THE MOST IMPORTANT THING IS TO REVEAL LATENT PRODUCTION POTENTIAL AND IMPROVE PLANNING METHODS*

W. Gomulka

FIRST SECRETARY, CENTRAL COMMITTEE, POLISH UNITED WORKERS' PARTY

The discussion on the first item on the agenda of our plenary meeting has been summed up in the draft resolution submitted to the Central Committee. This is an exceptionally important resolution. It is addressed primarily to the factory Party organizations and workers' self-management bodies, the engineers and technicians and generally the personnel of the enterprises.

The resolution poses before them and the local Party committees at all levels, as well as before the regional planning bodies, the task of revealing the untapped production reserves and improving planning. A feature of this decision—a feature which sets the present meeting of the Central Committee apart from previous meetings—is that it, like the first point on our agenda, stems from initiative from below, in this case from the intiative of the Katowice region Party organization.

INITIATIVE OF KATOWICE REGION PARTY ORGANIZATION

The Political Bureau of the Central Committee considered the Katowice initiative to be so important for the whole Party that it decided to take it up at a plenary meeting of the C.C. Because of this we departed from the customary practice and had, not the Political Bureau but the regional Party organization submit a report on the question to this meeting.

The problem raised in the report of the Katowice organization and discussed here is not a new one. We have discussed latent potential, investments, costs accounting, exports, planning, etc., time and again. But today the question is being posed in a new way. The importance of the present plenum consists in the fact that it has taken up the question far more concretely than before. This is to the credit of the Katowice region Party organization, an indication of its profound understanding of the decisions and directives of the Fourth Party Congress. The Katowice initiative should be taken up by all regional organizations, by the entire Party.

What is in question? As the title of our decision shows, two extremely important problems: utilization of latent production potential and improvement of planning. Much has been written about these problems. Plenary meetings of the Central Committee too have discussed them on more than one occasion. All this has yielded positive results. Writing and talking about these things is unquestionably very useful, but the most important thing is practical tapping of concrete production reserves and practical improvement of planning at every enterprise. As a rule, this cannot be done from the outside, by people who do not work at the given enterprise. It can be done above all by the workers and office employees, the Party and trade union organizations of each enterprise. If the Party guides the efforts of all along these lines, we shall surely discover the concealed production reserves that exist to one or another extent at every enterprise. By working along these lines, by enlisting the working and office employees, and above all the engineers and technicians, of every enterprise in this work, we shall also find effective ways of improving our methods of planning.

It cannot be said that we have done nothing in this respect to date, especially as regards tapping production reserves. A good deal has been accomplished. The personnel of all enterprises have long been working towards this on a lesser or greater scale. The most convincing proof of this are the tens of thousands of suggestions made for the Party Congress, most of which are being carried out. This is evident also from the overfulfilment of production plans of which the comrades spoke with justified pride from this rostrum. The point, however, is that the objective conditions now exist for posing the important questions of tapping unused production reserves and improving planning with the help of all the workers of the enterprises on a new and higher plane.

The way to do this has been indicated to the Party and the entire working class by the Katowice region Party organization and the Katowice workers. But, as was pointed out in the report, that which has been done so far in the Katowice region is not yet the ideal, but only the beginning of a new, higher stage. This is the crux of the matter.

THE ENTERPRISES SHOULD PLAY AS BIG A PART AS POSSIBLE IN DRAWING UP OUR ECONOMIC PLANS

At the Fourth Congress we spoke a great deal about improving planning, about rational, most effective use of investments, the need rapidly to increase exports, modernization and specialization of production, and many other problems directly or indirectly relating to planning of production and economic development generally.

Definite decisions were taken on these problems. We all know how complex they are and how important it is to improve planning methods. There are no ready-made universal recipes to go by; the solutions must be worked out in practical endeavor.

But there is no doubt that unless the workers of the various enterprises play a big part in drawing them up, our economic plans are bound to suffer from shortcomings. No one knows better than the personnel of a given enterprise how to increase its output with the least expenditure, how to make the most efficient use of plant, or where the bottlenecks are which prevent full use of the factory's capacity.

Since it is the workers of each factory that know their enterprise best of all, they are ones to do the groundwork in drafting its production and development plans. Their proposals will then enable the higher planning bodies to draw up optimal plans for the given branch, for industry as a whole, and for the entire socialized sector of the economy.

To carry out the decisions of the Congress concerning the elaboration of plans in a number of variants and the adoption of optimum solutions, each enterprise should work out its own draft plan.

Planning will become considerably more effective if the elaboration of the production and development plans for each enterprise and industry as a whole is carried out in three phases:

First phase: the Planning Commission of the Council of Ministers and the higher economic management bodies send down to the enterprises the initial, tentative projects, the preliminary target figures for both the long-range and current annual plans.

Second phase: the enterprise works out, on the basis of the preliminary draft received from its industrial amalgamation, its proposals for the plan. In drafting their plans, the workers and their organizations at the enterprises should above all strive to set their sights higher than the targets proposed by the amalgamations. If the targets proposed are too high to be feasible, the enterprise takes them up with the amalgamation with a view to bringing them within realistic bounds. If agreement cannot be reached, the decision rests with the Ministry concerned. As the experience of the Katowice and other regions has shown, the initial targets proposed by the amalgamations can be improved on by the workers at the enterprises.

The enterprises should display maximum initiative in drafting plans. They can produce two, three or more variants—one taking into account the funds available for investment and another disregarding them, a variant calling for additional investment, a variant with a view to coordination with other plants, and even a variant calling for changes in the assortment of output.

After the enterprises have drawn up the draft plans—and for this a definite time limit should be set—the third and last phase begins. At this stage the higher industrial management bodies and the Planning Commision of the Council of Ministers go over the drafts submitted by the enterprises and choose the best solutions offered and include them in the plans for the various branches and industry as a whole.

When this phase is completed the finalized plans will be handed down to the enterprises to be carried out.

Needless to say, it is within the powers of the higher bodies to accept the plans submitted by the enterprises, amalagmations and ministries may be allocated smaller sums for investment than originally proposed, while others may have their allocations increased. If an amalagmation does not accept a plan submitted to it by an enterprise, it should nevertheless send it on to the Ministry and the Planning Commission for final decision. Some enterprise plans calling for, say, an increase in production may not be approved because of a shortage of raw materials or for other reasons.

There is, however, no other way to ensure a wide choice of variants making for optimal planning than analytical elaboration of the initial drafts by the industrial enterprises and compilation of the final plan on the basis of these drafts.

Elaboration of draft plans by the workers of the enterprises implies extending socialist democracy, increasing the powers of the workers' self-management bodies, and giving the enterprises a bigger say in choosing lines of output and determining the direction and rate of their development.

A fundamental prerequisite of proper and conscientious elaboration of plans by the enterprises is an active, socialist attitude on the part of the entire personnel expressed in creative initiative on the job and in public life. It was this attitude that prompted people to put forward tens of thousands of suggestions of great value to our economy in the course of the preparations for the Party Congress. Every encouragement should be given to this creativity among the workers and all other working people, to this climate created by the Party organizations during the preparations for the Congress and after it.

PARTICIPATION OF THE PARTY ORGANIZATIONS AND LEADING BODIES

Such a climate can be sustained only through the activities of the Party organizations organized and guided by the Party committees at all levels. The plans of the enterprises will be drafted properly only if the regional, district, city and other local Party committees take a direct hand in this work. These committees should not only call for greater activity on the part of the Party branches at the big enterprises, the workers' self-management bodies and the workers generally, but render them assistance, correct them when they err, check up on the progress of the and give it guidance.

At some enterprises the managements in particular tend to minimize and conceal their latent potential so as to keep their plans down.

The Party committees can and must take a hand in putting a stop to such tendencies.

The commendable experience of some regions and especially Katowice region where the Party committees at all levels are taking a direct part in drafting the plans for the enterprises should be extended to all parts of the country. To carry out this enormous task the whole Party must be mobilized and the Party committees must be well acquainted with the situation at each enterprise. Representatives of these committees can help to reveal untapped reserves, to draw up plans properly and to correct faulty tendencies on the part of the managements only if they thoroughly know the enterprises and their problems. Hence it is not enough to attend production meetings in order to find out what the workers and the management have to suggest. The Party committees and their representatives must study in advance the functioning of the enterprise in question. Only then can they make a valuable contribution to the preliminary drafting of plans for the factory, put forward sound suggestions or challenge one or another figure, and help to harness all the latent production reserves.

Both the report and the discussion at our plenary meeting centred around two basic branches of industry: electrical engineering and metallurgy. But it is not only the enterprises in these industries that have to work out their production plans. This is a question concerning the whole of state and cooperative industry.

RESERVES EXIST EVERYWHERE

Every enterprise has latent potentialities. We have a general idea of the reserves existing at the key enterprises, for the attention of the state, administrative, economic and Party bodies is largely concentrated on them. The big enterprises have the strongest Party organizations and the best activists. But we know far less about the production reserves at the smaller enterprises, which constitute the overwhelming majority. For instance, none of the speakers here mentioned the woodworking, furniture, glass and other industries of great importance for both the home market and export trade.

Hardly any mention was made of the local enterprises belonging to producers' cooperatives, which too have a substantial production and play an important role in our economy, affecting the operation of the bigger enterprises with which they are associated.

More attention should be paid to these industries because of the need for a higher degree of coordination among enterprises which speakers here have noted, the need to introduce changes in the lines of output of various enterprises and to end over-concentration of industry in areas with a shortage of manpower.

Unless the Party organizations have a thorough knowledge of what is happening at the small enterprises, they cannot plan and suggest the best solutions as regards coordination of plants, changes in lines of output or deconcentration of plants. Therefore the regional and district Party committees, in carrying out the decisions of this meeting, should draw up plans of work taking in not only the key enterprises but also local and cooperative industry.

In our resolution we stipulate that the enterprises must complete the final drafts of their five-year plans no later than the first quarter of next year. The Party organizations will have to work hard and conscientiously in order to ensure in the brief space of time left that the five-year drafts will be given proper thought at every enterprise.

The Katowice region organization began this work earlier than others and has made more headway, but this organization too is aware that what has been done is only the beginning, that there still is much to be done, that many things still have to be examined anew. Things are more difficult in the regions that started later or are only beginning now. And there are also regions which, as could be seen from the reports of some regional committee secretaries, have not even made a beginning. These regions must make up for lost time. If we bear in mind that there is only four months left, it can be said in advance that some of the enterprise five-year plan drafts will not be brought up to the mark, that at many enterprises they will be drawn up without the participation of the local committees, without the benefit of the experience of the Party activists. But regardless of how thoroughly they will be elaborated, these drafts must be completed by the end of the first quarter of 1965. Otherwise the higher managerial bodies, industrial amalgamations, ministries and the Planning Commission will not have enough time to draw up the final variant of our economic plan for the next five years.

This does not mean, however, that the work of the Party committees and organizations will be done with the completion of the draft five-year plans of the enterprises. The point is that the planning method we recommend in drawing up the five-year plan should be employed in working out the annual plans.

The Party organizations are only beginning to acquire a little more experience, and the work of compiling the drafts of the five-year plan will help them to participate in drafting the annual plans.

INVESTMENT ALLOCATIONS SHOULD NOT BE EXCEEDED

The five-year plan is the general guideline for the development of our economy as a whole, and it is only in the annual plans that concrete tasks are defined, subject, moreover, to changes dictated by current needs.

What is the chief danger to guard against in drafting both long-range and annual plans?

The main danger, and one which the Katowice organization did not fully succeed in avoiding, consists in asking for more appropriations. A good many such suggestions were made at this plenum as well. This is a mistake.

The volume of capital investment provided for in the five-year plan, as we have pointed out many times, is maximal and cannot be exceeded.

Nor should reserve capital be drawn upon in drafting plans, for this negates the very purpose of the reserve. Each enterprise or branch should try to achieve the optimal advantage and the best results by making the most rational and effective use of the funds allotted to it.

The erroneous methods of calculating economic effect which unfortunately were recommended by some comrades from this platform should also be rejected. These comrades spoke about the high returns per zloty from investments in certain sectors. Such calculations are superficial and erroneous. We know very well that the biggest returns may be most easily obtained in manufacturing industry.

Estimates of the effectivenes of investment must take into account the capital expenditures on the raw and other materials needed. Only then is it possible to ascertain the actual returns on investments in manufacturing. Calculations which omit these expenditures or which fail to take into account the cost of importing materials are misleading.

In drafting plans it is necessary to pay heed to recommendations aimed at raising labor productivity, lowering production costs and also expenditure of labor and materials, mainly by improving technology. We must frankly admit that the question of improving technology of production has not yet been properly appreciated by the managements of our enterprises, government departments or the Party organizations. If we compare, for example, data on the replacement of machining by stamping with data from the most highly developed countries we will find that we are advancing at a snail's pace in this sphere. It is noteworthy that the enterprises themselves show no initiative in this respect, they do not exert pressure or ask for machinery for the purpose. On the contrary, from year to year we fail to reach the very modest targets we have set ourselves in this field, and the program for the next five-year period is minimal. This branch is poorly equipped technically, it has neither the technological base nor the cadres. And not enough interest is displayed in it. Yet this is a very important question, one that to a great extent determines our technological progress, reduction of production costs, consumption of materials, etc.

A similar state of affairs obtained until recently in two other fields—export and housing. Workers' collectives, factories, managements and Party organizations took no interest in these matters. It required much effort to overcome these sentiments, this neglectful attitude to those questions. As a result of these efforts the situation today is quite different. Today nearly every enterprise is tackling the question of export, searching for new production possibilities, new ways of improving quality and assortment, etc.

At this stage it is necessary to tackle the problem of technological progress, modernization of technology and lowering of production cost as vigorously and effectively as in the case of exports.

A few words, comrades, about horizontal coordination, or so-called regional planning.

This is a difficult problem. We have spoken of it more than once, and much has already been accomplished in this respect. The chief thing here is qualified local personnel. Perhaps it would be a good thing to strengthen the regional planning bodies in areas with the biggest concentration of industry, but everything hinges on the qualifications of the personnel.

In conclusion I should like to say that today's plenum is a good step forward in carrying out the decisions adopted by our Fourth Congress.

In order to fulfill the tasks mentioned here it is essential to maintain the activity of the workers' collectives on a high level, to observe financial and labor discipline, which, as the comrades have noted here, gave such good results in the current year. It is necessary to maintain this level in the coming years, and to improve the work of the whole Party and thereby ensure the speedy fulfilment of the tasks outlined by the Party Congress and by this Plenum.

BELGIAN COMMUNISTS CONDEMN THE AGGRESSION*

Bent on its adventuristic policy of giving military support to Tshombe and his army, the Belgian government has landed in Stanleyville, from American planes, the paratroopers whose base was set up on Ascension Island recently.

Humanitarian reasons aduced to justify this irresponsible step do not hold water.

In reality, the landing of the Belgian paratroopers coincided with the Congolese national army's attack on Stanleyville, which means coordination of hostilities against the Congolese nationalist forces and therefore flagrant interference in the internal affairs of the Congolese Republic.

As a matter of fact, it is the Belgian government which is placing in jeopardy the lives of the Belgian and other white civilians residing in the Congo whose security would have never been menaced had there been no interference in the political life of an independent state.

The situation is very grave.

Belgium encounters just reprobation from the overwhelming majority of world public opinion. It is antagonizing the countries of the third world and in particular the African countries whose desire to negotiate has been expressed by President Kenyatta. By rejecting peaceful initiatives it is setting a dangerous example of solutions by force and introducing into the international situation a new element of tension which benefits only the racist and bellicose ultras.

The Belgian government has reverted, in effect, to a reactionary policy condemned by the working people, by the democrats comprising the majority of the nation.

The Political Bureau of the Communist Party of Belgium reiterates the proposals it has repeatedly made, specifying them once again in its November 21 resolution.

The Belgian government, which is already responsible for the loss of human lives should stop immediately all military operations and withdraw the paratroopers and all Belgian military personnel from the Congo.

This is the only means of preventing new tragedies and, if it is still possible, paving the way for the establishment of normal relations between the Belgian and Congolese peoples.

Political Bureau,
Communist Party of Belgium

STATEMENT OF THE POLITICAL BUREAU OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF GREECE

The changes in the leadership of the CPSU and the Soviet government evoked lively interest in the Communist Party of Greece, just as in the other Communist parties.

This is quite understandable, for owing to its historical experience, vanguard role in the world Communist movement and position of the ruling party in the first and the mightiest socialist state the CPSU strongly influences world developments and the solution of problems facing the world Communist movement.

We have received with satisfaction the statements of the CPSU leaders and the additional information the CC, CPSU has given us in reply to our letter, to the effect that the CPSU will continue to pursue steadfastly the line of its 20th, 21st and 22nd congresses and the line of the 1957 and 1960 conferences, and that the changes were effected in conformity with Party principles and the Leninist standards of intra-Party democracy. The Political Bureau of the CC, CPG stresses that this is of paramount importance. This does not mean, however, that Comrade Khrushchov's services are ignored.

In our country, as all over the world, reactionaries have attempted to distort the truth about the changes in the CPSU and Soviet Government leadership with a view to launching a new anti-communist campaign and sowing confusion, hesitation and doubts among the Communists, the working class and the people in general. At the same time expellees from the CPG longing for a return to the old abnormal regime in the Party have decided that they can take advantage of the recent events for their anti-Party purposes.

Not only the CPG but the entire democratic movement in our country suffered from the grievous effects of the personality cult regime and the dogmatic adventuristic line of the previous CPG leadership. From its rich positive experience our Party knows what an influence the decisions of the historic Twentieth Congress of the CPSU, the Moscow conferences as well as the sixth enlarged plenary meeting of the Central and Control committees and the Eighth Congress of the CPG exerted on the popular-democratic movement in Greece. Any attempt of anti-Party elements to divert the Communists from the line of the sixth plenary meeting, the line of the 20th CPSU Congress and the Moscow Conferences, is therefore, doomed to failure.

Absolutely confident of the correctness of its line, which is confirmed in the course of the everyday struggles of the people, the CPG will be even more persistent in the pursuit of this line, for it accords with the interests of the working class, the working people in general and the entire nation, with the requirements of our country's progress.

As before, the CPG will continue to fight, together with the CPSU and the other fraternal parties, for cementing the unity of the world Communist movement.

LABOUR IN POWER — WHAT NEXT?*

John Gollan

GENERAL SECRETARY OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY

The defeat of the Tories after 13 years is of the greatest possible political significance. It can be made the start of a big new political advance in Britain.

It was the result of popular dissatisfaction going far beyond working-class ranks and reflects the crisis in British imperialism.

But while it was a vote for a change, it was not the resounding vote of confidence in the Labour Party and Labour policies which was possible.

Some argued that the less radical Labour's program, the more likely it was to attract the so-called uncommitted voter.

In fact the policy was watered down with this aim. This did not bring the desired result. Instead we have the big Liberal vote and the tiny Labour majority.

What is the big thing facing every Labour supporter, every Communist, every progressive? To work in such a way as to ensure that the Tories are not allowed to stage a comeback.

To ensure that the next election, whenever it is fought, results in an even greater resounding Tory defeat.

The Government starts with an enormous fund of good will—great masses of the people not only want the Labour Government to survive, but to win.

HOW WE BACK THE GOVERNMENT

We Communists want the Labour Government to survive and win victories for the people. We will support any progressive measures or steps it takes.

Harold Wilson's attitude that he intends to govern despite the slender majority, is correct. There should be no concessions to the Tories.

Any criticism we make will be to strengthen the Government and its standing with the people.

Our test will be what is good for the working class and the mass of the people, and what is bad for the Tories and the millionaires.

The new Government has inherited sharp, social, political and economic problems from the Tories—the acute balance of payments crisis (and here the key issue is military expenditure abroad); the need to modernize the economy (involving automation and consequent great social issues); the acute problems of housing, rents, pensions and education; the ending of the colonial wars and the general direction of foreign policy.

What the mass of the people want is systematic advance in our social services, the type of modernization which brings advances in wages and conditions, decisive action against the monopolists, speculation and profits, the cutting of military expenditure and new initiatives in British foreign policy to end colonial wars and place the country in the vanguard of the struggle for peaceful coexistence and disarmament.

It will be noted that the key Cabinet positions, responsible for major policy in home and foreign affairs, are in the hands of the Right-wing of the movement.

As for those in the Left in the Government and the Left M.P.s. in general, they can rest assured that every struggle they put up for progressive policies will get the full backing of all that is best in the movement.

QUEEN'S SPEECH AND BUDGET

We now have the first steps to tackle the economy, the Queen's Speech and the first Budget.

On the economy generally, Steel will be nationalized, the Crown Commission on Land is to be introduced.

There is the promise to deal with speculative gains in the spring and the halt to office building in London.

But at the same time we have the general assurance to the big monopolies that Labour will work in partnership with them: Callaghan's reassurance to the City, Jay's statement that they have no bias against private business, that profits earned are the sign of a healthy economy, and Brown's statement that "We want private enterprise to flourish." So we have a dual approach.

The first steps to tackle the balance of payments have been taken with the 15 per cent imports tax, the 2 per cent export rebate.

These steps will cut imports, but they will also increase prices, and are already inviting retaliation from some of Britain's trading partners.

Further, the overseas borrowing to ease the immediate pressure will create further problems later.

A really big change in the adverse balance can only come by slashing military expenditure abroad and the export of capital.

On the social side there has been the widely welcomed decision to increase pensions and benefits. The prescription charges are to be removed.

ACTION AGAINST EVICTIONS

The Rent Act is to be repealed and emergency legislation to stop evictions has been drafted.

But the new benefits will not operate till March. The increase of 2s in the insurance stamps is a heavy imposition on the workers, and the Petrol Tax means dearer transport.

The new taxes will reduce purchasing power more than the pensions increases will raise it.

The Government regards an "incomes" policy as its major preoccupation. There is to be a reorganization of NEDC (National Economic Development Council). The consultation with the trade unions and the employers has commenced.

There is insistence on giving up the so-called "restrictive practices", re-training and severance pay to deal with the upheavals of automation.

But trade unionists have noted that while the Government is clear that wages are to be restrained, it is vague on prices, and even more vague on profits, promising fiscal measures to deal with what they describe as "excessive" profits and dividends.

On foreign and defense policy we have had the visit of Gordon Walker to the U.S., the reaffirmation of NATO, the proposed visit to re-negotiate Nasseau and a dangerous ambiguity on the MLF.

We don't want to pre-judge issues. Many points are still unclear. But even now it is possible to make these points.

ADVANCE SOCIAL SERVICES

1. Any measure to advance the social services and deal with speculation should be welcomed and supported. The movement will look to the Crown Commission on Land to give a heavy blow to land speculation.

The new Rent Act should not only give all tenants security of tenure, but fix maximum rents at no higher than current rateable value.

The Government should fix a target of 400,000 council houses a year for rent, and councils should get loans at 2 per cent with higher subsidies.

2. The movement will support any new legislation to restore the position of the trade unions to that prior to the Rookes v Barnard judgement.

3. Major programs of social advance cannot go ahead while military expenditure and monopoly remain unchecked.

The Government has said it will reexamine military expenditure. This is urgent and it should aim at a substantial reduction particularly in military expenditure abroad.

From the general objectives stated so far, it is our duty to warn the movement that the proposed partnership with the big monopolies, the development of modernization and automation under their control, will only create the most acute social problems, as the U.S. shows.

The general aims to maintain the City, the international role of sterling, and big military expenditure here and abroad do not differ radically from the previous Tory policies and if continued will only result in current balance of payments problems and dislocation of the economy.

4. In this light we must consider the so-called "incomes" policy. We note that the trade union movement generally has shown no inclination to abandon the wages struggle.

We as a Party are completely opposed to wage restraint. We think that the trade union movement should make clear to the Government now that it will not support a policy of wage restraint

It is against the interests of the workers, the economy and the country as a whole.

We call on all Left and progressive sections to stand firm on this issue.

Profits and dividends should be tackled by the immediate measures of a far-reaching capital gains tax, an increased profits tax and a 1 per cent wealth tax.

As for automation, any proposals advanced must be the subject of prior negotiations with the unions particularly at factory level. We are all for modernization, but not as a means of increasing exploitation and redundancy, but to benefit the people and bring a shorter working week.

5. We call for a program of immediate action against the monopolies.

The great firms who are the "price leaders" in most industries must refer all proposed price increases to an enlarged Monopolies Commission.

All proposed raw material price increases must likewise be referred to the Monopolies Commission.

No merger of firms above a certain size should be permitted until justification is presented to the Monopolies Commission and its consent obtained.

6. We call on the Government to initiate new measures on foreign policy aiming at new independent British initiatives.

As first steps, to oppose out-right the MLF or any similar proposal for a joint nuclear force; to propose a non-aggression pact between NATO and the Warsaw Pact Powers; to propose extension of the Test-Ban Treaty to all tests; atom-free zones in Europe; systematic measures to end the colonial wars and reduce military expenditures.

We appeal for the greatest mass campaigning of the Labour and trade union movement for these aims. We need now more than ever a united, active trade union movement to defend and advance conditions. The claims of the dockers, railwaymen, engineers and other sections should be supported.

We need the strongest possible tenants' movement to force the landlords to lower rents. We need still greater activity by the pensioners.

The Peace movement should now develop a great, renewed national campaign for its aims and in particular against the MLF. Here we should recall the resolutions of the Trade Union Congresses and the Labour movement generally on these issues.

We should have the greatest possible anti-colonial mass movements of solidarity and action on Rhodesia, South Africa, Malaysia and Aden, and against racial discrimination.

How far the Government goes will depend in the last analysis on the scope and size of the mass movement. This is the way to carry forward the political victory in the General Election to the lasting defeat of the Tories.

COMMUNIST POLL RESULTS

Our election results have got to be seen against the political background as a whole with the possibility of a Labour Government after 13 years of Tory rule. We knew we would have to fight for every vote.

The campaign was a considerable effort on our part; double the number of seats, compared with 1959, and coming on the heels of our biggest municipal election effort for many years.

Our candidates got 46,532 votes, or 3.3 per cent of the total poll in the constituencies we contested. This compares with the best general all-round effort of 4.7 per cent in the special circumstances of the Greater London election, in which we contested all seats and voters were able to give us one of their three or more votes.

Of 21 results comparable with 1959 or the by-elections, 13 were up, two static and six down. Of the remaining 14, nine were encouraging first efforts, three where the vote was not too bad, although better was expected. Two were very poor, although we didn't expect very much different.

Of those down, West Fife and Rhonda East have caused the most serious concern to the Party.

Our Scottish and Welsh members should go into the matter deeply. While excellent mass work is done by individuals in both places, the political work and organization of the Party for several years has not been what it should be.

We are not reaching out to the young people—our support tends to be among the older age groups.

In both places our main support has come from the miners and the mining industry has contracted.

It will be for the Party center to help both districts to deal with the position.

We obtained more national publicity on the air and in the Press than in 1959, largely due to our TV campaign, which we have made an important national democratic issue. We also got some national Press publicity for our policy statements.

Everybody interested in the election knew that we were in the field and fighting, even if they did not always know what we were fighting for. To some extent we were regarded as the fourth party.

Although this was an advance, it was not nearly enough to enable us to overcome the handicap of no TV time, the election being regarded by most workers as a contest between two parties or even two party leaders.

A BETTER CAMPAIGN

In nearly all our constituencies its was estimated that the campaign was better than ever before.

A major weakness was our failure to make a national impact. We had, as it were, 36 separate campaigns.

The problem here is bound up with our present size and stage of development. There is no easy way forward.

The extension of our municipal contest this year was an advance. So was the Greater London contest.

So was the extension of our contests from 18 to 36 in this General Election. Yet the fact remains that 36 contests was only a marginal participation in the election and stretched our resources. The wasted vote argument is very much bound up with this.

The only way to create a greater national impact is systematically to extend the number of our contests. This in turn depends on our growth in the factories and locally, the development of the mass work of our branches, the further extension of municipal contests, the extension of Daily Worker and literature sales.

This was the electoral policy decided on by the Twenty-Eighth National Congress of the Party.

The overwhelming majority of members active in the election campaign have reaffirmed this from the political experience of the campaign.

Some, however, because of our still generally low level of results, think we should cut down our contests and concentrate our forces.

In fact, this would be a retreat and would solve none of our political problems. The extent to which you can concentrate Party effort in a few constituencies during an election is limited.

THAT "GINGER GROUP" IDEA

It means that the vast majority of the Party simply wouldn't be in the electoral fight.

It would also mean that we, in fact, give up the aim of developing a mass Party despite all the problems involved and falling back on the ginger-group conception.

The only way forward lies in the systematic development of our electoral work as part and parcel of our mass campaigning, our mass work in the factories and the Labour movement generally.

But even with the 36 candidates we could have made a bigger national impact, if in our general policy we had selected certain key issues, spotlighted them and made the running on them, nationally and locally.

We still don't get to the people sufficiently in between elections and can't overcome this during a three-week election campaign.

A lot now depends on the political developments and, in view of the size of Labour's majority, the possibility of an early General Election.

We must develop mass public campaigning on the issues. As the situation develops we should select the key points and concentrate on them.

We should, both at the center and in the districts, take a hard look at all forms of propaganda in order to develop every possible method that will carry our policy out far wider.

We ask the district committees to see the development of sales of the Daily Worker and pamphlets and our journals as the basis for our public work and Party growth.

PLAN FURTHER CONTESTS

If there is an early General Election we recommend the districts contest in the 35 constituencies and consider a further small number of places where we can get a good vote.

If the election comes later, each district should select an additional number of constituencies and work to build in them during the next two years the Party membership, organization, finance, more municipal contests and our votes.

There is need to prepare for the 1965 municipal elections in all boroughs and a number of urban districts outside Greater London.

We shall press ahead with our TV campaign and prepare a memorandum on electoral reform for submission to the Speakers' Conference.

The present political situation is one of great opportunity and progress. We are well aware of the dangers and problems.

The future depends on the activities and strength of the mass movement and the Communist Party has a key part to play in achieving what the Labour movement and people want and hope for after the General Election.

COLLECTIVE LEADERSHIP OF THE CPSU— A GUARANTEE OF PEACE AND SOCIALISM*

Gilberto Vieira

FIRST SECRETARY, CC, COMMUNIST PARTY OF COLOMBIA

The imperialist monopolies paying for the "sensational" inventions of their press continue to spread all kinds of cock-and-bull stories about why N. S. Khrushchov was relieved of his duties as Chairman of the Council of Ministers and First Secretary of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

The CPSU Central Committee has not published an explanatory document yet, but in conformity with the procedures adopted in the CPSU, ample information will appear in the press as soon as the process of informing all party organizations is completed.

The well-known Pravda editorial of October 17 contains some important statements shedding light on the reasons why Khrushchov was relieved of his duties. It is pointed out there that "the Leninist party is opposed to subjectivism . . . hare-brained projects, rash conclusions and hasty decisions and actions divorced from reality, boasting and empty talk, high-handed methods. . . ." Stress is laid on the basic thesis that collective leadership is the most important principle of the Party, which "firmly and consistently opposes the ideology and practice of the personality cult as alien to Marxism-Leninism. . . ."

Although we know only some of the reasons for the release of N. S. Khrushchov from his duties, it can be said that the main criticisms levelled at him at the October 14 plenary meeting were connected with violations of the principle of collective leadership expressed in the adoption of one-man decisions. The discussion of this question at the plenary meeting is known to have culminated in Khrushchov admitting his errors and handing in his resignation, which was unanimously accepted.

It should be stressed that it was a collective discussion and that the decision was taken by the entire Central Committee. It is a fairly big organ whose members are the most responsible and competent cadres of the world's most experienced Communist party. The problem of leadership was solved, and this was a convincing evidence of the solidity of the Soviet system which showed that even a person of Khrushchov's authority and prestige can be replaced in a normal procedure. This is indicative of the tremendous progress that has been made since the period of Stalin's personality cult and the great successes scored in implementing

There are elements among both the Colombian "Left" and Right who consider that Nikita Khrushchov's resignation will signify radical changes in some respects of the policy of the state and the CPSU. In reality, even if any changes can be expected at all, they can only be aimed at improving some methods. Those who hope for a departure from, or a "modification" of, the principles promulgated in the program of the CPSU, are in for a disappointment.

In the future N. S. Khrushchov's merits and demerits can be explained in greater detail. Public opinion in the capitalist and developing countries firmly associated Khrushchov's name with the struggle for peace, against the mortal danger of thermonuclear war in our epoch. Some people expressed the apprehension or hope—depending on their position—that the Soviet Union would change its foreign policy in this respect.

But the fact is that the CPSU policy is based on Marxist-Leninist principles and does not depend on the whims of a particular leader. The idea of peaceful coexistence as a form of economic, scientific and cultural competition between socialism and capitalism, aimed at avoiding a devastating war between the two opposed systems, was put forward by Lenin and has been consistently implemented by the Soviet state ever since. The Program of the CPSU adopted by the 22nd Congress states: "Peaceful coexistence serves as a basis for the peaceful competition between socialism and capitalism on an international scale and constitutes a specific form of class struggle between them. . . . The policy of peaceful coexistence is in accord with the vital interests of all mankind, except the big monopoly magnates and the militarists."

As regards the differences between the leaders of the Communist Party of China and the vast majority of the Communist and Workers' parties, they present an intricate problem whose solution does not depend on the Communist Party of the Soviet Union alone. It can be resolved, not by noisy polemic, but by the force of facts, by contemporary historical development. It is possible and desirable that the changes in the CPSU leadership should help towards creating a new atmosphere in which, as Palmiro Togliatti wanted, it would be possible to conduct the "polemic . . . without going to verbal extremes and without sweeping accusations, that is, to deal with concrete issues, in an objective and convincing manner, and always to show respect for the opponent."

On the 47th anniversary of the glorious Soviet revolution, which ushered in a new era in mankind's history, we once again reaffirm our unshakable confidence in the CPSU, the great party of Lenin which gives us political lessons of inestimable value. This time as well it has shown us how strictly one should observe the principle of collective leadership, combating any manifestations of the personality cult.

The wisdom of the collective leadership, the experience, unity and self-criticism of the CPSU Central Committee are a guarantee that the Soviet Union will steadfastly continue the victorious construction of communism; that the cause of world peace will always have in the USSR its champion, a champion as staunch as it is mighty; that heroic Cuba will enjoy the Soviet Union's continued support in its struggle against the infamous blockade imposed by the U.S. imperialists; that the USSR will invariably be a source of inspiration to the peoples fighting for liberation from the imperialist yoke; that the ideological struggle for the unity of the world Communist movement will go on developing on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and the independence of each Communist party.

FOR DEMOCRACY AND PEACE

DOCUMENTS* OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF ECUADOR

For our Party members to be able better to comprehend the policy of the Party and to implement it more efficiently it is essential that they correctly assess the situation both inside and outside the country and make a Marxist-Leninist analysis of it. Hence the need to formulate some basic principles that will help appraise correctly the trend of internal and international events and prove the correctness of the Communist stand.

Fairly broad sections of the population, especially the vacillating petty-bourgeois elements and elements from other classes, who have been led astray by the lying propaganda of the enemies of the people, still cherish illusions regarding the possibility of an intermediate position between capitalism and socialism and tend to misinterpret our chief slogan of the struggle for democracy and peace, for peaceful coexistence and disarmament, as "conciliation" with imperialism at the expense of the national-liberation and revolutionary movement.

I

THE STRUGGLE FOR DEMOCRACY

1. Is There an Intermediate Position Between Socialism and Capitalism?

Many representatives of the above-mentioned sections are acting in a revolutionary spirit; they are fighting for the interests of the people, against social injustice, against the misery and suffering of the masses. At the same time they are not against capitalism, for they consider that all these problems can be solved within the framework of capitalism. Clearly we Communists cannot demand that these people declare themselves to be "enemies of capitalism" as a condition for joint struggle for the solution of concrete problems of improving the conditions of the masses and ensuring the country's progress. That would be sheer sectarianism. It is precisely in order to avoid sectarianism, in order to promote unity of action and avoid fatal consequences for the democratic and revolutionary movement that may follow from incorrect appraisal that we Communists must have complete clarity on the question of whether this neutral or intermediate position is possible; is it possible in the present internal and international situation, to fight for the interests of the people while keeping capitalist rule intact, disregarding, to some extent, the fundamental principles of scientific socialism, and without drawing upon the rich revolutionary experience of the peoples who have already won freedom and are building socialism and communism?

Such seemingly "independent" positions are undoubtedly harmful to the struggle of the masses, for they create a breach which the imperialist agents utilize for smuggling in anti-communism and for engineering splits. Such positions facilitate the advocacy of the idea that all problems can be solved without the participation either of the capitalist or the Communist. These theses merely add grist to the capitalist mill. In view of this it is of vital importance that we should explain this problem. We do not propose to make an exhaustive analysis of the matter; we shall merely try, on the basis of our country's revolutionary experience, to make some assessments which will help us answer the question correctly.

2. The Policy of the Peoples

Only two kinds of policy are possible in the world today.

One of them is the policy of the peoples, the policy of those who are fighting for a new life for the masses, for the elimination of antiquated institutions and impediments to the country's development and improvement of the well-being of the peoples. This struggle is directed against any stagnation, backwardness, oppression, exploitation and injustice from which the overwhelming majority of the population suffers.

This is a progressive policy. Consequently, all actions of the masses accord with it: the actions of workers, office employees, artisans, specialists, etc., for better living and working conditions, higher wages and incomes, and so on; of students and intellectuals for better conditions for study and artistic and scientific work, for decent remuneration; of peasants against feudal oppression and for a democratic agrarian reform; of the unemployed for their needs and above all for permanent and well-paid work; of women against discrimination, for political and social equality, for constant child care. In line with this policy is also the struggle for more far-reaching aims: against feudalism, oligarchies and imperialist monopolies, for peace, for national and social emancipation. All these actions, seemingly disconnected, intertwine, reinforce and complement each other, because they all are aimed against a common enemy—capitalism (identified, in our conditions, with a local oligarchy and foreign imperialism), which resists any change, any advance, any gain of the people.

Such is the objective state of affairs, and it does not depend on those who take part in actions and on whether or not they consider they are fighting against capitalism. In addition, herein lies the basis for a broad unity of action between the Communist Party, the Revolutionary Socialist Party and other democratic political groups; unity which emerges from, and is determined by, class interests and by the demands put forward by the Confederation of Working People together with the Coastal Agricultural Workers' Federation and the Indian Federation and their organizations; unity which has also been developed, in one way or another, by other class and democratic associations.

Capitalism is a system of exploitation and oppression of the working people and the people in general by a handful of industrialists and monopolists who have captured the means of production, the wealth of the country and the machinery of state and exercise their economic, political and ideological rule, penetrating into all fields of human activity. In our country, already several months before the military coup of July 11, 1963, the exploiter classes, subservient to U.S. imperialism, had lost domination in the government, the National Congress, the judicature, the provincial and cantonal councils, etc., although they utilized the constitutional system they had created in order to seize the institutions of state and make them serve their class interests. In addition to state power, the big capitalists possess powerful economic levers. Supported by the imperialist monopolies, they have become a powerful oligarchy grouped around the banks, the chambers of commerce, agriculture and industry, and so on. In conformity with the "law," all these organizations participate in a large number of big joint-stock companies, such as the Institute of Social Insurance and Labor, the United Banks of Economic Development, the Central Bank, the Bank Administration, the Charity Council, Social Insurance, the Red Cross Society, the Supreme University Council, etc.

This oligarchy is closely connected with U.S. imperialism which, in turn, controls and directs the most important aspects of the life of the country through its inter-American cooperative services (health, education, agriculture, military aid, etc.) on the strength of the so-called Point IV (which enables them to interfere in all kinds of "technical" activity and split the movements of workers, students, peasants and artisans, as well as to establish control over university organizations); resorting to the assistance of the Peace Corps (which helps the imperialists infiltrate all fields of social life, sport in particular, to carry on espionage work and facilitate imperialist penetration), and finally, with the aid of the Alliance for Progress—the main channel through which all these activities are directed for the purpose of subordinating our country still more to the U.S. monopolies. This colonialist activity of U.S. imperialism is assisted by such supra-national institutions as the Organization of American States, the International monetary Fund, the Latin American Free Trade Association, the Inter-American Bank of Development, and others. Their objective is to impose on us the neo-colonialist diktat of U.S. imperialism, which is incompatible with our sovereignty, free trade, the stability of our currency, and our national interests.

The local oligarchy and imperialism have concentrated in their hands vast economic, political, social and ideological power. Their investments enable them to control the press and other propaganda media (the radio, television, etc.) and supply them with the propaganda material without which these organs of "free speech and thought" could not exist. They have the services of the majority of bourgeois party leaders. By supporting various political parties and groups the plutocracy and imperialism can palm off forgeries as a free expression of the will of the people and hoodwink the masses with the spurious propaganda of "representative democracy." Sport, the cinema and the church—all are in the service of the dictatorship and the bourgeoisie, in the service of this machine which the exploiters have streamlined in order to suppress nearly the entire population and which has spread its tentacles throughout the country.

That is why actions for the demands of all sections of the population inevitably come into collision with capitalism and imperialism with their instruments and forms of exploitation and oppression. This means that in the final analysis all actions of the people are essential in the great battle against capitalist exploitation and imperialist oppression. However it is essential that all the contingents of the masses led by the working class and its vanguard, the Communist Party, should mobilize all their forces in the struggle for the vital demands, that these actions should merge into one big revolutionary stream. This will lead to still greater unity, better organization, and joint leadership. In this connection the Program of the Party advances the main strategic slogan of building up a National Liberation Front spearheaded against imperialist domination. This Front will constitute the basis for the subsequent development of the struggle against capitalism and the entire system of exploitation. This has been demonstrated by the revolutionary experience of the peoples who have freed themselves from the colonial yoke and imperialist dependence, such as the peoples of the Soviet Union, Cuba, China, Algeria and other Asian and African countries who are building socialism or embarking on the socialist road.

Thus our Program stresses that in the final analysis it is the task of the revolutionary movement, and of our Party in particular, to ensure that the various isolated actions, including actions by some bourgeois circles, as well as popular actions of a purely economic or even reformist character, should become part of the common struggle for the aims of the anti-feudal, anti-imperialist, democratic revolution and for the subsequent transition to socialism.

This thesis is corroborated by the revolutionary experience of our country. The united actions of workers, peasants, office employees and others, supported and headed by the Confederation of Working People, the biggest united working people's organization, were marked, despite their limited objectives and participation, by great militancy and resulted in direct clashes with the entire apparatus of the bourgeois dictatorship—the police, the army, the chambers of commerce, agriculture and industry, the press, radio, television and other propaganda media, the executive power, the National Congress, the judiciary system, the Ministry of Labor, and various public bourgeois organizations. This showed to the people the anti-popular, reactionary class nature of the bourgeois state and contributed to the rapid rise of the revolutionary sentiment of the masses.

Such was the case with many working people's actions in Guayaquil and other regions of the country. The same can be said about the peasants working at the big estates of local landlords and foreign monopolies in many coastal and mountain provinces. Many of these actions developed into real class battles.

On the other hand, in addition to being directed against one and the same enemy, all these actions have another common feature: in order to be effective more democracy is needed, although at the same time they contain elements of a potential broadening of democracy. This is not to say that they can take place only in conditions of democracy. But they should never be isolated from the struggle for democracy, which is primary for all sections fighting for their specific demands, irrespective of their views on democracy. The very fact of taking joint actions and presenting demands promises democratic freedoms, such as the freedom of organization, assembly and presentation of demands, the freedom of thought, etc.

The essence of the demands that are being advanced, the actions undertaken by the masses, and the means they employ to secure victory signify an extension of democracy. This is taking place daily in the course of actions by workers, peasants and other working people. If all democratic freedoms, even the most limited ones, are not utilized whenever possible, and if they are not defended with maximum determination, energy, ardor and persistence, which alone can foil the maneuvers of the reactionaries, exploiters and their organs of repression, democracy is weakened and the way is paved for the establishment of the most undemocratic, cynical and ruthless regimes. That was precisely what finally happened in our country, where an ultra-reactionary military dictatorship was established.

In recent years the fighters for democracy in our country did not act with sufficient energy. The government of Velesco, Plaza, Ponce and others increasingly restricted the democratic freedoms of the people, cynically trampled upon them and persecuted progressives and democrats, who failed to organize a vigorous large-scale rebuff. The press and other propaganda media were free to misrepresent everything pertaining to the revolutionary and popular movements and their leaders, whereas only insignificant popular and trade-union press facilities were at our disposal. That prevented us from duly exposing their efforts to deceive the people. That was why the results of the actions of workers and other strata were modest, and even big successes, such as those scored in 1936, 1944 and 1961, were short-lived. Unquestionably, all democratic gains were won in hard struggle, including a popular uprising. But it should be admitted that we did not display constant militant vigilance and failed to act promptly and resolutely against any, even the slightest, infringements of democracy.

That was why the reactionaries and imperialists were able to utilize a whole arsenal of means and subterfuges to attack and reduce to nil the democratic gains of the people, the workers in the first place. When the masses joined in the active struggle demanding satisfaction of their demands and respect for their rights (recognized by bourgeois legislation), the employers, landlords and other reactionaries resorted to all kinds of anti-democratic and unscrupulous measures designed to deceive and confuse the masses. They suborned judges to institute proceedings and declare the demands of the masses to be unjust, bribed officials from labor bodies* and police chiefs and launched a slanderous anti-communist campaign in the yellow press. Confronted with the growing unity and solidarity of the working people and the masses generally and with the mobilization of their forces threatening to put an end to the injustices, the employers and other reactionaries began to flout their own bourgeois laws and hired assassins and other criminals in an attempt to break the militant spirit of the movement. Having failed to suppress the struggle of the masses for their demands with the help of these means, the reactionaries used the army, the police and the navy. When even these extreme measures proved insufficient to check the rise of the popular forces, the reactionaries unleashed terror in order to lay the blame on the working people and the democratic forces, to slander the fighting patriots. They launched a vicious anti-communist campaign and ruthless repressions. Realizing that the actions of the masses and their revolutionary spirit threatened to topple the already shady edifice, of so-called bourgeois democracy, and wishing to save it and "gain time," they openly steered a course towards a reactionary military dictatorship. There is no doubt that continued actions by the masses, who have gained new experience, will demolish this prop in the shape of the military dictatorship, which, incidentally, is beginning to disintegrate rapidly itself.

The bourgeois-democratic regime, being a limited democratic system, does not promote the interests of the majority of the population. While serving a minority class and carrying out its policy of exploitation and oppression, it is confronted with attempts of the masses to use at least the curtailed democratic freedoms proclaimed by bourgeois constitutions. But unless the masses fight for the consolidation and extension of the limited democratic forms existing under capitalism and unless their democratic gains are guaranteed, it will be impossible to pave the way to achieving higher forms of democracy, the democracy of the most developed type which is established under socialism and blossoms out fully under communism.

Highly valuable in this respect are the lessons of the struggle of the North American Negroes, who do not limit themselves to demanding a legislation conforming to human rights and aimed at ending racial discrimination, but fight selflessly for the realization of their rights already provided for in the law recently adopted in the United States.

In their day-to-day activity the Communists cannot disregard the democratic essence of the struggle of the people for their legitimate rights and the fact that this struggle is being waged against a common enemy. What does this mean for the people of Ecuador and for the Ecuador Communists? This means, on the one hand, that in the present conditions the struggle against the military dictatorship which oppresses the people is a prime task, and, on the other, that all actions of the most diverse strata for the most diverse aims help to undermine the dictatorship. We also want to say that the struggle against the military dictatorship should of necessity be combined with popular actions for vital political, economic, democratic and other demands, for the aims of the national-liberation revolution, i.e., for the program of the entire people.

The slogan of the struggle for democracy thus presupposes the utmost development of all mass actions for any demand of the people, for radical changes and in defense of democratic gains. At the same time it calls for the struggle against the dictatorship, against all reactionary maneuvers and deals aimed at deceiving the people, who want an end to the dictatorship and a genuinely democratic regime, and inducing them to accept "constitutional solutions" whose civilian garb conceals unending repressions and attacks on the rights of the people, rejection of democracy, and the whole reactionary and, traitorous policy of the military dictatorship. We are not opposed to a return to the constitutional order, but we want the regime which will replace the dictatorship and the new constitution to express the will of the people and fully conform to the interests of the people; we want the government which will emerge on the ruins of this sinister dictatorship to be a popular and democratic one and represent the forces fighting against the dictatorship and for the program of the people. This naturally demands great effort to achieve unity of action and build up a national-liberation front.

This concept of the struggle for democracy corresponds to the essence of the policy of the people stated above and to the policy which the Communist Party pursued prior to the establishment of the dictatorship.

3. The Policy of the Ruling Classes

There is a different policy, the very reverse of the policy of the people. It is the policy of the ruling classes: capitalists, imperialists and feudal latifundists, the policy of those who want to preserve their class privileges and retain their hold on the machinery of state and all its levers, to continue to oppress and plunder the people and rake in ever bigger profits. This policy, consequently, is directed against all actions of the masses for their demands and interests. The policy of the ruling classes is reactionary, for, in addition to the aforesaid, it gives rise to plots and maneuvers to restore the old methods of exploitation and oppression destroyed as a result of the stubborn struggle of the people. In order to protect their interests, which are diametrically opposed to the interests of the people, the local oligarchies and the foreign imperialist monopolies not only resist the struggle of the people, but also undertake steps to prevent them from utilizing all means of struggle by curtailing and even abolishing altogether the democratic freedoms won by them. They employ a wide diversity of means, such as the church, racism, anti-communism, etc., to split the mass movements. The oligarchies and the imperialist monopolies and those who support their reactionary policy are the worst enemies of democracy and of the unity of the people today. Confronted with the victorious development of the popular struggle, the imperialists do not hesitate to implant fascist concepts and methods. This is taking place in the United States and other imperialist countries, where fascist organizations such as the Ku Klux Klan, the John Birch Society, the American Legion and their like are stepping up their reactionary activities and committing crimes in the hope of coming to power with the help of the fascist candidate of the Republican Party.

Such is the policy which is being pursued in our country today and against which the people of Ecuador are fighting.

4. Conclusions

It thus turns out that actually there is no middle-of-the-way position on this issue. There can be no policy intermediate between the ruling classes' policy of fascist reaction and the democratic and progressive policy of the people; between capitalism and socialism. This must be made absolutely clear to the masses. But such a view should not be allowed to become an obstacle to united action with other forces which do not yet have a correct understanding of the problem.

An analysis of the content of the two kinds of policy solely possible today explains why the struggle for democracy is, along with the struggle for peace, the central slogan of political life in all countries. Whereas the capitalists seek to destroy democracy and sow discord among the masses, the peoples are fighting for democracy, for its extension, and for the unity of all democratic, revolutionary and patriotic movements.

The struggle for democracy reflects the aspiration of the working people, students, patriots and progressives, the aspirations of the entire people. It constitutes the essence of all their actions for immediate demands and for structural changes in society, that is, for the full implementation of the program of the people.

II

THE STRUGGLE FOR PEACE

5. Two Positions in World Politics

The two kinds of policy we have spoken about above, i.e., the two different attitudes to progress and to the well-being of the masses, clash in a severe battle in the international arena, too. The progressive and revolutionary forces headed by the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries are waging a constant struggle, in all fields, in all forms and employing all means, against the forces of capitalism headed and directed by U.S. imperialism. In view of the main content of our time, and the fact that the peoples are inflicting defeat after defeat upon imperialism and the local reactionary forces, no doubt is left as to who will win: the peoples or their oppressors.

Whereas socialism is growing and developing, imperialism is losing its positions and its influence in the world is weakening. The policy pursued by the ruling classes in the international arena reflects the aggressive, bellicose aspirations of the imperialist monopolies. The policy of the peoples accords with the peaceful aspirations of all mankind. There is no intermediate position in this field, either.

6. The Cold War, the Arms Race, Bases and Aggressive Blocs

Aware of the ground slipping away from under their feet, the imperialists are trying to postpone their doom. They see the only way out in implanting fascism in both the metropolitan and the dependent and colonial countries, and also in a world thermonuclear war. They pursue a cold war policy, engage in brinkmanship, carry on a frenzied arms drive, militarize their economies, set up military blocs, and criminally encroach on the sovereignty and independence of other countries: Cuba, South Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia, North Vietnam, Cyprus, the Congo (Leopoldville) and others.

The atmosphere of cold war enables the reactionaries the world over to strike blows at their peoples with a view to continuing their plunder, perpetuating class oppression and crushing the national-liberation movement. An example of this was provided by the establishment, on July 11, 1963, of a reactionary dictatorship in our country by U.S. imperialism in collusion with the local reactionaries. Imperialism is setting up fascist-like dictatorships in other Latin-American countries as well. It is waging a dirty war against the people of South Vietnam. Not long ago it launched a war against the people of Patrice Lumumba. Threats are constantly addressed to Chile, Argentina, Uruguay and other countries.

Capitalists, imperialists and all ruling classes are uniting to defend their interests on a world scale and pursue a common foreign policy designed to facilitate their rule over other peoples and class oppression in their own countries. This policy is conditioned primarily by the interests of the warlike, aggressive monopolies.

For our countries, dependent on U.S. imperialism, the foreign policy of the oppressors means militarization of the economy, involving colossal allocations for the purchase of obsolete material and the maintenance of the army command, of its venal, parasitic and traitorous "elite" and used by the imperialists as a weapon against the people. Unsettled border conflicts are used to intensify the arms race in our countries, which enables the imperialist monopolies, selling obsolete weapons to us at exorbitant prices, to obtain big profits. Sabre-rattling is used to intimidate our own people rather than the military castes and aggressive ruling classes in the neighboring countries. Therefore our Party, conscious of our people's profound love for peace, was the first to advance the demand for a revision of the Rio de Janeiro protocol, forced on us by U.S. imperialism, under which we lost almost half of our territory. Together with the people the Communist Party of Ecuador hails the initiative of the Soviet government in proposing an international agreement to rule out war as a means of settling border and territorial disputes.

The attitude of the different states to international problems is bound up with the nature of the policy conducted at home. We in Ecuador know from our own experience the consequences of the cold war policy, preparation for a world thermonuclear conflict, and the arms race. We have had to suffer from traitorous and anti-democratic regimes, including the dictatorship which has now been imposed on us and which is reactionary to the extreme and subservient to U.S. imperialism.

The main features of the policy are:

—enormous military budgets, militarization of the economy, and development of militarism in all its aspects;

—astronomical growth of taxes and rising cost of living due to the colossal arms expenditures;

—growing impoverishment of the people, disregard for their needs, for the organization of public works and all kinds of social welfare schemes;

—backwardness and deformation of the national economy, which is geared exclusively to supplying the basic raw materials to the imperialist monopolies;

—increasing dependence of the various sections of the bourgeoise on imperialism;

—extensive support to the landlords in intensifying their exploitation and plunder of the peasants; —government support to the big bourgeoisie, latifundists and imperialism in peddling anti-communism, launching all kinds of reactionary campaigns and splitting working-class and democratic organizations;

—ruthless suppression of working people's actions and their organizations to enable the ruling classes and imperialism further to intensify the exploitation of the working class and the people generally;

—abolition of democratic gains and guarantees and consolidation of the reactionaries' rule;

—growing interference of the imperialist agents in all fields of state and public activity, increasing dependence of the country on imperialism, more and more blatant suppression of national sovereignty, etc.

7. The Struggle for Peace, Peaceful Coexistence and Disarmament

Thus, the cold war serves the capitalists and imperialists as a means of preserving their class privileges and the "right" to oppress other peoples. Contrarily, the struggle for peace and peaceful coexistence, against the incendiary of the imperialist monopolies is the highest form of the struggle for the rights and interests of the peoples, including also the demands of the working class and all other working people. It is a struggle to weaken and defeat imperialism, which is out to preserve the most repugnant forms of exploitation and oppression of the peoples. Hence the struggle for peace and peaceful coexistence is not at all a "complot" of the revolutionaries with the capitalists. Essentially, it is a special form of the class struggle waged by the working people in their countries to fulfill the historical mission of transforming capitalist society into socialist society. It is indispensable for the broadest possible development of the liberation struggle of the peoples against imperialist oppression and capitalist exploitation.

It is indisputable that in the years of peaceful coexistence new countries have broken away from the capitalist system; the national-liberation movement has been on the upgrade; the class struggle in the developed capitalist countries has grown in intensity; more than 50 independent states have emerged in Asia and Africa, and the banner of socialism has been raised in all the continents, including America, where Cuba has dealt a staggering blow at U.S. imperialism. The policy of peaceful coexistence has demonstrated its tremendous revolutionizing force.

On the other hand, this policy accords with the humane aspirations of Communists and to the will of the peoples, who for centuries have striven to rid mankind of the scourge of war. To deliver mankind from the threat of thermonuclear war, which can destroy most of the earth's population and its riches, is the main task today.

That is why the progressives, democrats and revolutionaries maintain that the struggle for peace is, along with the struggle for democracy, one of the paramount tasks of all the peoples.

The splitters seek to belittle the importance of the struggle for peace and even to discredit it, calling it a "fraud." They are trying to convince the peoples that peace is merely a notion, a "category" that has been given currency in the sphere of international relations and foreign policy. They distort the content and significance of the struggle for peace. They fail to realize this struggle creates a situation in which the imperialist powers are compelled to coexist and in which they are powerless to unleash a thermonuclear war, although they periodically engineer, for this purpose, provocations and even wage local wars. They overlook the fact that if a world missile-nuclear war has not broken out up till now, this is thanks to the colossal might of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, to the struggle of the peace-loving peoples, who comprise the overwhelming majority of mankind.

This distortion of the essence of the struggle for peace is not accidental. It is a consequence of very serious causes. In some cases, it stems logically from the crazy "theories" that war and the destruction it brings is, as it were, a "bridge" for mankind to go over to a higher stage of development. In others, these views are spread by "ultra-revolutionaries" who have deserted to the enemy and degenerated into shameless agents of imperialism, merely posing as anti-imperialists. The struggle for peace, man's age-old dream, is at the same time, as everybody knows, an active, often bitter and even armed, struggle against the imperialists and their schemes. It is a constant clash with, and constant exposure of, the oppressive and warlike policy of the imperialists. The splitters and "ultra-revolutionaries," however, no longer regard imperialism as an enemy but as an ally.

Nor is it fortuitous that the imperialists and "ultra-revolutionary" renegades conceal the political character of the struggle for peace both in the national and international arena. This is nothing but a vain attempt to deprive the struggle for peace of its inexhaustible vitality, to minimize its tremendous significance in international politics. The attitude of states to the cold war and to the preparations for thermonuclear war is determined by the following factors:

a) their line in world politics: attitude to the arms race, military bases, military pacts and blocs, economic blockade; their position in international organizations, etc.;

b) their international positions as a whole; expansion or contraction of trade with other countries; acceptance or rejection of lists of goods restricting foreign trade; extension or curtailment of scientific, cultural and diplomatic contacts with definite countries; participation or non-participation in subversive activities against the socialist countries, and so on;

c) their concrete obligations in the international arena: attitude to the factors and consequences of the cold war, the arms race, etc.

We have seen already how the domestic policy of our country is affected by its international policy pursued under the influence of the cold war, the arms race, etc. It is impossible to separate internal policy from foreign policy; a country can have no "democratic" internal policy if in its foreign policy it follows in the wake of the warmongers and advocates of international tension.

Not to appreciate the rich content of the struggle for peace means, in our opinion, escaping from reality, refusing to see the developments taking place around us, failing to realize the tremendous importance of the big and small battles which can, in the course of the struggle for peace, be waged victoriously against imperialism and the local oligarchies, undermining their power, influence and rule. It means shutting one's eyes to the need for the peoples to develop resolutely the struggle for peace, which is component of the struggle for their emancipation, in order to compel the governments to pursue a national policy and respect democratic freedoms.

THE STRUGGLE FOR PEACE IS THE MOST REVOLUTIONARY AND AT THE SAME TIME THE MOST HUMANE STRUGGLE

8. Peaceful Coexistence Policy Has Nothing in Common with "Pacifism"

Peaceful coexistence should not be understood either as "pacifism" or as refusal to react properly to the violence used by imperialism in the world and in every country where the struggle for national liberation is mounting and where it supports the local reactionary forces. Peaceful coexistence should be understood as it is understood by the Soviet comrades and the leaders of other Communist parties and not by those who pervert its essence so as to be able to attack Marxist-Leninists. The essence of peaceful coexistence as explained by Kommunist, theoretical journal of the CPSU, is this:

— the struggle between the two systems is transferred into the sphere of economic development and raising the well-being of the people. In the course of peaceful economic competition the economic and defense potential of the socialist states grows steadily and the socialist world system is becoming an ever more powerful factor for preventing war between states;

— the advantages of socialism becomes ever more obvious, with the resulting increase of its influence on the growth of the revolutionary forces the world over;

— the masses are acting ever more vigorously for peace, to prevent thermonuclear catastrophe, consolidate the anti-imperialist forces and isolate the monopoly bourgeoise;

— disarmament is imposed on imperialism and its attempts to export counter-revolution are frustrated, which creates increasingly favorable conditions for the national-liberation and class struggle and brings nearer its victorious completion all over the world;

— the countries that have freed themselves from the colonial yoke are rendered ever greater political and economic assistance facilitating their national revival and transition to the non-capitalist path of development, which accords with the interests of their peoples.

Such is the clear-cut position of the world Communist movement headed by the CPSU. Such is the position of the Communist Party of Ecuador.

Thus, the policy of peaceful coexistence presupposes: active and courageous struggle against imperialism in the economic field, in politics and ideology alike; resolute defense by the socialist countries and all peace-loving forces of the revolutionary peoples against attacks by the imperialists and their flunkeys; reliable assistance to the peoples in the struggle against colonialism and neo-colonialism; growth of the might of the socialist countries, including their military might designed to prevent world thermonuclear war and imperialist aggression against other peoples.

Thus, there is no intermediate position between capitalism (imperialism) and socialism in the sphere of international relations. If the newly-free Asian and African countries declare that they hold a neutral position (active neutrality), they regard it as "independent" with respect to military blocs; they regard it from the standpoint of their attitude of resistance to imperialism. Hence, they are neutral only as far as military blocs are concerned. The struggle of these countries for peace and peaceful coexistence is a means of defending their national independence and national economic development and, consequently, is marked by a clearly-expressed anti-imperialist trend and ever closer relations with the socialist world. From the socialist countries alone can they expect reliable economic assistance and powerful political and military support for the successful realization of their objectives.

Developments in each of our countries and in the whole world show ever more clearly that whereas imperialism and the capitalist oligarchies, seeking to enslave other peoples, to preserve their colonial rule or introduce neo-colonialism, are taking recourse to fascist reaction and to cold war (with systematic attempts to turn it into a shooting war), the peoples, on the contrary, are fighting for democracy and peace in order to destroy the power of the capitalist monopolies, free themselves from imperialist rule, safeguard their newly-won independence, and march firmly along the road of progress and prosperity.

Put Monopoly Under Control

A New Economic Policy for Canada

By TIM BUCK

This new 78-page booklet spells out in detail the Communist Party's economic policy for Canada. It deals with jobs, economic growth, Canadian independence, curbing of the monopolies and placing them under public control or nationalization; and the bringing of the benefits of automation to the people.

FOR THE FURTHER DEVELOPMENT OF THE DEMOCRATIC FORCES

REPORT* OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF BELGIUM, PRESENTED TO THE 15th PARTY CONGRESS BY ERNEST BURNELLE, NATIONAL SECRETARY, CPB

I

At the previous Congress of our Party, held in Antwerp 18 months ago, we adopted a program for peace, social progress and democracy. We decided on expanding our work in order to enable the masses to exert continuous pressure with the aim of ending a policy running counter to the interests of the nation.

Since our 18th Congress, the Belgian reactionaries have been able to keep the country's foreign policy in the wake of NATO against the will of the people, who have repeatedly and clearly declared for measures to ease tension.

In these tragic days, when the Belgian government has recorded one of the most disgraceful chapters of its history, I wish to list, without going into detail, the manifold aspects of its foreign policy, against which the peace forces are now fighting, namely:

—the occupation of the Arendock base by Bundeswehr troops;

—The commissioning of the Baronville base;

—the Belgian delegation's invariable cooperation with the U.S. imperialists at the UN General Assembly;

—a negative stand on all propositions for a détente;

—the steady uptrend of our military spending;

—the new plan for military appropriations to the tune of 26,000 million Belgian francs, to be spent over several years; .

—support for the atomic arms race policy, countered by a powerful anti-atomic campaign which was launched by young people as usual and which this year was a tremendous success.

There were also showdowns between the ruling circles and the latter's demands. The working people's reaction to the plan of the manufacturers, who want ordinary men and women to bear the burden of growing inflation, was victorious struggles in the country's major economic fields, particularly the iron and steel mills, harbors, and government offices. In Flanders, the struggle was on the rise. It was also necessary to oppose the maneuvers of the reactionaries, who inspired and used the doctors "strike" to undermine maintenance in case of illness or disability, one of the foundations of social security.

The most noteworthy event of the end of last year was undoubtedly the increased antagonism over the issues of democracy between Wallonia's working people and the government, which is backed by the leaders of the bourgeois parties and the Socialist Party. The conflict arose over the settlement of Flemish-Walloon relations and the constitutional problems stemming from them, when 650,000 Walloon democrats declared for including the principle of national referendums on the people's initiative in the Constitution. The results of the Walloon petition campaign showed that the democrats of our country had scored a considerable success, all the more since the bourgeois parties and the Socialist Party leadership had fiercely opposed petitioning. Everyone will remember that the Bureau of the Socialist Party of Belgium called on the membership not to sign the petition text proposed by the Executive Committee of Wallonia.

As a result, our country found itself, on the eve of the communal elections, in an atmosphere of growing resentment over the government's policy of applying the Col Unique and the anti-strike laws, of continuously increasing military expenditure and the gendarmerie budget, and putting up taxes and prices.

At the same time the antagonisms between the Right and Left inside the government parties, particularly in the case of trade union leaders, kept on growing, verging on a split.

When the CC, CPB met to specify the main lines of the Party's election campaign, it was convinced that the October elections would confirm the unpopularity of the government policy. It felt that a new situation would be created in Belgium immediately after the elections, and that the outstanding problems would become still more pressing in view of the coming general election, to be held next spring at the latest. The Central Committee decided, therefore, that it would be useful in this new situation to convene a party congress, hold an exchange of views in all Party organizations, and in this way determine the main direction of the struggle which we will have to wage in common with the Belgian working-class movement as a whole. We felt that we needed a congress in order to decide on our election tactics, to enable the masses during the general election to condemn the government's policies effectively and in no uncertain terms, and reveal the new prospects of the struggle for peace, social progress and democracy. Coupled with further blows at the government coalition, this would go some way toward creating conditions for the early formation of an anti-monopoly government.

The communal elections of October 11 were a generally recognized success for our Party and a major reverse for the parties of the government coalition. The elections condemned the policy being pursued. Moreover, they condemned the government coalition and the practice of class collaboration underlying it.

The event occasioned spectacular conflicts between the Right and the Left in the two majority parties. In Liège, the Christian Democrats set a list of their own against the Catholic Conservative list. The Socialists and Christian Democrats put up joint lists with the Communists. These lists were rather few, but still they showed, often with the voters' support, the new opportunities for unity there are in our country. These joint lists definitely heralded decisive realignments that would prove fatal to the reactionary forces. Besides, it should be stressed that the masses readily approved our proposals for unity of action, their approval often assuming a massive character.

It is necessary to point out and fully appreciate yet another fact, namely, the thoroughly democratic atmosphere prevailing in the country today. This atmosphere was there during the election campaign and it left little room for ultra-reactionary propaganda. Of course, ultra-reactionary trends exist in Belgium and it would be wrong to underrate them. The Party of Freedom and Progress is trying, now that it has been "reconverted" from the former Liberal Party, to rally the country's most reactionary groups. It gave evidence of this during the doctors' "strike," by taking a demagogical stand and attacking social security in a Poujadist style. Nevertheless, this party was compelled during the election campaign to take account of the voters' democratic aspirations and sentiments. Its success was an expression of the voters' protest against the government's arbitrary actions and the impermissible discrepancy betwen public opinion and the activities of government and parliament. This may also be said to apply to the progress made by the Flemish Volksunie party. The reason for the success of the Volksunie was that the Flemish democrats wanted to protest in this way against the untenable position of the Social-Christian Party on constitutional matters and against its persistent cold-shouldering of federalism, which is gaining ground in Flanders.

The October 11 elections revealed an increasing political crisis. It is not a crisis of parliamentary institutions but of traditional methods of government, a crisis of the parties which identify themselves with these methods and strive to perpetuate them.

The changes which have occurred in the alignment of the political forces in Belgium are accompanied by changes in the political consciousness of the working class and the working people in general. The ideology of the masses is going through an important evolution.

After the liberation of the country, roughly until 1958, which was a turning point, the Social-Democratic leaders advocated — with some success, it is true—ideas borrowed from old reformist sources through refurbished in keeping with the fashion of the day, according to recommendations of the theoreticians of neo-capitalism.

Reality disappointed their hopes, however. As far as the working class was concerned, the policy of class collaboration and proved ineffective and utopian. The class struggle kept on gaining in intensity. Faced with the resumption of the struggle by the workers, the Social-Democratic leaders had to give up the shibboleths of reformist propaganda, which had been their war horse till 1958. They were compelled to take the defensive, to fight rearguard battles in the ideological war. Some of them tried to remedy the situation by means of more or less Leftist phrasemongering.

Thus the ideology of the working class underwent radical changes. The workers were becoming more and more distrustful of the virtues of reformism. The bitter experience of their lives taught them not to credit myths about class collaboration. Naturally enough, the foundation of anti-communism and anti-Sovietism were shaken along with those of class collaboration.

The progress of the ideas of the class struggle within the working-class movement forced the Socialist Party leaders to give up their plans for liquidating the Communist Party.

Everyone admits today that the CPB has returned to the political scene and is playing a role, whereas reformism is at the lowest ebb and has no future in Belgium.

The class struggle is gathering strength on a world scale. In the case of the imperialist powers, this expresses itself in acts of provocation threatening to develop into a world conflagration. The threat of a new war is ever-present. The imperialists, and more particularly the U.S. imperialists, use every opportunity to keep up this threat. The assassination of President Kennedy and the wanton attack in the Gulf of Tonkin last summer showed the extremes to which the more aggressive sections of U.S. imperialism are capable of going in their attempts to set the planet on fire, with the governments of the NATO countries helping them more or less openly.

The imperialists are making desperate efforts to realize their plan for a multilateral nuclear force that would put the atomic weapon in the hands of Bonn, one of whose revenge-seeking Ministers, Seebohm, recently laid claim to Czechoslovak territory. Simultaneously they are plotting to proliferate nuclear arms and extending their interference in the internal affairs of the countries of the third world.

But the peace forces are combating imperialist plots with increasing vigor. The spectacular nature of these plots must not, however, prevent us from properly assessing the growth of the peace forces and the progress made in peaceful coexistence. The important thing is the decisive role of the socialist commonwealth, the international working-class movement and the national-liberation movement of the oppressed peoples, whose combined actions are effecting a revolutionary transformation of the world. It is to these forces that we owe the Moscow partial test ban treaty and the agreement restricting the manufacture of fissile materials for military purposes. Due to their growing influence, many countries which yesterday were still dependent are shaking off colonial tyranny to embark on political and economic reforms bearing the imprint of a socialist orientation.

World opinion was gratified by Goldwater's crushing defeat. In American conditions, this defeat indicated a swing to the left, which is in evidence in many countries of the world. The same is true of the fall of the British Conservative government.

The signs of crisis which keep on cropping up in NATO and the Common Market likewise indicate the people's refusal to accept the cold war and bloc antagonisms.

World developments are being influenced more and more by the socialist system. The tremendous growth of the productive forces, the continuous improvement of the working people's material and cultural standards, and the decisive role played by the socialist system in averting a third world war and outlawing all wars are heightening its prestige, which contributes to the people's struggle for peaceful coexistence, independence, progress and socialism.

The Soviet Union has become a great force, a fundamental factor in the development of the world. The masses think highly of the efforts of the Soviet Union, of its Communist Party and its statesmen, toward lessening international tension, and of the Soviet Union's calmness, courage and initiative in the face of imperialist provocations. Soviet achievements in the political and economic spheres, in science and culture, speak of the superiority of socialist society. They stimulate the world revolutionary movement.

The USSR is advancing along the path chartered by the 20th, 21st and 22nd congresses of the CPSU. It reaffirmed this several weeks ago by effecting changes in the Party and government leadership.

These measures were taken in order that the country might go on along this path, that the interests of the people might be served better, and that the changing international situation, which calls for even bolder initiative, might be properly met.

The balance of the world forces continues to change in this favorable sense. We in Belgium must contribute our share to this development.

II

This, then, is the political situation in which the Belgian working-class movement and our Party are developing in the highly important period preceding the general election.

The best way to prepare for the general election is to join in the struggle on the basis of unity of action, make alliances, strengthen them and achieve successes that will clearly show the necessity of such alliances.

We propose that the Party take an active part in the communal work and plan its activities in such a way as to enable our newly-elected deputies to prove as early as possible that they keep their election promises.

The essential thing for us is to prepare for effective political work aimed at defending the interests of the working people in connection with the drafting of new communal budgets and the introduction of new taxes. It is important quickly to generalize the experience of our communal election campaign, the experience of work pivoted on consulting the population, trade union members and working-class organizations, and press forward our work in common with the people and with due regard to their opinions.

We will wage our struggle for peace as indicated in the draft resolution we are going to discuss. Specifically, we insist that the government refuse to join a multilateral nuclear force. We will oppose further increases in military spending. We will also fight to ensure that the Belgian delegates to the UN support the Indian proposal against the proliferation of atomic arms. We will call on public opinion, the working people, and peace organizations to empower the Belgian delegation to support the proposal for re-establishing the legitimate rights of People's China in the UN.

We will see to it that our young people join in vast numbers in the Anti-Atom March and in this way contribute their share to the success of the demonstration. As for May 8, which has become a tradition with our people and is celebrated by all the major mass organizations, we suggest linking it up with similar actions in other countries. We think May 8 can become an international day of resistance to the plans of aggression being made in Western Europe.

Lastly, we must strive to make the Belgian Peace League everywhere the mass organization it has already become in some industrial areas of the country, where numerous workers' organizations have recognized it as a peace organization representing the working class and the pacifists who are close to it.

We must take part, on the basis of unity of action, in the fight for the demands concerning wages and pensions, and the general demands of the workers of different trades.

Workers's organizations have already made progress in the struggle against the "incomes policy" which Spinoy, the Socialist Minister, tried to impose on them under the pretext of staving off inflation. Spinoy's attempt to curb the workers was supported by Le Peuple, the Socialist paper, which claimed, contrary to the facts, that the working people's purchasing capacity had gone up 13 per cent since the present government took over.

The only purpose of this crude mystification is to supply a propaganda "argument" to those who will try to extol the policy of class collaboration during the general election campaign. But the working people have taken care to show that they are no fools. Everywhere their demands are growing, becoming more and more insistent, in both the private and the state sector, in the case of both industrial workers and office employees, as well as pensioners and other people receiving social aid, and women and young people. Last but not least, we have the peasants, and professionals in the towns, putting forward their demands.

Again, we must bear in mind the problem of a revision of the Constitution. This problem is becoming more urgent as the general election approaches. We cannot regard it as merely an aspect of the important issue of relations between the two Belgian communities. It is most directly bound up with the more general problem of democracy. This is why the issue of a revision of the Constitution is likely to cause a serious conflict between all democrats, on the one hand, and the reactionaries inspired by the monopolies, on the other.

The demand for a federation as a democratic solution to the problem of relations between the two communities has become more emphatic in late years, particularly since the working class of Wallonia and some of its major organizations made this demand an object of their fight.

The Communist Party of Belgium, for its part, declared for a federation years ago. It defines federalization as a structural reform of the state, including its capital, monetary system, and a common home and foreign policy. By establishing the equality of the Flemish and Walloon communities, it would guarantee better agreement between the two peoples and, most important of all, easier control over the deputies by the electorate.

It is not surprising that the idea of settling the relations between the two communities by negotiation, on the basis of equal representation, has gained some ground and brought a favorable response from both Flanders and Wallonia. Nor is it surprising that the bourgeoisie, opposed to all extension of democracy, is incensed by the idea of a federation. It would like to perpetuate a situation which enables it to fool the working people and set one community against the other.

The petition campaign organized by the Executive Committee of Wallonia a year ago shows the road to a democratic solution of the country's mounting difficulties. The 650,000 persons who have put their names to the petition want the principle of national referendums on the people's initiative to be included in the Constitution.

The working people — Flemings and Walloons alike — are willing to subscribe to this principle. Locally, only the reactionaries are against it, because they have every reason to be afraid of consulting the people to fear that the masses may take a definite stand and proceed consistently to take part in political matters.

The struggle for such a revision of the Constitution will be a most important element of our election campaign, particularly in Wallonia.The Party organizations in Flanders would do well to continue their courageous explanatory work among the Flemish working people regarding the position of Wallonia's working people, the objects of their struggle and the reasons for which the reactionary and Right-Socialist front is so strongly opposed to the Wallonian People's Movement.

We must be exceedingly careful and prudent in choosing watchwords and ways of settling the national question, and in carrying on our propaganda and struggle. We must steer clear of nationalist and chauvinist distortions, which are a constant threat.

In the fight we have been carrying on for several years now, we have always been careful to keep ourselves apart from the petty bourgeoisie, which is apt to be carried away by high-sounding extremist slogans that are unrealistic and ineffective and therefore cause division. We have been doing our best to show the connection between demands of national significance and the fundamental, class interests of the labor movement. This does not imply going out of our way to lump together the workers' demands and demands concerning the nationalities. This is a practice not to be indulged in.

Our task is to emphasize the intimate political interconnection of the various aspects of the working people's struggle. The reactionaries do this whenever they are involved, for they are fighting against the federal system and national referendums on the people's initiative for political considerations of their own class. In this particular case, should the Constitution recognize the right of the working people and all democrats to be consulted and to have their opinion about a constituent assembly heard, there is no reason why the Flemish and Walloon working people should not some day exercise this right and insist on structural reforms imperilling the privileges of the banks, monopolies and trusts. This is the prime cause of the panic which spread among the bourgeoisie when it thought that national referendums on the people's initiative might become a reality in Belgium.

Such a referendum is an important democratic demand aimed at extending universal suffrage.

The winning of universal suffrage was a landmark in the political struggle of the working class, an important factor in molding the class consciousness of the Belgian labor movement. And to see the limitations of universal suffrage, which stand out even more clearly at present does not mean disregarding its importance.

If we want to remain loyal to the great battles which made universal suffrage in Belgium possible, we have to grasp the real meaning of this democratic institution and extend it according to the needs of our time. This would make it possible to introduce referendums on the people's initiative. It would definitely enrich universal suffrage and lend it a more decisive revolutionary significance than people believe possible.

The present difficulties are not really due to the institutions of parliamentary democracy but to the lack of democracy in the "traditional" parties and in the political formulas they cling to. They stem from the fact that these parties and formulas have shown their inability to take the people's aspirations into account in face of the capitalist monopolies and of the orientation the monopolies impose on the state.

Referendums on the people's initiative would be a reliable basis for the democratic forces still grouped in these parties to hold their ground against the encroachments of the reactionaries, against the secret forces whose pressure on government and parliament adulterates democracy and tends to reduce universal suffrage to a useless rite. Every deputy elected by the working people should realize this. Referendums on the people's initiative would by no means diminish their role or responsibility, for the deputies themselves would join in consulting the people. They would campaign for or against certain decisions and would commit themselves still more in respect to the working people.

We may well expect the reactionaries to fight referendums on the people's initiative as grimly as they opposed universal suffrage in the past.

Every worker activist must take this into account and remember that referendums on the people's initiative are an effective political means of ending the anti-parliamentary demagogy which the reactionaries are trying to step up. Referendum would make for a renovation of parliamentary institutions whose future would depend on how well they expressed the people's interests.

Such is the program for immediate action which we are going to put forward and to uphold during the election campaign. This campaign must result in the establishment of a constituent assembly.

The forthcoming general election should help public opinion to condemn not only the policies of the Lefèvre-Spaak government but the very type of government it represents — a false labor government which is trying by means of sham Labor Party methods to disguise its practice of class collaboration and the fact that it is merely stumbling along a path travelled by its predecessors.

Since 1947 Belgium has seen every type of government possible within the bounds of bourgeois parliamentarism. The reactionaries find it very difficult to think of further variants. This should prompt us to redouble our efforts in order to foster the maturing of the idea of an anti-monopoly government based on an alliance of all democrats — Socialists, trade unionists, Communists and Christian Democrats elected to implement a program for peace, social progress and structural reforms.

There is every reason to believe that the Communists will succeed at the coming general election. However, we repeat here a warning we have given more than once, in particular when preparing for the communal elections. At that time we said that the greatest danger for Communist activists was parochialism, the tendency to rest on their laurels, to become complacently passive after scoring certain successes. Let us see to it that our successes and favorable situation we now have do not shut off from us the important tasks facing the labor movement, or the new opportunities which we will be able to use provided our Party becomes stronger and is more closely linked with the organized workers.

With the general election only a few months off, we would like to insist that our activists and membership as a whole look beyond the limits of the Party. We would like them to do more and better still than they did during the communal elections. We will take part in the election campaign to win seats in parliament. But we want it to become a factor for greater working-class unity, to prompt the working people to gain positions of authority, and to bring the labor movement nearer to the time when it will upset the political balance we have today.

To go to the polls without seeing anything but the Party's specific interests would mean losing sight of the Party's raison d'etre and basic duty. It would mean undermining the opportunities for the Party's development. We will therefore go to the polls with a view to playing our role of champions of unity and making a decisive contribution to the progress of the working class as a whole, with all its organizations.

The Socialist Party of Belgium, the trade unions and the Christian-Democratic organizations are in a state of great confusion. They are deeply concerned about the course of events, and realize that the Right-wing leadership decisions are unfounded. Everybody is seeking new solutions. The Socialist Party activists are aware that the policy of class collaboration pursued by the Right-wing leaders and the witchhunt inspired by this policy are very harmful to their party and the labor movement.

The Christian Democrats, who, needless to say, react in their own way to the changes occurring in the Church, are getting used to the idea that the association of capitalist and labor elements within one party can only disillusion the workers. The possibility of a break with the Social-Christian Party is beginning to loom large.

That is why we must do our utmost to state our prospects, have them discussed, and in this way help active Socialists and Christians to beat off attacks from the right. It may well be that as the present crisis develops, many active Socialists and Christians will declare themselves more frankly in their respective organizations and will, for their part, try to shift their support to the ideas of unity, a government based on an anti-monopoly alliance, and a renovation, which everyone desires.

Of course, no one among us thinks an alliance will be made during the coming general election to form such a government. But the changes occurring among the Socialist rank and file, and the Socialists' drift to the left entitle us to regard a unity list—a list including Communists as well as Socialists, trade unionists and even some Christian Democrats—as a suitable objective.

Be that as it may, we know from experience about noted Left Socialists who have been fighting openly and courageously against the Right orientation imposed on their party while keeping to their Social-Democratic convictions. It would be well to form at least temporary electoral alliances between such people and us, on the pattern of the agreements concluded on the eve of the October communal elections.

This, comrades, is the perspective we are submitting to you for discussion. Should we agree on it, we will have to start immediately on extensive explanatory work, for we will need an intense propaganda campaign to popularize our proposals for unity at the biggest factories and in labor organizations. We will have to organize forums and, strengthened by the experience gained, to continue and improve consultations with the working people in the industrial areas of Wallonia and, as far as possible, of Flanders.

The problems cropping up in the country are very complicated and manifest themselves in different contexts. It will be seen, however, that all conflicts are linked in the final analysis with the problem of democracy.

On the one hand, reaction is trying to back out of the impasse by resorting to undemocratic practices, including the imposition, against the will of the working people, of anti-strike legislation, the Servais Bill, and the authoritarian settlement of Walloon-Flemish problems. On the other hand, the working-class movement refuses to yield to these practices. It insists on being informed and consulted. It demands a parliament expressing the aspirations of the working class. It is fighting to occupy in state government a position corresponding to its role in modern production.

The more important the political objects of the class struggle and the greater the awareness of the contradictions that are growing and multiplying in Belgian society today as a result of the near-dictatorship of the capitalist monopolies, the more radical the trend of the class struggle. This is why we are confronted with a whole set of democratic demands that speak of the remarkable cohesion and maturity of the working class. The demand for structural anti-capitalist reforms, in particular, is one of the principal demands whose realization would enable the working class to take over the leading functions it is entitled to at this stage of social development.

The growing importance of the objectives of the working-class movement in the sphere of democracy is an indication that we have entered a new period, the period of social reform leading to greater democracy in the interests of the political activity of the masses, and calling for a revolutionary reorganization of the country to safeguard its external security, stabilize it at home, and improve its standard of living.

In defending democracy and fighting to extend it, the working people are fulfilling a fundamental task and paving the way for the effective solution of other problems facing the country.

The issue of democracy will tend to become more and more pressing. This will express itself not only in the struggle against the government and the capitalists but in the character of the relations that will take form between the various components of the Left bloc, which we want to come into being as we look forward to the formation of an anti-monopoly government. None of these components will agree to take orders from others. Since the fight for the victory of the Left bloc can neither make headway nor succeed through top-level contacts, a multitude of complicated matters will have to be settled prior to the formation of an anti-monopoly government and even afterwards. Its achievements will have to be safeguarded and extended, which can only be done with the cooperation of the masses.

We say to our future allies from the outset that we are going to join in the common effort that will establish itself in the elected bodies. We want these bodies to play a greater role. We want the electorate to have more in the way of guaranteed rights and want the people's liberties to be extended. We also want the role of the working-class parties in this advance to state power to be specified democratically and publicly. The same applies to the role of the trade unions, which will be tremendous as we see it. It is essential to have a clear idea of every problem of the democracy of today and tomorow. This is indispensable if the working-class movement is to be prepared for the period of a new upsurge of the movement and work out its future tasks properly.

Precisely because we attach so much importance to the issue of democracy, we believe our Party should make a special effort to work it out more thoroughly from the standopint of theory. It is still obscured in our own ranks on account of dogmatic and sectarian concepts which hamper the struggle for democracy and fail to counter effectively the noisy propaganda on the issue of freedom being carried on by the enemies of the working people. We need exchanges of views, and serious study and research.

The advance of democracy taking place in Belgium is reflected first of all in our Party. Of course, our Party has always been a democratic party. We discuss everything freely—in the primary organizations as well as in the leading bodies, which are elected according to democratic standards and are in duty bound to render account at regular intervals. We convene our congresses as stipulated by the Rules. Inner-Party democracy has been developing according to the requirements of reality and the needs of our struggle.

At our previous congress we adopted new, clearer and more specific Rules guaranteeing the membership more extensive rights. In drafting the Rules, we were prompted by the desire to set an example for other parties and for every labor organization.

The Party members should have a better knowledge of the Rules and should scrupulously observe every clause to improve the Party's democratic functioning. They should make greater use of the Rules to take issue with opponents, for no other Belgian party has Rules comparable to ours, and none takes so much care to ensure that every one of its members voices his opinion at the congresses.

There is nothing secret about our Party, any more than about our congresses or deliberations. The reactionaries try to create an atmosphere of mystery around our Party, saying that we discuss things behind closed doors, hold secret pow-wows and settle accounts. They do that because they want to conceal at all costs the fact that our Party is a democratic party and that the things it discusses reflect the aspirations of Belgium's working people. They persistently make us out to be a clandestine set-up which sends its agents into working-class and democratic organizations for subversive purposes. This is a lie. We say again that our Party uses no clandestine methods and that its members openly attend and take part in the meetings and other activities of the democratic organizations and the trade unions they belong to.

Nevertheless, we will have to do a great deal more to get rid of shortcomings. Our discussions generally lack breadth and arouse little interest among the comrades. There is still a tendency to face backwards rather than look ahead so as to see new ideas and new vistas. Too many activists are still unaware that the Party must enlist more workers and democrats the better to express the people's aspirations, and that the admission of new members is, therefore, of special importance to us. How well we succeed in this will depend on our ability to convince as many workers and democrats as possible that if they join our ranks they will be able to make an appreciable contribution to the struggle going on.

Let us trust the working people whom we want to join the Party. Let us receive them as comrades who will help us in our quests and reflections. The admission of new members will be massive in character and will prove beneficial provided we regard it as an act of faith in the political consciousness and activity of the masses.

The entire democratic life of our Party confirms the democratic potentialities of the working-class movement. The eleventh National Congress held 10 years ago, in 1954, was one of the outstanding events of our Party's history in this respect. At that congress our Party criticized sectarian orientation, determined its new political line and replaced some of its leaders. It succeeded in developing its democratic forms in keeping with the new line it was formulating. To be sure, the difficulties were not few, and we owe it to the team work of the Party sections and industrial oragnizations, the federations and the Central Committee that in a most unfavorable situation we were able to bring about a change all by ourselves. Our 11th Congress, in which we take legitimate pride, was not a "putsch," as some people still think. It was the result of tremendous research carried out on democratic principles. It met at a time when every Communist Party was seeking the new, and it is fair to stress that we were stimulated by the new ideas coming from the Soviet Union.

There is a good deal of talk at the moment about the autonomy of parties. Do I have to stress that the 11th Congress was a most vivid demonstration of our Party's autonomy? Our Party has always been autonomous, and has always shaped its policies quite independently. The point is that its autonomy in practical matters was limited as long as its political position did not go beyond statements of principle and propaganda, and as long as it tended to adhere to ready-made patterns and to quote from books instead of analyzing realities, to imitate others instead of formulating original views of its own. A dogmatic and sectarian party can be autonomous only in name. The degree of autonomy depends on team-work to promote the struggle of the working class of one's country, which calls for a great deal of research, flexibility and democracy. This is why the 11th Congress was an important stage in the development of our autonomy.

To begin with, the Congress made possible a fresh effort toward creating a party of action, and enabled us to go beyond the stage of explanation and exposure. It insisted that worker activists, whatever their mistakes, not be treated like reactionaries.

Precisely because our Party was able to draw this distinction, it succeeded in improving its work in factories and in starting work there for united action with active Socialists.

We have heard some preposterous theories about the 11th Congress. True, they were expressed by those who afterwards backed or joined Grippa. We have heard talk to the effect that the mistakes we wanted to rectify were due to certain Party leaders who were said to have introduced the policy of the enemy into our Party. This attack was spearheaded against the Secretary General, Comrade Edgar Lalmand, who had rendered the Party great services, especially during the war, at a time when almost the whole Central Committee was in prison.

Fortunately, the 11th Congress rejected that point of view. It drew a distinction between the Party and reaction and thus rallied all delegates. Fortunately, it looked for the causes of our mistakes primarily in the obstacles which the reactionaries had been raising by mean of various maneuvers. It pointed out that we had been unable to overcome those obstacles. For prior to the 11th Congress none of the leaders had ever suggested surrendering either to the imperialists, the atom bomb or the West German revenge-seekers.

The ten years that have passed since than have changed our Party. The successes we have achieved or expect to achieve are also due to the changes we have effectd in our own ranks and to changes in inner-Party life.

That is why the swing to the Left, which had been shaping for several years, did not take us by surprise. Indeed, it could not have done so because we had forecast it.

Reality makes it our duty to be always exacting toward ourselves. Nevertheless, we may say as we appraise the path travelled that our Party has renovated itself and is transformed qualitatively. The Party constantly takes part in political life. It has abandoned its old methods of a Party doing agitation and propaganda. It has joined in the struggle of the masses and plays a real part in it. It ponders the various problems in common with the labor organizations and submits its views to the working people. Its opinion is heeded and its proposals are put into effect. The Party shares in the cares and hopes of the working class, which recognizes it as inseparable from and indispensable to the Belgian Labor movement.

Our Party is asserting itself more and more as the party of the future. We have done away in our ranks with the naive belief that verbal excesses are a necessary manifestation of the revolutionary struggle. Reality has taught us that there is no revolutionary propaganda other than which helps the working people unite in order to succeed in their present struggles.

However, not everyone appreciated the 11th Congress. Some of the Party members proved unable to identify themselves with the new line laid down by the Congress or with the idea of promoting inner-Party democracy. Unable to impose their sectarian views, which were refuted by the achievements of the working-class movement and the Party, Grippa and his group were outrageously hypocritical. We turned them out, and are very glad we did. The atmosphere in the Brussels federation, which they had been contaminating for several years, became healthy. The federation had called a halt to the interminable debates at meetings which did not benefit the Party in any way and exhausted the comrades and during which the Party line was constantly called into question and Party leaders, fraternal parties, the socialist community and the Soviet Union slandered.

The reactionaries fully appreciated the profit they could derive from the activity of the Grippa group, which had become a group of anti-Communist falsifiers. Before the communal elections they used their "information" media — the press and radio — with the Social-Democratic newspapers cooperating to play up the importance of this group, which they pretended to regard as an organized Communist party. The enemies of the Party suggested that our Party had split, whereas all that had happened was that a handful of people had withdrawn from the Party. Today the reactionaries are compelled to come down a peg or two because the Grippa group's sad failure at the communal elections showed it up for what it is, namely, something of no consequence. Still, we must continue to be vigilant, for the group continues its clandestine activity. It is stepping up its efforts to recruit new accomplices and circulate its "documents."

Following the recent changes in the leadership of the CPSU and the Soviet government, the enemies of the Party, aided by the Grippa group, have been alleging that the USSR is willing to recant the decisions of the 20th and 22nd Congresses of the CPSU, and the Declaration and the Statement adopted by the world Communist meetings in 1957 and 1960, the more easily to normalize the relations between the Communist Party of China and the Communist world as a whole. They suggest that those changes indicate the Soviet Union's admission of the erroneous nature of its fundamental decisions, as if the 20th Congress had not been the affair of the CPSU as a whole, the result of team work in which all Soviet comrades had been taking part for months, and as if the 20th Congress had not opened a new path for the communist world, a path proved effective by subsequent important achievements.

Some comrades do not always know how to counter insidious enemy propaganda. Occasionally they imagine that keeping silent on disputed issues might contribute to the restoration of the unity of the world Communist movement and that it would be easier for our Party to fight if we withdrew into our own shell. Some comrades say it would be better not to take a stand on the international problems cropping up but to wait and see. These comrades — who are few in number —do not see that to wait means leaving the field open for the reactionaries, who will not wait and never do but keep on attacking, putting about the most vicious slander stories about the Soviet Union, and making up all sorts of biased or false information to sow discord between the Communist parties and the Soviet Union. The reactionaries are well aware of the appeal of Soviet achievements to the international working-class movement. This is why we see them active in this respect, trying hard to cause distrust, misunderstanding, and withdrawal into the narrow shell of one's own problems. We will not yield to this pressure.

We want our Party to contribute its share to the unity of the world Communist movement, which is a task of the utmost importance. Our Party will do it by turning to the new and not falling back on sectarian and dogmatic positions, which was precisely what weakened that unity.

The internal difficulties which the world Communist movement is experiencing are in the nature of growing pains, with both the parties in power and those fighting under the capitalist system. We are faced with problems of exceptional complexity and importance, and we must seek to solve them precisely because they are so important. Nevertheless, it is now more difficult to arrive at a common point of view than before.

The world Communist movement is no longer what it was in its Comintern period. Twenty years have passed since the Comintern was dissolved, and our movement is perhaps lagging behind in its search for new methods and forms of cooperation, such as would enable it to strengthen its unity in accordance with the exigencies of the time. The present period makes it our duty to seek patiently for up-to-date means of achieving unity amid the vastly different situations we have in different countries. This is why our Central Committee on May 9 and 10 last took a stand in favor of a world conference. We intend to maintain this position of ours. And we want numerous patient exchanges of opinions and consultations, taking as much time as may be necessary, to really clear the ground for the conference.

The latest world Communist conference sat four years ago. Many an important event has occurred since then. The general line formulated by the 81 parties four years ago has been brilliantly confirmed. They demand that the Communists should begin as early as posible to compare notes so as to formulate, as a result of careful analysis, a general line of action in accordance with present-day realities. This will no doubt necessitate a very great effort, and the difficulties involved are easy to foresee. But we repeat that the Communist movement will make no progress if each party keeps to itself. We would also like the Communist parties of the Common Market countries to meet at regular intervals to exchange views and coordinate their research.

bonds of solidarity between Communists and Workers' parties. Allow me, on behalf of the delegates to this Congress, to convey warm greetings to the fraternal parties which accepted our invitation and to those which sent us messages of greeting. We greatly appreciate, dear comrades, the honor you are doing us by attending this Congress. We attach vast importance to the opinions you are going to express here.

I have confined myself to the important points, to the problems which must be discussed and carefully studied if our Party is to work fruitfully in the months ahead.

Our enemies will undoubtedly make a careful study of the records of this Congress. They will feign surprise at our no longer discussing this or that issue. Let that not worry us. Let us concentrade on extending unity of action and on tackling the fundamental problem of democracy.

PRESSING POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC ISSUES*

Walter Ulbricht

FIRST SECRETARY, CENTRAL COMMITTEE,
SOCIALIST UNITY PARTY OF GERMANY

I. THE NATIONAL QUESTION AS IT STANDS TODAY

On the occasion of the 15th anniversary of our Republic, we not only summed up the achievements of our people, our Party, the National Front and government bodies, but also pointed out the prospects for the peaceful settlement of the national question.

Herr Erhard has announced that in 1965 the Bonn government will take the initiative in the German problem. On the other hand, he insists on the restoration of the 1937 borders and the go-ahead for the multilateral nuclear force . . .

The plan for West Germany's atomic armament through the MLF makes the Bonn government even more unpopular with the European peoples and the young national states. It is no accident that neither Bonn nor the Social-Democratic leadership have been able to suggest a realistic plan for German reunification. Herr Schröeder's talks of a standing Four-Power Foreign Ministers' Commission has nothing in common with the idea of reunification. By contrast, many proposals for a peaceful solution of the German problem have been put forward by the Soviet Union and the GDR, Reunification is a task for both German states which cannot be carried out without first normalizing the relations between them through negotiations on an equal basis. But Herr Schröeder wants to shelve the matter, hoping to weaken the Warsaw Treaty countries by embroiling them with one another.

U.S. Divide-and-Rule Policy

Similar strange ideas have been advanced by U.S. spokesmen. Recently the U.S. Ambassador to Bonn came out with what he calls the "magnetic field" theory. It says that the NATO powers possess a "measurable force" which "attracts" the People's Democracies, and that this force should be increased so as to break People's Democracies away from the Soviet Union and win them over to NATO's side.

The U.S. Ambassador, who aired his theory in West Berlin in mid-November, believes that this development should make it increasingly difficult for the GDR to remain outside this "magnetic field," and should eventually bring the GDR into NATO's fold. Otherwise the GDR would find itself in isolation inside the "Eastern bloc," and then it would be difficult for the Soviet Union to bar mutual understanding between the Germans, and one fine day the Soviets would have to allow the GDR to turn to West Germany.

The ill fame of the divide-and-rule policy must have prompted the West to think of a new name for it, but it is doomed to failure in any guise.

Does Bonn really expect that its demand for the restoration of the 1937 borders, i.e., for the annulment of the results of the Second World War and for the dismemberment of Poland and Czechoslovakia, its decision to stop the prosecution of Nazi criminals, its arms race and its emergency laws will enhance the socialist countries' respect for and trust in the FRG? Does it imagine that the barbarous intervention against the Congolese people and the people of South Vietnam, and Bonn's neo-colonialist policy as a whole, wil not be taken by the African and Asian peoples as a manifestation of the aggressiveness of imperialism?

The Idea of the "Incalculable Risk"

War Minister von Hassel wants the European military command to be given the right to use nuclear weapons, while Herr Schmidt from Hamburg, a Social Democratic leader, suggests re-establishing the General Staff in the FRG.

This idea is opposed by other NATO countries, which refuse to join the West German revenge-seekers in their gamble. This means that the task facing the peace forces in West Germany and all peace-loving countries at the close of 1964 is to fight against the arms race and for a ban on nuclear weapons, and to expose before the peoples the secrets of imperialist war preparations. It is time to warn not only the CDU-CSU in West Germany, but also the advocates of atomic armament in the Social-Democratic Party against the criminal policy of a "forward strategy" and of the "incalculable risk," and to rally the peoples against it.

Unity in Conditions of Peace and Freedom

West Germany's ruling class has turned the Marxist slogan of Peace and Freedom into an imperialist slogan. Our Party, the National Front of Democratic Germany and the peace forces in West Germany take unity in conditions of peace and freedom as meaning the democratic reunification of Germany through agreement between the two German states, through liberation from militarism, revanchism and the dictatorship of the war industry monopolies.

But the CDU-CSU, the party of West German monopoly capital, sees unity in conditions of peace and freedom as the unity of Germany under the dictatorship of the West German monopolists and militarists, tension under the threat of MLF atom bombs, an atmosphere of insecurity bred by the cold war, and freedom for West German finance capital to extend its sphere of exploitation to the East. It is, in fact, the same strategy as German finance capital and the German militarists employed in Hitler's time. It is only the tactics that have changed.

This policy of so-called integration means a deeper split of Germany. It means rejection of a genuine settlement of the German national question. The United States is interested in closer cooperation with the West German Federal government, because this serves its own ambitions for expansion and aggravates West Germany's differences with France and Britain. Characteristically, however, not a single NATO country favors German unity. The United States fears democratic development in Germany, while other countries fear Germany as a competitor. Therefore, it is only the German Democratic Republic, the Soviet Union and other socialist countries and the national states that are advocating German reunification, provided the war menace rooted in West Germany is removed and mutual understanding achieved as a result between the two German states.

The Dual Policy of the SDP Congress

Was the truth about national and social problems spoken at the SDP congress?

This truth, which reflects the situation that has taken shape since 1945, is that West Germany's participation in the multilateral nuclear force will prolong the split indefinitely.

We ask you, comrade Social-Democrats, why at your Karlsruhe congress you did not say openly that the majority of the West German population would like to draw a line under World War II and live in peace. Why did the SDP not tell the membership and the West German population the truth, namely, that the MLF and the demand for the restoration of the 1937 borders meant perpetuation of the German split? At a time when most of the Social-Democratic leaders also support the West Germany imperialists' claim to the title of spokesmen for the whole of Germany, this means fomenting the worst kind of nationalism and inciting Germans against each other. This is harmful to the German people, no matter whether the Social-Democratic leaders pursue this line for electioneering or for other purposes.

At the Karlsruhe congress the SDP leadership proposed a dual policy stamped with nationalism and revanchist sentiment. On the one hand, it is allied with Erhard, War Minister von Hassel and Inspector-General Trettner, and supports the MLF and the claim to the 1937 borders. On the other hand, it wants scientific progress, a better educational system, greater democratic rights, etc. But these things just don't go together.

The Swedish Example

In connection with the SDP congress bourgeois political observers commented that SDP Chairman Willy Brandt, a candidate for the post of Federal Chancellor, wanted West Germany to follow the Swedish example . . . I consider that a program for development patterned on the Swedish model could be of some use to West Germany. But the decisions of the SDP congress point the other way.

What enabled the Swedish people and Social Democrats to secure important social gains? Above all the fact that Sweden kept out of the two world wars and, indeed, all the wars fought during the last century and a half.

Patterning one's policy on the Swedish example, and on West German participation in the NATO multilateral nuclear force and aiming at revenge are, in my opinion, mutually exclusive opposites.

However, the opportunities for closer relations and mutual understanding between the two German states that would be provided if West Germany followed the Swedish example are worth studying. I think there might be interesting developments meriting serious cansideration and discussion.

A Change Through Closer Relations

The late President Kennedy once spoke of a change through closer relations, i.e., of the gradual establishment of contacts and mutual understanding on particular issues. Herr Wehner unambiguously opposed this line at the SDP congress. But we ask: Can there be, in view of the existence of two German states with different social systems and of the revival of imperialism in West Germany, an alternative to a change through closer relations?

The agreement on passes proposed by us shows the possibilities there are. This agreement is based on the mutual recognition of the equality of political institutions, of the GDR government and the Senate of the special territory of West Berlin. The agreement on the motor road bridge in Hirschberg is based on the right of the respective authorities to represent the German Democratic Republic and the Federal Republic.

Closer relations through mutual understanding call for a progressive policy on the part of West Germany as well. This implies the workers' right to take part in economic, and more particularly industrial, management. It implies representation of the interests or the working peasants in government bodies, and recognition of the rights of their democratic organizations. It implies the right to education and the development of the educational system in step with scientific progress. It implies the equality of women, in particular the principle of equal pay for equal work, and the guaranteeing of the fundamental rights of the younger generation, as exemplified by the law on youth adopted in the GDR. It concerns various aspects of the development of the social sciences.

Mutual Understanding Between Workers

I want to say this to the Social-Democratic comrades in West Germany: Nothing, not even the fatal decisions of your Karlsruhe congress on multilateral nuclear armament, will prevent us from continuing our struggle for peace and national reunification. Let the SDP leadership join with the West German nationalists during the election campaign in supporting the West European Union and the restoration of the 1937 borders. In our fight for peaceful coexistence we will represent the interests of the GDR citizens as well as of the workers and all the peace-loving people of West Germany.

We shall do our best to contribute to mutual understanding between the workers of the two German states. We shall strive to facilitate the difficult process of ensuring peace in Germany and peaceful German reunification. We shall therefore redouble our efforts to strengthen the bulwark of peace in Germany, the German Democratic Republic, through full-scale socialist construction.

Our proposals for a peaceful German settlement, which will provide the basis for a peaceful solution of the problem of the special territory of West Berlin, are realistic and practicable, and they will eventually gain recognition.

The Social-Democratic leaders will be unable to achieve revanchist aims with regard to the GDR and other socialist states even if they join with the bourgeoisie in a nationalist front and a coalition government. They wil be defeated like Adenauer. They cannot realize their plans for expansion, for the balance of world political and military forces has changed.

I would like to suggest to the Social-Democratic comrades in West Germany that they contribute to creating a climate favorable to further steps, however small, towards a rapprochement and mutual understanding between the two German states. We, for our part, have already taken many such steps.

Being socialists who fight for peace and German unity, we are unhappy to see that everything is being done in West Germany to deepen the German split. However, what many workers, peasants and intellectuals say gives us hope that the peace forces will in the end gain the upper hand. A decisive step towards this could be taken by establishing mutual understanding between workers, above all between trade unionists, of the two German states. We are doing everythming to bring this about.

II. SOME QUESTIONS OF PARTY AND STATE LEADERSHIP

The Western capitalist press alleges that the cold war compelled the GDR to develop a national economy of its own and to organize independent scientific and technological research. Our opponents are right in the sense that we lost no time in drawing proper conclusions from the world technological revolution and in taking the necessary measures, such as the introduction of a new system of economic planning and management. Today we can say that we have made considerable headway through a purposeful economic policy. The working people of our republic feel proud and confident of their strength as they review their successes. The efficiency of leadership has increased considerably and won an appropriate reward on the occasion of the Republic's 15th anniversary.

A comparison with some countries shows how right we were when we concerned ourselves in good time with scientific and technological progress, the role of science as a productive force, with standardization and planning, and the development of certain industries.

In any case, it is evident that we can only make steady progress if we have a scientifically-grounded idea of what the world will be like in 1970 and 1980.

Guidance of a socialist state in present-day conditions makes serious demands on leading Party and government bodies as regards the theoretical examination and practical solution of problems. It is not enough to know the laws of social development. We must ensure, both in drawing up long-range plans and in fulfilling annual plans, that the population draws upon its own experience and raises its educational level, that it understands the new tasks and conscientiously participates in promoting social progress and doing away with obsolete practices.

Economic Competition and the Technological Revolution

Our Party firmly abides by the decisions of the Moscow Meeting of 1960, which proclaimed the policy of peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems in contrast to the imperialist policy of resolving the contradiction between imperialism and socialism by military means, i.e., through world nuclear war. The Meeting offered the socialist countries the alternative of transfering the dispute with imperialism primarily into the sphere of material production and defeating capitalism in this sphere.

The Communist and Workers' parties of the socialist countries committed themselves accordingly. Our Party attaches great importance to these commitments, being aware that the developed capitalist countries can be overtaken and outstripped within a reasonably short space of time provided we solve the problems of the technological revolution without delay.

The decisions of our Sixth Congress and especially the new Program of the SUPG are a concrete contribution made by our Party to the implementation of the general line of the world Communist movement. Our decisions envisage the further rapid growth of the productive forces, with the priority development of the key branches of the economy. They encompass all the important aspects of development, such as the establishment of a single socialist system of education, the further extension of democracy, and improvement of the living standard, along with the enhancement of our Party's leading role.

A New Standard of Leadership

The efficiency of leading Party and government bodies should be gauged by the extent to which they can cope with these basic tasks.

Once it was held that the content and methods of leadership are determined exclusively by the socialist relations of production, and that since these relations are stable and develop gradually, the content and methods of leadership can only develop gradually. Experience has shown, however, that the vigorous growth of the productive forces also influences the content and methods of leadership. It is a genuine case of dialectical interdependence. One of the chief tasks of leadership today is to solve problems of the technological revolution so as to ensure the rapid growth of the productive forces. This is essential to the people's standard of living. On the other hand, a careful study should be made to find out the changes caused in the content and methods of leadership by the technological revolution itself. This is especially important in the period of full-scale socialist construction, when socialism is fully established and the methods of leadership must be changed accordingly.

In keeping with the decisions of the Sixth Congress and the provisions of the SUPG Program, the Central Committee of our Party and the Council of Ministers thoroughly analyzed the style of their work and came to the conclusion that the effectiveness of the economic laws of socialism should be increased. As a result, a new system of economic management and planning was developed conforming to the demands of the technological revolution.

A distinction should be drawn between guidance of the Party and guidance of the state. The state is administered in accordance with the territorial princple. Economic management is based on the industrial-territorial principle. Both the territorial and the industrial principle underline the guiding activity of the Party, which embraces a whole set of poltitical, ideological, economic and cultural problems of social development, as well as problems of government. In our highly industrialized country, the industrial principle ensures, specifically, the uniformity of research and of the practical application of its results. Although the forms and methods of leadership have also been developing, I believe that the structure of the Party bodies dealing with economic matters should be correlated, on the whole, with the structure of the economic bodies.

Aware of its high responsibility, the leadership of our Party has long since concerned itself with problems of the technological revolution. It was not misled by the fact that some Marxist theoreticians and practical workers in other countries rejected this concept and spoke of only "technical progress." The important thing for us was to use a concept clearly showing the inner dynamics and the power of this objective process. However, we think it wrong to regard this process as gradual evolution, for this would mean underestimating automation, and, hence, big lot production, cybernetics and electronics. It would mean scattering our forces and losing more time.

The Leading Role of the Party

After analyzing the situation our Party leadership took steps to ensure that science developed uniformly in all the more important branches in close connection with the key branches of production, and that the material interest of factories, offices and their staffs in conducting research and applying its results were brought into line with the interests of society, of the people.

We can put on record that the standard of guidance provided by the Party has improved in every field. Party work is carried on in accordance with the democratically adopted decisions of the Sixth Congress and the Central Committee. The Party organizations are working to realize the decisions of the government, the People's Chamber and other popular government bodies, as well as the resolutions of the State Council and the decisions of trade union and peasant congresses.

We are guided by the principle of democratic centralism. As the guiding force, the Party must deal with the major issues, as was the case at the Party congress and Central Committee meetings. However, some Party bodies and functionaries still tend to assume administrative functions instead of working among people and helping them to understand and fulfil political and economic tasks. This is often due to the mistaken idea that it is the way to achieve higher efficiency.

The education of a body of people or an individual engaged in administrative work requires patient and systematic effort. Party committees and Party functionaries often take over the duties of trade unions — in guiding emulation, for instance — instead of working within the trade unions and helping them carry out their own decisions.

The Territorial-Industrial Principle

It is obvious that in the economic field, which today is decisive in the struggle against imperialism, the industrial principle should be applied to make possible an effective, uniform economic and technical policy. The current technological revolution makes this principle even more important. Therefore Party bodies dealing with economic matters should apply the industrial principle, so as to concentrate the more competent Party workers in the decisive branches.

But ours is not an "economic party" in the narrow sense of the phrase. It guides the entire social life of the republic. It is responsible for the whole range of political, ideological, scientific economic and cultural matters. This calls for the right combination of the territorial and the industrial principle. The Political Bureau believes that political and ideological work among the people should be strictly controlled and coordinated by the Secretariat. This will prevent its division into work in industry, in agriculture and in residential communities.

Tackle the Main Problems

The Party leadership is concentrating more and more on the main problems, making a special effort to attain the highest scientific and technological level, fully develop the leading branches of the economy, and establish a single socialist system of education.

To be sure, the Political Bureau and the Secretariat still have to deal with secondary matters. The result is too many instructions. One of the reasons for this is that some comrades and committees prefer to refer to the Political Bureau or the Secretariat questions which they should decide themselves — a practice which has yet to be emphatically condemned. On the other hand, the Political Bureau and the Secretariat have to pass decisions on some matters because the appropriate bodies are slow to issue directives enabling the lower bodies to work independently. But on the whole the trend of development is correct. It will certainly not be long before the survivals of the former style are eliminated.

The task, therefore, is to achieve a definite degree of self-regulation in the economy through the correct application of the economic laws of socialism and of the new system of economic management and planning. The more effectively the economic laws operate, the fewer bureaucratic obstacles they encounter, as has been the case only too often, and the more extensively precise economic calculation is used, the more scientific and technological progress is stimulated, the more production costs are reduced, and the more prices correspond to the value. This is a prerequisite for the steady improvement of the standard of living.

Socialist Countries Cooperate in Promoting the Technological Revolution

A study of the problems of the technological revolution brought the Party and state leadership to the conclusion that the GDR cannot carry out certain important tasks single-handed. The technological revolution necessitates international economic, scientific and technical cooperation. This confronts the Council for Mutual Economic Aid with new tasks that have yet to be carried out.

The big monopoly groups of Western Europe have removed some of the obstacles to technological progress. This was due in some measure to the economic pressure of their U.S. competitors.

Our Party leadership considers these matters most important and pressing. To carry out their decisions of 1960 in full, the socialist countries should join forces in solving problems of the technological revolution. On this depends the pursuit of the peaceful coexistence policy and further progress in changing the balance of economic forces in favor of socialism.

This calls for the removal of unnecessary administrative form in economic management, both inside the various socialist countries and in inter-state relations. In our opinion, the time has come for scientific and technical cooperation between socialist countries to be organized in strict accordance with economic criteria, on the basis of the national economy and in the interest of solving its economic and technical problems.

The CMEA countries maintain extensive economic contacts both among themselves and with capitalist countries. But to purchase machines and plant abroad is not enough. It is of decisive importance to raise production in every country to the level required on the world market, to reach the highest scientific and technical standards. This can be done provided there is accord and cooperation among socialist countries in the designing and manufacture of items essential for attaining the best world standards and ending the present dependence on deliveries from capitalist firms. Accord and cooperation are also necessary in research. It has become clear that this can only be brought about through genuine economic relations, which enhance the interest of every country in promoting research and meeting its engagements, and not on the administrative lines of the past.

It is fair to say that the activities of the leading Party and government bodies are essentially correct. In keeping with the principle of collective leadership, major problems are thoroughly discussed and are solved in common on a scientific basis. There is no subjective approach here, and every executive takes part and has his own responsibilities. The centralization prevailing in the discussion and solution of cardinal problems does not shackle but encourage the initiative of the working people.

A Correct Relationship Between Centralism and Democracy

Under our social system, with the people owning the means of production and exercising state power, there can be no return to bourgeois democracy. The task is further to develop socialist democracy, which makes it possible to decide important questions in a strictly centralized and yet democratic way and to give full scope to the initiative of the working people in their everyday work and in public matters. This possibility, which we try to use more and more effectively, stems from the community of the vital interests of society and the individual . . .

We intend to create a science dealing with socialist economic management, with the emphasis on the essence and methods of management, particularly in the associations of people's enterprises. We will also try to carry forward the organizational propositions of Marxism-Leninism which constitute highly important principles of the work of leading Party bodies. There is plenty of work to do, as you see. But it is just as certain that we will organize our work in such a way as to be equal to the great responsibility assumed by the CC and the government.

The Leninist principle of collective leadership, combined with the enhancement of personal responsibility and encouragement of the initiative of the masses, has struck firm root in our Party.

Our Party committees and local organizations should do more to verify the execution of decisions. They should go deeper into people's problems and emphasize the responsibility of every Party member. This applies both to the fulfilment of plan assignments and to public activities, personal behaviour and participation in the spiritual life of society.

We feel that Lenin's counsel on this score is sometimes interpreted one-sidedly. Some comrades have been over-emphasizing decentralization. But I have already said that democratic centralism is our guiding principle, as required by the Rules. Decentralization must not necessarily be identified with the promotion of socialist democracy and the extension of the rights of local bodies. Socialist democracy and the constructive initiative of the masses can come into their own provided major questions are discussed and decided on their merits, in a principled way.

When democratic centralism is applied correctly, the interests of the national economy, the associations of people's enterprises, individual enterprises and their personnels, and the interests of society as a whole coincide. This also makes it easier to use the principle of providing material incentives. The more thoroughly decisions are thought out, the easier it is to delegate responsibility to lower bodies and individuals and to organize effective control.

No important achievements can be expected, however, if the main problems are not spotlighted, their discussion and solution is delayed and no mobilizing goals are set.

III. THE NEW SYSTEM OF ECONOMIC PLANNING AND MANAGEMENT. WORK AMONG PEOPLE

The socialist consciousness of people grows in step with economic changes and as a result of ideological work and improvements in the standard of education. The new economic system has a great democratizing effect, for it makes for more competent leadership, leads to the extention of the rights of local bodies and encourages people's creative effort. Management on scientific principles, the new economic system, the socialist system of education and the promotion of socialist democracy all make up a single whole.

Concentration on economic tasks, which are decisive for improving the living standard, has in some cases led to a decline in ideological work, specifically as regards exposing the role of German imperialism. I think this is not due to emphasis on technology or economics but to the fact that the decisions of the Sixth Party Congress on political work among the masses have not yet brought a change in working methods.

Solutions to Problems Posed by Reality

The mere proclamation of Marxist-Leninist truths will hardly prove useful. Marxism-Leninism is a living science which, among other things, deals directly with questions of the people's everyday life. It is the science of how to remake the world, the social system, and people's lives in the interest of lasting peace, of humanism and happiness.

This is why we need something more than a proclamation of Marxist-Leninist principles and non-committal talk about them. Ideological work must first and foremost provide a scientific explanation of the problems posed by reality and Marxist solutions to them in order to mobilize the people for the remaking of the world. A characteristic of our democracy is that the decisive say belongs to the people. It is therefore the duty of the Party, government and other public bodies to keep the people abreast of the main aspects of full-scale socialist construction and of major ideological and political problems.

Our citizens, primarily young people, are keen on social problems and understand many of them correctly. But they do not see the broader interconnections of these problems. This is because theory is not presented to them creatively, in conjunction with present-day reality, and that Party and government decisions are often explained to them in an abstract manner, without explaining their practical bearing on the problems agitating people.

Guide to Action

Our young workers, engineers and scientists are successfully contributing to economic development, but we are not dong enough to help them in maturing politically and ideologically as the future masters of the GDR and of Germany as a whole. Party workers, especially propagandists and lecturers in the social sciences, should always remember that Marxism-Leninism is a guide to action. This is often forgotten. I would like to advise Free German Youth Union functionaries to give more thought to their working methods so as to ensure an effective interconnection between our new policy on youth and the new system of economic planning and management. We want to educate people who are engaged in creative labor and think independently.

Some time ago one woman Party member asked why the Party is less energetic, purposeful and self-critical in changing the methods of ideological work than in the economic field. She had a point there. The new system of economic planning and management has brought about radical changes, ideological changes included, and people are vigorously and confidently tackling new tasks despite all the difficulties. Little has been done, however, to revise the methods of ideological and political work among the masses.

Eliminate Old, Hidebound Methods

I am speaking about this in such strong terms to prevent the comrades from seeking a way out in organizational changes. The point is to use new methods in explaining new ideological and political problems to people and to concern ourselves more with their everyday interests.

We have taken a step in this direction by starting to set up a single socialist system of education. We have also made some progress in the social sciences. But we can make no progress in civic education in school or in political work in industry unless we thoroughly revise our style of leadership and our methods of work among people. In one vocational training school, a civic education lesson was devoted almost entirely to reading to the pupils excerpts from Lenin's Materialism and Empiriocriticism. What will the pupils know about materialism after such a lesson?

The fact that plans are fulfilled and the quality of output is on the rise testifies to the good will of people and their loyalty to the republic. Nevertheless, the Party, the trade unions and the officials responsible for economic and cultural matters should be more active in explaining the new tasks to people and mobilizing them to fulfil these tasks.

Foster Militancy

There is room for improvement in educational work with Party members. Some of them, still unable to think in terms of the new economic system and the long-range plan, limit themselves to explaining everyday issues to people, leaving out the interconnection between these issues and the problems of economic growth on the one hand, and of the struggle for peace, against imperialism, on the other.

Party members should be educated in a militant spirit. Too many of them more often than not take a defensive stand against imperialist attacks. They have but a faulty knowledge of the Party Program tasks as regards the struggle against imperialism, exploitation and war.

Much remains to be done to educate Party members in the spirit of intolerance of shortcomings and mistakes. Many comrades have the wrong idea of Party discipline. They argue roughly as follows: most of the shortcomings which the people criticize and which worry us too must be known to the leadership. As they do not consider themselves competent enough or simply wish to avoid additional trouble, they keep silent about shortcomings or even defend them. This attitude creates an atmosphere of tolerance of shortcomings and inefficiency, which reflects on the prestige of the Party and of these comrades themselves.

The education of Party members is also hamered by the style of work prevailing in some government bodies, in which comrades are given many assignments but the question of responsibility does not receive adequate attention.

Having limited opportunities of taking independent decisions, local bodies often refer even the simplest matters to the "top." It should be added that some problems of vital concern to the population, such as the construction and repair of houses, schools and kindergartens, cannot be fully solved at present.

Some may argue that the democratic rights of the local bodies have been established by law. That is correct and needs no revision. But it is also a fact that with the introduction of cost accounting the local bodies have ceased to get a certain share of the income of big enterprises. For this reason we have recommended the Council of Ministers to revise the law on the finances of the local bodies with a view to increasing their economic possibilities.

Educational work among Party members should be aimed at fostering an attitude of militant intolerance of slovenliness and mediocrity in their own work.

Everybody must have his share of responsibility.

I think it essential that many Party members should change their attitude to non-Party people. Some comrades may say that their relations with non-Party people are normal. But I ask for more than that. In my opinion, many of the tasks now being carried out by Party members should be shifted on to the broader shoulders of the working people who are not Party members.

In line with the resolutions of the Party congress and the decisions of the State Council on the promotion of socialist democracy, we should secure greater participation in public activities by the citizens and entrust more responsible tasks to them. Democracy can be further developed provided everybody feels responsible for the Republic's progress. Hence the need to draw more working people into the management of government affairs, irrespective of their party affiiliation or world outlook.

Discussions in the National Front

It is essential to consult the trade unions, the democratic bloc parties of the National Front, the mass organizations, and all citizens on these new problems. This Central Committee meeting and the discussion of the 1965 economic plan in the People's Chamber should serve as a sufficient impetus. We know that important developments are taking place in the democratic bloc parties. They not only cooperate actively in the pursuit of the peace policy of the GDR, but also contribute much to the realization of the new tasks in industry, agriculture and education. By means of rationalization measures they help to bring the local industries, especially semi-state enterprises and artisans' cooperatives, to a level with advanced enterprises. They help their members to acquire economic knowledge. We think highly of their contribution to socialist humanism and socialist morality. Hence the need for the National Front discussing the new problems that will crop up as the 1965 plan is fulfilled and the long-range plan discussed.

All these are new characteristics of our people's socialist democracy, which is a whole historical epoch ahead of bourgeois parliamentarism. We cannot therefore take the advice of those who suggest reverting to the antiquated practices of bourgeois democracy. That would mean forfeiting the advantages afforded by our socialist system.

Our opponents are complaining bitterly against the nature and methods of leadership in our Party and our workers' and peasants' state. These complaints are understandable, for the purpose of our Party and government leadership is to assure the victory of the people's cause and not to offer comfort to our opponents. Therefore, with the best of intentions, we cannot take their wishes and criticisms into consideration.

The historical mission of our working people, of our Party, of the National Front of Democratic Germany, of our workers' and peasants' state, is not only to serve the cause of ensuring the peaceful life of our people and other peoples as a bastion of peace, but also to realize, through the full-scale construction of socialism, the program which indicates the way to the future of Germany.

IV. FOR THE UNITY OF THE WORLD COMMUNIST AND WORKING-CLASS MOVEMENT

The celebration of the 47th anniversary of the Great October Socialist Revolution provided a good opportunity for an exchange of opinions on the cooperation of the Communist and Workers' parties of the socialist countries. Almost all socialist countries sent party and government delegations to congratulate the Soviet people. Meetings were held with representatives of the Presidium of the CC, CPSU headed by Comrade Brezhnev; with the delegation of the Polish People's Republic led by Comrade Gomulka; with Comrade Hendrych, head of the Czechoslovak delegation; with Comrade Chou En-lai, Deputy Chairman of the CC, CPC and Prime Minister of the Chinese People's Republic, and members of the Chinese delegation, and with the heads of delegations from other socialist countries.

In our talks with the representatives of fraternal parties we spoke in favor of normalizing relations and convening the Drafting Committee to prepare an international conference of the Communist and Workers' parties. We suggested creating an atmosphere that would enable the Drafting Committee to meet. That, in our opinion, called for discontinuing public polemics.

The comrades may have noticed that we began to pursue this line when celebrating the 15th anniversary of the Chinese People's Republic and the 15th anniversary of the GDR. We consider that certain serious discussions befitting relations between fraternal parties can be held without mutual discrimination at meetings or in scientific journals. In our talks in Moscow we also pointed out that the Drafting Committee should carry on its work on the basis of complete equality, without discriminating against or excluding any party. Documents on fundamental issues should be drafted jointly. Drafts and proposed amendments should be submitted to the parties to enable them to form and state their opinion in time for the next Drafting Committee meeeting. Repeated meetings of the committee would ensure proper discussion and mutual understanding on specific major problems.

New Problems

It is indispensable to prepare a conference of the Communist and Workers' parties in order to promote the unity of the world Communist and working-class movement and strengthen socialism in the struggle against aggressive imperialist policies. We know that Marxism-Leninism owes its strength to the fact that the Marxist-Leninist docrtine is applied on the basis of proletarian internationalism and in accordance wih the actual conditions in the countries concerned.

Many new problems have arisen necessitating more frequent exchanges of experience between the parties and governments of the socialist countries, and between the Communist and Workers' parties of the socialist countries, the newly-free national states and the capitalist countries. The vastly different problems and tasks in question cannot be reduced to a single denominator. This is why we should compare notes to promote the initiative and creative effort of the various parties.

Many problems were raised and solutions to some of them proposed at the international scientific session dedicated to the centenary of the founding of the First International. The building of communism in the Soviet Union and of socialism in the People's Democracies proceeds amid grim ideological battles against bourgeois influences and in the conditions of a world-wide technological revolution. Furthermore, the struggle of newly-established states for political and economic independence poses new problems concerning relations between these states and the socialist countries. The Communist parties of the countries of state-monopoly capitalism are faced with new problems, especially in connection with the Common Market and the close international intertwining of major corporations.

Important changes have taken place in the policy and work of the Communist and Workers' parties following the 20th and 22nd congresses of the CPSU. But it would be wrong as yet to say that all conclusions have been drawn from the new situation, from the development of the socialist world system, the liberation of the colonial peoples, and the growth of state-monopoly capitalism in some big industrial states.

Creative Application of Leninist Standards

Of decisive importance for ensuring peace in the conditions of peaceful coexistence is the effort of the socialist countries to raise their science and technology to the world level and attain superiority in material production. This enhances the appeal of socialism with regard to other peoples, especially the working class, the peasants and intellectuals in the highly industrialized capitalist countries. Hence the problems which we must solve.

In his Memorandum, Palmiro Togliatti, the Italian Communist leader who enjoyed universal esteem and who died so prematurely, stated his opinion on some of the problems confronting the Communist and Workers' parties. It was a contribution to the preparation of the Drafting Committee meeting. I, for my part, touched on some outstanding problems in my speech at the scientific session dedicated to the First International.

Some comrades from fraternal parties want to know more about the reasons for certain difficulties experienced by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. Basically, it is a question of applying the Leninist standards of Party and state life, and it is still a question of carrying out the decisions of the 20th and 22nd congresses of the CPSU, and of putting the 1960 joint Statement of the Communist and Workers' parties into effect. It follows that the issue is not one of flaws in the system, but of eliminating, among other things, the survivals of dogmatism in economic management. It is a question of promoting the technological revolution, of continuously improving the methods of Party leadership. Above all it is a question of the role of the Central Committee.

It is a long-established tradition with the Marxist-Leninist parties to learn from each other, each party deciding how to use the progressive experience of others with due regard to the conditions of its own development.

We of the Central Committee have made it a rule for the Presidium to report on its work at the beginning of every Central Committee meeting, every member of the CC having the opportunity to ask questions and state his opinion.

The main problem in the GDR, as we see it, is to remove administrative obstacles to the operation of the economic laws of socialism, to use scientific methods of leadership so as to ensure the continuous execution of the decisions of the Party Congress. I should add that the time has come to further trade between socialist countries on a genuinely economic basis. Since the development of every country has its peculiarities, this should provide the most favorable conditions for economic progress and for good, normal relations precluding unnecessary disputes.

Full-scale socialist construction is a very complicated process in the field of politics, economy, technology, education, state and international law, the social sciences, literature and the arts . . .

The comrades in the fraternal parties of the capitalist countries have their own challenging problems, such as that of the democratic road to political power. Sometimes they take a one-sided view of some of the socialist countries' problems facing the Communist Party of this or that capitalist country. All the greater, therefore, the need for more frequent joint meetings and mutual visits to improve reciprocal information and compare notes.

FOR PEACE, NATIONAL LIBERATION, DEMOCRACY AND SOCIAL PROGRESS

COMMUNIQUE* ON MEETING OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE COMMUNISTS OF THE ARAB COUNTRIES

A meeting of representatives of the Communists of the countries of the Maghreb and the Arab East was held in December 1964.

The meeting, which took place in a fraternal and friendly atmosphere, was marked by a broad and useful exchange of views and experience. The representatives of the Communists of the above countries noted that all the Arab countries are experiencing, in one or another degree and in different forms, a powerful upswing in the revolutionary movement against imperialism, for peace, national liberation, democracy and social progress.

They examined and evaluated highly the experience of Algeria and the United Arab Republic. They welcomed the achievements of the Algerian People's Democratic Republic which, under the leadership of its vanguard party, the National Liberation Front, around which all the revolutionary, socialist forces, including the Communists, are rallied, is forging ahead, carrying forward the socialist revolution on the basis of the Algiers Charter. They noted that the achievements of the Algerian revolution, which accords with the specific national features of Algeria, are associated with the growing role played by the working people of town and country in the conditions of revolutionary democracy, which has found most striking expression in popular self-management and mobilization of the masses.

They likewise welcome the big socio-economic and political changes in the United Arab Republic, which has taken the non-capitalist path of development. If these achievements are combined with growing activity on the part of the masses, broader democracy and efforts to make the Arab Socialist Union an organization giving full expression to the interests and ideology of the working people, the UAR will be able to forge ahead towards socialism.

The Arab Communists also welcome the major victory won in the Sudan, where the struggle of the masses swept away the reactionary dictatorship and led to the triumph of the will of the Sudanese people, who are striving to establish a national democratic regime opening the way to social progress.

The participants in the meeting noted with satisfaction the achievements of the revolutionary movement in many other Arab countries. At the same time they pointed out with regret that, as the events and the experience of the Iraqi Communist Party have shown, the main factor which enabled the reactionaries to deal a severe blow at the Iraqi revolution in February 1963 was the division in the ranks of the revolutionary and patriotic forces. Other factors were the suppression of democracy and the strengthening of imperialist positions in Iraq.

The overthrow in November 1963, under pressure from the popular masses, of the sinister forces of fascism which had committed the most monstrous crimes, was an important victory for the people. On the basis of their own experience, the Iraqi Communists hold that the main precondition for the country's progress is the unification of all the national progressive forces and the establishment of democracy.

The revolutionary upswing in the Arab world is taking place at a time when the socialist world system, with the Soviet Union in the vanguard, is becoming the decisive factor of world development and when the ideas of scientific socialism are winning support as never before.

The mounting revolutionary upsurge marking the present epoch, the main feature of which is the transition from capitalism to socialism, gains impetus from the unity of the basic forces of the world revolutionary process: the socialist world system, the national-liberation movement and the working-class movement in the capitalist countries.

The victories of the Arab countries and other countries of Africa, Asia, Latin America have been won in growing struggle on the part of all peoples for peace and peaceful coexistence. They bear out the correctness of the Marxist-Leninist ideas creatively expressed in the decisions of the 20th and 22nd congresses of the CPSU and the documents of the 1957 and 1960 meetings of the Communist and Workers' parties.

The participants in the meeting note with gratification that socialism is increasingly becoming the cause not only of the Communists but also of broad sections of non-Communist patriots and revolutionaries. This does not run counter to Marxism-Leninism, but, on the contrary, corroborates and enriches it. Experience has shown that there is only one kind of socialism—scientific socialism, the main motive force in the realization of which are the workers, peasants and the revolutionary intelligentsia.

This makes it imperative for sincere revolutionaries to exert ever greater effort in the search for the best forms of cooperation, alliance or unity with a view to joint action by all the revolutionary forces in organizational forms best suited both to the present stage in the development of the revolution and to the conditions, specific features and traditions of each Arab country.

It is the duty of all revolutionaries—Communists and non-Communists—to display the maximum fraternal creative initiative in building and cementing the alliance of all the revolutionary forces, taking into account the new developments in the Arab world. Everything possible should be done to overcome every manifestation of mutual mistrust and suspicion, and especially to overcome the anti-Communist and sectarian trends. The Arab Communists urge exchange of experience and the closest cooperation between progressive parties, organizations and movements in the Arab world. They also urge joint effort to ensure the unity of the revolutionary forces in every Arab country.

In this connection, of extremely great importance are the democratic solution of the Kurd problem in Iraq in conformity with the legitimate national aspirations of the Kurdish people, peaceful settlement of border disputes between Algeria and Morocco, freedom for all political prisoners, both Communists and other democrats, in Iraq, Jordan, Morocco, Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries, and the granting of democratic freedoms, including freedom of speech, the press and organization, to all patriotic progressive forces.

All this would help to create the most favorable conditions for foiling the intrigues and conspiracies of the colonialists, for isolating the reactionary bourgeoisie and all other enemies of socialism. This would also provide the best guarantee of the realization of Arab unity on the basis of struggle against imperialism, strengthening of friendship with the socialist countries, democracy and social progress. On this basis Arab solidarity can be strengthened with a view to ensuring victory in the struggle for the liberation of South Arabia, restoration of legitimate rights of the Arabs in Palestine, against the Israeli conspiracy backed by the imperialists, primarily the U.S. imperialists, and aimed at diverting the waters of the Jordan, and, finally, for the return to the Arabs of the wealth of which they have been robbed.

The Arabs have learned in the course of their struggles that the strengthening of friendship and mutual aid with the Soviet Union and other socialist countries is the greatest guarantee of success in the fight for national liberation, against imperialism, for freedom and social progress.

The participants in the meeting voiced in the name of the Arab working people solidarity with the liberation struggle waged by the peoples of the Congo and South Vietnam. They resolutely condemn the U.S. and other imperialists' aggressive actions against the freedom and independence of the peoples.

The march of events in the various Arab countries clearly testifies to the important positive role played by the Arab Communists in the Arab liberation movement, in bringing all the revolutionary patriotic forces together with a view to finding the correct solutions to the political, social and economic problems confronting their countries. All this heightens the awareness of the Arab Communists of their responsibility to their peoples.

COLOMBIAN COMMUNISTS BUILDING POPULAR UNITY*

Jose Cardona Hoyos

The problem of popular unity has not yet been solved in Colombia, but significant progress has been made towards it due to the policy of the Communist Party.

Fully aware of the significance of unity for winning over the people and effecting revolutionary reforms, we Colombian Communists are working hard in all fields to overcome the division of the popular forces on which the bipartisan political domination of the oligarchy and U.S. imperialism rests.

We do not delude ourselves with the immediate prospect of uniting the entire people, but search persistently for ways and means of uniting those forces active in fighting against the present regime, for a government of the people. And we think that when the vanguard forces come together the masses will support the road proposed by them.

The degree to which the situation will change will depend on the activity and intentions of the masses rising to join the struggle. But in any case it will mean an end to the "National Front" regime and the establishment of a democratic regime of a new type which will fully express the interests of our people fighting for national liberation and a new socio-economic structure.

Our Party considers that the extensive participation of the working people in the political life of the country calls for at least a minimum of popular unity. To this end it is necessary to set up a solid unitary organization of an independent working-class movement, step up the peasants' movement, organize a Left Front of all democratic sections, and promote the students' movement and other forms of mass struggle.

I

The century-old bipartisan system affords a great advantage to the semi-feudal and capitalist exploiters shaping official policy as dictated by the U.S. monopolies, and greatly hampers the development of the revolutionary struggle.

Although the distinction between the Liberals and Conservatives has been growing increasingly blurred in recent years, it still helps the bourgeoisie and the feudals to maintain their ideological grip on the masses. At the same time, the growth of the political consciousness of the people is more and more undermining the old political foundations. The plunder of the country's wealth, the destruction of democratic freedoms and, on the other hand, the international influence of socialism and, in particular, the Cuban revolution, increase the discontent with the old concepts and strengthen the belief in revolutionary solutions.

Paradoxically, the "National Front" regime itself is contributing to the destruction of the old political barriers that prevented the overcoming of sectarian sentiments. The ruling classes used to decide the destinies of the nation employing the services of the one or the other traditional party. Ensuring the domination of the exploiting class, these parties ruled alternately, depending on the degree of prestige each enjoyed among the people at the time. Then, however, the situation grew complicated as the masses decided to use "representative democracy" in their own interest. In reply the ruling classes resorted to murders, mass repressions and terroristic dictatorships. But this form of rule too was endangered by the actions of the masses. Besides, it affected adversely some aspects of economic life. Therefore the oligarchy decided to replace military tyranny with the "legitimate rule" of a farcical "parity government" supported by both parties. At present the exploitation of the people by the monopolies at home and foreign imperialists is more ruthless than ever before. The loss of faith in the old policy erodes not only the two "historical parties," but the entire traditional system ensuring the ideological influence of the ruling classes. As a result, the wrath of the people can no longer be vented in a successive replacement of the ruling party. The need for entirely new changes is becoming the order of the day.

II

The masses are more and more escaping the control of the ruling classes. This new phenomenon in our public life is manifested in the growing activity of the people, although some groups express their protest passively, by abstaining from elections, etc. But on the whole, even though mass actions are not always well coordinated, the ruling circles begin to see that it is becoming increasingly difficult for them to use parliamentarianism for imposing anti- popular decisions.

Regrettably, the erosion of old methods of rule proceeded in an atmosphere where a certain anarchist trend prevailed among the democratic and Left forces. The most active but ideologically confused elements of the petty bourgeoisie think that their small and isolated groups embody the real aspirations of the nation. Failing to understand Colombian reality, they spend tremendous energy—and sometimes precious young lives—on objectives the conditions for which are not ripe yet. The absence of unity favors the development of political sects which actually help the oligarchy preserve its rule.

On the other hand, our working class was in a state of split, which was all the more serious since it was engineered by U.S. imperialism in the conditions of an unprecedented rise in the cost of living and a sharp growth of reactionary trends in official policy. Encouraged by reactionary governments and intent on seizing leadership of the working people, the clerical circles succeeded in establishing a Jesuit-headed trade union center. After the collapse of the military dictatorship another trade union center was formed. The anti-communist witch-hunt started by this center turned it into an appendage of the liberal bourgeoisie.

For several years the truly independent sections of the trade union movement were subjected to persecutions by the authorities and employers. But despite this, they took advantage of every opportunity for establishing unity of action with the trade union organizations under the influence of the anti-communist centers. This line, put forward by our Party and acclaimed by the most progressive part of the working-class movement, was stubbornly resisted by the Right-wing trade union leaders. But it was supported by many rank-and-file trade unionists and began to undermine the ideological foundations of the trade union bosses—clericalism and "class collaboration."

This period was very hard for the Colombian proletariat but it was also highly conducive to the growth of its class consciousness.

Therefore there is nothing surprising about the enthusiasm with which the working people received the proposal of the trade union activists of our Party and other organizations to convene a trade union congress to set up a new Confederation. Some people asked at the time: Will not a third trade union center broaden the split? But it was clear that the road to trade union unity in Colombia lay through that stage. First, because the new organization would unite those workers with different political views whom the anti-communist hysteria debarred from the existing trade union centers. That would also be a major step forward in building a militant organization of the working class. Second, in conditions of the growing political consciousness of the working people the new trade union center would stimulate a more resolute expression of discontent by members of the Colombian Workers' Confederation (CWC) and the Colombian Workers Union (CWU), who faced sanctions for open opposition to their leadership. Third, the new center would enable a truly independent proletariat to win over to its side the vast number of unorganized toilers. Such was the real way to unity excluding any discrimination. It was essential for adopting a correct attitude to the social battles of today.

Responding to the call of the consultative conference held in Medellin last year more than 500 representatives of 166,000 workers assembled in Bogota in May and founded the Colombian Workers' Trade Union Confederation, baffling all attempts of the employers, the press, the government and the trade union bosses to prevent this. It was pointed out in the inaugural act that "despite the present state of affairs and the fact that prerequisites for achieving trade union unity have not yet arisen in the CWC and CWU leadership, we are ready to display class solidarity with all actions aimed to improve the condition of the masses or contribute to the struggle for the interests of the people . . . The Confederation which comes into being today aims to organize and unite all working people irrespective of their religious and political views for the struggle to emancipate the working class and the entire people of Colombia."

That was undoubtedly a major victory for the working class and the people of our country. This victory is being consolidated in measure as we carry into reality the thesis that "we Communists do not make a cult out of the spontaneous movement of the masses for unity. Our duty is to work actively for this spontaneous movement to mature and turn into conscious actions." (Gilberto Vieira's report to the 30th plenary meeting of the CC, CP of Colombia.

The disintegration of the political parties which traditionally dominated the political life of the country could rapidly lead to profound changes in the social structure if only the forces interested in these changes succeeded in releasing and directing the energy of the masses. But this has to this day remained impossible because of the disunity of the Left forces, which are devoting much of their effort to internal strife instead of coordinating their actions.

Of course, ideological differences do exist and are due chiefly to the influence of different classes. But it is also evident that despite the multiplicity of aspirations the Left forces of Colombia have many aims in common. Real achievement of unity presupposes the ability to advance such aims and ensure the unity of will and action in the struggle for them. It will be impossible to unite all the forces if each of them insists on the others unconditionally adopting its views. Sectarianism is one of the worst enemies of the revolution, which cannot—especially in the present conditions —be accomplished by any single force alone but derives from the gigantic collective effort of the entire people of the given country.

True to its principles and heeding the demands of our people the Communist Party put forward, in an open letter to the various Left groups in July 1963, concrete proposals aimed at "expediting an open and sincere discussion of practical steps" and coordinating the activities of these groups.

Seeing clearly the difficulties to be overcome the leadership of our Party stated in this letter: "Evidently we all consider that the absence of coordinated exchange of opinions, no common orientation and unstable organization weakens revolutionary activity and makes it easier for the reactionaries to attack us." The letter contained an estimate of the prospective development: "Left unity in Colombia will serve the sole purpose of rallying to the struggle all those who want democratic and progressive changes in the country."

The essence of the matter was thus stated in the letter:

"We consider that the time has come to give serious consideration to the question of setting up a genuine Left Front which would unite all trends believing in the possibility of democratic change and pave the revolutionary way for structural changes in the country. The function of this democratic front should be not only to ward off the blows of the reactionaries united in the 'National Front,' but also to remove this bulwark of reaction, build the basis for a new government, and clear the way to the realization of the constantly suppresed striving of the masses for liberation."

True, no practical organizational steps followed. While supporting the idea of mutual understanding in words, the leaders of various Left groups adopted such an evasive stand that it prevented a round-table meeting and, consequently, the achievement of the first practical result.

But the voice of our Party was heeded by the rank-and-file and some functionaries and leaders. Since then the policy of unity of action with some groups which the Communist Party of Colombia has constantly pursued despite the absence of a general agreement, has been conducted on a still bigger scale—a factor which the diehards will have to reckon with. The experience of the last election campaign and some other mass actions testify to it.

The past election campaign proceeded in conditions exceptionally difficult for the popular groups. That the "National Front" lost its prestige was beyond doubt, but the masses began to abstain from elections not only in protest against the hypocritical dictatorship of the oligarchy, but also as a result of the disunity of the democratic and revolutionary forces.

This form of protest, though essentially correct, was negative in the sense that it increased the masses' passivity and indifference to politics. The situation was aggravated by the attempts of some of the proponents of this policy, including such undisguised reactionaries as the Christian Social Democratic Party, to present this as a "real commencement of the revolution." It was not difficult to persuade people to abstain from voting, for even at time when public activity ran high barely 70 per cent of the electorate went to the polls. And in Colombia those who do not vote usually also refrain from taking part in or supporting any struggle.

Despite these difficulties the Communist Party continued its work towards unity. It successfully resisted the subterfuges of the sectarians and supported those groups everywhere which came out more definitely for a policy conforming to the interests of the people.

We, of course, made ample use of the election campaign to popularize our ideas and establish closer links with the masses, for we are convinced that, as Lenin pointed out, it is more useful to take part in a public debate, no matter how limited this possibility may be, than to reject it as not being "the revolutionary way."

The facts showed that we were absolutely right. As we had foreseen, the trend to abstain from voting increased, but the "ultra-leftists" who propounded this slogan met with such an apathy of the masses that they could not arrange a single meeting in support of their stand. In other words, this line led to the passivity of the masses which only benefited the enemies of the people. Our Party, on the contrary, established contacts with the broadest sections, striving to overcome the pessimism caused by the anarchic actions of the leftists. We regarded the elections as a useful though limited means which should be employed along with all other methods of revolutionary struggle. The Liberal-revolutionary movement lost votes but retained, with our help, its positions in the parliament. Thanks to the correct policy of the CP of Colombia and the vigilance of the masses the Left is now better represented in the parliament. On the other hand, thanks to the Communists' vigorous advocacy of unity and the lesson life taught to our allies, a situation has developed where "the building of a Left parliamentary bloc in the next Chamber over the head of the rival groups and trends in the Liberal Revolutionary Movement is becoming a real perspective which will provide a fresh impetus to the anti-imperialist and anti-oligarchy unity of the people." (G. Vieira's report to the 30th plenary meeting of the CC, CP of Colombia. Thus, despite all the negative aspects of the election campaign, the possibilities for building the organized unity of action advocated by the Communists have grown considerably.

VI

It is impossible to enumerate all instances of united action by the various sections of the population. But two of them should be mentioned: student actions and national solidarity with the armed peasant movement.

The Colombian student movement, which has remarkable traditions of struggle against tyranny, is faced with numerous problems today. In tackling these problems the students have already taken steps to restore unity and achieved signal success.

An important contribution has been made by the young Colombian Communists, who have helped to remove the obstacles to establishing a single leadership of the student movement. It can be said that the developments caused by the pro-imperialist policy of the authorities led to a new and more favorable situation for us.

Almost all students and the majority of professors have come out in defense of the Free University, Colombia's only abode of freedom of instruction, against the oligarchy's intention to establish its control over the university and impose an anti-communist orientation on it.

The struggle of the students took different forms tending towards unity and thus facilitating the drawing together of the various groups. This is understandable, for the traditions of the Free University are attacked by the same force which interfere in the affairs of the National University. Big national and U.S. capital seeks to subordinate the Free University to its influence. This also explains arbitrary acts in the Santander Industrial University and the plans for revising study programs in the vocational training centers. That is why the students, defying violence and even challenging the troops that seize the campus, rise in the struggle against the regime which tolerates foreign interference and brings humiliation and disgrace upon our country.

Alongside the heroic struggle of the students and acting in close contact with their vanguard, the Colombian people have launched an impressive campaign of solidarity with the guerrilla movement, which arose in reply to the U.S.-inspired attack of regular troops on the regions of peasants' self-defense.

It will be no exaggeration to say that the broadest revolutionary, democratic or simply patriotic sections that came out in protest against "operation Marquetalia" were prompted by a sense of self-defense: the people know that what is behind the infamous aggression against the peasants' organizations is the policy of coups which, unless it is paralyzed by the resolute resistance of the masses, will resolve itself in a new tyranny of the "gorillas." Initiated under the pretext of bringing the benefits of civilization and peace to the peasants of that area, the 'civic-military action" turned into a war of extermination in the course of which napalm and even bacteriological bombs (witness the world press) were dropped from U.S. planes. Fortunately, the staunch resistance of our guerrillas, supported by mass protests, forced the government and the imperialist agents who inspired this crime, to falter. In this case the people displayed both the united will and the growing revolutionary consciousness.

The independent workers' movement, the peasants' organizations, students, the most prominent representatives of both trends in the Liberal Revolutionary Movement, distinguished scientists, parliamentarians, representatives of the various sections of the intelligentsia and even clergymen protested against the repressive actions. It was only the "ultra-revolutionaries" from among the LRM youth who sided with the reactionaries, declaring that we Communists had staged a bloody farce in Marquetalia "in order to get money from the socialist countries." This lie was fully exposed in the course of the powerful movement of solidarity with the heroic guerrillas.

From the viewpoint of gaining influence among the masses, the groups in the Liberal Revolutionary Movement are of special interest to the Communist Party. This does not mean, however, that we do not want a more or less permanent mutual understanding with other small groups of the Left. And this is not an easy matter. For the smaller these groups, the more dogmatic unrealistic and self-opinionated they become as if they alone possessed the absolute truth. Their sectarianism and intolerance make them almost automatically reject all compromise solutions as being "revolutionary degeneration." Despite this our Party, which applies in conformity with the situation Lenin's teaching on positive and useful compromises in order to pave the way for a democratic and revolutionary development, uses every opportunity to organize joint actions with these groups. These are mostly sporadic actions which have no great repercussions. But they are useful for they foster the spirit of cooperation and serve as an example of effective joint work and calm comparison of views on the development of the revolutionary struggle.

No little difficulties have been caused in this field by the leaders of the Communist Party of China, who are seeking to interfere with the work of our Party and cause confusion by the same methods they are employing in the entire world Communist movement. Patronizing the small groups of "ultra-revolutionaries" embodying the most negative petty-bourgeois trends, they encourage anarchic subjectivism which tragically persists in artificially and even forcibly pushing the people into battles the meaning of which they do not understand yet and are not yet prepared to wage. This, naturally, ends only in failures, for one cannot "implant" revolutionary consciousness. Every small group wants to accomplish the revolution its own way and make it as profound as its "radicalism" goes. But it is evident that if this group is not strong enough to accomplish the revolution in keeping with the interests of the people and if it rejects alliance with the other revolutionary groups, all its energy is bound to be wasted. To be such a "super-revolutionary" means to be a sectarian, to facilitate the work of the enemy and delay the revolution. The revolution becomes possible only when and where the overwhelming majority of the people is drawn into the struggle to effect changes in the socio-economic structure. Even if this change is not most radical it will initiate a revolutionary stage when the masses will be more and more insistently demanding new and deeper changes. This will make it possible first to consolidate the popular democratic revolution and then to go over resolutely to the socialist revolution. Certainly it is better to embark upon this road of revolutionary development than to choke with impotent anger at one's isolation and inability to become immediately the main dramatis persona of "the most radical revolution in history." Such is the real road to revolutionary unity.

The Colombian Communists closely connect the question of popular unity with the question of power, which we think has long since been posed by history itself. It has been pointed out repeatedly in our Party documents that we are fighting for an anti-feudal and anti-imperialist revolution and that it is possible already now, after overcoming the split and strife between Left organizations, to set about ousting the present regime and setting up a popular democratic government. This government will have to drive out the imperialists and effect, along with a radical agrarian reform, other profound changes which will lead Colombia to socialism.

This does not mean, however, that we reject unity of action with those who limit themselves to general democratic objectives in the struggle against the two-party dictatorship. Proceeding from the classical propositions of Marxism-Leninism, we consider that the struggle for democracy, far from running counter to the struggle for socialism, is a component part of the latter. It certainly appears difficult to realize the principles of "pure democracy" in present-day conditions in Colombia, but there are no grounds for us to combat those who sincerely believe in this and are exerting efforts to liquidate the existing regime. We consider that a careful study should be made of the possibility of establishing the government of a broad democratic coalition, however, slim this possibility may seem to be. Its vacillating and transitory character notwithstanding, such a government would be useful from the viewpoint of future revolutionary transformations. That is why in our work for unity we orient ourselves on the mustering of forces and do not reject the opinions or the contribution of those who are simply democrats. We are confident that the best way to winning leadership of the people is not to issue radical-sounding but illusory calls, but work systematically to awaken the revolutionary consciousness of the masses.

We Columbia Communists cannot rest content with whatever we have achieved in building popular unity. Much remains to be done to win over the broadest masses to our side, to open their eyes to their own interests. But our initial success inspires us to new efforts. The spirit of mutual understanding is growing stronger among the front-rank fighters for national liberation, the structural reorganization of society, general well-being, social justice, progress and peace. A historically doomed regime trying to save itself is only capable of committing base and barbarous acts. This too helps the masses to see for themselves that joint and coordinated struggle alone will lead to great revolutionary transformations which are becoming a general necessity.

THE '64 ELECTION MANDATE AND THE ROAD AHEAD

I. REBUFF TO REACTION

The electorate has spoken. It has given a stinging rebuff to the arrogant bid of extreme reaction for government power. It has made the term Goldwaterism synonymous with McCarthyism, with rabid anti-communism and war-mongering, with Dixie-cratism and violent racism, with haughty indifference to the plight of the unemployed, the aged, the young and the poor.

November 3rd represented an important people's victory. It has placed the political struggle on new terrain from which new victories are attainable. It has made possible a massive legislative offensive. But it is no guarantee that what the people voted for — peace, civil rights, greater democracy and a real war on poverty— are now assured. The election landslide has given the common people an indisputable advantage in the fight for their rights and their needs. Whether that advantage is fully utilized, or whether it is frittered away or completely lost, depends upon how the election victory is understood and what is done to realize its mandate.

There can be no mere reliance on the Administration and the newly-elected Congress, despite the overwhelming character of the victory and the greatly improved composition of both the House and the Senate. Whether the election returns will be read correctly by those elected to public office does not depend alone on their ability to interpret the national will accurately. It depends even more on the people's ability to make that interpretation stick, to translate it into concrete forward-looking policies and to fight for their realization. In this alone lies the guarantee that the election mandate will be fulfilled.

II. ULTRA REGROUPING

The struggle to achieve this will not be easy. The ultra-Right, although badly beaten in the election, still represents a formidable force. While it aimed to win in 1964, for the ultra-Right this was not a win-all, lose-all election. Taking advantage of traditional party voting patterns in the North, and allying itself with the Dixiecrats in the South, it misled 26 million Americans into voting for Goldwater, even though the vast majority of these cannot be considered as ultra-Rightists. Such a vote is an ominous warning.

The Birchite-Dixiecrat-Goldwater camp is now seeking to regroup its ranks. It will try to maintain its dominant position within the GOP while perhaps making some concessions to party unity. It will seek to exert an unremitting pressure on the Johnson administration, on Congress, and on the state governments. It is tightly organized and well-heeled financially. It will use every setback suffered by American imperialism abroad, every struggle between monopoly and the people at home, to sow confusion and democracy. It aims to weld together a phalanx of racist and fascist-minded forces ready to go to any limit, even armed violence, to thwart the national will and to achieve its ends. The November 3rd election was only the first major battle with the ultra-Right, not the decisive nor final one.

III. BIG BUSINESS GOALS

A different kind of threat to the popular mandate comes from some big business forces who, for their own reasons, opposed the Goldwater candidacy and gave varying degrees of support to President Johnson. These capitalist groupings will now endeavor to interpret the election mandate in their own way and in their own interest. This will not be in the interest of the people.

It is true that these groups do not want a trigger-happy foreign policy that could blunder the nation into a nuclear disaster. That is why they feared a Goldwater victory. But neither do many of them want a complete end to the cold war and arms race, nor a true policy of peaceful coexistence with the Soviet Union, China, Cuba and all other socialist lands. They seek no end to colonialism, only an end to the discredited European brand, while imposing their own neo-colonial forms of economic and political subjugation. They support the dirty war in Vietnam and the Congo and organize U.S. guerrilla armies and CIA financed and manipulated counter-revolutions to keep the people of Latin America, Asia and Africa from becoming masters in their own homes.

The big business groups that supported Johnson recognized that there could be no peace on our streets if Goldwater and the Dixiecrats won federal power. They realize that concessions to greater Negro equality are inevitable. Yet many of them do not want a complete end to discrimination now, and certainly do not want in industry, for that would cut into their profits. Nor do they want a radical change in the South, with higher wages and living standards. They fear that a South governed by a forward-looking Negro-white alliance would so weaken reaction nationally, and particularly in the halls of Congress, as to give a new progressive thrust to the whole nation.

Likewise they are opposed to a shorter work week and a massive federally financed building program to help create the jobs and decent housing without which the very promise of Negro equality becomes a mockery.

These capitalist groupings, contrary to those who supported Goldwater, find it in their interests to make certain concessions to labor in order to avoid all-out class conflict. But they are no less bitterly opposed to a new labor upsurge, to a new extension of labor's right to organize and to bargain collectively, and to a great new advance in progressive social legislation.

While these groupings of capital did not want Goldwaterism in power at this time, now that it has been rebuffed, some of them do not want it totally crushed. They want it to remain strong enough to veto public pressure for more liberal and progressive domestic and foreign policies, and as an ace-in-the-hole should they some day prefer it in power.

IV. TWO-PARTY SYSTEM

One of the major objectives of these big business groupings is to try to halt the process of political regrouping which in this election, more than any previous one, indicates a radical transformation of the mass base of each of the two major parties. As these parties evolved historically, they were each composed of heterogeneous and conflicting class and sectional interests which, in the course of intra-party strife, cancelled themselves out and thus made big business control easier. In fact, the parties were little more than unprincipled electoral combinations held together to win elections and not in fact bound by any platform or program. However, with the Roosevelt New Deal a shift began to take place in the mass base of each party. The Democratic Party nationally became identified in the public mind as the party more responsive to mass pressure, especially from the workers, Negro people and lower income groups. The Republican Party became identified in the public mind with the vested interests.

Both national parties remained in fact the parties supported and controlled by big business. The national Democratic Party tended to get more big business support when a course of compromise was deemed advisable or unavoidable. The national Republican Party was the greater recipient of this support when a policy of concessions was opposed, or when it was feared that the pressure for reform would get out of hand. Monopoly groupings and individual capitalists have leaned in one direction or the other, depending also upon the nature of their investments, their market problems, and the struggle within the ranks of finance capital for the lion's share of the yearly $100 billion of federal spending.

V. MASSIVE VOTE SHIFT

In this year's election, the shift in mass base reached a new level. Every section of the labor movement supported the national Democratic ticket, something which did not take place even in the Roosevelt landslide of 1936. It is estimated that well over 80 per cent of the working class vote went to Johnson. The Negro people, who up to the New Deal were traditionally in the Republican column, this year voted Democratic by an estimated 95 per cent. The huge Negro vote with its near unanimity was decisive in swinging the election in many Northern industrial states and in a larger number of state and congressional races. In the South it played a special role, being decisive in all the Southern states won by Johnson and in a larger number of state and congressional districts as well.

The Dixiecrat hold on the South has hitherto been used as the main political roadblock to the growing influence of the labor, Negro and liberal movements within the national Democratic Party. This year, many Dixiecrats broke with the national ticket and formed an alliance with Goldwater and the Republican Party. Some, like Thurmond, switched outright to the Republican Party. The Dixiecrat influence in the Democratic Party and in Congress has thereby been weakened. Thus the labor, Negro, liberal and progrssive forces are in a relatively stronger position to wield influence in these bodies than ever before.

VI. REPUBLICAN PARTY

Contrariwise, the national Republican Party in this election became the diehard party of extreme reaction, turning its back on many of its former supporters and embracing the Birchites, Kluxers and Dixiecrats as its natural allies. Even large sections of the Northern farm vote, the women's vote, the relatively conservative suburban, small-town and old-age vote, swung away from the Republican national ticket. It is estimated that in the North Goldwater got his main vote from the upper and middle income groups. Only in the South, where many white working people are still poisoned by racial prejudice, did he get large numbers of lower income voters.

This situation is causing considerable alarm in the ranks of certain big business groups and their political pundits. There is much talk about the danger of a one-party system and of the Republican Party dwindling to a small minority party and going the way of the Whigs. The real fear is that the two-party system as now constituted may disappear and give way to parties based on specific class alliances and corresponding programs.

The Republican Party finds itself in deep crisis. If democratic reapportionment is won in the various states, and if the Negro people can win their right to vote in the South, the crisis in the ranks of the Republican Party is bound to grow, for much of the strength it has exercised in state legislatures and in Congress has been out of proportion to its actual strength in the electorate. Many inside the Republican Party now realize that it can only survive as a potent political force — in the industrial states at least — by moving in a direction opposite to Goldwaterism. Progressives are not indifferent to this trend and would like to see extreme reaction defeated in both major parties.

But the attempt to save the Republican Party by patching up the differences within it are not in most cases motivated by concern with giving the people meaningful electoral choices. On the part of many big business groups it is motivated by the single desire to perpetuate the two-party system as a safe vehicle through which monopoly capital can exercise its political domination.

VII. NEW ADMINISTRATION

In the Democratic Party, too, the struggle is shaping in new dimensions. The question is: Will the new mass base of the national Democratic Party reflect itself in policies, leadership and in the exercise of power? Or, will the Administration take this mass base for granted and seek instead to mend its political fences on the Right?

Concretely: Will the Administration take steps to bring America's, undeclared war against Vietnam to an end, or will it give way to the Goldwaterites in the State and Defense Departments who want to escalate that war into an all-Asia conflict? Will the Johnson administration continue to give key posts in the Cabinet to big business representatives, including Republicans, or will labor and the Negro people find representation in the Cabinet for the first time? Will the Administration lead the fight for a change in seniority rules in Congress, or will it placate the Dixiecrats by giving them the very committee posts from which they can effectively sabotage the election mandate? Will the Administration give protection to the Metro people in the deep South and guarantee them their constitutional rights, or will it close its eyes to the reign of terror in the interests of re-cementing party harmony? Will the Administration push through congress a major crash anti-poverty program, transferring billions from military expenditures to the task of wiping out slums, building schools, expanding education, and providing jobs and opportunities for our youth, or will it be content with only token efforts in that direction?

It is on these basic questions that the new Administration will be judged. If a great mass movement develops which can press the Administration in a more progressive direction in both foreign and domestic policy, then the prospect of a new-New Deal becomes a realistic possibility. Under such circumstances the Democratic Party and the Johnson administration will not collide with their own mass base on support and may even consolidate this base still further. But if they head in a conservative-reactionary direction and betray their own election promises, then a collision between them and their supporters becomes inevitable.

VIII. PEOPLE'S COALITION

It would be a major mistake to believe that the overwhelming victory of the national Democratic ticket represented a blind allegiance to the Democratic Party or an unconditional vote of confidence in President Johnson and his policies. There was more split-ticket voting this year than in any previous election. Then, as noted by many commentators and straw polls, the vote and support for President Johnson was definitely conditional. What was unconditional was the opposition to Goldwaterism and the determination to bury it in an avalanche of public condemnation.

Furthermore, the large plurality given Johnson was not garnered exclusively by the Democratic machine. Without the independent activities of the labor movement, the Negro people, Jewish, Mexican and Puerto Rican Americans and other nationality groups and of writers, educators, scientists and citizens of all types; without the tireless work of nearly all civil rights organizations and peace groups, and without the formation of independent volunteer movements within and without the Democratic Party and of such new political formations as the Freedom Democratic Party, this great victory would not have been possible.

All this represents an important plus for the battles ahead, but only if these independent movements recognize that their job is not done. They need to find the basis for continued and permanent existence, fighting for progressive policies and for the complete fulfillment of the November 3rd mandate.

Secondly, these independent volunteer formations need to achieve a greater degree of cohesion and unity based upon greater clarity of program and perspective. What is needed to combat Goldwaterism in all its manifestations and to counter the organization and cohesion of the ultra-Right, is a great people's coalition for peace, equality, security and opportunity. It is the labor movement, representing the most progressive and best organized class in modern society which has the responsibility of taking the lead in the formation and heading of such a popular coalition.

The need for such a people's alliance has been recognized by certain labor leaders who have called for a National Coalition of Conscience. But this idea has not yet become the accepted goal of the entire labor movement and little has been done to implement it. One reason for this is that the majority of labor leaders still has too large a dependence on the Democratic machine and tends to give a blank check to whatever Democratic administration is in power. This is the major reason why the political action machinery of the labor movement in the form of COPE and DRIVE is still in many places something thrown together in the last weeks of an election campaign.

It should become a permanent political arm of labor, working day in and day out around the year in every plant and working class community.

IX. NEGRO PEOPLE'S MOVEMENT

Of all social forces in our land, the Negro people are the most dissatisfied with their lot, unable and unwilling to live in the old way and determined not to sell their birthright and self-dignity for some minor advances. Yet the fulfillment of their battle cry, "Freedom Now," requires far-reaching changes in American life and not least of all in its economy. For these reasons the Negro people's movement is the most determined and militant force in America today. Its courage, self-sacrifice and noble ideals have attracted to it also many of the best of the white young generation who understand that by winning freedom for Negro America they will ensure freedom for all America.

Because the root cause of Negro oppression is economic, because the great majority of Negro Americans are working people, and because the self-interest of the white workers requires their joining with their Negro brothers, there is the basis for a natural alliance between the labor and Negro people's movement. This is already in formation and could exist in complete and solid form once the labor movement takes a greater initiative in the struggle for Negro rights and in the great battle for peace and against poverty.

When the spirit which today animates the Negro people's movement sweeps over into the ranks of labor, a great new rebirth of the labor movement will take place. It will complete the job of organizing the millions of still unorganized industrial, white collar and professional workers, including the South, squarely face the unprecedented challenge of automation, and place itself in the recognized leadership of all those working for social progress in the United States. It is toward that day that all class-conscious and militant trade unionists should work.

X. ROLE OF THE LEFT

A central task in helping to weld a coalition that can block the path to Goldwaterism, no matter what guise it may take, is the building of an ever more united and ever stronger Left force in American life of Communists and non-Communists. The nature of our problems in the years ahead is such that only deep-going economic and political changes can counter the built-in tendencies of American capitalism toward retrogression and reaction. Only a stronger Left force which views American problems on the background of a world in revolutionary technological and social change, and which understands the nature of our present-day society and the meaning of socialism, can exert a consistently progressive influence on current struggles, giving them aim and perspective.

There is increasing evidence of a growing ferment in the ranks of progressive-minded people, especially young people; a growing realization that what some have referred to as the "Triple Revolution" of our time, will require answers more deep-going than those faced by any previous generation. New times will require new values, new approaches, new answers. This means that the potential for the development in American life of an influential and ever more vital Left force is rapidly maturing.

The fact that new forces moving to advanced social thinking come from varied class and social backgrounds and have different levels of experience, explains the reason for the conflicting points of view in the ranks of the Left, both new and old, and why no common approach to all basic questions has yet emerged.

This expressed itself during the election campaign. Every section of the Left recognizes that a basic political regrouping in American political life is necessary and inevitable. The day will surely come when socialist-minded people, trade unionists and progressives generally, will have a major electoral party of their own, representing their combined interests and not that of big capital.

But what many of the Left fail to see is that the exact process of political regrouping taking place is different from that at the beginning of the century. It is not following the old classical pattern of straight-line third-party development. The process at work is more complicated and complex. It is still taking place within the frame-work of the institutionalized two-party system. Whatever significant independent volunteer forms of political expression exist have as their immediate objective the aim of influencing the outcome of the struggle within and between the two major parties.

The whole Left should realize that subjective desires cannot replace objective reality. Nor can the Left achieve anything by standing on the sidelines as super-critics of everything and everyone that does not accept its own overall viewpoint. The Left, seeking a more fundamental reconstruction of society, can only help bring this advanced thinking to the people by being part of their daily struggles and not by separating itself from them or erecting artificial barriers between it and the much vaster mass of forward-moving Americans.

So long as the people see a tangible difference between the two parties, they will continue to cast their votes for the one which is somewhat better or, to put it another way, somewhat less worse. Nor will abstract arguments about the "lesser evil" change anything until the masses feel strong enough to go in the direction of a party representing the greater good.

Third party candidates should be put forward wherever this can help crystallize the mass movement and struggle and where no meaningful choice is given the people. Under no circumstances should they be put forward where this would mean a head-on collision with the labor and Negro people's movements or where the only result would be the victory of the ultra-Right.

But certainly the Left should actively urge the labor and Negro people's movements to begin fighting for increased representation all along the line, to put forth their own more advanced candidates in primary struggles and to refuse to go along with machine-chosen political hacks. Likewise, it should help stimulate the formation of a liberal-progressive bloc in Congress and in state and city legislative bodies.

The Left should grasp the truth of all past experience that higher social consciousness and more advanced political movements can only arise from the mass currents and struggles of today. We feel confident that the American people too will come to realize the necessity of taking the socialist path. But they will do so only out of their own experience and in accord with specific American conditions and traditions.

XI. COMMUNIST PARTY'S ROLE

In the 1964 elections the Communist Party played an important and significant role. It helped bring greater clarity and a degree of unity to Left-minded people, and by speaking to tens of thousands in its own name made a contribution to the victory that finally came. Recognizing the danger of the ultra-Right long before the brazen coup d'etat at the Cow Palace, the Communist Party was prepared for the specific character of the election struggle as it unfolded.

This compares with those sections of the Left that had ridiculed the idea of an ultra-Right menace and were therefore caught completely unawares by the Goldwater-Dixiecrat bid for power. At first, some of these groups tried to ignore its meaning. Even when they saw it for what it was, a specific form of American fascism, they recoiled from drawing correct tactical-political conclusions from their own analyses. For them it was either all the way or none of the way with Johnson, not just part of the way.

The Communist Party can be rightfully proud of its correct basic analysis, its line of policy and the way it worked during the campaign. Never before were the ranks of the Party so united behind party policy as in the election struggle.

Now a new phase of struggle is opening. This will be a continuation of the election struggle, yet different from it in many respects. In this period ahead we seek to strengthen our own party and its influence but not as against the rest of the Left or against the great popular forces not yet Communist or Left in their thinking. We seek to find the basis for a greater unity and greater initiative of the Left within the framework of a greater unity of all Americans fighting for their immediate needs and rights.

STRUGGLES AHEAD

In the period ahead, the following issues and struggles stand out:

1. End the Cold War. Win the Fight for Peaceful Coexistence and End Colonialism.

The most urgent of all tasks at this moment is the mounting of a powerful movement to stop the dirty war against the Vietnamese people and for bringing our boys back home. The fight for peace also requires mass pressures for recognition of People's China; for a world conference of nuclear powers to ban the bomb; for opening reciprocal trade relations with all socialist countries, including China and Cuba; for immediate withdrawal of men and aid from the mercenary war against the Congolese people; and against any proposal to give nuclear arms to West Germany.

2. End Jimcrow.

In the first place this requires a movement to get federal protection for the constitutional rights of the Negro people in the deep South, and to get the Administration to stop all federal funds to states refusing to comply with federal law. This also makes necessary the full enforcement of both Article IV, Section 4 of the Constitution as well as the 14th Amendment to the Constitution. These require a republican form of government in all states and for a reduction of state's congressional representation where the principle of one man, one vote is violated. To win full equality for the Negro people in the period ahead requires the most determined struggle for full enforcement of the Civil Rights Law and against every act of discrimination, especially in employment, housing and occupational opportunities.

3. End Poverty.

The war against poverty must be made into a real war. In addition to the immediate adoption of an effective Medicare bill, it is necessary to struggle for a basic extension of all social security and old age benefits and for a major crash program of ten billion dollars a year to combat poverty in America.

4. Extend Labor's Rights.

To protect labor's rights and to help in organizing the workers of the South and Southwest it is necessary to demand the repeal of all existing anti-labor legislation including the state right-to-work laws and to win a new and stronger charter of labor's rights.

5.Extend Democracy Throughout the Land.

The repudiation of Goldwaterism and its "states rights" doctrine is the final confirmation that our country can and must become a united nation—a nation with one constitution and one Bill of Rights that applies uniformly to all our citizens in every state. What is needed is a new federal charter and a new addition to the Bill of Rights that unify and revitalize all of our democratic institutions. The time had come to make all laws pertaining to democratic rights and social legislation uniform throughout the land. To move in this direction requires a struggle for democratic reapportionment in all states; an end to the seniority system in congress; the abolition of HUAC and all remnants of thought-control; the protection of the rights of minority parties, including the right to the ballot; and an end to the persecution and prosecution of Communists.

Certainly around these and other issues there is ample room and need for Left initiative and for unity between the Left and all other liberal and democratic forces in the land.

Such are some of the lessons and some of the tasks as we see them. Just as the election struggle developed on the background of the important battles that preceded it, so the new post-election struggles are developing on the background of the election victory. New opportunities have been opened up for important gains by the people. But these opportunities must be seized or they can be turned into their opposite. We have confidence they will be seized. The Communist Party pledges to work and struggle with might and main to help fulfil the mandate of November 3rd and to make the elections the beginning of a new forward advance of the American people.

DRAFT GENERAL PROGRAM* OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF EL SALVADOR

INTRODUCTION

The ultimate objectives of the Communist Party of El Salvador are to establish a socialist system, which will eliminate the exploitation of man by man, and to build communism, under which material and social distinctions, classes, and all forms of oppression will disappear forever.

Before stating the CPS program for the present stage of the revolution, it is appropriate to review the main characteristics of the situation in the country.

In El Salvador, capitalism has been developing against the background of strong survivals of feudalism and disastrous economic dependence on developed capitalist countries, primarily the United States.

Capitalist development in the imperialist phase has led to technical progress, a better transport system and the establishment of a home market. On the other hand, it has lent the national economy a lop-sided character by gearing it to the export of agricultural raw materials. Industrial development limited to the construction of factories to process imported raw materials has resulted in increased infiltration by U.S. monopoly capital and still greater economic dependence, to stagnation in certain branches of agriculture and industry, near-starvation of the greater part of the population, and the recrudescence of numerous survivals of feudalism.

While some branches of agriculture, such as cotton growing, are developing rapidly, there is a serious slump in others, in particular animal husbandry. Industrial progress is retarded by the exceptionally low standard of living of the masses due to monstrous exploitation and by the restrictions which U.S. imperialist capital and the national oligarchy have imposed upon the country. As a result, economic progress lags behind the increase in population. The labor force is growing as it is joined by thousands of young people, most of whom cannot find work.

That is why we maintain that El Salvador is a semi-feudal and semi-colonial country with a deformed capitalist economy.

El Salvador has never been economically independent. Following

*This Draft, printed in an abridged form here, was approved by the Fifth Congress of the CPS in 1964. By decision of the Congress, it was submitted to the membership for discussion. Besides, it was widely circulated among the people. It is to be approved in final form at the Sixth Congress of the CPS or at an extraordinary congress if necessary.—Ed.

liberation from the Spanish rule in 1821 it gradually became dependent on Britain and afterwards on the United States. Oppression by the U.S. imperialists has increasedd uring the past thirty years and was particularly strong during the Second World War. El Salvador is losing the last vestiges of national independence and becoming a U.S. colony.

The United States is out to expedite the complete subjugation of El Salvador through the "Alliance for Progress," a program designed to check the revolutionary process in Latin America and accompanied by the increasing penetration of U.S. capital. Far from contributing to the country's development and the solution of serious national problems, "aid" under this program helps the military dictatorship to carry out demagogic campaigns in the social sphere. It is aimed at increasing the economic dependence of the nation and at limiting its sovereignty.

The main features of the oppression of our country by the U.S. imperialists may be listed as follows: (a) the economy is greatly deformed to serve U.S. monopoly interests rather than the needs of the people; (b) 36 per cent of our imports and 34 per cent of our exports are controlled (as of 1962) by the United States; furthermore, the USA buys our raw materials at ever-decreasing prices while charging more and more for its own goods, and prevents us from establishing commercial relations wth the socialist countries; (c) there is a rapid growth of U.S. investments in the key branches of our economy: sea, air and railway transport, oil processing and trade, power, seaports, trading and processing establishments (cigarettes, instant coffee, dyestuffs, etc.); (d) the credits granted by the USA on exceedingly onerous terms are heavy shackles for our country.

U.S. imperialist domination takes various forms: (a) all kinds of "technical" missions operate unhampered in the country, infiltrating the administration, police and army, and bringing various government institutions, which they are decentralizing, under their increasing control; (b) the government's credit and tax policy is shaped in Washington; (c) films, the press, radio, television, music and other media are used to further the ideological influence of imperialism, to corrupt people by propagating frustration, loose morals, vice and crime—in short, to destroy national culture and the patriotic spirit of the people; (d) with CIA agents holding key posts in the armed forces, the imperialists urge the country to join in the arms race with its neighbors; they encourage militarist trends in the country and try to incite the armed forces to an open attack on Cuba and other countries striving for freedom; (e) the Salvadoran Embassy in Washington has become an agency forwarding State Department instructions, while the U.S. Embassy in our country often acts over the head of the President of the Republic.

El Salvador's foreign policy and its stand in international organizations do not meet the interests of our people; they are fully subordinated to Washington's diktat, to the policy of provocation and war pursued by the U.S. imperialists.

New powerful and dynamic productive forces have emerged in our country capable of providing the people with high living and cultural standards. The vast majority of our population is made up of working people of town and country who have to a considerable degree mastered modern techniques and are capable of achieving rapid progress in this sphere. Nevertheless, they continue to live in poverty, and remain culturally backward.

What is the obstacle to the full and harmonious development of the country, the provision of a high standard of living to our industrious people, and a flourishing culture? It is the semi-colonial and semi-feudal state of our economy, which suits the interests of the U.S. imperialists and their ally, the national oligarchy. They make colossal profits by exploiting our people. They have monopolized trade in the products of our monoculture economy. They benefit by the survivals of feudalism. They have intertwined their interests in mixed enterprises to exploit the Central American market.

The workers, peasants, small urban and rural proprietors, and medium urban and rural capitalists all suffer, to some degree or other, from exploitation and oppression by the U.S. imperialists and the national oligarchy. All these classes and social strata want progress for the country and would greatly benefit from its harmonious all-round development.

It follows that the fundamental historical conflict in our country is that between the interests of the U.S. imperialists and the national oligarchy, on the one hand, and the interests of the nation, on the other. The contradiction between imperialism and the majority of the population is the chief aspect of this conflict. Therefore, at certain junctures and on certain issues, even the "Big Fourteen"* can and do join the opponents of imperialism because of their antagonism to the latter.

On the other hand, the contradictions within the ruling classes are growing because the path imposed by the imperialists complicates national problems still further. So are the contradictions between imperialism and its allies, between the allies of imperialism, between the people and their oppressors. In short, imperialist activity aggravates all contradictions and the various economic and political problems of the country.

Between 1958 and 1964 El Salvador experienced a cyclic economic crisis, chiefly caused by a fall in the world prices of coffee which, in turn, resulted from overproduction and U.S. monopoly profiteering.

The second half of 1963 witnessed a notable increase in industrial and commercial activity, although the downward trend of coffee prices persisted. Three main factors made it possible to compensate for the loss due to overproduction of coffee and put the economy on the road to progress. They were increased cotton output, the growth of the nation's foreign debt and direct U.S. investments, and greater export of shrimps and sugar.

In other words, the country pulled out of the crisis not by solving the problems arising from the one-sided development of agriculture and dependence on U.S. imperialism, but by accentuating all the negative aspects of the economy, which has become even more dependent on world market fluctuations and hence more vulnerable. In addition, its indebtedness to the United States is still greater now, partly due to increased direct investments by the U.S. monopolies.

Obviously, the solution found by the country does not lead to national liberation but to greater subjugation by imperialism. It is undeniable, however, that the past crisis has created objective conditions favorable to revolution, increasing its social forces and opening up prospects for the rapid development of subjective factors.

When, more than thirty years ago, the national oligarchy was faced with the growth of the popular movement and revolutionary ferment, the failure of official policy, the general crisis of capitalism, and a mounting anti-imperialist struggle on the continent, it established a military dictatorship. On December 2, 1931, a military coup brought General Martinez into power. Never since then have the military relinquished the reins of government, allowing only an occasional slackening of repressive measures when forced to do so by popular action or by the contradictions of the regime itself.

The past three decades have seen a series of rigged elections and government reshuffles, but the military dictatorship has stayed on. Martinez was succeeded by Castaneda Osorio, then came Lemus, Cordon, and Rivera who is still in power, their rule being "diluted" by military juntas to guarantee the continuity of the regime.

A strenuous struggle by the people over a long period toppled the Lemus government. The new government did not suit the reactionaries because it respected certain freedoms. On January 25, 1961, imperialist agents operating in frank collusion with the national oligarchy engineered a coup d'état and set up a new military dictatorship. The putschists again shattered the myth that the army keeps out of politics and stands guard over legality. They showed that the armed forces are the main instrument of coercion in the hands of the imperialists and the oligarchy.

Following the coup the machinery of state, which the oligarchy had always used to oppress the people and which served U.S.

imperialism, found itself under the direct control of U.S. agents. Today this machinery server primarily U.S. imperialist interests.

Unless the main historical conflict mentioned above is resolved, our country will be unable to cope with its major economic, social and political problems and gain genuine independence. This cardinal task has to be carried out by the revolution. At the present stage of our development the revolution is bound to be democratic revolution by virtue of the people's role in it, an anti-feudal revolution by virtue of the economic changes it is to bring about, and a national-liberation revolution by virtue of its anti-imperialist nature.

It is to be a revolution of the masses in the interests of the majority of the people. It will have to be accomplished with the participation of all Salvadorans, civilians and military alike, who regard it as their patriotic duty to join in the people's struggle for freedom. Its worst enemies will be the U.S. imperialists, the parasitic oligarchic group, and the traitors implementing its policy of oppression, plunder and crime.

The revolution will be made by the workers, peasants, small urban proprietors, and the medium capitalists of town and country, i.e., the classes most oppressed by the imperialists and the oligarchy. Some patriotic-minded big capitalists may likewise join the ranks of the revolutionaries.

To enable these classes and social strata to pool their efforts against the common enemy, it is necessary to form a Democratic National Liberation Front. This is the chief strategic and tactical task at this stage of the revolution, a goal on which our Party is concentrating now.

This front—the most consistent alliance of all progressive anti-imperialist forces—will be the result of a series of joint actions and efforts in the spirit of unity. It will not be brought into being by any single decision. Aware of its duty to help in forming this front, the Communist Party of El Salvador favors broad enduring alliances and joint actions on definite issues or specific immediate demands in the struggle against imperialism and the oligarchy, for democracy.

The tasks of this revolution can be carried out only by establishing a democratic government of national liberation which will be led by the working class and will constitute the political expression of the alliance of classes interested in the liberation and progress of the country.

The proletariat must play the role of vanguard in the revolution. This is indispensable for lending the anti-feudal and anti-imperialist struggle a genuinely democratic and revolutionary character, ensuring that the revolution gradually accomplishes its great tasks, and preventing capitulation through conciliation with the imperialists and the oligarchy. The proletariat is the most numerous class in our country today, and also the most consistently revolutionary class. Its interests coincide, more than those of any other class, with the interests of society because it champions socialist, i.e., the most progressive and comprehensive, reforms.

The proletariat becomes leader of the revolution through its struggle and with the support of its vanguard. The Communist Party will continue to do all in its power to establish the hegemony of the proletariat in our country.

Should some other democratic government be established—a possibility not to be ruled out—prior to the formation of a democratic government of national liberation, our Party will vigorously support that government's every anti-feudal and anti-imperialist step and every reform promoting national progress. At the same time our Party will combat all vacillation and all attempts at a compromise with the imperialists and the oligarchy.

At present our Party sets itself the task of resolutely mustering the forces necessary for the victory of the revolution. This means fighting for:

—the consolidation of the Party and all revolutionary and democratic organizations;

—the establishment of a Democratic Front of the anti-feudal and anti-imperialist forces;

—democratic liberties, against encroachments on civil rights, against anti-democratic legislation and fascist trends, for the release of political prisoners, against all dictatorial practices;

—trade union unity, against interference in trade union affairs by the government and by imperialist agents, for trade union democracy, for the extension and effective application of labor legislation, for greater social funds and social security, against anti-labor legislation, for higher wages, against unemployment and the high cost of living, against the economic crisis which brings suffering to the overwhelming majority of the population;

—a stronger alliance of the workers and peasants, for the freedom of the union of agricultural workers, for higher pay and better working conditions for them, for the abolition of the semi-feudal relations from which they suffer, for the extension of labor and social rights to them, for the provision of land, loans, implements and technical assistance to small and middle peasants, for better housing, medical care, social conditions and education for the rural population;

—easy-term credits to small and medium proprietors in industry and trade, for measures to defend the national industries and promote their vigorous development;

—the rights of women, young people and children;

—sovereignty and national independence, against all manifestations of imperialist rule, against all imperialist attempts to perpetuate and aggravate the semi-colonial state of the country, for free trade with all countries;

—for peace and peaceful coexistence.

Our people and our Party do not advocate the use of force as a means of solving the fundamental problems facing them. They have always preferred peaceful means in their struggle for democracy. But today the most advanced sections of the people have come to realize that the imperialists and the oligarchy have blocked the peaceful road to the revolution in our country. For many years our people have suffered from massive repressions, terror, denial of elementary democratic rights, successive military dictatorships, the brutal persecution of democratic organizations, refusal to allow the agricultural workers, who make up two-thirds of the country's population, to organize, denial of the freedom of speech, and military coups against every government attempting democratic reforms. All this shows that it is the ruling classes that use force, and convinces the people that they must prepare to counter force with force. All this has made the people realize that no matter how difficult their road to the establishment of a democratic government of national liberation may be, it is certain to be less painful that constant suffering, the death of thousands, and the flouting of the country's sovereignty by the U.S. imperialists and the oligarchy.

The general line of our Party is to achieve the unity of the people in the struggle against the dictatorship and the oligarchic and imperialist interests it serves, to secure the victory of the national-liberation, anti-feudal and democratic revolution by every legal or illegal, peaceful or non-peaceful means, to develop a powerful popular movement, with the armed struggle of the people as the chief means of winning power.

The present period of the mustering of forces requires the right combination of preparations for the armed uprising of the people and various mass actions, the rallying and organization of the people, and the use of every opportunity for open or underground struggle.

Should internal and international developments, the growing achievements of socialism, and progress in the struggle of our people create favorable conditions for a peaceful transition and the establishment of a democratic government of national liberation, the Party and the people will not insist on using force but will take the peaceful road in keeping with the new historical situation.

The international situation is becoming more and more favorable to the revolutionary struggle of the people of El Salvador. Whereas the capitalist system is in the grip of a fatal crisis, the socialist system is demonstrating its indisputable superiority in the most diverse fields. As a result, the balance of world forces is changing irrevocably in favor of socialism, the national-liberation movements and the forces of peace, democracy and progress. Socialism is fast becoming the decisive factor in historical development. The Soviet Union and the other socialist countries have become the lodestar of all the peoples seeking liberation. The awakening of the colonial peoples of Asia and Africa to an independent life was an epoch-making event.

Latin America, too, has resolutely joined in the liberation movement. This part of the world has become the scene of an event of tremendous international significance: an anti-feudal and anti-imperialist revolution in Cuba has resulted in the emergence of the first socialist state in Latin America. This is a staggering blow at imperialism and a stimulating example for the other peoples of the continent.

The international situation is favorable to the victory of the people's revolution, to the assumption of power and the destruction of the foundations on which the power of the oligarchy and the imperialists rests.

It is indisputable, furthermore, that with the formation of a democratic government of national liberation our country will be assured the solidarity and extensive support of all the peoples of the world, primarily the socialist countries, in consolidating the revolutionary forces, effecting radical economic and political reforms, rapidly improving the standard of living, embarking on industrial development at a fast rate, doing away with the ignorance of the masses and raising their cultural level, and frustrating all attempts by the imperialists and their agents to interfere in our internal affairs, hamper the development of the revolution and implant counter-revolution.

The revolution of our people will not stop at the democratic and national-liberation stage. The conditions of our historical development, which are essentially the same as in other countries, will set our people a new and loftier task—that of accomplishing the socialist revolution and building socialism, the most developed, prosperous and just of all societies.

It should be stressed that as the experience of Cuba and other countries shows, the countries getting rid of colonial and semi-colonial oppression in the present historical situation can, after accomplishing the democratic and national-liberation revolutions, and given proper internal conditions, skip the capitalist stage and rapidly proceed to socialist construction with the powerful support of the socialist world community.

The Communist Party considers that this transition to socialism will not necessarily be brought about through coercion but will be effected chiefly through persuasion. This view is based on the following: (1) the successful realization of the proposed program will lead to the solution of pressing national problems; (2) its realization will prove beyond doubt the viability and progressive character of collective ownership of the means of production, and the inability of the existing system of private ownership to bring about profound social changes; (3) in the new society, launched by the democratic system of national liberation, solidarity will prevail and all selfishness will be done away with.

In this way, the most favorable conditions will be provided for winning the support of the non-proletarian classes, the backward sections of the proletariat and all non-socialist elements for the peaceful and rapid transition to socialist construction. Reality itself will shatter the anti-socialist prejudices which imperialism fosters among non-proletarians. There is no doubt that the vast majority of our people will readily and consciously join in socialist construction, and will find in it a source of patriotic and genuinely humane inspiration.

On the strength of this analysis, the Communist Party of Salvador advances the following program for the present stage of the revolution, to be fulfilled by the democratic government of national liberation which will come into power as a result of the struggle of our people.

REVOLUTIONARY CHANGES, POLITICAL AND LEGAL

The great objectives of the democratic revolution of national liberation cannot be achieved unless the present reactionary and pro-imperialist regime is replaced by a revolutionary system. The revolution would make a serious mistake if it limited itself to a mere change of government, for it would immediately incur the danger of a counter-offensive by the domestic reactionaries and the imperialists. The state machinery of the imperialists and the oligarchy shall be destroyed and replaced by a revolutionary state of the working class, the peasants, the middle classes and the anti-imperialist sections of the bourgeoisie.

The government formed on this basis will be a coalition government of the revolutionary classes and will be led by the most consistent and determined members of these classes. The alliance of the workers and peasants, headed by the working class, will be the backbone of the revolutionary coalition.

The Constitution and the laws supplementing it, which today protect the reactionary interests of the ruling classes, shall likewise be replaced by a new Constitution and new laws facilitating the exercise of revolutionary power and extending its range.

MEASURES TO LIQUIDATE THE STATE MACHINERY OF IMPERIALISM AND THE OLIGARCHY AFTER THE VICTORY OF THE REVOLUTION

(a) abolition of all laws, decrees, codes, ordinances, regulations, etc., which sanctify semi-feudal exploitation and imperialist oppression or interfere with the democratization and revolutionary transformation of the country;

(b) dissolution of the Legislative Assembly;

(c) removal from the judiciary of all those who connived at the arbitrary practices and crimes of the dictatorship;

(d) restitution of the national property usurped or confiscated by those in power in the previous period;

(e) confiscation of the property of all those who betrayed the interests of the country by actively cooperating with imperialism in bolstering up its rule with the help of a tyrannical regime;

(f) dismissal of those officials who collaborated with the dictatorship to perpetuate the regime of oppression;

(g) complete abolition of all forms of U.S. imperialist control and influence over the armed forces by expelling the U.S. military mission and annulling all the agreements and treaties which contributed to the establishment of U.S. control and influence;

(h) prosecution of those guilty of crimes and violence against the people.

MEASURES TO ESTABLISH A REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT AND STATE

(a) establishment of a revolutionary government headed by the vanguard of the revolution;

(b) appointment to top administrative posts of the most upright and capable people devoted to the revolution who have taken an active part in the struggle of the people;

(c) revolutionary legislation to enforce economic, political and social changes;

(d) establishment of the government bodies which are to implement revolutionary changes;

(d) reorganization of the judiciary system in line with the new revolutionary law;

(f) reorganization of the armed forces along the following lines: participation of the masses; formation in the armed forces of a new cadre of leaders recruited from people loyal to the revolution; those officers of the present army found suitable for service in the new armed forces may join them if they wish; enactment of a new military law making the army truly an instrument of the people; introduction of a discipline based on revolutionary and democratic consciousness and not on subordination alone;

(g) formation of revolutionary security contingents and revolutionary vigilance organizations consisting of representatives of the people;

(h) adoption of a new Constitution to give legal form to the economic, political, judicial and social institutions created by the revolution.

The Constitution is to legalize the republican form of government and establish a completely democratic state whose organs will fully present the interests of the workers, peasants, and the petty and national bourgeoisie. Both the Constitution and supplementary laws are to guarantee capitalist, personal and family, cooperative, and state property as the four basic forms of property under the new economic system. The revolutionary Constitution will consolidate the system on the basis of extensive democratic rights and freedoms enabling the people to actively contribute to and constantly influence the functioning of the state.

THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE REVOLUTIONARY GOVERNMENT

The foreign policy of the democratic government of national liberation will be directed above all towards defending national independence and sovereignty; maintaining solidarity with all the peoples fighting against U.S. imperialism; supporting the people's aspiration for freedom; promoting friendly relations with all countries on the basis of mutual respect, coexistence, non-aggression, non-interference in each other's internal affairs, and defense of the right of the peoples to self-determination; settling all international disputes through negotiation, and promoting world peace. In practical terms, this policy implies the adoption of the following concrete measures:

(a) an end to all foreign interference—above all on the part of U.S. imperialism operating through its embassy and other institutions—in the domestic affairs of the country;

(b) expulsion of all U.S. military, police, cultural, economic and technical missions violating the sovereignty of El Salvador;

(c) annulment of all international agreements and treaties which in any way prejudice national sovereignty, hamper our economic and cultural development, or associate the country with the imperialists' aggressive policies;

(d) establishment, preservation and development of diplomatic, economic and cultural relations with all countries, the United States included, on the basis of full respect for our rights and independence;

(e) a policy aimed at promoting the unity of the Central American countries, with due regard both to the interests of the people and the struggle for national liberation, and to the rights of the five countries, the requirements of the all-round development of the peoples and nationalities making up the Central American family;

(f) pursuit in world and regional organizations of an independent policy furthering the interests of our people, human progress and world peace;

(g) firm support for plans to end the arms race and bring about general and complete disarmament;

(h) prohibition of all war propaganda in the country.

REVOLUTIONARY CHANGES IN THE ECONOMIC SPHERE

The nation's economic development will be based on the revolutionary reorganization of the present economic system in the interests of the majority of the nation, to be effected through the constructive effort of the working people, with the help of patriotic private initiative.

The new economic system will have four main forms of property:

(1) state property, or the property of the whole people as distinct from present-day state property which belongs to a state serving the exploiting classes and imperialism and is an instrument in the hands of these forces;

(2) cooperative property, created, on a voluntary basis, in the fields of production, distribution or consumption in town and country. Profits from this property will be distributed among the membership in accordance with each member's contribution in the form of labor or material means;

(3) personal and family property—articles of personal use, dwellings, and means of production used without exploiting wage labor;

(4) capitalist property—the property of medium and big urban and rural proprietors whose interests are in harmony with the necessity for promoting independent national economic development and improving the life of the people.

Contrary to the assertions of the reactionaries, a country like ours can develop its economy independently by using its own internal resources and drawing on the economic and technical aid of more developed countries provided its national sovereignty and its interests are fully respected.

MEASURES TO FREE THE NATIONAL ECONOMY FROM THE RULE OF THE OLIGARCHY AND THE IMPERIALISTS

(a) An agrarian reform to end the feudal monopoly on the land and the semi-feudal relations of production (rent, gratuitous work, all kinds of extortions, etc.). The large estates will be expropriated in favor of the poor and land-hungry peasants, leaseholders, colons and agricultural workers. Estates of less than 100 hectares will not be expropriated. Those holders of latifundia willing to cooperate in national reconstruction will be allowed to keep this maximum of land for cultivation;

every peasant will be allotted a certain minimum of land, depending on area and soil fertility; he will be given technical assistance and granted long-term loans at low interest to purchase implements, fertilizer and select seed. The state will set up and run its own farms if it finds this necessary for more rapid progress in agriculture. The establishment of agriculture cooperatives with voluntary participation will be encouraged. The agrarian reform law will regulate the application and development of these fundamental principles;

(b) nationalization of the banking system to guarantee its operation in the interests of the nation's economic development; the rights of depositors will be guaranteed;

(c) nationalization and extension of foreign trade to end the foreign trade monopoly of the oligarchy which injures the interests of the small and medium producers and of the nation, abolish imperialist controls, and remove the obstacles to mutually advantageous trade with the socialist and all other countries;

(d) nationalization of the power industry, the railways, seaports, monopoly enterprises, and all major public-service establishments to improve service, make it cheaper, and stop the outflow of exchange. The profits of these establishments will be used to speed up the country's development and improve the people's standard of living.

MEASURES TO ACCELERATE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

(a) Establishment of a government economic development and planning body which, in conformity with the provisions of this program, would mobilize national resources and use them together with the aid provided by more developed countries;

(b) industrial development, with heavy industry receiving priority in terms of available resources, to strengthen our economic independence and meet the growing requirements of the people. With this aim in view, preferential tariffs and tax reductions or exemptions will be granted to enterprises with due regard to their economic importance. Steps will be taken to restrict the import of goods competing with home-made items;

(c) expansion and mechanization of agricultural production to improve the life of the people and promote foreign trade;

(d) a tax reform which will begin with the gradual reduction of indirect taxes and will considerably lighten the tax burden of the masses. The tax system will be chiefly based on direct progressive taxation on the principle, "He who has more shall pay more";

(e) the state budget will be drawn up in such a way as to promote economic growth and improve the material and cultural standards of the people. Wasteful spending will be eliminated and strict control established over national expenditures. A law on wages will establish an equitable wage scale and remove existing disparities;

(f) a National Coffee Institute will be set up to group all organizations concerned with coffee production;

(g) a Foreign Trade Institute will supervise foreign-trade transactions to safeguard independent economic development;

(h) protection and development of small and medium industrial, agricultural and commercial enterprises.

The important revolutionary changes in the countryside which will rapidly and considerably improve the life of the masses and eliminate unemployment at a comparatively early date will increase the purchasing capacity of the people and production at small and medium agricultural and industrial enterprises. In addition, the following measures will be adopted:

(a) creation of an extensive and flexible credit system providing for all forms of credit for varying terms;

(b) technical assistance to medium industrial and agricultural enterprises;

(c) credits and assistance in the fields of technology and planning to small industrial enterprises to modernize equipment and production methods.

REVOLUTIONARY CHANGES IN THE MATERIAL AND CULTURAL STANDARDS OF THE PEOPLE

The chief objective of the democratic revolution of national liberation is to radically improve the material and cultural standards of the people.

As far as religion is concerned, the revolutionary government will respect the freedom of religion and religious worship.

The revolutionary program of our Party envisages the following measures to improve the material and cultural standards of the people:

(a) greater incomes for the working people through an equitable wage scale and a fixed minimum wage sufficient to meet the material and spiritual requirements of every family;

(b) effective improvement of working conditions and the social security system;

(c) equal status and equal opportunity for women in politics, employment and in the cultural field, as well as in the family. All discrimination against women shall be ended. Women be granted the right to employment in accordance with the principle "equal pay for equal work," and will have equal opportunities for vocational training. Motherhood will be protected, the rights of expectant mothers will be guaranteed and an extensive network of maternity hospitals set up. Mothers of large families will receive assistance;

(d) an effective child-care system will be introduced. Child labor, which interferes with the education and normal development of children, shall be prohibited. Nurseries and kindergartens will be built. Meals will be provided to school children;

(e) a radical housing reform, with drastic cuts in rent, to provide every family with a flat of its own. A program for the early and large-scale construction of blocks of flats will be carried out by the state to end the housing shortage. In addition, people building their own homes will be granted loans;

(f) reorganization of the educational system. Early elimination of illiteracy. A sufficient number of primary schools are to be built. Promotion of secondary and higher education, and vocational training to meet the demands of developing agriculture, industry and national culture;

(g) a university reform to make the university an instrument for the country's cultural and scientific progress. University education will be brought within reach of everyone.

THE STRUGGLE OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF EL SALVADOR

The Communist Party of El Salvador, a party born of the country's working class, has been in existence for over thirty years now. These have been years of heroic and selfless struggle. Our Party was founded by a group of prominent and experienced leaders of the working people in March 1930, during a rise in the popular movement. Its founding met an imperative historical need and was, without doubt, an event of tremendous importance for the revolutionary movement in El Salvador.

The CPS is the party of the working class. It represents the fundamental interests of the most progressive class of our society, the only one capable of carrying the anti-feudal and anti-imperialist revolution through to the end and proceeding to build a new, classless society. Thereby the CPS also represents the fundamental interests of all the revolutionary and progressive social strata and classes of the nation. It is their organized vanguard and the standard-bearer of their struggle.

The CPS groups, on the basis of Leninist organizational principles, the revolutionary elements of the working class, the peasantry and other classes fighting for socialism and communism as their ultimate goal. Marxism-Leninism, the scientific theory of the proletariat of the world, is the ideological foundation of the CPS, which strives to apply it creatively, with due regard to the actual conditions.

A party which dissociates itself from the people becomes a sect with no prospects. It loses the ability to see the needs of the masses and realistically assess the situation in the country. Hence it cannot plan the future and determine the right line of action. To be able to play the leading role, the Party should study the actual conditions while working among the masses. It should generalize the knowledge thus gained, formulate its Marxist-Leninist policy accordingly, and make it known to the masses, who will translate it into reality.

The revolutionary tasks facing the people of El Salvador cannot be carried out by any one class or party. They must be tackled by the masses, who should be organized, mobilized, inspired by a high degree of revolutionary consciousness, and united to fight for common aims. The lasting unity of all progressive forces is built up by the Communist Party, which strives to establish a united front that will head the revolutionary struggle. This front should be based on a solid alliance of the proletariat in town and country and the peasantry, above all its poor and middle sections. This alliance should include the numerous revolutionary-minded sections of the petty bourgeoisie, first and foremost students, professional and office workers, artisans, shopkeepers, etc., as well as those sections of the national bourgeoisie exploited and oppressed by the oligarchy and the imperialists.

The hegemony of the proletariat is needed to accomplish all the tasks of the revolution. It can be established provided the Communist Party is strengthened ideologically and organizationally and its political role enhanced.

Ever since it came into being, the CPS has had to wage ideological and political struggles against all kinds of deviations from Marxism. Its history has seen periods when deviations could have led to the liquidation of the Party had they not been resolutely combated. In recent years the struggle against sectarianism and extremism has become particularly important in view of the necessity for the all-round development of the Party and because the Party has to play its role as leader of the revolution effectively. The CPS has invariably adhered to the principles of proletarian internationalism, educating its members in the spirit of solidarity with all working men on earth and with the peoples fighting against imperialism and colonialism, for national independence, progress, peace, socialism and communism. Our Party bases its close relations with other fraternal parties on the principles laid down in the 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement.

Our Party fully supports the Leninist principles of the peaceful coexistence of countries with differing socio-economic systems. It is convinced that if all the peoples of the globe fight with determination to preserve peace and if the forces of socialism and progress continue to grow, it will be easier to foil the warmongers' plans and secure a lasting peace.

The Communist Party of El Salvador reaffirms its solidarity with the international Communist movement and with the peoples fighting for independence, progress and peace. This solidarity fully accords with the Party's profound patriotism and devotion to the interests of all the working people of El Salvador. Our patriotism is supreme because it is based on the principles of proletarian internationalism, or it could have degenerated into national egoism, chauvinism and bourgeois nationalist bigotry. This is why our Party educates its members in the spirit of genuine patriotism which expresses itself in the struggle for the happiness of our people, for the prosperity of our nation, which is threatened by U.S. imperialism. At the same time it educates its members in the spirit of consistent internationalism.

Our Party has been viciously attacked by the most reactionary forces ever since it was founded. An object of constant persecution, it has for more than thirty years been operating underground and has travelled a distinctive path. But nothing has been able to break it and nothing can destroy it, for its existence meets an objective historical requirement of our society. The Communists of El Salvador have always faced up with unexampled heroism and selflessness to the savage cruelty of the oppressors and executioners of the people. The Party has succeeded in gaining strength, although this has taken it many years.

The party is working to remove the harmful effects of erroneous methods of leadership and activity, extend its ideological work and strengthen its links with the masses. This will enable it to become the real leader of our people before long, to head all progressive and patriotic forces, and fight against feudalism, for national emancipation and socialism, which it is doing already.

The Communist Party of El Salvador is well aware of its revolutionary duty as it submits its first revolutionary program to the working class and the people of the country. Because of the difficulties it encountered, the CPS could not adopt its first Rules until 1946, i.e., sixteen years after it was founded. Its program today tells the people of the Party's aims in the struggle for national liberation and anti-feudal changes. The present document, drafted during the organizational and ideological development of the Party and the revolutionary awakening of the masses, is the revolutionary program of the people of El Salvador. The CPS presents this program to the people, who are to translate it into reality. This marks the beginning of a vigorous struggle by the people to defeat U.S. imperialism and the national oligarchy and to establish a government that will assure the victory of the democratic revolution of national liberation.

POLITICAL RESOLUTION*

14TH CONGRESS, SOCIALIST PARTY OF ICELAND

I

Since the last Party congress the factory and office workers, fighting for their interests, have established extensive cooperation inside their organizations and secured the conclusion of important agreements with the employers and the government. They owe their achievements to the activities of powerful working people's organizations using the right methods of struggle which the Socialist Party has vigorously advocated both in labor unions and in the Union of Government and Municipal Employees. The Party has been intent on rallying the working people irrespective of their political views.

In January 1963 agreement was reached on a five per cent wage rise. However, the increase was greatly depreciated by a higher cost of living in later months. In June 1963 wages and salaries were raised by another seven per cent. But both agreements were nullified by increased prices in October. In the summer of 1963 salaries went up rather considerably, although the increase was not the same for all categories. Later on growing prices nullified that too.

The working class is stepping up its struggle, trying to stem the unrelenting offensive against wages and bring about a real improvement in the standard of living. Cooperation inside the working class with a view to extending this struggle is becoming closer. As a result, the employers and the government are faced with a dilemma of either using state power to suppress the struggle of the working class or making concessions to the factory workers' and office employees' organizations, possibly to the point of reaching agreement with them.

The employers and the government tried to use force. The Althing discussed a Bill to freeze wages and ban strikes. After five sittings the Bill was submitted for final consideration. But the workers' opposition to it was so firm and widespread that realistic-minded government members had to retreat, giving up the idea of voting for the Bill. This occurred on November 9 and the strikes which were on or had been announced had to be put off until December. The Government promised to discuss wages with labor organizations during the interval but did not keep its promise. This is why a two-week strike was called in December to secure a general 15 per cent wage increase.

The strike forced the employers and the government to retreat, but the ruling classes stuck to their methods—by engineering a brief spell of inflation, they immediately robbed the working people of the pay rise won. In May 1964 the pay rise secured under the December agreement was again nullied. The United Socialist Party of Iceland (USPI) and the labor movement are therefore fighting against the policy of unrestricted inflation. In March and April 1964 the USPI Central Committee spokesmen for labor discussed inflation and the economic situation in detail. They stated that they intended to use the strength of the working class against he growing cost of living and bring about a revision of economic policy. The Board of the Union of the Working People of Iceland (UWPI) offered the government its cooperation in carrying out measures to stop inflation, provide a higher standard of living for wage workers and reduce working hours. A statement issued by the CC, USPI in April 1964 commented on the changes to be effected in economic policy if such an agreement was to last. The result was an agreement on wages signed in June by representatives of labor, the government and the employers.

That agreement was a milestone in the struggle which the working class has been waging in late years. The government had to make substantial concessions. This meant abolishing the ban on the practice of adjusting wages to price indexes. Formerly—between 1960 and 1964—this ban was used to curtail the wage increases sought by the working people. Another agreement provided for considerably improving social security, appropriating additional funds for housing construction, granting longer holidays, and increasing wages. On the other hand, nothing came of the attempt to reach agreement on a greater increase in real wages, to which the working class is undoubtedly entitled. Nor was any appreciable headway made on so important a matter affecting the interests and rights of labor as shorter working hours.

This Congress considers that the establishment of a broad united front of labor organizations despite differences in political views is a valuable achievement of the class struggle. Cooperation provided the labor movement with sufficient strength to prevent the use of coercive methods by the government and to force it into agreement on a number of important issues.

This Congress believes that the agreements made in June 1964 may form an important basis for further achievements by labor organizations, real and lasting wage rises, and increased appropriations for social purposes. This will be possible if the workers maintain their broad united front and take advantage of every opportunity to secure further gains.

This Congress considers that, on the one hand, the labor movement should be prepared for a difficult fight if the employers and reactionaries in the ruling parties make further attempts at using state power to reject the working people's legitimate demands; that, on the other hand, labor organizations must, now as in the past, be prepared to compromise with the government whenever there is an opportunity of reaching agreement on such important matters as shorter working hours, higher real wages and, in general, better social conditions for the working people.

Broad unity in the class struggle is a prerequisite for realizing either of these alternatives, that is, fruitful cooperation or a victorious struggle. There is every opportunity for this, which accounts in the main for the results achieved last summer, when inflation was stopped and the practice of adjusting wages to price indexes restored. The major points on which agreement should be sought in future talks with the employers are the following:

(1) A steady increase in real wages.

(2) Shorter working hours without wage cuts, so that wages can serve as a source of livelihood to a considerably greater extent than before.

(3) Longer holidays with better facilities.

(4) The promotion of agriculture, particularly sheep-breeding, on a plan basis, with the aim of making full use of economic opportunities.

(5) Lower housing construction costs; the construction of houses to let; better credit terms, and better functioning of housing cooperatives.

Class unity in support of these demands would afford better prospects for the struggle that is to start next spring, when the term of the June agreements expires. This is why the main task of labor organizations should be to achieve unity. It is also possible and necessary to see to it that labor organizations exercise their rights to influence the outcome of the forthcoming talks.

This Congress also considers that it is absolutely indispensable to attain the fullest possible unity on the issue of organizational changes in the trade unions leading to a structure more in line with the tasks facing the unions.

The Union of Government and Municipal Employees (UGME) has in recent years made real progress in the class struggle because its leadership succeeded in uniting the membership on a broad basis despite differences in political views. The agreement on the employees' right to negotiate working conditions without, however, going on strike was a step forward. The solution reached is unsatisfactory, of course, and the employees insist on intensifying the struggle to gain the right to strike on an equal footing with wage workers. It is important, however, that the Union of the Working People of Iceland (UWPI) and the UGME should cooperate and that a special committee for cooperation be set up representing both organizations.

II

For 24 years now, Iceland has virtually been an occupied country. Throughout this crucial period the Socialist Party has been leading the people's liberation struggle. It has never abandoned this struggle even when it has to wage it singlehanded. The formation of a broad united front against occupation has been making steady progress. In recent years the activity of the Organization Against Occupation has been of special importance to the people, and it deserved the support of all fair-minded Icelanders. At present it is highly important to concentrate on organizing the people's liberation struggle, so that the question whether Iceland will favor a prolongation of the Atlantic Treaty or will wait till 1969 provided the alliance itself ends its painful existence can be decided in the next general election, that is, not later than 1967.

Occupation is fraught with the danger of foreign monopoly capital coming to take a direct part in Iceland's economic life. The extent of this participation has been increasing fast in late years.

Sizable forces in the government parties persistently seek permission for foreign capitalists to build aluminum plants and oil refineries in Iceland. Obviously, were this permission granted, foreign capitalists would be provided with a direct opportunity to influence Iceland's economy more and more.

There are two points of view on foreign participation in the country's economic activities.

On the one hand, there is talk of growing distrust of the Icelandic economy and its ability to meet the people's growing needs. This distrust is undoubtedly fomented by government advisors, who say in so many words that the traditional industries—fishing and fish processing, agriculture, and industry, all of which cater for the home market—allow little scope for economic growth.

This assertion comes from profit-seekers tempted by the profits of foreign companies.

On the other hand, experience has shown that the appraisal of Iceland's economic potential made by government advisors is absolutely wrong. The growth of production has greatly surpassed their estimates and the national income has now increased much more than in most of the neighbor countries.

This is true despite the fact that Iceland's economic opportunities are still largely unused. The products both of the fishing industry and of agriculture can be fully processed at home. The eventual increase in the value of these products promises a substantial growth of annual revenue.

In 1963 Iceland exported a mere 339 tons of canned fish worth 17 million kronur. Norway's export of the same fishing industry products this year (September) ran to 20,000 tons. Were Iceland to concentrate on this industry as much as Norway does, its export of these products could top 1,000 million kronur a year.

Iceland's possibilities in this field are much greater if account is taken of the results that can be achieved by processing agricultural raw materials. The aluminum plants, if built, would mean very little financially compared with what could be derived from processing raw materials in the fishing industry and in agriculture.

The direct loss in foreign exchange which Iceland would incur by using foreign hydro-electric power stations, to be built for the aluminum plants, would for several years exceed the profit made from the sale of electric power. An estimate of the foreign exchange which the aluminum plants would supply through the employment of Icelanders and the use of various facilities shows that the total would approximate to 120 million kronur a year, or less than the annual profit of the average herring-processing factory in Iceland.

Besides, granting foreign monopolies the right to build aluminum plants would involve a great risk. Indeed, it would be a fatal step. Foreigners would be allowed to engage in industrial activity in Iceland. The next step would be to enlarge the aluminum plants. Afterwards the foreigners would build an oil refinery. It goes without saying that foreign capitalists would begin a dogged search for new opportunities of increasing their capital—the fishing grounds around Iceland, Iceland's fishing fleet, and so on.

It follows that foreign capitalists threaten to move into a dominant position in Iceland's economy faster than expected, with Iceland losing its economic independence as a consequence.

That is why the USPI has repeatedly declared against giving foreign monopoly capital an access to Iceland's economy. The USPI believes that the Icelanders' most important economic task is to make full use of the raw materials supplied by the basic industries. It stresses that the Icelanders themselves should fully control every industry, without sharing their rights with foreigners.

Naturally, the Icelanders themselves should go about setting up a large-scale industry. A foreign-controlled large-scale industry in Iceland is out of the question.

The political parties' attitude to a foreign-controlled large-scale industry in Iceland is in the main clear. The leaders of the Independence Party* (IP) and the Working People's Party (WPP) declare for a large-scale industry to be built and controlled by foreigners. The Progressive Party (PP) has passed a resolution agreeing, if with certain reservations, to the establishment of such an industry.

The USPI and UWPI have officially stated that they are emphatically against a foreign-controlled large-scale industry in Iceland. Many members of the Independence, Working People's and Progressive parties are likewise against it.

The USPI calls on those who are opposed to the establishment of a foreign-controlled large-scale industry, whatever their party affiliations, to join their forces in a determined fight against all plans for allowing foreign capitalists to share in Iceland's economic activities.

This Congress declares that the leaders of the Independence and Progressive parties are trying to reduce the existing multi-party system to a bourgeois bipartisan system on the U.S. model.

The IP has gained very strong influence on the WPP, seriously imperilling its autonomy. It has succeeded in using the WPP as a vehicle of its influence in the labor movement and in gaining important positions in that party. The decline in the influence of the WPP in the Reykjavik municipality is due, among other things, to that party's links with the IP. The political positions of the WPP have been undermined to a considerable extent. The IP leaders therefore intend to take over the role played by the WPP. They want to do this in order to move their party into a dominant position in the country.

The Progressive Party makes no secret of its desire to set up a bipartisan system in Iceland. It has advanced the slogan of grouping all the enemies of the Conservatives within one strong party, namely, the PP.

With this aim in view, the PP leaders have been looking for supporters within the labor movement and the Union of the Working People of Iceland. This explains their high-sounding phrases about the struggle of the factory and office workers, although earlier they invariably backed the opponents of higher wages, and were against adjusting wages to price indexes.

Today the PP leadership is again raising these questions to reassure patriotic-minded members and hence most of Iceland's farmers, as well as to win the support of other sincere advocates of the liberation of Iceland.

*A bourgeois Conservative party.—Ed.
A Social-Democratic party.—Ed.
A bourgeois farmers' party.—Ed.

But it is the PP leaders who are responsible for the authorization of extremely dangerous telecasts from the U.S. military base. They are also responsible for the presence of foreign troops on Icelandic soil and for Iceland's adherence to a military alliance.

The PP is a bourgeois opportunist party modifying its intentions according as it participates in the government or is in opposition. It has never been a party to which Iceland's workers could entrust their fortunes. In recent years it has had little to do with leading the factory and office workers' struggles for a higher standard of living. The people's resistance to foreign rule and to the influence of foreign troops would hardly grow were the PP leaders to support the people's fight.

On the other hand, were the PP to persist in its attempts to establish a bipartisan system (which it could hardly do without using force or greatly increasing the number of shopkeepers among its membership), the proportion and influence of peasants in the party would decrease accordingly. This means that the adverse effects of the bipartisan system would not be limited to the working class.

The working people of Iceland, primarily the working class, have sufficient opportunity and strength to prevent a bipartisan system. The workers formed a party of their own as far back as 1916. They constitute a politically mature class. They would never entrust their fate to two bourgeois parties which could offer them nothing but the prospect of voting for one or the other party, as in the case of Britain and the United States.

The workers and all working people of Iceland now have their own political party and their own trade union movement—the United Socialist Party and the Union of the Working People of Iceland. These two organizations rally the country's labor movement in a reliable alliance. The task of Iceland's people is to increase their political influence in appreciable measure.

On the other hand, this Congress considers it very important to do everything to strengthen and improve relations between the working class and those members of different political parties who support the labor movement in its fight for a higher standard of living.

This Congress lays special emphasis on the necessity for attempting closer cooperation with the WPP, a veteran labor party, both within the framework of individual trade unions and in other mass organizations of the working class. This is the paramount task today.

This Congress believes such cooperation to be essential to success in the forthcoming struggle for the working people's interests. It would be a step toward ruling out a bipartisan system.

Furthermore, such cooperation on issues affecting the every-day interests of the working people would pave the way for closer political cooperation of the two parties.

DEVELOPMENTS IN COMMUNIST PARTY OF SWEDEN*

Frithjof Lager
BOARD MEMBER, CPS

The radio, television and some newspapers in Denmark have lately shown an unusual interest in the Communist Party of Sweden —its political activities and its methods of solving problems of Party life. The CPS's stand and prospects have been widely commented on, with all sorts of hackwriters and wiseacres contributing heavily Land og Folk has for its part, printed comments on the situation in the CPS, its future, etc. It would be useful to explain certain points to the Danish public and make a brief digression into history, for history is always interesting and instructive.

★ ★ ★

The history of our Party is part of the history of the international revolutionary movement. Our Party was founded in 1917 as a result of the withdrawal, or rather expulsion, of a group of members of the Social-Democratic Left Party. Our Party was represented at the First Congress of the Third (Communist) International. In 1920 the Second Congress of the Comintern adopted what were called the 21 conditions for admission into the Comintern. Those were very rigid conditions reflecting the character of the contemporary situation, which it would be hardly appropriate to go into here. One of the conditions was that every party joining the Communist International should be called the Communist Party of such and such a country (a section of the Third, Communist International). Lenin's theses stresed that "the question of the name is not merely formal and is very important."

At our 1921 congress some delegates objected to these conditions, but the overwhelming majority voted for them and, consequently, for changing the name of the Party to the "Communist Party of Sweden (a section of the Comintern)."

Much has happened since. In 1943, after the Comintern was dissolved, having completed its historical mission there arose new problems, among them problems of the postwar period with its revolutionary changes, and the question of the name of the Party was posed again. Some comrades from the leadership, obsessed with the idea of breaking with old standards, proposed renaming the Party. But things never went beyond mere talk.

It follows that the idea of changing the Party's name is not new. The success scored by the Party in the September 1964 election settled this question. The electorate showed that it had nothing against the name of the Party and, indeed, approved of it as symbolizing a new policy and socialist renovation. Should a future situation necessitate further discussion, I believe our Party would be prepared to re-examine the matter without prejudice. The important thing is the policy of a party, not its name.

Now for another and more important question, which has also been raised in the Danish press, namely, whether the change in the Party leadership effected means a change of policy, a shift from the firm position of scientific socialism to the shaky ground of unprincipled politics. There is no case whatever for putting the question in this way.

Now, as in the past, the Party adheres to scientific socialism, observing its principles and seeking better opportunities for applying them with due regard to Swedish reality. "Our Party has a clear socialist goal and works to make it the goal of the entire working-class movement," Party Chairman C. H. Hermansson stated at a Board meeting last November. "The balance of forces has to be changed if our population is to exert greater influence on social life. This implies a revision of the existing relations of ownership and control. The rule of big capital has to be ended."

Hermansson outlined a specific home policy program. He stressed that the Party supported the government's foreign policy of non-alignment and would do its best to increase Sweden's contribution to the effort to bring about disarmament, discontinue all nuclear tests and ban nuclear weapons, as well as to considerably increase aid to the developing countries. He reaffirmed the Party's solidarity with the forces fighting for peace, national independence, democracy and socialism, and its desire to co-operate with all nations and popular movements. He said the Party intended to exchange "experience and views with spokesmen for these forces in order to gain a broader understanding of problems and overcome national narrow-mindedness."

These few words make the position of our Party clear enough.

Did the 1964 Party congress contribute anything new? To a certain extent, one generation succeeded another in the Party leadership during the congress, and the change was unanimously approved. The congress also showed that the Party had become more energetic in drawing practical conclusions from recent developments abroad and at home. It thoroughly analyzed the forms and methods of Party work and discarded all that was obsolete, adopting new and progressive forms and methods. With the election campaign about to begin, we were resolved not to miss the new opportunity.

But that was only the beginning. In the autumn the Board set up a committee to review the Party Program adopted in 1951 and Program Statement of 1961. The committee was to submit its proposals in time for the next Party congress which under the Rules is to be held not later than 1967. Another committee was introduced to analyze the Rules and organizational structure of the Party.

I have just mentioned recent changes in policy which we cannot ignore. Allow me to touch upon certain changes taking place in Swedish society.

Concentration of capital continues. The Swedish capitalists are active at home and show a tendency towards expansion abroad. The export of capital is growing, and the key positions of big capital in the country are as strong as ever. The statae and cooperative sectors of the economy account for about 10 per cent, with half of it belonging to the state sector, which tends to decrease rather than grow. Considerable migrations have been taking place, resulting in a marked growth of the population in some regions. Specifically there has been a considerable influx into the areas of Greater Stockholm, Central Sweden, Göteborg and Malmö-Helsinborg.

To cope with the growing communal and state expenditures, promote social security and expand public education, the ruling classes of Sweden imposed heavier taxes on the people. At present 50 to 60 per cent of the worker's income is swallowed by taxes and rent. According to some estimates, these expenditures will claim more than 60 per cent before long. Revenues, especially state revenues, have to be increased by finding new sources, which can only be done through a resolute onslaught on big finance capital and an active rationalization policy in the public sector. The migration I mentioned calls for well-considered state interference before chaos sets in.

Major changes have been effected in the administrative division of the country. Much more remains to be done, however—the communes are being amalgamated and district boundaries are to be revised.

An important reorganization has been going on in the trade union movement in recent years, with unions merging on the industrial principle and small federations being amalgamated. Trade union leadership and policy-making are being centralized. On the other hand there is a growing trend to leave it to the workers to decide specific questions of the struggle for wages and draft collective agreements.

Needless to say, the Communist Party cannot stand aloof from this transformation which may enable it to test new forms and methods.

POPULAR UNITY AGAINST IMPERIALISM AND ITS NEW INTERNAL AGENTS

STATEMENT* BY THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF BOLIVIA

In analyzing the country's political outlook, the Second National Congress of the Communist Party of Bolivia stated: "The U.S. imperialists and the ruling bourgeoisie will not relinquish power easily. They will do all they can to retain it and to mislead the people. The elections are merely one of the methods for keeping the government in power. When this method has spent itself they will resort to a coup of d'état to hand the power to another government willing to carry on their policies. The reinforcement of the army and the policy pursued by the reactionaries are aimed at achieving this purpose." Thus the CP Congress anticipated a situation which has now materialized.

The CPB Political Committee report countered the factionalists as follows: "Petty-bourgeois despair drove them "Claure and Co.) to seize on and spread Right-wing slogans: 'Abstain from voting! Everyone should come out against Paz Estenssoro irrespective of his political or ideological differences, to overthrow him and transfer power to others.' Transfer to whom? Would it be to the people, to the working class? No, to the reactionaries, who have greater opportunities for maneuver than the present government rejected by the people."

Have the Communists ever backed Paz? "The Communists are well aware of the policies of the Paz Government. There can be no doubt as to our future policy, which is to unmask the pro-imperialist policies of both the present and the future government of Paz Estenssoro and to isolate it."

This has been the CPB policy on Paz and his agents and on the imperialist alternative, the Bolivian Socialist Falange* and the army. It is a policy directed against the government, classical reaction and the factionalists, the imperialists' mainstay in the country.

What was the upshot?

The country saw rapid developments of vast importance. The struggle which the universities and students had launched against the Paz Government's policy of repression immediately after the teachers' campaign assumed a popular character. The resolve to fight spread fast to every town and every industrial center. The movement was reinforced above all by the cooperation of the more enlightened sections of the working class, in particular the miners, who joined in this unequal battle to defend democratic liberties.

For many heroic days, miners, university professors, students and other sections of the people fought the repressive machinery of the Paz regime, which used every force at its disposal including the police and the army, called "liberation army." This course of events, whose main feature was the people's revolutionary enthusiasm, threatened — despite a violent massacre — to get out of control and its implications were easy to foresee. The fighting masses were undaunted despite the dozens of killed and the hundreds of injured and arrested. The government's position was becoming precarious.

Judging by the experience of the Siglo XX Mine, the High Command took advantage of the situation to carry out its plan for a military coup. It did so to check the revolutionary upsurge and disrupt the working-class and popular movement. Its purpose was to curb the people. The coup resulted in a Junta headed first by General Ovando and then by General Barrientos, Vice-Chairman of the Paz Cabinet. The imperialists and reactionaries carried the day at this new stage of the people's fight against the cruel regime.

The military coup did away with Paz but not his regime. In view of certain contradictions within the High Command, the people spontaneously took part in the overthrowing of the government. This is now misinterpreted as an indication of popular support for the Junta. The people's minor transient victories are due to their participation in the overthrow of the government. Whether these gains will be preserved will depend on how far the working class and the people as a whole are willing to go. It is a situation in which the Junta and the classical reactionaries are bound to reveal their true face.

The spontaneous character of the movement was due to the lack of proper leadership of the people's fight. For the same reason there was no chance of so much as raising the question of taking state power. This made it easier for the Junta to gain the upper hand.

The Junta, which poses as non-partisan, actually rescued the regime. It is made up almost entirely of military men, members of the Nationalist Revolutionary Movement party. Among them there are men who, like the Commander of the Rangers, shot down miners in Sora Sora.

It is indisputable that the participation of the working class and the masses at large compelled the leaders of what was a classical coup d'état to make some concessions to the people. In this way certain liberties were secured. The armed people put an end to the Department of Political Control,* and the police immediately forfeited its repressive power. This should not delude us, however. The army was the regime's most powerful repressive weapon and it is intact. Indeed, it retains a certain aura. The army's Second Department is more dangerous than the Department of Political Control. Besides, the government and its masters, the imperialists, have the opportunity to re-arm their repressive bodies when they see fit.

The labor movement and its organizations have defeated splitters and agents provocateurs like Sanjines Ovando, Paz Torres, and others of lesser stature. This development affords promising opportunities of remoulding militant labor organizations — the Bolivian Labor Center, the national confederations and federations and the industrial trade unions — on the basis of democracy and lawful representation. The working-class movement can and must consolidate its position and gain strength, as it did after April 1952.

Needless to say the Junta will be unable to use for a long time the demagogy which in the past won the people's support for the Paz Government. At that time the government profited by the slogan of "revolution." The revolution had been betrayed long ago, but it was referred to for demagogical purposes. The peasants, who until recently were more or less loyal to the bourgeois traitors, are becoming a powerful force that can and should be won over by the working class.

Specifically this opportunity is very real in the Altiplano and North Potosi areas. Our Party should do all it can to start work there. In the Valle area, the backers of Barrientos are now taking over where NRM influence has declined. But their positions are weaker than those held by the NRM earlier. These areas retain their special importance and the situation there calls for careful analysis, which, however, cannot be done here. Speaking generally, the situation is favorable now and we must make prompt use of the opportunities there are in the countryside.

While certain aspects of the present situation are more or less favorable, it is the general problems and trends that all revolutionary forces, in particular the working class, but above all Communists, should concentrate on.

It is true that one of the main agents of imperialist policy in Bolivia, Paz Estenssoro, has disappeared from the national scene.

In April 1952 the Bolivian people rose against the ruling military Junta and overthrew it.—Ed.

However, we must not for a moment forget that while the methods used by the State Department have failed, those of the Pentagon have not and it will use the most violent means to safeguard monopoly interests. The ties linking the U.S. militarists and the Junta are patent. The Bolivian Minister of the Interior headed Civic Action, the military version of the Alliance for Progress plan. Our army is essentially Americanized, which is not to say that there are no Bolivian-minded elements in it.

U.S. military attachés play a decisive role in Bolivia. It is safe to say that they have recaptured the positions lost by Mr. Henderson.* General Barrientos himself enjoys the personal esteem and, indeed, unlimited support of Le May, Chief of Staff (USAF. The Junta's inaugural statements on world politics are among the antecedents that have to be taken into account in assessing the political course to be followed by the new government, which is new only in appearance. In these circumstances, the vigilance of the masses is of decisive importance.

The Bolivian Socialist Falange did its best to exploit the atmosphere of rebellion which set in immediately after the military coup, and the coup itself, to which the classical Right was a party. Putting on military and university uniforms, it went into the streets to revive the terrorist practices of the Paz Estenssoro regime. Its slogan is anti-communism and its method, violence. It controls the government radio. The White Shirts are an instrument of destruction and plunder. They intimidate working people and raid their homes.

And as the Junta abets the Falangists on rampage, only vigorous action by factory workers could stop them.

Now here is a noteworthy fact. The "Marxist-Leninists" of the factional group, whose propositions are being proved false by developments, claim the right to represent our Party in reactionary organizations, such as the proposed People's Revolutionary Committee. Let the people and our membership pass judgment on these filthy politicians.

This is how the true nature of Creole fascism and its factional flunkeys is being revealed. The immediate task of the working class is to bar the way of these neofascist legions. The people will never fight to bring the old scum back to power.

In this emergency, the working class, the masses, the peasants, university professors, students, teachers, specialists, and the petty bourgeoisie in town and country must choose the road they want to take. This road should lead to establishment of an anti-imperialist united front of the people, primarily the working class, a front which our Party began to call for long ago as a vital necessity. It has to be a front of the people and not an alliance with their enemies, a front of Bolivians and not an alliance with imperialist agents, a progressive front and not an alliance with the reactionaries, a patriotic front and not an alliance with the advocates of cosmopolitanism.

The struggle for the people's road is on and it can only be led by the working class. This, of course, does not imply a sectarian attitude to other sections of the population. What we mean is leadership and not participation — it is a question of the unity of all popular, progressive, democratic and revolutionary forces with the working people. This is the only way to prevent an eventual military dictatorship and a comeback of the counter-revolution like the Paz Estenssoro regime or even worse. And this is the only way to lay the groundwork for the changes in policy demanded by the nation.

Mass action, working-class unity and organization, an uncompromising fight for the demands of the working class and in defense of its gains, resumption of the banner of April, and consolidation of the positions of labor should be the watchwords of every patriot.

The forces of the National Liberation Front and the political parties which express the interests of the working people and of the nation, such as the CPB and the Left National Revolutionary Party, must join their efforts in this movement, the only one that will lead to a truly Bolivian solution. Today the program of the Bolivian Labor Center is the instrument rallying the main forces. It consists of the following items:

(1) Preservation of the arms obtained by the people during the rising; heightened vigilance to prevent the movement from being misled or betrayed.

(2) Respect for the trade union and parliamentary rights and democratic and constitutional liberties of all trade union and political trends.

(3) Restitution to the trade unions and popular organizations of their premises, radio stations and economic resources, as well as their political rights violated by the National Revolutionary Movement party.

(4) Unlimited freedom of the press and radio.

(5) Abolition of the Department of Political Control and the mercenary force.

(6) Immediate general election, and abrogation of the Election Regulations.

(7) Complete emancipation from all imperialist oppression, and immediate advancement of the national economy.

(8) A Repeal of the Decree of August 22, and the liberalization of foreign trade.

(9) Stimulation and protection of industrial progress.

(10) Defense and revolutionary promotion of the gains of the people, such as the nationalization of mines, the agrarian reform, universal suffrage, workers' control with the right of veto, and the educational reform.

(11) Confirmation of the transfer of the land turned over to the peasants, and an amendment to the agrarian reform law providing for the improvement of the peasants' condition by supplying them with machinery, granting them loans at low interest, and organizing cooperatives. Renunciation and abolition of the rural inheritance tax.

(12) Extension of the health service to the peasants, and the establishment of medical centers and maternity homes in the countryside.

(13) Complete autonomy and greater appropriations for the University; more schools and less illiteracy — the premises of the Department of Political Control and other repressive bodies should be turned into schoolhouses.

(14) Improvement of the economic condition of the population, and a general normalization of wages and salaries.

Respect for women, who must be granted social, economic and political rights on a par with men. Disbandment of women's squads.

We Communists advance the following slogans:

—Promote working-class unity and organization.

—Work for the immediate convening of a national conference of the working people by the Bolivian Labor Center.

—Maintain working-class vigilance.

—Uphold the demands of the people, of the peasants and workers. Preserve and foster the militancy of the masses defending their gains and liberties.

—Stop the counter-revolution, whether military or Falangist.

—Let the people keep their arms. Help them to build up their strength.

—Bolivia has never sought, and will never seek, a mere change of master.

POLITICAL RESOLUTION OF SEVENTH CONGRESS, COMMUNIST PARTY OF INDIA

Following is the full text of the Political Resolution* adopted by the Seventh Congress of the Communist Party of India at its session on December 22:

Since the Sixth Congress of the Communist Party of India held at Vijayawada, big events have passed in rapid succession. Immediately after the Congress, the Party was called upon to implement its political line in the general elections of February 1962. Then followed the Chinese aggression which subjected the democratic movement to a severe ordeal by giving Right Reaction a most favorable opportunity to take the offensive. Before the country could settle down from the stresses and strains of this crisis, communal orgy of a serious dimension had burst out in several states. Finally, the crisis of the capitalist path of development, producing high prices, food scarcity, hoarding, profiteering and ministerial and other corruption of an unparalleled magnitude has overtaken the country.

During this period the differences inside the Communist Party which had already manifested themselves at the Sixth Congress entered into a new phase of acute tension and bitterness due to the activities of the dogmatic section which adhered to the ideological positions and the "splitting" theory of the Communist Party of China. These activities culminated in this section walking out of the Party and setting up a rival party of its own.

In spite of this tension and split, our Party boldly faced the crisis, championing all along the interests of the country and the masses. The resolution of the National Council in November 1962 for national defense was of historical significance in the life of the Party, laid the basis for fighting back the chauvinist reactionary offensive.

Since then, the Great Petition campaign and the Delhi March, the four stage workers' struggle, the magnificent bandhs in several states and the great all-India food satyagraha raised the democratic movements to a new height on an all-India scale never attained after national independence.

With the political resolution of the Sixth Congress as its guide, the Party has emerged out of the crisis, notwithstanding the split in its ranks, with a stronger bond of unity with the patriotic forces in the country and as a champion of the interests of the broad masses of our people.

WORLD SITUATION

In the midst of these grave difficulties, however, our Party and the country have before them an unusually favorable situation in the international sphere.

The world socialist system forges ahead in economic growth and military prowess, with the Soviet Union in the vanguard engaged in the creation of the material and technical basis of communism.

The collapse of colonialism continues, but the battle against colonialism and racialism is still not over and is being waged with ever greater strength in Angola, Mozambique and other Portuguese colonies, in South Africa and Southern Rhodesia.

Neo-colonialism has become a major threat to the independence of countries. Neo-colonialist designs of the imperialist powers are seen most glaringly in their intervention in Congo and South Vietnam, in the U.S. economic domination of many countries and in the creation of Malaysia.

A number of newly independent states are marching forward along the path of national democracy. The alliance between the socialist world and the newly independent nations has been strengthened.

Afro-Asian solidarity has grown. The non-aligned powers act in greater concert and exert an increasingly positive influence on the international situation.

In the imperialist countries, the anti-monopoly actions of the working class have reached new heights. Inter-imperialist contradictions have sharpened and the most aggressive imperialist circles are getting more and more isolated.

The forces of extreme reaction have received a setback notably in the defeat of Goldwater in the U.S. presidential elections. The Tory Party was defeated in the British general elections.

Despite some setbacks as in the Congo, new successes have been won in the worldwide struggle for peace and peaceful coexistence as, for example, the Moscow partial test ban treaty.

The main contradiction in the world today, that is, between socialism and capitalism, is increasingly being resolved in favor of socialism. The stage is set for the advance on a world scale and in each country, of the forces of peace, freedom, democracy and socialism.

At such a historic moment, what is the position in India today?

INTERNAL SCENE

During the past four years, the economic development of the country, though on the basis of capitalism, has taken a step forward by fulfilling certain schemes of industrialization, etc. This has strengthened the economic base of our national freedom.

But the policy of capitalist development, pursued by the ruling party, not only heaps misery and burdens upon the people but hampers the very process of full national rebirth. The outcome of the successive five-year plans has been a meager growth of national income and even the comparatively low national income target set in the Third Plan is not likely to be reached.

At the same time, the huge taxation targets, mainly regressive indirect taxes, have always been overfulfilled ahead of schedule. The food crlsis literally engulfs every aspect of the nation's life and the people's welfare. The inflationary policies of the government have fleeced the common man. Prices rise at a galloping pace and make life unbearable for the overwhelming majority of the people. Unemployment increases.

The people's living conditions have not only failed to improve but even the meager gains won through unremitting struggle have been considerably wiped off, giving rise to universal unrest among fixed and low income groups. The plague of poverty attacks our toiling people as never before since independence.

People's sufferings due to high prices, food scarcity, high taxation, unemployment and low income have become boundless. Discontent of the masses, irrespective of their political affiliation, has grown as never before. Hoarding, profiteering and corruption have reached such unprecedented dimensions that the people have begun to lose faith in the capacity of the government to overcome them.

Monopoly groups have availed of every opportunity to put pressure on the Shastri government to change the character and direction of economic planning and remould it in their own interests, disregarding the interest of the nation as a whole. Yielding to their pressure, Prime Minister Shastri has raised the slogan of pruning new projects of heavy industry in favor of giving priority to agriculture and production of consumer goods.

While it is correct to put emphasis on the latter in view of the present crisis, it is dangerous to slow down the growth of heavy industries without which neither agriculture nor the production of consumer goods can be stepped up in the long run.

From a long-term point of view, the contradiction between agriculture and light industries on the one hand and heavy industries on the other is more apparent than real because without our own forge foundries and machine-building industries, machinery required for light industries, production of chemical fertilizers, etc., cannot be adequately developed.

REFORMS

For the sake of galvanizing agriculture production, progressive land reforms in favor of the toiling peasantry, nationalization of the wholesale trade in foodgrains in order to give the peasant a fair price, and bank nationalization for increasing the facilities for agricultural credit, are of supreme importance.

The Government of India had at one time flirted with the idea of accepting the Big Business advocacy of a smaller and so-called "realistic" Fourth Plan, but meeting with universal popular opposition it has now decided to propose an overall fiscal outlay of Rs. 21,500 crores. This according to the planners will generate an overall growth rate of 6.5 per cent per annum.

Even this inadequate growth-rate will not be realized unless its fulfilment is guaranteed by radical reorganization of the national economy through land reform, nationalization of banks, state monopoly over wholesale trade in food grains and the nationalization of export-import trade. These measures are also imperative in order to hold the price line and step up agricultural production.

The development projects for the new Plan will be faced with the problem of resources. An annual expenditure of Rs. 1,000 crores for defense is an additional strain. The extension of the state sector is essential in order to solve the problem of resources for the Fourth Plan. After an increase of indirect taxes from Rs. 980 crores in 1960-61 to Rs. 1,580 crores in 1963-64, further increase of tax burdens on the common people will spell disaster for their household economy.

RESOURCES

From the point of view of finding resources, the real alternative to further indirect taxation is to make the state sector the dominant sector, run it efficiently and earn substantial revenue from it without raising the prices of the goods produced therein and to tax appropriately the wealthier sections of society.

In the Fourth Plan there is a proposal to augment the state sector further but it will still not be dominant enough to find resources satisfactorily. Nationalization of banks is denied. State monopoly of the wholesale food grains trade is not accepted, though the formation of the State Food Corporation is a step forward.

Fraternal aid from socialist countries is another helpful source. Acceptance of Soviet aid for the Bokaro project and defense industries is an indication that this source is being increasingly utilized, but as yet it is not being tapped to the full extent available.

During the last few years, the quantum of such aid has grown but the Shastri government is not yet utilizing the full opportunities available. For instance, a recent offer of the GDR government to give aid for heavy industry in India has not been accepted, though the terms offered were favorable, in order not to displease the West German imperialists.

Simultaneously, in the recent period, foreign private monopoly capital has increased its penetration and the Government of India is creating favorable conditions for its further growth, not hesitating to violate its own Industrial Policy Resolution in this regard.

For example, the import of U.S. private capital rose from Rs. 5.57 crores in 1961 to Rs. 11.48 crores in 1962 and Rs. 17.03 crores in 1963. Increased reliance on PL 480 and other forms of Western imperialist "aid" is a menacing feature of the situation.

Concentration of wealth and economic power in the hands of a microscopic minority has accentuated, the collaboration between foreign and Indian monopolies has increased, very often at the expense of small industrialists.

Corruption spreads like an evil cancer gnawing at the very roots of our present democracy. "Black money" abounds, tax evasion proceeds apace, speculation and hoarding increase. Thus, the economic base of Right reaction has been strengthened.

FOREIGN POLICY

In the field of foreign policy, non-alignment, peaceful coexistence and anti-colonialism continue to be the basic approach of the government, having withstood the terrible test of Chinese aggression, which encouraged Right reaction to go on the rampage against it, though these policies were then weakened.

Friendship with the Soviet Union, closer links with Afro-Asian states and non-aligned powers characterize an important aspect of the government's foreign policy. The adherence to the Cairo Declaration and the refusal to deviate from the policy of using nuclear energy only for peaceful purposes are positive features.

It is especially to be noted that in the present period, democratic unity has been reinforced in defense of the nation's foreign policy, with leading Congressmen and government personalities also playing an important role, though mass actions and campaigns as, for example, against the "air-umbrella" and Voice of America, in which the democratic masses following the Congress also took part.

WEAKNESSES

Nevertheless, serious weaknesses and vacillations have developed, especially in the direction of soft pedalling the struggle against colonialism and neo-colonialism, in refusing to energetically protest against the provocative maneuvers of the U.S. Seventh Fleet in the Indian Ocean and the open U.S. intervention in Vietnam, Laos, Cambodia and the Congo.

India is far from playing the role of pioneer and initiator in the Afro-Asian and non-aligned world and sometimes drags its feet. On Malaysia, the government of India has taken a stand which only helps the neo-colonial designs of British imperialism. In the Commonwealth Conference, the weak and vacillating stand taken by the representative of the Indian government disappointed the Afro-Asian countries.

National defense has become one of the major problems facing the entire people and the government. This has led to the renewed danger of Anglo-U.S. imperialist pressures and interventions on the pretext of rendering so-called military "aid" to India.

The Government of India, having embarked on a big defense program costing Rs. 8 to 9 hundred crores a year, is liable to make serious concessions and compromises on this, as is evidenced, for example, by the facilities given to Anglo-U.S. military officers to inspect our border areas where arms supplied by them are in use and the assurance that these arms would not be used against any aggressor other than China.

The government of India's defense policy, however, remains basically non-aligned. It has rejected the idea of defense pacts with the imperialists and refused to permit foreign bases on Indian soil. It has sought to develop the country's independent defense potential by seeking assistance from socialist countries, especially the Soviet Union, as well as from the western powers.

Outstanding in this connection is the MIG factory agreement, which vividly contrasts with the imperialist reluctance to supply vitally necessary heavy equipment and technical know-how. This opens the possibility of overcoming to some extent the dependence on imperialist powers.

The democratic forces, however, must maintain constant vigilance to ensure that our national sovereignty is not jeopardized in any way in the name of securing so-called Western "aid" for national defense.

The government has not made basic changes in national policies. It carries forward both the positive as well as the negative aspects of the policy in general.

But there has been a change in the internal situation for the worse. Under the mounting pressure of Right reaction, both inside and outside the Congress, the government has made dangerous anti-people concessions on issues of food and price policy, suppression of democratic rights, etc.

But in the recent period, the democratic movement has through mighty campaigns and struggles not only compelled the Right to retreat on occasion but also forced the government to make concessions in favor of the people. The situation may deteriorate further unless popular democratic forces are able to check and reverse it through determined struggles.

CONFLICT

But the contradictions inherent in the situation, the growing conflict between imperialism and the Indian people including the national bourgeoisie, the policies pursued by the socialist countries to help India in her economic development and peoples' capacity to resist reactionary changes, are potentially stronger deterrent factors.

In this new situation, the vigilance of the organized democratic movement and active intervention of the Communist Party and other progressive democratic forces have assumed new importance. The task of building up the unity of democratic forces for the defense of India's progressive policies and for a shift to the Left can no longer be ignored, except at the peril of India's future.

The contradiction between the democratic masses and the ruling class, including its government, has sharpened in the recent past and the prospect is of its further sharpening, as the crisis of peoples' suffering born out of capitalist development unfolds itself more and more. The differences inside the Congress party are also beginning to grow.

Under these conditions, the most favorable opportunity exists for bringing about a shift to the Left in governmental policies by uniting all progressive democratic forces. This will give the rebuff to the machinations of Right reaction including the communal forces.

RIGHT REACTION

The results of the third general elections show a shift in favor of the parties of Right reaction. While the CPI not only maintained its position but also slightly gained, the ruling party lost mainly to parties of Right reaction, as a result of which they emerged more united and consolidated. In some by-elections that followed, the Congress in spite of maintaining its dominant position, has lost more to the Right than the Left. All the Rightist forces both inside and outside the Congress are being more and more consolidated.

Their drive for extending the private monopoly sector, for abandoning non-alignment, for taking India into the imperialist war bloc, for a nuclear shield and imperialist protection, for eschewing land reform and reversal of all progressive measures are being sought to be strengthened by taking advantage of the people's growing discontent against government anti-people policies and the continued deadlock on the northern frontier.

Systematic refusal by China to accept the Colombo proposals as the basis for starting talks for the settlement of the border question is bringing grist to the mill of the Right reactionaries and their foreign collaborators.

During this period, the forces of communal reaction have also strengthened their position; they seriously endanger India's security and democracy. Right reaction has exploited casteism which has a powerful grip on the people today.

But at the same time experience has shown that mass campaigns and struggles led by the democratic forces against the anti-people policy of the government reduce considerably the capacity of Right reaction to mislead the masses.

At the same time, the democratic forces in the Congress have become more vocal and active, advancing alternative democratic slogans. This was reflected in the Bhuvaneshwar Congress discussions and later in the Congress Workers' Convention held at Delhi. They are groping towards internal unity as well as joint activity with other sectors of the democratic movement.

The participation by a large number of Congress leaders in the World Conference for Peace and International Cooperation held in Delhi and the participation of the official youth organization of the Congress in the National Youth Forum reflect the growing strength of the democratic forces inside the Congress.

Congress masses also have moved in the struggles launched by Left parties on issues like food, high prices, nationalization of banks, etc.

Under the impact of the crisis and due to the weakness of the democratic forces inside the Congress, the ruling party has reached a new stage of factional conflict in different states as well as at the center. These factions have at times used the people's discontent in some stages. The political prestige and the mass influence of the Congress, though still very extensive, has fallen appreciably.

These factional conflicts, combined with increasing exposure of ministerial corruption, continue to reduce the mass popularity of the Congress and undermine its unity. This will lead to a situation of instability, frequent political crises in some states, as has already happened in Kerala. Unless the democratic forces unite and intervene, the situation will be successfully exploited by Right reaction.

NATIONAL UNITY

In the recent period, the forces of communalism, casteism, religionism and linguistic chauvinism have posed new dangers to the unity of our nation and to our secular democracy. Disunity and discord provide a fertile soil for the growth of Right reaction and constitute a serious obstacle to the building of the National Democratic Front.

The failure of the government to rectify regional imbalances, to implement the three-language formula and to curb the tendencies of casteism and communalism which are utilized by the ruling party itself, has further accentuated the problem.

The refusal to consistently implement the principle of linguistic states has helped the spread of linguistic chauvinism and bitterness. The utter inability to solve the problems of the tribal peoples has encouraged divisive tendencies and separatist trends.

The richest heritage of our national movement—the unity of our motherland—faces the serious threat of being dissipated and undermined.

Democratic unity at the mass level and from below has grown in the recent period. National slogans like nationalization of banks and state-trading in food grains advanced by the Communist Party and popularized through mass struggles of the working people, have won wide support. The democratic masses, including working women, have moved into actions as in the food satyagraha and the bandhs, with determination and unity.

The working class has moved not only in the interest of its own demands but has played an increasing role of initiator and unifier of the struggles of the masses, under the leadership of the Party and the trade unions of the AITUC acting in unity with other trade union centers. But working class unity is yet to be achieved, though some advance has been registered through the bandh actions.

Large sections of middle-class employees like government employees, bank employees, teachers, professors, doctors and pilots have come forward in strike struggles and other forms of mass action, as never before.

Simultaneously, the mass movement of the urban middle-class against price rises through the building up of consumer cooperatives and other forms of resistance against high prices have begun to develop in the big cities. The urban middle-class is in ferment and restive.

The task of the Party is to forge its living links with the masses including those sections who have not yet moved into action and develop these movements, giving them an organized character. Conscious, fraternal efforts must be made to bring about the widest possible unity of all democratic forces, including Congressmen and Congress committees, to make them participate in the common movement, in any form of organized activity that can serve the interests of the people against the price rise, food scarcity, black market and corruption.

PEASANTRY

The peasants have also gone into action in the form of satyagraha, but it is clear that the peasant movement is lagging behind and the All India Kisan Sabha has become almost inactive and defunct. This weakness on the peasant and agricultural labor front is a serious handicap to the democratic movement as a whole and it sharply reduces its sweep and striking power.

The Congress agrarian reforms like tenancy legislation and the ceiling acts have not solved the land problem in the interests of the peasantry. Because of the loopholes in the tenancy acts millions of tenants have been evicted and thrown out. Even today millions of tenants-at-will and sharecroppers have not got security of tenancy. The ceiling acts have proved to be a failure. Ten per cent of the agricultural families even now possess 58 per cent of the land under cultivation.

The peasant is robbed both as a producer and as a consumer through the market manipulations. The Reserve Bank of India Report has proved that the agricultural debt burden has grown in the recent years. Cheap credit is not available to the vast majority of the peasantry. Huge tax burdens are levied. Unemployment and underemployment in the rural areas, by and large, is on the increase.

The minimum wages acts have not been properly implementsd. Even where the wages have been fixed they are much lower than the existing rates. In many parts of the country the agricultural laborers are still suffering from debt bondage, homestead bondage, social oppression and other forms of semi-feudal exploitation.

The government has failed miserably to distribute even the waste lands to the agricultural laborers and poor peasants. An overwhelming majority of agricultural laborers do not possess even house sites. The solution of these problems brooks no further delay.

The urgent necessity of increasing agricultural production and of national regeneration in the countryside demand their immediate solution. An all-India mass campaign and struggle should be organized for the solution of the above burning problems. The Kisan Sabha must be revived and agricultural workers organized in order to galvanize the peasant masses into action.

IMMEDIATE TASK

In the coming period, this must constitute the most important task of the Party throughout the country. Only by discharging these tasks can peasant unity be built up and the workers' and peasants' alliance forged as the main lever of the democratic movement and the National Democratic Front.

Despite semi-feudal relations and oppression, consciousness among the women of India is rising. Participation of women in the kisan and workers' struggles, in the food satyagraha all over the country is worth mentioning. It has been clearly demonstrated in the increasing discontent against rising prices, which found expression in demonstrations, morchas, etc., by all sections of women, including housewives and middle-class women.

Under these circumstances it has become an urgent task to build a strong movement of all sections of women—housewives and working women in factories and farms—at all levels, in the form of mass organizations and to activize and strengthen the existing organizations.

The sentiment for unity of all the forces of the Left has acquired new impetus and is exerting its beneficial influence on the organized forces and parties of the Left. But anti-communism pursued by the leadership of the SSP and some other parties of the Left, continues to be detrimental to unity of action.

Among the parties of the Left, other than the Communist Party, the SSP which has emerged after the merger of the PSP and the SP, has an all-India character.

Before the merger, the right-wing leaders of the PSP and SP often sided with the parties of Right reaction and were notorious for anti-communism. Even after the merger, one section of leadership continues to toe the line of Right reaction.

But the rank-and-file members of the Party and a section of leadership are genuine Lefts, despite their anti-communist prejudices. It will be the constant endeavor of the Communist Party to win this party, as the other Left parties, for the National Democratic Front.

At the same time, fraternal criticism has to be made of the anti-communist prejudices of a section of the leadership of the SSP and of the tendency for all manner of opportunist alliances, even with parties of Right reaction including communal forces.

DISRUPTION

At such a time, the split engineered in the CPI by the dogmatic section will exert a negative influence on the work of building democratic unity for mass action. After having split the Party, they now threaten the unity of the AITUC. The Party must combat these disruptive trends and preserve the unity of the trade unions and other mass organizations.

In spite of all the disruptive and non-Communist methods and language of the rival party leaders, the CPI will adopt an attitude of patience, reason and fraternity. The CP will spare no effort in trying to draw the rival party into joint mass campaigns, while simultaneously exposing its wrong ideology, policies and organizational methods.

The CPI is confident that in this manner, learing from their own experience, an increasingly large number of those who have temporarily gone with the rival party will once again take their due place in the ranks of the CPI.

In this complex situation, the CPI sets itself the immediate task of going all out to build and consolidate the unity of all democratic and socialist forces for the defeat of Right reaction, for reversing the anti-people policies of the government and for bringing about a shift to the Left. It appeals to all the Left parties, to all progressive forces and personalities, including democratic Congressmen, to join together to discharge this sacred national task at this moment of peril and promise.

The CPI will carry forward to still higher levels its own independent mass mobilization and struggles, both on a local and all-India scale. It will carry forward the achievements of the all-India campaigns, the satyagraha and the bandhs, to the stage of Bharat Bandh combined with countrywide, peaceful mass peasant actions. It will work for united mass action, wherever possible, and convergent action wherever necessary.

It will spare no effort to build and strengthen the mass organizations of the workers, peasants, youth, toiling intelligentsia, women and students on the widest possible united basis. In order to discharge its duty to the nation and the people, it will continuously strive to consolidate itself ideologically, politically and organizationally and to build a strong mass Communist Party.

As a way out for the people and in order to effect a breakthrough, the CPI advances the following immediate platform of action. It is willing to discuss any and all items of this platform with any democratic party, group or personality in order to facilitate mutual understanding and for joint mass campaigning and action:

1. Institute state monopoly of the wholesale trade in food grains, with reasonable, assured prices for the peasants and a fair price for the consumer; introduce statutory rationing in all cities and towns and deficit states, like Kerala; open consumers' cooperative stores, fair price shops in urban and rural areas and guarantee regular supply of food grains and other essential goods to them.

2. Develop an all-India food production drive by distributing fallow lands to agricultural laborers and poor peasants; by granting occupancy rights to tenants-at-will and sharecroppers other than the holders of land belonging to the rural poor and the poor toilers of the towns; by fixing fair rents; by amending ceilings acts in favor of the peasantry and implementing them immediately; by opening state farms wherever possible as in Suratgarh, by increased facilities for the toiling peasants to improve cultivation through irrigation, fertilizers and adequate credit; by expansion and democratization of the cooperative movement; by providing debt relief to the peasants and agricultural laborers; by securing a minimum wage and providing house sites for the agricultural laborers; by assuring fair prices for agricultural goods as well as supply of industrial goods at controlled rates.

3. Secure higher wages and increased bonus for industrial workers and middle-class employees and link their DA with the corrected cost of living index; ensure trade union and democratic rights for the working class in both the private and state sectors and for all government employees; secure opening of cheap price shops for supply of essential commodities in all factories and establishments employing 300 or more persons; develop and promote TU unity and united actions of the working class.

4. Nationalize banks, general insurance, foreign trade, oil, coal and other mines and plantations; impose control over prices, raw materials and rate of profit in the case of existing large-scale industries like cotton and jute manufacturers, sugar, cement, etc.; take over industrial units and establishments where industrial control measures prove inadequate to prevent mismanagement, corruption and profiteering; democratize the working and management of the public sector.

5. No further taxes on the people; increase taxes on the higher income groups and profits above the bank rate; cancel the privy purses and all princely privileges; reduce the existing unbearable taxes on essential commodities and reduce their prices to a reasonable level; direct tax burdens and peasants to be reduced and uneconomic holdings exempted from land revenues.

6. Remove and punish corrupt ministers and officials; take over companies guilty of swindling public money; take effective steps to unearth black money and to prevent tax evasion; ban forward dealings in futures and forward markets.

7. Lift the emergency, scrap the DIR, release all political prisoners and detenues and restore fundamental rights.

8. Promotion of communal harmony, secularism and national integration; ban all communal propaganda; ban the RSS; take effective steps for the security of the life and property of the minorities; take adequate measures for the rehabilitation of refugees from East Pakistan; campaign against casteism.

9. Take adequate measures for the uplift of the scheduled castes; scheduled tribes and other backward classes and tribals.

10. Defend and develop the national policy of peace and disarmament, non-alignment and anti-colonialism and move forward to the government's implementation of the Cairo Declaration.

11. Work for the settlement of the conflict with China on the basis of the Colombo proposals.

12. Work for friendship with Pakistan through bilateral talks for the solution of all outstanding problems.

13. Stop all cuts in allocations for health, education and other social services; introduce the regional language as the medium of instruction up to and including the university stage; ensure adequate salaries for teachers and for doctors in government hospitals.

14. Take effective and immediate measures for the democratization of the state machinery, basing it on the principle of decentralization and with more powers and finance to the elected panchayats and other local bodies.

15. Establish full-fledged responsible governments in the centrally administered areas of Manipur, Tripura, Himachal Pradesh, Delhi on a par with other states.

16. Break the Congress monopoly of power to form a government of all progressive parties, groups and individuals in whichever state the situation permits, in the first place in Kerala, without any alliance with communal parties.

FORWARD!

With this immediate platform of action, the Communist Party of India will go to the people, organize them and lead them into battle, together with all other democratic and Left parties, to take a gigantic step forward towards the completion of the national democratic revolution, for genuine national regeneration and for building up the National Democratic Front.

The Seventh Congress of the Communist Party of India calls upon all the people, including Congressmen who desire to carry forward the best traditions of the national movement, towards democracy, progress and prosperity to come forward in multifarious activities for national regeneration.

Together we must combat and rout the forces of corruption, decay and parasitism born out of the remnants of feudal social relations, the new growth of the monopolies and imperialist machinations. The sufferings of the people and dangers threatening the progress of the country must make any party and group subordinate their narrow party interests and rivalries to the supreme interest of the nation as a whole.

The socialist forces of the world are marching ahead and the hitherto dark regions of Asia, Africa and Latin America have been roused and are taking forward strides. India shall not lag behind.

ON THE IDEOLOGICAL CONTROVERSIES AND UNITY OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

Following is the full text of the resolution,* "On the Ideological Controversies and the Unity of the International Communist Movement," adopted by the Seventh Congress of the Communist Party of India in its session December 18:

Since the Sixth Congress of our Party, which took place almost immediately after the Moscow Conference of 81 Communist and Workers' Parties, the international Communist movement has been passing through bitter and prolonged ideological controversies. These controversies which came out into the open in 1960 assumed particularly serious dimensions with the publication of an alternative general line for the world Communist movement by the leadership of the Communist Party of China in the form of its June 14, 1963 letter to the Central Commitee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

The National Council of our Party critically examined and appraised this general line of the world Communist movement embodied in the 1957 Moscow Declaration and 1960 Moscow Statement. The attempt by the CPC leadership to push this alternative line and impose it on the fraternal Parties created an unprecedented situation and brought the international movement almost to the brink of a split. That situation, unfortunately, still continues.

Like many other fraternal parties, our own Party too was seriously affected by this ideological offensive of the CPC leadership and its open call for splits. Splitting activities which have accompanied the propagation of this alternative line have been sought to be justified in the name of purity of Marxism-Leninism.

When the collective line of the world Communist movement was thus openly challenged and assailed, it became naturally incumbent upon Marxist-Leninist parties to defend the common line—the 1957 Moscow Declaration and the 1960 Moscow Statement. This became necessary not only for discharging their responsibilities towards the world Communist movement, but also for carrying out their tasks as national contingents of that movement in their respective countries.

The ideological struggle for upholding the Declaration and the Statement in the face of open attack on the part of the leadership of the Communist Party of China became inseparable in the capitalist world from the struggle for peace, national liberation, democracy and socialism. This has been confirmed by the experience of our own Party and the ideological struggles it has had to wage within its ranks.

The alternative general line of the CPC leadership found its most crude and destructive expression in relation to our country. Disregarding the fact that India is a non-aligned country adhering to the peace zone, to which China was allied in principles of Panchsheel, the Chinese armies made massed military attacks across the MacMahon Line in an attempt to solve the India-China border problem by armed force.

INTERFERENCE

This had already been preceded by open interference by the Chinese Party in the affairs of our country in the form of pronouncements about the character of the Indian government which went contrary to the declared decisions of our Party at its Vijayawada Congress. Chinese aggression against our country was followed by open slanderous attacks against our Party and call to split it, in the form of the article "Mirror for Revisionists."

The narrow nationalistic and chauvinist attitude taken up by the Chinese leadership on the border question and its attempt to solve it by armed force caused a major setback to our democratic movement as it created opportunities for the forces of domestic reaction to strengthen themselves and gain vantage positions in the country's political life. This made the struggle against the erroneous ideological and political positions of the CPC leadership all the more urgent in the case of our Party.

As far back as 1959, our Party had drawn the attention of the CPC leadership to their incorrect attitude towards the border question. We subsequently raised the question at the 81 Parties Conference as well.

It was under such circumstances that our Party came out openly to refute the Chinese line, save the democratic movement of our country from the disastrous repercussions of that line and defend the integrity and unity of our Party.

The National Council of our Party took note of the June 14 CPC letter and reaffirmed our Party's firm adherence to the Moscow Declaration and the Moscow Statement. The Council repudiated the positions of the CPC leadership. In its report "For the Unity of the Party and the International Communist Movement" the National Council of our Party again comprehensively discussed the ideological issues and placed its view for discussion by the entire Party as part of the preparation for the Seventh Party Congress. This report has been discussed by many Party conferences at different levels and the discussions have given general approval to the positions taken by the National Council on all questions of principle.

The Seventh Congress notes with satisfaction that these conferences have once again reaffirmed, through free and frank discussions, the Party's complete identification with the overwhelming majority of the Marxist-Leninist Parties in upholding the programmatic documents of the world Communist movement—the Declaration and the Statement.

In this connection, it is perhaps necessary to recall that the Fourth Congress of our Party had acclaimed the decisions of the 20th Congress of the CPSU which ushered in a new stage in the international Communist movement. Later, the National Council of the Party similarly highly appraised the decisions of the 22nd Congress of the CPSU. The Moscow Declaration and the Moscow Statement were acclaimed warmly in the ranks of our Party.

At the same time it must be emphasized that no effective steps were taken to conduct any ideological discussion in the Party ranks with the result that despite formal acceptance of the conclusions of the CPSU Congress and of the two Moscow meetings of the world Communist movement, the Party ranks remained by and large in the dark as to their full meaning and significance. The ideological struggle within the Party was not undertaken, not even when the decisions of the 20th Congress and of the Moscow meetings of 1957 and 1960 were being challenged by a section of the leadership within the Party. Further, until mid-1963 even crucial documents on vital issues of the world movement including a full and proper report of the proceedings of the 81 Parties Conference as well as of the stand of the Indian delegation on the Sino-Indian border question were not made available to the ranks of the Party. This failure to draw the Party members into discussions on ideological issues contributed in a no small measure to making the Party vulnerable to alien trends and splitting activities.

The Seventh Congress of the Communist Party deems it necessary to emphasize the supreme importance of drawing the entire Party ranks into ideological discussions, organized on the basis of making all important material available to the entire Party ranks, of conducting principled ideological struggles within the Party and equipping and strengthening the entire Party on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.

On the basis of the pre-Congress discussions which have taken place in the ranks of our Party the Seventh Congress deems it necessary to sum up and conclude the results of these discussions by restating and re-affirming the positions of our Party in regard to the major issues of controversy, namely, the character and significance of the new epoch, war and peace, peaceful coexistence, national-liberation movement, national democracy, forms of transition to socialism, cult of personality, the unity of the socialist camp and world Communist movement.

In regard to all these vital questions, our Party disagrees with the positions taken by the CPC leadership and considers their alternative line as a repudiation of the line of the world Communist movement. In the course of the discussion within our Party, the positions of the CPC leadership have been appraised as dogmatic and disruptive and spelling out great danger for the world Communist movement as a whole and particularly for the Communist Parties in the capitalist countries, and the struggle for peace, democracy and national independence. Both in theory and practice, the line of the CPC leadership suffers from narrow nationalistic and even chauvinistic distortions.

The Seventh Congress of the CPI attaches the greatest importance to the correct understanding of our present new epoch. The definition of the epoch is essential for the working out of the strategy and tactics of the movement as a whole and equipping every Marxist-Leninist Party for fulfilling in the most effective manner the revolutionary role assigned to it, in all countries and in all situations.

NEW EPOCH

It is of fundamental importance to recognize that the main content of our epoch is transition from capitalism to socialism. Similarly, it is also to be understood and accepted that the most distinctive feature of the present epoch is that the world socialist system is becoming a decisive factor in the development of human society. It is not correct, therefore, to describe the present epoch merely as an epoch of imperialism and proletarian revolution.

The main content of the present epoch and its distinctive feature have given rise to real opportunities for solving the cardinal problems of our time in a new way. Our own experience is that the refusal to fully accept the definition of the epoch given in the Moscow Statement results in dogmatism in theory and sectarianism in practice. It comes in the way of utilizing new opportunities for advancing the cause of the working class and the democratic movement.

The Seventh Congress of our Party fully endorses the definition of the epoch as given in the Moscow Statement and enjoins all Party ranks to keep this definition constantly in view in the context of theoretical work and practical activities of the Party in the mass movements of our country.

The Seventh Congress of the Party rejects all theoretical propositions that are based on the denial of the fact that the main contradiction in modern society is that between capitalism and socialism. Even before the world socialist system came into existence, this was the main contradiction and it is now immensely sharpened and has become all the more pronounced as a result of the advent of socialism as world system and of the advance of the contemporary international working-class movement.

The focal points of world contradictions are naturally concentrated where the most powerful and organized forces of socialism stand face to face against the forces of imperialism. This means that the contradiction between the world socialist system and the world capitalist system constitutes the focus of the contradictions of modern times.

It is incorrect to treat the contradiction between imperialism and the national-liberation movements, notwithstanding all their revolutionary potentialities, as the main contradiction of our time. Hence it is also not correct to say that the focal points of the world contradictions lie in the vast areas of Asia, Africa and Latin America, where the national liberation struggles against imperialism are in progress, even though these may be areas where imperialism is most vulnerable.

These national liberation struggles are delivering shattering blows to imperialism but then the fact remains that the decisive role in the world revolutionary process today is played most definitely by the working class and its chief creation—the world socialist system. Our own experience in the struggle against overcoming the legacies of imperialism and in achieving economic independence confirms this understanding.

The Moscow Declaration highlights the importance of the emergence of the "Peace Zone" comprising the socialist countries and newly liberated non-aligned nations. Our Party fully acknowledges the positive role of this Peace Zone in the worldwide struggle for peace and against colonialism. The Party Congress considers that it is the duty of all Communists, to work for expanding and strengthening the Peace Zone.

To negate or even underestimate the role of the Peace Zone is to restrict and weaken the anti-imperialist struggle, the common front against imperialism. The stand of the CPC leadership in this regard, particularly in relation to India, which is a vast country in the Peace Zone, means a virtual negation of this concept. Worse still, it weakens and undermines the Peace Zone instead of expanding and consolidating it.

Our Seventh Congress rejects the concept of the so-called "Intermediate Zone" put forward by the CPC leadership as contrary to the understanding of the Declaration and the Statement. It is one thing to recognize that inter-imperialist contradictions do exist and are growing, and to utilize those, but it is quite a different matter to put forward, out of this, the concept of the "International Zone."

This is an erroneous concept which separates the USA from other imperialist powers and puts the latter in the same category with the non-imperialist capitalist countries and even blocs created by the imperialist powers such as NATO, CENTO and SEATO and underestimates the dangers posed by the imperialist block.

UNREALISTIC

This unrealistic and artificial concept also underlies the neo-colonialism of Britain, France, West Germany and Japan and so on. It goes without saying that the spearhead of these imperiailst alignments and their military blocs and their bases is directed, first and foremost, against the countries of the socialist camp as also against other countries, especially in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

The Chinese theory of the "Intermediate Zone" in reality weakens the struggle against imperialism. Not only that, in practice it has been a cover for the most opportunist and unprincipled alliances in the field of foreign policy. The most crude expression of this has been the policy of China towards Pakistan, China's open tributes to the military dictatorship of Ayub Khan, her defense of Pakistan's membership of the SEATO imperialist war bloc, and her indirect support to Pakistan's demand for a plebiscite in Kashmir in the name of self-determination.

One of the most important questions over which the controversy in the international Communist movement has arisen is that of world war and peace.

The Seventh Congress of the CPI entirely endorses the call of the international Communist movement to regard the fight for peace as the prime task of all Communists. Our Party fully recognizes the new possibilities which have grown and are further growing day by day for preventing a world war by the combined efforts of all peace forces. The correlation between the forces of peace and those of war and aggression is constantly changing in favor of peace and against war. Hence it is wrong in theory and harmful in practice to put equal emphasis on the possibility of averting war and of its breaking out.

All this, however, does not mean that imperialism has changed its aggressive nature, or that the danger of war does not exist, or is not serious. It only means that the forces have arisen in the world arena today which can, by their united efforts, curb imperialism and prevent it from unleashin another world war.

The Seventh Congress of the CPI stands foursquare with the rest of the Communist movement in maintaining that the only alternative to destructive war is peaceful coexistence between states with different social systems and looks upon the struggle to compel imperialist powers to accept this as of vital importance for freeing mankind from the threat of a thermonuclear war and for ensuring durable peace. Peace is clearly an ally of socialism and of progressive causes.

The experience of our people in their struggle against imperialism and for national regeneration has fully confirmed this proposition.

GENERAL LINE

In the struggle for peace the greatest role is naturally assigned to the countries of victorious socialism. The policy of peaceful coexistence has been very aptly regarded as the "cornerstone" and "foundation" of the foreign policy of socialist countries. It is but logical that this policy of peaceful coexistence should be regarded as the general line of the foreign policy of all socialist countries. Non-acceptance of this by any socialist country cannot but lead to serious mistakes of adventurism in foreign policy and weaken the struggle against imperialism and for peace and peaceful coexistence.

The Seventh Congress of our Party understands the slogan of complete and general disarmament as a fighting slogan of the masses and rejects the defeatist view that it is an "illusion" to expect general and complete disarmament so long as the system of imperialism and of exploitation of man by man exists. It fully endorses the confident line of the world Communist movement that by active and resolute struggle, imperialism can and must be made to meet the demand for disarmament.

The struggle for disarmament helps weaken and isolate the imperialists and the reactionaries and strengthens the position of all forces fighting for peace, national independence, democracy and socialism. In this connection, our Party is in full support of the Moscow Partial Test Ban Treaty and looks upon it as one of the most significant achievements of the peace movement.

The prolification of nuclear weapons and the defiance of this Moscow Test Ban Treaty contributes to the heightening of international tension and encourages the nuclear arms race and spread of nuclear weapons. The Chinese explosion of an atom bomb in defiance of the Moscow Treaty has led, in the case of our own country, to strengthening the hands of the pro-imperialist reactionaries to clamor for making the atom bomb in India or alternatively to seek the nuclear umbrella of the Anglo-American powers.

The Seventh Congress of our Party totally rejects the view that the struggle for peaceful coexistence weakens the struggle for national liberation and the class struggles in the capitalist countries. The truth is that peaceful coexistence is itself a form of class struggle in the world arena between capitalism and socialism. It most definitely implies ideological, economic and political struggle. Peaceful coexistence only means that disputes between socialism and capitalism in the international arena must not be sought to be resolved through recourse to arms and war. Socialism does not need war to triumph.

Our experience confirms that peaceful coexistence creates favorable conditions for the development of class struggle in the capitalist countries and the liberation movement of the peoples. It should not be lost to the view that a large number of Afro-Asian countries have won their political independence precisely under conditions of peaceful coexistence.

In their turn, the class struggle and the national-liberation movement promote the cause of peaceful coexistence. It is an utter distortion of the common line of the world Communist movement to suggest that peaceful coexistence means abandonment of class struggle or conciliation with imperialism. On the contrary, peaceful coexistence demands the intensification of the struggles of the working class and all the peoples fighting for national liberation.

The Seventh Congress of the CPI fully recognizes the revolutionary significance of the national liberation struggle in Asia, Africa and Latin America. The national liberation movement is a component of the one and same revolutionary process, other components being the struggle of the working people in the socialist countries for building socialism and communism, the revolutionary movement of the working people in the capitalist countries and the general democratic movement. All these merge into a powerful single current that ensures destruction of imperialism and world capitalism. The interconnection between all these forces is of fundamental importance for the success of the world revolutionary process.

Contemporary events are amply proving the correctness of the Moscow Statement that world socialism has contributed decisively to the struggle of the colonial and dependent peoples. It has been seen in our own country as in other newly liberated countries that the world socialist system constitutes a reliable shield for independent national development. But for the disinterested economic assistance India receives from the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, the independent development of our national economy and its reconstruction under the Plan would not have been possible in the face of imperialist pressures.

The rapid victories for national liberation and the consolidation of the newly won freedom are ensured by the international working class and the socialist system. It follows, therefore, that in the interest of national liberation itself as for the larger cause of world-wide struggle against imperialism, the bonds of the national liberation struggles with the international working class and the socialist camp have got to be constantly strengthened. Any step that weakens these bonds is contrary to the position of the world Communist movement and in fact objectively serves the ends of imperialism.

To approach the question of national liberation not as a component of the world revolutionary process but in isolation from the socialist camp and the international working class movement is wholly alien to Marxism-Leninism.

It should perhaps be reiterated here that national liberation is not completed with the attainment of political independence. Hence the revolutionary and progressive forces in the newly liberated countries have got to be organized in a common united national democratic front for carrying out the unfinished tasks of the anti-imperialist and anti-feudal democratic revolution, for winning economic independence and for national rebirth.

The CPC leadership attacks socialist aid to underdeveloped countries especially to India on the plea that it helps imperialism. But the actual experience in our country speaks otherwise. Socialist aid helps in building an independent economy, thereby enabling our country to resist imperialist pressures.

What is particularly noteworthy in this connection is that such newly freed countries can advance along the non-capitalist path even without the existence of any sizeable industrial proletariat.

Significant socio-economic transformations which are in progress in Algeria, UAR, Ghana, Guinea, Mali deserve special attention. These newly-liberated countries are advancing not along the traditional capitalist path but more and more on non-capitalist lines, each however with its own peculiar features and its own correlation of class forces. In quite a few of such countries, the non-working-class democratic elements are playing a far more radical and revolutionary role than what was anticipated even a few years ago. Forces objectively working for the victory of Marxism-Leninism are emerging even outside the stream of the traditional Communist movement.

The working class and the international Communist movement are securing new and powerful allies, and the prospects of non-capitalist development and then of transition to the road to socialism are becoming brighter. Their success naturally depends on the development of a broader outlook and more flexible policies on the part of the Communist parties and democratic forces in building the broad united democratic front and fully exploiting the new opportunities.

Ours is the most advanced capitalist country among the newly independent nations. With the new possibilities mentioned above and basing ourselves on the Moscow Statement, our Program holds the view that the perspective of national democracy is valid for our country and that, given the proper fulfilment of the revolutionary tasks in the present stage of our revolution, national democracy may provide a peaceful transitional form for advance to the road to socialism.

This perspective arises primarily from the shift in the balance of world forces expressed in the socialist system becoming the decisive factor in the present stage of world development. Further the achievements of the socialist camp as well as the disinterested and exemplary help which it renders to the newly-independent countries including India are revolutionizing the minds of millions of people.

POSSIBILITIES

Serious limitations and crises of the capitalist path of development and all-round discrediting of this path, the existence of a powerful working class movement with old traditions, and its great possibilities, radicalization of the middle class elements profoundly influenced by the ideas of socialism, the growing contradiction and differentiation within the national bourgeoisie sharpened by the growth of monopoly—all these greatly augment the possibilities for putting our country on the non-capitalist path.

For us in India, the struggle for the non-capitalist path and national democracy is indeed the struggle for forging a broad national democratic front based on the firm worker-peasant alliance and on mass struggle against imperialist strongholds, semi-feudal relics in our economy and for breaking the power of the monopolies. It is through such struggles in both economic and political spheres that a major shift in the balance of class forces has to be brought about for the establishment of national democracy and change-over to the non-capitalist path of development.

On the question of the form of transition to socialism, the Seventh Congress of our Party fully endorses the understanding and approach of the Moscow Declaration and the Moscow Statement. The standpoint of our Party in this respect is in full conformity with the line of the world Communist movement.

The Declaration and the Statement point to both peaceful and non-peaceful possibilities but do not merely stop at that. They explain that in the present epoch with its great change in the correlation of world forces in favor of socialism, the possibilities for peaceful transition are growing. It is therefore incorrect to equate the twin possibilities.

However, in what form the transition will take place in this or that country depends upon a whole complex of objective and subjective factors, both external and internal—mainly internal. Communists should be ready for all possible twists and turns in the situation.

As far as our Party is concerned, it has long acknowledged the possibilities of peaceful transition and, indeed, has been working for strengthening these possibilities.

The key to utilization of the opportunities for peaceful transition, for transforming parliament into an instrument of people's will lies in the defense of the democratic rights and liberties under our present parliamentary system through mass struggles and in constant struggle for broadening and expanding democracy in all spheres of our socio-economic life.

TRANSITION

Peaceful transition does not mean abandonment of the class struggle or the militant mass revolutionary movement. On the contrary, peaceful transition is ensured by sharp class struggles based on the maximum possible unity and mobilization of the popular forces under the leadership of the working class and its Party.

The pre-Congress discussion within our Party has endorsed the understanding and approach of the National Council on this question, elaborated in the ideological document "For the Unity of the Party and the International Communist Movement."

Our Party is in complete disagreement with the one-sided dogmatic approach of the leadership of the CPC which ridicules the concept of peaceful transition as "historical idealism" and advocates the non-peaceful way as the only way for transition to socialism. The position of the CPC leadership on this question is an open repudiation of the Declaration and the Statement.

The Seventh Congress of the CPI reaffirms its full support to the struggle against the cult of personality and its harmful consequences initiated by the 20th Congress of the CPSU.

It was an act of courage on the part of the CPSU leadership to have boldly launched the struggle which not only unleashed a new mass initiative in the Soviet Union but which injected a new spirit into the entire international Communist movement. The Seventh Congress records its deep appreciation of the great strides that have been taken in the Soviet Union and the socialist countries in the restoration of socialist legality and Leninist norms.

The phenomenon of the personality cult was not limited to the Soviet Union alone. It developed in other socialist countries and had similar repercussions in Communist parties outside the socialist countries. The CPC leadership continues to glorify it even today.

Considering these developments, the Seventh Congress is of the opinion that a comprehensive examination of the various historical and personal factors that lead to the emergence of the cult is necessary not only for understanding the phenomenon fully but for a thorough and faster eradication of all its consequences.

The emergence of the personality cult can in no way negate the basic and historic superiority of socialist democracy over bourgeois parliamentary democracy. The dazzling advance of socialist industry, science and culture have already proved this in practice beyond doubt. The cult of personality however distorts and vitiates socialist democracy. The struggle against the cult is a struggle for a constant broadening and deepening of democracy in every sphere of socialist life, social, political and cultural. The question of speeding up the process, including helpful institutional changes, calls for consideration.

The unity of the countries of the socialist system is the most decisive force for guaranteeing success in the struggle for world peace, national independence, democracy and socialism. The strength of the socialist system arises from the unity of the socialist countries. It is precisely this unity which invests our present new epoch with tremendous revolutionary possibilities and creates new opportunities for the world revolutionary movement.

DIFFERENCES

In the recent period, the unity of the socialist community has been very seriously impaired. Bitter ideological polemics among the ruling parties in these countries have arisen and have been projected into the sphere of state relations. This has emboldened the imperialists who now set great store by the disunity among the countries of the socialist system and bank on the possibility of splits in the world socialist system, for the furtherance of their aggressive designs.

The dangerous outcome of the disunity of the socialist camp stands out in bold relief in the increasingly aggressive moves of the U.S. and other imperialist powers in Vietnam and other countries of South East Asia, Cyprus and Congo, as well as in the intensified drive of the U.S. and West German imperialists for the creation of a multilateral nuclear force.

The responsibility for the present state of disunity in the socialist camp rests on the leadership of the CPC. The CPC leadership has repudiated the common line of the Declaration and the Statement including, in particular, the guiding principles laid down in the Statement for developing cooperation between the socialist countries and for strengthening the great socialist community of nations.

The restoration of the unity of the countries of socialism, the common united actions by them in the struggle for peace and against imperialism and its aggressive moves, have assumed primary importance. The restoration of unity among the fraternal Communist and Workers' Parties and the peoples in the socialist countries is possible on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.

The objective possibilities do exist for overcoming these difficulties. For these it is, of course, necessary to work out concrete steps and policies, concentrating more on what unites them in common struggle rather than what divides them.

The Seventh Congress of our Party naturally welcomes the initiative which the CPSU and others have time and again taken for the cause of restoring the unity of the socialist camp and the world Communist movement. Unfortunately, these initiatives have been met with a negative response by the leadership of the CPC.

Certain questions pertaining to the international division of labor and planning among the socialist countries have lately come up. The mutual fraternal assistance and all-round cooperation on the basis of complete equality between the socialist countries in the interest of each socialist country and the socialist camp as a whole are essential for the victory of the cause of the international working class.

This objective is also accepted by all, but, in practice, difficulties have currently arisen in the actual implementation of this objective. Difficulties are, however, not insurmountable. Given the proper attention to socialist internationalism and socialist patriotism and firm adherence to the Marxist-Leninist doctrine, solutions to these problems can be found.

It is possible that the leadership of the ruling Communist Party of this or that socialist country may deviate from Marxism-Leninism and advocate and pursue certain wrong policies for a time. But a socialist country does not cease to be a socialist country merely because of such deviations or wrong policies.

Whether a country is socialist or not is to be determined by the fundamental fact as to which class is in power and who owns the means of production, distribution and exchange. Hence it is wrong to treat the People's Republic of China or Albania as anything but socialist states. Whatever the differences and however serious they may be, the question of excommunicating a socialist country whose leadership has deviated from the common line does not at all arise.

It is also necessary to emphasize that Yugoslavia is a socialist country since it is a socialist state by the same criteria and that it should be considered a member of the socialist community.

CORRECT LINE

It is, however, necessary on the part of the parties of other socialist countries and the world Communist movement as a whole to uphold the correct line of the movement and offer necessary criticisms. But such criticisms must be conducted in a fraternal spirit and must aim at helping those who have committed mistakes to rectify them. In this context, there is every need for forebearance, patience and flexibility in the interest of the unity of the socialist countries and the world Communist movement.

The strength of the world Communist movement lies in the unity and cohesion of its ranks, and indeed, unity of all Communists in each country. The pre-Congress discussions within our Party have been marked by the desire for unity of the international movement on the part of the mass om our Party members.

It is, however, to be realized that it is not enough merely to express sentiments for unity; the problem now is one of correctly understanding what makes for unity and of determining concrete steps for achieving this objective. The unity of the world Communist movement, as a whole, is secured, first and foremost, by the unity of the ideological platform, by identity of views on theoretical and practical questions of struggle against the common enemy.

Further, the cause of unity demands that all Communist parties submit to international discipline of the revolutionary proletariat. Observance of the principles of Marxism-Leninism, of proletarian internationalism and the carrying out by each Party of the international commitment accepted by it in relation to the movement as a whole, as laid down in the Moscow Statement, constitute the criteria of international discipline.

In approaching the question of unity of the world Communist movement, it has to be realized that it functions today under vastly altered circumstances.

RESPONSIBILITY

The conditions in which national Communist parties have to function and their vastly enhanced responsibilities demand full freedom for each national Party to work out its own policies in relation to its specific problems within the framework of an agreed international line and non-intervention by any Party in the internal affairs of other parties. The unity of the international Communist movement can now be based only on the full recognition of this reality, not only in theory but in practice.

Clearly, this calls for a great sense of responsibility on the part of the leadership of each Communist Party. If, in the exercise of its sovereignty, a Communist Party flies in the face of the commonly accepted international line, it is bound to result in the path of disruption and, necessarily, with the passage of time, the path of narrow nationalism and chauvinism. Such a path is totally alien to the most elementary principles and ideals of Marxism-Leninism. Unfortunately, such a problem does face us today for which the Chinese leadership, most of all, is responsible.

Normally, open polemics between Communist parties are to be avoided and solution of differences are to be sought in accordance with the principles and conclusions laid down in the Moscow Statement. But when a Communist Party or a group of parties openly repudiate the common line, violate international discipline and seek to impose their views on others, such open polemics may become inevitable for the defense of Marxism-Leninism and the line of the world Communist movement.

But polemics must be conducted in a sober, principled and fraternal way with a view to helping the rectification of mistakes, overcoming the differences and restoring the unity of the movement. Simultaneously, efforts must be made to develop common action on anti-imperialist and anti-colonial issues and on the issues of the struggle for peace, disarmament and so on.

The question of achieving unity is not confined to bringing back the Chinese leadership and its supporters into the common fold.

There are differences even among the Communist parties that solidly support the general line of the 81 Parties Statement. The primary method of overcoming them is, of course, biltateral and multi-lateral talks between the parties concerned. In this connection, meetings of representatives of the Communist parties that to deal with common problems have been suggested. Such bilateral and multilateral meetings will not only help solve these particular differences, but also contribute to the unity of the international Communist movement.

As far as the unity of the Communist Party and Communists of a given country is concerned, this cannot be ensured and maintained unless all the Party members submit to the fundamental principles of Communist organization and, particularly, the principle of democratic centralism based on full internal Party democracy.

Ideological and political differences within a Communist Party, however serious they may be, must not be allowed to lead to a split. Solutions to differences must be sought within the Party itself and in conformity with Leninist organizational principles of the Party.

OBSTACLE

Life itself has demonstrated that the main obstacle hindering the further advance of the world Communist movement is dogmatism and Left-sectarianism, while the danger from revisionism also remains. The overcoming of dogmatism is only possible through the use of the scientific method of Marxism-Leninism to boldly analyze the new reality that constantly emerges and to develop the theory of scientific socialism.

In view of the present unfortunate attitude of the leadership of the CPC, our Party has no illusion that the differences within the international Communist movement are going to be easily overcome. However, the Seventh Congress is confident that fundamental loyalty to the principles of Marxism-Leninism, to proletarian internationalism, will ultimately prevail and the leadership of the CPC and others who have broken away from the common line will rectify their mistakes and return to the common positions of the movement.

The Seventh Party Congress naturally shares the view that the open polemics for which the leadership of the CPC is responsible must be ended in the interests of the unity of the world Communist movement and appreciates the efforts made by the CPSU in that direction.

The Seventh Congress of the CPI endorses the proposal for holding the world conference of all Communist and Workers' parties and it expresses its most earnest hope that such a conference, with the goodwill and cooperation of all fraternal parties, will succeed in restoring the unity of the world Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationailsm.

PLANS FOR A 'BROAD-BASED' GOVERNMENT

JOINT STATEMENT BY THE COMMUNIST PARTY AND THE LEFT REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENT OF VENEZUELA

After the electoral farce of December 1, 1963, the Communist Party and the Left Revolutionary Movement (LRM) of Venezuela declared that the Leoni government would be unable to end the the political crisis and would, in effect, continue the policy of capitulation and repression that marked the five years of Betancourt's rule.

The government is flirting with U.S. magnates, the national big bourgeoisie and the reactionary generals, while doing nothing to check the growing cost of living, end unemployment and resolve other serious problems facing the country.

The past months have revealed the failure of Betancourt's agrarian reform and the demagogic, fraudulent character of "industrialization." They have shown that foreign loans are used to balance the budget and finance demagogical projects, while nothing is done to promote independent economic development of the nation.

It has become clear that the government will go on with its reactionary onslaught on the universities—on their autonomy and on their role as centers for free discussion allowing no restrictions or privileges; that the policy of division and repression will be continued in the field of education at all levels; that democratic-minded lecturers will be victimized as before, whatever their past services; that the colleges will remain closed to patriots.

The Leoni government is stepping up persecution, although the number of armed clashes has dropped due to the unilateral termination of hostilities by the revolutionary forces. It continues searches, arrests, tortures and executions (as in the Miranda State), and massive offensives against the peasants in the guerrilla-controlled regions, especially in the states of Falcon, Lara and Miranda.

When the Leoni government was formed most parties and national movements proposed seeking solutions to pressing problems and above all taking measures to establish peace in the country. Urging "political and not police measures," Usiar Pietri declared that there should be "no more persecuted or persecutors." Jovito Villalba insisted on "restoring democratic legality." The election campaign centred on the issues of granting more extensive democratic rights and an amnesty, and of legalizing the LRM and CPV. Vice-Admiral Larrazàbal, the People's Democratic Force party, the People's Nationalist Vanguard, the Revolutionary Nationalist Party and the National Opposition Front want an amnesty, the legalization of parties, and an end to persecution as radical measures to resolve the political crisis.

There are people even in the Democratic Action Party, who, sobered by the gravity of the situation and the loss of hundreds of thousands of votes, have adopted a realistic stand and expressed concern over the continuation of Betancourt's policy of repression and other anti-popular measures.

This aggressive and terroristic policy has been openly supported only by an insignificant minority — the Copei (Social-Christian) Party and the pro-Betancourt group of Democratic Action. They have been using high-ranking reactionary officers, the presence of Gonzola Barrios in the Ministry of the Interior, and the control they exercise over the repressive organs, to impose their will on other pro-government groups. The result is increased repressions.

The National Liberation Front, the LRM and the CPV have stated more than once that they were no worshippers of violence and that if they had an opportunity to fight by peaceful means they would use it actively. Indeed, to ensure that our people's revolutionary demands were met with minimum sacrifice, they respected, as far as the government's repressive policy allowed, the truce they had unilaterally offered. We did all we could to secure the amnesty of the thousands of political prisoners held unlawfully. What was the government's reply? It is known to all and we have repeatedly exposed it: fierce repressions, the systematic persecution of revolutionaries, and complete disregard for the demands for an amnesty. Moreover, Betancourt's backers campaigned against amnesty, misrepresenting the position of the revolutionary forces. The ruling party and the government itself followed suit.

A war is on against the peasants, aimed at encircling and destroying the guerrillas, who attempt no operations other than those intended to beat off attacks by the government troops. Aircraft, guns, mortars, helicopters and other modern weapons, used at El Bachiller some time ago, are now being employed against the peasants and guerrillas of Falcon and Lara.

Such is the situation in which maneuvers have been undertaken to establish a "broad-based" government. Surprisingly, those who have been holding forth on the need to end the division of Venezuelans into "persecuted and persecutors" agree, without protest or explanation, to form a government with those who are fighting the people. The argument that they want to maintain law and order is designed, in our opinion, to camouflage their desire to consolidate the anti-national tyranny ruling our country today.

We have never deluded ourselves or anyone else as to the real purpose of a "broad-based" government. This government should not be judged by the program it has announced. Its program is too general and non-committal and is, moreover, supported by the very same political forces which today keep silent about the more specific programs they advanced in the recent elections.

We should judge the authors of the "broad basis" program by their deeds and class positions. The Democratic Action group, being in the government, acted in the interests of the big U.S. monopolies and the national moneybags connected with them. The Democratic National Front is joining the government by virtue of its links with these economic groups. The Republican Democratic Union is out to prove its ability to serve the ruling classes as faithfully as Democratic Action does. Such government, if formed, would bring about no changes. In fact, its purpose is to consolidate what exists already. A "broad-based" government would try to solve the problem of concessions in favor of the oil companies, come to terms with the reactionary brass-hats, gain a majority in parliament, and "settle" the problem of violence by suppressing revolutionaries and denying them the right to fight for their ideals.

Our parties have been striving sincerely to achieve peace in the country. But we shall never renounce our revolutionary aims. We are ready to do all in our power to pave the way for Venezuela's advance to revolution without civil war. But we are resolved not to buy peace at the price of submission of the revolutionary forces, the continued humiliation and oppression of our country by foreigners, a backward agriculture, and mass starvation. We are confident that all other revolutionary, democratic and nationalist forces, including patriotic-minded army officers, will also refuse to pay this price.

If "to end the division into persecuted and persecutors" means physically destroying the former, we say to the advocates of a "broad basis" that it is a hopeless job. There are many of us, the "persecuted," and we can draw on the inexhaustible solidarity of the people. We are not bragging when we say that our parties have become steeled in battles and that the people's vanguard in the National Liberation Front and the Armed Forces of National Liberation have the high morale of patriots and revolutionaries. We are fighting for a just cause, and we enjoy the growing solidarity of our people. We are invincible. If persecution is stepped up —as it already is — it will be the one-party government that will have to answer for it and not we, the revolutionaries, who have made a fair effort to achieve peace. It is this govenrment that is persecuting the popular movement, with help from those who offer their services in setting up a "broad-based" government.

Unless persecution is immediately stopped, the new government will come into being in an atmosphere of persecution and violence. It will be rejected by the vast majority of the people, who demand peace and equality for all. We stress the great responsibility that rests with Jovito Villalba, Arturo Usiar Pietri and their parties for allowing a fierce government offensive even as attempts are under way to form a new government, which will lead to unrestrained violence.

We call upon all supporters of democratic peace to unite in order to stop persecution and offer the country another alternative. We call upon all who advocate full civil rights, the legalization of parties and the reinstatement of democratic-minded officers; all who are fighting for the release of prisoners and for an amnesty; all who are ready to fight against unemployment and the high cost of living, for higher wages and for changes that would make it possible to effect an agrarian reform in the interests of our peasants and our agriculture; all who want real freedom for our country to sell its oil — we call upon all of them to take the road proposed by us, a road leading to peace and the solution of the problems facing the country.

We urge the people, all democratic and revolutionary forces, to fight for a new alternative, to prove, in common with other progressive groups, the possibility of forming a government that would open the way to democratic and patriotic rule, rid the country of foreign domination, carry out an agrarian reform, establish democratic peace, bring freedom to all Venezuelans, and pursue an independent foreign policy.

AN IDEOLOGICAL OFFENSIVE OF MARXISM IS INDISPENSABLE FOR OUR SOCIALIST CONSTRUCTION*

Present-day reality, the socialist development of our society, calls for urgent measures to improve our ideological work. An ideological offensive of Marxism is indispensable for our socialist construction. Without it we can neither safeguard our achievements nor go on with socialist construction.

Last September the Agitation and Propaganda Committee under the Central Committee of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party held a conference of key ideological workers. In response to a written report and introductory remarks by Comrade Isvan Szirmai, Secretary of the CC, HSWP, the conference discussed the state of ideological work and the tasks involved, as well as the progress made in carrying out the relevant decision of the Eighth Party Congress. The free exchange of views covered various aspects of the Party's manifold ideological activities, the conference seeking for specific ways of launching an ideological offensive.

Below we comment briefly on certain important questions of ideological work that were prominent in the conference debate.

The ideological activity of the Party is not an end in itself but a part of the fight which the Communists are carrying on on many fronts to attain society's chief goal, the victory of socialism and communism. It was logical, therefore, that the report, which provided the basis for the debate, and most of the speeches delivered at the national conference examined ideological problems with due regard to the economic, socio-political and cultural situation and the requirements of the present stage of socialist construction. This is the only point of departure if we want to discuss ideological issues in the creative spirit of Marxism and determine the main direction of ideological work and our tasks in it.

Socialist construction in our country is not an isolated development but a component of the world revolutionary process, which consists in a worldwide struggle between socialism and capitalism. The conference therefore paid considerable attention to the international conditions in which our country's socialist construction, and hence the Party's ideological work, is taking place.

PEACEFUL COEXISTENCE AND THE IDEOLOGICAL STRUGGLE

In the worldwide struggle between socialism and capitalism, the Communist parties base their strategy on the conviction that today peace and peaceful coexistence, and the prevention of a new world war are more essential than ever to social progress and the common interests of mankind. But peaceful coexistence does not imply discontinuance of the struggle between socialism and capitalism, or approval of the economic, political and ideological status quo. It is an international class struggle focussed on economic competition and the ideological battle between the two world systems.

Peaceful coexistence provides favorable conditions for the spread of socialist ideas. The expansion of economic, diplomatic, scientific and cultural relations between socialist and capitalist countries and comparison of the two world systems make the adherents of socialism more confident of their cause and contribute to the growth of their numbers. Most Hungarian citizens who visit capitalist countries come back fortified in their socialist patriotism and determined to champion socialism more staunchly than ever. Our socialist achievements arouse the interest of people from capitalist countries who familiarize themselves with our life. The appeal of socialist ideas is stronger and more widespread today than ever before. But it would be naive to imagine that the growing appeal of socialism is sufficient in itself and that we can win the ideological battle without vigorously and continuously promoting our ideas.

We must not underestimate the enemy in the ideological struggle. It is true that, historically, our ideas are far and away superior to bourgeois ideas, for ours is a just ideology while bourgeois ideology, increasingly helpless in face of the growing contradictions of modern capitalism, is sinking deeper and deeper into the morass of crisis. This is not to say, however, that bourgeois ideology today has no chances of checking the spread of the ideas of scientific socialism or, given the opportunity, of launching a counter-offensive. Just as the general crisis of capitalism must not be seen as evidence that capitalism is no longer capable of substantial economic, technical and social achievement, so it would be wrong to contend that bourgeois ideology is absolutely powerless and harmless. Modern bourgeois ideology is trying to devise more subtle forms of apology for capitalism, and it is not entirely unsuccessful. It even manages to mislead those who are unimpressed by the old-fashioned advocacy of capitalism.

The imperialists refuse even today to give up attempts at overthrowing socialism and restoring capitalism in the socialist countries. But the changed balance of forces compels them to revise their former tactics of trying to achieve their aims through undisguised threats, the so-called "liberation" program, and economic blockade. In the new international situation, in view of the grave risk of a worldwide conflict and the failure of the policy of bans, they want to achieve their aim not through forcible "liberation," but by "inciting to rebellion," above all through political and ideological infiltration. Their plans assign ideological sabotage a special role. A West German journal, describing the nature of these tactics, commented that the "West" must smuggle its ideas into the public life of communist countries by subtler methods, using every medium of modern propaganda.

Those who apply these tactics to the socialist countries believe that the growing economic, political and cultural relations between the countries in the two world systems and increased personal contacts will help them carry out their plans. Our country and other socialist countries accept the challenge, for we have nothing to fear from an ideological competition between the two systems. It is a contest which socialism is bound to win. But because we are willing to accept peaceful coexistence and its practical effects, we must carefully prepare for the ideological struggle in every field, answer the questions posed by our time in the spirit of creative Marxism, foil the ideological sabotage of imperialism and launch an ideological offensive.

MARXIST-LENINIST PLATFORM OF WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT AND THE POLICY OF THE PARTY

The development and present state of the world Communist movement are an important factor in the ideological struggle. The 20th Congress of the CPSU ushered in a new era in the development of the Communist movement as a whole. The world Communist movement, which has rejected the theory and practice of the personality cult and which proceeds from the changed historical reality as it fights on two fronts, has set forth its new strategy in the Moscow documents of 1957 and 1960. The overwhelming majority of the Communist parties abide by this strategy in fighting for peace, the freedom of the peoples, and social progress.

Our prime duty is also to defend the collectively formulated Marxist-Leninist platform of the world Communist movement in the debate which has divided the world Communist movement. It is our aim to elucidate from the ideological point of view the questions raised in the course of this debate, to test our views in practice and carry them forward. We must defeat the offensive against the unity of the world Communist movement and restore that unity which is the fundamental condition for further progress in the anti-imperialist struggle.

It is a most important guarantee of the success of the Communist movement, and of the re-establishment and promotion of its unity, that most Communist parties remain staunchly loyal to the principles approved by the Moscow meetings of 1957 and 1960. Special credit is due to the Communist Party of the Soviet Union for the historic fact that its 20th Congress took the initiative in formulating today's Leninist line of the world Communist movement and that the CPSU is now leading in the pursuit of that line. With unflagging enthusiasm, the CPSU is championing peaceful coexistence and the unity of the international working-class movement as it presses forward its communist construction.

The Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party educates its membership in the spirit of proletarian internationalism. In the ideological fields as well, it consistently applies the principles collectively formulated and approved at the Moscow meetings. The Hungarian Communists wholeheartedly support these principles, which also meet the interests of the Hungarian people and are proved correct by our own experience. But the debate in the world Communist movement is having some repercussions in our midst. In the circumstances, some people are trying to justify their sectarian or Right-wing views. It is therefore our internationalist duty to expose and reject the pseudo-revolutionary, petty-bourgeois nationalist trend which opposes the Marxist-Leninist platform of the world Communist movement. Moreover this is essential in order to defend the policy of our Party.

The policy of our Party was determined by the decisions of the Seventh and Eighth congresses. Our Party continues to work in the spirit of those decisions. During the past years the people have satisfied themselves that the Party is pursuing the right policy, and on the whole they support it actively. But we must never relax our effort to ensure that this policy is appreciated and consistently implemented. The tasks facing us are vast and complicated. Our work still encounters hurdles, and many political questions are not dealt with competently enough. Nor has the danger of various distortions been entirely eliminated. Our Party is vigorously combating sectarian dogmatism and Right-wing revisionism. The Hungarian Communist Party has come to know both dogmatism and revisionism in practice and has rejected them on the basis of its experience. But there still are cases of the implementation of the Party's policy coming up against the survivals of sectarianism and dogmatism, and revisionism is still a real menace, especially in our spiritual life. This is why we must go on fighting on two fronts to defend the policy of our Party and consistently translate it into reality.

The Eighth Congress of the HSWP, making a Marxist analysis of the progress made, charted the road to the completion of socialist construction in our country. Creative labor in the economic and cultural fields, the promotion of socialist democracy, and the establishment of socialist national unity are the cardinal tasks set by the Congress. This is what our Party has to strive for in its ideological work. We must substantiate the policy of the Party from the Marxist point of view, and must be at one in interpreting it, in order to achieve ideological unity, which is a requisite for unity of action. We must see to it that the people understand and accept the policy of the Party. We must rally and consolidate the forces of our society to put the Marxist program for the completion of socialist construction into effect.

LOYALTY TO MARXISM AND ITS CREATIVE APPLICATION

The objective conditions of our society are favorable to the ideological struggle to spread Marxism. Progress in socialist construction has reaffirmed and strengthened Marxism, and hence the theoretical basis of the activities of the Party. It has been proved that Marxism alone makes it possible to solve, theoretically, the major problems facing Hungarian society.

After 1956 the Party, creatively applying Marxism-Leninism, solved the problems which had arisen during the fight against the counter-revolution and in the period of socialist consolidation, when it took steps to develop socialist industry and reorganize agriculture on socialist lines. To complete socialist construction, we must solve new problems, which can be done only by creatively applying Marxist theory. The victory of socialism will not be complete until we substantially increase labor productivity. With this aim in view, we must continue to improve our socialist economic planning, and the forms and methods of economic management. The establishment of socialist national unity—a task set by the Eighth Congress—is a complicated process. As we creatively apply Marxism, we can and must reveal the elements of this process and thoroughly analyze the changes that have occurred in the class structure of our society and in the position of the various classes. The promotion of socialist democracy is the key issue of our social development. It is an important theoretical as well as practical task to study the economic, socio-political, moral and philosophical conditions for the further development of socialist democracy. Many new questions crop up in the course of the continuing socialist cultural revolution, scientific progress and the all-round development of the arts and letters.

Neither the classics of Marxism nor contemporary Marxist works can provide ready-made solutions to all new problems. But Marxism-Leninism is the theoretical and methodological basis, the only truly scientific basis, on which new problems can be solved. For it reveals the law-governed nature of the development of society, elucidates the cardinal laws of the socialist revolution and theoretically generalizes the experience gained by the world working-class movement.

Like any other measure adopted by the Party, the ideological conference inspired those active on the ideological front to continue their effort in the creative spirit of Marxism, study reality and seek solutions to new problems. Numerous signs, including achievements to date in social science research, discussions of urgent issues and, last but not least, the attention which the conference devoted to the Marxist investigation of new problems show that ideological workers are eager to approach their tasks in a creative spirit. Our system, and the policy of our Party, provides ample opportunity for creative work on problems of Marxist theory aimed at achieving further progress. It stands to reason, however, that creative effort in this field is difficult and is often attended by contradictions.

We must always combat the conservative point of view which alleges that the Marxist doctrine cannot be carried any further, for this view paralyzes ideological activity. Furthermore, in tackling theoretical issues, theoreticians often have to combat their own timidity and hidebound thinking. Research into new problems does not always lead to the best solutions; moreover, it does not provide them at once. As the problems in question are complicated, several different opinions may be advanced on this or that point. It is not always possible to tell at once which of them is correct. More often than not, it is necessary to compare the various solutions to them, in order to find Marxist answers, reject the false solutions and carry forward the correct ones. No science can make headway without such discussions, and Marxism is a developing science. We therefore welcome any discussion aimed at finding the right solutions to new problems.

We must not forget, however, that work on new problems cannot result in new achievements and solutions furthering scientific progress and socialist practice unless it is carried on in keeping with Marxist theory and by Marxist methods. The conference report and debate called attention to certain negative trends in this respect.

One of the dangers is a relativist approach to Marxism. Those who dispute the lasting validity of the theoretical content of Marxism are disarming themselves, among other things, with regard to Marxist research into new problems. Marxism is not a collection of dogmas and does not contain ready-made solutions to every new problem. But neither is it a stockpile of obsolete views from which one can at best borrow the method. The content of Marxism is not ephemeral. Indeed, it is being continuously renewed. It has withstood the test of history and has been proved correct by practice. It furnishes answers to the cardinal questions of our time as well. We must base our effort on the durable content of Marxism and enrich it through further research as we creatively apply Marxism and carry it forward.

Attempts to renounce the fundamental tenets of Marxism or ignore the unity of Marxist theory and practice in tackling new problems—attempts which we occasionally witness—inevitably lead into a blind alley. They give rise to fruitless discussions. Instead of thoroughly analyzing interconnections, people confine themselves to a superficial and one-sided appraisal of events. They create a semblance of new theoretical discoveries while in fact refurbishing hopelessly outdated views justly rejected by history and Marxism.

Liberalism toward bourgeois and petty-bourgeois concepts is another danger. It is a good thing that our ideological life is characterized by constructive discussions, but, unfortunately, these discussions do not always distinguish between correct, scientific, Marxist views, on the one hand, and incorrect, bourgeois or petty-bourgeois views, on the other. Our journals even publish an occasional article advocating scientifically unsound or downright anti-Marxist views. What makes it worse is that these articles are often not even criticized, let alone refuted.

In carrying on our ideological work, we must never forget that the influence of bourgeois ideology still affects our society. The strongest is the influence of those trends in modern bourgeois ideology which do not attack Marxism directly but try to reconcile Marxism and bourgeois ideology. One of these trends, which influences our estimation of the economic, sociological, political and other problems of social development, is the concept of a "single industrial society."

Referring to progress in science and technology, it discounts the distinctions between the social systems of capitalism and socialism. The influence of the existentialist perception of man also makes itself felt—in the form of an abstract, unhistorical approach to ethical issues, abstract moralizing, misrepresentation of the conflict between power and morality, and opposing the individual to a society alien to him. Philosophical problems are often examined from the standpoint of neo-positivism, which advocates "neutrality" in world outlook.

Such trends are in many respects concerned with real problems of our development, but the approach to the various problems, and still more the manner in which they are solved, generally betrays elements of bourgeois ideology.

The only way in which we can defeat and eliminate this influence is to solve, in the spirit of creative Marxism, the problems posed by reality. Criticism of the wrong approach of bourgeois ideology should be a component of Marxist theoretical research and of the method used in solving new problems which arise in the course of our socialist development.

ECONOMICS AND IDEOLOGY

The importance of the socialist consciousness of the working people for the accomplishment of the tasks facing us has vastly increased at the present stage of our socialist development. Laying the foundations for socialism, the complete victory of socialist relations of production in every economic branch, the socialist reorganization of the class structure of society, the changes which have come about in the position of the various working classes, and progress in the socialist cultural revolution—all help to make our society socialist-minded and to further socialist progress in the social and economic spheres. The experience of the socialist countries shows, however, that the new, socialist life does not mould a socialist consciousness automatically or spontaneously. We must wage an ideological struggle and steadily promote socialist education if we want the people's consciousness fully to reflect their changed social being and to be freed from the survivals of bourgeois or petty-bourgeois ideology.

This is why the Eighth Congress stated that the Party's paramount ideological task is to "teach people to live, work and think in the socialist way." It follows that ideological work should involve millions of working people—workers, peasants and intellectuals.

The conference stressed the close connection between economic development and ideological work. This connection has two aspects.

On the one hand, the state and progress of economic activity, and shortcomings in it, affect the growth of political consciousness. This means that we must also take account of the ideological impact of every economic measure, support ideological education with a corresponding economic policy, and create the main economic, technical and organizational conditions for conscious socialist labor. Sound economic progress and improvements in the standard of living resulting from it provide what is on the whole a solid basis for the formation of socialist consciousness. However, speakers at at the conference cited numerous examples of ill-advised economic measures, drawbacks in labor organization, and bureaucratic excesses in economic management injuring the economy, hampering ideological education and producing an adverse effect on the people.

The ideological offensive has to be prepared, and this calls for well-considered economic, organizational and other measures to ensure that economic activity truly helps to mould socialist consciousness.

On the other hand, the active role which factors like consciousness, morality and world outlook play in the fulfilment of economic tasks is an increasingly important aspect of the interconnection of economic progress and ideological work. For that matter, economic activity itself should be inspired by socialist ideology. In completing socialist construction, we cannot fulfil our economic talks without encouraging a socialist attitude to labor, maintaining socialist discipline and consulting the working people. We must carry on day-by-day ideological work to help the people appreciate the tasks assigned them and see the interconnection of these tasks in terms of the factory and industry concerned, of the national economy and the class struggle. The ideological conference came to the unanimous conclusion that there still are immense unused opportunities in this sphere.

Logically enough, the conference gave a good deal of attention to the issue of a socialist attitude to labor, public respect for labor and, as a concomitant, labor discipline. It would be wrong to go from one extreme to the other in appraising the present situation. But if we want to make progress and accomplish the increasingly important tasks facing us we must frankly disclose the incorrect attitudes to labor that often manifest themselves and concentrate on rectifying them. Speakers at the conference pointed to the wasteful use of working time, bad work and loafing. On the other hand, to ignore our achievements in this field would mean taking a biassed and pessimistic view. After all, our country's economic progress is due first and foremost to the good performance of our working people. Since liberation the Hungarian working class has repeatedly set an example of devoted labor in the production sphere as well. The rapid consolidation and sound economic development of most producers' cooperatives shows that the cooperative peasants, for their part, work conscientiously.

We must remember that there still exist great distinctions between different sections of working people as regards socialist consciousness and the attitude to labor. Some work conscientiously, and are prepared to make sacrifices when necessary. Others, while fulfilling their duties honestly, are willing to consider the interest of society only insofar as it can benefit their own immediate interests. They have but a vague notion of the connection between personal and public interests, and therefore do not feel bound by anything that goes beyond their direct duties. Still others—they are few but their influence is most harmful—shirk their duties, lack discipline, and live at the expense of the community. We must condemn and firmly oppose these parasitic elements. As for the overwhelming majority of the working people, we must draw on the opportunities we have to help them foster their socialist consciousness.

In shaping a socialist attitude to labor, it is important to use material and moral incentives in the right ratio. There was a time when both the economic development of our country and the growth of our people's socialist consciousness were handicapped above all else by a scornful attitude to economic inducements. As a result moral inducements also failed and appeals to people's political consciousness often had the opposite effect. The Party has ended this one-sided approach — it now attaches great importance to material incentives.

However, moral incentives have lately been neglected. Besides, the system of material encouragement does not always yield satisfactory results. The conference came to the conclusion that we must accomplish a double task. On the one hand, we must promote and improve the system of material encouragement so that it can prompt people to work efficiently and contribute more than ever toward reaching economic targets. On the other hand, we must increase the role of socialist ideas and moral principles. We should do more to foster public respect for those who work well, and must combat individualistic views.

SOCIALIST DEMOCRACY AND SOCIALIST CONSCIOUSNESS

Active contribution to the victory of socialism and the experience gained in the process are particularly important in moulding the social consciousness of the people. The conference therefore paid special attention to these factors.

The issue of democracy and freedom of the individual holds a prominent place in the struggle between bourgeois and socialist ideology. Bourgeois ideology is trying to impose its idea of democracy on the socialist countries, which it accuses of having set up totalitarian regimes denying the people democratic rights and personal freedom.

We counter the bourgeois interpretation of democracy and freedom of the individual with socialist democracy, which is superior to bourgeois democracy in every respect. The bourgeois concept of democracy declares democratic rights and freedom of the individual to be independent of the freedom of society and the community, and often to the detriment of the collective interest. As for the socialist concept, it considers that freedom of the individual is invariably a part, or element, of the freedom won by the community, of the effort of a society which knows how to use and apply natural and social laws. We regard it as the fundamental principle of socialist democracy that freedom of the individual must not run counter to the interests of society and the community.

The personality cult and the violations of legality attending it are foreign to the socialist socio-political system. Nevertheless, they tarnished socialist democracy in the eyes of many. Yet the personality cult was exposed by Communists—the socialist system logically rejected it as a harmful practice. The extension of socialist democracy, its steady development in our country, the re-establishment of the Leninist standards of Party life, all the activities of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party and the methods used by it are an earnest that the personality cult will never recur. In our country we have socialist legality and complete equality of rights under the control of society. The socio-economic conditions are such that no one is discriminated against, everyone is guaranteed freedom of creative endeavor, and scientists and artists have ample opportunities for experiment.

All this is not to say, however, that we may sit back, fully satisfied with the present state of socialist democracy in our country. We cannot foster the people's socialist consciousness unless we foster and perfect socialist democracy. This is true not only because the exercise of democracy is the basis and condition for enhancing socialist consciousness, but because socialist consciousness and collectivism are active components of effective democracy. Hence it is also important to distinguish between socialist democracy and liberalism, which substitutes individualism for collectivism, indifference for a high sense of responsibility, anarchy for conscious discipline. Our task is to promote active democracy and encourage the people's participation in the leadership of society and the management of public affairs, while doing away with liberalism, which manifests here and there.

Our social and political system and the vast network of voluntary associations afford the people every opportunity of taking an active part in public life. But these opportunities are often not properly utilized. To illustrate this, speakers at the conference cited the system of industrial democracy. The trade unions, factory councils and production conferences should serve as important vehicles of socialist democracy promoting socialist consciousness. But these forums often operate perfunctorily. Speakers pointed out that apart from such reasons as the reluctance of some business executives to inconvenience themselves, elements of a bureaucratic approach to economic management, and so on, the main reason for this is that economic and ideological activities are not coordinated.

To promote socialist democracy, we must organize, more effectively than ever, the people's participation in public life, make better use of available opportunities, call a halt to formalism in this field as well, and look for further opportunities of heightening the people's activity in public life.

THE STRUGGLE AGAINST NATIONALISM

Moulding the people's socialist consciousness is a struggle against the survivals of bourgeois and petty-bourgeois ideology, above all those of bourgeois ideas and trends which influence large sections of the people.

Nationalism is the chief element of bourgeois and petty-bourgeois trends which, more than anything else, hamper and imperil the spread of Marxism. The imperialists hope that nationalism will enable them to undermine the unity of the world Communist movement and the commonwealth of socialist countries. Nationalism runs through the tendency to disrupt our unity from a "Left" —or Right-wing standpoint, a tendency manifesting itself in the world Communist movement. In our country as well, it provides fertile soil for many remnants of bourgeois ideology. This is why the relevant decision of the Eighth Congress says that "the chief task in the struggle against bourgeois and petty-bourgeois ideology in our country is to eliminate the survivals of nationalism." For the same reason, the fight against nationalism received careful attention at the ideological conference.

This fight is primarily a practical fight. The socialist changes effected in our country were a decisive step toward removing the social roots of nationalism. But they did not eliminate the danger and objective possibility of nationalism. Socialist construction is taking place within national bounds and will continue to do so for a long time to come. The socialist countries have specific national interests in addition to their common vital interests. When they began to build a socialist society they had different economic, political and cultural legacies. Their economic cooperation, and measures to improve it, confront them with tasks unprecedented in history. Therefore, some are apt to put national form before the common socialist content. They may pose national interests against the international interests of social progress, exaggerating the national peculiarities of their countries and treating them as something absolute. This possibility becomes a real danger due to national distrust and prejudice, a grim heritage of the past.

Increasing economic cooperation between socialist countries, the gradual evening up of their levels, and the methodical coordination of common, international interests and specific national interests, that is, the final abolition of the social basis of nationalism, should be accompanied by a conscious ideological struggle against nationalism, by a consistent internationalist policy, and the education of the working people in an internationalist spirit.

Nationalist views in the past struck deep root in the minds of people, pervading their thinking and their sentiments, and often intertwining with sincere patriotism. This is why the fight against nationalism is an exceedingly complicated and delicate task. We are not fighting nationalism from the position of national nihilism. We must not allow reactionary nationalism to exploit the people's national feelings, desire for national freedom, and national pride, for its own ends. The socialist countries have every opportunity of ensuring that these sentiments grow into socialist patriotism merging with internationalism.

National nihilism is as alien to socialist ideology as nationalism. Our socialist patriotism is based on the conviction that socialist construction in our country is the only policy truly fostering the progress of the nation. We can pursue this policy only as a member of the fraternal community of socialist countries and with the powerful support of working people the world over. We therefore regard socialist patriotism and socialist internationalism as inseparable.

ATHEISTIC EDUCATION

Religion continues to exert a certain influence on the masses. Atheistic education should therefore play an important part in the ideological struggle. We Communists have never seen the struggle against religion as the main issue of the class struggle. Within the framework of socialist national unity, Communist and non-Communist atheists alike work shoulder to shoulder with religious people, and we want this cooperation in labor and politics to grow, not to diminish. This makes it our duty to subordinate the fight against religion to the main issues of the class struggle, and to seek media of atheistic education that will not handicap this cooperation but will help to free religious people from the influence of religion.

However, there has lately been a certain confusion on these points in some Party organizations. This is because those who take a primitive view of the struggle against religion misinterpret the normalization of relations between state and Church, certain changes in the attitude of the Vatican and the recent concordat between our state and the Vatican. The normal relations between state and Church which have led to some degree of cooperation in many walks of public life do not imply that the ideological struggle between the scientific, materialist world outlook and religious ideas is over. For the Church makes no secret of its desire to take advantage of political cooperation and strengthen its ideological positions.

The ideological conference, therefore, stressed that religion remains a regressive world outlook and that the ideological fight against religion is still an urgent task. It pointed out, however, that in combating religions we must show proper tact, have a thorough knowledge of the situation, use the means of atheistic education discriminately, and above all promote the scientific, materialist world outlook.

In our anti-religious work, we must remember that religion has roots in the people's private lives and that these cannot be removed unless society finds a way of drawing people into the socialist community, into socialist construction and public activity. It is only by combining such extensive public effort and specific atheistic propaganda that we can make our struggle against religion effective and ensure that atheistic education reaches religious people, instead of being addressed to non-believers, as is often the case.

PARTY LEADERSHIP OF THE IDEOLOGICAL STRUGGLE

The spheres in which socialist consciousness is shaped, and the means by which this is brought about, are varied. Each has possibilities of its own and performs specific functions in the ideological struggle and all of them are therefore indispensable. Science plays an important part in ideological work, in the theoretical substantiation of the policy of the Party. Arts and letters, in their turn, have great influence over large sections of the population. The school is a most important instrument for the education of youth. Public education involves vast numbers of people. The press, radio and television are the most powerful media for shaping public opinion. Now that the ideological struggle has become one of the decisive fronts of the class struggle, it is highly important that the different forms of ideological work should be coordinated to serve the objective set by the Party. The complex process of forming socialist consciousness, and the ideological content of this process concern the Party most of all. It is the duty of the Party to do everything to keep this work on the right track, control its every form from the ideological and political points of view, influence them in decisive measure, take a definite stand on every fundamental political problem coming up for solution, and resolutely oppose all anti-Marxist and anti-socialist trends. The Party must organize, guide and control the Communists' ideological activities. To step up our ideological struggle, we must critically and self-critically analyze the situation in every sphere and ascertain whether we are making adequate use of available opportunities to fully implement the Party line and what else we must do to make our ideological activities more effective.

The conference itself constituted an important means of Party guidance of ideological work. Naturally, it could not discuss all the specific problems in equal measure or sufficient detail. Indeed, it set itself no such task. It examined the overall state of ideological work, above all the fundamental problems and tasks in each sector of the ideological front. The special problems of this or that important sector (such as literature or art) were less prominent in the conference debate. Nevertheless, the fruitful exchange of ideas on the state and tasks of ideological work and on the formation of socialist consciousness, which took place at the conference and whose conclusions are valid for every field of ideological work, is still going on. This is an important fact enabling Communists in every sector to prepare more effectively for the ideological struggle.

Ideological leadership connotes frank discussion of various shortcomings and public criticism of mistakes. The conference report and debate did both. There was legitimate criticism of the educational work in schools, the planning and coordination of scientific research, ideologically erroneous literary productions and works of art, the press, radio and television, and the work of Party and government bodies in charge of ideological matters. It was entirely constructive criticism, not aimed at individuals but intended to rectify errors.

We must re-emphasize the importance of Marxist criticism because some people do not realize its necessity or else misunderstand it. For instance, some writers and art workers take offense at criticism offered by Party or government bodies or by literary or art critics. Yet they themselves freely state their views, often erroneous ones. We must also dispel the false notion that fair criticism and public discussions result in coercive measures. Our policy on culture over many years shows that nothing of the kind happens.

Our Party has repeatedly declared—as was pointed out at the conference—that it considered the important thing in its guidance of cultural activity to be ideological and political influence, and did not propose to dictate artistic styles or interfere in the discussion of professional problems. But the Party must firmly proclaim and uphold its aesthetic ideal. It must formulate the fundamental demands which our epoch makes on socialist literature and art. This socialist ideal is determined by the principles of socialist realism. It is possible and necessary to argue about the exact definition of socialist realism. But although the discussion is not over, we may draw from the practice of socialist art certain basic theoretical conclusions concerning the nature of socialist realism. We can say that socialist realism is characterized by Marxist-Leninist social consciousness, partisanship, and the demand that reality be portrayed in historically concrete terms, fully and in development. Socialist realism upholds the ideal of the active man, man engaged in creative effort and developing all his talents. It chooses forms of expression that can influence large sections of the people. With regard to the point of view which disputes socialist realism as an aesthetic requirement, the conference pointed out that a world which is being transformed through the socialist revolution naturally gives rise to a new, revolutionary art. It would be absurdly contradictory, therefore, to deny the new art and its new, revolutionary creative method while recognizing the new world and revolutionary reality. The conference debate on socialist realism was a fitting illustration of the Party's ideological leadership of literature and art.

A whole network of institutions, government bodies and voluntary organizations—schools, scientific institutions, publishing houses, editorial offices, art associations, societies for the dissemination of knowledge, and so on, are engaged in ideological work. The Party leadership must see to it that their work is properly organized and in accord with our socialist ideas. The responsibility of the Communists working in them, primarily those who hold key positions, is great. When an ideologically incorrect and politically harmful work, or a work in bad taste, gets the green light, especially in the case of such mass media as the radio, television, or cultural magazines, many people ask (as did some speakers at the conference): "Why do the leaders and staff members of such-and-such an institution—Communists, or non-Communists who agree with the Party's policies—allow that?" The Party expects its every member to champion its policies. It wants them to do all they can in their own particular fields for the implementation of its policies. This means, among other things, that Communists everywhere must combat bourgeois and petty-bourgeois views.

In ideological work, the central bodies of the Party and every Party organization, that is, the Party as a whole, must show determination, consistency and a high sense of responsibility. Ideological work is not only the duty of the Party bodies in charge of scientific research and cultural activities, or of the Party organizations of scientific and cultural institutions. It is the common task of the entire Party, and of every single Party organization. Party organizations must in this field display the same resolve, consistency and sense of responsibility as on other fronts of the class struggle, and as they displayed earlier, when establishing and consolidating state power, or when reorganizing agriculture along socialist lines.

FUNDAMENTAL ISSUES OF OUR NATIONAL POLICY AND THE 1965 ELECTION CAMPAIGN*

Max Reimann

FIRST SECRETARY, CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF GERMANY

I

This meeting has to decide on the application in the present conditions of the general line set forth in the Program Statement of the 1963 Party Congress, and to specify our tasks for the immediate future, including the Bundestag election campaign in 1965.

We base our struggle against the monopoly bourgeoisie and its party, the CDU-CSU, and also against the Wehner group in the SDP, on a constructive policy aimed at saving the nation. We want to awaken the working class and the people in general to the anti-national, anti-popular character of the policy of imperialism and revenge which robs them of every prospect for peaceful democratic development and may lead to catastrophe unless curbed.

The substance of the national question is to prevent a war from originating on West German soil. Two independent states exist in Germany today: the socialist German Democratic Republic, a champion of peace, freedom and social progress, and the Federal Republic of Germany, a country of state-monopoly capitalism from which comes the danger of a new war of revenge and which is dominated by political and economic reaction. The way to a peaceful settlement of the national question and to closer relations between the two German states can be paved only by renouncing nuclear armaments and the use of force, relaxing tension, and establishing mutual understanding. This means curbing the rule of the imperialists and militarists and enabling the workers, peasants and all democratic-minded citizens freely to exercise the right to self-determination in order to gain decisive influence in the state, the economy and society.

*Report to the 4th plenary meeting of the CC, CPG. Abridged from Wissen und Tat, January-February 1965

FIGHT AGAINST THE WAR MONOPOLIES AND MILITARISTS FOR THE PEOPLE'S RIGHT TO SELF-DETERMINATION

Therefore, it is essential to peace and reunification that the working class and the masses generally should curb the influence of the war monopolies and militarists.

Any action against monopoly capital—the opposition of the peace forces to atomic armament, the struggle of the workers for their social and political rights, the protests of the peasants against ruin, democratic resistance to emergency legislation and violations of the Constitution, the efforts of the intellectuals to create a humanistic national culture and defend it against militarization—is a step toward settling the national question.

The CDU-CSU wants to use the notorious "Indivisible Germany" and other revenge-seeking organizations in its election campaign, so as further to poison the minds of people with chauvinism and revanchism. The Wehner-Erler group wants to do likewise, primarily among the workers. Our task is to combat revanchism and chauvinism and to assert, with due regard to the people's vital interests, our policy of peace, mutual understanding between the two German states, and reunification.

The ruling monopoly groups, which camouflage their true intentions with the catchword of "self-determination," want to win popular support for their revanchist, aggressive ends. They have always interpreted self-determination as their own unchallenged rule, with the people having no say. They never consulted the people where the division or unity of the nation, the conclusion of a German peace treaty, entry into NATO, or atomic armament were concerned. The Bonn government demanded a ban on our Party because we insisted that these vital issues should be decided by the people of West Germany. The imperialists, militarists and the CDU-CSU government sold out the West Germans' right to self-determination by concluding the Paris agreements on rearmament and entrusted the solution of all-German problems to the imperialist occupation powers by signing the special clauses. Fearing to negotiate with the GDR and to let the people know that they are planning a global and fratricidal war they pose as champions of reunification, and hold forth on non-existent four-Power responsibility for the solution of the German problem.

The Soviet Union, in keeping with the principles of self-determination established by international law, holds that German reunification is a matter for the Germans themselves to decide, and has always offered its good services to this end. All agreements with the Soviet Union, including the Treaty of Friendship and Mutual Understanding provide for the unrestricted exercise of the right to self-determination by the GDR, specifically in all questions bearing on reunification.

We Communists declare that reunification is above all the concern of the Germans themselves. We demand the right to self-determination for the West German population. We demand the immediate annulment of the special clauses of the Paris accords.

Every people which has fought for national independence and freedom has had to defend its right to self-determination against imperialist encroachments. A German reunification can never be achieved in peace and freedom with the help of foreign or German imperialists.

To find new, effective solutions, it is necessary to restrict the influence of the revenge-seekers and militarists by promoting the initiative of the masses. We hold that there can be no reunification with the present monopoly rulers of the Federal Republic. It can be achieved only despite them, only by the working class and the people generally. Success in this matter will depend on the extent of their influence on the state, the economy and the government.

THE KEY TO SOLVING THE GERMAN PROBLEM

Of late some politicians, SDP Chairman Willy Brandt among them, have been advocating "a change through closer relations," a policy of "small steps" towards settling the German problem. Useful agreements may gradually become possible provided the cold war between the two German states is ended. There is no doubt that other outstanding issues can be settled by official negotiation, as for example the agreement on passes.

But we maintain that no change, however slight, can be achieved without first eliminating revanchism and hence the tension it generates in the FRG. A realistic policy calls for recognition of the GDR and the abandon ment of illusory plans for annexing it. This is the only basis on which the "small steps" policy can bring about useful agreements leading to bigger steps in the future.

The population and government of the GDR enjoy the unrestricted right to self-determination. They owe this to the fact that they have uprooted imperialism and militarism and thus created a sound basis for a peace policy.

Anyone who understands the policy of "a change through closer relations" correctly and takes it seriously is bound to come to the conclusion that the change must take place in the Federal Republic. It should result from independent actions by the working class and the people in general against the big monopolies and their policy of armament and revenge.

OUR NATIONAL AND DEMOCRATIC ALTERNATIVE

With a view to ensuring a peaceful future for the West German population and bringing about the settlement of the national question through reunification in peace and freedom, the CPG demands:

(1) rejection of the multilateral nuclear force and of any other plan enabling the Bundeswehr generals to possess or control nuclear weapons. Independent proposals and steps by the Federal Republic as Germany's contribution to disarmament;

(2) support for the proposed non-nuclear zone in Central Europe;

(3) good-neighborly peaceful relations with all states and peoples;

(4) renunciation of the emergency laws; respect for the Constitution;

(5) social security for the working people; fairer distribution of incomes and property; the solution of social problems;

(6) steps to lessen the tension and achieve mutual understanding between the two German states on German disarmament and reunification.

Let the working people pass their own judgment on our proposals. They will see that everybody can rely on the CPG when the destiny of the nation—its peace, freedom and social and cultural progress—are concerned.

That is how we see our contribution to the 20th anniversary of the defeat of fascism.

If we make our national policy the keynote of the election campaign, if all our Party organizations improve their political work among the masses, if they consider every development in the context of the vital importance of our national policy of peace, we shall increase our influence on the working class and the population in general, fulfil our tasks in the struggle to save the nation, and convince people of the need to support the struggle for a legalized CPG.

II

The development of state-monopoly capitalism is incompatible with the interests of the working class and the nation as a whole. Modern science and technology afford the possibilities for rapidly multiplying social wealth. In the GDR, where power belongs to the workers and peasants and where socialism prevails, the productive forces are being developed in the interests of the whole of society. In the FRG, where state-monopoly capitalism prevails, the productive forces are used to multiply the wealth of a handful of monopolists whose arms race increases the danger of nuclear war. It is becoming increasingly evident that state-monopoly capitalism has grown overripe. Our people should take the road of building socialism in the FRG as well.

The monopolists are compelled to maneuver in order to camouflage the nature of their social system. With the help of concessions in the social sphere—made in no small measure under the impact of the GDR and thanks to the substantial growth of labor productivity and profits—they have succeeded in deluding a considerable section of the working class as regards the constantly increasing exploitation.

The continuing boom and the big demand for manpower have enabled many workers to win wage increases above tariff rates. The partial social concessions obtained in many cases without an aggravation of the class struggle have given rise to the illusion among workers that their social status has changed radically and can be made secure under capitalism.

The development of state-monopoly capitalism has brought about changes in the economic cycle. Whereas in the past economic booms alternated with severe crises, since 1945 production has never dropped to the previous year's level, although there have been considerable fluctuations in the annual growth rate and recessions and crisis-like phenomena in some industries. Hence the illusions in the FRG about the economic and social stability of the capitalist system.

THE POLICY OF THE WEHNER-ERLER GROUP IS A COMPONENT OF THE POLICY OF THE STATE-MONOPOLY SYSTEM

State-monopoly capitalism is that socio-economic background which enabled Wehner, Erler, Deist and other Right-wing leaders of the SDP to push through the Godesberg program of their party. This program signifies renunciation of an independent ideology and policy of the working class, of its socialist goal. It signifies a change-over to the positions of the state-monopoly system, which is precisely what the monopolies wanted. Hence the SDP Right-wing leaders' "policy of community" with the CDU-CSU, their support of the imperialist foreign, home, military and economic policy, and their stand on the German question. The last sharp clash of views took place at the Karlsruhe congress, when the MLF and emergency legislation were approved. Thus the Wehner-Erler group has over-stepped the bounds of the Godesberg party program which rejected the nuclear armament of the Bundeswehr in any form.

The main contradictions between the international working-class movement with its greatest creation, the socialist world system, and the imperialist system is manifested especially vividly in Germany. The working class in the east of Germany has built its own state and established socialist relations of production. The successes of the GDR increasingly attract the population of West Germany. The working class of the GDR embodies the future of the German nation and shows the population of the FRG the way to solve vital problems.

BROAD ALLIANCE AGAINST MONOPOLY POWER

The increasing clash of interests between the non-proletarian classes and strata and the ruling monopolies and their government creates the basis for a broad anti-monopoly alliance of the working class with all the non-monopoly sections of society.

Also other contradictions of the capitalist system are becoming more acute. As more and more factories and mines are closed down it is becoming clear that a state-monopoly regulated economy, too, is characterized by large-scale waste of the means of production. As a result of the frenzied arms race the values created by society are being wasted on an unprecedented scale, with thousands of millions being spent on weapons which become obsolete while still in storage and consequently suitable only for scrap-iron. And all this for the sake of fabulous profits to the arms monopolies.

AIM MAIN BLOW AT ERHARD'S POLICY, AT THE CDU-CSU

Erhard continues Adenauer's policy of pressing for a multilateral nuclear force and for the adoption of emergency laws. This policy is a revanchist, anti-national, anti-democratic and anti-social policy, a policy inimical to peace. Therefore the main blow in the election campaign should be aimed at Erhard's policy, at the CDU-CSU, which should be defeated and removed from power. Only in this way can conditions be created for working out a political alternative which will provide the FRG population with an opportunity of peaceful and democratic development conforming to national and social interests.

There are real possibilities for this. The contradiction between Erhard's unrealistic policy and the existing correlation of forces impels people to search for a way out. They realize that this policy is more and more at variance with their interests, that with the mounting resistance of the peoples, this policy is leading to the growing isolation of the FRG. Such are the real causes of the crisis phenomena in Bonn. Hence the growing contradictions within the coalition and in the CDU-CSU leadership, in the first place. But for all that it is clear that the various groups and individuals in the CDU-CSU leadership adhere to revenge-seeking aggressive positions on all major issues. None of them oppose the MLF, the emergency laws, revanchism and social reaction. They are in full agreement in this respect. They all seek, though in different ways, better methods of carrying on the old untenable policy, and all of them will support Erhard in the elections. Erhard and his policy must therefore be defeated if we are to prevent the realization of the plans of the nuclear war strategists, revenge-seekers and militarists in the FRG.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE FORCES OF THE WORKING CLASS, SUPPORTERS OF PEACE AND DEMOCRACY AND ALL THOSE AWARE OF THEIR RESPONSIBILITY TO THE NATION

It is of decisive importance for our people to counterpose to the concentration of the monopoly forces the concentration of the forces of the working class, the supporters of peace and democracy and all those who are aware of their responsibility to the nation.

The working class is the biggest force in the people's struggle against the monopoly rulers of the FRG, a force which, through the activity of its organizations, the trade unions in the first place, can steer developments towards peace, democracy and social security.

An end must be put to a situation in which the monopolies influence all areas of life, ignoring the opinion of the trade unions. Parliamentary institutions discriminate against the unions as "representing group interests" although they actually speak for three-quarters of the population of the country. The decisions of the government and the Bundestag run counter to the interests of the working class and the demands of the trade unions.

Therefore the trade unions have every reason for acting jointly to defeat the CDU-CSU at the polls and to remove the Erhard government from office. This goal is certain to be achieved if the working-class parties and their organizations, if the Trade Union Federation, the SDP and the CPG, join in the fight against a common enemy.

The program and decisions of the last trade union congress and the congresses of various unions rejected atomic armament in any form, and specifically the MLF. The T.U. program calls for a policy of peace as the basis of any social and cultural progress.

It insists on negotiations to settle disputed issues and steps towards disarmament on the part of the Federal Republic. But the Erhard government ignores this will of the trade unions and insists on atomic armament. The trade unions press for defense of the Constitution, democratic rights and civil liberties, while the Erhard government presses for emergency legislation.

PUT DEMANDS OF THE TRADE UNIONS ON THE ORDER OF THE DAY

The only conclusion the trade unions can draw from the present situation is to fight against atomic armament and the emergency legislation and thus uphold constitutional rights, the future of their organizations and the democratic rights of the voters as stipulated in the fundamental law. This would also be in line with the demand of the trade union rank and file that only workers, farmers and intellectuals who uphold the interests of the working people, support the decisions of the trade unions, and owe allegiance to the working people and not to the monopolies, be elected to the Bundestag.

Wehner declared at the Recklinghausen conference of functionaries that he would like to see more resolute support of the SDP on the part of the trade unions, but at the same time he made it clear that the workers and trade unions would have no influence on the political decisions of the SDP leadership. Wehner wants the entire trade union movement to be subordinated to its "policy of community" with the CDU-CSU and the monopolies.

The Communists advocate more vigorous political action on the part of the working class, more active intervention on the part of the trade union in political and social life, the election campaign included. But the interests of the workers demand that the trade unions also have a decisive say in the policy of the SDP, most of whose supporters are organized workers.

The trade unions should work for the SDP policy to be brought nearer to their own line, for the SDP to present their demands in parliament.

OUR PROPOSALS FOR FAIRER DISTRIBUTION OF INCOMES AND PROPERTY

In order to counteract the workers' discontent with social injustices, the CDU-CSU and the Erhard government have put forward demagogic pre-election proposals concerning what they call concentration of property. In reality they want to preserve the power of the millionaires and change the distribution of incomes still more in their favor. At the same time they urge the working people to be moderate and make sacrifices for the sake of armament.

Leber's project for "concentrating property in the hands of wage-earners" cannot change the unfair distribution of incomes and property as demanded by the trade unions. It changes nothing in the state-monopoly system and does not abolish the gulf between the billionaire tycoons and the dispossessed workers.

Leber promises the building workers a secure old age paid for out of a special fund after forty years of work in the industry. Every worker would welcome this. But Leber's plan is built on sand. With the existing working conditions most building workers can hardly hope to carry on for forty years. To tie the worker to a definite industry or a definite enterprise means restricting free choice of employment and thus hampering the struggle for higher wages and better working conditions. The Leber plan therefore offers the monopolies an instrument to be used against labor.

According to the Leber project, the worker would not be able to draw on the proposed fund for forty years. The present generation has seen our currency devaluated to rock bottom twice in the past forty years. The funds created by the workers were wiped out by armament spending. The First World War was followed by inflation which made money completely valueless in 1923. Under Hitler there were the "iron" and "Volkswagen" retrenchments. During the Second World War money was depreciated anew. The 1948 currency reform again robbed the working people of their hard-earned savings. Now too, the workers' money is to be placed at the disposal of the monopolists who twice in forty years were responsible for wars and inflation. This would provide the monopolists with additional means for strengthening their grip on the economy, increasing the exploitation of the workers, tightening the screws on them, and pressing on with the implementation of the policy of armament and revenge.

The stand of our Party on the distribution of incomes and property, based on our program statement, coincides in many respects with the position of the metal and chemical workers' unions, which reject the Leber plan. Specifically, we agree that an active policy on wages is essential for increasing the share of wages in the social product and reducing the share of profits. This would but a brake on the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few monopolists.

We support the demand of the chemical workers' union that part of the profits should be channelled to a special fund. The CPG considers that this fund should be controlled exclusively by representatives of the working class and be free from any interference by the monopolies and their state.

Just distribution of property and incomes is possible only through curbing and eventually abolishing the power of the monopolies and the system of exploitation, through the implementation of the principle "what the people create should belong to the people," through the establishment of the socialist system, which has already been built by the working class of the GDR and which serves as an example for the rest of Germany.

FATAL DECISIONS OF THE SDP CONGRESS

We and our comrades in the SDP strive in common for a policy of peace and democracy, for social and cultural progress. It is in our mutual interests, therefore, to defeat the CDU-CSU in the elections so as to initiate a new policy. Hence the need to counter Erhard's policy with a political alternative and already now to press for its implementation.

Under the influence of Wehner, Erler and other Right-wing leaders the Karlsruhe congress adopted decisions that have nothing in common with such an alternative. The working class and its trade unions, all champions of peace and democracy, and above all the comrades from the SDP, should realize the gravity of the implications of these decisions.

They are designed to align the SDP with the policy of nationalism and revanche. The approval of the NATO multilateral nuclear force, the emergency legislation and the plans for restoring the General Staff of German militarism, and the support of the revanchist demand for a revision of the borders — all this shows that the Wehner-Erler group is out to make the SDP an integral part of the system of state-monopoly capitalism and its revanchist policy. These decisions run counter to the vital interests of the German people, who want peace, democracy and mutual understanding between Germans. In fact, the Wehner-Erler group is trying to continue the hopeless and adventuristic "positions-of-strength" policy of the CDU-CSU. We stress that the decisions of the SDP congress are the most harmful since 1945. Only if we state this with utmost clarity shall we be able to fully awaken those members and functionaries of the SDP who oppose these decisions to the responsibility resting on them.

Erler's arguments to justify the nuclear arms race policy coincide almost literally with Adenauer's demand "for the same weapons for the Bundeswehr as its potential adversaries possess," and echo Strauss' contention that atomic weapons are essential for national sovereignty. The best reply to Erler's demagogic attempts to ascribe his own striving for nuclear "equality" to the younger generation has been given by the Social-Democratic and other youth organizations of the working class. They demand equal opportunities for education and vocational training, respect for human dignity, and a say in deciding political issues. They are becoming increasingly aware that it is in the interests of the youth to fight against its mortal enemy—German imperialism.

MORE TO THE RIGHT THAN GODESBERG

The congress in Karlsruhe shifted even more to the Right than the Godesberg congress, as is evidenced by its approval of the MLF, the emergency laws and the military plan of Helmuth Schmidt. By demanding the restoration of the General Staff the SDP is taking a step which even the CDU-SCU has not dared to take, the crimes of Hitler's General Staff being still too fresh in the memory of our people and our neighbors. The Social-Democratic claimant to the heritage of Strauss and Hassel intends to push through the extremely dangerous plans of revenge despite the doubts voiced even by West Germany's partners in NATO.

The SDP's approval of the MLF and of the unilimited power of the monopolies, and hence their drive for profits, has stripped its statements on social and cultural progress of all semblance of sincerity. What social and cultural progress can there be when the spirit of militarism and the drive for profits reigns supreme everywhere? Social and cultural progress will only be possible when the working people get rid of the heavy burden of arms expenditures, restrict the influence of the millionaires and militarists and begin to play an ever more active part in political life.

Many workers, SDP members and trade unionists included, wonder how the Wehner-Erler group managed to block the progressive proposals submitted by party organizations and to push through its own concept. For one thing, the SDP leaders, who wanted their party to adopt a policy incompatible with the interests of the people, saw to it that the Karlsruhe meeting was not a democratically-convened congress whose delegates, elected in accordance with the will of the membership, would adopt decisions on the policy of the party in a free discussion.

But it would be simplifying things to explain everything by skillful handling of the congress. The main reason, in our opinion, is that the Social-Democratic rank and file do not yet approach the national question from class positions. They are still strongly influenced by chauvinism and anti-communism, and muddled by the concept of "social partnership." They do not realize the class nature of the West German state. Therefore they do not see the mortal danger of the "policy of community" with the CDU-CSU.

DEEP-SEATED CONTRADICTIONS REVEALED AT THE CONGRESS

Although no broad discussion or explanatory statements were allowed on the pretext that in order to win in the Bundestag elections, differences and contradictions had to be relegated to the background, the stage-managers of the Karlsruhe congress did not succeed in concealing the sharp contradiction between their policy and the interests of the workers, peasants and intellectuals. This contradiction was revealed in the discussion on the MLF, on the application of the statute of limitations to Nazi criminals, and on the right to participate in managing the enterprises. Wehner was defeated on the question of extending the workers' right to take part in policy-making. This testifies to the discontent of many Social-Democrats with the policy of Wehner and Erler.

The Right-wing leaders tried to attribute the success of the SDP in the last municipal elections to their Godesberg line and "policy of community" with the CDU-CSU. In reality the SDP owes this success primarily to the disillusionment of the electorate with the CDU-CSU and to their hope that the SDP would represent their interests better.

The decisions of the Karlsruhe congress deprived the SDP of some trump cards in the Bundestag elections. In view of the declining influence of the CDU-SCU, the best thing for the SDP would be to counter Erhard's bankrupt policy with a clear-cut alternative. Instead, Wehner and Erler carried their "policy of community" to the point of approving such unpopular measures as nuclear armament and the emergency legislation. As a result, the voters cannot see any difference between the position of the ruling parties and the SDP Right-wing leadership on the main issues.

Evidently aware of this, Brandt tried to point out the differences between the positions of the SDP and the CDU-CSU. But these differences, as well as the positive effect of the pass agreement, are nullified by the approval given to the MLF and the emergency laws which destroys any hope for a policy of common sense and rapprochement.

The success of the pass agreement undoubtedly benefited the SDP. It demonstrated to the public the fallacy of the Bonn contention that it is impossible to negotiate with the GDR government. By initiating steps to ease tension and improve relations, the SDP could develop a political alternative to the position of the CDU-CSU which offers no perspective, an alternative that would appeal to the electorate and be of importance for the future of the entire nation.

This is realized by SDP functionaries who know the sentiments of the masses. Whereas Wehner and Erler doggedly cling to the unrealistic policy of revenge, non-recognition of the GDR and its forcible liquidation, suggestions submitted by party organizations to the Karlsruhe congress contained the demand for "realistic proposals" for putting relations between the two German states on a businesslike footing which could lead to "new talks broadening exchanges in the sphere of culture, science, economy and sport, as well as contacts between people."

COMMUNIST-SOCIALIST COOPERATION IN WORKING OUT THE ALTERNATIVE

We should give a helping hand to those SDP members and functionaries who oppose the "policy of community" with the CDU-CSU. The present differences with regard to the decisions of the trade unions could also be ironed out in this way. This would accord with the wishes of the members and supporters of the SDP who want to defeat the CDU-CSU. It would also furnish an answer to the many active Social-Democrats who are pondering the question of what to do once the SDP comes into office. We fully agree with those Social-Democrats who say that an independent Social-Democratic policy is needed to defeat the CDU-CSU.

Of exceptional importance for establishing unity of action with the comrades from the SDP are the recommendations on this question submitted to the Karlsruhe congress by such big organizations as those of Munich, Nuremberg, Dusseldorf, Frankfurt, Muelheim, Bremen and other industrial centers.

It is also noteworthy that proposals of a positive nature were made by organizations from regions where the trade unions are very active in the social and political fields.

These proposals are indicative of the existence of many points of agreement between us and these organizations. Hence the possibility of pooling efforts in the struggle for peace, democracy and social progress. To promote cooperation is a pressing political task of every Communist, every Party organization, every leading organ of the CPG. This is indispensable for the realization of an alternative to the CDU-CSU policy.

The proposals of SDP organizations which coincide with important decisions of the trade unions, the Easter March demands, and the social and democratic demands of big organizations of the working people, pave the way for agreement on united action.

Socialist-Communist mutual understanding and joint actions would enable the working class to fight effectively against the policy of the monopolies and defeat their party, the CDU-CSU. Only in this way is it possible to remove the barriers between the two German states erected by the millionaires and militarists.

CEMENT WORKING-CLASS UNITY AND THE ALLIANCE OF ALL THE ANTI-MONOPOLY FORCES IN THE ELECTION CAMPAIGN

Our election campaign should promote the implementation of our general line and help build working-class unity and an alliance of all the anti-monopoly forces of the nation. In order to defeat the CDU-CSU we have to undermine the influence this party exerts on the masses with its religious, national and social demagogy, and to show the people that the policy of the monopolies and their government damages their interests.

Working-class unity presupposes the participation of the Christian workers in the struggle for social demands, for peace and democracy. As the events in the Ruhr have shown, in social battles they fight on the side of their class comrades.

Catholic and Evangelical youth organizations join organized young workers in the Easter Marches, anti-fascist actions and the all-German forum. Protest against the leadership's obedience to the monopolies frequently emanates from the social committees set up by the CDU-CSU for the purpose of promoting its influence on the Christian workers. The committees often support the demands of the workers and the decisions of the trade unions.

This points to the great possibilities that exist for securing the participation of the Christian workers in the common struggle against the dangerous reactionary policy of the Erhard government and inducing them not to vote for CDU-CSU candidates.

Similar processes are taking place in other sections of the population, specifically among the peasants and handicraftsmen, many of whom have up till now supported the CDU-CSU. The middle urban strata, too, are protesting against the growing concentration and against the tax, economic and financial policy of the Bonn government which jeopardizes the interests of the middle sections.

COMBAT THE REACTIONARY AGRARIAN POLICY OF THE ERHARD GOVERNMENT

Many peasants are alarmed by the reduction of grain prices. The compensation promised by the government cannot fully make up for their losses. It is one of those "consolation measures" designed to secure the peasants' support for the CDU-CSU in the elections. An aggravating circumstance is that preference is given to capitalist agricultural enterprises, while small and middle peasants are left out in the cold.

The agrarian program of the Erhard government continues to be based on the premise that in the interests of the monopolies and the capitalist way of farming another million peasants must be driven off the land. Th eworking class cannot endorse this policy, which spells the ruination of its closest ally, endangers the population's supply of farm products from domestic sources, and gives the local and foreign monopolies even greater opportunities to dictate food prices.

As a counterweight to the anti-national policy pursued by the monopolies in the European Economic Community and to the agrarian policy of the government, our Party proposes a worker-peasant alliance and an agrarian policy which would accord with the interests of the workers, peasants and the population in general and act as a curb on the monopolies.

Now that the monopolies and their government have stepped up their efforts to sow discord among the workers and the peasants, the trade unions should work to establish closer relations with the peasantry and promote solidarity with and support of the peasants' movement. This will help the peasants to resist the propaganda of the nationalists and neo-fascists and become reliable allies of the working class in the struggle for democracy and social progress in the FRG.

OUR STRUGGLE FOR DEMOCRATIC AND SOCIAL CHANGE IN THE FRG

The peaceful future of our people hinges on our ability to heighten the workers' class consciousness and militancy, to make them aware of their historical role as builders of the socialist future, and to lead them to the struggle for democratic change in the FRG. While promoting the struggle of the workers for their immediate social and political demands, we explain to them that they will be able to ensure their own future and the future of the entire German people only if they succeed in bringing about fundamental social changes. As long as monopoly capital and militarism dominate in political and social life, peace, democracy and social security cannot be guaranteed. The FRG needs radical democratization of the state, the economy and society. This is essential in order to put an end to the unchallenged rule of 94 millionaires, to end the crying injustices of the state-monopoly system.

How, we are asked, can democratization be achieved, how can the FRG be turned into a socially-just, democratic and peace-loving state? Our Party answered these questions in its Program Statement adopted by the 1963 congress:

A peace-loving, democratic and socially just system can be created only if the working class, in alliance with the other sections of the working people and democratic elements of the bourgeoisie, exerts increasing influence on political and social life and restricts and overcomes the power of monopoly capital and militarism. This struggle can be headed only by the working class as the biggest and best-organized democratic forces.

The working class will not be able to carry out this task unless it achieves unity of action. Not a single step towards democratic and progressive changes can be made without vigorous actions of the working class and the masses generally, without a broad popular movement.

OUR PROPOSALS FOR DEMOCRATIZATION ARE BASED ON THE CONSTITUTION

The opponents of democratic development contend that our intentions contradict the letter and spirit of the fundamental law. We reply that our proposals for the democratization of the state and society are based on the fundamental law and are aimed at removing the contradiction between the Constitution and reality. It is precisely because of our positive and constructive attitude to the Constitution that we oppose any recourse to emergency legislation by the government and any emasculation of basic democratic freedoms. It is high time that such principles of the Constitution as living in peace with all peoples, the inviolability of the basic rights of citizens, the demand for building a socially just and democratic state, or the demand for preventing abuse of economic power, were implemented. Hence the need for the working class and its trade unions to fight in and outside parliament for social and democratic reforms leading to the realization of the trade union program.

It should be clear to the working class and all the democratic forces that militarism, the bulwark of big capital, is the chief danger to peace and to democratic and social rights, a danger that is heightened by the existence of U.S. atomic bases and an occupation army of half a million men on FRG territory. Every step towards social and democratic progress in the Federal Republic is blocked by German and foreign militarism and imperialism. No state in the world threatens our borders. If the Bundeswehr were concerned solely with ensuring the integrity of the FRG borders nobody would regard it as a menace to peace.

STEPS TOWARDS BUILDING A DEMOCRATIC PEACE-LOVING SYSTEM

The interests of security and democracy demand the restoration of our people's right to self-determination and national sovereignty. This calls for the removal of all the clauses restricting the right to self-determination which the imperialist occupation powers included into the Paris accords. Next should come reduction and eventually complete removal of the occupation troops, conclusion of a peace treaty, and withdrawal of the FRG from NATO and other military pacts. This would make military neutrality possible for the whole of Germany and ensure the German people maximum security and the right to self-determination.

The struggle for democratization should be waged in and outside parliament. The trade unions will occupy their rightful place in political life when they begin to act on all political issues independently and in the interests of the working class and display their own initiative; when they guide themselves by the interests of the masses and convince the population of the need to defend civic rights and press for the satisfaction of their demands on the basis of democratic principles. This will enable the working class and all the democratic forces to ensure genuine popular representation in the Bundestag.

The essence of parliamentary democracy cannot be reduced to the voter going to the polls once in every four years, while his will is ignored in all other respects and parliament is excluded from political life, serving as a representative organ only for appearance's sake. The principle of the sovereignty of the people presupposes that the people themselves pass decisions on questions of vital importance to them and that the deputies, as representatives of the people, are accountable to the voters, and the government and its ministers, to parliament.

DEMOCRATIC DEMANDS OF THE WORKING CLASS AND ITS ORGANIZATIONS

In the interest of democratic development and the establishment of normal civil rights, we want an end to the emergency laws enacted in the cold war years and to prosecution on political charges, which the government uses against all opponents and critics of its policies. We agree with those spokesmen for the democratic forces who have lately stressed that the elimination of anti-communism as an official doctrine prevailing in the FRG and the restoration of the CPG's right to legal activity were the main requisite for this. Indeed, the prohibition of the CPG was decreed, and has been upheld, with the unconstitutional aim of suppressing and defaming all opposition. We therefore showed, in our statement on the eighth anniversary of the ban, that the repeal of this ban has become the touchstone of all civil liberties and democratic rights and of the Federal Republic's parliamentary system as a whole.

The working class and its organizations should champion the following democratic demands:

—respect for basic civil rights, and prevention of all attempts to abolish them by means of emergency laws and practices;

—extension of democracy in the social and economic spheres;

—full exercise of their constitutional powers by the Bundestag and the parliaments of the Laender and Gemeinden;

—the powers of the Laender and democratic self-government in the Gemeinden should be extended and financially guaranteed through a reform allotting one-third of the state revenues each to the Republic and the Laender and Gemeinden;

—the repeal of all electoral regulations running counter to the constitutional principle of equality, such as the "five per cent" clause,* and the introduction of proportional suffrage;

—elimination of monopoly influence on parties and parliament by banning all the lobbies of manufacturers' associations and monopolies, by disclosing every financial source and doing away with concentration of power in the press;

—granting the trade unions and democratic opinion a share in the supervision and control of broadcasting and television; carrying out a democratic school reform.

CO-MANAGEMENT LIMITS MONOPOLY POWER

We regard the struggle for the right of the factory and office workers and their trade unions fully to share in the management of the industries and in the economy in general as a decisive means of limiting monopoly power. The present form of participation in the management of the mining, coal and other industries is inadequate as a means of safeguarding the rights and influence of the workers in industry and in economic life in general. Otherwise the closure of mines, dictated solely by the interests of the coal and oil magnates, would have been impossible. To secure the right to co-management, the workers and their unions should go further than merely demanding it. The time has come to take practical steps in accordance with the demands of the Association of German Trade Unions and the Metal-Workers Union. In each plant, settlement hinges on the workers' unity and readiness for action and on how far the positions of the union are strengthened, first of all through the activity of the union delegates. The task here is to wrest concessions from monopoly capital that would subsequently be confirmed in agreements at industrial union level. This will add to the political weight of the working class and its unions. It will also have an effect on the life of society as a whole, including parliament, and will make possible legislative acts in favor of co-management.

Today the trade unions' attitude to the law on factory statutes and representation of personnel in the management is determined by the need to make full use of the opportunities arising from the statutes and safeguard the workers' rights against the menace of emergency legislation. In seeking real co-management, it is necessary to abolish those clauses in the statutes which commit the representatives of staffs and unions to act together with the employers and tie up union activity in the plants. Furthermore, an effort should be made to bring about legislative solutions guaranteeing the complete freedom of union activity in the plants and to extend the guarantees against dismissal now enjoyed by members of production councils to union delegates.

Those who represent plant collectives on the supervisory councils, and members of production councils should be accountable to the collective and unions concerned. Their present commitment not to disclose information is incompatible with this requirement. Disclosure of the balance sheets and transactions of the monopolies and big banks would give the working people a clear idea of the actual ratio between profits and wages, of monopoly power and abuses of power. To restrict this power, our Party congress proposed in 1963 that the production councils and trade union bodies be authorized fully to participate in the decision of all questions bearing on production, wages, working time, personnel, social services and holidays, as well as on investments, shares and dividends.

NATIONALIZE KEY INDUSTRIES AND BIG BANKS

Apologists for state-monopoly capitalism and Right Social-Democratic leaders are trying to scare the working people away from the fight for nationalization. They assert that nationalization would mean introducing a forced economy and make it difficult for the workers to seek social improvement, for they and their unions would be confronted by a super-powerful partner. Today the workers in the monopolies and state undertakings are up against state-monopoly capitalism, that is, the combined power of the monopolies, which use the state as their tool. Nationalization of a monopoly like IG Farben would make it possible to cut the prices of numerous consumer goods, such as synthetics, medicines and mineral fertilizers.

We advocate nationalization to restrict the power of monopolies and ensure that wealth serves the nation, not a privileged minority. This calls for the removal of monopoly representatives from their key positions on the boards and supervisory councils of plants, which are public property, and for democratic control and management with the decisive participation of trade unions, parliamentary bodies and other democratic organizations. This is why the unions should demand that state enterprises take the lead in ensuring that factory and office workers and their production councils and trade unions be given a say in the management. They should insist on state enterprises no longer granting the big plants low tariffs, and secure for the people cuts in transport, electricity and gas rates. Model working conditions, wages and social security in these enterprises should demonstrate how much an economic system under democratic control can do for the working man. This would greatly stimulate the struggle for the nationalization of the big capitalist monopolies.

We agree with many workers who consider that the trade unions should, in keeping with the stipulations of their fundamental program, draw up a specific plan for the nationalization of the big monopolies in the war, atomic and coal industries and the decisive power industries, as well as the big banks, and call on all workers to fight for the realization of this plan.

As to compensation, our Party holds the view formulated at its 1960 Conference. We are of the opinion that nationalization, or the transfer of property to the state, should provide for compensating the owners, as envisaged by the Constitution. On the issue of legally establishing the amount of compensation, we favor full compensation to small and medium shareholders.

In connection with democratic measures for nationalization, the unions' proposals for the national budget, economic accounting, the planned management of investments, and scientific and technical progress in the interests of the national economy would also serve a useful purpose. At present the state influences economic activities through numerous measures. But it does so exclusively in the interests of the big capitalist monopolies. Democratic measures in the sphere of planning imply decisive participation by the trade unions, production councils and other representatives of the democratic public in the entire economic policy of the state.

FOR A PEACEFUL ROAD TO THE SOCIALIST REVOLUTION

Social-Democratic comrades and non-party people and Christian trade union members ask us how we Communists visualize the Federal Republic's road to socialism. This was answered in our policy statement—the CPG favors the peaceful road to socialism. Every socialist reorganization of society constitutes a radical change of the social system, a revolution, irrespective of the means used. It necessarily presupposes that the working class will, in alliance with other groups of the working people, take political power into its hands. Lenin repeatedly stressed that there is no solid wall between the democratic and the socialist revolution. How far we will succeed in creating favorable conditions for a peaceful and, as far as possible, a painless transition to socialism in the Federal Republic will depend primarily on the strength, breadth, organization and political consciousness of the people's anti-monopoly movement led by the working class, on the vigor of class and popular struggles waged by both extra-parliamentary and parliamentary means.

The closer the unity of action of the working class and the cooperation of all democratic forces in the anti-monopoly front, the greater the opportunities of isolating the monopolists and preventing them from using their coercive machinery, and the more favorable the conditions for effecting the socialist revolution in a peaceful way. This is what we are striving for. The opportunities for this are growing as the balance of forces changes in favor of socialism throughout the world and in Germany.

However, historical experience shows that the ruling classes never retreat without putting up a fight, which means that the bitterness of the class struggle depends not so much on the working class as on the reactionaries' use of force against the people. In any case, the working class and other working people in the Federal Republic should realize that the West German and foreign monopoly capitalists confronting them are experienced and highly organized opponents. This implies that democratic reforms and the socialist revolution can be brought about only through a sustained struggle.

Unity of action of the working class and its organizations, and cooperation of the SDP, CPG and trade unions are indispensable for overcoming the power of the militarists and monopoly capitalists, reorganizing political and economic life in the Federal Republic along peaceful and democratic lines, and above all for carrying on the fight for socialism.

To the Social-Democratic comrades who ask whether a merger of the two working-class parties is a prerequisite for the transition to socialism in the Federal Republic as well, we answer: the country is developing in conditions different from those prevailing in Eastern Germany after 1945. Even if they are organizationally independent, the two parties can fight for a socialist society jointly, in close comradely cooperation and in alliance with other anti-monopoly parties and organizations.

Hostile propaganda alleges that the Communists favor as a matter of principle a one-party system under socialism. This is not so; there exists a multi-party system in the GDR and a number of other socialist countries, a system under which the party of the working class confidently cooperates with other working people's parties. We consider that all the non-monopolistic sections of the people and their political and other mass organizations can cooperate on the basis of identical interests in fighting against monopoly capital and for the transition to socialism, and in building a socialist society as a system meeting their common interests.

Since the whole of present-day development leads to socialism and the possibility of peaceful transition is growing, it may well be that this transition will be effected in the presence of opposition forces and parties. Established by the working class and all working people, the socialist government will staunchly defend their gains against counter-revolutionary attacks. However, this does not necessitate banning and suppressing a parliamentary opposition so long as it adheres to the Constitution and the laws of the socialist state approved by the majority of the people's representatives.

PROMOTE THE UNITY AND SOLIDARITY OF THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

It is well known that most of the Communist and Workers' parties have declared in favor of preparing and convening a new conference of Communist and Workers' parties. We have repeatedly stated, and would like to say again, that we consider such a conference necessary. This confronts us with the task of again setting forth the position of our Party on how to overcome the differences and difficulties that have cropped up in the world Communist movement and how to promote its unity and solidarity.

There is no question of excommunicating anyone or of infringing the right of fraternal parties to shape and implement their policies in their respective countries. As we see it, the conference should help to promote the unity and solidarity of the world Communist movement, reaffirm the general line jointly formulated in the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement, and arrive through free discussion at a common point of view on certain new questions of principle.

Developments since the two Moscow conferences entitles us to make the following points. The 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement are correct. The estimation of the trends of development and of the tasks facing the revolutionary movement have been corroborated by the experience of recent years. It follows that the Communist and Workers' parties have every reason to abide by the general line formulated at the two meetings.

Our effort in the way of preparations for the coming conference is aimed at reaching an agreement on joint anti-imperialist actions even if it should prove impossible to come to immediate understanding on every point.

It seems to us that we must create an atmosphere of serious and comradely exchange of opinions and stop all public polemics if we want the Drafting Committee and the international conference to prepare successfully for their task and to accomplish it. A further exacerbation and extension of differences and polemics could benefit none but the imperialists.

Experience tells us that joint action by all the fraternal parties calls for close cooperation on general and fundamental issues concerning all. This unity on fundamental matters of general importance is perfectly compatible with the autonomy and independence of each Communist Party in formulating and implementing its political line.

World Communist unity does not preclude different approaches in appraising one or another event, different views on certain questions. These distinctions are often due to the actual situation in the country concerned. While taking account of the particular conditions and specific problems in the various countries, we would like to stress that we must ensure unity of action in the world Communist movement on cardinal issues, and that the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism should be binding on all. We therefore oppose all attempts to exaggerate national peculiarities, undermine proletarian internationalism and encourage separatist trends.

FOSTER THE ACTIVITY OF THE PARTY AND REINFORCE ITS RANKS

We can achieve proper activity by the Party on the everyday political issues provided we make clear our aim and ways of settling the national question in Germany, and also the fundamental concept of the fight against state-monopoly capitalism. Otherwise we will not be safe from vacillation and incorrect decisions on tactical questions, which are often very complicated and will have to be dealt with in the election campaign as well. Only from this standpoint can we correctly answer the questions of our relations with the SDP, of unity of action, and the formation of a broad anti-monopoly alliance.

The tasks for the election campaign and other tasks we have mentioned require more efficient ideological, political and organizational work by the Party. We can cope with these tasks only if we in the Party bring clarity into some fundamental ideological matters.

It was said in the Report that we have in recent weeks and months held Party meetings or delievered lectures involving many hundreds of Party members. These discussions and talks indicate that there are still considerable uncertainties in the Party about the national question and the nature of our national struggle. It is wrong to see a split Germany as the source of the war danger, or mere reunification as the substance of the national question. The substance of the national question is to guarantee that no war will break out originating on German soil.

Thus the national question involves settlement of the irreconcilable contradiction between the peaceful interests of the vast majority of the German people and West German monopoly capitalist and militarist interest in profit and expansion. This contradiction can be resolved only by stepping up the class and popular struggle against monopoly capital. This struggle pervades every walk of public life. It is therefore essential to reorganize the work of our Party in order to ensure that our correct national policy and the tasks of our national struggle run through the Party's activity in every field.

We must explain it to our comrades. Only in this way can we bring the requirements of the national struggle home to them. Only in this way can we make clear that the national struggle is also a class struggle taking manifold forms. Only in this way can we enable the Party to show, in every action of the working class, its role and responsibility in the national struggle, and the need of a peaceful, democratic and socialist alternative for the whole of the German nation.

Those who take this view of the struggle to settle the national question cannot but appreciate the growing role and importance of the German Democratic Republic. Everyone can see for himself that full-scale socialist construction in the GDR meets the national interests of all Germans. Everyone should realize that the victory of socialism in the GDR accords with the national interests of the West German working class and people and is a decisive condition for a peaceful settlement of the German national question. In the interest of the national struggle, the working class and all popular forces of West Germany should take a firm stand in support of the GDR, reach an understanding with the working class and its organizations and rebut the falsehoods spread by hostile propaganda.

CONCENTRATE ON THE MAIN ISSUES

The fundamental tasks for the coming months may be stated as follows:

1. We must see to it that the basic political line of our national policy, which is also valid for our election campaign, is discussed by every leading body and every Party branch.

2. Safeguarding peace for the Federal Republic and carrying out the election campaign will depend on how effectively we develop the national struggle, the struggle against the NATO multilateral nuclear force and emergency laws. We must open the eyes of the people to the dangers that exist, and carry out trade union decisions through a variety of actions. May 8, 1965—the 20th anniversary of the defeat of Hitler fascism and the termination of World War II—must not bring freedom to war criminals and Nazi murderers. This day, which is to come after the Easter Marches and May Day, should mark a new high in the fight against fascism, war and nuclear armaments, for a policy of peace and democracy.

3. In the course of a dialogue now going on between Germans, we must explain primarily to the working class that the MLF, the state of emergency and a revanchist policy block the solution of the German problem. It is necessary to achieve understanding among the working class, peace and mutual understanding between the SDP, SUPG and CPG, and cooperation between the AFGTU and AGTU. Explaining these problems to the working class should become the chief content of preparations for a German workers' conference and other meetings of German workers, peasants, handicraftsmen and intellectuals.

4. Extension of the struggle of the working class, in particular the miners' struggle for their jobs. We must be in the van of the struggle for higher wages being carried on by the workers in the iron and steel industry, the Federal railway system and postal services, and in other branches.

The struggle for social interests affords the best opportunities of establishing unity of action between Social-Democratic, Communist, non-party and Christian workers. This is the basis on which we must prepare for the elections to production councils, so that these elections should strengthen the trade unions and increase the militancy of the working class.

These are our immediate tasks. It is with them as our guide that we are entering the election campaign. In this campaign we are going to use every opportunity of working among the masses and of making our Party's national policy the policy of ever larger sections of the people. We are going to support all forces advancing and alternative to the CDU-CSU and their Erhard government.

This work will help the Party to win the confidence of the working class and the people as a whole, reinforce its ranks and show the working people that it is in their interest to have a legal Communist Party of Germany.

STATEMENT* BY THE POLITICAL BUREAU OF THE FRENCH COMMUNIST PARTY

On October 10, 1964, the Central Committee of the Party, which attaches special importance to the forthcoming municipal elections, emphasized that the election or re-election of UNR members and other reactionaries, whatever their camouflage, would make for fresh attacks on the powers of the municipal councils and raise further obstacles to the achievement of changes meeting the needs of the population.

To defeat the candidates of the UNR and reaction, our Party proposed putting forward a joint list with the Socialist and other democratic parties in the very first ballot in towns whose population exceeds 30,000, taking account of the respective influence of the parties concerned.

As for communes with populations under 30,000, the Party stated that the Communists would seek agreement with other democratic parties immediately after the first ballot, with due regard to the vote obtained by each.

In terms of preparations for the municipal elections, this attitude reflects the desire of the Party for unity aimed at barring UNR and reactionary representatives from municipal government.

In line with this decision, an agreement was reached in the Seine Department with the Socialist Party to put forward a joint list in towns of more than 30,000 inhàbitant.s Similar agreements were concluded in the Seine-et-Oise Department and in some towns elsewhere.

However, an agreement on unity between Socialists and Communists proved impossible in many towns because of the unprincipled coalitions formed by the Socialists, the MRP, the Independents and other reactionaries.

Such alliances sometimes go even further, as is the case in Mulhouse and in Strasbourg, where the Socialists appear in the same list as the UNR candidates.

In Bourges the Socialists share the same list with the reactionary Mayor, one of the staunchest backers of the government in the National Assembly. In Vierzon, the Socialists have refused to put forward a joint list with our Party and are preparing an alliance with the reactionaries, hoping to prevent the election of a municipal council headed by Communists.

*L'Humanité, January 23, 1965.

This line of action seriously injures working-class unity and the alliance of the democratic forces. It plays into the hands of the UNR and reaction, and greatly imperils the outlook for our country's democratic regeneration.

The danger presented by such alliances with reaction, including an alliance with the UNR, should be pondered by those taking this road.

The Communist Party, which did all in its power to bring about the agreements on unity reached with the first ballot in view, will scrupulously abide by these agreements and seek further agreements of a similar nature.

Furthermore, it is resolved to do its utmost to ensure that the agreements reached on a reciprocal basis for the purpose of defeating the candidates of the UNR and reaction become universal in the second ballot.

On the other hand, the Communist Party, which is pursuing a policy of unity meeting the interests of the working people and the need to open up prospects for democratic progress, condemns all alliances with reactionaries concluded before the first ballot. It will withhold all support from those alliances in the second ballot as well.

The Communist Party intends to conduct a clear-cut and honest campaign to ensure that the municipal elections should not be projected to a dead past but on the contrary, should contribute to the achievement of genuine democracy in our country.

JOINT COMMUNIQUE BY THE COMMUNIST PARTIES OF LATIN AMERICA

The Communist parties of Latin America met in conference at the end of 1964.

The Conference proceeded in an atmosphere of fraternal cooperation, in the spirit of a frank exchange of opinions and appreciation of common problems. There was a useful exchange of experience gained by all the peoples of the continent in their struggle against imperialism, for national emancipation, peace, democracy and socialism.

The Conference devoted special attention to the issue of solidarity with the people and government of Cuba. It is necessary to expand the movement for solidarity with Cuba all over the continent and to lend it a more resolute and organized character. By promoting the solidarity movement, organizations, leaders and parties not only fulfil their internationalist and Latin American duty but defend the interests, freedom, dignity and future of their own peoples.

In carrying out its tasks, the solidarity movement should make a special effort to achieve the restoration of diplomatic and commercial relations with Cuba, combat economic blockade, seek expanded trade, expose preparations for aggression, and the activities of counter-revolutionaries and other CIA agents, repel in good time the slander campaign against Cuba and its government organized and directed by the U.S. imperialists, and widely popularize the economic, social and cultural achievements of the Cuban revolution.

To support the anti-imperialist struggle of other Latin American peoples, the Conference approved the following recommendations:

—to encourage the formation of solidarity movements or juntas and lend campaigns against repressive measures a permanent character, so that this work would not be reduced to sporadic actions or occasional statements;

—to render active support to those who are being cruelly persecuted, specifically to the Venezuelan, Colombian, Guatemalan, Honduran, Paraguayan and Haitian freedom-fighters;

—to extend the anti-colonialist movement on the continent, firmly support the fight for the independence of Puerto Rico and British Guiana, the autonomy of Martinique, Guadeloupe and French Guiana, and the restituion of the Malvinas Island to Argentina, and support the national aspirations of the British and Dutch colonies in the Caribbean;

—to organize on a continental scale an active movement of all the Latin American peoples for solidarity with the liberation struggle of the Venezuelan people;

—to intensify the movement for solidarity with the Panamanian people, who are fighting a difficult battle against imperialism;

—to step up the campaign for the release of unlawfully imprisoned Communist leaders—Jesus Faria, Gustavo Machado and Pompeyo Marquez of Venezuela, Pedro Saad of Ecuador, Jacques Stephen Alexis of Haiti, Antonio Maidana of Paraguay, and Mario Alves, Ivan Ribeiro and Astrogildo Pereira of Brazil—as well as all persecuted patriots, working-class and democratic leaders;

—to foster the spirit of solidarity among the Latin American proletariat by organizing protest movements of the workers of all factories and bringing them to the notice of the World Federation of Trade Unions and all the independent united labor centers of Latin America.

The Conference emphasized the need to achieve closer relations between different parties, comparing notes, and getting to know one another better.

The Conference carefully examined the differences that have arisen in the world Communist movement, and adopted a relevant resolution, the main points of which are cited below.

FOR THE UNITY OF THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

The Communist parties whose representatives have met to compare notes reaffirm their determination actively to contribute to world Communist unity based on Marxist-Leninist principles and the policy documented of the 1967 and 1960 Meetings.

The Communist parties consider that unity is the chief guarantee of the success of our struggle against imperialism, for the national and social emancipation of all peoples, world peace, socialism and communism.

We are deeply concerned, therefore, about the situation in the world Communist movement, in which there are sharp differences threatening a split and playing into the hands of our enemies, prompting them to take a more aggressive stand.

The Communist parties consider it necessary to do their utmost to pave the way for unity, ensure mutual understanding in the socialist community, and avoid all that increases the danger of a split, hampers fraternal and constructive discussion and makes it difficult for the fraternal parties to act in a united front with the aim of overcoming the present divergencies and turning all their energy to the fight against the imperialists and other reactionaries.

We must base ourselves on common points of view expressing our common ideology, Marxism-Leninism, and do everything to ensure that solid unity on questions of principle wins the upper hand.

In view of this and the fact that the differences in the form in which they have begun to be discussed injure the world Communist movement, this Conference insists on immediately discontinuing public polemics and stresses the need to find appropriate ways of settling the issues that have arisen in a fraternal spirit, which should govern the relations between Marxist-Leninist parties.

This Conference also considers that the unity of each party is a necessary condition for the further development of the revolutionary process in the country concerned. Consequently, all factional activity, whatever its nature and origin, should be emphatically condemned.

This Conference considers that resolute steps should be taken to ensure the unity of the world Communist movement. This calls for bilateral and multilateral meetings and conferences, or conferences of all the Marxist-Leninist parties.

SPEECH* BY FIDEL CASTRO

We may say that what we have learned in the past six years of revolution is our most important gain. And there is something we can learn, for the revolution is a great school. Those who enter this school may be good or bad pupils. We must do our best to be good pupils in this excellent and unique school.

In these six years we have all acquired what is most valuable, that is, experience. If we use this experience properly, we will be able to move mountains in the next six years.

We have every grounds to say that 1964 was a remarkable year of the revolution, a year which saw great progress in every field, and tremendous changes in organization and quality. Above all else it was truly an "Economic Year," since the economy was the paramount concern of the people.

Like other years, it was a year of education, and all of them were years of organization and economic growth. Nevertheless, attention was focused on the economic problem, which is important to the country.

It was a year of extensive rehabilitation and a powerful uptrend in our agriculture and transport. It witnessed a steep rise in all production spheres, which we achieved by drawing on our own resources and in the face of all kinds of difficulties.

We can note with satisfaction that there was an appreciable uptrend in industry and that we at least provided conditions for definite progress in those branches where they were lacking.

We may register it as a major achievement that this year we will have more milk and meat and eggs, and will use lesser quantities of dry feeds, which have to be made largely from imported raw materials . . . As for sugar cane, its output went up last year.

Our effort in agriculture prompt the enemies of the revolution, the mouthpiece of imperialism, to slander us, alleging that we have given up the idea of industrializing the country and our original plans for industrialization. That is not surprising, of course, because they will keep on resorting to various tricks and falsehoods to mislead the peoples. We are already in a position to assess the experience I have mentioned, and the results we owe to our knowledge and practice. We now know quite well what to put our resources into first of all. We have come to realize that there always are various reasons for which we must make investments in a particular branch to the exclusion of another. And we will decide the question of priority in strict accordance with the nation's economic interests.

At the early stages of the revolution we were apparently not quite clear about a certain circumstance. I refer to our country's remarkable natural conditions and the vast potentialities of our agriculture. What happened? A single-crop economy based on sugar cane, the restrictions encountered by our sugar industry, and the lack of markets all caused a certain prejudice against cane. There was an allergy which may be described as lack of faith in agriculture. The need to develop industry, for its part, led to a certain underestimation of the potentialities of our agriculture.

Industrial production requires primarily plant and competent personnel. In agriculture, the decisive thing is land. And we have very fertile lands which, moreover, can be used virtually all the year round. No European country, no wealthy and industrially developed country of the world, can boast a climate comparable to ours. Neither the European countries, nor the United States, nor the other countries of the temperate zone, have such opportunities for agricultural development as Cuba.

We realized that in the new conditions, at a time when we had a practically unlimited market, when the people's requirements were growing day after day, and when the capacity of our home market was virtually unlimited, agriculture had to become the main factor in our development. As regards industrialization, it will not be long in coming — it will proceed in step with the rapid growth of agriculture and on its basis.

Fortunately, we saw that clearly and in good time. We know that it is not enough to have an ideal social system—to replace capitalism by socialism—unless the potentialities of the new system are properly utilized. Unless we have a clear idea of reality we will miss excellent opportunities even under socialism.

It should be clear, therefore, how important it is to apply Marxist-Leninist theory dialectically, from a revolutionary standpoint, in each particular set of conditions. This does not mean being a chauvinist or nationalist. Not at all. Chauvinism and nationalism pursue the selfishly ambitious aim of subordinating common to national interests, of betraying common interests to promote petty national interests. Yet national interests, that is, the interests of the woking people of a country, do not and cannot clash with those of the working people of other countries. For the interests of the working people both in the country and abroad can clash only with the interests of the exploiters, the enemies of the working class, in the country and on a world scale.

On the other hand, it should be clear that conditions vary from country to country and that every revolution develops in specific conditions differing from conditions elsewhere, often very considerably. There are both objective and subjective factors at work here. After all, different countries have different traditions, and their peoples have different characteristics which revolutionary leaders take into account in each particular case. This teaches revolutionary leaders not to imitate others mechanically but to make a through study of theory and apply it in practice, with due regard to the actual conditions in the country concerned.

Every people makes its own contribution to revolution and history. They contribute to the universal treasury of ideas and of culture as much as they can in the way of experience and knowledge.

We live in a complex and ever-changing world. It is indispensable for every country and every leading party which finds itself in a situation similar to ours, that is, in other words, engaged in a Marxist-Leninist revolution, to assimilate theory correctly and accurately in each particular case.

There is yet another important thing to point out: no one should try from anywhere to tell a revolutionary party what it has to do in particular circumstances. The policy to be followed by such a party has to be shaped by that party itself, by the people of the country in question. Of course, no one has ever tried to tell us what we have to do. First of all, because no party ever uses this method, and secondly, because should a party try such a thing on us, we would rebuff it with the greatest determination.

To those who have misgivings as to whose wits we should use, we say without the least hesitation: "We stand in no need whatever of borrowing anyone's brains! We don't have to borrow courage or heroism!"

These factors, which may be called subjective and which belong to the realm of consciousness, are plentiful in our country. But we are short of many material things. As a matter of fact, we are ninety miles from the U.S. imperialists, which means that our position is unlike that of any other socialist country. We are thousands of miles from the socialist community, and are the only socialist country in this hemisphere.

That is what makes it indispensable for us to be armed. That is why we need arms and why we asked for them. We are most grateful to the countries which have given them to us . . . The imperialists will never sincerely help a revolution anywhere in the world.

I believe no one doubts the imperialists' inability ever to make a disinterested contribution to a revolutionary process. Their "contribution" is aimed at making this process less revolutionary, at checking it or leading it astray. Besides, the imperialists never help anyone without strings attached . . .

We have said that we were willing to live in peace. I think this is what every nation demands and seeks. No country or people ever seeks war or violaes peace. I mean the countries governed by the people, by those hardest hit by war. We have said that if the imperialists want to do business with us we would be willing.

We have also said that we are prepared to discuss the terms of compensation for losses incurred to promote reciprocal interests. It would be rather a question of token compensation.

When we speak of trade . . . we mean that trade could benefit both them and us . . . When they make trade and the discontinuance of their hostile attitude conditional on certain things, we answer them: "We recognize no conditions or obligations other than those imposed by international law and legal standards. We will never accept any other conditions."

What happened when our country said it was ready to hold discussions and to live in peace? What was the imperialists' reaction? They reacted in an insolent manner, because they thought our position was hopeless, and imagined that we were in the water up to our neck, that we were drowning and so were asking them for mercy. That is perhaps the reason why the imperialists were so very surprised when they heard the statement made by Major Ernesto Guevara in the United Nations on behalf of the Revolutionary Government of Cuba.

One of the newspapers peddling imperialists ideas expressed its surprise at the fact and commented that some people apparently had not known how firm and militant Cuba's position was. Now they all know! Perhaps they are surprised. This shows how easily the imperialists fall into error and how easily they are embarrassed . . .

We do not at all think we must speak of imperialism every day, letting weeds choke our cane fields in the meantime. We do not, because a revolution is accomplished not by means of words or theory alone but by labor, by work in field and factory. Where would the theoretical superstructure be without the material basis? Doesn't Marxism-Leninism tell us? How can we forget about the importance of economic matters?

It is very well that we know what our enemies are thinking and how they react to our policy. The imperialists were brazen enough to declare that we would have to sever our relations with the socialist community if we wanted the imperialists to treat us better.

I believe every single revolutionary citizen of our country thinks that this is a shameless statement. I think they all consider it to be immoral and disgraceful. Even if the socialist camp were, represented by one country instead of the socialist community we have today, and even if it were limited to a country like ours, we would never barter away this one socialist country for a whole world dominated by the imperialists . . .

When we were attacked by the imperialists we began to receive assistance from the socialist community. We appreciated that assistance and were grateful for it. It was a source of inspiration to us. We will never be able to express our gratitude, we will never find the words to tell how generous that assistance was. But that assistance lulled our people into a somewhat complacent mood, prompting them to reason like this: "Oh, well, when the imperialists deprive us of something, the socialist camp makes up for it." It bred a tendency to consider our path easy.

We will have no right to regard ourselves as true revolutionaries, to feel strong and absolutely confident, until every revolutionary in our country is convinced that we will be able to overcome all difficulties with the resources of our own land, by the will and spirit and effort of our own people.

Does this mean that such a situation will arise? Perhaps we will never be put to such a test. But we prefer our people to be prepared for it and not to delude themselves by thinking that we will get everything from abroad . . .

The role of subjective factors has noticeably increased, now that our revolution is six years old. There can be no doubt that our people today are better organized, politically more conscious and more revolutionary than ever. I have not the slightest doubt that they could pass the test.

Socialism is a new social system based on tremendous creative energy, which gives rise to new ideas and brings added experience. It is in this sphere of ideas and experience that we must work. We must work creatively and must arrive at the right understanding of the ideas of Marx, Engels and Lenin as we make our contribution in accordance with the new conditions. It is our duty properly to carry forward the idea of the role of the Party and to establish institutions that will ensure the closest possible links between the masses and their vanguard, the Party.

We are gratified by the fact that these links are growing stronger from day to day as the working people take an increasingly active part in building up their vanguard and putting forward the finest and fittest for enlistment in this vanguard. The point is that a party which is the vanguard of the working people and represents the masses cannot be built up behind the backs of the masses or without them.

The idea of the dictatorship of the proletariat is inherent in Marxism-Leninism. Socialism is, in fact, a transition period politically embodied in the dictatorship of the proletariat. People all over the world have a distate for the term "dictatorship" which they associate with the dictatorship of individuals or camarillas, and above all with the dictatorship of exploiters. But the dictatorship of the proletariat is not exercised by an individual or camarilla. It is the dictatorship of a class which is not one of landed proprietors, big merchants or bankers, of course.

The dictatorship of the exploiters brought suffering to the people even under so-called representative democracy; it was either a military or a parliamentary class dictatorship. Those who sat in such parliaments represented the landowners, bankers, wealthy merchants and industrialists, and foreign monopoly interests.

Does the concept of the dictatorship of the proletariat run counter to the concept of democracy? Not at all. We will see it easily if we go deeper into the matter and get to its root. In the United States, for example, there is a class dictatorship of the big bankers and monopolists. It exists in a form which may be called a bourgeois democracy. The dictatorships existing in Nicaragua, Honduras and Guatemala are dictatorships of the monopolists and landed proprietors. But in those countries they take the form of military dictatorships and not bourgeois democratic regimes. In other words, there is no democracy there but a class dictatorship.

Under socialism, state power is in the hands of a different class. The bourgeoisie has no political rights in the country and wields no power. The concepts in operation under socialism are entirely different.

We must create institutions which will properly apply the principle of proletarian democracy within the framework of the class dictatorship of the proletariat. Our Party should constitute their principal element and main content.

Our revolution is six years old. In the next few years we will have to establish our political institutions and local government bodies, and formulate constitutional laws at national and local level. These laws will be different from the bourgeois constitutional laws of the past.

Our future is clear. We will have to live in unfavorable international conditions for a long time to come.

When will the imperialists bring themselves to talk with us? We would like them to talk with several revolutions rather than with one. For it is not merely a question of the imperialists respecting our rights and pledging themselves not to interfere in Cuban affairs. We must tell them that they must promise not to interfere in the affairs of Vietnam and Venezuela, and to stop interfering in Guatemalan and Congolese affairs.

Who is to tell the imperialists when and how they should begin negotiations? The peoples. They will teach the imperialists to do that. Some day the imperialists will have to talk with Cuba as well as other countries. When will that be? Nobody can say exactly. All that we can say is that the day will come. Sooner or later the imperialists will learn to talk with the revolutionary peoples who have cast off imperialist tyranny. We have to be realistic. Before starting any talks with us the imperialists will no doubt put forward certain conditions. And we have said that we would accept no conditions set by them.

However, we are revolutionaries and hence realistic. We must not adhere to one position in theory and to another in practice. We must not approach theory in one way and practice in another. I am quite certain that even in present-day conditions in our country we can, for all the hostility of the imperialists, carry on our creative effort and make progress, specifically economic progress. We have no forebodings and are by no means anticipating bad times. We say this without the least hesitation. But we must work hard if we want to make proper use of our favorable prospects.

Sugar prices on the world market have dropped and that means we will be deriving less foreign exchange from sugar sales than we need for purchases on the world market. But it is just as certain that in many industries we will have more products as a result of our effort.

We may experience difficulties for another two years or so. But we are making fairly rapid progress in other branches of the economy and are in a position to increase the rate of growth, improve the supply of consumer goods, and put out other export items. The fact is that all we can export at the moment is sugar. We have always been dependent on our cane harvest and on sugar price fluctations on the world market. But then a substantial amount of our sugar goes to the socialist countries at stable prices which satisfy us.

We will continue to export as much sugar as at present. But the extra output of sugar will go mainly to the socialist community, at prices satisfactory to us.

This means that the bulk of our output will go to consumers who have stable commercial relations with us and pay us good prices.

So long as our economy retains its specific features, it will be important for us to have more foreign exchange for the purchase of goods on the world market. But this is not a decisive factor. We will not run into debt with any capitalist country. What the imperialists say in an effort to undermine our trade with other countries is so much slander. We had occasion to state that we would go hungry if we had to rather than fail to pay all our debts, down to the last centavo.

Does anyone doubt that we will cut all of our sugar cane? Of course not. Yet we have plenty of it and we must cut it all. The imperialists may doubt that but we don't. We will cut all of our cane, to the last stalk. We will do it even if we are short of labor, of volunteers. How? By mobilizing everyone if necessary. We already have 500 combine harvesters and an even greater number of loaders . . .

Our defenses are stronger now because we are better organized. And while in the past we gave a great deal of attention to defense, we can—now that we are much stronger—make a greater economic effort. . .

I would like to touch on yet another question. What is the evil we must uproot? Did you say red tape? Well, we think you are perfectly right. But how are we to go about it? Should we create unemployment by firing people? No, that would be wrong and unfair. If we were to lay off anyone we would have to began with ourselves, because it is we who have bred red tape. To be precise, red tape has come down to us from the past, but in some cases we contributed to it and in others failed to combat it effectively.

Does this mean that those who work in government offices should be looked down upon? Not at all. There is administrative work that is indispensable. We must not confuse administrative activity with red tape. Red tape is due above all else to the belief that the office means everything. To begin with, that is a 100 per cent petty-bourgeois image of the world as an office, something utterly alien to the proletarian spirit. Secondly, it is a matter of gross overestimation of certain administrative functions, which, too, can be traced to a definite world outlook.

In many organizations there is a persistent tendency to set up vertical associations covering the whole of our long and narrow island, spanning it from tip to tip. Very often this is at variance with the degree of development of the branch of the economy concerned. Undoubtedly, we must improve or reorganize many government bodies to make them more flexible and efficient. It is organizational patterns prompted by erroneous notions that often breed red tape. Moreover, they foster a petty-bourgeois psychology within the framework of the proletarian revolution and a careless attitude to state funds on the part of many officials.

Red tape has many roots. It is an evil that belongs to the past only in part. I feel very strongly that socialism will have to fight red tape as vigorously as it fights imperialism. It will be fought by the masses and the Party. Today there are many organizations, and even factories, that are overstaffed. We are not going to fire anyone or cut anyone's pay by as much as a centavo. We will set up trade schools, but we do not plan to entrust this job to any one organization. The Party will contribute its share, coordinating its work with the Ministries of Labor and Education.

But what are we to do if tens of thousands of our people turn out to be out of useful jobs when we have accomplished this rationalization? We will have to make them study.

What shall we call this year? Did someone suggest calling it "Sugar Cane Year"? What's that I hear about red tape? Oh, I see, it is suggested that we make it "Fight Red Tape Year." However, some suggest calling it "Agricultural Year."

I admit that I like the idea of making it a "Fight Red Tape Year." The suggestion about agriculture isn't bad at all, either. But I fear that red tape may survive if we don't fight it . . .

Someone here suggests calling this year "Production Year," but I think that just now this sounds too vague. I repeat that calling this year "Agricultural Year" is a good idea because it implies studying agriculture, increasing its efficiency, developing it, setting up specialized schools, publishing great quantities of agricultural literature, and so on . . .

I think that suggestion is an indication of the common sense of the masses and we will concentrate on this branch—agriculture —in particular on greater use of machinery.

On the other hand, since we realize the need to fight red tape, we must entrust our Party with carrying out the people's mandate, which is to combat this evil.

On the sixth anniversary of our revolution we wish our people happiness and success in this "Agricultural Year" on behalf of all the comrades in the Revolutionary Leadership.

Patria o muerte! Venceremos!

BUILDING A MASS PARTY*

Claude Jones

The 20th Congress of the Communist Party of Australia set the aim of laying the foundations for building a mass party and laying down an 18-month plan in preparation for a decisive advance to this goal. In so doing Congress finally settled accounts with sectarianism and narrowness which confused and distorted Party thinking on this vital question, despite decisions of previous Congresses.

In particular, it marked the final rejection of the Hill group's opposition to and sabotage of Party building. Hill counterposed the absurd concept of a small "pure" group of "Marxist-Leninists" —a narrow sect isolated from and contemptuous of the working people.

The 20th Congress issued an inspiring call to build the Party. This arose not only from the subjective wishes or desires of Congress delegates. Building the Party means extending its influence and leadership to wider sections of the working people. It means tackling in a more sustained and vigorous way the problems of mass work and leadership and lifting the level of mass ideological propaganda and explanation. It is a pressing necessity if the Party is to carry through the tasks set before it by life itself.

The clarification of the Party line and the impressive unity behind this line are a clear pointer to the maturity of the Party. The Party at all levels is surer in its work and is beginning to make bigger strides in building the unity of the working class in the struggles against monopoly capitalism and in seeking out, initiating and leading the struggles of the people on all sorts of big and small issues. Providing the proper political and organizational leadership is given at all levels, significant and important advances will be made during 1965.

The mood and temper of the working class is militant and for struggle. From one end of Australia to the other, but particularly in the three eastern states, there have been widespread and sustained struggles during most of this year. Workers are demanding higher wages and margins, and in many cases winning them. There is growing hostility and increasing mass criticism and action against both Federal and State Arbitration Courts and their penal provisions.

There is deeper understanding of unity and more and more practice of the united front in action. There is an increasing isolation of the Right wing and routing of the NCC candidates in union election by candidates standing for unity and struggle.

The hope of the capitalist class and governments that the workers would be bought off with the mid-year basic wage increase was not realized. The widespread and barefaced price increases following so quickly on the wage gains are stimulating all sorts of mass opposition and protest. The workers see the enormous profits of monopoly, experience the increasing intensity and speed-up of labor and are vigorously demanding an increased share.

In addition to the workers, wide sections of the people are becoming alarmed at growing monopoly exploitation and the cynical and wholesale disposal of our natural resources to overseas monopolies. In this developing favorable situation we need to discuss much more concretely the role and character of our Party. We are a militant socialist Party guided by Marxism-Leninism. Our purpose is to lead the working class to fulfil its historic task of ending capitalism and building a socialist Australia. This aim conditions our thinking, policies and activity.

But the starting point is deep concern and involvement in the down-to-earth struggles of the workers around immediate demands. The Party needs to be deeply connected with the people, not only with the working class, but all sections of the working people. This depends upon its ability to give leadership to the many questions arising in the day-to-day struggles against monopoly capitalism, its governments and agents.

Every action, every struggle of the workers is assisted to the very best of the Party's ability and capacity. The fight for immediate demands enables the workers to fight better for the future. The ability of the Party to lead the workers in their daily struggle is constantly improving. As subjectivism and sectarianism are shed, the Party's leadership becomes better both collectively and individually.

Everywhere there are splendid examples of very good activity involving a wide mobilization of the workers and requiring the solution of quite complex tactical problems. The line and proposals of the Party are accepted and the respect for the Party and individual Communists grows. But it is often found during the course of the struggle and at its successful conclusion that the Party had either grown little or not at all.

Too often it is said "wait till the struggle is over and we wil get some new members." To put the question this way denies th leading role of the Party. It is in fact submergence of the Party in the mass movement, a rejection of the concept of building a mass Party. It is also opposed to long years of experience that it is in the course of the struggle itself that the political consciousness of the worker is heightened, his attitude to the Communist Party changes and he is more likely to become a member.

It is true that the prestige and influence of the Party and individuals grow during struggle. This is a very good thing which can and should lead to an increase in the strength and influence of the Party. Mass political action and the building of the Party cannot be separated. The statement "wait till the struggle is over and we will get new members" does in fact separate mass political action from Party building and is in fact a right opportunist approach to this vital question of building the Party. This is one of the weaknesses which must be tackled if the Party building campaign is to be successful.

There are other impediments in the way which will have to be tackled, such as "the branch . . . it is pretty dead and it wouldn't be good to bring a new member in." Some honest workers won't join the Party because they believe they "are not good enough to be a Party member." The life and activity of the Party branch require constant attention, as well as our personal attitude to the people.

A relatively small Party, no matter how hard working and heroic, cannot tackle and handle the very complex problems of the class struggle in the way that can bring the whole movement forward. Our 20th Congress unanimously rejected the thoroughly incorrect view that what the Australian working class needs is a small elite Party of "pure Marxists" ready to spring into action when the time comes, and declared for the building of the biggest and broadest Party in the conditions of today.

Whilst it would be wrong to suggest that the Party is on the verge of enrolling tens of thousands of members, the conditions exist for increasing Party membership and consequently extending the Party influence considerably beyond the present position and laying the foundations for building a mass Party.

The concept of a mass Party is not something new or "revisionist." Lenin long ago attacked those who, because of sectarian narrowness or fear of new people, put up barriers against the building of a mass Party and the wide enrolment of militant workers. Writing "On the reorganization of the Party" in 1905, he said: "The working class is instinctively, spontaneously social-democratic, and more than ten years of work put in by social democracy has done a great deal to transform this spontaneity into consciousness. Don't invent bugaboos comrades! Don't forget that in every live and growing party there will always be elements of instability, vacillation, wavering. But these elements can be influenced, and they will submit to the influence of the steadfast and solid core of social democrats." The 20th Congress resolution was in line with Lenin's long substantiated correct views when it stated: "By going boldly among the masses and recruiting widely, the Party not only increases its size but greatly enriches its collective experience and wisdom. New members may bring into the Party all kinds of non-Marxist ideas, but these are overcome by participation in mass activity, in Party life, and the study of Marxism-Leninism."

If the decisions on Party building are to be carried through successfully there must be a critical and concrete examination of all aspects of Party work. Bare exhortations and schematic plans will not bring success. Political cobwebs and a certain conservatism need to be cleared away in the course of frank and comradely discussions. Discussions are needed in the light of today's possibilities and reality of some fundamental questions on Party building which are too often and erroneously regarded as self-evident.

Recently a series of discussions on Party building was held in a number of sectors of work in Queensland. These preliminary discussions were stimulating and encouraging. The Party organizations concerned were made up of devoted capable comrades enjoying wide mass support and respect, elected and re-elected to high positions in their mass organizations despite the most vicious campaigns by the capitalist class and the NCC. Collectively they know intimately and work with hundreds of militant workers, but the membership remains the same and press sales and finance are way below what they could be.

During the discussions some comrades were somewhat startled to come to the realization that the main problem in building the Party was in their own thinking. Concrete plans are arising from these frank and splendid discussions. One group plans to double its membership by 1965; others are discussing increasing membership by 25 per cent to 50 per cent. Already proper planning and checking are bringing increased press sales and will bring finance.

These discussions are raising other points about the internal life of the Party organizations and about the various forms of Party organization. Are we too conservative in our approach to forms of organization? Are we in some cases and places hanging on, in dogmatic fashion, to forms of organization which have become either outdated in new concrete conditions or have proved inadequate in practice?

Is the level of mass ideological work of a high enough quality? Do the propaganda and agitation of the Party show clearly the connection between the present and the future, aiming all the time to lift the socialist consciousness of the workers? Is enough thought and skill being given to the form, content and topicality of all the propaganda media?

These questions and others are important ones to solve if the Party is to hold and consolidate the hundreds of new members which will be won during 1965. They are questions arising from life and cannot be discussed or solved in a vacuum. Organizations which discuss them concretely and link them with the solution of the political organizational problems posed by the Party building campaign will gain excellent all-round results.

Such questions arise from reality. They will be properly discussed and solved in the course of the political, organizational activity of Party organizations carrying through the Party building campaign.

The aim during 1965 is to build and strengthen the Party, paying particular attention to winning and consolidating new members. The targets set by the Central Committee of 500 members, £120,000 and a 10 per cent increase in press sales are modest ones and can be fulfilled. But the targets are not mechanical things in themselves. In conducting the ideological, organizational work to reach and pass them, the Party committees and branches are lifting their collective understanding, and grappling more concretely with both left and right hindrances which hold the Party from the masses and prevent the building of the Party.

With proper attention from leading Party committees, involving the full and enthusiastic participation of all committee members, 1965 can become a significant year of successful Party building.

WALTER ULBRICHT ON THE WARSAW CONFERENCE*

Q: What was the reason for calling the Warsaw conference, which has aroused worldwide interest?

A: The meeting was made necessary by the new situation in Europe, which seriously imperils peace and security. This situation is characterized, among other things, by the increasingly adventurous policy of the West German Federal government. Nuclear armament, dogged attempts to gain control of atomic weapons, plans for nuclear mine belt along West Germany's eastern frontier, the agggressive "forward strategy," the threat of "undercover" and civil war against the German Democratic Republic, made by high-placed spokesmen of the Federal Government, the unrelenting arming of West Germany, and a more and more active policy of revenge are some of the essential elements of the new situation.

The West German government, which is itself a product of international tensions and hopes to promote its revenge-seeking policy by maintaining and increasing them, is playing — obstinately and with old disdain for people — the role of an international center resisting the effort for peace, security, and mutual understanding between nations.

Q: That business of a nuclear mine belt has undoubtedly caused widespread alarm. But both in West Germany and elsewhere there are quite a few people who refuse to see the danger. They believe — and want us to believe — that — there's no evil intention behind the idea, that the devil is not so terrible as he is painted.

A: Our people had to pay dearly in two world wars for the underestimation of the aggressiveness and adventurism of the then imperialist rulers of the country. They mustn't scorn the lessons of history any more.

Note that high-ranking government officials in West Germany openly discuss plans for war on German soil, to be waged with both conventional and nuclear arms, and have already begun to test those plans in army maneuvers. Vice-Chancellor Mende, who is a member of the cabinet and the Defense Commission of the Bundestag, that is, a man who should be well posted on the Bonn government's plans and intentions, openly threatened us with "undercover" and civil war. National Defense Minister Hoffmann of the GDR was obliged, at a press conference, to give warning about the fate that would befall anyone who took part in aggression against the GDR.

Preparations for the NATO multilateral nuclear force have already resulted in bringing West German military personnel into very close contact with atomic warheads and carrier missiles and in enabling it to train carefully in that field. There is at least one ship equipped with atomic missiles, and manned in part by West Germans. Were the plans for the MLF to materialize — in a U.S. or British or some other version — a number of ships carrying atomic missiles would find themselves under the command of West German generals and admirals, who during World War II showed what they are capable of.

The West German government has made preparations for the manufacture of atomic arms of its own both in West Germany and abroad. Missile production is already under way in West Germany. The number of West German military men in key NATO posts and staffs is so great that there can be no question of the West German militarists being controlled by their NATO allies.

Anyone who shuts his eyes to these and many other no less convincing facts risks pursuing an illusory policy. We, however, are in the habit of taking account of facts and not of the fine talk that wolves dish up on big occasions. This means that we are appraising the new situation and drawing proper conclusions with due regard to the facts, even though the wolves resent it.

Q: Why was the conference held in Warsaw?

A: The Political Consultative Committee could no doubt have met in the capital of some other member country. But I think it was most appropriate to hold it in Warsaw.

A few days before the conference Poland celebrated the 20th anniversary of Warsaw's liberation from Hitler occupation. Twenty years ago Warsaw lay in ruins. Comrade Gomulka mentioned that in his introductory remarks. In that Polish city alone, some 800,000 men, women and children fell victims to the Hitler German militarists. In other words, two-thirds of the 1,200,000 people who lived in the Polish capital on the eve of the Second World War were destroyed by the invaders.

The Polish people rebuilt Warsaw through tremendous effort and sacrifice, and the city today is more beautiful than ever. The bitter experience of a city so cruelly ravaged by the German militarists undoubtedly provided a suitable background for our conference.

Q: What did the allied socialist countries want to achieve in Warsaw?

A: The Conference Communique reveals that the Political Consultative Committee was to appraise the new situation, examine its possible consequences for the peace and security of our nations, and plan joint measures.

Account was taken of the fact that the growing war danger in Europe is in the final analysis a result of constant violations of the fundamental provisions of the Potsdam agreement by Bonn, violations which the imperialist Western Powers abet. This necescitated discussion of the ways and means of restoring respect for international treaties.

We discussed and partly planned measures in the most different fields, considered necessary for safeguarding peace and the security and peaceful labor of our countries. Thus the conference was also aimed at calling the potential aggressor to order and at taking effective steps toward peace and security.

We regard the outcome of the conference as a gain for European peace and security. It has opened a new stage in the fight against granting the West German Federal Republic a share in the control of nuclear weapons in any form.

Q: It is natural that a conference as important as that should begin with an appraisal of the situation. You listed some elements of the new situation, particularly as regards the aggressive policy of Bonn. What was the appraisal agreed on in Warsaw?

A: The Communique answered that. The GDR delegation circulated to the delegates a memorandum giving irrefutable factual data on atomic armament, the "forward strategy," and West Germany's preparations for an "undercover" war. Among other things, the memorandum speaks frankly, forcefully and in detail of the strategic doctrine of Bonn as an expression of its revanchist aspirations towards the socialist countries, of the steadily growing influence Bonn exerts on the NATO nuclear powers' target planning and atomic war planning in general, and of what Bonn is doing step by step to gain control of nuclear arms.

I would like to state that there was complete agreement on the appraisal of the present situation. This applies particularly to the role of Bonn as an international center obstructing the effort for peace and international understanding.

The entirely negative policy of the West German Government is not the only thing characteristic of the new situation. The principal trends of world history point the other way: at this stage they are characterized by the growth of the peace forces.

There was also agreement on the appraisal of the special role envisaged for a NATO multilateral nuclear force involving West Germany. This plan was unanimously condemned as a serious threat to European and world peace.

It is clear, however, that the military technical resources at the disposal of the Warsaw Treaty countries' armed forces create a situation in which every aggressor must remember that he can be destroyed.

Q: What do you think of the role of the Erhard cabinet, whose members have taken the initiative in proposing a multilateral nuclear force?

A: Federal Chancellor Erhard declared in taking office that he was going to pursue a middle course, that is, a policy of smoothing things over. It is quite obvious, however, that his actual policy is aimed at anything but smoothing things over. Indeed, he is out to foster the policy of revenge. The actual difference between Erhard and Adenauer as politicians is chiefly that Erhard seeks an agreement with the United States that would give him a share in the control of atomic weapons. Furthermore, he sees France and Britain as auxiliary forces, while Adenauer put the alliance with France first, hoping that he could with the help of France and its nuclear arms force the United States into aggreeing to West Germany's nuclear armament and into backing the revanchist policy of Bonn.

Q: Would you mind describing, in as simple terms as possible, the nature and aim of the policy of multilateral nuclear armament? After all, this issue has become exceedingly complicated.

A: The point is that the dominant groups in West Germany are trying to blackmail the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries by linking their revanchist demands with the claim to a say in the use of nuclear arms and the organization of war provocations.

Unfortunately, the opinion prevailing among the Social-Democratic leaders is that a nuclear war policy is the means by which the GDR can be incorporated in the West German Federal Republic.

Q: What did the Warsaw conference say about the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons?

A: The Warsaw Treaty countries are opposed to the proliferation of nuclear arms, especially to the transfer of such arms to the West German militarists in any form. This means that they consider a NATO multilateral nuclear force in any variant incompatible with a ban on the spread of nuclear arms.

We think this particularly important because the U.S. government evidently reckons that the socialist countries would favor an agreement banning proliferation even after a multilateral nuclear force had been created. We are convinced that the issue of banning nuclear arms proliferation provides a basis for broad international cooperation against the nuclear arming of West Germany. True, the United Nations has already passed several resolutions insisting on such a ban, but that is not enough. We think it indispensable to lay down this demand in an international treaty.

Q: The Bonn government was defeated at the NATO Council meeting in Paris. Some people contend therefore that the danger of the MLF is no longer so great. What is your opinion?

A: Bonn was defeated because it linked its so-called initiative on the German question with a direct claim to a share in the control of nuclear weapons. France and Britain, and even the United States, rightly fear that given such a policy, the West German leadership might draw them into a nuclear war. In addition, neither France, Britain nor the United States wants German reunification.

Nevertheless, the United States still wants to hasten West Germany's atomic armament, provided it is done under American leadership and command. In other words, it favors atomic blackmail against the socialist countries but wants this blackmail to remain under its control.

It is wrong, therefore, to imagine that the danger of the MLF is no longer so great. This danger will persist so long as a West German government reaches out for nuclear arms, so long as there is no disarmament and revanchism has not been eliminated.

Q: Some West Germans feel that Bonn's plans for atomic armament and a nuclear mine belt are so insensate that nobody need fear they will ever materialize. Would you like to comment on that?

A: Historical experience disproves that point of view. I think we would deserve a thrashing if we forgot the lessons of history.

When, in 1940, shortly after the beginning of World War II, the German imperialists and their Hitler generals, some of whom today head the Bundeswehr and hold key positions in NATO, decided on attacking the Soviet Union, some top-level statesmen refused to take it seriously. After all, the war in the West was not over yet, and so those statesmen considered such a plan, clearly suicidal to the aggressor, to be improbable.

The peoples, including the German people, had to pay an enormous price for that underestimation of the traditionally adventurous policy of the German imperialists and their generals, and for their just as traditional inability to assess the balance of world forces in realistic terms. Historical experience suggests that no plan for aggression is too adventurous as far as the present West German government and its revanchist politicians and Hitler generals are concerned.

Herr Strauss, the leader of the Christian-Social Union, said a while ago that Hitler had wanted no world war. According to Strauss, Hitler had not imagined that Britain would step in after the Wehrmacht had marched into Poland. This means that Strauss wants to justify the attack on Austria, Czechoslovakia and Poland. Only, he thinks Hitler should first have satisfied himself that Britain was amenable to an agreement of the Munich type on Poland as well. This shows the spirit that is still alive among the ruling circles in West Germany.

Q: Some NATO governments affirm that the MLF would prevent the Federal Republic from gaining control of nuclear arms. Would it?

A: I regard that assertion as a deliberate attempt at deceit or, at best, as an indication of remarkable naïveté. However, it is the sort of naïveté that certain dominant groups in Britain, France and the United States have for many years shown in their dealings with German imperialism.

Let me remind you of Munich or the well-known naval agreement between Britain and Hitler Germany. In one case the Western Powers helped Hitler commit an act of aggression, mistakenly hoping that they would thereby safeguard peace for themselves and divert the aggressor to the East.

In the other case, the British government gave its contractual consent to a limited naval armament of Hitler Germany, hoping thus to keep Hitler's naval force within bounds tolerable to Britain. In reality, however, the Western Powers' Munich deal paved for the German militarists the way to aggression and World War II. As for the naval agreement, Britain merely legalized Hitler Germany's naval arms drive, which until then had been carried on illegally and had therefore been somewhat slow and had encountered certain difficulties.

Q: Comrade Ulbricht, do you see any connection between the revanchist policy of the Bonn government, the attempt to set up a NATO multilateral nuclear force and Bonn's claim to West Berlin?

A: There undoubtedly is a connection. Bonn's claim to West Berlin and the forms in which the claim is expressed — such as the illegal and provocative meeting of Bundestag commissions or the provocative conduct of the Federal President — are an important component of the policy of revenge, as are also the ideas of "forward strategy," a nuclear mine belt, and participation in a multilateral nuclear force.

Let there be no mistake: West Berlin does not belong to the West German Federal Republic, and never will. The issue of West Berlin affects vital interests of the German Republic.

This matter is as important to us as, say, the question of the peace frontier along the Oder and Neisse is to People's Poland. Like the other Warsaw Treaty countries, we flatly reject Bonn's contention that West Berlin is part of the Federal Republic.

Q: What did the Warsaw conference recommend to safeguard peace in Europe?

A: Since peace on our continent is indivisible, the Political Consultative Commission declared in favor of a series of proposals designed to create step by step a genuine system of collective security for all European nations.

Those proposals include the ones for an end to the nuclear arms race, and a denuclearized zone in Central Europe, and the well-known Polish proposal for a European conference to discuss collective security measures. There are also the still valid and urgent proposals for a non-aggression pact between the Warsaw Treaty and NATO countries, and for the removal of the remnants of World War II and for a peaceful German settlement.

The Communique stresses that the Warsaw Treaty countries support the German Democratic Republic's proposals for the renunciation of nuclear weapons by both Germany states. I am certain that by renouncing nuclear weapons the Germans would make a valuable contribution to European peace. Besides, the Political Consultative Committee also supported all proposals for the complete prohibition and destruction of all nuclear weapons throughout the world, and for global disarmament.

Q: What is the opinion of the Warsaw Treaty countries about cooperation between European nations?

A: All speakers at the Warsaw conference voiced a desire for close cooperation among all nations of Europe. The GDR shares that desire. It holds a special position as a state. As a result of historical development since World War II, it has become the focus of the main problems of European coexistence. In a certain respect, mutual understanding with the GDR is the key to durable peace and mutual understanding throughout Europe.

Because we are the peaceful German state which has outgrown its part, it is natural that the German Democratic Republic should have taken the initiative in seeking a lasting peace for the German people.

Is a thaw in Europe possible? I think so. The ice of cold war, which has blocked cooperation in Europe for so long, can be melted. Our policy is aimed at a thaw in Europe. We are willing to cooperate with all Europeans of goodwill.

We should begin by achieving a genuine detente through normal relations between European nations. This calls first of all for goodwill on the part of all and a readiness to cooperate on the basis of mutual trust.

We are convinced that such a thaw would benefit all European nations as far as the maintenance of peace is concerned.

We favor a European security system safeguarding the security of all European countries and relieving all Europeans of the war menace. In connection with disarmament measures, we also favor an agreement on control over the manufacture of armaments, and control measures in both German states to prevent surprise attack.

We believe that a common history and an age-long culture to which every European nation has made its own unforgettable contribution, and also the common interest in safeguarding peace are conducive to peaceful coexistence and close cooperation irrespective of differences in world outlook and political views.

We, the socialist countries, feel that we have a special responsibility for the European nations' humanistic and cultural heritage, because two-thirds of European territory belongs to the socialist countries and every other inhabitant of our continent is a citizen of this or that socialist country.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS AND THEIR AFTERMATH*

Luigi Longo

GENERAL SECRETARY, ITALIAN COMMUNIST PARTY

This meeting of our Party's Central Committee is going to examine the political situation following the presidential election.

Our Central Committee is the first among the leading bodies of the different political parties to meet after the long and arduous battle which Italy's political forces had to carry on in twenty-one ballots over thirteen days. We emerge from that battle with considerable success and with increased faith in our strength and our political line.

It is no accident, of course, that the Christian Democrats, on the other hand, are still unable to so much as fix the date of their National Council. They were defeated in that battle, with the result that they are rent by serious differences and have lost a good deal of prestige.

The fight against Leone's nomination was primarily aimed at defending the Constitution and opposing the Christian Democrats' Dorothean candidate. The firmness and unity which the parliamentary groups of the Communist Party showed from the first, and their explicit resolve to arrive at an agreed solution based on Left unity inspired the resistance of various groups to Dorothean domination.

From the first ballots on, our parliamentary groups made clear that they were going to vote for a lay or Catholic Left candidate who guaranteed that he would pay heed to the serious requirements of the nation's socio-political progress and would, unlike the Dorothean candidate, express the will of a wide range of democratic forces. That is why our explicit aim throughout the ballots was to bring about the broadest possible unity of the democratic Left forces, lay and Catholic alike.

It was no easy task to achieve that aim, for there were contradictions among the lay as well as the Christian Democratic Lefts.

*Report to the CC, ICP. Abridged from l'Unita, Jan. 15, 1965.

The term "Dorothean" is applied to the Christian Democratic group of conservative leanings which in January 1959 met at the Convent of Santa Maria Dorotea (hence its name) and decided to relieve Fanfani of his office as Party secretary and Prime Minister. Today the Dorotheans represent the relative majority in the CDP and lend a markedly "centrist" character to the policy of the "Center Left" government.

Besides, the four candidates were opposed to one another, and to the last minute this made it impossible to rally the forces they headed in support of one candidate.

These difficulties should be borne in mind by anyone who wants to appreciate the success scored through the defeat of the Dorothean candidate. In the previous presidential elections, the Dorothean candidate defeated his Left opponent, while in these it was the other way round. The CDP leaders stinted no effort to push their man through. They sought contact with us in a bid for our votes. They even said they were ready to join with us in looking for a candidate—a Dorothean if possible, or at least a Christian Democrat who would be acceptable to all. However, they ruled out the nomination of Fanfani or Pastore, proposed by us, for the two men were considered "rebels" who had violated CDP discipline.

The deadlock over Leone, who was losing votes from ballot to ballot, even after Fanfani and Pastore had withdrawn their names, compelled the Dorothean leadership to extend the list of candidates as well. When we proposed nominating Saragat, whom we had always said we were willing to vote for, Rumor contended that the Christian Democrats could not vote for a "lay" candidate who was a Socialist and, moreover, had opposed their official nominee. The Christian Democrats stood pat in several ballots. But when they saw that they were getting nowhere they tried a different approach. They raised the question of the procedure to follow in seeking for a candidate who could win a majority. They suggested putting forward a so-called assembly candidate, that is, appointing one candidate to be agreed on at a meeting of parliamentary group leaders. They imagined that through such an appointment, apparently behind the backs of the parties, they would be able to put forward one of the candidates they had in store.

Needless to say we flatly rejected the procedure they suggested. We repeated that we were ready to discuss the choice of a common candidate with all democratic groups, that we were not biased either against the lay candidates who had appeared in the various ballots (Saragat and Nenni) or against the Left Christian Democratic candiates (Fanfani and Pastore), and that we did not even rule out the possibility of considering some other candidate although we could think of no acceptable names just then.

However, we made all agreement conditional on open and frank discussions unequivocally precluding all discrimination against us. This was a principle of our activity, along with the effort to achieve unity of the Lefts, who from the very first ballots had opposed the Dorothean candidate, and constituted a substantial majority. Should it prove impossible to achieve Left unity on one opposition candidate, the votes at our command would still enable us to exert decisive influence on the choice of the candidate and force the Christian Democrats into serious talks with us on a candidate acceptable to us.

There was a moment when we thought Fanfani might be able to win a Left majority. But he failed to bring support from the syndicalist "basists,"* even from those of them who had promised it. In the case of the lay Lefts, Fanfani only secured the votes of the Italian Socialist Party of Proletarian Unity. All this was logical.

The strong stand taken by Fanfani against the Moro Dorothean group and the Moro cabinet must have marked him as the candidate who undermined the government's position more than anyone else. That stand lost him the votes of the Left Center parties. I believe, however, that Fanfani seriously considered the possibility of making Rumor accept his nomination. The struggle inside the CDP compelled Fanfani to seek for contacts and agreements with all non-Dorothean Christian Democrats. It should be remembered that his opposition to the Center Left has never been quite clear as to its content, nor is this accidental. To be specific, it has always been such as not to jeopardize a possible convergence of Right-wing votes on his name—meaning not only those of the liberals but possibly those of the Italian Socialist Movement as well.

We must now trace back some of the important stages of the presidential elections and of the actions initiated by our Party. The eighth ballot suggested that the various positions had crystallized to such an extent that the elections could not be brought to a positive conclusion.

That is the reason why, after the eighth ballot, we proposed to the Italian Socialist Party, Italian Socialist Party of Proletarian Unity, Italian Social-Democratic Party and Italian Republican Party that we should meet to decide jointly on a collective vote.

By declining our invitation, the ISDP made the five-party meeting impossible. But while putting it on record that the meeting could not be held, we declared that we we would keep in touch with all democratic forces to resolve the crisis on the basis of unity.

Nothing but united opposition by these forces would make it possible (a) to defeat the Dorothean candidate; (b) to continue the search for a candidate representing all the Left forces, and (c) to leave the door open, in any case, to eventual talks with the Christian Democrats in order to impose a non-Dorothean candidate upon them. In the circumstances, our Party's activity and initiative were decisive, because our Party was the only one that could rally the different, still divided forces and establish a homogeneous and decisive majority. But whatever our initiative, it must not undermine, or even create the impression of undermining, either by lay Left forces or the forces of the Left Christian Democrats. In fact, it was the continued resistance and opposition of these forces that prevented the Dorothean group in power to impose its candidate.

After Saragat had withdrawn his name it looked as if Fanfani had a better chance of securing the required majority. We strove for unity on this but Pastore and Fanfani complicated things by refusing to run, even though dissension continued, finding expression in blank ballot-papers.

The Socialist leadership and parliamentary groups began a new phase by proposing the nomination of Comrade Nenni. They explained that they were addressing this proposal to "all the lay and Catholic Left parties and groups to enable the National Assembly to find a way out of the difficult position in which it found itself, lacking an adequate majority for the election of the Head of State." Thus Nenni's name promised to rally the Left votes. But this was true only in theory, for the ISDP had no intention of voting for Nenni, whereas the ISP had voted for Saragat.

In the tenth ballot, when Nenni was first nominated, Leone had already been defeated beyond hope. But even in those conditions we felt that we had to work on patiently for the unity of the lay and Catholic Left forces, being careful not to demoralize either group or push it, to a compromise with the Christian Democrats. We extended our contacts and activities with regard to all Left parties and groups. But the results were scant. There were still too many blank ballot-papers.

Besides, no political initiative was taken by those who could and should have done so to help gain a solid vote for one of the candidates. Our groups therefore decided in the twelfth ballot to vote for Comrade Nenni. They wanted once more to give clear expression to the spirit of unity toward the Socialist Party, point to a suitable, explicitly democratic and anti-fascist solution of the problem of the Presidency and facilitate the search for broader democratic unity, so as to ensure the election of the President.

The Dorothean leadership finally had to renounce Leone, also because the ex-Chairman of the Chamber of Deputies had refused to remain a useless target for all the internal and external opponents of the CDP.

True to the spirit and letter of the Constitution and to our entire policy of broader alliances and agreements, we called on the leading CDP groups to take their failure into account and make up their minds about serious talks with all democratic groups in order to resolve the presidential crisis at an early date.

At last the Dorothean leadership secured its parliamentary groups' authorization to hold talks about a non-Christian Democratic candidate as well. However, the more rabidly Dorothean groups set out to torpedo any decision favorable to the Lefts. When the CDP leaders accepted the idea of supporting the renomination of Saragat, they thereby accepted a candidate whom we had proposed in the very first talks, along with Nenni, Fanfani and Pastore, and whom they had originally turned down. But they tried to block all contacts and all talks in respect of this candidate between the ISDP and the ICP.

It was in that situation that the talks which had been held before the last ballots acquired their full political significance. The task was to counteract the Christian Democrats' discriminative, anti-Communist claim and foil their plan of defeating Saragat again.

As soon as our Secretariat got word of the discriminative condition put forward by the CDP, it unequivocally reaffirmed, in its statement of December 26, that the Communists would vote for a candidate who would be capable of winning adequate democratic support, provided there were frank discussions ruling out all discrimination.

The Christian Democrats had to abandon their discriminative stand when faced with the self-evident results of the subsequent ballots, which fully precluded the possibility of Saragat being elected without Communist support, and also with the open refusal of the ISP to discriminate against Communist votes in the presidential elections. Then Saragat took the matter of talks into his own hands to ensure his election. In an interview with him we stated the reasons for which the Christian Democrats' opposition to our voting for him had to be removed. We left it to Saragat himself and to the ISDP to find the method which they thought best for remedying a situation created by Christian Democratic obstruction. The result was Saragat's statement on December 28 which said: "I am running for President of the Republic for the second time and I would like all democratic and anti-fascist groups to vote for me."

The significance of that statement was made even more obvious by a letter we received from De Martino, Secretary of the ISP. Enclosed was a copy of the letter by which Nenni withdrew his name and said that he would like the Communists to cast their votes for Saragat, also because he had made a statement "ruling out all discrimination against you."

It seemed clear to us then that our position had been appreciated and accepted. We therefore considered that proper conditions had been provided for our voting for Saragat in common with the Socialist comrades.

I think there can be no doubt that Saragat's election to the Presidency constituted a triple defeat for the Christian Democrats: (1) because after fifteen ballots the Christian Democrats found themselves unable to secure the election of their Dorothean candidate, Giovanni Leone; (2) because subseqeuntly they were compelled to agree to the nomination of a layman, as their candidate, one, moreover, who in the first ballots had opposed the official CDP candidate; (3) because their votes did not suffice to ensure the election of Saragat and they had to renounce discrimination against Communist votes.

These votes were officially sought by the ISDP and the ISP. The latter agreed to vote for Saragat provided the Communists were also asked to vote.

No one has ever imagined, and it would be absurd to imagine, that with the election of the President it would become possible to solve all outstanding political problems overnight. Among these problems are the political orientation of the parties, the government coalition, relations with the CDP, relations between the Lefts, and relations with the ICP. This is not to say that it is immaterial—in the light of the powers which the President exercises under the present Italian regime—what President we have or what political forces he represents.

The recent experience with Segni is a case in point. Segni influenced the Christian Democrats, and hence the entire Center Left, in the spirit of the Dorothean conservative trend. From this point of view, Saragat's election deprived the Christian Democrats of a power center which asserted CDP hegemony at the summit of the state. But the important thing was, and still is, particularly in the political situation prevailing in Italy today, not only the choice of President but the political activity which can and should be conducted with regard to various political alignments and groupings, without yielding to the illusion that all outstanding political problems can be easily solved at once and in the way we want them solved.

Throughout the election battle we strove to take advantage of all possible coincidences of interests, and to pave the way for a cooperation that would facilitate the further promotion of our action for unity, renovation and social progress in the near future.

I think that, speaking generally, we fulfilled our intentions in the different situations which arose as we went along. I also think that our activity contributed in large measure not only to Saragat's election to the Presidency but to the shaping of the political situation and the creation of greater opportunities for united actions and for renovation which obtained after the elections and as a result of them.

To be sure, neither the political crisis paralyzing Italy's economic and social life, nor the government formula of the Center Left was eliminated in those thirteen days. This also applies to the question of relations between Left democrats and between them and the Christian Democrats.

I think, however, that it would be wrong, at variance with reality, and dangerous to the progress of our entire activity to say that the political situation, the attitude to outstanding problems, and the state of various questions relating to the Center Left, to its orientation and vitality, have remained unchanged since the presidential elections.

All political groupings are busy reappraising their past positions and orientations. In the CDP, this reappraisal calls into question not only that party's activity during the presidential elections but the validity of the moderate limits within which Christian Democratic policies have been kept so far, relations between the various trends and various groups in power, and, in an indirect and timid sort of way, the very unity of the CDP and the Catholics in the CDP.

In the ISP, the vicissitudes of the elections, the attitude of the CDP, and the blow delivered to the Dorothean leadership have exacerbated the tone of Nenni's own supporters and increased the resistance to the CDP, which they want to explain its internal alignments, its political orientation, and the relations the CDP plans to maintain with the Center Left. True, this is so far taking place at top level only, but it is realized and stated, too, that this cannot go on and that something is bound to change. This realization prompts the more forward-looking groups in the ISP (the new Lefts, Lombardi, the youth) and the CDP (the syndicalist "basists," the youth, and Fanfani, who is following a line of his own) to insist openly on more progressive policy directives and new relations between Lefts and with the Communists.

The Social-Democrats cling more tenaciously than anyone else to the present position of the Center Left. They believe there is no need either for crisis or for improvement. In their view, everything can and should go on as in the past so long as the proportion of "their presence in the government" is unchanged.

The Right Christian Democrats and the Right-wing economic groups hold that nothing should be changed. They are more anxious than ever to maintain the present impotence of the Center Left as a cover for a conservative policy that would allow full scope, as it has done so far, for monopoly "free enterprise" in reorganizing industry and consolidating the system of capitalist accumulation.

Today there is serious discord within the CDP, rooted in the Left Christian Democrats' growing resistance to the hegemony of the leading Dorothean group.

The gravity of the economic situation necessitates prompt and bold measures to overcome these difficulties and the limitations of the socio-political system dominating Italian sociey. This necessity is obvious to the more advanced Christian Democrats, who reject the moderate trend of CDP policy and stress the need for increasingly competent solutions to the country's problems.

The Sorrento congress of the young Christian Democrats, who had hailed the "historic turn" in Naples as a promise for democrats, defined the Center Left as "a mere parliamentary majority operation," a new formula, a smoke-screen behind which the old, moderate content of Centrist politics has been smuggled in.

There is a lively debate going on between these Left trends in the CDP. It is aimed at reciprocal clarification, and hence an agreement on united action to defeat the moderate policies which today predominate in the CDP.

Discussion in the country and within the various political groupings should center on general orientations, programs, and the choices to be made. It is these choices that should help reveal the forces which can lead these groupings onward, without allowing themselves to be paralyzed by absurd prejudice and discrimination.

In this connection we think that while the Italian Socialist Party of Proletarian Unity reaffirms its traditional position on unity, the ISP Left-wing was right when it stressed some important points by explicitly pronouncing itself for a government that would abolish the discriminative principle of setting limits to the Left-wing section of the majority.

It is well aware that this abolition implies a reversal of the principle which has so far guided the Dorotheans holding sway over the Center Left, for the political premises on which the present government coalition is based have proved utterly inadequate in the light of the serious requirements of political renovation and economic and social progress which are appreciated by all.

It would seem that the young Socialists are heading in the same direction when they recognize the need for a realignment of political forces, that is, the restoration of relations between all components of the working-class movement with the aim of establishing a Left-wing alignment, they say—one that would be neither Social-Democratic nor "frontist."

It is within the range of these more general problems that a debate is going on these days on the conclusions to be drawn from the elections, from the contradictions, exigencies and new opportunities that have been emerging in respect of the policy, formula and program of the present Center Left.

As soon as Saragat was elected Comrade Nenni called for a sorting out within the CDP. He did this for the implied purpose of starting on a more consistent and resolute implementation of the program of the Center Left.

There is a need for a new political line, but this line can only emerge from an overall reshaping of policy to defeat the present government combination which has so dramatically betrayed its inefficiency and which during the last parliamentary campaign revealed an alarming lack of cohesion, increased weaknesses and disruptive antagonisms.

This is the only way really to end the years-old "crisis" of the Center Left, and the deeper crisis which the country and the political alignments are going through. It means tackling the country's real problems in a new spirit—constructively and with a real desire to solve them.

Comrade Nenni says that one should proceed carefully and should not provoke a government crisis blindly. We don't say at all that one should provoke it without knowing where one wants to get. All we say is that we must not keep coming back to one and the same thing, and must promptly clear up moot points. Nor can this clearing up be limited to a general discussion of formulas.

In the political debate which is in progress, and in relations with the various parties, it is necessary to elucidate program directives, the alternatives to be chosen, and the forces which can put these alternatives into effect.

Unless these questions are dealt with, the debate will remain abstract and futile, the situation will deteriorate and it will be impossible to overcome the government paralysis. It is not a question of blindly provoking a crisis but of getting as speedily as possible out of the darkness, of the swamp in which the Center Left has been floundering for months. It is a case of thoroughly clearing up questions that have to be cleared up if we want progress.

This is the only way to avoid the hypocrisy—as Comrade Nenni puts it—of pretending that nothing has happened, that the events which characterized the presidential elections did not occur.

Moro's hope that all this can be settled through "painless" reorganization or through increased activity by the Center Left seems naive or designed to camouflage the maneuvers of the leading Dorothean group, which is resolved, if it gets the chance, to bring about a further swing to the right contrary to Nenni's expectations, so as to "counterbalance" the election of Saragat, a Left candidate. This group is resolved to keep its allies in the inferior position in which they have been so far, and above all to prevent the Socialists from encouraging by their attitude the resistance and offensive of the Left Christian Democrats.

Now is the time to resist and foil these Dorothean attempts. The outcome of the presidential battle has restored to the ISP some of the influence it had lost in the government alliance. Increased Left pressures in the CDP may create fresh opportunities for the success of the struggle going on both in and outside the Center Left, a struggle to put the political and economic leadership of the country on a new, more progressive basis.

Socialists — adherents of Nenni or Lombardi — often speak of "processes of reshaping" which are alleged to be taking place in our Party. Nenni's supporters hint mainly at ideological, political and organizational reshaping, while Lombardi's supporters hint at reshaping in programmatic and socio-economic matters. We would like to know better what it is all about. Our Party is continuously shaping and carrying forward its general political line and line of action. This has by no means led us to a "revision" of the fundamental principles of what we have called, and still call, the "Italian road to socialism." Indeed, it has always prompted us to criticize and reject the results of the recasting and revision accomplished by the Socialists in recent years, such as the revision which has seriously affected the character of the ISP as an autonomous class party earnestly seeking socialist changes, or the revision which has led this party to ideological and political concessions, and to subordination to the CDP and the conservative policies of its leading groups. We think these concessions and revisions are incompatible with the revolutionary class nature of a socialist party and have embarked the ISP on the road of social democratization.

In working out and carrying forward our political line, we have never refused to recognize—despite the ideological and political involution of the ISP—certain points, questions and themes of study which could lead to a comparison of ideas, and to agreement and understanding with a view to defending the immediate material and democratic interests of the working classes and the people as a whole, and also to breaking monopoly power and substantially reforming the economic and political structure of Italian society.

We must admit that with regard to these points and issues, we have found the trends which have gradually shaped in the ISP in opposition to the process of Social-Democratic involution to draw nearer and nearer to us and to appreciate our own preoccupations more and more. First it was the Left trend which afterwards gave rise to the Italian Socialist Party of Proletarian Unity, and now it is the new Left trend and the Lombardi group. We have not failed to underline certain points of the well-known Giolitti Plan, on whose basis we think we could usefully exchange views and, indeed, find points of contact and agreement.

We have suggested, and still suggest, studying ways and means of limiting and then checking the process of fragmentation of the socialist forces, which was intensified by the involution of the ISP. This can be done either by encouraging contacts and cooperation between all the forces which consider themselves in some form or other to belong to the working classes and to socialism, or by starting discussions and exchanges of experience—with the aim of the eventual organzational unification of all those forces, parties and groups which remain loyal to the socialist perspective and intend to fight for it in the present situation.

This is neither a "crisis" nor "reshaping and revision," as our political opponents and even our Socialist comrades and friends, say—in different tones, we admit. It means charting our Italian road to socialism. Our goal is precisely socialism, to be attained through democratic action and struggle by the masses. A necessary condition for this is the broadest possible cooperation of democrats and the people, the broadest possible fighting alliances and unity (in the most expedient forms that can be worked out jointly within the framework of one party) of all the truly socialist forces loyal to the revolutionary struggle of labor, primarily the working class.

With regard to the relations between Socialists, we must say a few words about our comrades of the ISPPU, relaticns with whom are an essential component of our unity policy. We maintained close relations with these comrades during the parliamentary battle as well, and continuously exchanged opinions.

However, we did not proceed alike in all the ballots. In the end they voted for Nenni like us, but in the closing ballots they refused to vote for Saragat. It is not for us to judge them, of course,. They adopted a perfectly independent decision which they thought most suitable for their orientation, their aims and their policy within the working-class movement, as well as among the lay and Catholic Lefts.

The difference in the behavior of the various organizations of the Italian Left in the various ballots is indicative of the complexity of the positions and the relations existing between the Left and Socialist forces.

We must bear this complexity in mind, not only in order to appreciate the actual state of affairs but to step up our effort for more effective united action. In other words, we must remember that there should be no room, especially in the relations between our Party and the ISPPU, for erroneous interpretations of the position of either party in any given situation.

The situation clearly suggests the necessity and urgency of ascertaining how the new government combination is to proceed, and what are the program and the points they want to realize in the immediate future. This has to be done because there are pressing problems and because things are not going well in the country. The workers' condition goes on deteriorating—there is greater exploitation of labor, wage cuts, the threat of unemployment, low wages and high profits.

Nevertheless, Dr. Carli, Director of the Banca d'Italia, insists that that is not enough. He says accumulation should grow—to the detriment of wages and the position of the workers, of course. The employers' offensive against the workers' living standards and working conditions is accompanied by an offensive against the right to strike, against the powers and the autonomy of trade unions, against the General Confederation of Labor program, which demands economic program-making, and even against the Pieraccini Plan, which is itself a rehash of the Giolitti Plan of last July.

In their fierce opposition to reform, the Rights put the GCL and Minister Pieraccini, whose economic views differ considerably, on the same footing as "destroyers" of the system. This is why the year 1965 promises to be one of great and hard social and trade union battles. The term of many contracts, involving almost all the main categories, has expired and the contracts have to be renewed. Almost seven mililon working people will have an interest in this. It is envisaged that industrial output next year will go up—from a 1.5 per cent increase last year to a 7 per cent increase in 1965. But despite this increase, Confindustria plans to cut employment by more than 100,000 people next year and roughly by 200,000 in 1966. This is not a theoretical prospect but a plan which is already being carried out through continuous dismissals, speed-up, and the use of more intensive methods of exploitation. Dr. Carli wants technical, production and financial reorganization to boost monopoly profits. Italian industry is to be made more competitive at the expense of the factory and office workers, The workers cannot accept these plans and prospects. In 1964 the upsurge of monopoly activity was firmly resisted by the working people, although the results unfortunately fell short of the sacrifices made.

In the circumstances, the demand for democratic program-making has quite concrete aims, namely, complete employment, public control over investment, an agrarian reform, stimulation of forms of accumulation to counter monopoly forms, elimination of the imbalance between North and South, a reform in urban development, an educational reform meeting the demand for the renovation and spread of culture, a reform of pensioning, a new system of public administration, and the exercise of regional autonomy.

of the working people should be led. And it is with due regard to these issues that one should decide how popular, democratic and renovating is the government that will emerge from the present difficulties and discussions.

Our Central Committee, which met last month, thoroughly discussed all these questions and worked out an appropriate line of action. The forthcoming conference of Communist factory workers should be one of the important components of this line. We recall such questions in order to examine them in the light of the political situation resulting from the presidential elections, and to foster their decision by using the increased opportunities for understanding and cooperation provided by the election campaign. We also recall them in order to stress the necessity in the new situation for greater political and organization effort, which the Party must exert in dealing with these and all its other problems.

We know that the tasks facing our organizations are manifold. These tasks are set by reality. We must assess our opportunities and plan our work in keeping with reality and not with bureaucratic habits. We must make our leading bodies and instruments of leadership more efficient. We must carry out the decisions of the Naples conference and intensify all the elements of our work and leadership. It is imperative to specify our orientation and our political line. What we need today more than ever is unity, contacts and dialogues with all political forces in and outside factories, in and outside the elected bodies. The presidential elections have created a more favorable climate and new opportunities of promoting unity.

We must use these opportunities, above all in factories, among the working people, in contacts and discussions with the working people of every political trend—Socialist, Social-Democratic and Catholic.

The point is to launch and carry forward a public discussion of the programmatic, political and organizational problems whose solution has become an urgent issue and requires cooperation, unity of action and political unity of the working class, and a stubborn effort to surmount obstacles.

RESOLUTION OF THE CC, ICP

The Central Committee approves the activities of the Party Leadership and the parliamentary Communist groups during the presidential elections. The line that was pursued—first of all the continuous effort to bring about the broadest possible cooperation of the Left forces, lay and Catholic alike—made it possible to defeat the domination of the Dorothean group, frustrate its more insidious maneuvers and resolve the presidential crisis in a positive manner.

The contrasts of the presidential elections threw a stark light on the contradictions of the Center Left majority and its inability to meet the country's democratic requirements. They confirmed the need and possibility of new alignments of consistently democratic and progressive forces.

The economic and socio-political position of the country, and its international position with all its implications—from the UN crisis to the intricate maneuvers aimed at forming a multilateral nuclear force to the increasingly brutal imperialist intervention in the Congo and Southeast Asia—necessitate the broadest contacts among the Left forces and a maximum of effort by each to initiate and promptly determine new political directions.

This necessity seems particularly urgent in view of the continuous aggravation of problems such as the extent of employment and the living standard of the working people, the growing pressure of the monopoly groups in favor of a policy that would fully suit them, and in view of the present government's evident reluctance to resist this pressure, solve the problems of employment, the workers' condition and the steadily worsening state of agriculture and of the South, introduce statutory rights for the working people, grant autonomy to the regions, effect a radical reform in urban development and a democratic school reform, and implement a progressive economic development program.

It is with an eye to these issue, to this imperative necessity for a new government line, that the Left trends in the Christian Democratic Party and the socialist forces should take an unequivocal and consistent stand divorced from all ruinous compromise with the Dorothean group, whose domination and conservative line were defeated in the presidential elections, without any attempts whatever to "revive" the present government coalition, whose survival would plainly contradict the country's requirements. Today it is necessary resolutely to put an end to the program of the Moro government, which is completely inefficient, and to its principle of discriminating against and splitting the Lefts.

The Central Committee calls on all Party organizations to seek —also with the aim of speedily changing these new political and government combinations—for meetings with other Left forces, both lay and Catholic, and to make every effort to establish direct and fruitful cooperation on the basis of explicit programmatic and political principles in solving the problems of communal and provincial Giunte, defending the rights and urgent demands of the working people, in order to initiate the realization of the more pressing socio-political reforms and an anti-monopoly policy of democratic program-making in the economic sphere.

REPORT* TO THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF AUSTRIA

E. Kodicek

MEMBER OF THE POLITICAL BUREAU

The discussion on workers' participation in the management of industry and the economy has been going on in the Party for a year now. The results have been summarized in a document to be published as part of the discussion in preparation for our congress, which will adopt the corresponding resolution on the matter.

In this document the concept of workers' participation in management does not always conform to the concept hitherto held by Communists, or to what Marx and Lenin had to say on the subject. In Marx's works we find hardly any direct reference to the question. Lenin in his works noted on several occasions that at times of revolutionary upsurge, on the eve of revolution the working class must fight for workers' control. We know from the history of the working-class movement in Austria that this question arose in the past. Thus, the conference of members of production councils in the metalworking industry, held in February 1921, was the first to demand the participation of production councils in socialization, "in order to prevent any attempt to restore the old capitalist system." No such demands were made, however, during capitalist stabilization in 1923-25.

After the end of World War II this demand reappeared in various programs, for example in the decisions of trade unions and in the well-known resolution of the first conference of production councils held in December 1945. It will be remembered that the working class rejected the law of 1947 on production councils for ignoring, as a Communist-initiated statement said, the demand for workers' participation in production management. The resolution of one of the production council conferences read, in part:

"We will not allow ourselves to be deprived of the rights we have won. We have already won the big right to participate in the management of enterprises." Indeed, in the specific conditions of the immediate post-war years the workers, especially those of the big enterprises which are state-owned today, not only had a say in production matters but also actively participated in the management of enterprises. Much of the credit for initiating economic development at that time goes to the working class.

The bourgeoisie's attitude to the law on production councils can be seen from an article which appeared in one of the newspapers of the Austrian People's Party on April 19, 1947. We read that "the industrialist must remain the master at his enterprise. This proposition stands." The bourgeoisie thereby unequivocally announced that it had gained the upper hand in the talks on the law.

Did we correctly assess the importance of the struggle for participation in management at the time? Our representatives at all congresses of the Federation of Austrian Trade Unions and at all production council conferences demanded this right; on the other hand, however, we warned against illusions that might arise in this connection, and did not express a definite opinion regarding the possibility of workers being able to take part in management under capitalism.

Why are we pressing for this demand now? Is it because it is also voiced by the Socialist Party, or because similar slogans have been advanced by the FATU? This is not the reason. The real reason is the changed balance of world forces, which led our Party to the conclusion regarding the possibility of the peaceful advance to socialism. In 1958 our Party adopted a document "Austria's Road to Socialism," charting the general line of the struggle. The Communist parties are not waiting passively for the victory of socialism, the advent of the "great day" of the revolution. They are not merely preaching socialism but are organizing the struggle for it.

Hence the need to outline partial and transitional objectives, to organize the struggle of the Communists and build the broadest possible alliances for the attainment of these objectives.

The comrades know of the decisions of the November 1959 Rome conference of 17 parties calling for effective restriction of the power of the monopolies. The decisions note that this could be achieved through nationalization of certain monopolized industries, democratization of the management at nationalized enterprises, promotion of workers' initiative and influence on all aspects of economic life, and through establishment of democratic control over investment plans. Although this would not as yet abolish the exploitation of man by man, it would restrict the power and the means of the monopolies.

The struggle for broader democratic rights, renovated and extended democracy, and for democratic structural reforms constitutes in our time an important part of the struggle for socialism. The demand to be given the right to participate in the management of production is one of the aspects of this struggle.

The question of participation in management still needs to be elaborated. None of the Communist parties has as yet worked out a document on this problem. We consider, however, that our attitude conforms to the specific conditions of Austria and that it can help develop new concepts regarding democratic structural reforms.

Participation in management does not mean partnership with the employers. Nor does it mean that it can be ensured by half of the seats on control councils being held by workers or their production councils. We also reject the "labor directors" institution patterned after the West German model. We want the working class to have a say in economic and production matters, and to use its influence so as to rule out a situation in which it has to shoulder the burden of unilateral decisions taken by the capitalists.

We will not make every minor issue the pivot of our struggle for participation in management. We are concerned with major problems, such as investment and financial policy, foreign trade orientation, the prices policy, etc. We are concerned with the main aspects of the working-class movement, i.e., decisive economic problems bearing upon the worker's standard of living, on his future, the solution of which must not rest exclusively with the capitalists. It is a question of declaring war on the freedom of private ownership held sacred by the capitalists and on the right to dispose of the means of production as they see fit, to restrict the right of big capital to pass decisions on its means of production and of pursuing a corresponding policy.

To sum up. Participation in the management of production means countering in all major issues the capitalist concept with the working-class concept, and fighting for its realization. The struggle for participation in management is therefore not a concession to the social partnership policy, for this struggle can be won only in sharp class struggle.

The demand to participate in management is not a mere propaganda slogan. This demand should serve as the basis for united action and raise the class struggle to a higher level. We orient ourselves on this struggle, and this is what the document we shall submit for pre-congress discussion aims to show. The results of this discussion will be made known to the working class.

Although it is not the accepted thing nowadays to conclude reports with quotations, I should like to do just that, to quote Lenin, who in 1916 outlined in a few words what is the essence of our present struggle for participation in management, for the renovation and extension of democracy:

"The socialist revolution is not one single act, not one single battle on a single front, but a whole epoch of intensified class conflicts, a long series of battles on all fronts, i.e., battles around the problems of economics and politics, which can culminate only in the expropriation of the bourgeoisie. It would be a fundamental mistake to suppose that the struggle for democracy can divert the proletariat from the socialist revolution, or obscure, or overshadow it, etc. On the contrary, just as socialism cannot be victorious unless it introduces complete democracy, so the proletariat will be unable to prepare for the victory over the bourgeoisie unless it wages a many-sided, consistent and revolutionary struggle for democracy."

We hope that the document we will issue shortly will be useful to our Party and our working class in their struggle.

L'HUMANITE CORRESPONDENT INTERVIEWS MOHAMMED ENNAFAA*

QUESTION: After the M'Saken events you voiced support for the government's position on behalf of the Tunisian Communists. What significance do you attach to this move?

ANSWER: To begin with it should be noted that this is not the first time the Tunisian Communists have had occasion to support certain steps taken by the government of independent Tunisia. For, although our concept of socialism differs from that of the Destour Socialists, and although the Communists criticize some of the latter's erroneous or inadequate positions, we nevertheless do not reject positive moves capable of promoting the economic and social development of our country.

As regards the events in M'Saken, the Tunisian Communists appreciate the fact that despite the open reactionary opposition the government had the courage to denounce the big proprietors, reject their claims and reaffirm its determination to continue the policy of reform and planning under state leadership. This attitude is essentially an indication of something new. It denotes a change in the general orientation affirmed before the congress in Bizerta and which appeared to have triumphed at the congress.

Q: Could you give our readers a general idea of the substance of the orientation?

A: On the eve of the Bizerta congress last October the reactionary elements inside and outside the Neo-Destour came out against economic planning, structural reform and any interference by the state in the economic and social spheres. At the same time the moderate and legitimate demands of the working class were rudely turned down and a broad and vociferous campaign launched further to subordinate the labor unions.

Reactionary pressure unquestionably made itself felt at the Bizerta congress. Retarding the process of reform started under the three-year plans, it strengthened the positions of the big capitalists. Concessions were made to private capitalists, especially foreign. The agrarian reform was rejected. Along with the decision to transform the Neo-Destour party into the Socialist Destour Party, the Congress affirmed its negative attitude with regard to improving the position of the working class and the peasant poor. It also confirmed the old inflexible concept of national alliance, ignoring the problem of social classes, class contradictions and class struggle. All these negative aspects naturally tend to slow down the economic and social development of the country.

It must be said, however, that despite the reactionary offensive, other noteworthy aspects of a positive nature emerged at the Bizerta congress. For example, the condemnation of the capitalist path of development. Or the fact that despite the concessions to private capital, the congress endorsed the policy of planning, the need to develop the state industrial sector, strengthen agricultural producers' cooperatives and promote the cooperative movement.

Another positive fact is that the resolution on Destour socialism does not speak of private property as an immutable principle, but leaves room for a possible restriction of big land ownership. Elaborating a concept of socialism which is still far from scientific socialism, the resolution nevertheless draws attention to certain basic principles of socialism, as for example "the elimination of exploitation," "to each according to his labor," etc.

On the foreign policy plane the congress reaffirmed the line based on non-alignment and actions in favor of peaceful coexistence.

In sum, the Bizerta congress revealed the existence of contradictory positions, and although it sought to bring about a certain equilibrium between them, the possibility was not excluded that these contradictions would grow sharper and that new problems would emerge. Nor was it excluded that, as the situation developed, the positive aspects would become decisive and give a new impetus to the progressive reformist tendencies. M'Saken was a striking example of this.

Q: What do you think of the prospects at the present time?

A: The experience our country has gained since independence shows that with the progress of decolonization the struggle has assumed the character of a clash between progressive and reactionary forces, for or against the radical choice of national democratic development along non-capitalist lines.

There are grounds for assuming that the aggravation of the contradictions already manifest will lead the working class, the peasant poor and the intellectual youth to affirm more clearly their role and their position on the need for more drastic measures to spur economic and social development. At the same time the big proprietors and other reactionary elements will continue by diverse means to resist any radical steps in this direction.

We hope that the reformist wing of the socialist Destour Party will rid itself of the illusion that it is possible to win anything by making common cause with the Right-wing reactionaries, without isolating them politically, without relying firmly on the advanced social forces. The lesson to be drawn from the events in M'Saken is that it is necessary to go as far as possible along the road of structural reform.

For one thing the agrarian reform must be carried out without further delay, the economic power of the big landowners must be curtailed, the land must be turned over gratis to the agricultural workers and poor peasants, with or without parcelization, depending on the concrete circumstances. At the same time, a social policy answering the urgent needs of the urban working people, the mining centres and villages would help to free the masses from the influence of reactionary propaganda and win their active support for progressive orientation for our country.

With such a perspective the Tunisian Communists naturally side with the forces of progress. They are anxious to speed their country's progress toward the democratic, non-capitalist road, to help the progressive ideas of socialism to take firm root among the people. The influence our Party has won among the active sections of the working class, the poorest peasantry and the young intellectuals enables us to promote the interests of the people.

Q: What do you think of the reaction to your statement on the M'Saken events?

A: That statement was favorably received. The wide publicity it was given by the official TAP agency, the state radio and the local press clearly shows the importance the government attaches to Communist support. I, for my part, would like to see in this evidence of a favorable evolution, a sign of a departure from certain anti-Communist prejudices.

In any case it showed that where there is a progressive policy, the views of the Communists and the more advanced Destour Socialists can be brought closer together. And this is all the better, for this can only redouble the activity of the progressive forces and help isolate the Right-wing reactionaries.

At the same time these developments have shown that the measures adopted in 1963 outlawing the Tunisian Communist Party are out of date. Without reverting to the conditions in which this administrative measure was introduced, one can only say that the time has come to abolish it.

TUNISIA FACED WITH CHOICE OF TAKING PROGRESSIVE PATH OF DEVELOPMENT*

Khaled

Tunisia is at the crossroads. The direct vestiges of colonialism have been almost completely eliminated: the base at Bizerta has been evacuated, the colonialists' land has been expropriated, the country's indebtedness, which hampered progress, has been settled; the difficulties connected with the war in Algeria and the existence of a military base on Tunisian soil, and also with the replacement of the colonial regime by a national state, are now things of the past.

The choice of a truly progressive path of development conforming to the will of the people, to national possibilities and the international situation acquires added urgency in view of the fact that the basic tasks of a purely national revolution are practically completed, while new tasks, those of a social revolution, are arising in an ever more lively atmosphere of competition created by the considerable success of the progressive, socialist and revolutionary forces all over the world and near our own frontiers.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

The government based economic development on a three-year plan. Several positive beginnings and achievements can be noted in this field.

A number of industrial projects, such as sugar refineries, pulp and cork factories and textile mills, have been completed while others (an iron and steel mill and an assembly plant) are in the development stage. All these projects have been realized, in the main, by the state, the National Society of Investments and various national agencies. As a result, a step towards industrialization has been made.

The most significant measures, however, have been effected in agriculture. The nationalization of the rest of the colonialists' land (350,000 hectares), an important anti-colonialist measure, has returned the best arable land to the country and opened up greater possibilities for carrying out the agrarian reform.

*Abridged from Democratic Nouvelle, November 1964. This article was written before the congress of Socialist Destour Party, which defined its program and decided to reorganize its organizational structure.

Another important measure is the setting up, on state-owned land, of agricultural cooperatives consisting of small and middle proprietors thereby preventing big owners from taking possession of this land.

Yet why is it, despite all these achievements and efforts, that the country's development still lags behind the expectations of the broad masses, progressive intellectuals and students, and even behind the objective possibilities of present-day Tunisia? We think it is in place here to point out and analyze the factors responsible for this.

(a) Administration

The disregard for priority in investments is particularly conspicuous. Investments in the infrastructure continue to exceed investments in industry; too much is being spent on the tourist trade; housing construction is consuming inordinately large sums while benefiting only a small minority. Moreover, no attention is being paid to costs and profitability. Wasteful and extravagant spending are limiting the possibilities for productive expenditures ensuring employment.

The administrative system itself is bureaucratic, authoritarian and not subject to any control. A case in point are the agricultural cooperatives. Because membership is obligatory, the peasants are wary of them. Bureaucratic administration deprives the cooperative members of any initiative and virtually turns them into agricultural laborers.

The two years' experience in planning shows that there are other, even more serious drawbacks hindering genuine development.

(b) Rejection of Radical Reforms

First, about the agrarian reform. The cooperatives could undoubtedly become elements of a real agrarian reform provided membership was voluntary and the peasants were given a say in democratic management. The return of the land seized by the colonialists could also contribute to this end. But progress in implementing the reform is intolerably slow, falling short of even the very moderate planned targets. Nor should it be limited to state-owned land, for only a small part of it has been used for the cooperatives.

A few remarks about the cooperatives themselves.

The bulk of state-owned land, it is said, will be sold to cooperatives and even "preferably" to agricultural workers, but where will the landless and land-hungry peasants get the money to buy the indivisible plots of land?

In addition, the profits, if any, are to be distributed in accordance with the size of the peasants' pooled plots, which are not all the same. This may lead to a differentiation within the cooperatives, to the enrichment of those who gave the biggest plots, at the expense of the others.

The cooperatives do not include all the peasants in the locality: they do not accept disabled persons; only one member of each family is allowed to work on the cooperative; those whose land is situated in the area of a cooperative and who do not wish to, or cannot, join it are compelled to lease their holdings to the latter.

It must be stated therefore that the cooperatives, although essentially an element of progress as compared with the old agrarian policy, still have to undergo big changes before becoming what they should be.

A genuine agrarian reform is supposed to give land to the landless peasants and those with smal holdings. This means that in the North, for instance, at least 2 million hectares are needed if 150,000 poor households there are to be given land. But state-owned land and small private plots total not more than one million hectares. Where to get the other million? Here is revealed the contradiction between reality and the socio-economic needs of the country, the pernicious consequences of maintaining big land ownership (5,000 persons own nearly 600,000 hectares of fertile land), the great inequality of the land-tenure system (and this in regions with predominantly small holdings), and the possibility for persons of other professions to own agricultural property and for big farmers to lease their land.

All these facts are well known in our country. They are indicative of the acuteness of the land problem. It is equally clear to all that the agrarian reform is indispensable for overcoming backwardness, ending unemployment and part-time employment, for expanding the domestic market and paving the way for industrialization.

But does the Tunisian government realize this? Will it continue its policy of gradually implanting cooperatives or take drastic measures and restrict big property? It is hard to see what its exact intentions are, for one day it speaks of introducing a genuine agrarian reform only to assert the very opposite on the next day.

What can be definitely said is that its policy is determined by two contradictory factors: on the one hand, by its unwillingness to encroach on big Tunisian property (although measures have been taken with respect to some individuals) and its striving to develop a class of well-to-do middle peasants as the regime's base in the countryside; on the other, by its realization of the need to solve certain economic and social problems (management of state-owned land, the precarious situation in the village) and to satisfy the demands of the young forces inspired by socialist ideas and by the experience of the expanding countries.

But the policy of rejecting radical reforms is not limited to the agrarian policy. The old foreign-trade contacts, the source of non-equivalent exchange and the chronic foreign-trade deficit, have still not been disrupted; no serious study is being made of the possibilities for trade with the socialist countries, which could purchase our mineral raw materials (phosphates) and other products; little is being done to end our economic dependence, a source of constant blackmail, best exemplified by France's recent denunciation of the Economic Convention. The government still refuses to nationalize the mines, banks and insurance companies and contents itself with participation in mining companies, which is a progressive but clearly insufficient measure.

It also refuses to nationalize foreign and wholesale trade. The measures imposing control and restrictions that have been taken to date are certainly progressive but again, absolutely insufficient.

(c) Foreign Aid

The government continues to cherish the illusion that backwardness will be ended and an economic "uptrend" ensured chiefly with the help of Western and, above all, American aid.

It is true that our foreign policy has been somewhat modified following the announcement—in official documents, at least— of a policy of non-alignment. Accommodation with the UAR, the normalization of relations and even a certain rapprochement with Algeria have led our country out of the isolation in which it opposed any progressive government in Africa. Several agreements with socialist countries have been concluded, and some projects (dams, an institute of technology) will be built with Soviet help. But the main tendency continues to be pro-Western, pro-American.

Well-known facts illustrate this persistent striving to remain in the pro-Western orbit despite all the lessons of other countries and our own experience. Here are the facts:

U.S. businessmen carrying on geological prospecting are followed by Krupp, who is entrusted with the job of indusrialization!

U.S. aid makes up the main part of the foreign financing of the three-year plan.

The leadership of the Tunisian Workers' Unions, whose dependence on the government and the Destour is common knowledge, doggedly clings to the ICFTU and resists the establishment of an independent federation of African trade unions.

Last but not least, this tendency is manifested in the refusal to take a clear-cut stand with regard to the threats of aggression against Cuba and against the Vietnamese people, whose magnificent victory at Dien Bien Phu heralded our own liberation.

The harmfulness of this policy needs no further proof. Suffice it to add, without going into detail, that Western aid, most of which comes from the United States, is obviously insufficient. What is more, it is given irregularly, as is even admitted in official quarters, as a result of which the development of the state and cooperative sectors is retarded. It is granted on the condition that Tunisia accept inadmissible control over her economy. It unavoidably makes for conservatism and a bourgeois orientation.

Social Policy

The demands of the working people continue to be ignored. Wages have been frozen since independence while the cost of living has been steadily climbing, adding to the difficulties experienced by the wage and salary workers, who have to spend more than 40 per cent of their income on rent and other services. Even the TWU leaders have been compelled to call attention to this intolerable situation and speak out for higher wages. Disregard for the needs and demands of the masses is combined with measures to "constrain" them, to prevent the emergence of an independent movement among them, to resist any demands.

This is the predominant trend, despite the fact that the people have had some benefits from improved public health, education, social maintenance and industrialization.

Absence of Democracy

Even prior to 1963 democracy was formal and limited, contradicting the spirit and letter of the Constitution and the aspirations of the people. The patently reactionary plot of December 1962 enabled those opposed to democracy to liquidate it altogether. The Communist Party was banned and progressive publications suppressed. The regime grew more repressive and arbitrary, depriving citizens of effective guarantees against arrests, proscriptions and other measures decided on by the all-powerful administration.

On top of this the one-party system was implanted. Many arguments were advanced in defense of it but none of them hold water.

One such argument was the desire to avoid anarchy, ensure the necessary discipline and prevent the Right from resisting the "socialist" policy. To this we can reply that instability is a feature of every authoritarian regime which regards violence as the only means of effecting change. Besides, the necessary discipline does not at all presuppose the absence of freedoms, independent organizations and discussion. Rather the reverse is the case if this discipline is to be conscious and hence effective. As regards the forces of the Right whose activities were supposed to have been suppressed, they are to be found in the Destour itself and in the organizations controlled by it. A blow was struck, as a matter of fact, only at the Communist Party, progressive and Left forces in general.

The establishment of the one-party system was a manifestly anti-democratic, anti-progressive and anti-communist measure designed to suppress just criticism and free discussion which pointed to the inconsistency of the "socialist" orientation, and to check the growth of Communist influence and the spread of Marxist ideas among the students and young people generally.

Those who abolished democracy now find themselves in a tight corner. They hold forth on democracy within the framework of one party, the Destour. But experience shows that liberty is indivisible. The ban on the Communist Party and the Left press and the consequent repressions have cut short all discussion and criticism, even constructive criticism. They have created an atmosphere of distrust, fear, suspicion, apathy, indifference and reticence against which even the Destour organizations are complaining.

The liquidation of democracy is a blow not only at the Communists, who are deprived of the right to voice their opinion, have their own organization, propagate their ideas, participate in the ideological struggle and pursue a constructive policy in the interests of the masses. It is detrimental to the country's development for it nullifies even the best decisions, gives the irresponsible, uncontrolled latent Right opposition a free hand, breeds apathy and indifference to politics, and prevents the masses from taking part in construction.

THE MAIN OBSTACLE

Tunisia was one of the first African countries to win its freedom and has unquestionable successes in the anti-colonial struggle to its credit. Why, then, does it not rate today among the foremost revolutionary states? Why, in spite of the exceptionally favorable international situation, did our country embark on the policy of planning, cooperation and non-alignment later than many other countries, and then not without reservations? Why is it so slow and hesitant in carrying out its own policy of reform? The main reasons are of an ideological and social order.

First of all the class nature of the Tunisian state must be taken into account. Although it is a national state which emerged as a result of the struggle of the entire people, its essence is determined today by the national bourgeoisie, and its social basis in both town and country is the petty bourgeoisie.

Part of the bourgeoisie grew rich in the period of the French protectorate. Another became active in agriculture, transport, trade, public works and new branches of industry only after independence, thanks to state support and credits issued by state banks; this comparatively small privileged section emerged from the petty bourgeoisie and remains rooted in it. It is augmented by a bureaucratic stratum enjoying definite privileges whose role is steadily growing.

The government which came into being in the course of the struggle for independence waged by the entire people fostered for a long time a so-called free, i.e., purely capitalist, economy in spite of its obvious deficiencies because of class considerations. For the same reason the government, even after proclaiming an allegedly socialist policy, continues to encourage the middle bourgeoisie and to safeguard its specific interests and ambitions, subsidizes more than 400 private enterprises and in no way restricts the private sector dominant in all branches of the economy (93 per cent of all industrial enterprises and 40 per cent of all investments are private).

These class reasons explain why the government has given private business a free hand with the bulk of the commodity stocks in the country, why it is reluctant to impose limitations on landed property or to nationalize foreign and wholesale trade, why so many of its public declarations favor private interests, and why ministers spend so much time reasoning with representatives of the Tunisian Industries, Trade and Handicrafts Association. Because of this the national anti-imperialist revolution has bogged down at its bourgeois stage instead of moving ahead towards social revolution.

At the same time the contradiction between the country's development needs and the social basis of the state is becoming increasingly glaring.

The petty-bourgeois nature of the Neo-Destour party which makes it sensitive to pressure from the masses, the existence of a striving for reform at grassroots level despite the influence of the General Workers' Union, the work done by the Communists to bring the fallacy of the present policy and the need for a new, more effective and more realistic course to the people led to rejection of the classical type of capitalism and adoption of a policy of reform. But with this the first symptoms of contradictions emerged. Ever since the policy of planning, state intervention in the economy and establishment of the state and cooperative sectors began to be implemented it has caused discontent among some property owners even though it has not prevented them from thriving. Hence the smouldering opposition now in evidence on the part of the propertied classes and the Right wing of the Destour party, an opposition directed, if not against the government which it is hoped may yet "think better of it" or at least mark time for a long time to come, then at least against the advocates of the new policy.

Things, however, cannot be explained from the social standpoint alone. We have seen the development needs of other countries and the bigger opportunities opened for progress prompt these countries to take the road of radical reconstruction. The Tunisian government itself has begun to pursue a policy which is logically bound to bring it into conflict sooner or later with the dominant section of the very forces it relies on, and, if it does not beat a retreat, even with the Right-wing elements in the government itself.

This brings us to the "ideological" factor. The bourgeoisie in the underdeveloped countries is not firmly entrenched and hence unable to ensure progress. But there is a large and influential petty bourgeoisie, which often is sensitive to mass pressures and the interests of which in many respects clash with the interests of the big bourgeoisie. Hence the leaders — and they play a role of prime importance, especially if they built up their prestige in the independence struggle — usually are petty-bourgeois intellectuals whose world outlook was shaped in the course of the anti-colonial struggle. People of this type are likely to give thought to promoting the national economy and in some measures to respond to the demands of the masses. Although their ideology is bourgeois, they can be to one or another measure receptive to progressive ideas.

Whether development will proceed rapidly or lag behind depends largely on the extent to which the leaders respond to the pressure and demands of the masses and accept progressive ideas. Hence the decisive significance of the ideological factor, the decisive influence (positive or negative) of the political and ideological concepts of those at the helm of state. These concepts may faciliate the choice of a progressive path of development, or, conversely, prevent such a choice.

As regards Tunisia, it must be said that so far the ideological factor has acted as a brake. The Tunisian leaders subscribe to a capitalist ideology with a heavy imprint of anti-communism. Their outlook is a bourgeois nationalist one. They deny the existence of classes and class contradictions, underestimate or ignore economic and social problems, assume that the only road of progress is that taken by Western Europe, believe in the alleged anti-colonialism of the United States, etc. Moreover, their nationalism is utterly out of step with the times, a nationalism blind to the present world balance of forces and hostile to, or at best suspicious of, the socialist forces and the socialist countries. Though anti-colonialist, it is the old, classical nationalism, "liberal" in the sphere of the economy, "Western" politically, and bourgeois socially. It is this nationalism which above all has determined Tunisian policy since independence.

In time, however, what used to be taken for granted inevitably was seen to be questionable and unsuitable. As the old nationalism grew obviously outdated, a certain evolution began towards renunciation of some prejudices. A reform policy came to the fore once again, primarily in the shape of the plan worked out by the General Workers' Union in 1955 and of the official Neo-Destour "socialism."

The significance of the new orientation is self-evident. It shows that it is no longer possible to wave the banner of capitalism and to laud it, even before people hostile to socialism, as the only path of progress. In this sense it is a reflection of the growing influence of triumphant socialism. One hardly need underscore the value for Tunisia of extended dissemination of the once tabooed ideas of socialism.

Destour "socialism" is designed to preserve the political monopoly of the Neo-Destour at a time when the masses are turning away from it and young intellectuals are challenging its tenets. It claims to meet the requirements of further development, to offer a more realistic road than that which the country has followed so far. Approaching it from this standpoint without bias, it may be said that the doctrine has some positive elements, viz., planning, the establishment of a state or mixed sector, cooperatives, etc.

But if we try to define the content of Neo-Destour socialism we come up against utter confusion. There are as many interpretations as interpreters. Some are prepared to socialize the means of production, others confine themselves to talk about social justice, fair distribution of wealth and equal opportunities. The ideologues of Neo-Destour "socialism" regard it in something completely different from any other variety of socialism, counterposing it to scientific socialism, Marxism, and denying the existence of class struggle within the country and the struggle between socialism and capitalism on a world scale. The state sector they advocate is nothing but state capitalism under which the workers play no active part and which is wholly dependent on the bureaucratic bourgeoisie.

Therefore, in reality it is neither socialism nor the Tunisian road to socialism; at best it is moderate petty-bourgeois reformism hemmed in by survivals of the old, classical concepts of nationalism.

Further, it is an obsolete type of reformism, with deep-seated anti-Marxist prejudices stemming from its own genesis and the influence of Social Democracy, the anti-communist Left in France and the American reformist labor leaders. This explains why it seeks to combat Communism, to caricature Marxism and the policy of the Tunisian Communists, and claims it is superior to Communism as regards "concern for man" in the matter of "use of force," in taking cognizance of the "specific conditions." Like all types of reformism, Neo-Destour "socialism" is blinded by its own illusions and seeks to "build socialism" with the aid of U.S. imperialism and foreign private capital, relying on the bourgeoisie whose interests it is pledged to safeguard and eschewing such reforms of a more radical nature as those carried out in Egypt or recently in neighboring Algeria.

Apart from the ideological confusion and narrow-mindedness stemming from old illusions and prejudices, the Neo-Destour hardly offers a channel for socialism to assert itself. Although it is a mass party it does not accord the masses the role due them. It above all seeks to monopolize all political life and essays to unite everybody: the Right, the Left, the reformists and reactionaries alike, including those who are opposed to all planning, state interference in the economy, and cooperation. It is a party in which the lack of inner democracy precludes any battle of ideas, a party in which the supporters of reform have no opportunity to disseminate their views and consolidate their influence. It is a party whose core was never imbued with a socialist spirit inasmuch as the idea of socialism as such entered it largely from without.

This class base and ideology tend to retard the development of our democratic revolution. The government is capable of going in for any amount of political tight-rope walking, encroaching on the interests of some property owners and at the same time giving reassurances to others, paying lip service to socialism and at the same time shying away from every measure that might really met the demands of the masses; it may take steps forward along the path of reform but it is equally likely to retreat. Hence it cannot solve the problem of our progress; its policy may alarm the propertied classes but it does not meet the demands of the masses or give them inspiration.

CONDITIONS FOR POSITIVE DEVELOPMENT

For Tunisia to develop along the lines demanded by the masses —the workers, peasants, progressive intelligentsia, students — and made possible by the internal and external conditions (witness the examples of the UAR, Algeria and Cuba), some important conditions must be met and some important qualitative changes effected in the political, social and ideological spheres.

In other words a clear and unequivocal choice must be made between the present course with its illusions, its inconsistencies and limitations, and the path of genuine progress, with all that this implies for the solution of the main issues in all spheres. This is an issue of national significance. It affects all of us, and it is the duty and the right of all Tunisians to help resolve it. They must insist that the former course be abandoned and a new course chosen. Whether they belong to the Neo-Destour Party and other national organizations or not, whether they are Communists, progressivists, reformists or simply men and women concerned about national development, about the international prestige of their country — they must all press for this choice, the choice in favor of progress, in the direction of historical development, to be made as soon as possible.

a) in order to ensure genuine progress it is necessary to take radical measures in the sphere of economy, to choose the non-capitalist path of development.

b) for this policy to succeed, it is necessary to rely on the workers and the poor peasantry who comprise the overwhelming majority, those who have nothing to lose but everything to gain from a policy of planning, expansion of the state sector, agrarian reform, and cooperative development. They alone with their creative enthusiasm can make this policy work and defend it from all attack both from within the country and from without. It is likewise necessary to pursue a correct policy with regard to the middle classes, taking care to avoid anything that could antagonize them and impel them to give their support to the big property owners.

To rally the masses it is essential to:

—satisfy their material demands;

—gradually win their interest;

—democratize the government, do away with bureaucratic authoritarianism;

—draw the masses into policy-making, the implementation and control over the realization of policy;

—reconstitute the factory advisory committees into genuine committees of management;

—pursue a strict policy of economy, excluding all pomp and ostentation;

—restore, observe and expand democracy in the trade unions, put an end to measures depriving the Communists, who are the consistent champions of the workers' and peasants' interests, of the right to have their organization and to express their opinion.

This presupposes radical changes in the social policy of the government, and in addition—and this is the chief thing—changes in the structure of the social forces on whom it relies.

It presupposes rejecting the official policy of national alliance which has hitherto implied subordination of all classes to the interests of the bourgeoisie. National alliance should be invested with a new content so that the workers, poor peasants and the progressive intelligentsia should become its motive force. If some section of the national bourgeoisie prepared to agree to the limitation of their interests is permitted to participate in the development of the country, it will not of course have the dominant role.

It presupposes differentiation everywhere, and specifically in the Neo-Destour, so that the Right capitalist wing which stubbornly opposes the present policy and is naturally hostile to any radicalization, to any progressive policy should be eliminated from political life.

This calls for intensifying the role and influence of the workers and peasants who will exert pressure on the political orientation and change the balance of forces in their own favor. The Communist Party and the other progressive forces should be legalized and strengthened.

c) Radicalization of economic, social and political life along the above lines calls for ideological clarity.

Modern reformism, "Destour socialism," must put an end to its confusion, it must rid itself of its obsolete form and hangovers from the past, overcome its basic misconceptions on the question of classes and the class struggle, abandon the pro-Western orientation to which it stubbornly clings, and reject anti-communism.

Whether one wishes it or not, Marxism remains the only scientific criterion of the genuineness of one or another brand of "socialism." It is therefore unreasonable for socialism, even the Destour variety, to dissociate itself from scientific socialism, to isolate itself from the socialist countries, in other words, to close its eyes to what is actually happening in the present-day world, to eschew scientific analysis of any kind.

To achieve the ideological clarity essential for the evolution of Destour socialism itself, to rid it of its illusions and prejudices, to enable it correctly to assess the alignment of forces in Tunisia and the rest of the world, it is essential to encourage and not suppress the broad and free discussion of ideological problems, or at least to compare the different viewpoints on socialism.

The present character of the Neo-Destour, the fact that its ranks include Right capitalist reactionary groups, can in the final analysis lead to retreat or at any rate to marking time. That is why it is essential to fight for the conditions essential to development.

But no one and nothing can replace the struggle of the masses themselves who advance their own economic and other demands, express their opinion, exert their healthy influence on the general course of development in order to steer it in a progressive direction, to place it in the service of the entire nation, and not of a few individuals.

This struggle to impart a new direction to policy in the interests of the whole people, to take the path of fundamental socio-economic reform, should find support among the progressive intellectuals and the students. In the present circumstances they have an important role to play and hence theirs is a special responsibility. They are able to formulate and express the demands and aspirations of the masses; to describe the poverty and misery of the masses, and tell of the fate that has befallen them eight years after independence and three years after the choice in favor of "socialism."

The joint actions of the masses and the intellectuals which should be carried out throughout the country, in the Neo-Destour, in the mass organizations and outside them, can lead to political, economic, social and ideological changes. All these aspects are closely interlinked.

FOR NATIONAL DEMOCRACY

We do not yet speak of the socialist Tunisia that is our principal objective and which we hope above all to see in our epoch, the epoch of the transition from capitalism to socialism. For us there is no such thing as "Destour," "Arab," or "African" socialism. There is only one socialism, scientific socialism which, of course, is applied differently in each country in accordance with the specific conditions.

In the present conditions it is a question of establishing a progressive, independent, free Tunisian state which would join the advanced contingent of revolutionary states of Africa. It is a question of investing the Tunisian state with a progressive socio-economic content through far-reaching political, ideological and socio-economic changes.

The history of the past few years has provided many examples in this respect: Cuba's transition to the path of socialism, Algeria's choice of the socialist path, the realization by the UAR of a number of important reforms which pave the way to the non-capitalist path of development. The Tunisian Communists are carefully studying these and other examples. They are closely following all the changes and developments in our own country. They seek, in the light of creative Marxism, to examine all possibilities of transition to socialism, all the transitional forms, however different they might be. They offer a program whose realization would lead to the establishment of a state of national democracy which could become one of the possible forms of Tunisia's transition to socialism.

So far the immediate task is to extricate the country from the slough of conservatism in which it is floundering, to release the brakes and destroy the barriers to progress. This means smashing the fetters of the present reformist policy just as the fetters of the former liberal policy were destroyed. On the whole, it is a matter of pursuing a policy more in keeping with the conditions of the modern world, the possibilities and the most urgent needs, a more modern policy, more worthy of the international prestige our country enjoys.

Tunisian Communists believe that their criticism, their analyses, their highlighting of realistic and urgent tasks, in a word, their persistent struggle has done much to open the way to a policy of genuine development in the interests of the entire nation.

The Tunisian Communists have always — both before and after the institution of repressive measures against them—fought against the temptation to succumb to sectarianism, Right or Leftist opportunism. Their policy has always been to support all positive steps, all positive measures, however insignific nt, and to criticize and denounce everything negative, all mistakes and illusions. They have never ceased to support the left trend, even if it is limited, not sufficiently stable and susceptible to anti-communism. They have not ceased their efforts to begin a friendly debate even when the other side has done everything to discourage such efforts.

Both before and after the banning of the Communist Party, the Communists held and still hold that it is necessary and possible to begin carrying out the minimum program they have always advanced and which includes the following basic points:

—a resolute struggle against colonialism and neo-colonialism;

—industrialization through the state sector;

—agrarian reform with restriction on big landownership and distribution of the land gratis to the landless and land-poor peasants;

—nationalization of foreign trade;

—nationalization of the banks, mines and insurance companies;

—a genuine policy of non-alignment, a policy of peace and friendship with the socialist countries;

—satisfaction of the material demands of the workers, office employees and minor officials;

—restoration, observance and expansion of democracy, and primarily legalization of the Communist Party and removal of the ban on Left newspapers.

NIGERIA AND MARXISM

W. O. Goodluck

VICE-CHAIRMAN SOCIALIST WORKERS' AND FARMERS' PARTY OF NIGERIA

The October Revolution opened a new epoch in the history of humanity. That epoch is the epoch of Socialist Revolution. It made Communism no longer a spectre haunting Europe, but the greatest social force gripping the world and rapidly transforming it for the lasting happiness of mankind.

A hundred years ago only a handful of men dared identify themselves with the working class revolutionary movement. Today the army of the revolutionary working class movement has grown to several millions and states with a Marxist-Leninist government embrace over 1,134 million people, a third of mankind.

Against this background of inspiring revolutionary development appears the dying but stubbornly clinging to life—imperialism. It is not enough to proclaim the inevitable doom of imperialism, and thereby fold our arms and expect it to pass away. Imperialism even in its present decaying stage remains the greatest obstacle to man's future happiness. It remains dangerous, more cunning, treacherous and reckless. During the last hundred years, it has gained experience, it has improved its method of exploitation, it has multiplied its profit, it has succeeded in tightening its grip on the state machine and proceeded from national state-monopoly capitalism to international state monopoly capitalism. Yet it remains a giant with clay feet. With the united effort of the socialist countries, the world revolutionary working class movement and the national liberation movement, imperialism shall be toppled and crashed into smithereens.

In the battle against world imperialism, the working class remains the most conscious, revolutionary and effective force to combat the might of international monopolistic capitalism. It follows therefore that it requires an effective militant trade union organization. The trade union movement today has been divided into two distinct leaderships. On the one hand are the Right-wing reformist leaderships, who advocate the line of capitulation and class collaboration, the line of agreement reached behind the backs of the working people and against their will. It is this labor aristocracy who serve as a brake on the militancy of the working class and an obstacle to the unity of the working class against capitalism.

On the other hand are the militant Left-wing revolutionary leaderships who advocate the line of unity founded on defense of class principles, on the consistent struggle for the independence of the union from both the employers and the reactionary ruling class. Representatives of this leadership depend on the workers and organize the struggle for their demands under the banner of trade union unity.

With the ruthless exploitation of the working class by the monopolists, the vicious attack on the hard-won gains of the working class, the frequent police raids on trade union premises, the growing arbitrary arrest and imprisonment of militant trade union leaders; the ever growing unemployment problems and the spiral soaring of the cost of living, the mass of the working class, the rank and file, have swung to the offensive by founding Joint Action Committees over and above the heads of the reactionary Right-wing leadership.

The waves of strike movement in Western Europe, America, Latin America, Asia and Africa are eloquent testimony of the offensive of the working class against the monopolists. The development of Joint Action Committees of trade unions of different ideological orientation all over the world is the latest phenomenon which has overthrown the applecart of reactionary Right-wing trade union class collaborators and their monopolistic capitalist masters.

IN NIGERIA

At this stage it is useful to cite the successful application of the Joint Action Committee tactics in respect of two important country-wide strikes which have shaken the forces of neo-colonialism and monopoly capitalism in Nigeria to their foundations. Nigeria today is the largest populated African state with an officially declared population of 55 million (even though this figure is in dispute). After the end of the Second World War, as a result of the general economic upheaval, the activities of the national liberation movement, and the marked deterioration in the living standards of the working class and the masses as a whole, a countrywide strike broke out in 1945 which lasted up to forty-four days, ending in the victory of the Nigerian movement. Ever since, the British colonial powers, alarmed at such a grave threat to their economic interest, threw all their weight into the battle to divide and weaken the movement. Experts on labor problems were sent from the Colonial

Office to advise the colonial administrators. The reactionary Right-wing leadership of the British Trade Union Congress and other "experts" helped to devise trade union ordinances which encouraged weak and ineffective unions.

In addition to this, the breakaway bodies of the ICFTU sent experts to assist in the break-up of the militancy of the trade union movement. Trade union leaders were offered scholarships to study at Ruskin Trade Union College and on their return offered appointments either in the colonial government offices or absorbed into highly paid personnel management jobs. To complicate matters the ICFTU also came through the back door to add to the division.

Besides these elements of division and confusion the militant Left-wing leadership fell into the hands of pseudo-Marxists, ultra-Left dogmatists and crooks. As a result for almost a period of eighteen years, apart from the strike of the Enugu coal miners in 1949 when twenty-one miners were shot dead in cold blood, and the strike of mercantile employees of the subsidiary Unilever Group, the United African Company Limited in 1950, the leaders of the Nigerian trade union movement were engaged in fruitless battle against themselves, leaving the monopoly capitalists alone to wax strong and given a free rein to exploit the workers ruthlessly. The Nigerian trade union movement became an object of international ridicule and derision, weakened and divided.

SOCIALIST AID

During this period it must be recorded that both the moral and material assistance rendered by the trade union movement of the socialist countries as well as the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) played no small part in helping to keep the militant Left-wing of the movement growing.

The First Revolutionary Convention of the Nigerian Trade Union Congress which took place from August 4th to 8th, 1963, marked the turning point in the history of the Nigerian trade union movement. At that Convention a new leadership was elected to office, a leadership which had been tested and proved honest and determined, a leadership which has roots in the trade union movement and which recognizes the necessity of working together with all the progressive classes—especially the Marxist intellectuals. This leadership at the end of the Convention advocated as its main task a joint action program of all trade unions with different ideological orientation based on the demand for a guaranteed national minimum wage, control of prices and rentals and abolition of the daily paid system.

The Central Working Committee of the Nigerian Trades' Union

Congress immediately embarked on this program by calling a wage conference of all unions and central trade union organizations irrespective of their international affiliation. Seeing the impact which this call evoked, the leaders of the ICFTU-affiliated center, the United Labor Congress, hurriedly sent out another invitation on a similar theme of wage demands. This move no doubt set the Nigerian Trade Union Congress a problem whether to attend the conference called by the ICFTU-led United Labor Congress. The Central Working Committee met and carefully examined the implications and came to the conclusion to attend the wage conference called by the United Labor Congress and at the same time to go ahead with the preparation of the original conference called by the Nigerian Trade Union Congress.

At the meeting of the ICFTU-led United Labor Congress wage conference, the reactionary Right-wing leadership ignored the presence of the leaders of the NTUC and pretended that it was only a conference of their affiliates that was in progress. Several leaders of the NTUC who raised their hands to speak were ignored. However, the rank and file members of both the ULC and the NTUC affiliates who were directly involved raised their voices and demanded that the leader of the NTUC be given the floor to speak.

The NTUC leader who spoke stressed the urgent need for a Joint Action Committee. He pointed to the inability of any section of the existing central labor organization to carry out industrial action effectively and noted that even though official Government recognition had been granted to the ULC the Government had no respect for it. He stressed the deplorable conditions of the workers and the great harm which the division of the trade union movement was causing them.

At the end of the NTUC leader's speech the rank and file members who were present unanimously rose up and demanded the immediate setting up of a Joint Action Committee composed of ten members from each side. The meeting also approved the attendance of the ULC at the NTUC wage conference and also mandated the twenty-man Committee to enlarge its membership and make room for other trade union bodies.

COMMISSION OF ENQUIRY

At the NTUC wage conference the ICFTU Nigerian Workers' Council, the neutralist Nigerian Union of Railwaymen and other neutral trade unions attended and the Joint Action Committee membership was enlarged.

The immediate task of the JAC was to demand the setting up of a high-powered Commission of Enquiry to overhaul the existing colonial wage structure with the aim of bridging the gap between the lower income group and those in the senior service and the upper segment of the civil service, public corporations and private enterprise.

The Federal Government of Nigeria felt that the demand was a joke. It did not believe that the JAC could last a week, and relied on the Right-wing leaders of the ULC majority, to whom it offered board appointments. The Federal Government bluntly refused to appoint a Commission of Enquiry.

The workers became enraged and on September 27, 1963, a countrywide strike started from Lagos, and by the 29th it had spread all over the country, involving 800,000 workers. During this period the Nigerian Government which had been hard pressed by the progressive forces was compelled to invite the strike leaders to a meeting on the eve of October 1st, the anniversary of independence and the installation of the first President of the Republic Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe. The Government was compelled to come to terms, having realized that the workers were determined.

The Federal Government, represented by four cabinet ministers, reached agreement with the leaders of the Joint Action Committee on terms dictated by them and the high-powered Commission of Enquiry was set up.

No sooner was the strike called off than both the Government and the ICFTU combined together to break the Joint Action Committee. In fact the IFCTU-led Nigerian Workers' Council that represented an insignificant section of the mercantile workers was expelled from the JAC when it came out in opposition to the September strike call.

The leaders of the ICFTU-led United Labor Congress also used their regional leaders to intensify the call for the dissolution of the Joint Action Committee. However, the leaders of the NTUC mounted a strong propaganda in support of the JAC and sent out its leaders to meet the regional trade union leaders and encourage them to form branches of the JAC all over the country.

The formation of regional branches of the JAC weakened and exposed the leadership of both the ULC and the NWC, and the majority of their affiliates openly disagreed with their directives. Thereby for fear of being isolated and destroyed they had to change their tactics.

The high-powered wage and salary review commission sat for a period of three months. Memoranda were submitted by the JAC, some trade unions, progressive economists, medical practitioners, the Federal and Regional Governments as well as the Nigerian Employers' Consultative Association—NECA.

After six months of the appointment of the Commissions and no submission of a report, the workers became very restive. The Government, which felt that it had weakened the JAC enough, became obdurate and arrogant. It would not give a specific date when the report would be ready.

Under the auspices of the JAC a representative meeting of all the trade unions was summoned and at this meeting a resolution was passed giving the Commissioners seven days to submit their report failing which another countrywide strike action would start. Before the end of the seven days ultimatum the report was submitted to the Federal Government. The representatives of the JAC approached the Government for a copy of the report but the Government turned down the request. The workers were not in the mood to wait any longer and thereupon gave another ultimatum.

STRIKE ACTION

At the expiration of the given period a mass meeting of all workers was called to take a decision to start strike action. Simultaneously the Government sent for the JAC leaders, doing its utmost to break the solidarity of the leadership. When it became clear that no report was forthcoming and it was discovered that the Government had deliberately called for the talks with a view to preventing a decision at the mass meeting, the JAC leaders left the Government representatives. The rank and file seriously attacked the leaders for ever attending the last-minute meeting with the Government. The workers then decided to start a countrywide strike action after twenty-four hours.

The decision was hailed with great jubilation and the workers, defying the ban on public procession, poured into the streets and started a march to the Parliament. They were met at the middle of a bridge linking the mainland to the island of Lagos by steel-helmeted police, who attacked the workers with tear gas and baton charges and succeeded in breaking up the demonstration.

Leaders of the JAC were wounded, arrested, locked up and charged in court.

The unanimous and united support of workers for the strike was inspiring. Both the Government and the foreign monopolist capitalists consoled themselves that the strike could not last more than a week. At the end of the first week the strike continued to spread further and further, the docks were paralyzed, the trains stood still, the shops were closed, the police and the army were confined to barracks and the economic life of the country gradually ground to a standstill. Over one million workers were on strike.

The striking workers started to raise the slogan of "Balewa's Government must resign." After the ninth day of the strike the Prime Minister, Tafewa Balewa, broadcast a message to the nation in which he ordered the workers back to work within forty-eight hours or face mass dismissal. The workers became indignant and defied the order. At the end of forty-eight hours the workers at a mass meeting of almost 250,000 workers gave the Balewa Government an ultimatum to either adopt the Commission's report or resign.

Before the end of the workers' forty-eight-hour ultimatum, the Balewa Government called for talks with the JAC leaders and at the end of the second day of talks the strike was called off after the Federal Government had agreed (i) to withdraw its White Paper in which it rejected the finding of the Commission; (ii) to treat the thirteen days' strike period as earned leave; (iii) to withdraw all dismissal and termination papers; (iv) to withdraw cases in court against JAC leaders and strikers; (v) non-victimization of strikers.

UNITY FROM BELOW

From the above experience of the Nigerian trade union movement it can be seen that working-class unity should be looked for from below, among the workers who directly experience the day-to-day attack on their standard of living. The agreement from below among the working class based on their suffering is the keynote to the further growth of the Joint Action Committee in the battle against imperialism.

Although the cause of the strike was based on economic demands, yet in its development it has raised possible political action which with a developed Marxist-Leninist party could have led to proletarian revolution. It also raises the problem of the role of the trade union in the national liberation movement.

NATIONAL LIBERATION

The division of a large area of the world among the capitalist powers and the deprivation of the majority of the people of their independence gave rise to antagonism and opposition to the capitalist rulers, which led to sporadic risings here and there. In West Africa and in Nigeria in particular such risings were led by the local chiefs, Obas and Emirs. The British had to enter into treaty with some of the compromising rulers and to establish the indirect rule system to subdue the people.

The national liberation movement in Nigeria took a national character after the end of the Second World War. Before then there was only local opposition and the demand for reforms was confined to the coastal areas. There was no national movement of any significance over a large area of Africa. Historically before the outbreak of the Second World War, with the exception of the one-fourth independent American semi-colony of Liberia, the whole of Africa was in the grip of the European capitalist powers.

The defeat of the fascist forces at the end of the Second World War let loose the demand for national independence. But Comrades! Let us not kid ourselves, it was not only because of the might, or the better weapons of the national liberation movement, that the colonial powers abandoned the colonies. It was also because of the might of the socialist countries, their support, morally, financially, materially and militarily that the colonial powers were forced to yield. If the Soviet Union had not gone to the aid of Egypt when both the British and French imperialists invaded her territory, today there would not have been a flourishing United Arab Republic under President Nasser. And if the UAR had been crushed in 1956, which African state would have dared to challenge the imperialists?

Let those erring comrades who have lost their bearings stop and think. The further success of the national-liberation movement primarily depends on the continuous assistance and support from the socialist states and the world revolutionary working-class movement. To isolate the national-liberation movement from its inseparable root means only to turn over the gains of the national-liberation movement to the neo-colonialists who are feverishly prowling around for any prey.

The national-liberation movement in some countries has been led by the growing national bourgeoisie. The national bourgeoisie is made up of two distinct groups. On one side are those who wish to compromise with the foreign monopolies, to cooperate with them, to go into partnership with them, to open up markets for unbridled exploitation and to oppose the call for nationalization of the property of the monopolists.

To this group in Africa belong the Government of Nigeria, the Senegalese Government, the Liberian Government, the Cameroons Government and several other Governments that adhere to the former Monrovian bloc.

On the other side are the governments of the progressive national bourgeoisie who are engaged in the completion of the anti-feudal and anti-imperialist revolution. They advocate the nationalization of the foreign banks, insurance companies, shipping, etc., and proclaim as their main objective the building of socialism. They establish commercial relationships with the socialist governments and enter into mutual and advantageous economic agreements. To this group belong the Governments of the Ghana Republic, the United Arab Republic, the Mali Government and the Algerian Government; and recently the newly independent governments of Tan-Zan and Kenya.

ROLE OF MARXISM

It is a well known fact that there were hardly any well organized and developed Marxist parties in any of the colonial territories before the victory of the national-liberation movements. In Nigeria there existed various pockets of Marxist groups. Attempts made to unify these groups on different occasions were not lasting. In any case, the national-liberation movement struggle appealed to and unified all forces fighting against colonialism.

It was after the victory of the national-liberation movement and the inability of the ruling national bourgeoisie to complete the anti-feudal and anti-imperialist revolution that the formation of Marxist parties took place.

Considering the socio-economic stage of development in some of the African developing states, where there is practically no industry, where the working class consists of white collar merchant clerks, where capitalism is still in its infancy, where the mass of the people are illiterate and the country is still in the feudal stage of development the classical textbook solutions do not apply and therefore new methods and tactics are required to guide the people to socialism.

There is therefore no ready-made answer for Marxist-Leninists in Africa. It is our duty to map out the road to consolidate the victory of the national-liberation movement and support it to complete its anti-feudal and anti-imperialist struggle. In some of the African states like Ghana, the United Arab Republic, Algeria and Mali the question has been raised whether there is a necessity to found a purely Marxist-Leninist Party as distinct from the popular nationalistic governments. In some of these countries existing Communist Parties that have played leading roles in the national-liberation movement have been banned and their leaders jailed.

As Marxist-Leninists, we must admit that we are capable of making mistakes, if we become dogmatic, if we feel that we are the only chosen people to herald scientific socialism and that the move towards socialism not necessarily based on scientific socialism by others must be opposed. If, rather than using our knowledge to guide others towards our goal, we create the impression that as individuals we are the only group to rule the people, then we are bound to end up in isolation. The realistic application of Marxist-Leninist tactics by the Cuban Communist Party in support of the national-liberation movement of Cuba led by Fidel Castro is worthy of very close study.

It follows therefore that in countries where the national leadership is not necessarily Marxist, but simply an anti-feudal and anti-imperialist, it is the duty of true Marxist-Leninists to place their services at the disposal of such a government.

It would be sheer dogmatism for Marxist-Leninists to insist that the newly emerging African states must traverse the road of capitalism from feudalism so as to afford Marxist-Leninists the luxury of creating the ideal atmosphere of a proletarian revolution.

UNITED FRONT

In the African states where power has fallen into the hands of the reactionary national bourgeoisie, the approach of the Marxist-Leninist party and the militant working class is to work for the creation of a United Front of all progressive forces and to fight for a National Democratic Revolution. Depending on the reaction of the ruling class in different countries, the path of struggle may lie in parliamentary struggle or extra-parliamentary struggle.

Where the Marxist-Leninist party is banned, then depending on the prevailing circumstances, the party may take up armed struggle, but great care must be taken that the populace support an armed struggle, otherwise the Marxist-Leninist party which prematurely resorts to armed struggle will soon find itself in isolation and consequently face destruction. Such a party can only do great harm to the revolutionary working-class movement.

SOVIET RECOGNITION

Another problem which has caused a great deal of confusion and accusation against the Soviet Government and other socialist countries is the establishment of diplomatic relations with the reactionary African governments and the rendering of substantial material and financial assistance to them.

These are very important problems which require very close study. Some African Marxists feel that this is a betrayal of Marxist revolutionaries. This conception is wrong. The establishment of diplomatic relations with any African state whether reactionary or progressive is a positive and correct policy.

The fact that the national-liberation movement has succeeded and freed the people from colonial rulers is a very significant development. It is a defeat for the forces of imperialism. If the Soviet Government or any socialist government refuses to recognize a newly independent African state because the national bourgeoisie who came to power are reactionary, then the Socialist government would cease to be Marxist-Leninist.

The establishment of diplomatic relations with reactionary African governments rather strengthens than weakens the chance of the growth of the revolutionary forces.

The African Marxist-Leninists have their own contribution to make to enrich the treasure trove of Marxism-Leninsm. They call on our comrades everywhere to assist the national-liberation movements to complete the anti-feudal and anti-colonialist struggles. They call for active support to the armed national-liberation movements of Angola, Mozambique and "Portuguese" Guinea against the ruthless Portuguese colonialist government. They call for support to the patriots fighting the American-controlled government of traitor Moise Tshombe in the Congo. They call for active participation in the world fight against apartheid in South Africa, and the encouragement and growth of the organization of African unity.

Long live the unity of the Marxist-Leninist parties!

ON THE POLITICAL SITUATION AND THE TASKS OF THE PARTY

NATIONAL COMMITTEE MEETING, COMMUNIST PARTY OF CANADA, JANUARY 16-19, 1965.

Our 18th National Convention fulfilled its responsibility by working out our party's three point program but it was not able to deal in a thoroughgoing way with our party's concepts and practices. The June, 1964 plenum posed this question before our members, opening up a party-wide examination of what needs to be done to close the serious gap that has been developing between the mass movement of the people and the organized influence and strength of our party. This plenum must supply answers to some of the questions raised. But it must do so in the light of the political and economic changes that have developed internationally and in Canada during the ten months that have passed since the 18th National Convention.

THE WORLD IN CHANGE

There has been a substantial change in the general political situation since our national convention; a progressive trend is emerging on a world scale. There is a world-wide growth of the deep popular desire for peace, for policies of peaceful coexistence, against United States interference in the domestic affairs of newly independent countries, for democratic progress. The strength of this desire was demonstrated dramatically in the U.S. when Senator Goldwater was rebuffed by 46 million votes. It was reflected in the election of the Labor government in Britain, in the increased votes cast for candidates of the Communist parties in Italy, Belgium, Sweden, and in the election of Giuseppe Saragat, as president of Italy.

Combining, in its effect, with the strengthening of the democratic trend in capitalist countries, socialism is growing stronger with gathering resources of the 1,000 million people of the socialist states, there is added now the momentous fact that, in numerous newly independent countries, the peoples and their governments are choosing the path of socialist development. These are not yet socialist countries in the full sense but their adoption of the socialist path, as the means by which to protect their newly won sovereignty from imperialist schemes, extends greatly the area in which economic development is planned on a non-capitalist path and it intensifies still more the crisis of imperialism in decay.

These changes are of vital importance. They reflect the growth of democratic action and its power to influence the course of events. They testify to the possibility for a broad democratic advance to the extent that the world-wide desire for peace and democratic progress is united and makes its influence felt.

It must be noted however that the growth of democratic sentiment is not yet expressed in organized form. The desire for peace finds wider and wider public expression, including support from some capitalist politicians, but there has been an actual slackening of organized peace action. The shift in favor of policies of peace and democracy is only in the early stages of development—strong enough to administer a setback to the most reactionary forces of imperialism but not yet committed to the necessity for a decisive repudiation of them.

The forces of reaction and of the drive to war are still very strong. The people of the United States voted by such an overwhelming majority that it evoked public opposition to Goldwater even within the Republican Party. But, he received nearly 27 million votes. Goldwaterism remains entrenched in many key positions with active support from the most aggressive circles of state-monopoly capital including some circles of the Democratic Party. The strength of Goldwaterism is reflected in the evident pressure that it exerts upon the President and the extent to which it is able to obstruct the introduction of policies such as the people expected. The President, who was elected by the greatest popular vote in the history of the United States, supports some enlightened measures to buttress state-monopoly capitalism. But, he promised civil rights for all citizens and a month after the election his administration resumed its persecution of the Communist Party of the United States. In defiance of a judgment by the Supreme Court of the U.S. the Johnson administration is making another attempt to enforce the discredited McCarran Act, repeating its rejected prosecution of the Communist Party and of Gus Hall and 44 other United States citizens. It is an act of Goldwaterism in defiance of the votes of the people. It is a betrayal of the President's election promises. The Communist Party of the U.S. correctly describes it as "desperate and malicious".

The President assured the people that he would honor the sovereignty of newly independent nations but, less than a month after the election he associated the United States with Belgian reaction in one of the most shameful invasions of another country ever recorded; air-lifted Tshombe's hired killers into the Congo. U.S. imperialism continues to be a bulwark of reaction in Africa.

The President assured the people that he would not spread the dirty war in Vietnam into North Vietnam. But within weeks of the election, General Maxwell Taylor, U.S. ambassador to South Vietnam and the President's chosen adviser on military questions, announced that, having discussed the matter with the President personally, he will "step up" military operations across the frontiers of South Vietnam. In his State of the Union message, the President revealed clearly the aim of trying to exploit the differences existing between socialist states and indicated his intention to place increased emphasis on United States aggression in South Vietnam.

The very grave situation in Vietnam makes this a matter of vital concern to Canadians, indeed to the people of all countries. The categoric public declaration by the government of the People's Republic of China that it stands ready to go to the assistance of the people of Vietnam should cause all men of good will to insist that the governments of their countries press the United States to withdraw its military forces from Vietnam.

In his State of the Union Message to the United States Congress on January 4th, the President said: "With the Soviet Union we seek peaceful understandings that can lessen the danger to freedom'" . . . "I hope the new Soviet leaders can visit America so they can learn about this country first hand." He added that, in this, he was obeying the people's "command".

But, a few words later in his Message the President promised to continue the U.S. aggression in Vietnam. He solidarized himself directly with the West German ravanchists and their aim to absorb the German Democratic Republic. In a slightly veiled form he aligned himself also with the reactionary dream of re-establishing the imperialist influence in some socialist countries of Eastern Europe, a dream which is also shared by the West German militarists.

The U.S. government continues to press its scheme to give the revenge-seeking militarists in Western Germany nuclear weapons in the form of a multilateral force and to set up a multilateral force in Asia, to arm Japanese imperialism also with nuclear weapons.

Mankind craves for peace, with a growing realization that universal world disarmament is now our sole alternative to the worldwide proliferation of nuclear weapons. But President Johnson continues the United States policy of cynical opposition to universal disarmament. In his State of the Union Message he boasted that the military power of the United States is overwhelming. And he added to the members of Congress: "that superiority will continue to grow as long as this office is mine—and you sit on Capitol Hill".

This policy of emphasis upon preparation for nuclear war is the background upon which the Johnson administration tried to organize a majority to support illegal action against the Soviet Union in the United Nations and of its continuing attempts to bring about large-scale military invasion of Cuba. The people voted in their overwhelming majority for peace, democracy and social progress, but the ultra-right is still strong, the danger of war is still grave. To defeat Goldwaterism conclusively in the U.S. there is need for continued and growing democratic action in the spirit with which the progressive forces permeated the Democratic election campaign.

FOR AN INDEPENDENT CANADIAN FOREIGN POLICY

In the sphere of foreign affairs the Pearson Government pursues, in the main, the line of the foreign policy of the United States—even to "pulling U.S. chestnuts out of the fire" at times.

Lester B. Pearson promised the people that he would negotiate a reduction of Canada's nuclear commitments if he became Prime Minister. Instead, the Pearson Government has enmeshed the Canadian people even more deeply in the United States nuclear war plans. In addition to nuclear warheads for Bomarc missiles, large storage dumps of U.S. nuclear weapons have been established in Canada and the Royal Canadian Airforce in West Germany is committed to a nuclear "strike" role.

While paying lip service to the idea of non-intervention in the domestic affairs of newly independent states, the Pearson Government continues to give active support to United States aggression in several countries. Canada is a member of the International Supervisory Commission to prevent foreign interference in Vietnam, but the Pearson Government refuses to call for a meeting of the Geneva Conference of Powers to act on the flagrant United States aggression in that country and neighboring countries.

The Pearson Government does maintain some distinctions in its foreign policy. Most evident are its continued maintenance of diplomatic relations with Cuba, defiance of the United States to sell hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat to socialist countries, expressions of doubt about the wisdom of the U.S.-West German plan for a multilateral nuclear force, the statement by Paul Martin that Canada will not take part in such a force, and his protest against its organization by negotiations carried on outside NATO. These distinctions are important and peace-loving Canadians should compel extension of such distinctions to crucial areas of foreign policy. We should reject the government's proposal to spend an additional $1,500 million upon new and expanded means of destruction during the coming five years. Canada's real interest will be served by a mass popular demand upon the members of the House of Commons to compel the government to discard that proposal. The Prime Minister should be pressed to carry out his election promise instead.

Canada should send all nuclear war-heads back to the United States. Canada should call for the reconvening of the Geneva Conference and stop the war in Vietnam. Canada should make a public demand that the United States drop its plan to put nuclear weapons in the hands of the West German militarists. Canada should take a clear public stand in favor of complete general world disarmament.

The change of leadership in the Soviet Union and the official statements of policy by Premier Kosygin and Secretary Brezhnev are being responded to by several governments with invitations for exchanges of visits. Now is the time for Canada also to propose reciprocal visits. Let us develop active relations, increase trade and cultural exchanges between our countries. Let us associate our countries, neighbors across the Arctic Ocean, in action to achieve lasting world peace and friendship between peoples. These are the keys to world peace, the characteristics of the foreign policy which is necessary now to regain Canada's independence.

THE PEOPLE AGAINST THE MONOPOLIES

There is developing in Canada widespread democratic opposition to the monopolies and resistance to their exploitation. It finds expression in a variety of forms but its universal content is that of "The people versus the monopolies". It is a gratifying fact that the science of Marxism-Leninism enabled the 18th National Convention of our party to discern the elements of this development and to indicate this as an important avenue of progress in Canada.

There is a marked upward trend of democratic action, and of its power to influence the course of events. The issues around and the forms in which it finds strongest expression differ between French and English Canada, but the demand for progressive social change is outspoken, its growing support it evident, and there is a developing political ferment.

The most evident expression of this trend so far is the militant readiness of the rank and file members of the trade union movement to meet the challenge of the monopolies, including readiness to act together regardless of affiliation.

Monopoly-rigged prices have forced our cost of living up to the highest level in history and the workers want wage increases to maintain their purchasing power. They are no longer satisfied with the traditional settlements of their demands for wages, fringe benefits and better working conditions. They want more paid holidays. They want more adequate pensions and they want to be able to receive the pensions before they are completely broken by the merciless killing speed-up which is shortening the working lives of Canadian workers. They want to abolish the inequitable gap between the wages paid in Canada and the wages paid in the United States for the same type of job and the same amount of work.

The monopolists are developing a new counter-offensive against the workers. Holding down wage levels in spite of a revolutionary increase in productivity, maintaining exorbitant prices in spite of lower and lower costs of production, they drag out negotiations while applying ruthless measures against attempts at job action. They are resuming again the use of organized large-scale scabbery, they use injunctions increasingly to restrict trade union action when the workers are forced to strike. Their courts are stepping up their service to the monopolies against the trade unions, exemplified by the fine and costs totalling nearly 2.5 million dollars imposed upon the Steelworkers for the Murdochville strike.

The battle to protect the workers and their unions against the rapacity of the monopolies when automation is introduced is becoming very sharp. Printing trades workers in Toronto and Montreal, longshoremen in Newfoundland, electrical workers in Dunnville, automobile and steel workers, all these are confronted by the preliminary effects of automation. They are advance detachments of the trade union movement in the battle that is being forced upon the working class by the monopolies. The lockouts and strikes in which these workers are being increasingly involved, are the beginning of a great social struggle that is developing to decide how the coming re-organization of Canadian economy is to be carried through, and what its results are to be for the masses of the people.

In addition to the defensive battles being forced upon the unions, they are fighting also to advance; to win for the workers some benefit from the enormous increases in the profits being made by the great corporations through killing speed-up in the plants and rapacious monopoly price-fixing in the market. Demands fought for by the workers illustrate a vital change that is taking place. The form of their actions is still that of trade union economic struggle, but at the heart of the conflict there is the fact that, to survive, the trade union movement must challenge the right of corporations to be the sole judges of what they will do with "their" increased profits, and what they will do about workers whose labor is replaced by automation. Thus the essential content of these struggles is political. Recognizing this, the Canadian Labor Congress is pressing for far-reaching reforms, to give the trade union movement a voice in carrying through the re-organization of the national economy. Jean Marchand, president of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, declares categorically that the working people must have a direct voice in the direction of an all-embracing reconstruction of the economy of Canada. A great democratic movement must develop to unite the trade unions around this demand in both English and French Canada. There should be developed broad movements in every province to fight for legislation which guarantees security for every worker whose job is taken over by automation.

There is a rising democratic demand, in both French and English Canada, that the federal government should come to grips with some of the problems that beset the two nations of this country, and that the government implements some of its promises, particularly the election promise made by Pearson that, if he became Prime Minister, he would negotiate a reduction of Canada's nuclear role.

Indications that electoral support for progressive policies is increasing are to be seen in the results of municipal elections in various parts of the country. In a number of places progressive candidates, including Communists, received substantially bigger votes than in the previous election. In by-elections for the House of Commons the changes in the popular vote have also been encouraging. The indications so far do not justify a forecast of the trend in the event of a federal general election but they do show the influence of the widespread desire for change. Our audience is growing. The proposals advanced by our party are being listened to with growing respect. There is increasing recognition of the fact that many of the democratic proposals which now command wide support were advanced first by the Communist Party.

GROWING CONTRADICTIONS IN THE ECONOMIC BOOM

Economic activity in Canada is, currently, at the highest level in more than ten years. Corporations profits are at an all-time high. Dividend disbursements are the highest ever — 10 per cent higher in 1964 than in 1963.

Gross national product in 1964 was 6 percent more in volume than in 1963. There has been large-scale expansion of production facilities through 1963 and 1964. Total private and public investment including housing, was $10.8 billion — more than 25 percent of the gross national product. Boosted by the sale of half a billion dollars worth of grain to socialist countries, Canada's exports have, for the first time in 15 years, exceeded our imports of merchandise.

The speed at which the policy of integration is reducing Canada to complete dependence on the United States is illustrated by the growing burden of debt and its effect. During the first nine months of 1964 Canada exported products to the value of $6,159,600,000. We shipped out of this country more goods than we brought in, to the extent of six hundred and thirty-six million dollars worth. But interest and dividends, and other costs of integration were so enormous that, for the year, they consumed all the surplus earned by the export of products, plus an additional six hundred million dollars. Thus, even in such an exceptional year when we exported ten percent more than we imported, Canada is still forced to borrow six hundred million dollars to service debt.

Automation and cold-blooded killing speed-up is increasing productivity per worker to such an extent that Stelco is reputed now to have one of the highest rates of production per worker of any similar plant in the world. In November, Canadian economy was breaking records for production and corporation profits, with 258,000 workers still chronically unemployed. The boom has not overcome the contradiction between the rate of growth of Canada's population and the very slow growth in the number of jobs. Because of the effects of automation, young workers have become the main victims of technological change and automation is only at its beginning.

Monopoly capital has enjoyed a boisterous recovery from the relative decline of 1956 to 1961 and the stock markets are booming. Professional business forecasters are assuring the capitalist class that the economy will continue to expand through 1965. On the surface, it appears that optimistic forecasts are justified, but consideration of the underlying factors upon which the boom depends, compels a more cautious estimate.

A very big factor in the present boom has been new investments, which accounted for more than a quarter of the gross national product in 1964. New investment was triggered, mainly by increased foreign demand for products of the resource industries. That demand and the decisions for or against new investment in this country each depend to an alarming extent upon conditions and interests which are outside Canada.

The majority of all production in this country, including 60 percent of the manufacturing, is controlled now in other countries, mainly the U.S.

Since the Pearson Government took office the U.S. has been taking over control of our country faster than ever. Today 89 percent of all Canadian exports are either industrial raw materials, partly processed raw materials, or agricultural products. In 1963 we exported $780 million worth of finished manufactured products but we imported more than $3,000 million worth, mainly from the United States. Buying finished manufactured products from the U.S. we create for ourselves the chronic mass unemployment of workers, especially young workers, who could be employed producing them here.

The rate of economic expansion is slowing down in the United States as well as in some overseas capitalist countries. It is unlikely that foreign demands for Canadian industrial raw materials will continue to grow as rapidly through 1965 as it did in 1964.

The economies of a number of advanced capitalist states are strained and extremely sensitive to any unfavorable development in capitalist economy as a whole. This found dramatic expression in the alacrity with which eleven imperialist states, including Canada, joined in placing an international credit of $3 billion at the disposal of the government of Britain.

The magnitude of that credit, the speed with which it was arranged, and the simultaneous raising of the bank rate in the leading countries, combined to make that an international financial operation without precedent. It betrays the extreme nervousness of state-monopoly capital and its governments lest a financial or other form of economic "break" in any one of the advanced capitalist countries should touch off an international chain reaction through the tension ridden imperialist system. The Financial Post was impelled to comment, editorially: "Never before have so many nations come together so promptly and so effectively to stamp out a financial fire that could have led to a competitive devaluation race in currencies and widespread economic holocaust." (Financial Post, Dec. 5, 1964)

These factors are not evident in Canada as yet but they will effect our economy.

The fact that the people of Canada are going to be compelled to deal with crucial economic problems in the near future is admitted in the Report of the Economic Council of Canada, published on January 12th.

This documented statement admits that our economic development has fallen far behind our potential and that it will be necessary to create new jobs during the coming years, twice as fast as we created them during the past fourteen years, just to keep pace with the growth of population. Even more significant is the fact that this Report admits that we can do this, provided that a larger area of this country's economy is developed under public ownership and control.

Our 18th National Convention saw this problem developing and emphasized it. The difference is that, whereas the Economic Council of Canada evades the question of what, specifically, should be done, our convention told the people of this country forthrightly what needs to be done and proposed that we join forces to do it.

The Pearson Government on the other hand, with the co-operation of the Conservative and Social Credit parties, is trying to sidestep this issue by selling still more of Canada and control of our lives, to the United States. Writing in the current issue of a United States magazine, Foreign Affairs, Prime Minister Pearson adds his voice to the chorus of monopoly propagandists who are pressing for the pooling of all the natural resources of Canada and the United States. One of the objectives of this plan is to divert vast quantities of fresh water from Canada's lakes and rivers to the United States by canals to head off the threatening famine of fresh water in that country. This is simultaneously a plan to head off development of conditions there which would induce numerous industries to transfer their production operations from the United States to Canada. It is Canadian monopoly capitalists and their political representatives who are "selling us down the river" by integration and they are making fabulous profits out of their operation. But their victim is Canada. They are selling our country's future. The long-term tendency of integration is to turn the direction of Canadian economic activities from East-West to North-South. Contrary to the assurances being given concerning free trade in automobiles and parts, and in spite of the fact that some very transitory advantages may be derived from this, the overall effect of integration is to transfer control of Canada's economy to foreign hands. This is why the president of the New York City Bank prophesied to a meeting of Toronto businessmen early in January that there will be "a custom union" between Canada and the U.S. within ten years. Integration is the policy of subjugating Canada completely to the United States. Against this there will arise, there must be developed a great national-democratic Canadian movement for a new economic policy, to bring the monopolies under democratic public control.

A VOLUNTARY PARTNERSHIP OR A DIVIDED CANADA

Our country is inhabited by two nations, English and French Canadians. As nations we are distinct from each other as both of us are distinct from the older nations from which we all are descended. The one way by which we can prevent a "break-up" of Canada, is by recognizing that, in the conditions of today, neither of her nations can be subject to the other one. The relationship between English Canada and French Canada must be changed to one of voluntary partnership in a new and genuine confederation.

For us to enter voluntarily into partnership the primary requirement is mutual recognition of the necessity for us to do so, in a new confederation. Only on this basis can the two nations approach the distribution of governmental powers in a new confederation, that is to say, which powers are to be retained by each nation to be exercised as it decides on its own territory, and which are to be assigned to the confederal government with the necessary safeguards to protect the national status and rights of each nation in that government also. Instead of a pretended confederation of ten provinces, Canadians need a genuine voluntary confederation of the two nations. Joint elaboration of such an agreement between the two nations is indispensable. It is the Liberal and Tory refusal to acknowledge this fact that could lead to a "break-up".

The Pearson Government "tipped its hat" to the necessity for a Canadian Constitution when it set up the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. But today, even before that commission has completed its public hearings, the Pearson Government is engaged in backroom negotiations, behind the backs of the people, in an attempt to reach an agreement between the federal and provincial governments, Liberals and Tories, upon the means by which to retain the British North America Act as the constitution of Canada on the basis of the reactionary idea that Prime Minister Pearson describes as "co-operative federalism". That high-sounding phrase is in fact a deceptive verbal fig leaf for a cunning plan to defeat the demand for solution of the crisis between the two Canadian nations. It is represented to the people as simply an elastic conception of the relations between federal and provincial governments, to the extent that all provincial governments can exercise freedom to choose when they will be an integral part of Canada and when they will not. It does include that. Its immediate effect is to encourage provincial governments to jockey and bargain with the federal government and with each other, each becoming increasingly concerned to be the sole agent for the monopoly or monopolistic group, the interest of which is dominant at the time. It provides loopholes by which governments, provincial and federal, may evade their responsibilities. It fosters the competition between provinces which leads to elements of anti-French propaganda in some parts of English Canada. The logic of the conception corresponds with the perspective of the dissolution of Canada as a sovereign confederation. It is no accident that Mr. Pearson, at the convention which elected him National Leader, refused to pledge himself to "maintain the Canadian identity."

English Canada and French Canada will both be victimized if the Liberals and Tories are allowed to continue to inflict upon us the unworkable distribution of powers and responsibilities laid down in the outdated BNA Act, particularly with the additional handicaps imposed by "co-operative federalism".

English Canada needs a new constitution to enable the people to correct the anomalies that have developed because of the BNA Act, to carry through needed changes without infringing upon the rights of Quebec, to redistribute responsibilities and taxing powers of the different levels of government, in accord with the conditions of today, to stop the systematic dispersal of responsibilities that is proceeding now.

French Canada needs a new Canadian Constitution to satisfy her demand for constitutional recognition of her full and unqualified national status and of the right of the people to decide for themselves whether they will remain in partnership with English Canada. How important that is, to Canada, as a whole, was illustrated by René Lévesque, a minister in the Quebec government, when he replied to an interviewer in a CBC television program: "No I am not a separatist." But, if we cannot reach agreement with English Canada, then, "I could become one." A Canadian Constitution is necessary to preserve Canada as a two-nation state.

In French Canada the struggle for national rights is inseperable now from the people's struggles for social justice. They want to develop their economy, to abolish unemployment and they want democratic control of the conditions of their lives. They want educational opportunities for their sons and daughters. They want social security. The rise of new socialist organizations in Quebec represents the merging of national aspirations with socialist consciousness. A growing number are inspired by the ideal of socialism, a society which rejects war and the exploitation of man by man, in which the full free opportunity for the development of each guarantees the harmonious development fo society as a whole.

People are becoming disillusioned with the evasions of the Lesage Government. Jean Lesage promised that his aim would be to make the people of French Canada "masters in their own house." Instead he has, in effect, repudiated the principle of the right to national self-determination through to victory. Great demonstrations of farmers, school teachers and others, demanding social justice, are dramatic expressions of the fact that,in Quebec, an alliance between distinct groups of democratic forces is already in action.

Steadily there is a coming together in French Canada of patriotic national aspirations and economic discontent. The merging of these will achieve a new status for French Canada. It will be in a new voluntary partnership of equals or it will end the present anomaly in some other way.

Along with the necessity to solve the crisis between the two Canadian nations, Canada needs a new constitution to overcome the undemocratic features and the gaps and the anomalies the pervade the outmoded British North America Act. In addition to the necessity for changes in the constitutional division of powers and responsibilities between the different levels of government, Canadian democrats must write some provisions in our new constitution which are notable by their absence from the BNA Act.

Every Canadian needs the protection of a Bill of Rights, entrenched in the constitution and free from the limitations and restrictions that are imposed on the Bill of Rights today by the provisions of the outdated BNA Act.

The organized labor movement needs constitutional guarantees of the civil rights of workers—an end to the use of injunctions, full democratic right to strike and to picket, immunity of trade unions as such from legal actions.

The national minorities in Canada need constitutional guarantees of civil rights, particularly the right of immigrants to attain citizenship regardless of his or her race, color, creed, or political affiliation. The present situation, in which immigrants who have seen active service with Canada's armed forces may be refused citizenship on the word of a secret R.C.M.P. informer, and have no opportunity to confront the informer or even to know what the alleged information is, must be ended. Deportation of workers without a public trial must be stopped. Members of national groups in Canada need guarantees of cultural rights to continue to enjoy the treasures of the culture of the lands of their birth without being treated here as a second class citizen.

For our self-respect as a people, all democratic Canadians need a new constitution to codify an end to the historic injustice that we have committed and are continuing to commit against the indigenous people of our country, the Indian and the Eskimo peoples.

Every person of Indian and Eskimo birth must enjoy the full rights of Canadian citizenship without any loss of treaty rights, or other governmental assistance. Every boy and girl of Indian and Eskimo birth must be guaranteed the right to education equal to the rights enjoyed by the children of other Canadians. Every young man and young woman of Indian or Eskimo birth must be guaranteed an opportunity to learn a trade or a profession. The Indian and Eskimo people must be guaranteed all social services, federal and provincial, enjoyed by other Canadians.

Now at least we have a distinctive Canadian flag. We greet this. The Communist Party has advocated consistently since 1926 that we adopt a flag that is distinctively Canadian to symbolize Canada's sovereignty. We rejoice in the fact that it is greeted with such wide approval in both French and English Canada. Now that our flag is uniquely Canadian, surely we should agree that the constitution under which we live should be uniquely Canadian also. All who love this country, all who want to see her two nations associated in firm and lasting partnership, in the independent two-nation state of Canada, should support now the demand for: a new Canadian Constitution, written in Canada to express the national relationship and the constitutional needs of today, by 1967.

Such are the outlines of the general political situation and the changes taking place as the people of Canada start the year 1965 confronted by a growing necessity for energetic democratic action to get Canada's foreign policy on to the path of peace, for domestic action to solve the constitutional crisis, to stop the depradations of the monopolies, to make automation serve the people instead of creating unemployment and economic chaos, to reorganize Canada's economy, to regain Canada's independence. These issues which were emphasized by the 18th National Convention of our Party, continue to be at the heart of Canadian politics. The three point program, adopted by the 18th Convention of our party expresses in broad outline the needs of Canada and her people.

TOWARDS DEMOCRATIC UNITY AGAINST THE MONOPOLIES

The urgent immediate need of Canadians in all walks of life, in French and English Canada, who want peace in the world and democratic social progress at home, is the development of cooperation on the path to a democratic alliance of progressive forces. Working people, professional and other middle class people in the towns and on the farms, all who recognize the necessity to end the unbridled rule of the monopolies and the steadily increasing commitment of our country to nuclear war, are faced with a challenge. It is a challenge to our ability to unite for democratic aims. There is need to bring together, in French and English Canada, alliances of progressive forces in opposition to the monopolies and to the political parties which serve monopoly capital. To fight for Canada, for broadening democracy, for peace, for socialism, in the conditions prevailing in this country today, means to work to build electoral unity and extend it systematically until it is broad enough to end the monopoly of parliament by the Liberal and Conservative parties.

Until now the great majority of Canadian workers have voted in elections for the candidates of the Liberal and Conservative parties. There is a long-term trend among industrial workers, of a turn away from their once "deep-dyed true blue" loyalty to the Conservative Party, but this is not yet a rejection of capitalist politics. The tendency of large segments of the popular vote to swing from one of the old parties to the other shows that the majority of people do not see any essential difference between the two old parties, many workers are losing confidence in both of them. There is a growing leftward trend, expressed in the NDP, in the rise of socialist organizations in Quebec, and in the rising militancy of the working class.

Working class support for the NDP is growing, although not yet in the way that is necessary to end the Liberal-Tory control of parliament.

The struggle to win support for the program of our party, does not contradict critical support for the NDP in elections. Our party has advocated the building of a broad electoral party since we were first organized in February 1922. Our program makes it mandatory upon us to give critical support to the NDP, to help it to increase its strength in the House of Commons, while convincing more and more of its members of the necessity to develop cooperation between our two parties. Critical support must extend beyond election campaigns however; it must include consistent day by day activity to help members of the NDP to recognize the full role that their party can play if it will become part of a broad democratic alliance against the monopolies. Such alliances in opposition to the monopolies and to the political parties which serve monopoly capital, must be built in French and English Canada on the basis of the popular democratic movements of each nation and they will have to be extended until they are broad enough to rally the largest grouping of the electorate and elect majorities.

To win recognition of the necessity for such a development and of the role that the NDP must play in it, is one of the main tasks of our party. It must be at the center of our work as an essential link between the present situation and the winning of socialism.

The necessity for cooperation between the Communist Party and the NDP, and between both of us and other socialist parties or groups must be emphasized particularly in relation to our proposals for far-reaching reforms and the necessity for democratic unity to achieve them. The Communist Party will strive for the development of consistent cooperation between our party and the NDP, and all socialist-minded workers, in action to win immediate demands and in longer term action to bring about an anti-monopolist coalition of democratic forces.

OUR PARTY IN THE GENERAL ELECTION

Maneuvering for party advantage has become the main preoccupation of the parliamentarians, completely overshadowing the legislative needs of the Canadian people. It has brought parliament to a state of near-paralysis, at times almost to popular ridicule. There is a growing opinion that a general election is becoming necessary, even if only to end the harm that is being done to the image of Canada's Parliament.

The Pearson Government would prefer to avoid a general election at this time, particularly while it is on the defensive against accusations of attempted bribery and coercion. The leader of the official opposition on the contrary, has been so anxious to force an election that his tactics in the House of Commons have verged at times upon irresponsibility. The Liberals have avoided defeat until now, because the other parties and even some Conservatives members have rejected the idea of another election so soon.

It is not possible as yet to define what changes if any will take place in the relationship between the political parties of the capitalist class between now and the election. It is evident that a good deal of maneuvering and some negotiations are taking place. The Quebec Conservatives in the House of Commons split from Diefenbaker on the issue of the flag, some of them may leave the party. Premier Manning of Alberta flew a trial balloon on the possibility of some measure of electoral unity between Social Credit and another party. Premier Bennett, along with crystallizing West Coast finance-capitalist interests, is bent openly upon strengthening his regional authority and political autonomy.

The elements of flux that are indicated in the maneuvers of the capitalist party leaderships reflect the increasing underlying pressure of change. They emphasize the necessity for our party to bring forward as strongly as possible the challenge, and the possibilities, that this situation presents to the progressive movement. These possibilities are reflected in the tactics of the Pearson Government.

The cumulative effects of hard fought battles by the working class movement over the years, are impelling the Pearson Government to try to make the Liberals appear as the party which will serve the interests of the working class. As part of this strategy, the government has brought in some of the legislation that its spokesmen promised in their election speeches. The Canada Pension Plan and The Canadian Labor (Standards) Code are each of this character although concessions to the insurance companies and other finance-capitalist interests have reduced the Canada Pension Plan seriously and concessions are being made now on the Labor (Standards) Code. The workers are being assured that medicare will be next if the government is re-elected. The Canada Pension Plan and the Labor (Standards) Code can both be passed and become law during this Parliament if the democratic forces of the country exert united pressure for them but powerful lobbies are seeking to delay their passage and to emasculate them still futher.

In the event that a general election is called before the next meeting of the National Committee and in circumstances which prevent a special meeting, the Communist Party will fight the election campaign on concrete proposals which express the aims of the Three Point Program adopted by the 18th National Convention, in terms of the pressing current needs of the people, in English Canada and in French Canada.

The party will nominate candidates in both English and French Canada, and will fight energetically to elect them. We will fight everywhere in Canada to win support for our program. In constituencies in which there is no Communist candidate we shall work for the election of the NDP candidates.

The party must begin now to focus its activity on preparations for the coming election. Our aim is to integrate every party club in the campaign in a lively active way on the constituency level as well as to relate our national platform as an influential factor in the campaign as a whole. This means a concrete study of each constituency, the local issues as well as their relation to the national picture; an appraisal of the sitting member as well as the alternative candidates and the most flexible ways to develop our influence in each constituency.

The question of party candidates will be a subject of consultation between the National Executive Committee and the provincial leadership in each province. Decisions whether or not to nominate, in which constituencies, and who is to be the candidate, must be based upon the concrete circumstances in each case.

We shall emphasize the role that the NDP can and should play in uniting Canadian democracy against the monopolies. We shall urge the NDP to invite other progressive parties and organizations to form constituency elecoral alliances in support of its candidates.

Because of the position of the NDP on the national question, the attitude of the progressive forces in French Canada towards it differ considerably from that of progressive people in English Canada. The electoral relationship that will emerge between the NDP and other progressive forces in Quebec, including the trade union movement, will determine the role that it plays in the struggle for the idea of a democratic anti-monopoly coalition in French Canada. The Communist Party will fight for the idea of electoral unity of the anti-monopoly forces in French Canada as in English Canada, on the basis of the issues and the organizations and the forms of struggle involved.

The party's electoral platform should be built around our 3-Point Program.

a) A new foreign policy of peace, disarmament and world trade, starting with the removal of all nuclear weapons and bases from Canada. This section will include immediate demands such as: Canadian initiative in the UN to outlaw the use of nuclear weapons in any circumstances. A demand for the re-convening of the Geneva Conference to stop U.S. aggression in South East Asia. Concrete proposals on trade, economic assistance to newly independent countries, etc.

b) A new constitution for a united Canada made up of the two free and equal nations dwelling together in friendship.

c) A new economic policy of jobs, all round Canadian economic development and Canadian independence—to curb the monopolies, place them under public control and bring the benefits of the scientific industrial revolution to the people.

This section will include our concrete immediate demands relating to people's welfare, as well as the longer-term proposals for reorganization of the economy.

In campaigning for our election platform or specific proposals from it, our party will seek, consisently and sincerely to cooperate with all democratic Canadians who favor peace and social progress. In working to develop such cooperation we must correct a mistake that we have made in the past. We must change our attitude, as a party and as individual Communists, to progressive people who are not Communists. This is particularly important in relation to the socialist groups in French Canada and to all workers in both nations who subscribe to the idea of socialism but do not join our party. Many such are members of the NDP. In French Canada some are members of socialist organizations, many of them in both French and English Canada are not members of any political party. But such workers are interested in the same demands for which our party is fighting and usually support the struggles for them.

In the past we have adopted a mistaken attitude to such workers. Failing to understand that people fight for what they believe to be right, in their own way, we have obscured our view of their political activities by our own special smokescreen of prejudice — against reformists and against social reformism in general.

This prejudice must be overcome. The harm that it is doing to our party and the over-all struggle for peace and socialism in Canada must be stopped. It will require serious self-critical work by all of us, as a party and as individual Communists, beyond the election campaign, right through to the stage when we and the socialist workers and the party or parties that they belong to, cooperate in mobilizing a democratic anti-monopoly coalition, in the election of a People's Government, and through to the building of socialism in Canada. It is our task to start earnestly now as an indispensable feature of our preparations for and campaigning in the federal election.

THE PARTY

Our party is the politically organized direct continuation of the socialist movement to which capitalism gave birth in Canada with the rise of modern industry during the 1890's. The Communist Party is inseparable from the transition to socialism on a world scale, ushered in by the Great October Revolution. To make its most effective contribution to the advance of the working class to political maturity, and to the struggle for over-all democratic progress in general, as well as in the forthcoming general election, our party is called upon now to strengthen its struggle for the creative development of the ideological positions of Marxism-Leninism and to improve its work to integrate Marxism-Leninism in the broad labor movement.

The most urgent immediate measure by which we can increase the effectiveness of our contribution to the labor movement and to the development of the anti-monopoly coalition is by building our party.

The growth of the party is directly related to helping the working class go beyond trade union consciousness, to bringing socialist consciousness into the broad labor movement and strengthening the leading role of the working class as that force around which an anti-monopoly coalition can be brought into being.

This long term task can be achieved to the extent that the party's leading role is strengthened, enabling it to give conscious, bold and timely leadership in this period of great change. To negate or underestimate the party's leading role is to fall into the pitfall of spontaneity or reformism and opportunism and weaken and isolate the party.

There is need to deepen understanding of the party's attitude to these cardinal questions. From this it follows that the strengthening of the party's influence among industrial workers must be at the center of attention of the party. From this it follows that party organization must be placed on a firm footing and all tendencies towards looseness and diffusion strongly combatted. This cannot be carried through by administrative measures but by patient ideological work convincing and activizing the party members.

To make the party a more effective force in the developing movements of the people, to build and extend its influence, demands an all-sided struggle against opportunist passivity which leads to lagging behind events and a struggle against dogmatism and sectarianism which isolates us from these movements.

To accomplish the tasks that stand before the working class and our party requires a radical improvement in our style of work, and methods of leadership.

Nationally this requires stronger, more decisive and operative leadership, more initiative, directed to inspiring the party and helping it to influence the course of events. This needs to be combined with a critical and self-critical examination of the work of the party, a continuing study of the processes at work in our country and creative development of policy. It requires a continuing study and utilization of the personnel of the party with a view to strengthening key areas of work and promoting younger comrades into positions of responsibility. It likewise requires a strengthening of the ideological work of the party, combatting both revisionist and dogmatic and ultra-leftist tendencies in the party and around the labor movement, and a radical improvement in the educational work of the party.

As we have recognized for some time our party is passing through a difficult period.

Our membership and the readership of our press is not growing, and is in fact in many areas declining. Consequently, the age level of our members and immediate supporters is increasing, affecting our ability to campaign and influence the course of events.

We devoted our last National Committee to an effort to dig into some of the root causes of this grave problem. The discussion initiated at that meeting is helping to sharpen our critical examination of our work—and that self-criticism, which is the law of growth for a Communist Party, must continue and go deeper yet.

We need to continue the fight begun at the last plenum to raise up the sense of responsibility of each individual member for the work of our party. We need to continue to stress the high value we place on the initiative of our members who strive, in the best way that is possible for each of them, to become part of the people's movements, and to work there for our policies. The ways in which this can be done are far too varied to be the subject of blue-prints provided by leading committees.

The more we succeed in enhancing the initiative of our members, the more will our clubs become what they ought to be—the place where Communists exchange experiences, receive education, guidance and inspiration from discussions with others, all for the purpose of helping our members to work among other people.

We must take our point of departure from the situation in which we work in this country today, from the fact already stated in the resolution that "there is a marked upward trend of democratic action, and of its power to influence the course of events . . . the demand for progressive social change is outspoken, its growing support is evident, and there is a growing political ferment."

Wherever we have been able to become part of these developments our experiences are positive. In the municipal elections, in which most of our public activity has recently been centred, in meetings with university students, and church groups, in discussions with militant trade unionists, in participation in such media of public discussion as the Couchiching Conference, EPIC, etc.—we have found a friendly response to the propositions we put forward, and a willingness on the part of others to take up these propositions. While anti-communist prejudice remains widespread, there is a distinct decline in open red-baiting, and far less tendency to exclude Communists.

The barriers erected against our participation in the movements of the people in the earlier years of the cold war period are breaking down. Participation in broad people's movements is increasingly possible today, requiring only consistent action on our part. The chief obstacles that stand in our way in this period are of our own creation—tendencies to withdrawal, unjustified fear of the consequences of being known as Communists, routine preoccupation with inner affairs, passivity growing out of failure to appreciate the changes taking place within the working class and among the democratic people generally.

Along with this goes a problem of our understanding of the movements of the 60's, a tendency to think too much in terms of the mass movements of earlier days. Progressive movements are arising today, in conditions of relative prosperity, and are expressing the demand for a good life which working people are increasingly aware is made fully possibly by the advance of science. We need to strive much more to identify ourselves with these positive forward strivings.

The whole attention of our party needs to be turned to the problem of becoming fully a part of these developing movements of our class, and of the democratic people of our country, to which we must bring our own specific contribution.

That contribution includes the popularization, in public campaigning as in the federal election, of the three point program adopted by our 18th National Convention, the singling out in a concrete way of immediate goals towards which it is practical for a particular section of the mass movement to strive at a given time, and a constant focus upon the need for achieving the broadest unity of action in every struggle.

STRENGTHEN THE PARTY'S IDEOLOGICAL WORK

We must strengthen the party's ideological work in all its aspects. We must develop more effective methods by which party members and progressive non-communists can study the application of Marxism-Leninism to our problems in Canada, today. This must be an increasing important feature of the educational work of the clubs, evening classes, week-end courses and seminars, and summer schools. As soon as possible the party must re-establish the National School.

In our ideological work we must deal increasingly and concretely with the problems of Canadian development, and we must subject our Marxist-Leninist conclusions to the test of public debate on the widest scale possible.

Some progress has been made in the publication of materials putting forward the party's position and proposals on problems confronting the Canadian people. In addition to the briefs submitted in public hearings of commissions on various matters of public concern, the party has published pamphlets and booklets dealing with the problems of power development, automation, the need for a new economic policy, on the need for a new constitution and, in the French language, on the necessity for a new social policy in French Canada in place of the present bourgeois policy. In addition, The Marxist Quarterly has made special contributions to the ideological work of the party by its issues devoted specifically to the crisis between the two Canadian nations, automation, and the centennial of the founding of the First International, as well as by its articles on other subjects.

To a limited extent, public discussion of our party's position has been developed. A great deal more is necessary, however. We must do more work on, and also at, the point of the impact of these new problems on the lives of the people. We must deal directly with the actual effects of automation where they are evident, and with the practical measures that should be fought for to protect the workers immediately concerned. To the workers on the job this is as important at the moment as is the fundamental contradiction between the social consequences of automation and private ownership and control of the means of operating it.

There is need for an authoritative but popular exposé of the grim meaning for Canada of the scheme now being supported by the Pearson Government to divert enormous volumes of Canada's fresh water to the United States. There is need for Marxist-Leninist treatment of the problems of social reconstruction which confront Canada and which, to an increasing extent, will be subjects of popular discussion. On these and similar projects we should seek to cooperate with all who will join in the work of elaborating Marxist analyses of Canadian reality. We should seek to extend Canada-wide participation in the work of the Marxist Study Center, looking to the development of a Marxist-Leninist Canadian Center of Social Studies.

Along with such extension and over-all enrichment of our ideological work we must, more effectively, expose and combat the anti-Leninist character of the line propagated in Canada by those who support the position of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China. We must show to all who support the ideal of socialism, to all who cherish peace, how the danger of war is increased by the division in the world Communist movement. Furthermore, workers who are interested in the cause of socialism must be shown convincingly, by our actions as well as by the truth and logic of our arguments, that the political line of our party and the immediate proposals in which our line is expressed concretely, are the consistent revolutionary application of Marxism-Leninism in Canada. Workers who are sincerely interested in socialism and attracted by revolutionary generalization and radical-sounding phrases should be approached in a comradely way. It is our responsibility to help such workers to get a clear understanding of the revolutionary science of Marxism-Leninism as our guide to action.

We must arouse supporters of Marxism-Leninism more effectively to isolate those who, for whatever reason, set up organizations such as the Progressive Workers Movement, in opposition to the Communist Party. We must reach out to the growing number of workers and progressive middle class people who want social change but who have not yet accepted Marxism-Leninism. To such people our ideological work should have the character of an extended hand as well as being the clear application of our world-historical science in Canada.

REFORMS AND THE SOCIALIST REVOLUTION

Our party is called upon now to place a great deal more emphasis upon the vital relationship between the struggle for needed reforms and the socialist revolution. It is necessary that we eliminate the erroneous theory, expressed in the non-Marxist formula that "reforms are only by-products of the revolutionary struggle." Writing on this question during 1916, Lenin pointed out that the essence of reformism lies in mitigating an evil and not destroying it:

> "A reformist change is one which leaves intact the foundations of the power of the ruling class and is merely a concession leaving its power unimpaired. A revolutionary change undermines the foundations of power." (Collected Works, Volume 22, page 344)

A few lines down the page Lenin added: "But, as everybody knows, in practice a reform is often merely a step towards revolution."

We must emphasize the special importance of this today, in the conditions of the world historical transition to socialism.

Precisely because we are living in the epoch of the transition to socialism on a world scale, because of the deepening historical crisis of imperialism, because wider and wider circles of people are recognizing socialism as the just alternative to the increasing evils of imperialism, mass working class struggles for needed reforms have a significance that is related to the new epoch. Every genuine mass struggle to back up demands upon monopoly capital or upon the capitalist state is, objectively, part of the many-sided historical process through which, eventually, the monopolies will be defeated by the people. It is well to recall that, in his famous Inaugural Address at the founding of the First International, Marx greeted the victory of the struggle for the ten-hour day in Britain's factories and mines as "the victory of a principle".

In Canada today there is sharpening need for reforms some of which, to paraphrase Lenin, undermine the foundations of capitalist class power. Typical of such reforms is the urgent necessity to take away from the monopolies the right that they exercise now to decide when and how they will introduce automation, regardless of its consequences. Another is the necessity for public control of a growing proportion of all new investment. This necessity is creating another, namely, the necessity for public control of capital accumulation—the heart of monopoly capitalism. Repatriation of ownership of natural resources, nationalization of banking and credit. bringing the monopolies under democratic public control, the right of the working class to have a voice in a radical re-organization of Canadian economy, indeed our program of democratic reconstruction of the economy as a whole, these exemplify the growing need for reforms which will undermine the power of monopoly capital. These and other changes of this character will be achieved only as the working class along with other progressive forces in French and English Canada unite and win their rightful place and role in the leadership of their respective nations. Because of this, struggles for peace, to end the use of injunctions, and so on, are all part of the process of changing the structure of our political life.

The conditions and traditions of working class struggle indicate a strong probability that, in our country, the socialist revolution will be carried through successfully, as the culmination of tireless militant popular struggles to overcome the opposition of the monopolies to needed reforms, including structural reforms. Provided that the popular forces for progress, including other progressive political parties besides the Communist Party, are united in that, a powerful coalition of democratic forces can be united in political and economic action against the monopolies. Mass popular struggle to put the monopolies under control, is right on the main political path to the election of People's Governments in both French and English Canada.

Paying careful attention to differences between French and English Canada in the urgency of issues, and to the differing forms of action by which struggles are developed around them, the party will carry systematic, well-organized activity all over the country to help develop democratic action around the issues which are at the heart of the parliamentary crisis. Beneath the maneuvering of the parties in the House of Commons, obscured by their maneuvers, it is a crisis of policy, of leadership. Our party must reach out to democratic people on the widest scale, with the truth. What is involved is in fact the question whether Canada shall move forward along the path of peace and democratic social progress; or backward, to be shackled still more harshly under monopoly domination and enmeshed deeper and deeper in our commitment to nuclear war. Our party will strive to make these alternatives clear to all democratic Canadians as part of our continuing campaign for our three point program and a democratic advance to socialism in Canada.

It is by thus becoming part of the movements of the people, and by contributing to their development that our party can grow in influence and membership and come to exercise its vanguard role in the full sense of the term.

In working in this direction, it is essential that we pay special attention to the development of unity between ourselves and that growing mody of Canadians outside our party who are seeking a socialist answer to the problems of our society.

In the first place, cooperation between ourselves and this socialist left, can have the most positive results in terms of influencing the movements of the people as a whole in the direction of greater militancy and unity in the struggle against the monopolies. Of no less importance, is the fact stressed at our last national committee meeting that it is largely from amongst this socialist left that our party will gain new members and supporters.

We have a problem of winning the confidence of the socialist left—one that we will only overcome as we enter into frank discussion with those who are part of it.

That discussion must go beyond immediate issues, and take up fundamental questions with respect to the road to socialism in Canada.

In putting forward our position, we must make clear that we look forward to long term cooperation between ourselves and others on the left in the winning and building of socialism, which includes the concept of the probability of multi-party coalitions. We must develop our ideas on the process by which socialism will be achieved in Canada through the struggle for the democratization of our society through deep-going reforms which curb and weaken the monopolies and strengthen the working class.

We must, better than we have done up until now, show not only how this is the realistic road to the socialist revolution, but how it is the basis for the inspiration of all socialists (including ourselves) with the conviction that in the movements of the present we advance the cause of the socialist future of our country.

We must recognize that in conditions of mounting social criticism and ferment many ultra-left and pseudo-revolutionary sentiments will arise, especially among younger Canadians. These ideas while expressing on one hand frustrations at the slow progress of socialist development among the people, and petty bourgeois idealistic searching for quick answers and alternatives, none the less represent sincere and honest motivations in most cases.

This tendency poses a threat to the working class movement in Canada because it joins at times with discredited Trotskyist elements, as well as being objectively in harmony with the divisive line of the Communist Party of China.

The necessity to isolate the line of the CP of China can only be realized by the confidence and mastery and development of our own program and policy and in sharp debate and discussion on all divergences.

However our attitude to most of our critics from the left must be one of patient debate and example, without conceding one element of principle.

This is especially true in relation to younger people who are developing a social consciousness on the basis of their own experiences, and without a firm footing in the history and tradition of the working class movement in Canada and the world.

We have to find a basis for cooperation with all who act for peace, democracy and progressive change, with special emphasis upon the necessity to find common ground for joint action and discussion with leftward moving young people.

The prime responsibility for putting into life all that is indicated here devolves upon the party leadership. It is fully responsible for initiating and giving firm consistent direction to this vital change that our party will make. It must be emphasized that great improvement is necessary in respect to this. But, for the party as a whole to become seized with the revolutionary significance of the change, the membership as a whole, at all levels of party organization, must be drawn into the process of mastering the idea of the change, and bringing it about.

We need to continue to stress the high value we place on the initiative of our members who strive, in the best way that is possible for each of them, to become part of the people's movements, and to work there for our policies. The ways in which this can be done are far too varied to be the subject of blue-prints provided by leading committees.

The more we succeed in enhancing the initiative of our members, the more will our clubs become what they ought to be—the place where Communists exchange experiences, receive education, guidance and inspiration from discussions with others all for the purpose of helping our members to work among other people.

The party demands that its leading personnel works consistently to take advantage of the widening opportunities for public work and for strengthening our relations with the people's movements.

The party leadership must work, constantly, to encourage and develop more spokesmen for our party policy in all communities, in all sections of the democratic movement.

Party leadership has the responsibility of lifting up the work of our party, focussing the attention of our membership on the new developments in Marxism-Leninism, and their application in a creative way to present-day Canadian problems. A most necessary part of the process of the improvement of the work of party leadership at all levels is the promotion of younger comrades of proven ability in working among the people and in meeting the challenge of new conditions.

The stress on individual initiative, and upon the variety of directions in which the work of our members can establish new real relations with the mass movements, has to be combined with emphasis on one task which needs to be made a feature of the work of every Communist wherever he or she may be. That task is the spreading of our press and literature.

We should at this National Committee meeting re-state the emphasis placed upon this question at our plenum in November 1963, when we stressed the need to make the building of the circulation of our press the first job of every party member, and to make our press "the means of spreading ideas, comment, new points of view and entering into debate on a far wider plane than now."

We must strive to win at first hundreds and then thousands of new readers among people active in the democratic movements, particularly those of the socialist left. The fight to win new readers for our party press is an integral part of the all-round struggle to build the party, to win new supporters for its proposals, to extend its influence to wider circles of workers and progressive farm and urban middle class people.This is the path by which our party will bring the science of Marxism-Leninism into the broad progressive movement and make its full contribution to the triumph of peace, democracy and socialism in Canda.

MOTIONS ON YOUTH WORK

The following motions, flow from discussions held in the NEC concerning the memo on youth work which was presented and tabled at the last meeting of the National Committee. The discussion at this time is complicated and made more difficult because of the virtual elimination of the national office of the YCL during the period between plenums. While this fact makes more difficult our discussion at this time, it also underlines the necessity of coming to grips with this field of activity, of developing a perspective and to begin moving on a predetermined course.

It is necessary at the outset to remind the Committee as to where the youth memo stands at present in the discussion. The following is point 10 of a letter to the membership from Number 2 of Viewpoint:

"10. A memorandum prepared by the national office had been circulated to the National Committee prior to its June meeting, in which a number of steps were proposed to establish firmly the principle of party responsibility for work among young Canadians. The memorandum was not adopted by the National Committee but referred to further discussion and a future meeting inasmuch as it made proposals with respect to the YCL that required this discussion. However, steps which have been taken by the NEC to appoint a national party youth secretary, and a party youth director in the Metro Toronto area, were approved, as well as plans to publish a paper for young Canadians later this year. In the discussion, descriptions were given of experiences in Toronto and Edmonton of party clubs of young people which have been set up since the 18th Convention. In each case a number of positive achievements were registered and some of the prospects for work by the party in the youth community were outlined. Some speakers in the discussion were not generally in favor of "youth clubs" of the party although they agreed that the experiences in Toronto and Edmonton could be regarded as valuable experiments. National Committee members from French Canada (and from B.C.) emphasized that they needed the YCL and that it should be retained as a local organization even if the national YCL organization were to be abandoned, as the memorandum on youth work suggests. (The memorandum lays great stress on the existence of youth groups in the localities, for which the local party would take responsibility.")

Progress has been made in developing the magazine, an advance flyer has been produced and well received throughout the country, and the first issue is now well under way.

MOTIONS

1. This meeting of the National Committee, having considered the need to decidedly strengthen work among young people, reiterates again that work among youth is a direct political responsibility of the party. This should guide the work of all party organizations. Furthermore it expresses agreement with the proposal that, for the period immediately ahead the concentration of the party's activity in the field of youth work shall be focussed on local groups of young people as circumstances make possible in each area.

2. The National Committee expresses the view that there is need for further clarity and perspective with respect to forms of organization best suited to attract young people to socialist ideas. Experience so far would indicate the need for flexibility. In some places, YCL groups function, in others different types of youth organizations as well as teenage discussion groups have come into being. In still others party clubs composed of young people have been established. Out of the development of these and other diverse forms of activity and practice the groundwork will be laid for the formation at a later stage of an all-Canada youth organization.

3. To strengthen work in the youth field at this time, and to bring together all facets of this sphere of activity, party youth committees should be set up in the main centers, to work closely with the National Youth Committee of the party. The task of these committees should be to develop appropriate forms of youth activity, such as teenage groups, campus clubs and other forms. The party youth director should be considered as a Communist Party spokesman among youth.

4. Such youth committees should in the main be composed of younger comrades actively engaged in various facets of youth work. These committees should also maintain and develop liaison with other youth groupings and organizations, and as a Communist Party spokesman among youth. Provision should also be made for national and regional conferences, meetings and seminars on policy matters relating to youth questions as the need arises.

5. The National Committee calls upon the party to give full support to Scan now being launched and will press throughout the country to win readers for it among young people and to build up supporting committees to spread its circulation. We should see the success of Scan as decisive step in bringing our ideas to young Canadians as well as providing a forum of opinion for questioning young people. In the long term the success of Scan can ensure a cohesive force in our efforts to weld a Canada-wide youth movement.

The National Committee taking account of the specific problems, and developments among university students, proposes that a coordinating committee be established at the national center to develop work and policy among Communists on different university campuses. This committee shall be responsible for the production of a newsletter on university questions, as well as other forms of communication.

7. The National Committee registers a criticism to the NEC as well as of itself for indecisiveness and slowness in discussing and working out Party youth policy which led to a disorientation among the comrades directly involved in this work, and which resulted in the virtual liquidation of the national leadership of the YCL.

8. Bearing in mind the complex problems facing young people which will become accentuated with the advance of automation and technological change, the NC proposes that a program of public actions be undertaken around the issues of education, training, leisure and job opportunities for youth, and that particular attention be paid to making them issues for the entire labor and democratic movement with the objective of pressing for appropriate legislative measures at all levels of government.

FOR UNITY OF THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

1. Our party has repeatedly supported the proposal for an international conference of Communist and Workers' Parties. Such a conference is necessary in the interests of the unity of the world movement, for the strengthening of the forces of socialism, and in the struggle against the imperialist policy of aggression.

We therefore welcome the decision to convene a meeting of the preparatory committee on March 1st, so that ground-work, the materials and agenda for such a conference could be adequately prepared. The National Committee welcomes too, the request that parties state their views on the basic questions which need resolution, and instructs the National Executive Committee to outline the views of our party and present them to the preparatory committee once it begins its work.

2. In our opinion the preparatory committee ought to be guided by the fundamental line and thesis of the documents adopted in 1957 and 1960. This fundamental line which is honestly supported by our party and the overwhelming majority of Communist Paries of the world has in the main been supported by events and should continue to be the basic guide line for the world Communist movement. At the same time events since 1960 emphasize the need for an examination of what has changed in the world situation and what conclusions need to be drawn from these changes with regard to strategy and tactics, so as to facilitate the further development of the revolutionary processes throughout the world.

The National Committee believes too that there is need for more intensive study on questions such as: the varied paths to socialism, their unity in diversity; the world socialist system and the new stage of the national struggle for independence, as well as the relationship of the struggle for peaceful coexistence to the struggle for socialism; problems of the working class movement in the highly developed capitalist countries; the socialist states and socialist democracy.

Involved in all these questions is the necessity to deepen understanding of the relationship between proletarian internationalism and of the defense of national interests.

This meeting of the National Committee therefore instructs the National Executive Committee to initiate a study of these questions in preparation for the presentation of our views to the preparatory committee and to consider the advisability of a National Committee discussion on these matters at a later date.

3. The National Committee firmly believes that if all parties are guided by the basic documents of the world Communist movement, by creative Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, the path to unity will be found. We realize that the restoration of the unity of the world Communist movement will require patient, persevering work and persistent effort. In our opinion the process of restoring the unity of the world movement would be helped were agreements reached on ceasing public polemics while the preparatory committee conducts its work. What is required in the interests of the unity of the world movement is to seek out ways and means of solving differences as laid down in the document of the 1960 Meeting of Communist and Workers' Parties.

Such an approach pre-supposes an end to splitting and interference in the internal affairs of fraternal parties with its consequent harmful results both to the world movement and to struggle for peace, democracy, independence and socialism. It pre-supposes too, a desire for unity and opposition to the formation of splinter groups on a national and international scale. For our part, we shall continue our efforts to isolate and defeat all those who seek to split our ranks, both nationally and internationally.

4. In expressing these views the National Committee believes there is need to seek out those points of agreement around which the process of restoring unity can be advanced, taking time to resolve differences and being always guided by the need to establish a common front against imperialism.

The complex international situation and developments in various parts of the world make concerted action of the world communist movement and of the socialist states an absolute necessity to beat back and defeat the aggressive actions of U.S. imperialism and other reactionary forces, be it in South East Asia, in Africa and in the direction of spreading nuclear weapons to West Germany and elsewhere. Thus, while it may take time to come to agreement on those ideological questions which have divided the world movement, no time ought to be lost in achieving concerted action, on a firm class basis, so as to strengthen the world-wide movement against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism.

It is the hope of the National Committee that existing difficulties and differences will be overcome, step by step, through comradely discussion in line with the principles of relations between fraternal parties and on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, thereby creating the conditions for restoring the unity of the world Communist movement.

We shall do everything in our power to help bring this about.

5. The National Committee is of the opinion that all parties which participated in the 1957 and 1960 Conferences should be invited to attend the international conferences when it is convened. In addition to that, Marxist-Leninist Parties which were formed in those countries where no parties existed at the time of the 1960 Conference should also be invited to attend.

RESOLUTION OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, AKEL

The Cypriot people are waging a hard, difficult, just struggle for national liberation. The aim of this struggle is to free Cyprus from all kinds of bonds which imperialism has imposed upon our people under the Zurich-London agreements, to gain complete independence for Cyprus, defend its territorial integrity and uphold the internationally recognized inalienable right of the people freely to decide their own destiny on the basis of the principle of self-determination. This just struggle of our people has brought a violent reaction from the Anglo-American imperialists and NATO, the inspirers and actual instigators of the rebellion of extremist leaders of the Turkish-Cypriot community, the same people who are to blame for repeated threats of aggression against Cyprus by the neo-sultanist, chauvinist rulers of Ankara. The Anglo-American imperialists' main aim is to impose NATO sovereignty upon Cyprus and make the island their military spring-board and nuclear bridge-head serving their predatory interests in the Near and Middle East countries.

Fighting as a united force, the Cypriot people have achieved some glorious victories. Their brave resistance has foiled all the evil plans of the NATO imperialists for the enslavement of Cyprus and frustrated their efforts to impose a solution of the Cyprus problem beneficial to their own interests. The unity of all popular forces, the common struggle of the people, the armed forces and the Government, and the courageous stand of the President of the Republic against imperialist pressure — a stand which essentially expressed the consistent and anti-imperialist will of the Cypriot people — enabled us to say an emphatic NO! to imperialist pressure and blackmail.

The fact that our people survive in spite of hard trials and that Cyprus has been able to maintain its independence and sovereignty, repulsing all the acts of aggression by NATO and Ankara, is due to the joint struggle of the people, to their fighting spirit, heroism and self-sacrifice, as well as to the valuable support given by Greece, the decisive solidarity of true and powerful friends, such as the socialist countries headed by the Soviet Union and the uncommitted Afro-Asian countries headed by the UAR and, finally, to the support given by all liberal-minded and democratic mankind.

As a result, the Cyprus state still exists in spite of imperialist machinations, and the Cyprus question is on the agenda of the present UN General Assembly. Anglo-American imperialist reaction was unable, for all its intrigues, pressure, threats and blackmail, to prevent the issue being placed on the agenda of the present session of the UN Assembly and discussed by the United Nations.

While appreciating the achievements of the joint struggle of our people, we cannot disregard certain negative aspects in the approach to the Cyprus question, which have harmed our cause, particularly as regards the support of friendly countries.

The AKEL Central Committee is convinced that all those countries which stood by our side in the course of our just struggle, offering their valuable material and moral support, will continue to support us in the difficult struggle we are going to wage during the discussion of the Cyprus question by the United Nations. And of course, in the front line of those countries is, besides Greece, the mighty vanguard country of socialism, the USSR.

Following a recent statement by Mr. Gromyko, the Soviet Minister for Foreign Affairs, on the Cyprus problem, certain circles made desperate efforts to cause confusion and uneasiness among the people with regard to the position of the Soviet Union on our just struggle. Some of these people allege that the Soviet Union has abandoned Cyprus, aligned itself with Turkey and betrayed our people and their national-liberation stuggle.

The AKEL, CC and CCC condemn the unfounded and provocative allegations and express their conviction that the Soviet Union stands steadfastly by the side of the fighting Cypriot people.

The statement of the Minister for Foreign Affairs makes clear that the Soviet Union:

a) steadfastly and consistently defends the independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Cyprus Republic, which is a member of the UN;

b) resolutely opposes all foreign intervention in Cyprus' internal affairs;

c) unreservedly supports the "unquestionable and inalienable" right of the Cypriot people to decide their own destiny, within the framework of their own independent state;

d) underlines that "complete and real independence and security" must be achieved in Cyprus and that to achieve this, "all foreign troops must unfailingly be withdrawn from Cyprus and all foreign bases abolished";

e) declares that only after securing real independence and territorial integrity "could the people of Cyprus be really free to solve all their problems without intervention from outside."

The above statements, made with absolute clarity and sincerity, are a positive contribution showing the Soviet Union's full and unqualified support for the struggle of our people, and its emphatic opposition to any attempt at imposing a solution from outside, or at blackmailing the people in one way or another in order to impose on them a solution which in reality would serve foreign interests—such as, for example, a "union" of the Acheson type or the Lemnitzer partition plan.

The above-mentioned points of the statement are in absolute accord with the declared line of the Cyprus Government and fundamental principles of the UN Charter, and are in full harmony with the explicit and firm position of support or the just, anti-imperialist national-liberation struggle of our people, to which the great country of socialism, the USSR has adhered to this day. This new statement of the Soviet Union strikes a strong blow at NATO imperialist circles which are plotting continuously against Cyprus in a persistent effort to abolish the sovereignty and independence of the Cyprus state and to impose—with foreign intervention or by means of a coup d'etat—a solution to the Cyprus question contrary to the real interests of the people of Cyprus. The main task of the people of Cyprus at the present stage is not simply to maintain the state of Cyprus and safeguard the independence and territorial integrity of Cyprus, but to strengthen the state, which is threatened by the imperialists, in order to enable it to exercise its powers without pressure or blackmail from outside, and play its role locally and internationally in the freest and most effective way. The statement of the Soviet Foreign Minister is an imporant and positive contribution towards the realization of this task.

In that statement Mr. Gromyko also referred to the internal structure of the Cyprus state. Repeatedly stressing that it is the "full and sovereign" right of the people of Cyprus to decide this question themselves, he went on to express the opinion that the people "could also choose a federal type of state structure if they wished." Our party has clearly stated its position on this question.

Proceeding from the fundamental proposition that the essence of the Cyprus national problem lies not in forming a separate national entity with a distinct national consciousness, but in effecting the national reunion of the Cyprus people, the overwhelming majority of whom are Greeks, the CC reaffirms the line set forth by the Tenth Congress: complete independence, demilitarization and self-determination. That line remains unchanged. The CC therefore rejects federation in principle for a number of important considerations. Such a solution of the problem would be wrong and unpracticable for the following reasons:

a) The Turkish population of Cyprus, constituting only 18 per cent of the total, is dispersed among the Greek majority over the entire area of Cyprus, a fact which makes the formation of any separate local state organs impossible. Only by uprooting populations could a Turkish area be created. That, however, is not only contrary to the principles of the UN Charter but could also cause much suffering to both the Greeks and Turks, and would eventually lead to partition.

b) A Federal state structure under Cyprus conditions would create a situation which might give the imperialists a chance, by applying the well-known motto "divide and rule", to incite and foment racial animosity and contradictions and thus become the real regulators of the political life of the country, as well as to blackmail the governments of Greece and Turkey.

c) A federal state structure, far from doing away with the spirit of distrust fostered by the imperialists through intrigues, would become a constant source of new difficulties and hardships for the whole people, a source of more serious disturbances and anomalies which would seriously endanger peace in the Middle East and internationally.

While expressing our opposition to the federal form of state structure, we most strongly underline the necessity for fully guaranteeing the international recognized human and democratic rights of the Turkish and all other national minorities.

The approach to our Turkish compatriots should be more positive. We should show them by more concrete and pratical measures that we sincerely wish to live in peace with them. We must persuade the Turks that it is our firm resolve not to permit any national discrimination against them.

AKEL believes that the Cyprus question will be settled by the joint and consistent struggle of the entire people against imperialism and its intrigues. The people of Cyprus will not be able to obtain full sovereign rights and freely to decide their future until all foreign troops leave Cyprus and the Treaties of Guarantee and Alliance and the British "sovereign" military bases are abolished. Only after securing its unfettered independence will the people of Cyprus be able to realize their national reunion and a genuine union with Greece, without any conditions, without any foreign military bases and without any compromise.

Our struggle will be hard, difficult and protracted. In this just national-liberation struggle we shall be faced at every step with violent reaction and internal subversion by the imperialists. Hence the repetition of untimely and irresponsible statements of activities can only multiply the difficulties of our struggle. In face of such difficult tasks, it is necessary further to strengthen the unity of the whole people, as well as unity in the army and the Government. We need more tenacious and resolute joint effort to abolish foreign military bases, deliver Cyprus from all imperialist bonds, and win unfettered independence, demilitarization, self-determination, and enosis.

The message which the Central Committee and the Central Control Committee address to the people is a message of faith and optimism. Hard as our struggle may be, we will finally triumph through the joint heroic effort of our people, with the valuable help of Greece, with the moral and material help and support of all our mighty friends—the socialist countries headed by the Soviet Union, the non-aligned Afro-Asian countries and all the progressive and freedom-loving people of the world. AKEL will continue to fight, together with all patriotic forces, until our people, really delivered and free from all foreign dependence and intervention, are able to exercise their inalienable right to decide their future on the basis of the principle of self-determination.

ENLARGED MEETING OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, SUDANESE COMMUNIST PARTY

Delegates from all provincial and regional Party organizations and representatives of the Students' Communist League took part in the enlarged meeting of the CC, SCP held in Khartoum on January 14, 1965.

The meeting discussed the report of the General Secretary of the CC, reports on organizational and fiancial matters, the work of the Party's newspaper el Maidan, and the draft resolution on the Communist Women's Union.

Printed below is a detailed summary of Abdel Khalek Mahjoub's report on the political situation in the country, the changes that have taken place since the previous CC meetings, and the tasks of the Party and the revolutionary movement in defending and promoting the revolution.*

Before proceeding forward we should analyze the many events that have taken place since our previous meeting two months ago. It has become a constant practice of the CC to draw theoretical conclusions from its experience, for there can be no revolutionary movement without revolutionary theory.

It should be said that the theoretical conclusions drawn at the previous meeting were incomplete, for we could not make a profound theoretical analysis in the short time we had at our disposal. Herein lay the cause of certain mistakes. One of our conclusions was that the revolution of October 21 was a national-democratic revolution, but we failed to follow it up with the necessary explanation. By saying that it was a national-democratic revolution we meant, on the whole, that our country was still at the stage of the national-democratic revolution, i.e., that the struggle was still directed against foreign imperialism, its allies—the semi-feudals and bureaucrats—and its agents; that the working class, various sections of the peasantry, the revolutionary intelligentsia and the national bourgeoisie free from the influence of foreign capital were the main driving forces of the revolution. These forces were in varying degrees opposed to the old regime. The same forces were called upon to lead the Sudan forward after the proclamation of independence.

It is essential, however, to have a clear idea of the situation. We say that the revolution of October 21 was a national-democratic revolution, that is, a national revolution at the stage of national-democratic development, that it is to culminate in the establishment of a national-democratic government representing all the above-mentioned main forces of the revolution, a government which will fully implement the program of the national-democratic stage of the revolution and prepare our country for entering upon the socialist path. As is known, a clear line between the national-democratic and socialist revolutions cannot be drawn. National-democratic administration in such a country as the Sudan can become, in effect, a form of transition to socialism.

The revolution of October 21 is a national-democratic revolution from the viewpoint of the objective conditions in the country and the sentiments of the masses which launched it. But the tasks of our national-democratic revolution have been implemented only in part. The changes that have taken place in the country do not yet entitle us to say that all the tasks of the current stage of the revolution have been carried out.

FACTORS WEAKENING THE REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENT

The revolutionary movement was weakened by a number of factors impending the realization of the tasks of the national-democratic revolution. The political strike was the only weapon the revolutionary movement could employ against the army. There were no armed detachments to support the strike and no close cooperation with the revolutionary forces in the army. The army virtually remained in the hands of the reactionaries, who sought to give all power to the Right. The inter-party talks that were held at the time pursued the same objective. We all remember well that at first the Communist Party was barred from these talks, and that attempts were made to isolate it.

But the reactionaries' intrigues fell through. It proved impossible to isolate the revolutionary forces in view of mass pressure and the continuing political strike. Then the reactionaries attempted to put an end to the strike. But the traditional parties* proved unable to do so and were obliged to invite the revolutionary forces to the talks.

The reactionaries from the army who participated in the talks managed to secure the representation of the reactionary forces and the traditional parties in the government, although both the former and the latter had nothing in common with the militant movement and had stood aloof from the revolution of October 21. They also succeeded in setting up a caretaker government, regarding this the first step towards the restoration of reactionary power in the country.

---

*The old bourgeois-feudal parties and groups that existed before the military coup, such as Al Umma, the National Unionist Party, the People's Democratic Party, and others.—Ed.

LACK OF DEMOCRATIC UNITY

Lack of democratic unity of the masses during the revolution was another factor that weakened the revolutionary movement. Unitary trends among the democratic forces were particularly strong in the weeks preceding the revolution, but it broke out before complete unity could be established. Therefore the revolutionary forces headed by the working class were unable to guide the popular movement and provide it with a revolutionary center.

THE PRESENT GOVERNMENT

We must make an appraisal of the present government. Although it for the first time includes representatives of the revolutionary forces, we cannot say that it is a national-democratic government representing an alliance of the workers, peasants and revolutionary intelligentsia. A national-democratic government cannot, naturally, be transitional as it completes a whole epoch in society's development. It can be called that only in the narrow sense of transition from the national-democratic to the socialist stage.

What we now have is a transitional government which includes both representatives of the Communist Party, the workers,* the peasantry and the progressive-minded intellectuals and representatives of national parties, rightist ones included. We can say that essentially it is a national and anti-imperialist government although the forces represented in it are so different. Its dual nature affects its activities. Its policy does not reflect the profundity of the revolutionary movement and the striving of the masses for cardinal change. It ignores the people's demand to purge the administrative apparatus and bring to court those who abused power.

WHAT HAMPERS DEVELOPMENT OF THE REVOLUTION

Moreover, some steps taken by the government harm the revolution and may lead to a reactionary comeback. For instance, it has refused to grant the revolutionary forces representation in the Constituent Assembly and failed to change the old electoral systm, which does not conform to the recent revolutionary changes; it disregards the distinctions between the developed and backward regions of the country and between the various political forces and groups some of which represent the advanced sections of the people (the workers, organized peasants, progressive-minded intellectuals) while others represent backward strata connected with small-scale production (nomadic cattle-breeders, non-organized peasants, etc.). Nor have any considerable changes been effected in the administrative apparatus, which does not truly represent our people. The imperialists not only continue their activities in the country, but, in fact, are stepping them up.

THE GOVERNMENT'S ROLE

In the light of these facts we once again, as at the previous meeting, raise the question of the role played by the present government.

As the Charter points out, it is to pave the way for the national-democratic development of the country, set up a national-democratic government, and bar the reactionaries' way to power. This means that the government is to meet the demands of the people, guarantee political and democratic freedom to them, and resist the activities of the imperialists and their agents. This can be done, not by separate decrees, but through legislation guaranteeing the general political, trade union and other rights of the revolutionary masses.

The situation demands that the government oppose imperialist influence in all its forms, that it serve the interests of the people, destroy all the footholds of imperialism, clear the administrative apparatus from anti-democratic elements, set up an effective security system to protect the interests of the popular movement, turn the forthcoming elections into a triumph of the revolution, and ensure the real exercise of democratic rights to promote the growth of the revolutionary movement and prevent the transfer of power into the reactionaries' hands.

Hence our task to do everything to help this transitional government achieve these aims. We also have to rally the popular forces to fight for their demands and organize their actions aimed at having these objectives realized.

CORRELATION OF FORCES FAVORABLE FOR THE REVOLUTION

The correlation of forces remains favorable for the advocates of revolutionary transformations. Notable changes have taken place in the revolutionary forces themselves. The industrial working class increasingly strives for independence and grows more and more aware of its revolutionary potentialities. The opportunities for winning the broad masses for the revolution are greater than ever before. This, naturally, calls for vigorous ideological struggle against the reactionaries, which is a perfectly feasible task. It is also necessary to combat the opportunists who deny the independent role of the working class and therefore oppose its interests. Although they have quietened down somewhat during the rise of the revolutionary movement, they may again raise their head in working-class organizations.

HOW THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE WORKING CLASS SHOULD BE UNDERSTOOD

The independence of the working class and its unity with the Left forces, towards which it gravitates, are not necessarily to materialize under a single banner, that of the Communist Party. Serious changes in the working class should be taken note of. Various socialist trends have appeared, and one should not go to extremes when dealing with them. This is very dangerous and can only strengthen the positions of our enemies among the working masses. The most important thing is to promote the growth of the existing revolutionary forces and strengthen them with socialist ideology. This is a challenging task calling for work not only in trade union committees and Party branches alone. It is necessary to broaden the democratic front through drawing into it all progressives who believe in the cause of the working class and in the Sudan's socialist perspective, whether they accept Marxism or not.

We should not underestimate this problem and rest content with the changes that have taken place already. We should not forget about the influence of alien ideology on the working class and the presence of opportunistic elements in it. It should also be borne in mind that the changes in the working-class movement can not only promote the revolution but also drag it backwards if they are not consolidated through ideological work and correct leadership. The conditions for launching ideological work are quite ripe today. The bourgeois parties are beginning to come out openly against the working class. For instance, they protested against the inclusion of its representatives in the government and against the establishment of workers' electoral areas.* The agents of the bourgeoisie operating among the workers are unable to justify this attitude of the bourgeois parties. But we, for our part, have been doing little to expose such actions of the bourgeoisie and its agents.

OFFICE WORKERS

The revolutionary transformations have influenced not only the industrial workers, but also the office employees, and we should revise our attitude to this category of working people whom we unjustifiably ignored in the past. We should differentiate between them and the top officialdom. In conditions whenever more people are getting an education, including university education, minor officials have no opportunity for promotion.

*Special areas for workers and organized peasants to be set up for the elections to the Constituent Assembly.—Ed.

In addition, there have appeared skilled workers enjoying a privileged position, and officials cannot look down on them any longer.

The minor officials are revolutionary by virtue of their present position, and they should demand the right to form trade unions of their own. It is our duty to see to it that this contingent of the working people joins the ranks of the Left.

REVOLUTIONARY CHANGES IN THE PEASANT MOVEMENT

Major revolutionary changes have taken place among the peasants, in particular those living in the White and Blue Nile valleys. These changes are significant chiefly in connection with the agrarian reform, and our Party should analyze them. Slogans and trade union demands are not sufficient to translate the reform into reality. The peasants movement is to have a clear common line with regard to the agrarian reform. We should explain to state-employed cotton-growers that the growth of capitalist relations bars the way to progress and that therefore we should advance along the non-capitalist road, towards socialism.

PRIVATE FARMS

We should work to free private farms from exploitation by foreign capital, promote the development of cooperatives under state supervision, and encourage peasants with small holdings to unite in cooperatives.

There is one more section of the peasantry—nomadic tribes engaged in cattle-breeding. The first expression of their opposition to the local authorities is an encouraging fact; those of the nomads who have received an education are already coming out openly against the local authorities. This opens up possibilities for securing the participation of these tribes in the peasant movement.

WHAT IS NECESSARY FOR THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE PEASANT MOVEMENT

How to talk to the peasant masses and how to organize them are highly important questions. The peasant masses openly strive for independence, wishing to take their destiny into their own hands. This will deliver a crushing blow at the reactionary elements, who have for many years enjoyed the peasants' support secured by fraud and economic pressure. We should pay special attention to this question. We must tackle the problem of ensuring the independence of the bulk of the peasantry if we want our country to develop along the road of national democracy. It has become clear now that the reactionaries can no longer deceive the peasants into submission. Hence their resort to religious customs and prejudices, their attempts to present progress as the enemy of religion and in this way to retain their influence on the peasants. It is therefore essential for the Communists to find a correct approach to the peasants, to respect their religious views. The Communists should always know the needs of the people, both material and spiritual. To overlook these needs means to hamper progress. There is nothing hypocritical in our attitude to religion for we know that no religion can give people more than socialism gives them. To leave the field of activity among the religious masses in the reactionaries' hands would be inexcusable.

AL ANSAR PEASANTS

Special attention should be paid to the peasants inhabiting the White and Blue Nile valleys. These peasants, members of the Al Ansar community*, are displaying an ever greater striving for independence. We should find the means of establishing contact with them. Having revolutionary traditions of their own, they continue to contribute greatly to the development of the peasant movement.

PRIMARY REVOLUTIONARY TASK: BUILD A WORKER-PEASANT ALLIANCE

To build a worker-peasant alliance is the most important revolutionary task. The growing trend among the workers and peasants to act as an independent force provides the basis for this alliance. The conditions are ripe for it, particularly in view of the attempts of the traditional parties to affirm the class inequality of workers and peasants. Therefore it is no longer a matter of propaganda but a pressing task. In order to establish this alliance we must convince the masses of the need for it by showing on the basis of their own experience how class inequality affects them.

It is also important that the alliance should materialize not only at the level of leading bodies. It is necessary to set up joint committees of trade unions and peasants' organizations. We should broaden the participation of the masses in building the alliance and in this connection discuss, among others, the question of establishing a joint committee for the agrarian reform and the solution of the other pressing problems facing the country.

The worker-peasant alliance will form the basis for a democratic bloc, for a national-democratic front, and give a powerful impetus to the revolutionary movement.

FORMS OF ORGANIZATION IN RURAL LOCALITIES

Different forms of organization of peasants should be studied. Serious consideration should be given to the expediency of isolating regional organizations from one another by connecting each of them directly with the central body. Take, for instance, the Blue Nile province, the center of the peasant movement. Which is better: to have all work there done under the guidance of a single provincial committee or to divide the province into districts in accordance with the production principle (Gezira and Manaqil, Blue Nile, White Nile), with district committees directly connected with the Central Committee of the Party?

All possible forms of organization should be studied in order to intensify and broaden the peasant movement.

IMPORTANT CHANGES IN THE INTELLIGENTSIA

Important changes for the better are to be observed among the intellectuals. Representatives of this category took an active part in the revolution of October 21. Seeking to reverse the trend, the reactionaries are trying to bar office workers from political activities.

On the other hand, these changes are as yet insignificant as compared with the changes among the workers and peasants. Therefore we should draw as many intellectuals as possible into the revolutionary movement, either through rallying them around the Party or by securing their participation in Party work itself.

In addition to political activity, intellectuals should be drawn into ideological work. Up till now we have not paid sufficient attention to this question. Revolutionary-minded intellectuals should be induced to join the National Democratic Front, where they can play an important role.

THE SITUATION IN THE SOUTH

Although the influence of the reactionary forces in the South has increased because of the military regime's mistakes, the democratic and progressive forces are gaining strength there, even in such extreme rightist organizations as the Sudan African National Union. However, their voice was barely audible during the military rule, and therefore they invariably found themselves under the influence of the extreme Right forces.

The position of the Right would most probably be weakened if a policy of peace were pursued in the South, backed up with determination to fight the imperialists and imperialist intervention. The rightists have no material basis in the South, for there are no semi-feudal relations there. But they may supply the imperialists with a pretext for intervention or take the road of narrow nationalism. In view of the foregoing, we can say that there exists a real possibility for the South to advance along the democratic path toward Socialism. There are no serious obstacles to this, with the exception of traditional conservatism and narrow nationalism.

INTERVIEW* WITH A. MAHJOUB

GENERAL SECRETARY, SUDANESE COMMUNIST PARTY

Q. Does the Sudanese Communist Party consider the situation in the country following the period of militancy dictatorship favorable to the democratic forces?

A. The defeat of the military dictatorship provided new opportunities for democratic development. After six years of military rule the democratic forces — trade unions, organized peasants, and intellectuals — formed a united front. Preparations for it had been going on for a long time. While the front was in the making the Communists took advantage of the antagonisms between the military junta and the Right-wing parties. At the end of 1960 and the beginning of 1961 an illegal opposition came into being. It was joined by all political parties, Right and Left alike. The Communists strove to extend the democratic, progressive front. In so doing they used the contradictions between the military government and the Rights, contradictions which did not allow the government to concentrate on curbing the democratic movement.

That situation did not last, however. In 1962 the Right-wing opposition surrendered to the government. The workers, peasants and students continued to fight, and were persecuted. When, at the end of last October, the revolution opened the prison cells, it was the Communists, progressive-minded workers and peasants, and servicemen opposed to the fallen regime who came out. There were no Rightist prisoners — evidently because the military in power had not found them dangerous.

During the revolution, in October and November 1964, the military dictatorship tried to come to terms with spokesmen for the Right-wing parties and wrest the leadership of the victorious revolution from the democratic forces. It was willing to talk with the old bourgeois parties only. But its maneuvers failed. The progressive forces launched a decisive battle and on October 23, 1964, formed a powerful national front with a thoroughly democratic core. The front includes the trade unions, the Gezira Peasant Union and the organization of Sudanese intellectuals.

The revolution opened up new opportunities for the democratic forces. It began by removing the reactionary warlords, the chief obstacle to the country's democratic development. It helped to change foreign relations, primarily with the neighboring countries.

*Rude Pravo, Feb. 2, 1965.

I must stress that the Sudan's support of the revolutionary forces in Congo is highly important, and revolutionary forces in the Congo is highly important, and revolutionizes the masses in the Sudan itself. Better relations with the UAR are another important development — the anti-imperialist and socialist slogans of the UAR inspire the Sudanese masses.

The progressive forces in the Sudan are encountering serious difficulties in striving to democratize the country. They are under continuous attack from reaction. Certain foreign powers are trying to complicate the situation, above all in southern Sudan. But so far the democratic forces have stood their ground by joint effort.

Q. How will the Communist Party react to attempts to eliminate its influence on the government bodies?

A. Reaction has from the outset opposed Communist participation in the government. But its efforts have borne no fruit. The absence of the Communist Party, one of the major forces of the revolution, from the government would be unthinkable. So far the reactionaries have not brought themselves to insist on excluding the Communists from the government. But they are trying to weaken the positions of the Party. They would like to create difficulties in the government and put the blame on the Communists. They attack the democratic forces. They attack the trade unions for their active role in the government, and come out against the political activity of government officials, trying to split the unity of the organized peasants. But the progressive forces are prepared to repulse any attack on the principles of the revolution of October 21. Led by the Sudenese Communists, they are forming a broad national democratic alliance, which should isolate the reactionaries and foil their plans.

Q. How does the Communist Party envision the elections and how is it preparing for them?

A. The Communist Party will take part in the elections on the basis of a new broad alliance, or front, including the association of labor unions and the Peasant Union. This front is widely supported by the masses.

As regards the Communist Party, it is going through a certain reorganization. Until recently it was illegal and its organizations had to operate accordingly. Today the Party is functioning on a mass basis. The masses welcome this change. A mass Communist Party is bound to be an effective force in the elections. A few days ago the Party set up a canvassing center that will have branches in all Sudanese provinces, including the South. We will soon hold our Fourth Congress. Preparations for it are complete. The Congress is to rally the membership to fight for the development of a broad-based mass movement and for participation in the election campaign.

Q. Does the Communist Party think the problem of southern Sudan can be reasonably solved in the near future?

A. The problem of the South is inseparable from the development of the whole country. The previous regime dealt with this problem in its own way. It discriminated against the progressive forces in the South. The South was isolated. That policy in no way differed from the imperialist and colonialist policies of the past, and it played into the hands of the separatists. The new Sudanese government has declared an amnesty for all prisoners representing the South. It has afforded those who under the previous regime were compelled to flee from the reign of terror and seek refuge abroad the opportunity to return. The new government wants to grant the democratic forces in the South self-government within the framework of the new state. The Communist Party favors national and administrative autonomy for the southern provinces. The atmosphere which the new government is creating for the solution of the problem of the South is reliable and truly conducive to the peaceful unification of the country. Already many Southerners reject a separatist policy and imperialist intrigue.

Q. Statements made by various political parties suggest that in the Sudan it is a fashionable as in other African countries to speak of socialism, or rather of "Moslem socialism" or "collective socialism," and so on. Since when has the prestige of socialism been so high in the Sudan, and why?

A. Before the military came to power the Communist Party was the only party to advocate socialism. The other parties attacked socialism, alleging that it was contrary to Islam, that it did not suit the Arab countries and was, in fact, dangerous to them. At present, however, all Sudanese parties seem anxious to insert the demand for "socialism" in their programs. This is evidence of the prestige and popularity which socialism enjoys among the masses. It also shows how utterly unpopular was the capitalist policy pursued by the previous government. It led to economic collapse and political dependence. Needless to say the popularity of socialism in the Sudan was fostered by the socialist countries' achievements at home and abroad and by developments in the Arab world.

If the bourgeois parties of the Sudan want to follow socialist policies we would welcome it. It would be an indication of the pressure which the masses bring to bear on the policies of these parties. We would readily cooperate with any party striving for socialism. But it would have to be socialism without anti-communism. "Socialism" which connotes anti-communism has nothing to do with democracy, it simply means a new dictatorship of reaction. We distinguish between the so-called socialism of the reactionaries, who use socialist slogans as a smokescreen to attack the Communist Party and the progressive forces, and a sincere desire to build socialism, even if on a different, non-Marxist-Leninist basis. Other socialist schools, distinct from Marxist schools, also have their roots in the masses. But they are certain to realize, in their turn, that scientific socialism is the only method by which they can attain their goal. Such a realization is incompatible with anti-communism and should lead to cooperation with the Marxists.

Q. How does the Communist Party view the socialist future of the Sudan?

A. The future of our country lies in gradually transforming the people's social conditions. The people should take an increasing part in government. The state machinery should be democratized and all working people united. We want socialism to be based primarily on a corresponding economy, which means that the economy should create conditions for the further democratization of social life. The democracy advocated in our country from 1954 to 1958 was purely nominal. The people lacked democratic rights. Socialism alone can fill the democratic form with a democratic content.

The present demand that electoral districts be established for the organized workers and peasants is one of the first steps toward introducing genuine democracy. The votes of this politically-conscious section of our population — a section which is still very small — and those of the progressive intellectuals, who earlier secured the establishment of special electoral districts, could be overwhelmed by the votes of the backward section of the rural population still dominated by religious sects and feudal rulers. Such election returns would have an adverse effect on democratic development in the country. Our demand for electoral districts for the workers could constitute a first step toward a national democratic state.

COMMUNIQUE*

OF THE TENTH PLENARY MEETING OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, WORKING PEOPLE'S PARTY OF VIETNAM

The Party CC met in December 1964 to discuss progress in home and foreign trade, and the price policy.

With due regard to the line elaborated by the Third Party Congress and to the present stage of the socialist revolution in North Vietnam, the meeting analyzed the trade and price situation since the restoration of peace. Its unanimous conclusion was that the past ten years in North Vietnam have been important, deep-going economic changes and a considerable improvement in the material and cultural standards of the people, brought about under the leadership of the Party, the Government and President Ho Chi Minch. In exercising overall leadership of the national economy in order to transfer small production into large-scale socialist production, our Party and Government have attached great importance to the role of trade and the prices system. They have been taking steps to place trade and prices in the service of socialist changes, the development of a sovereign economy, and the transition from capitalism to socialism.

The revolutionary practice of the past decade has proved the Party policy on trade and prices to be correct. The effort made and the progress achieved have considerably increased the role of trade and prices in improving production and the standard of living, strengthening North Vietnam, and providing a solid basis for the peaceful unification of the country. However, work in the field of trade and the price policy still have many defects and flaws due to the great difficulties arising from a complex objective situation and organizational shortcomings.

The transformation of the North Vietnam market is one of the major revolutionary changes brought about in the national economy. The result is a single socialist market, with state trade playing the leading role. State trade has won strong positions in wholesale trade and is beginning to play the preponderant role in retail trade. Cooperative trade, which strengthens the standing of state trade on the rural market, has become widespread. Capitalist trade has been transformed into state-capitalist trade, and small-scale trade is being transformed as most of the small traders are transferred into the production shphere. Exchange between industry and agriculture,

At a time when there is an imbalance between many aspects of the economy and when progress in production is on the whole lagging behind the fast-growing requirements of society, a serious effort has been made to put home trade in the service of production and to use it as an instrument for improving the standard of living, increasing exports, strengthening the dong, completing socialist changes, and increasing accumulation, which is indispensable for the socialist industrialization of the country. But home trade does not yet contribute to the development of production in sufficient measure, particularly in agriculture and local industry. The materials and commodities needed for production and consumption are not yet being distributed rigorously and wisely enough. There are numerous shortcomings in supplying the needs of the population. They are in evidence, first of all, in the organization and control of the distribution of food grain, in the supply of foodstuffs to towns and industrial areas, in the provision of the countryside with manufactured goods, and in the stabilization of food prices. Trade in the mountainous areas is inadequate. The necessity for reorganizing private trade is often disregarded and profiteering is not combated vigorously enough.

Our foreign trade has been growing steadily and has undergone important changes in the course of economic rehabilitation, reconstruction and development. Attention has been given in these years to measure designed to expand foreign trade and promote economic cooperation with fraternal socialist countries. Simultaneously steps have been taken to increase trade with certain other countries. Exports have been steadily expanded by utilizing the vast natural resources, the potentialities of a tropical agriculture, and the large manpower reserve. Foreign trade has prompted the re-establishment and growth of certain export industries, and has made it possible to give jobs to tens of thousands of people.

Imports, which supply the needs of capital construction, production, and in part consumption, have been growing at a fair rate. We have established a foreign trade monopoly, created a socialist foreign trade and geared it to the service of socialist industrialization. We have been using it as an instrument for the rapid development of industrial and agricultural production, as a means of guaranteeing production in the country, improving the standard of living, and furthering the foreign policy aims of our Party and state.

In the light of the needs of socialist industrialization, however, we have yet to achieve adequate results in encouraging reliance on our own strength, industry and thrift in developing our country, and to exercise more strict economy in production and consumption. We have yet to make full use of the our production potential to put out greater quantities of profitable export commodities and properly increase the share of farm produce in the country's export balance in order the sooner to raise exports to a level meeting import requirements. In importing goods, we have in many cases failed to take into proper account the necessity for meeting basic requirements and for rationally equipping the state sector with new plant.

The Party has in the main mastered the economic laws of socialism; it has been making correct use of the law of value in deciding questions of price formation, and has been doing its best to use prices for the solution of economic and political problems. Prices in the country have been balanced and a price system has been established within the framework of our independent, sovereign socialist economy. This system is contributing effectively toward economic development according to plan. The purchase prices of agricultural produce and retail prices are fairly well balanced and on the whole reasonable. Prices play a definite stimulating role in production development and in distribution according to work. They make for a higher standard of living, the establishment of the right ratio between accumulation and consumption, and of closed links between industry and agriculture, and for a stronger alliance of the workers and peasants.

On the other hand, the control of price formation has not been all-round, there have been cases of underestimation of and sluggishness in setting prices in the state sector. Price stabilization on the free market has not been receiving adequate attention. There have been discrepancies in fixing the prices of some agricultural products, of commodities differing in quality, and discrepancies in price fluctations by areas. For this reason, price formation has not developed sufficiently as a major production lever, one that helps production, accelerates the technical revolution and contributes to a new division of labor, increased productivity per worker, higher quality, and lower costs per item produced.

The meeting considers that it is necessary to press forward with greater energy the revolution in production relations, and the technical, ideological and cultural revolutions — by developing the economy, transforming small-scale productive into large-scale socialist production in order to advance the country to socialism at a fast, steady and powerful rate, and making North Vietnam a solid basis for the struggle to unify the country along peaceful lines. The key task is to concentrate on the technical revolution in order gradually to mechanize all economic branches fully or in part, provide the material and technical basis for socialism, replace the greater part of manual labor by highly efficient mechanical labor, and accomplish a new social division of labor.

It is necessary to continue the effort to draw the remaining individual peasants into cooperatives, reorganize lower-type into higher-type cooperatives, associate small cooperatives in large collective farms in keeping with the actual conditions, transfer most of the small traders into the production sphere, and re-educate the capitalists. It is also necessary steadily to enhance the leading role of the state economic sector, reinforce the cooperative sector, and perfect and carry forward socialist relations of production.

At the present stage the socialist revolution, which has political, economic, ideological and cultural aspects, is a continuation of the struggle between the socialist and the capitalist path, a continuation of the class struggle throughout the period of the revolutionary transformation of a backward economy (chiefly small-scale, individual and dispersed in character) into a socialist economy with large-scale modern and proportionately-developed production, bypassing the capitalist stage of development.

We must do all in our power to consolidate the people's democratic state, which is fulfilling the historic tasks of the dictatorship of the proletariat, in order to build socialism and complete socialist changes, exercise dictatorship in relation to the counter-revolutionaries, curb the activities of anti-popular, anti-socialist elements, and counteract subversion by which the U.S. imperialists and their flunkeys try to provoke war.

In future we must work steadfastly for the successful realization of the first five-year plan, take a stride along the path leading to socialist industrialization, step up the technical revolution and complete socialist changes. We must promote and perfect new relations of production, accelerate the ideological and cultural revolutions, create an independent and sovereign socialist economy, continuously improve the material and cultural standards of the people, vigorously develop the advantages of the socialist system, strengthen North Vietnam, turn it into a stronghold for the struggle to unify the country on peaceful lines, and contribute actively to the consolidation of the socialist camp, to the struggle for peace, national independence, democracy and socialism all over the world.

In industry, the task is to work more vigorously to provide the material and technical basis, giving priority to heavy industry, make further headway in the technical equipment of every branch of the state sector, primarily industry, increase the output of commodities for home consumption and for export, and strengthen the country's defenses.

In agriculture, we must increase food output so that it can fully meet domestic requirements. We must hasten the expansion of areas under the more important technical crops, take a big step toward overcoming the imbalance between land cultivation and animal husbandry, ensure the powerful and steady all-round developments of agriculture, rapidly increase gross agricultural output, raise labor productivity and purchasing capacity in the countryside, and make agriculture the real basis for industrial progress.

In the sphere of distribution, we must, by developing production and exercising economy in consumption, radically improve the management of home and foreign trade and of prices. We must combine this with better work in the sphere of finance, credit and material supply in order to expand production, increase exports, increase state and cooperative accumulation, and improve public services, primarily taking care to meet the demand for food, clothing, footwear and housing. The task is to enable everyone to receive an education and medical care. We must take measures to provide guaranteed wages and gradual increase in the incomes of factory and office workers and all working people in the towns, and to raise the living standard of peasants to that of the well-to-do middle peasants.

In the sphere of home trade, we must — with a view to supplying production and meeting the needs of the population more effectively — promote state and cooperative trade, continue socialist changes in the trade sphere, improve organization and management of the rural market, strengthen and expand the single socialist market, and extend organized exchange between industry and agriculture, between the state and the cooperative economic sectors, between town and countryside, between lowland, highland and costal areas. We must strive to expand exports, strengthen the dong, complete socialist changes, and perfect the new relations of production.

Home trade should foster production, particularly in agriculture and the local industries. We must pay special attention to providing the collective farms with means of production, light industry with raw materials, and the export industry with commodities. At the same time we must take care to supply food to the areas producing technical crops and vegetables for sale to the state.

We must also improve our work in the field of distribution, properly supply the population, improve the distribution of foodstuffs in the country, stimulate greater output of food crops, exercise economy, ensure that consumption remains within reasonable bounds, and create conditions for a radical solution of the food problem. We must see to the supply of products to people engaged in heavy physical labor, engineers, technologists and skilled workers, children, sick people, and compatriots in the highland areas, and do all we can to aid low-income families having many children. We must meet the country's defense requirements and increase state stocks of indispensable materials.

The main task of foreign trade is to promote socialist industrialization, the provision of the material and technical basis for socialism, and steadfastly increase exports and imports. To be able to increase imports, we must do more for the speedy expansion of exports. By increasing output and exercising economy in home consumption, making fuller use of the great potentialities of a tropical agriculture, vast natural resources and labor power reserves, we must rapidly expand output and improve the quality of export commodities, striving to increase the share of farm produce (including pre-conditioned produce) in our exports.

On the other hand, we must closely combine exports and imports, and import the best in technical facilities. In keeping with the country's general economic position, we must ensure the import of complete plants and individual machines to equip new enterprises and modernize the entire national economy, the import of certain raw materials, fuels and spare parts needed for the normal, steadily expanding operation of every economic branch, and the import of certain consumer boods for the population. We must actively expand the foreign market, shape our export and import policies according to the needs of economic and cultural development, and of the foreign policy of the Party and the state.

In the sphere of trade and prices, we must firmly abide by the Party line of carrying out socialist industrialization and settling questions of the relations between industry and agriculture. We must step by step establish economic plan links between industry and agriculture, between the state and the cooperative economic sectors, and promote relations of cooperation, mutual encouragement between industry and agriculture — relations which further the development of all branches — accentuating the leading role of industry as we do so.

In the sphere of prizes, we must create a balanced price system, radically stabilize prices, normalize price formation, and strive to reduce prices by carrying forward the technical revolution, perfecting production, introducing a new division of labor, increasing labor productivity, reducing costs per unit produced and circulation costs, improving and tightening financial and economic control, exercising strict economy, and combating corruption, waste, and red tape.

Prices should make for a more equitable distribution and redistribution of the national income and thereby accelerate socialist accumulation, ensure extended reproduction, improve the standard of living, normalize consumption, and guarantee strict economy. They should promote cost accounting in the state and cooperative enterprises, and make for more extensive commodity exchanges, a more solid socialist market and a stronger socialist economic sector in town and country.

The Party and the Government must control trade and prices more efficiently. It is necessary to ensure that the Party's policies and fundamental propositions regarding the socialist revolution, trade and prices are thoroughly understood and put into practice by people in all spheres and at all levels, above all by those directly engaged in these particular fields.

In distributing products, goods and the national income, trade and prices should actively contribute toward revealing and using potential economic reserves to increase accumulation for socialist industrialization. They should also lead to steady improvements in the standard of living. The distribution of consumer goods should be based on the principle of combining distribution according to work, on the one hand, and the satisfaction of the basic requirements of all sections of the population and extended supply of the needs of the population, on the other. The object of this is to heighten the class consciousness of the people and strengthen their unity, rally them for an all-out effort to expand production, and foster their enthusiasm and their desire to achieve further and greater results in socialist construction and the peaceful unification of their country.

The meeting holds that the management of trade and price formation is a revolutionary, mass activity. It is a complex and difficult activity exerting a direct and far-reaching influence on production and life, on the economic and political situation as a whole. This is why Party bodies at all levels — from the central bodies to the primary organizations and cells — should thoroughly improve their guidance of this activity. They should take special care to strengthen the Party cells in trading institutions and establishments.

The Party and the Government must take correct decisions on all matters relating to the management of trade and price formation, clearly specify the tasks and responsibility of every branch and every section, properly differentiate the functions of the central body and local bodies, and strengthen and improve the organizational structure of home and foreign trade agencies in order to make them equal to their tasks. Along with the further implementation of socialist changes in private trade and the transfer of the majority of small traders into the production sphere, it is necessary to strengthen and improve the organization of state and cooperative trade, effectively situate the network of establishments for the purchase and distribution of goods, and properly organize their work. This should result in a lower expenditure of social labor in the sphere of circulation and distribution, make it possible to abolish redundant intermediate elements, and achieve the greatest speed, convenience and economy in the circulation of commodities, the purpose being to foster production and continuously improve the standard of living. Special attention should be paid to the organization of the movement "for a higher sense of responsibility for more efficient financial and economic management, against corruption, waste and red tape."

It is necessary to pay constant attention to the training and education of leading and rank-and-file workers in the spheres of trade and the monetary system, strengthening their class positions and revolutionary moral principles, encourage their industry, thrift, honesty, incorruptibility and unselfishness, their reliance on their own strength, their conscientious and assiduous effort for the development of their country, their desire to advance production and serve the people and the Party's political line, heighten their sense of responsibility, organization and discipline, and improve their technical and professional standards, so that they can fight even more resolutely against all manifestations of an ideology foreign to the proletariat, of bourgeois habits, in fulfilling their tasks.

Economic reorganization and development during the past ten years have shown the organization of socialist trade and the elaboration of a socialist price system to be a revolutionary activity. This activity is aimed at steadly developing the productive forces, improving financial and economic management, increasing socialist accumulation, improving the material and cultural standards of the people, strengthening the alliance of the workers and peasants under the leadership of the working class, promoting and developing the system of socialist property, and leading North Vietnam toward socialism with firm step, at a fast and unrelenting pace.

COMMUNIQUE

OF THE CONSULTATIVE MEETING OF REPRESENTATIVES OF COMMUNIST AND WORKERS' PARTIES IN MOSCOW

On March 1-5, 1965, a Consultative Meeting took place in Moscow of Representatives of the Communist Party of Argentina, the Communist Party of Australia, the Brazilian Communist Party, the Bulgarian Communist Party, the United Party of the Socialist Revolution of Cuba, the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia, the Communist Party of Finland, the French Communist Party, the Socialist Unity Party of Germany, the Communist Party of Germany, the Communist Party of Great Britain, the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party, the Communist Party of India, the Italian Communist Party, the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party, the Polish United Workers' Party, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Syrian Communist Party. Representatives of the Communist Party of the United States attended the Meeting in the capacity of observers.

The participants held consultations on questions of mutual interest and exchanged opinions on the ways and means of surmounting differences and strengthening the unity of the world Communist movement.

The consultative meeting proceeded in an atmosphere of fraternity and friendship and was imbued with the spirit of active struggle for the cohesion of the Communist movement in the name of its great historic tasks. The participants expressed the firm determination of their parties to do everything in their power to cement the world Communist movement and to strengthen its unity on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism and the line defined in the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement.

The representatives of the parties agreed that consolidation of the positions of socialism, upsurge of the national liberation and the international working-class movements, and growth of the forces advocating the maintenance and strengthening of peace, constitute the basic trend in world development under the present conditions. At the same time, it was noted that world reaction, primarily U.S. imperialism, is becoming more active in various regions of the globe, trying to aggravate the situation and undertaking acts of aggression against the socialist countries, the newly-liberated countries and the revolutionary movement of the peoples.

In this situation it is more than ever necessary for all Communist parties to show their sense of internationalist responsibility and to unite for the common struggle against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism and against the rule of monopoly capital, for active support to the liberation movement and defense of the peoples who are objects of imperialist aggression, and for the struggle for world peace based on respect for the sovereignty and integrity of all states.

In a Statement, the participants expressed their solidarity with the heroic people of Vietnam and the Party of Labor of Vietnam, and issued a call for international solidarity in the struggle against the aggressive acts of the U.S. militarists.

Cohesion of all the revolutionary forces of our time — the socialist community, the national-liberation movement and the international working class — is of crucial importance for the success of the fight against imperialism. This cohesion calls insistently for the strengthening of world Communist unity.

Divergences in the Communist movement weaken its unity and thereby do damage to the world liberation movement, to the Communist cause.

The participants voiced their conviction that what unites the Communist parties greatly outweighs that which at the present time disunites them. Even though there are differences over the political line and many important problems of theory and tactics, it is quite possible and necessary to work for united action against imperialism, in the matter of all-round support for the liberation movement of the peoples, in the struggle for world peace and the peaceful coexistence of all countries, big and small, with different social systems, and in the fight for the vital interests and historical goals of the working clas. Concerted action in the fight for these common goals is the most effective way of surmounting the existing differences.

The participants stressed that the Communist parties must exert collective efforts to improve relations between them and to strengthen the unity of the world Communist movement on the basis of the observance of the democratic principles of the independence and equality of all the brother parties.

In the struggle for the solution of tasks common to the whole of the Communist movement, it is desirable to exploit all possibilities and ways, including bilateral and multilateral meetings between representatives of fraternal parties and other forms of Party contacts and exchanges of opinion.

The participants are unanimous in the opinion that under present conditions, as is declared in the 1960 Statement, International Meetings of Communist and Workers' Parties are an effective means of exchanging views and experiences, enriching Marxist-Leninist theory by collective effort and working out united positions in the struggle for common aims. Such Meetings, held with observance of the principles of complete equality and independence of each Party, can render good service to the cause of surmounting differences and cementing the Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism. Therefore, in the opinion of the participants, active and all-sided preparations for a new International Meeting, to be held at a suitable date, fully conform to the interest of the world Communist movement.

To convene the new Meeting and to secure its success, it is necessary to prepare it both as to its content and as to organization, actively to create by joint effffforts favorable conditions for all fraternal parties to participate in its preparation, and to work tirelessly for an improvement of the atmosphere in the world Communist movement. The Meeting should serve the common cause of all Communists. Emphasis and concentration of efforts on the urgent tasks confronting the Communist movement will, more than anythig else, bring our positions on the fundamental issues of the time closer together.

The participants expressed the opinion that it is desirable to hold a Preliminary Consultative Conference of representatives of the 81 parties that gathered at the 1960 Meeting in order to discuss the question of a new International Meeting. It is necessary to hold consultations with all these parties to decide the question of convening this Preliminary Conference.

The parties represented at this meeting have declared themselves in favor of discontinuing open polemics, which are in character unfriendly and degrading to the fraternal parties. At the same time, they consider it useful to continue, in a comradely form and without mutual attacks, an exchange of opinion on the important contemporary issues of mutual interest. The participants declare themselves in favor of the rigorous observance of the standards governing relations between parties as defined by the 1957 and 1960 meetings, and against the interference by any Party in the internal affairs of other parties.

In expressing their opinion on the ways of surmounting the difficulties in the world Communist movement and on its further development, the representatives of the parties were guided by the wish to strengthen the Marxist-Leninist unity of the Communist ranks in the fight against imperialism and colonialism, for national liberation, peace, democracy, socialism and communism.

The representatives of the parties trust that all fraternal parties will respond favorably to this consultative meeting.

THE EVENTS IN VIETNAM

STATEMENT BY THE PARTICIPANTS IN THE CONSULTATIVE MEETING OF COMMUNIST AND WORKERS' PARTIES

On March 3 last, the participants in the consultative meeting of Communist and Workers' parties unanimously adopted a statement on the events in Vietnam. The following is the full text of the statement:

The representatives of Communist and Workers' parties who have met in Moscow for consultations on matters of mutual interest call the attention of all the progressive and peace-loving forces, of the masses generally, to the dangerous situation created by the expansion of military intervention by the U.S. imperialists in South Vietnam and by their acts of aggression against the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

U.S. imperialism, defeated in its attempt to strangle the liberation movement of the South Vietnamese patriots, has embarked on open aggression against the Democratic Republic of Vietnam. In defiance of the elementary standards of international law, the U.S. military are pursuing the most brutal and undisguised colonial policy. The brutal bombings of populated areas in socialist Vietnam create a new situation in Southeast Asia which is fraught with serious complications for the whole world.

The U.S. armed intervention in the affairs of the peoples of Indo-China not only imperils the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the independent states in that area but seriously injures world peace. It is fresh evidence that imperialist reaction is stepping up its activity and trying to aggravate the situation in various areas of the world by launching acts of aggression against the socialist countries, against countries which have freed themselves from colonial rule, against the liberation movement of the peoples.

The U.S. imperialists' actions in Vietnam are severely condemned by all the revolutionary, democratic and peace-loving forces. The peoples that have cast off colonial tyranny and are fighting to consolidate their independence rightly regard these actions as an attempt at forcibly suppressing the national-liberation movement, as an undisguised encroachment on the sacred right of every people to shape their own destiny.

The representatives of the Communist and Workers' parties express their internationalist solidarity with the fraternal people of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, the heroic Party of Working People of Vietnam, and the National Front for the Liberation of South Vietnam, who are waging a courageous fight against imperialist aggression. The Marxist-Leninist parties regard it as their internationalist duty to work to ensure united action by all the progressive and democratic forces in resolute support of the Vietnamese people's heroic struggle for their freedom and independence. We demand the immediate withdrawal of the armed forces of the United States and its satellites from South Vietnam, and an end to military attacks on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

The representatives of Communist and Workers' parties assembled in Moscow call on all the Communist parties and socialist countries, on all the forces of national liberation and the working-class movement, on all who champion peace and progress, to promote unity of action and solidarity in the active struggle against imperialist aggression, for national independence, for peace and the security of peoples.

MEETING OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA*

On January 27-29 last, the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia met to discuss guidelines for better economic organization, planning and management. Comrade Josef Lenart presented a report on the principles of management and the problems of implementing them. The CC also examined, on the basis of a report by Comrade Jiri Hendrych, questions relating to the work and structure of the Party and other mass organizations.

The debate, which reaffirmed the need consistently to solve the problems of the further development of the socialist economy, dealt in detail with political and organizational measures for the successful realization of the proposed principles of economic management and organization. Party work, the Party's leading role, and the activities and role of the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement (RTUM) and other mass organizations were also discussed.

The Central Committee passed a resolution on the main lines to be followed in improving economic planning and management and on Party work. Another resolution concerns the position, role and tasks of the RTUM during the full-scale construction of socialism.

RESOLUTION ON THE MAIN LINE TO BE FOLLOWED IN IMPROVING ECONOMIC PLANNING AND MANAGEMENT AND ON PARTY WORK.

The 12th Congress of the CP of Czechoslovakia showed that the advance of our society to communism calls for the fulfilment of two interdependent tasks: orientating the economy on intensive development, and organizing the management of our society, particularly the national economy, along scientific lines.

The experience gained by the Party in recent years leads to the conclusion that the present system of economic management, which has fulfilled its historical mission in socialist construction no longer meets the growing requirements and that the economic directives of the 12th Congress cannot be carried out unless this system is fundamentally readjusted.

The Central Committee considers it necessary to utilize all the positive aspects of the present system, enrich it with new elements and in this way introduce a superior system of socialist management. Better management will make it possible to use every advantage of the socialist system more effectively, to use for the benefit of socialist society the vast opportunities provided by the present revolution in science and technology.

An improved system of management should also allow better use of the advantages of international cooperation with fraternal socialist countries, especially through the Council for Mutual Economic Aid.

I. MAIN PRINCIPLES OF THE NEW SYSTEM OF ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT

The Central Committee proposes the following lines to be followed in improving the socialist system of management.

—creating the most favorable conditions for steady economic progress through higher productivity of social labor and greater returns, to be achieved by making the most extensive use of science and technology and by consistently applying the principle of material incentive and of the responsibility of all working people for the results of labor;

—improving centralized economic management and making better use of its advantages;

—combining social planning with socialist commodity-money relations;

—extending the powers and responsibilities of enterprises and encouraging the workers' individual and collective initiative.

The Central Committee stresses that the new system of management cannot operate automatically and will require a higher standard of management. The effectiveness of the system will depend entirely on how well its significance is understood by the working people, particularly managerial personnel, and how they apply it in dealing with practical matters. This calls for proper explanatory work by the Party, which must show that the new system will benefit individual workers and the staffs of enterprises provided their labor effectively contributes to the economy. It is also necessary to use moral and political factors as effectively as possible and foster comradely relations between people.

ROLE OF CENTRALIZED PLANNING AND GUIDANCE OF THE ECONOMY

Centralized guidance of the socialist economy by the Government and its agencies is based on a knowledge of the laws governing the development of socialist society. Accordingly, the Government and its agencies draw up scientifically sound economic plans and devise the best economic policies. The central leadership concerns itself with basic economic questions, which cannot be decided by the lower bodies inasmuch as their knowledge of the decisive economic relationships and interconnections is bound to be only partial and hence inadequate.

The Central Committee considers that decisions at the center should be taken:

—on basic production proportions, division of the national income into accumulation and consumption funds, the relationship between personal and social consumption, and ways of improving the standard of living;

—on the main lines of development of the productive forces. To this end, it will be necessary to direct the development of the various industries in such a way as to ensure the most effective branch structure and specialization. And this means that the central bodies must plan basic investments according to long-range scientific concepts, ensure the continuous improvement of the working people's skills and specify the main objectives of technical progress and the tasks arising from international division of labor, as well as from economic and trade agreements. They are also responsible for the balanced economic development of the country's various regions, primarily by properly distributing basic investments.

—on the methods of applying the economic levers of management, on guidelines for price and wage policies — to ensure that the initiative of enterprises aimed at increasing the production of social labor, improving production and its organization and introducing new lines of output, is continuously encouraged and supported—and on credit and finance policies.

THE ECONOMIC PLAN IS THE MAIN INSTRUMENT OF MANAGEMENT

The national economic plan, which ensures proportional economic development, is the main instrument of socialist economic guidance. To raise the scientific standard of the plan and all decisions on economic planning and management, it is necessary to use objective criteria and on their basis to choose the best possible solutions.

Previous practice considered the satisfaction of certain requirements out of planned resources to be the important thing. More, it seldom took the effectiveness of the decision adopted into proper account. Under the new system, decisions on the requisites for our further progress are to be taken with due regard to the following circumstances:

(a) how effective the proposed decision is in comparison with the world high in terms of quality, technical indices, and outlay;

(b) what economic results it will produce considering the investments and production expenditures made;

(c) to what extent it will deplete or save economic development resources.

To guide the operation of enterprises from the center does not mean determining every decisive aspect of their work but continuously and flexibly influencing the economic situation which the enterprises go by in making decisions. The point is that enterprises should, while taking account of their own interests, meet the interests of society as a whole. This means that one of the new important tasks of the central bodies will be constantly to harmonize individual interests and the interests of society by flexibly using economic levers and to implement the principle: what is good for society should be good for the enterprise and the individual.

The entire economy and its every branch need a clear outlook the details of which should be continuously specified. This means adopting the following system:

(a) a long-range program for 10 to 15 years, based on an analysis of the state of our economy, the trends of development of public life and the use of scientific and technical achievements, and taking as its point of departure the role we expect to play in the world economy, particularly within the socialist system;

(b) a five-year plan giving concrete expression to the long-range perspective and research findings throughout the economy. It will be the main guide to concrete management at all levels and provide guidelines for current plans.

Simultaneously with drawing up the five-year plan, the central bodies must establish basic rules for the provision of material incentives, especially the principles and rates to be applied in making deductions for the state budget and in creating reserve funds, the manner in which enterprises are to participate in financing capital investments, and so on.

It is essential to ensure that the enterprises, guided by the long-range program and acting on their own initiative and with due regard to their own needs, systematically make their own analyses of the home and foreign market, and of the conditions and requisites for further development, in order to ascertain the best ways and means of achieving the world standard as regards production outlay, quality, and the technical, aesthetic and other characteristics of their products.

(c) The annual plan, drawn up with a view to the prospects of the next year or two (the two-year perspective will be particularly necessary in capital construction), should be aimed at reaching five-year plan targets.

The central bodies will exert decisive influence on capital construction, which is the chief means of effecting structural changes in the national economy, ensuring technological progress, and improving living and working conditions. Investments and the use of fixed assets will have a direct bearing on the deductions from the incomes of enterprises for the state budget. The investor will be fully responsible for the turnover, and hence the effectiveness, of investments. Credits will be used for the purpose. Enterprises will repay these credits and pay interest on them out of their incomes.

The central bodies will ensure the utilization of achievements in science and technology to advance our society still further. Science should influence production and the whole of social practice in increasing measure.

The central bodies will continue to promote international economic cooperation. The development of the Czechoslovak economy and the gradual increase of its productivity call for methodically implementing the principle of international division of labor and carrying forward the positive results of the activities of the Council for Mutual Economic Aid. It is particularly important properly to organize international division of labor in the sphere of research and development. Czechoslovakia has a vital interest in promoting international division of labor.

MATERIAL INCENTIVES AND THE ECONOMIC LEVERS OF MANAGEMENT

The Central Committee considers it necessary radically to reshape the system of material incentive and material responsibility. The interests of enterprises will be linked with actual economic results and not merely with the fulfilment of plan indices. The funds available to the enterprises for bonuses and for their own development will directly depend on their net returns after deductions for the labor expended and fulfilment of their obligations toward society.

The overall remuneration of each employee should depend not only on the results of his own labor but — to a certain differentiated extent — on the economic results of the operation of the enterprise in general and its every section in particular.

The new approach to material incentives will make it possible gradually to overcome the present tendency on the part of the enterprises to keep down their commitments under the plan. In the economic climate in which the enterprises will be placed they will be interested in drawing up optimum plans.

THE ROLE OF PRICES

In keeping with the evolution of economic conditions in production and consumption, prices should be applied in such a way as to make the economy as productive as possible. The right criterion here is the socially-necessary cost of production, world prices and, consequently, the effect of world labor productivity on the ratio of prices in our country. This is why prices which over a long period were unchanged will be revised by flexibly and methodically directing prices movements while maintaining a stable general level. The general level of retail prices should be preserved. This stability should be achieved chiefly by flexibly adapting production to the requirements of society.

More profitable prices will be fixed for new products that will be more perfect in terms of quality and other consumption indices.

In organizing the planning of prices and a system for fixing them, it is necessary to elaborate in detail a proper distribution of functions between the central and lower management bodies. The central organs are to decide on fixed prices and control the observance of the rules of price formation. Fixed prices will be set on basic raw and other materials and on basic necessities. Within these rules and limits, specific prices will be set by agreement between the buyer and the supplier. In certain cases enterprises will be agreement with the buyer independently fix free prices on the basis of supply and demand and in keeping with the regulations in force throughout the country.

FOREIGN TRADE

The price level on the foreign market should stimulate the more profitable operation of production enterprises and foreign trade organizations. This will not only encourage the enterprises and organizations in question to make exports and imports as profitable as possible but will make for greater initiative and for the introduction of desirable changes into the pattern of our foreign trade. Thus foreign trade will make it possible to compare the national and world technical and economic standards of production. This will lead to specialization in production and research and to the economy being equipped with the best in world technology.

To induce production enterprises to improve their contribution to foreign trade, it is necessary gradually to introduce sharing in foreign exchange incomes, the free purchase of foreign currency at the established rates, exchange credits, redistribution of foreign exchange incomes accruing to enterprises as well as bonuses to their suppliers, etc.

HOME TRADE

In the sphere of home trade, greater inducements are required to promote the continuous satisfaction of the population's demand and better services, with the simultaneous optimum increase of the stocks of consumer goods.

We must achieve maximum flexibility in the relationships between buyers and suppliers, between home trade, production and foreign trade, and remove all obstacles to the choice of suppliers by trading establishments.

Competition to meet the requirements of the population will be stimulated by the gradual increase of consumer goods imports, which will be effected within established limits at the request of home trade bodies, and not by arrangement with home producers, as has been done so far.

In organizing home trade, we must expand opportunities for competition between different enterprises in the trading system: between state trading establishments, the trading network of state production establishments and trading cooperatives. However, cooperatives should not reduce supplies to the countryside.

ENTERPRISES UNDER THE NATIONAL COMMITTEES

The new principles of economic management will also be applied at the enterprises under the charge of National Committees.

The main economic function of the National Committee is to ensure the development of the public utilities and small-scale local production to meet the needs of the population. In order steadily to improve the municipal services, it is necessary to launch competition between enterprises under the National Committee, on the one hand, and cooperatives, on the other, and use simpler forms of management (sharing in proceeds, remuneration according to proceeds, and so on).

PLANNING AND COST ACCOUNTING AT THE ENTERPRISES

The considerable extension of the powers and responsibilities of enterprises will call for a qualitatively new kind of management.

The specific methods and forms of organizing the management of enterprises should be differentiated according to local conditions.

It is necessary;

—further to improve and properly use internal technical, economic and current planning in the system of management:

—to promote the purposeful employment of value ratios in internal management and accounting;

—to encourage personal material interest in the economic results achieved by each section of the enterprise and personal material responsibility for these results, making active use of suitable forms of remuneration;

—to organize all planning and accounting in such a way as to make possible constant control over the various sections of the enterprise;

—to use mathematical methods and promote mechanization of managerial activity;

—to overcome subjectivism in management and draw on the achievements of the social sciences, including sociology and psychology.

THE ROLE OF CONTROL AND INFORMATION

The new system of management will require, first of all, making control based on a complete, efficient and dependable system of information the daily concern of every management body and managerial worker. It should help them to discern and generalize development trends in good time, spread positive experience, prevent errors and shortcomings or efficiently and resolutely rectify them.

The control system will be aimed at protecting the public interest and stimulating initiative and socialist enterprise more effectively with a view to better management. Control will be exercised above all in fields where the danger of anti-social trends is greatest (questions of quality, movement of prices and wages, the abuse of their monopoly position by producers).

To make control more effective, we must steadily render it more democratic, so that it will not be the concern of management bodies alone but of all working people and their elected representatives.

We must improve the standard of information at all managerial levels, end the fragmentation of economic information, and improve methods of collecting, conveying and processing data. The system of economic information, which should be competently processed in line with progress in statistics, should gradually enable the central management bodies to supervise and direct the general development of the entire economy, allowing the lower bodies or their public agencies the greatest leeway and maximum initiative in current management.

IMPORTANT MEASURES FOR THE TRANSITION TO THE NEW SYSTEM

Changes in the organization of the technical base of production, and the methodical solution of the problems of economic development according to the new principles are a necessary condition for the effective operation of the new system of management.

1. THE ORGANIZATION OF COST-ACCOUNTING AND CENTRAL MANAGEMENT BODIES

The Central Committee has approved the following principles of organization of the technical production base:

Concerns taking in entire branches of industry, which it is advisable, as a rule, to set up for vertically organized major economic units having a complex internal structure, and trusts uniting enterprises of one and the same branch are the basic type of organization of production and economic units corresponding to the approved system of management and creating favorable conditions for the application of higher forms of production organization — concentration, specialization and combination.

In cases when the conditions in terms of production and consumption warrant it, diverse types of enterprises may be grouped under a single management.

We must consistently carry out measures to strengthen the buyers' economic position and hence to eliminate, or at least alleviate, the adverse effects of the concentration of production in single hands.

The organization of the production and economic base should make for healthy competition between state and cooperative enterprises, on the one hand, and locally-run enterprises producing primarily consumer goods and providing services to the population, on the other.

The boards of the concerns and trusts will be the highest links of management with jurisdiction over the finances and operation of all the subordinate enterprises and organizations. They will operate autonomously, using the economic levers provided by the new system, and will be responsible for the economic decisions they make. These boards will specify the powers which subordinate enterprises are to exercise in taking decisions on their own initiative in keeping with the principles of socialist enterprise.

The Central Committee holds that the branch boards should be responsible:

—for the development of the branches concerned, especially from the point of view of world technical standards and outlay, quality, and use value of commodities;

—in common with trading organizations, for the steady supply of the economy as a whole with their products;

—for the most economical and expedient utilization of the funds entrusted to them.

The previous system of management limited independent decision-making and thereby undermined the authority of executives, leading to an oversimplified attitude toward economic matters. The new system of planning and management calls for the consistent distribution of powers and responsibilities between executives at various levels, for the necessary independence of executives in making decisions. An end must be put to the arbitrary transfer of the authority of one managerial level to another, and to the excessive restriction of the powers of executives by pedantic coordination with higher bodies. Every executive should be responsible for the decisions he takes.

Since every executive must bear full responsibility for the job entrusted to him, he must have greater authority to decide on the selection, transfer or dismissal of personnel. Labor power transfers desirable from the economic point of view will be authorized by appropriate regulations.

The Central Committee instructs the Government of the Republic to devise an expedient structure and distributing of the funcions of its agencies, to normalize and properly orientate the work of Ministries as complex bodies of the central management of the new branch associations.

The State Bank is to play an important part in the solution of economic problems under the new system. In addition to better control through finances, it will promote the effective operation of enterprises by making credits dependent on returns and turnover. The activity of banks will also be extended in the sphere of foreign trade.

2. ACTIVE SOLUTION OF PRESSING ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

The introduction of the new system of management is a condition for the solution of pressing economic problems. It calls for drawing up the five-year plan in a new way, on the basis of a realistic appraisal of the opportunities for economic growth, and for carrying it out according to the new principles of management. The long-range plan should, in addition to introducing the new system of management, ensure — in the spirit of the decisions of the 12th Congress of the CPC — the gradual technical reconstruction and consolidation of the economy, conformity of raw material resources to demand and labor power, as well as of the population's money incomes to goods stocks and the available public service facilities, greater returns from foreign trade, and the creation of material, foreign exchange and financial reserves.

The five-year plan for 1966-70 should be based on the actual potentialities of the Czechoslovak economy and should initiate the intensive rather than extensive development of the economy. It should introduce such an approach to investment as will result in a more effective use of raw and other materials and power. Priority is to be given to the overall modernization of enterprises, which should guarantee technological progress over a long period.

It is necessary consistently to ensure, in conformity with the resources created, all-round improvement of the standard of living by promoting housing construction, the service industries and passenger transport and striving toward shorter working hours, a better pattern of personal consumption, and higher quality of goods.

The development of agriculture and the gradual evening up of the level of agricultural and industrial production are a prime factor for the advancement of our material and technical base. This will in the next few years require continuing the all-round mechanization and chemicalization of agriculture, providing greater materal inducements, and in this way creating further conditions for drawing the youth into agricultural production.

To end harmful levelling in remuneration, it is necessary to redistribute the remuneration fund by increasing the amount set apart for bonuses and other premiums to be paid as inducements for results achieved by the whole enterprise, with due regard to the contribution of each worker.

GRADUAL INTRODUCTION OF THE NEW SYSTEM

The introduction of the new system of management is a gradual and purposive process during which it should be continuously developed and improved. The system must not be expected to operate automatically.

The initial period of operation of the new system will be particularly important, because that is when the fundamental principles of the system will have to be put into effect with due regard to the available opportunities for economic development.

In this connection, account should be taken:

—of existing economic imbalances, which it will take time to remove;

—of the limited opportunities for the use of current wholesale prices;

—of the actual state of preparations at all levels of management.

The Central Committee deems it necessary for the Government to begin by accomplishing the following tasks:

1. Completing the solution of pressing problems, and paving the way for the introduction of the fundamental principles of the new system, in 1965. This means:

(a) elaborating the basic concept of economic development from 1966 to 1970 in order to strengthen the economy and reconstruct it technically;

(b) seeing to it that the principles of the new system are worked out in a creative spirit not later than June 30, 1965, on the basis of available data, in keeping with the nature and conditions of individual branches of industry, construction, home and foreign trade, and of the enterprises under the National Committees;

(c) proposing, before the end of 1965, ways and means of applying the principles of the new system in transport and agriculture;

(d) reorganizing the technical production base in the first half of 1965, taking care to distribute personnel as effectively as possible;

(e) completing, before the end of 1965, the solution of methodological problems posed by the new system, working out appropriate legal standards, specifying the sphere of action of economic levers between 1966 and 1970, and devising a system of economic levers and measures that the central bodies could use if the introduction of the new system were to produce adverse effects;

(f) mounting in the same period preparations for a radical revision of wholesale prices, and elaborating the fundamental principles of price formation, as well as a system of state subsidies pending final revision of wholesale prices;

(g) defining the principles of deciding questions of wages, specifying the content and function of collective agreements, subsequent control of the wage fund, and so on, and deciding on the manner in which undesirable wage increases can be prevented, on the understanding, however, that funds should be used expediently to eliminate levelling and increase bonuses for the successful fulfilment of annual plans by enterprises;

(h) ensuring that in 1965 work on the plan is already carried on according to the new principles of management;

(i) testing the new system of planning and management in experimental enterprises assigned for purpose; carefully following the experiments and thoroughly appraising their results with an eye to introducing the new system everywhere.

2. Introducing the fundamental principles of the new system in the main branches of the economy in 1966. Decisions on the ways and means of introducing the new system and on the limit within which this should be done should be taken upon verification of preparedness, especially as regards the plan for the period till 1970. The following principles should be adhered to:

(a) introduce a comprehensive system of incentives for and responsibility of the workers of enterprises, using gross income or profit as a lever; decide on incentives for enterprises pending complete settlement of wholesale prices;

(b) substantially reduce the number of directive indices in the case of the national plan; abolish the practice of obligatory specification of the economic activity of enterprises through an extensive system of overall indices of output, labor productivity, reduction of production outlays, and so on. Staff restrictions and the organized recruitment of labor power will have to be maintained to a certain extent until we succeed in reducing the discrepancy between the available reserves of labor power and the demand for it;

(c) introduce from the outset the principle of material responsibility for the use of fixed assets and for the effectiveness of investments; the amount of deductions from the incomes of enterprises is to be determined according to the amount of fixed assets;

(d) in the sphere of foreign trade, use from the outset economic means to promote the effectiveness of exports and imports, increase the amount of foreign trade in planned proportions, and improve the balance of payments;

(e) in home trade, pass at the very beginning from the system of detailed directive indices to more efficient management of trading organizations by using economic levers. It is above all necessary to ensure that from 1966 onward trading establishments receive most of the goods direct from the producer. Trading organizations should have the opportunity to choose suppliers and purchase goods in optimum quantities and variety. This means lending greater flexibility to the import of consumer goods and placing the means required for their import at the disposal of trading bodies without previous agreement with home producers;

(f) the central bodies should constantly watch over and control the formation and movement of prices, combat any tendency toward unwarranted price and wage increases, and provide an optimum wage structure to avoid risk and the unfavorable trends engendered by previous imbalances.

The Central Committee emphasizes once again that the fundamental principles of the new system of economic management should be regarded as a long-range decision to be carried out gradually, according to the political and economic conditions and the experience gained.

II. ENHANCING THE LEADING ROLE OF THE PARTY AND INCREASING THE ACTIVITY OF MASS ORGANIZATIONS

To solve the complex problems of providing the material and technical basis for a developed socialist society, higher social relations and carry on communist education, the Party must systematically study and cognize the objective processes of social development and create—by elaborating a long-range scientific concept—the socio-political basis for the functioning of all its leading bodies, all its organizations and members. The Party must, furthermore, know and take account of the objective interests of society, social groups, collective bodies and individuals, enlist the broadest possible sections of the working people in preparations for and the realization of all measures, and provide conditions for the independent solution of problems by government and economic bodies, as well as by mass organizations. All this will enable the Party bodies to give more attention to the decision of long-range questions with due regard to public opinion.

Responsibility for the decision of questions pertaining to the concept of development between Party congresses rests with the Central Committee, which is in a position to take in social developments in their totality and to unite the interests and requirements of classes, social strata, economic branches and territorial units. The knowledge of the entire Party and the whole of society is concentrated in the Central Committee, which is the chief exponent of creative political thinking. In the light of the latest achievements in science, the CC studies the possibilities of society's development according to plan. To cope with socio-political tasks, the CC carries on experimental work, taking account of the experience of the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries, and of the world Communist movement. It improves the system of comprehensive information and guides the activities of Party bodies and organizations to enable them in their respective spheres purposively to generalize the course of social events and raise the standard of Party work.

A useful role is also played in this respect by the CC commissions, whose subsequent activities should be geared more consistently to the elaboration of concepts and fundamental proposals. The commissions should consult researchers and other specialists, as well as the working people generally, on these matters. The commissions of regional and district Party committees should concentrate on working out concepts of the all-round development of regions and districts.

ORGANIZE EFFECTIVE POLITICAL WORK AMONG THE MASSES

The leading role of the Party consists, as well as working out the concept of the development of society, in leading the working people, in educating them ideologically and organizing them, in order to win their support for Party policy and secure their active cooperation in carrying it out. The Central Committee instructs all Party bodies and organizations to pay special heed to this fundamental aspect of Party work, overcome their inclination for purely inner-Party activity and carry on political work among the masses, outside the Party, on a far greater scale. The CC notes that political explanatory work among the masses has been unsatisfactory, and has borne little fruit, for a fairly long time now. This work is adversely affected, among other things, by a certain vacillation in evidence in certain sectors of the ideological front.

The CC instructs Party bodies and organizations to shape the membership's political work among the masses in such a way as to ensure that it acquaints the working people more actively and promptly with concepts embracing the whole state, with the aims, intentions and activities of the Party.

An important task of the Party bodies is constantly to inform the Communists of Party policies, of the questions decided by the Party. This information enables members and candidate members to work more actively among the masses. In view of the introduction of an improved system of economic management, it is necessary, first and foremost, to explain the importance of democratic centralism in the life and development of society, of the unity of the interests of the individual and society, of local and group interests, of long-range planning, the use of commodity-money relations, the development and proper application of the principle of material inducement, the extension of the powers and responsibilities of economic executives, more rigid discipline, and greater initiative and activity on the part of the working people.

Party bodies and organizations discussing economic issues should adhere to a political approach. With the aim of increasing the activity of Communists and intensifying their political work among the masses, greater emphasis should be placed on making the work of the Party committees of primary organizations more effective and on increasing assistance to the primary organizations on the part of the district committees and higher Party bodies.

The entire ideological and educational work of the Party should heighten each citizen's sense of responsibility for the further successful development of our socialist country. All evidence of a sectarian attitude toward the working people by Communists has a negative effect on the relations between the Party and the masses. The Party considers a comradely, thoughtful attitude to all working people a condition for ensuring the success of its policy and winning greater confidence with the masses.

PARTY GUIDANCE OF THE ECONOMY

To give Party guidance means influencing the production and economic activities of the working people, and the work of government, economic and other public institutions and organizations in such a way as to expend social labor in a planned and efficient manner and encourags the abilities and initiative of people. It also means coordinating the activities of all the sections of society, cognizing and using the objective processes going on in society and in material production. Party work has always been, and will continue to be, aimed at solving production and economic problems and at achieving closer links with the production sphere. In practice, however, there is still a need to do away with certain elements of one-sidedness.

The cause of shortcomings, uncalled-for takeovers of managerial functions, and a certain relaxation of links with the working people lie in the nature of the difficulties our country is passing through. While administrative methods of leadership predominated and the central government and economic bodies were unable to combat economic stagnation actively enough, the Party grappled with important economic problems and difficulties. The result was that Party bodies relieved the top workers of government and economic bodies of responsibility for the direct management of the economy.

Party guidance must not be seen as the assumption of economic and government functions, any more than it can be confined to political and ideological influence isolated from the economic sphere. It does not contradict the authority and personal responsibility of economic bodies or executives. Their powers and responsibilities are reaffirmed by the new system of management, and Party organizations should not infringe but support them; they should control the fulfilment of assignments, verify the practical results of work done and draw attention to incorrect decisions. Whenever they fail to reach agreement with the economic management on disputed issues, and hence to introduce necessary corrections, they should inform higher Party bodies accordingly.

To assume the functions of economic and government bodies and their personnel means in effect depriving Party bodies of the possibility to exercise control, appraise, to give political guidance. This inevitably leads to irresponsible attitudes, overcautiousness and duplication, with the result that it is often impossible to trace the real causes of shortcomings.

The Central Committee stresses that the right to exercise control over the activities of executives in enterprises or institutions—a right granted by the Party Rules to the primary organizations of the production, transport and trade enterprises, machine-and-tractor stations, state farms, various agricultural cooperatives, design offices and research institutions, which are controlled by different departments and by production or economic bodies—must not be taken to mean the right to determine what and how the executives concerned must and can decide.

Party organizations should concentrate primarily on implementing the economic policy of the Party in the conditions of enterprises and various work places, exercising control over economic activities and appraising the results of these activities. The Communists, being the main exponents of social progress, should consider it their duty to acquire scientific knowledge, introduce new techniques, and see to it that these are used to the full.

We maintain that economics are inseparable from politics and Party work is inseparable from economic problems. Politics are the concentrated expression of economics, and no economic questions can be properly decided unless properly approached from the political standpoint.

A correct policy on personnel is indispensable for putting the Party line into effect. In the light of the decisions regarding the policy on personnel, adopted by the Presidium of the CC CPC in December 1964, all Party bodies and organizations must pay special attention to the provision of personnel to all fields of work under the new system of economic management.

In every walk of life, particularly in key posts, we need people firmly upholding socialist principles, politically mature and professionally competent, people who know how to approach their fellow-workers, people who are exacting, devoted to their job and aware of their responsibility, and who assess their own activity and that of others by the extent that it benefits the whole of society, the people as a whole. The Party will see to it that every citizen who thinks and acts in the socialist way holds, according to his ability and the degree of his political maturity, the position in which he can be of the greatest service to society.

PROMOTE THE IDEOLOGICAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL UNITY OF THE PARTY

To solve the new difficult economic, political and ideological problems, we must systematically foster the unity and working capacity of the Party and provide an atmosphere more conducive to creative endeavor in inner-Party life. By its activity and its internal relations the Party should serve as an example of serious and critical approach to results achieved. It should reject all manifestations of negativism and self-complacency. By holding exchanges of views on the basis of Marxist-Leninist principles, and by using criticism and self-criticism, the Party rids its activity and the life of society of obsolete working methods, indolence in thought, manifestations of dogmatism, Right-wing opportunism and liberalism.

In view of the introduction of the new system of economic management, the Central Committee re-emphasizes the need of an uncompromising and active ideological struggle against liberal trends, as well as against conservatism and subjectivism.

We must dismiss all speculative talk to the effect that the new system means modifying the socialist character of our economy and a triumph for liberalism in economic management. In fact, the measures being taken by the Party are aimed at releasing the forces which will enable our society to eliminate the survivals of philistine morality and practice.

The new forms of work and the further organizational structure of the Party should correspond to the new system of economic management. The Central Committee holds that the territorial and production principle should remain the basis of Party structure.

The primary organizations, which unite Communists by work place, that is, according to the production principle, will continue to form territorial, regional and district Party organizations headed by common Party committees, that is, will be organized according to the territorial principle. This will enable the territorial Party bodies to discern and decide general questions of the long-range development of the region or district concerned, take part in the working out of long-range plans of economic development, guide the Communists in solving economic problems in the enterprises, and bring Party influence to bear in the spirit of democratic centralism.

We must also encourage methods and forms of work that will help integrate the activity of the Communists in the branch enterprises or trusts in question. In line with democratic centralism in Party structure and activity, the Party committees of branch organizations (the committees at the chief enterprise) should be in a position to call twice or three times a year, by arrangement with the relevant departments of the CC CPC (CC CPS) and the regional Party committees in whose territory the branch boards concerned are operating, meetings of the first secretaries or other Party functionaries in the enterprises, research institutions and design offices associated in a branch enterprise or a trust. These meetings will, as a rule, discuss important economic and political matters, the education and placing of personnel, and so on. One of their functions will be fully to inform the rank and file of the tasks of the branch (trust) organizations, generalize opinions, coordinate activities, spread knowledge and experience, and examine proposals for better leadership.

The Central Committee expects the regional Party committees to contribute, by drawing on their experience, to the elaboration and realization of perspectives, especially in the field of economic planning. The regional committees will lead the district committees in implementing Party policy in the spirit of unity, combating departmental narrow-mindedness and parochialism, and ensuring a consistent and a responsible attitude to the public interest.

Inasmuch as the district committees give direct leadership to the primary organizations and are closest of all to the masses, it is important even more resolutely to direct their political, ideological and organizational activity toward concrete work among the masses. The growing tasks imperatively demand that the district committees should stop concerning themselves with particular questions of secondary importance and should concentrate on fulfilling the major political tasks set by the Central Committee, improving ideological work and work among people, and exercising control in the districts concerned.

The role of the district committees as the decisive link which through its political, organizational and educational work directly carries Party policy into practice in common with the members of the primary organizations and other working people is becoming increasingly prominent. This means that they must provide better leadership to the primary organizations, go deeper into their activity and direct it more effectively toward steadily increasing Communist influence in factories, agricultural cooperatives and other work places. We must keep the Party organizations, every Communist and all working people much better informed.

We must differentiate the role and functions of the regional and district committees more precisely. They must not decide identical questions in one and the same way. This would scatter the forces of the Party and breed unnecessary decisions and bureaucratic methods. For instance, the tendency to spell out every CC decision, no matter how specific, leads to waste of energy, delays the forwarding of decisions from the center to the primary organizations, fetters their initiative in adjusting Party directives to local conditions, and thereby holds up the execution of Party decisions.

With a view to preparing regional and district committee meetings more thoroughly and ensuring that their decisions are carried out more fruitfully, the Central Committee deems it possible for the plenary meetings of the regional and district committees of the CPC to be called less frequently than once in two months, as the Party Rules require. On the basis of the experience gained, the CC will submit a fundamental draft resolution on this matter to the Thirteenth Party Congress.

The main task of the primary organizations, which are the decisive factor in our Party, is consistently to orientate their membership on work among the masses. They should follow up a thorough study of the situation in production and at every work place by providing conditions for an intelligent use of economic levers, which will help to harmonize personal with social interests and to observe the principles of a correct policy on wages and material incentives. Greater attention should be paid to educating the working people in the spirit of an exemplary attitude to labor, to popularizing useful experience and working methods which have proved their worth in production, management and other walks of life.

We must put more effort into removing all manifestations of formalism, which in some Party bodies and primary organizations has increased considerably, and into preventing evasion of the solution of burning problems of production and human relations, the suppression of criticism, indifference to shortcomings, and a scornful attitude to suggestions made by the working people. We must call a halt to perfunctory meetings. All Party meetings should be business-like; they should help the membership work better among the masses and provide them with a clear outlook for their further activity. To facilitate the convening of meetings and ensure greater efficiency in promptly informing the working people, it is advisable to decide what political and economic questions should be put on the agenda of the general meetings of Party, trade union and youth organizations.

Sustained and exacting control over the actual fulfilment of tasks should make for more efficient and fruitful Party work. However, Party control should be conceived as active assistance to ensure that the problems of society are solved without serious errors if possible, and that the best experience is generalized. We cannot put up with the fact that while there are numerous control check-ups, real help is often scant.

INCREASE THE ROLE OF MASS ORGANIZATIONS

The Central Committee considers it necessary to re-emphasize the importance and role of the National Front and the mass organizations, which under the leadership of the Party have contributed to the education of the working people in a socialist spirit and thereby helped to strengthen the moral and political unity of the people. The further expansion of the activities of the mass organizations will benefit, first of all, from the use of new forms of promoting the people's political activity and labor and their participation in government, and from the removal of all formalism. The political and organizing work of mass organizations should express more forcefully the unity of the requirements of society as a whole and the personal interests of the citizens united by those organizations. All mass organizations are duty bound to do more for the education of the masses. They must choose the forms and content of their activities more purposively to end the present practice of over-regulation.

It will, therefore, be expedient to transfer the organizing activities of those mass organizations whose educational work is not directly linked with production operations from the factory to the residence. The working people spend most of their leisure hours at their residence and are often left outside the range of the educational influence of mass organizations.

The mass organizations should eliminate administrative methods in their work, establish closer links between higher and lower levels, draw primarily on the help of volunteers, and reduce paid staffs.

The Central Committee stresses the important role of the RTUM in socialist construction and is therefore adopting a special resolution on the tasks of the RTUM.

One of the prime tasks of the Party and society is to educate the younger generation, to exert greater influence on its life and work. The youth should be educated in the spirit of communist moral principles and drawn into active social work.

The Czechoslovak Youth League should take a more responsible attitude to the education of our youth and seek for ways of actively influencing their life and growth. While the youth will continue to have a single organization, it is wrong to cling to habitual organizational forms. The organizations at work places and in educational establishments should be supplemented with interest groups, clubs, minor units, tourist leagues and groups at the places of residence, in which young people should be provided with facilities for cultural and technological pursuits and for sports. This is also a function of the sports organnizations of the Czechoslovak League of Physical Culture, the RTUM clubs, and the houses of culture and education. The CYL should effectively influence these activities from the ideological point of view through its more competent members in order to foster proper moral and political qualities in young men and women.

The Central Committee instructs the Party organizations to study the young people's thinking and way of life more thoroughly, and to bring home to them the need of conscious responsibility and devoted work for the good of society, for the realization of our ideas. This means that Party members, particularly young Communists, should influence the youth by their personal example and by active work among them. Other mass organizations should join efforts with the CYL to promote this work.

In order consistently to carry out the decisions of this CC CPC meeting on the work and structure of the Party and on the activities of the mass organizations under the new system of economic management and to ensure the advance of our society, we must:

1. Work out—in view of the establishment of branch enterprises, in close collaboration with the CC CP of Slovakia and the regional and district Party committees—measures for the formation of Party organizations and the introduction of new forms of coordinating the activity of Communists in branch enterprises.

2. Work out problems of the unity of Party and government leadership of the further development of socialist society, problems of the unification of the Communists in central institutions by the Central Committee of the Party in terms of ideology and unity of action, the problems of proper relations between Party, government and economic leadership; adapt the structure and activity of the Party apparatus to the new conditions, focus it even more on political organizing work in the Party organizations and among the masses, simplify its structure and emphasize the formation of a numerous body of voluntary activists around the leading Party bodies.

3. Appraise the work of the commissions of the CC CPC and of the regional and district Party committees, strengthen links between them, on the one hand, and Party departments and functionaries and the body of volunteers, on the other, and direct their work toward solving the decisive problems.

4. Work out the content and forms of the Party's political work among the masses, and the participation of Party bodies, organizations and members in every field in explaining Party policy; work out more thoroughly the forms of the uniform influence of every medium of political work among the masses, of the press, radio, television, and Party information.

5. Generalize the experience of the Party organizations at the factories, where the new system of planning and management is being tested experimentally, and draw proper conclusions in order to decide on the direction main direction of the political activity of the primary organizations, to give Party leadership to and orientate economic executives and the leaders of mass organizations.

6. Work out problems of the activity of the district Party organizations from the standpoint of enhancing the leading role of the Party with due regard to the new conditions of improving the organization and management of the national economy; prepare conclusions for the promotion of Party leadership in the economy, ideological work and work among people in order further to consolidate the districts politically.

7. Work out ways of increasing the effectiveness and accentuating the single content of the activity of the system of Party and people's control; increase the role of Party bodies at all levels and of the control and auditing commissions in specifying the guidelines of control and coordinating control; achieve closer contact between functionaries of the control bodies of the Party and those of the people. The control bodies should base their activity on the working people's opinions and suggestions and on the broadest possible control from below.

8. Draft, in collaboration with the Central Committee of the National Front and with the Communists in mass organizations, proposals to step up the activity of the mass organizations of the working people.

DELEGATIONS OF SOVIET AND FINNISH COMMUNIST PARTIES MEET*

Delegations from the Communist parties of the Soviet Union and Finland met in the CPSU Central Committee on February 16 and 19. The CPSU was represented by L. I. Brezhnev, First Secretary and member of the Presidium, M. A. Suslov, Secretary and Presidium member, and B. N. Ponomaryov, Secretary; the CPF, by General Secretary Ville Pessi, Chairman Aimo Aaltonen, and Political Bureau members Hertta Kuusinen, Aarne Saarinen and Erkki Tuominen.

Many questions of interest to both parties were discussed in the atmosphere of friendship, sincerity and complete confidence typical of the relations between the two fraternal parties.

The delegations exchanged views on the international situation. Noting that the recent acts of aggression committed by the U.S. imperialists against the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, and the armed intervention of the USA and Belgium in the Congo had strained international rélations and endangered world peace, they stressed the need for more vigorous actions by all the peace-loving, democratic, anti-imperialist forces, above all the working-class movement, for higher vigilance on their part, and for a joint rebuff to the enemies of peace and freedom of the peoples.

The representatives of the CPSU reaffirmed that it was the invariable aim of Soviet foreign policy to prevent a new world war, consistently to apply the principles of the peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems, and support the liberation movements of the peoples. The representatives of the CPF voiced their full approval of this policy and declared, for their part, that the Finnish Communists, together with the working class and all progressive forces of Finland, came out resolutely for the preservation of world peace and the security of the peoples.

The two delegations agreed that the situation called for rallying all the peoples against the growing menace presented by the revenge-seeking militarist forces in West Germany, which are out to get nuclear weapons by hook or by crook and to restore the former political and economic positions of German imperialism in different regions of the world, thus creating a direct danger to the independence and sovereignty of a number of countries.

The two parties noted with satisfaction that the good-neighborly, friendly relations between the USSR and Finland, developing successfully on the basis of the principles of peaceful coexistence, greatly furthered peace. The representatives of the CPSU stated that the Soviet Communists thought highly of the active and fruitful contribution of the CPF to the development of these relations, which fully meet the vital interests of the peoples of the two countries. The CPF delegation stated that the policy of friendship and good-neighborly relations between the USSR and Finland accorded with the vital national interests of the Finnish people and was vigorously supported by them. The two delegations pointed out, however, that forces trying to divert Finland from the road of peace and friendship with the Soviet Union chosen by her were still active both in and outside Finland.

Questions of economic cooperation and cultural, scientific and tourist contacts were also touched upon. The CPF delegates stressed the importance of the mutually advantageous Finnish-Soviet economic cooperation and trade for the economic development of their country and for the employment of Finnish working people.

Both delegations hold that there are good opportunities for the further growth of Soviet-Finnish economic and cultural cooperation. The CPF delegation expressed the wish that the Soviet side study the possibility of, say, extending contacts between industrial establishments, exchanging specialists and scientific and technological information, building industrial projects on Soviet territory by Finnish workers, extending the area used by Finnish fishermen in Soviet territorial waters, opening a direct steamship line between Helsinki and Tallinn to promote tourism, and, in perspective, building a gas pipe-line to Finland with Soviet help.

The CPSU delegation declared that the Soviet organizations concerned were ready to consider suggestions by the CPF delegation.

The two delegations put on record the complete identity of the views of their parties on topical problems of the world Communist movement. They reaffirmed that in all their activities their parties firmly abided by the propositions of the 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement as policy documents of the world Communist movement. They agreed that it was above all necessary to make every effort to overcome the present difficulties in the world Communist movement and strengthen its unity and solidarity on the basis of Marxist-Leninist principles and proletarian internationalism. They expressed the firm conviction that it was quite possible despite the disagreements to achieve unity of action of all the fraternal parties on the topical problems of the struggle against imperialism, for peace, national independence, democracy and socialism.

The two delegations noted with great satisfaction that the traditional fraternal contacts between the CPSU and the CPF, which, like relations between all Marxist-Leninist parties, were developing on the basis of respect for the independence and equality of every party, had lately been strengthened and expanded. They reaffirmed their readiness to continue promoting contacts and cooperation between the CPSU and the CPF through meetings of representatives, through exchanges of delegations, information and publications, and in other forms in keeping with the principles and standards of proletarian internationalism.

INTERVIEW* WITH ALVARO CUNHAL, GENERAL SECRETARY, CP OF PORTUGAL

By NEUES DEUTSCHLAND

Q. What do you think of the situation in your country now, at the beginning of 1965?

A. Portugal is ruled by a fascist dictatorship lacking a mass base. The Salazar regime is propped up by a well-organized coercive machinery and by its NATO partners. The people are against fascism and the movement against Salazar has expanded considerably, particularly in recent years. The movement involves all segments of the population — industrial and agricultural workers, students, servicemen, and the middle classes in town and country. Every day sees fresh action by the people.

The authorities are well aware of the danger threatening the dictatorship, and Salazar has lately stepped up measures to suppress resistance. The number of arrests has been growing and some regions are virtually under martial law. Terrorism is spearheaded against our Party cadre.

Q. How would you estimate, in the circumstances, the outlook for the popular struggle against the regime?

A. The outlook is favorable. This year will witness new major battles by the people. But, of course, that will mean more suffering and further sacrifices. The reign of terror will become even more cruel and the NATO countries will do still more to help Lisbon. There is West Germany, for one. That country has been accused of supplying arms for Portugal's colonial war. By granting Salazar substantial loans, West Germany has become one of his important economic props. Bonn has an air base at Becha.

All that notwithstanding, we are ready for more sacrifices. We see this readiness of ours as an earnest of victory.

Q. What is the position of the Communist Party in the Patriotic Front of National Liberation?

A. Our Party did much to initiate the Front. It has been fighting for democratic unity for many years now. The Front comprises representatives of every political trend. Its Second Conference early last year passed a resolution to intensify activities. Among the measures listed was the formation of the Revolutionary Junta, which has its seat in Algiers and from there supports the struggle of our people by means of propaganda and through actions in the diplomatic sphere.

Incidentally, the Third Conference of the Front, held in the latter half of 1964, did not re-elect General Delgado, ex-President of the Junta. Like the other organizations which have joined the movement, we think that right. An organization which is out to restore democracy in Portugal should respect democratic methods of leadership. It would be unfortunate if anyone were to abuse the possibilities and forces the Front for his own ends. This has been rendered impossible since the Third Conference.

I would like on this occasion to thank the Government of the Algerian People's Democratic Republic, in particular President Ben Bella, once again for the support they have been giving to our struggle.

Q. What is the attitude of the Patriotic Front to the emancipation struggle going on in the Portuguese colonies?

A. Our Party has invariably reaffirmed the right of the colonial peoples to self-determination and independence. It is doing all it can to help them. It organizes resistance to the colonial war in the armed forces. Many privates and young officers have already broken with the colonial army.

A mere decade ago the Communist Party was the only organization demanding freedom for the colonies. Today the entire Patriotic Front takes a correct stand on the colonial issue. This issue has become the touchstone of the attitude to the freedom of Portugal, for our country cannot be free and independent unless the peoples of its colonies win freedom and independence.

Q. You escaped from prison early in 1960. Could you tell me how you did it?

A. It was nothing of an exception. Our Party has organized many flights from jail. I think success depends on three circumstances: first, the prisoner's resolve to escape in order to resume the struggle, second, a constant effort by the Party to free its members, and third, popular backing.

In 1960 I succeeded in escaping with another nine comrades six of whom were Central Committee members. We were held in an ultra-modern special prison in the inner part of a fortress, which meant solitary confinement, automatic locks, guards at all hours, and strict isolation from the outside world. Nevertheless, the escape came off with the Party's help. First we had to remove one of the guard. We used chloroform because we wanted to avoid bloodshed. Another guard, who had been initiated into the matter, took us to the fifteen-metre high wall of the fortress which we cleared with a rope made of shredded bedsheets. People in the nearby fishing village saw us but didn't give us away.

Q. Would you like to say something about your impressions of the German Democratic Republic?

A. I am here to acquaint myself with the GDR and inform my Party about it. The way in which the GDR solves its political problems will be important to us tomorrow. We hope that "Tomorrow" is not very far off.

There are important changes in the GDR. I've seen the fruits of creative labor everywhere. I'm certain your republic will make even greater progress. I wish its citizens all the best.

JOINT STATEMENT* BY THE COMMUNIST PARTIES OF SOUTH AFRICA AND FRANCE

Representatives of the Communist parties of France and the Republic of South Africa met at the beginning of February and had a fruitful exchange of views and information.

The delegation of the Communist Party of South Africa spoke highly of the efforts of the French Communist Party to defend the interests of the working class, renovate democracy and uphold peace, and of its support for the national-liberation struggle against imperialism and neo-colonialism.

The South African delegation made a detailed analysis of the disgraceful racialist regime in South Africa. It described it as a special type of colonialism based on the oppression of the black African majority and other non-whites. Verwoerd, Vorster and other leaders, admirers and followers of Hitler, resort to the worst methods of fascist terror.

The French delegation paid tribute to the South African resistance movement, which unites Communists and non-Communists in a courageous struggle for freedom and equal rights and opportunities for all. Both delegations hailed the solidarity movement growing all over the world. They came to the conclusion that Verwoerd's racialist regime would be unable to hold power without the political support, weapons and capital it receives from the imperialist countries, France included. Despite UN decisions, the French government continues to supply South Africa with weapons for use against the freedom-loving forces. French investment in and trade with South Africa are growing steadily.

The FCP delegation considers that this policy injures friendship between France and the African countries and runs counter to the French national interests.

Both delegations declare that the struggle against apartheid is of international significance not only for the defense of basic human rights but also for peace. The government of South Africa is a threat to world peace and to the independence and security of all the African countries. South Africa, the most industrialized African country, is mustering its forces for war. Aided by British, French (Panhard, for instance) and other enterprises, it is building a war industry of its own. In addition, the Bonn and Pretoria governments have concluded a secret agreement on the joint manufacture of nuclear weapons, rockets and modern war gases in South Africa.

*L'Humanité, February 16, 1965.

The Pretoria regime maintains close military relations with Salazar's Portugal and the racialist government of Southern Rhodesia.

The representatives of the FCP pledged to do everything to develop a broad and powerful anti-apartheid movement in France. Together with all the democratic forces of the country, the French Communist Party will work to intensify the struggle against the French government's support of the racist and militarist regime in South Africa. Specifically, it will fight:

—for the release of all political prisoners in South Africa;

—for French observance of the embargo on arms supplies to South Africa recommended by the Security Council;

—for the severance by the French government of all diplomatic, commercial, cultural, sporting and other relations with the apartheid regime, and for French insistence in the UN on measures against South Africa's unlawful annexation of South-West Africa.

At the conclusion of the talks, which proceeded in a spirit of great cordiality and fraternity, the two delegations decided to extend contacts and fraternal cooperation between their parties.

JOINT STATEMENT* BY THE COMMUNIST PARTIES OF CHILE AND ARGENTINA

Meeting in Buenos Aires on January 22 and 23, 1965, representatives of the Communist parties of Chile and Argentina exchanged information and discussed some questions of the struggle against imperialism, for democracy and peace.

The Communist Party of Chile was represented by Luis Corvalan, General Secretary, and Rafael Cortes, member of the CC Secretariat, and the Communist Party of Argentina by Victorio Codovilla, Chairman, and Orestes Ghioldi, member of the Political Secretatiat. The meeting was also attended by Arnaldo Pinero, alternate member of the CC, CPA.

Afte· the talks, which revealed complete unanimity on the questions under discussion, the following statement was issued:

The Communist Party of Chile and the Communist Party of Argentina are in full agreement that the defense of the freedom and national independence of their countries, and of peace on the American continent calls for stepping up the flunkeys to set up a counter-revolutionary Cuban government in exile. In line with the recent conference of the Communist and Workers' parties of Latin America, they call for a struggle to bring about the restoration of diplomatic, commercial and cultural relations with heroic Cuba.

Everything should be done to ensure the success of the forthcoming continental conference of solidarity with Cuba and for the peoples' right to self-determination. The two parties reaffirm their resolve to work for this.

In keeping with the decisions of the conference of the Communist and Workers' parties of Latin America, the two parties also pledge to step up the movement for the release of the imprisoned public leaders of Venezuela, Brazil, Paraguay, Ecuador, Haiti and other Latin American countries, and in particular to extend the campaign of solidarity with the fraternal Communist Party of Venezuela and the Venezuelan National Liberation Front's heroic fighters for freedom and democracy.

The forthcoming U.S.-sponsored conference of the Foreign Ministers of the OAS countries, which is to adopt measures against the anti-imperialist movements on the continent, makes it even more urgent to step up the fight against the onslaught of reaction and fascism, in defense of democracy and for the extension of democratic freedoms. This struggle is part and parcel of the struggle for national independence, peace and socialism.

The comrades from the Communist Party of Chile voiced solidarity with the courageous fight of the Communist Party of Argentina for the complete restoration of its political and electoral rights. The comrades from the Communist Party of struggle against the militarist agreements, open and secret, under which the governments of their two countries undertake to render military and other assistance to the armed ventures of U.S. imperialism in any part of the world with the aim of suppressing the national-liberation movements in South Vietnam, the Congo and elsewhere, and which can be used for preparing open armed aggression against the Cuban revolution.

The aggressive nature of these agreements was demonstrated once again during the visit of U.S. General O'Meara to Argentina and Chile.

Alleging humanitarian intent, the Argentine government has already decided to take part in these ventures by promising the U.S. government to send medical supplies to South Vietnam in order to help the U.S. aggression there. The Pentagon is pressing for similar support from the Chilean government.

The Communist parties of Chile and Argentina call upon all the democratic and patriotic forces of their countries to repudiate the military agreements with the United States and fight against the Pentagon's nefarious plan to convert national armies into praetorian forces suppressing their own peoples against all participation in U.S. military ventures, even if symbolic or justified by "humane" reasons.

In view of the growing danger of U.S. armed aggression—direct or through puppet governments—against heroic Cuba, the Communist parties of Chile and Argentina, like the other Communist parties of Latin America, express their firm determination to intensify their peoples' movement of solidarity with the first free territory in America, in defense of the peoples' sacred right to self-determination. Both parties vigorously denounce the criminal intention of the U.S. government and its Argentina, for their part, expressed solidarity with the activities of the Communist Party of Chile aimed at safeguarding and extending democratic rights and consolidating the Popular Action Front in the struggle for deep-going economic, social and political changes.

The Communist parties of Chile and Argentina reaffirm their unqualified and vigorous support for the statement of the conference of the Marxist-Leninist parties of Latin America against factional activities and for the unity of each Communist Party and of the entire world Communist and working-class movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and of the 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement.

The Communist parties of Chile and Argentina reaffirm that they favor an early international conference of the Communist and Workers' parties, and express confidence that the preparatory meeting, due to open in Moscow on March 1, will do everything to ensure the success of the new conference. This conference is a pressing need, for it is to discuss the changes that have taken place in the world and to uphold and strengthen the unity of the world Communist movement on the solid foundation of Marxist-Leninist principle.

STATEMENT BY THE GENERAL SECRETARY OF THE PEOPLE'S PARTY OF PANAMA

V. Tello

Panama's conflict with the United States over the "status" of the canal zone is complicated by internal difficulties. Our country is nearing the culmination of the process of national formation. Our people have realized that it is time to put an end to our dependence on North American imperialism. The national interests, which have crystallized in the course of a long and difficult period of development, are coming into sharp conflict with the presence of a foreign power which usurps and exploits part of our resources. This contradiction found expression in the violence of January 9, 1964.

While our people are becoming conscious of themselves as a nation and of their destiny, we see that in these crucial days negotiations on behalf of our people are conducted by the same ruling circles which have for 60 years pursued a foreign policy of capitulation and servility. Subordination and capitulation to the United States is incompatible with the historical necessity of freedom. Our historical development itself demands a political change conducive to the complete liberation of the country.

Thus, the actions of our people against U.S. imperialism are accompanied by an aggravation of the internal political situation in the country, expressed in the opposition of the masses to the ruling circles which are experiencing a growing political crisis. The political prestige of these circles among the masses is diminishing as their defeatism and inability to negotiate from patriotic positions are becoming ever clearer. This is bound to lead to revolutionary changes in Panama. North Americans realize this full well and they are greatly disturbed by the trend of developments in our country.

As the first anniversary of the January events draws closer, it is natural to expect our people to express their attitude to the murderers of our students and the best representatives of our youth by exposing before the whole world this much-vaunted American democracy with its professed respect for the right to self-determination as nothing but demagogic talk. By showing the real nature of imperialism, our small nation will deepen the internal crisis, undermine still more the political and moral prestige of the oligarchy, and weaken the positions of both imperialism and reaction at home.

It is this prospect, this new awakening of our country that determines the imperialists' present policy towards us. It is a policy of smiles that conceal the fangs of the imperialist beast of prey; it is a policy of sham concessions designed to convince our people of the good will of the North American negotiators.

The real aim of President Johnson's statement made several days before the anniversary of the January 9 events and several days after the Panamanian people had reaffirmed their determination not to allow any more concessions by our representatives at the negotiations, is to compel the Panamanians to give up the patriotic struggle for the unconditional recognition of Panama's sovereign rights to her territory and, consequently, to all her natural resources.

An analysis of Johnson's statement would clearly show these two intentions: to disorient our people and to paint a rosy picture of the imperialists' promises to our country.

The first intention is camouflaged by a form which confronts us with the choice between rejecting or accepting Johnson's statement. If we reject it, our position will not be understood by the patriotic sections of our people, who justly hold that we should not renounce the waterway, the benefits afforded us by nature. They would think that we are interested neither in the national development, in the solution of our economic problems, nor in the future of our country.

On the other hand, by accepting Johnson's statement so as to avoid creating the impression that we reject everything offered by imperialism, we would be, in effect, supporting a statement permeated exactly with the same imperialist spirit as the negotiations of 1903.

This is real blackmail designed to compel us either to antagonize the broad patriotic sectors which regard Panama's sovereignty as indispensable for the solution of the country's economic problems, or to capitulate and approve of statements behind which, as we shall see, are concealed the selfish interests of U.S. imperialism.

Exposure of the predatory imperialist essence of the second intention certainly calls for a more penetrating analysis of Johnson's statement. That statement holds out the prospect of the canal being returned in due course and the possibility of a new canal being built which will bring hundreds of millions of dollars to our country. We cannot fail to reckon with the effect such a promise may have on our people, who have been repeatedly robbed and who have been driven to desperation by economic hardships. And although the Panamanians are already beginning to suspect the motives of their imperialist enemies, they cannot help cherishing illusions, and this blinds them to the real essence of Johnson's statement.

The imperialists, aware of this, are trying to weaken the fighting spirit of our people, contain and isolate the patriotic movement, and sow confusion and doubt in the popular movement striving for the restoration of sovereignty and the restitution of the canal, our chief wealth.

We must thoroughly analyze all the propositions of Johnson's statement in order to expose the real essence of the seeming concessions made by the United States, and to show that this is merely a new ruse designed to guarantee the United States' continued monopoly use of the benefits accruing from the canal. That is why we say that Johnson's statement was made from the same old stand, which is to preserve the monopoly on the advantages of our geographical position. We maintain that the United States pursues political aims: to prevent a new national outburst on the scale of January 1964, to prevent a political crisis of the oligarchy which would bring about changes in Panama that would compel the United States to negotiate with a free, and not an enslaved country.

Situated at a junction of major sea lanes, Panama occupies a position of great economic importance which for several centuries has determined its development and the formation of our nationhood.

International agreements of an imperialist nature have given the U.S. government monopoly control of this vital economic lever. Under the present conditions should Panama decide to build a new canal by its own forces or with the help of a suitable partner, she would be unable to do so by virtue of the rights the United States enjoys under the 1903 treaty.

We do not find a renunciation of this privilege in Johnson's statement. In raising the question of building a new canal, Johnson proceeds exclusively from the interests of the United States, completely disregarding the interests of the country on whose territory the canal would be built.

The imperialist arrogance displayed by the U.S. President is nothing but a modern version of the equally arrogant attitude of another U.S. President, Theodore Roosevelt, who boasted that he had taken Panama.

The decisive issue for us is the monopoly utilization by the United States of the advantages of our geographical position, which is essentially an expression of the imperialist principle of the conquest and colonization of our country. All other realities affecting our people and restricting our freedom are a consequence of this principle. And there can be no talk of ridding our country of imperialist oppression so long as this principle remains in force.

An analysis of Johnson's statement shows that the U.S. President is seeking to conceal the real meaning of the article of the 1903 treaty granting the United States the use in perpetuity of the canal and the ten-mile wide canal zone when he says that this perpetual use will end, with the return of the canal zone as the first step and the subsequent return of the canal itself.

If we examine Article 5 of the treaty we will see that the provision on perpetual use is absolutely unconditional. It gives the United States monopoly use not only of the existing canal but also of the geographical position of our country which, being situated on a very narrow isthmus, offers several sites for canals or land routes between the two oceans.

By proposing to replace the existing right of perpetual possession of the canal and its zone with rights to another zone and to build an ocean-level canal, the U.S. President merely modifies the concept of perpetual use: in exchange for the renunciation of the perpetual right to the present zone he demands the guaranteed right to the continued monopoly use of our geographical position.

As we see, the United States has no intention of relinquishing the possibility of continuing to deprive us of our principal wealth, of keeping us as its colony, trampling upon our national pride and maintaining its hegemony over us. This is the main point of the current negotiations. In such conditions it is impossible to reach a solution that would accord with the aspirations of our people, and the firm determination of our workers, peasants and young patriots to win freedom for our country.

It becomes clear from a comparison of Johnson's statement with the inordinately optimistic statement of Panamanian President Marcos Robles which followed it that there is nothing accidental about both statements appearing on the eve of the anniversary of the January 9 events, that they were, in fact, so timed in the interests of certain political forces in Panama. Indeed, the haste with which the Panamanian government launched the series of meetings that preceded the negotiations and proceeded to iron out some difficulties that had arisen in the course of the talks was indicative of its desire to prepare the ground for the publication of a statement that would proclaim victory and thus restore the prestige the government had lost after a few months in office.

Even those who do not know these details can see the discrepancy between the two statements. The Panamanian President's statement is a deliberately one-sided interpretation of the statement by Johnson. It does not examine everything the U.S. President really said.

Significantly, it says nothing about the proposal to build a new canal and does not even mention the broad hints the United States made concerning the establishment of new military bases on our territory. Yet these are the conditions the U.S. President lays down for negotiating a new treaty.

It is this that constitutes the essence of Johnson's statement, but the President of Panama passes over it in silence in order to claim a victory over the United States and the alleged renunciation by the U.S. President of imperialist aspirations.

Such are the positions from which negotiations with the North Americans are conducted. These positions can in no way guarantee respect for the interests of our country. More than that: what is being done today for propaganda and political purposes can tomorrow become the real spirit of the negotiations, and there will appear a new draft treaty under which Panama will again cede her right to the advantages of her geographical position.

Needless to say, today, when we are no longer a province of Colombia, when we have outgrown the 1903 concept of independence and when our national consciousness has matured, our people cannot accept a new treaty renouncing our sovereign rights to our territory and our principal natural wealth.

The actions of our people show clearly what their attitude will be when they are confronted with a new imperialist weapon, a new treaty concluded from the positions of capitulations and submission to U.S. imperialism.

At present one cannot yet say definitely what turn developments will take. The negotiations have revealed a clash of interests. We need not dwell on the interests of U.S. imperialism. But it should be remembered that the different classes of Panama also have different interests.

There are some groups in Panama which, by virtue of their contact with U.S. imperialism, will do their utmost to keep us under U.S. patronage, which is the source of their wealth and high profits. These groups can betray our people.

But there are classes, such as the emergent national bourgeoisie, the petty bourgeoisie, the working class and the peasantry, which derive no benefits from this patronage, but which, on the contrary, are experiencing difficulties just because of the presence of the imperialists in our country. These classes are at one in their striving for the independence of their country. But the interests of these classes, which we call patriotic, and the motives uniting them in the struggle, are not the same.

The national bourgeoisie wants the return of all our national wealth in order to have a stable domestic market and the possibility of developing bourgeois exploitation in our country. The working class is interested in the restitution of all our resources as a means of improving the conditions of all the exploited classes by making it possible to expand production, create the necessary social wealth and thereby promote social progress towards the supreme goal, the abolition of exploitation of man by man.

Likewise, despite the class differences, the interests of the peasantry and other exploited classes cannot be realized without the national liberation of our country.

Since the Panamanian negotiators represent a definite class they cannot properly defend the interests of the other classes, interests which unite our people in their struggle for national emancipation.

They represent essentially the interests of the oligarchy. They have not taken counsel with the people, with the true patriots who have made the negotiations possible. Worse still, the Panama government agreed to secret talks, conducted behind the backs of the people.

The negotiations are unpopular and do not express the genuine interests of Panama not only because of the narrow class interests of the Panama negotiators, but also because of the form in which they are conducted. Under these circumstances, inasmuch as the political views of the masses are changing and those in power are finding themselves in ever greater isolation, can the negotiations be considered final if they are conducted by representatives of the oligarchy behind the back of the people?

In our opinion, the negotiations have reached a stage when attempts are being made to consolidate the political power of the oligarchy in our country in order to safeguard the interests of U.S. imperialism.

This means that public pressure, mobilization of the masses to struggle against the position of the oligarchy, and the definition and clarification of the position of the people can have a decisive influence on the negotiations and lend them a truly historical significance.

As we have said, in this struggle we must take a principled stand reflecting the genuine national interest, the true will of our people, their yearning to be free, to take their destiny into their own hands. This stand accords with the Panamanians' right to their own territory and all its economic resources. Such is the real meaning of the concept of sovereignty.

And when we speak of restoring our sovereignty we mean that there should be only one government, one language, one culture and one flag on our territory, and that the Panamanians alone should be the masters of their territory and all its natural resources.

Only if we adopt this principled stand will we be able to recover everything that has been taken away from us.

Only if we proceed from this principle can we demand the return of the canal zone.

We do not object to the canal passing through our territory. The entire history of our country's development is associated with the canal. Indeed, we owe our existence as a nation to the canal. It is natural, therefore, that we should want the waterway to remain on our territory.

But if tomorrow our people, in the exercise of their sovereignty, decide to close the canal, it will be their inalienable right to do so, and it is not for the United States to decide unilaterally whether Panama should build a new canal, continue to operate the old one, or be left without any canal at all by closing the old canal. The decision rests with the people of Panama alone, by virtue of their sovereign right.

It follows from this that it is necessary to put an end to the old policy, to the spirit of the 1903 treaty which granted the United States monopoly use of our geographical position. Only after regaining our sovereignty will we be able to decide what to do, to demand the return of the canal zone, to decide whether a new canal should be built and whether we should build it alone or with outside assistance, to ensure that our national wealth—precisely because it is national—should serve first of all our own people and, then, if possible, other peoples as well.

The historical mission of the present generation is to make us a sovereign nation possessing a sense of dignity—such is the behest of our forebears. The patriots of today should concentrate on this historic task bequeathed us by the patriots of the past. Let us not lower the banner. It is the duty of our people to raise it higher than ever before.

Therefore, the negotiating position which this patriotic principle obliges our genuine representatives to adopt should be as follows: the treaty of 1903 should be abrogated, and with it, all clauses providing for use in perpetuity, so that the Panamanians should be able to decide their own destiny.

This means that there can be no talks on any new treaty on another canal until we secure the abolition of this ignominious clause, including the United States' perpetual monopoly on our geographical position, i.e., on all ocean-to-ocean routes passing through the isthmus.

There can be no talks, no discussion on any new canal until Panama regains her sovereignty.

We cannot agree to have any negotiations as long as the article on perpetual use remains in force, for it is precisely our people's determination to get rid of any imperialist control, to reject any enslaving terms, especially for negotiations, that has inspired them to heroic struggle against the North American colossus.

We realize that it will be a long struggle, that much suffering still lies ahead, that our people should be prepared to repel any aggression and acts of violence which may be organized by imperialism and eagerly executed by its local agents. But we have already given sufficient proof of our national consciousness, and of our firm resolve to fight. We are a small country, and our strongest weapon is the militancy we shall demonstrate before the whole world, our heroism which is winning the sympathies of people the world over.

The socialist countries, where class exploitation has been abolished and where the working class is in power; the countries whose peoples are casting off the yoke of imperialism; the millions of people throughout the world fighting for peace; the millions of people rising against any oppression—they all are on our side, they all are our reliable allies.

In the patriotic struggle attracting the attention of all the peoples, the working class, the peasantry, the professionals from among the middle strata, the shop-keepers, the patriotically-minded national bourgeoisie, the students, who are playing the leading role, and honest intellectuals comprise the core of our forces, of our people who are called upon to carry on the fight to a victorious finish, to realize the great ideals of freedom and justice.

The future belongs to us. Those who vacillate, who do not dare to demand that the imperialists restore our rights, who believe in the policy of hypocrisy an dsubservience, will be swept aside by the irresistivle stream of our people's struggle for liberation. There is no force in the world which could shake our resolve to become a free country.

We are a nation. We have become a nation as a result of historical development, and since nobody can check historical development, any one who comes out against our people, however powerful the force he may represent, will be defeated when confronted with our people's will to free their country from the yoke of North American imperialism.

THE FIGHT FOR CO-MANAGEMENT*

In the countries of developed capitalism, the task of the labor movement is to set by stages socialist objectives whose attainment will reduce and limit monopoly power, strengthen the positions of authority held by the working class and extend the scope of democracy. Among these objectives are nationalization of the key branches of the economy, which will force big capital out of them, the fight for the working people's participation in the management of all public affairs, and abolition of the exclusive right to decide exercised by Austrian big capital and the foreign monopolies, an objective to be achieved through industrial and economic co-management by the workers.

The capitalists have become superfluous in large-scale social production. Production management has long since been taken over by managers. It is the workers and other employees who are the true producers.

But the capitalists, who own the means of production, have the exclusive right to decide in industry. They pocket the profits, which are growing enormously as a result of the far-reaching technological revolution and the rapid concentration of large enterprises. As for the working people, who create social wealth, they have no say in deciding what should be produced, how the product should be sold, or what should become of returns. While they constitute the majority of the population they are not the managing class. By fighting for the abolition of an economic system based on gain, they can win the right to become a class co-managing industry and economy.

At a time when the industrial, professional and office workers make up the overwhelming majority of the population — (over 70 per cent of the gainfully employed in the case of Austria) — the right to co-management should be seen as elementary.

However, the demand for co-management is bound up with the struggle for the most favorable growth of the economy with a view to ensuring full employment, giving the working people a greater share in economic benefits, precluding price increases, protecting and expanding the nationalized sector, countering the penetration of foreign capital, preventing subservience of the Austrian economy to any supra-national institutions, such as the EEC, and promptly remedying its structural weaknesses. It follows that co-management by the workers and other employees is in their class interests and in the national interests of Austria.

1. WHAT DO WE MEAN BY CO-MANAGEMENT?

The fight for co-management is part of the fight to renovate democracy, to introduce new, democratic forms and methods of economic management and political government.

Co-management, which we want to achieve, should be based on the actual right to control, protest, and participate in making decisions in respect of all economic, financial and investment policy matters pursued at industrial level or higher up. At the present stage, it is aimed at pushing back monopoly power and winning positions of authority for the working people.

Gains in this struggle will not by themselves bring the state under the social control of the working class, but they will change the alignment of class forces within the capitalist state. They will limit monopoly power and resources, enhance the prestige and increase the political weight of the working class in the life of society, hasten the isolation of the reactionary social groups, and make the cooperation of the progressive forces easier.

Hence the fight for co-management is an important condition for the working class to effect a peaceful transition to socialism.

The struggle of the working class involves every sphere of social life. It no longer confines itself, even in the case of trade union actions, to laying greater emphasis on the traditional demand for better living and working conditions and for a fairer social policy. Without detracting from the great importance of these actions, the fight for co-management should aim at extending the influence of the working class to spheres which so far have been under the exclusive control of the employer or his representatives. Consequently, it is a question of limiting the real power in the economic field necessarily imply lesser rights for the employers. One is impossible without the other.

That is why the fight for co-management is also a part and a form of class struggle. Co-management and social partnership are diametrically opposite concepts.

Gains in the fight for co-management will depend on the development of united mass actions in support of this demand and on the trade unions exercising autonomy and independence also in the sphere of their traditional objectives. To renounce trade union action (in favor of, say, "top-level" talks) or the demand for higher wages (in favor of, say, "economic co-responsibility") means undermining the struggle and discrediting the idea of co-management.

2. THE NEED AND POSSIBILITY OF CO-MANAGEMENT

The impetuous progress of science and technology is leading to an unprecedented growth of means of production. The use of new means of production is increasing the role of the working people in production and economy.

Capitalist relations of production are coming — even in the conditions of a sustainedly favorable economic situation — into an increasingly deep-going conflict with the modern productive forces. In deciding on the introduction of new techniques, it is considerations of profit and cartel agreements that prevail. Furthermore, the full use of the modern productive forces for rapid and planned economic progress is often handicapped. The urge for a rapid increase in profits blocks the pursuit of a long-range research policy, and technological progress is often slowed down. Competition and failure to plan investments in terms of the economy as a whole lead to abortive investment, imbalances in economic pattern, excessive capacities, and economic reverses. Even when major slumps are avoided, as they have been so far, uncertainty persists — the workers and other employees are constantly threatened with the loss of work places, and a deterioration of social conditions. A consumer demand that is questionable from the humanist and social points of view is brought into being and the durability of the commodities produced deliberately reduced in an effort to increase sales and keep the economy in full swing. Corruption and squandering reach unprecedented proportions while vast areas of the world starve and whole regions in industrially developed countries remain in a distressed state. The vital needs of individuals, but above all of the community (schools, hospitals, public transport) remain unsatisfied.

True, this contradiction between relations of production and productive forces has not taken the dramatic economic and political forms typical of the First Republic. But it finds a clear expression in diverse forms of squandering in the production sphere, on the one hand, and in the fact that the state is playing an increasing role as a regulator and a buyer, on the other. Economic and political considerations, changes in the national and international alignment of class forces, the existence of the socialist community, and the achievements of the liberation struggle in the colonies compel the employers and the state to pursue a policy of intervention and regulation aimed at ensuring steady economic growth, which are contrary to traditional capitalist economic thinking. Nevertheless, profit and competition interests impose themselves again and again.

That is why, in seeking steady economic growth with full employment and an improving standard of living, long-range planning of the entire economy is indispensable.

To prevent Austria from lagging behind in science and technology, the state must spend more and more on scientific and technological investigations. The state would thus visibly assume responsibility for the spiritual and material shaping of the future and strip "free enterprise" of its aura of vehicle of the creative forces of society.

This expresses itself, first of all, in nationalization, which in Austria was effected in 1946-47, on a scale hardly paralleled in any other capitalist country. The nationalization of the whole of heavy industry and of major electrical and mechanical engineering plants restricted the Austrian bourgeoisie's direct control of these industries and weakened the bourgeoisie.

In these conflicting circumstances, the working people have new opportunities and new tasks. They can and must wage a resolute mass struggle to influence every sphere of economic management in order to extend democracy and bring economic planning into line with democratic and national objectives. These objectives are "intermediate alternatives" within the framework of the controversy over the great historical alternatives: the anarchic economy of gain or a socialist, planned economy.

The Austrian working class has a powerful and united class organization, the Association of Austrian Trade Unions (AATU), through which it can exert considerable influence on all of the nation's major economic and political decisions. This is conditional on complete autonomy and independence of the AATU, which should bring its strength to bear in full measure.

3. CO-MANAGEMENT AND CO-RESPONSIBILITY

The demand for co-management is something new in the labor movement. There are those who fear that as a result of penetration into the employer's sphere of decision, we may slip into positions of the class enemy, into the ideology of social partnership we are combating. This fear is understandable and justified.

Managerial workers and trade union functionaries often voice the opinion that they do not need to worry about industrial management so long as the social system remains capitalistic. To adopt this attitude would mean for us to shut our eyes to the new situation with its opportunities and requirements.

We must therefore begin and carry on the fight for co-management, safeguarding its content and aim against misunderstanding and misinterpretation.

To influence the decision of socio-political matters and matters concerning labor law does not in itself mean co-management. The aim is participation in the decision of all economic, financial and investment policy matters.

To hold certain positions in the government, in parliament or in the economic chambers does not amount to co-management. We must use these positions to uphold the interests of the working class in the above agencies against the ideology and practice of social partnership, by extending democracy and by enlisting the workers and other employees, or their production councils, in decision-making at industrial level or higher up.

Co-management does not mean having interests in common with the employers. The aim is to restrict the rights of the employers by extending the rights of the workers and other employees, to reduce the power of the employers by winning for the workers positions of authority in the control of plants and the economy as a whole. Today the working people bear the full burden of the abortive investments of their employers. Our aim is to participate in deciding on the planning and use of investments, to be based on a long-range investment plan drawn up by the trade unions and workers' chambers. The workers should share responsibility for economic decisions they will actually have taken part in making.

Co-management does not mean co-responsibility for the profits and well-being of the employer. It means exerting direct influence on our country's economic, technological and political development, for which we have always felt responsible.

Co-management does not mean conciliation with capitalism. The goal is still to overcome capitalism and establish a socialist socio-economic system under which the working class will not merely participate in management but will, in common with all the other working people. decisively influence the economy and social life — an influence which it has long been entitled to by virtue of its numerical strength and social standing.

4. THE TASKS IN THE FIGHT FOR CO-MANAGEMENT

In the special conditions following World War I the Austrian working class succeeded in securing the enactment of a series of social laws and decrees on labor. In the special conditions following World War II, it secured the extension of many of these gains. Today Austria has a useful law on production councils, and social security in our country is exemplary in many respects, although a number of capitalist countries have in late years outstripped us in several fields.

All these achievements have restricted the employers' right to make decisions. But this applies only to social questions and legal questions concerning labor (dismissal, transfer, piece-work, observance of collective agreements, and so on). As regards economic matters, co-management by the employees is virtually non-existent.

True, the production council has opportunities of influencing decisions, which it often makes little use of. But this should not make us overlook the fact that the employers' point of view wins the upper hand in all matters of importance because he is the "master of the house." This is why the fight for participation in the decision of all economic, financial and investment policy matters is not a fight for the extension of existing rights but for new rights for the working class.

The task is to win and actually exercise the right to participate in the decision of everyday social questions in the most diverse forms, which are continuously developing and changing. Needless to say we also want our struggle to result in a definite legislative and legal confirmation of our right to co-management.

We can and must establish broad unity of action in the fight for co-management. The Vienna program of the Socialist Party of Austria, adopted in 1958, calls for the realization of democracy through "self-government within the small area," and hence for "the working people's right to co-management in industry." The Fifth Federal Congress of the AATU demanded "the right of the workers to participate in making all economic and technological decisions at industrial level and higher up." The special significance of this formulation is that it attaches equal importance to co-management at industrial level and higher up, and rejects all those concepts which would confine co-management to top executives.

At the industrial level, it is primarily the production councils that will participate in management. Their contacts with and commitments to the staffs would have to be considerably extended.

At the same time, however, there is a need for co-management bodies at higher level, provided they do not restrict the freedom of action and the autonomy of the working class and its organizations. In this respect we favor realization of the demand unanimously approved by the Third Federal Congress of the AATU for "the establishment by the chambers and the AATU, at provincial and Federal level, of joint institutions that will work out proposals and advise public associations on economic matters."

The task of the trade unions and workers' chambers will be autonomously and in collaboration with the production councils of the various branches to work out a comprehensive economic concept, coordinate co-management through the production councils within the bounds of the concept, and if necessary, give appropriate support to the production councils seeking the realization of their proposals, for it is impossible to achieve the main goal of co-management — pushing back big capital and the cartels — by co-management at industrial level only.

Conversely, a trade union economic concept which is in the interest of the workers and other employees and of the country as a whole cannot be put through against the employers' profit interests unless the trade union and the workers' chamber maintain the closest contact with the production councils and the workers and other employees at the various plants and are fully supported by them.

The unlimited right to participate in the discussion and decision of various questions in the trade unions, and the development of the broadest possible trade union democracy are an important precondition for the militancy of the workers and other employees and of their production councils to come into full play.

The industrial, professional and office workers are the only force which can counter the thinking of the employers or the employer class, aimed solely at making profit, with concepts meeting the national interests of Austria and the economic interests of the vast majority of its population. They are also the only force which can put these concepts into effect against the resistance of the empioyers.

The trade unions will have to provide the production councils with the necessary knowledge through appropriate instruction, information, technical advice, and forums, which is not to say that all production councillors must become economic experts. Wherever the class view is the point of departure and the economic concept of the trade union the guide, every production councillor drawing on the collective knowledge of his fellow-workers versed in trade and technology will be able, by agreement with the trade union concerned, to take more correct decisions on the economic problems of his enterprise than the employer, whose sole concern is profit.

The present fight for co-management is directed primarily against the positions of big capital, particularly in the key industries and insurance companies. This fight would benefit in decisive measure from the workers and other employees at nationalized plants, where big capital also has its representatives, acquiring the right to co-management, for the objective and subjective conditions there are more favorable than anywhere else. The nationalized sector of our economy embraces a large number of key industries. The power of big capital there is fairly limited, and the workers and other employees regard them as "their own" in greater measure than elsewhere. In the nationalized sector, the lack of comprehensive planning and coordination of production, investment and research is considered utterly absurd and unaccountable. We therefore insist on the exclusion of all representatives of private capital from the management of the nationalized plants and banks, and on increased representation of the working people in the supervisory councils and directorates of the plant.

It follows that it is first and foremost in the nationalized sector that we must demand full co-management by the production councils. It is there that we must make it an object of our present struggle. Gains in this sector would greatly benefit the fight for co-management in the private sector. But the fight for co-management is most intimately linked with the fight for the protection and extension of the nationalized industries. Consequently, to fight for co-management connotes defending national interests, independence and neutrality.

Among other things, we want greater powers for the production councils. We want them to be fully informed of the economic condition of the enterprise, and to be able to object when it is a question of putting up prices, admitting foreign capital, or accepting foreign credits and licences.

We call for the production councils' participation in making decisions on the use of the returns of the enterprises, and above all on investments, which should be made with due regard to national economic expediency and with a view to guaranteeing full employment. We want the production councils to have a say in the drawing up of output plans.

We insist on enabling the workers and other employees to exert decisive influence on the credit policy of the banks, particularly the big nationalized banks, and hence to have a decisive say in the management of the state-owned enterprises of these banks.

To prevent the loss of work places as a result of the introduction of new machinery (automation), the employers should be bound to come to terms with the production councils before introducing methods and plant increasing labor productivity.

Labor power can be taken on or discharged only with the consent of the production council, which should have the right to make proposals and raise objections when appointments to executive jobs are under discussion.

To prevent price increases, the production councils should be entitled to exercise control over profits (they must have the opportunity to look into price and rate calculations in collaboration with experts from the trade unions and workers' chambers).

We demand the prohibition of all cartels and all agreements on prices. We insist on using the consumers' associations as a factor keeping prices down, on rendering the children of workers and other employees ample assistance in receiving occupational training, as well as a secondary or higher education, on extending the powers of the elected bodies in terms of the communes, districts, provinces and the republic.

The industrial, professional and office workers are the greatest force of society. Our task is to defend and extend democracy and to ensure that the working people participate in economic management. To accomplish it, we must carry out resolute class battles and mass actions in cooperation with Socialist, Christian and non-party workers and other employees.

FOR A NEW INITIATIVE OF THE PEACE FORCES

RESOLUTION* OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE ITALIAN COMMUNIST PARTY

The Central Committee of the Italian Communist Party has approved Comrade Berlinguer's report on the problems of the struggle for peace and the unity of the world Communist movement.

The continued U.S. acts of aggression in Vietnam, which seriously threaten an escalation of the conflict, have dangerously aggravated the internaional situation, generally characterized by a halt in the process of relaxation. To check this negative trend and give fresh impetus to a deep-going change in the international situation in the spirit of peaceful coexistence, it is necessary resolutely to revive the initiative of the peace forces aimed at rallying the working classes and the peoples, who invariably strive for national independence, social emancipation and peace, on the basis of widespread and manifold actions. In these circumstances, it is more important for the Communist movement than ever before to restore unity of action in the struggle against imperialism, to encourage discussions and the search for solutions, and thus provide conditions for a new and more profound unity.

In this international situation, complicated by the aggravation of the conflict in Vietnam, the passive and inert foreign policy of the Center-Left government, and its lack of initiative, have proved incapable of contributing to negotiation, international detente, and the establishment of new relations of cooperation with the peoples fighting for independence. Moreover, it has given further proof that it is subservient to the general interests of U.S. imperialism. Nor has the participation of the Italian Socialist Party in the government moderated this subservience. Thus, as regards the raising of international problems, an independent role and peaceful initiative on the part of Italy in this field, the policy of the Center Left and the present government coalition demonstrates its failure and its crisis.

Three basic changes should take place in Italy's foreign policy: (1) renunciation of the commitment to participate in the atomic armament of NATO in any form, opposition to the atomic rearmament of Germany, and promotion of a European security system; (2) going beyond the bounds of the Common Market and "Little

*L'Unità, February 20, 1965

Europe" to establish a democratic system of economic and political relations between all European countries; (3) development of relations with the third world, such as would renounce all forms of colonialism and neo-colonialism and would be based on strict recognition of and respect for the economic and political independence of every country, beginning with the recognition of People's China as an act of restoration of the universal character of the United Nations provided for by its Character adopted in San Francisco.

The CC, ICP calls on Party organizations to do all in their power to encourage united popular actions which would reflect the present demand for a peaceful settlement of the conflict in Vietnam in keeping with the Geneva agreement of 1954 and ultimately develop into a permanent movement, with the widespread participation of the working-class, for an overall revision of Italian foreign policy. Such changes are also a condition for the effective development of the entire struggle for our country's shift to the left. This is necessary in order to replace the present Center Left government by a government capable of lending Italy's policy a new character in both domestic and international affairs, whose close interconnection today has a direct effect on our economy and is manifested in the obstacles which agreements between Italian and foreign monopolies raise to the solution of the country's economic difficulties.

In the interests of the unity of the international Communist movement, the CC, ICP instructs the leadership to act, in its future contacts and meetings with other Communist and Worker's parties, on the basis of the line reaffirmed by Comrade Berlinguer's report and by the debate at this meeting.

APPEAL* OF THE CC ICP

Workers, working people,

Our country is passing through a serious crisis of its labor system and of its economy. A dangerous offensive is going on against employment, against living and working conditions, against the trade union and democratic rights of the working people. Dismissals and curtailment of working hours, denial of employment to young people, the reduction of the wages total, and a steadily growing cost of living — this is the way the monopolies have chosen to make the working people shoulder the burden of the crisis again. Such is the plan of the big industrialists, who want to preserve and increase their profits, and to expand production while reducing employment and wages.

to cope with the economic difficulties experienced by Italy, to work out and implement necessary measures for a rise in production. It insisted on containing and blocking budget expenditures, investments and public consumption: it assisted in freezing wages, and refused even a niggardly increase in pensions. Thereby it helped bring about stagnation and crisis in production and lowered employment and the demand for labor power, restoring a dangerous phenomenon—unemployment.

This situation can and must be remedied. The prospect the monopolies are out to impose on the Italian people can be rejected. This calls for a rapid change in the economic policy. The state should mobilize all the forces of the country. All resources and reserves should be used, but used correctly. A bold policy of expenditure is needed — bold chiefly because it should take into consideration the main requirements of democratic programmaking. Large allocations should be made without delay for basic productive investments. It is necessary to combat the squandering of public funds and discontinue all support for parasitic elements. Consequently, more funds should be allocated directly for public works, provided Law No. 167* is applied more extensively and new legislation is sought on urban development ruling out land profiteering. Greater allocations should be made for agriculture, transport, social security, education, but all this should be done on the basis of an agrarian reform, a reform of the railways and public transport, the reorganization of pensioning and medical assistance, and the democratic development of education. It is necessary that production of the means of production should be developed at state-owned enterprises. This work should be conducted with the help of the democratic forces active in the regional and local self-government bodies, and not through the old or new, unwieldy bureaucratic machinery.

This new policy may succeed. The working people and their vanguard should form a broad united front, launched an extensive struggle combining the immediate and long-range objectives with the general mobilization of public opinion in order to foil the plans of the monopolies and ensure the pursuit of a new policy. The decisive role should be played by the working class. To resist the onslaught of the employers, it should uphold demands directed against the consequences of the current transformations and reorganizations, going over from the necessary particular demands on narrow points to broader, more general ones. It should strengthen the trade unions, promoting, from factory level upwards, the democratic life of the trade union and Party organizations.

*This law enables municipal councils to combat land profiteering and control urban development.—Ed.

The situation brooks no temporizing or delay. One should not cherish the illusion that no government crisis is needed to bring about a policy change and Italy's pledge to act in the interests of peace, which are closely connected with the possibilities for the democratic development of the Italian economy.

This is the time for everyone to assume a share of the responsibility. Both the gains bought at the price of many years of strenuous struggle by the working people and the very future of our country are at stake.

Workers, working people,

The Communist Party calls upon you to unite and fight in defense of your work and your future. The Communist Party has already raised in Parliament the question of the economic situation and of the measures to be adopted at once. It has taken steps to have a new debate held in the Chamber of Deputies next week.

The whole country, all enterprises, and all the working people should give a massive and energetic response by joining in this great, decisive struggle.

Central Committee,
Italian Communist Party

LAST WEEK'S EVENTS

STATEMENT BY THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF SPAIN

An opposition movement unprecedented in scale is developing in our country. Started by the Workers' Committees, who called powerful strikes and demonstrations in various parts of the country, it is being continued by the Free Assemblies of students, who have drawn all the Spanish universities into a protest action by boldly demonstrating in the streets. A considerable section of the academic staffs has joined the students while the rest waver. The number of faculty members who remain firm in their allegiance to the regime is small. The opposition movement has the active sympathy of a substantial number of churchmen. It brings a favorable response from the broadest sections of national opinion. This is why, under a dictatorship such as is oppressing Spain, we have in recent weeks seen the opposition movement spread so wide despite threats from the police and the courts.

The attempt to represent the political actions taking place in our country as a product of the activity of "certain groups of agitators" can comfort only the conservative and feeble-minded partisans of the present cryingly anachronistic social order. Every sensible person realizes that when tens of thousands of workers and students accompanied by faculty members and priests go into the streets to express their discontent, it is because they have no choice, because they are at the end of their tether, because the opposition to the regime has already become a national attitude. The real extremists who shut themselves off from the general sentiment, clinging to positions contrary to the wishes of the country, are those who persist in backing with might and main a dictatorship from which the whole of Spain is dissociating itself.

The people's fight has already yielded some important results. But let there be no illusions; it is only by developing and extending this fight, and by carrying it to still more widespread and militant actions, that the demands of the various groups taking part in it can be really met.

There can be no real parley with spokesmen of the dictatorship. Compromises with the regime are out of the question. There is only one way, that of struggle for the complete satisfaction of popular and national demands.

In these circumstances, the way to end the dictatorship by peaceful means, sparing Spain the hazard of a new civil war, is to pursue this fight until it grows into a powerful nation-wide strike, with every segment of the population unequivocally rejecting and condemning the regime, and demanding the establishment of a democratic system.

That strike would be truly nation-wide; it would be launched by the working people, whose example would show the way to other classes and social strata opposed to Franco. It would be joined in by peasants, students and faculty members, clerks and officials, professional people, merchants and industrialists, or, in other words, by the population at large.

The actions of the workers, students, academic personnel, and priests show clearly that a nation-wide strike is not only possible but is a logical prospect of the whole opposition movement, which is spreading in the country. Such actions are in themselves a most important part of preparations for a nation-wide strike. The coordination which has developed spontaneously between various sections should be consciously and resolutely encouraged and continued by representatives of these circles.

While dialogue with the dictatorship is impossible, there is an imperative need to develop the dialogue between all national forces which want to find a satisfactory solution to the present crisis. We Communists consider that no group should be excluded from this dialogue, whatever its past policy, provided it realizes that it is impossible to put up with the present state of affairs and is agreeable to the free exercise of democracy. We take this open position because we believe that no one should be denied the opportunity to contribute to and participate in shaping the future. Besides, it is a necessary condition for this future not to be marred by violence and bloodshed. This position is as sincere as our resolve to fight to the finish by these peaceful means if experience shows that they are possible, or by other means if our open position is not responded to—to fight for the elimination of the dictatorship, the establishment of democracy, and the solution of the manifold and serious problems facing Spain.

We Communist consider that the dialogue should be open to spokesmen of the Army. The fight against the dictatorship and preparations for a nation-wide strike are not directed against the Army or the forces of Public Order as such. The action of the latter against the demonstrations, and above all the extremely brutal character it assumed in some cases, may give rise to dangerous situations characterized by violence. Members of the forces of Public Order should fraternize with the people because they owe the improvements which have come about in their economic condition (still unsatisfactory) since 1962 to actions by the workers and the people generally, which the Government orders them to suppress. They should realize that their future is linked with Spain, not with the regime.

The Communist Party considers that this is the time to establish contact between different political forces, social strata and representatives of organizations in order to clear the ground for a meeting or a series of meetings that would search for points of agreement likely to promote the solution of the present national crisis. The dialogue should be straightforward and should concern problems which cannot be disregarded any longer. We will do well to begin examining these problems in time so as not to find ourselves overnight in a situation in which they will have become even more pressing and harder to solve.

At present Spain is faced with problems — including problems of a general political character—that call for prompt solution. First among them is that of agreement on an action or actions that could lead to the elimination of the dictatorship as early as possible.

As regards steps that can lead the country to normalcy, a complete amnesty is needed, such as would put an end to all charges linked to the war and subsequent political and public activities. The whole country thinks this measure a necessary beginning of a stage of democracy and civic activity. Spain has had more than enough of repression and persecution.

It is necesary to restore the right to strike and trade union freedom, and to put the trade unions and their operation in the hands of the Workers' Committees, which should be recognized as the true spokesmen of the working people until the latter freely decide otherwise. It is also necessary to recognize the free and democratic organization of the students.

It is necessary to authorize the activity of political parties and establish freedom of association, assembly, the press and demonstration.

At the same time it is necessary to prepare, within a reasonably short time, elections to a Constituent Assembly on the principle of proportional representation.

Catalonia and the Basque country must regain their autonomous freedoms, and Galicia must acquire autonomy.

What government could tackle these tasks with popular and national support? This is the time for a thorough examination of the problem. We Communists are ready to deal with it in cooperation with other forces, and to find a proper and timely solution to it.

Along with these political problems there are acute problems of an economic or social character:

—effective restoration of the eight-hour day, and a minimum wage in keeping with the cost of living, such as the Workers' Committee demand;

—the establishment of a sliding wage scale and a one-month paid holiday; equal rights and opportunities for women, not merely on paper but in practice;

—readjustment of salaries according to the increase in the cost of living and to the importance of the post held;

—a deep-going agrarian reform putting an end to latifundia, giving the land to those who till it, and solving the problem of small holdings through the development and protection of a genuine system of agricultural cooperatives;

—an agrarian policy that will give the countryside the attention it needs to stop being the stepchild of the Spanish economy;

—restriction of monopoly power by nationalizing banking and credits, the basic raw material sources and the monopoly industries, accompanied by a policy of respect and protection for and assistance to commerce and non-monopoly industry;

—a cultural and social reform of the university and of education in general;

On the international scene, Spain must return to its traditional neutrality; it must dissociate itself from the policy of military blocs, maintain commercial and other relations with all countries irrespective of their social system, and uphold its national interests and world peace.

Measures of this nature are, in fact, prerequisites for Spain to enter a period of all-round economic development on modern lines, without insurmountable contradictions and excessive imbalances.

The Communist Party believes that a sequence should be established in the solution of these problems, which should be solved one by one. However, it is already necessary that the forces which propose to assume responsibility for the future should consciously tackle them even now.

We Communists are willing to examine these and other questions raised by other groups, in the most open-minded manner and with the greatest respect for other opinions.

Regarding problems which it may prove impossible to solve through the dialogue, we hold that the decisive say should be allowed to the spokesmen of the freely expressed will of the nation. We Communists will respect that decision, whatever its nature.

The Communist Party declares that the new stage in the nation's life which has to be ushered in should under no circumstances be either a continuation of the present regime or a restoration of the previous lawful regime. While negating the present, it must not be a revenge, a return to the past. It is necessary to build a new democratic system in harmony with the spirit and the problems of the present epoch, with due regard to the sentiments of the present-day generations, a system from which no one should be excluded a priori.

In urging a meeting of those who today may to a greater or lesser degree be regarded as representatives of the national forces responsible for shaping the future of Spain, we Communists must point out that the actions and struggles of the masses, of all sections of the population that are hard hit by the Franco regime, are the irreplaceable motive power of the changes which are occuring, or must occur, in the country.

The essential task is to continue developing and intensifying mass actions, to ensure that the masses express their democratic will in the streets with increasing force, that the number of protests, demonstrations, strikes and other actions grows, that the various forms of unity and organization—Workers' Committees, the Free Assemblies or delegations of students, peasant committees, women's and neighbors' committees — multiply and that there is more coordination in actions and struggles by the working people, students, intellectuals and other social groups. This is the way to hasten the provision of conditions for great national strikes, such as will announce the country's rejection of the dictatorship.

APPEAL OF CENTRAL COMMITTEE, SYRIAN COMMUNIST PARTY TO THE PEOPLE

MATERIALS OF THE SYRIAN COMMUNIST PARTY ON THE SITUATION IN THE COUNTRY

Workers, peasants, progressive intellectuals, small employers, our valiant people!

At the beginning of this year new decrees were promulgated nationalizing 115 companies, including most of the country's big industries, as well as a number of industries producing articles of prime necessity.

These decrees, issued for the good of the people, are of a profound progressive character since they enable the state sector to control industry and expand the base for Syria's development along the non-capitalist road. By abolishing the economic domination of the reactionary forces the decrees have thereby deprived them of the possibility of plundering the people and ruling the country in the interests of their own class.

The promulgation of these decrees is closely linked with the struggle taking place today between the two main trends in Syria and other Arab countries: the trend favoring nationalization, i.e., Syria's development along the non-capitalist path, and the reactionary trend favoring the country's development along the capitalist path which would mean profits for the imperialists, big capitalists and feudal lords at the expense of the people.

The decrees were endorsed and supported by such popular forces as the Communists and democrats. They were hailed by workers, peasants, progressive intellectuals and by all small employers. These sections of the people have expressed their readiness to do everything in their power to mak these decrees effective for they have seen that these decrees meet the demands and slogans for which they have made so many sacrifices.

Reactionary circles (the big capitalists, monopolists and feudal lords), however, and also the imperialists of the United States, Great Britain and the FRG are working hard to undermine the people's confidence in nationalization. They are carrying on agitation against socialism and social reforms, and are trying to cause chaos on the economic and political life of the country.

It is the duty of every honest citizen to work for nationalization and to expose any plot directed against it.

The Central Committee of the Syrian Communist Party declares, in the name of all Communists and their friends, that it welcomes and supports the nationalization decrees. The Central Committee believes that to make the decrees effective the following measures are essential:

1. Proper management of the nationalized enterprises, relying on people dedicated to nationalization.
2. Respect for the demands of the workers and to give them a bigger say in management and control.
3. Democratization of the trade unions and institutions of local government so that they express the will of the masses more broadly.
4. Freedom of speech and trade union rights for the workers.
5. Study of the conditions of the small producers and promotion of their interest.
6. Use of the funds received from the nationalized companies to expand the latter and also the state sector as a whole.

All these measures are important for the success of nationalization and its steady extension. It is likewise important to carry out other measures such as granting the people and all forces fighting for progress and socialism democratic liberties — freedom of speech, press and assembly; introducing an agrarian reform to benefit the peasants; strengthening the state sector (building fertilizer factories, a dam on the Euphrates, extracting oil, etc.); promoting solidarity with the progressive forces of the other Arab countries and friendship with the socialist camp, headed by the USSR. Such a policy would conform to the national interest and the hopes that nationalization will be successfully accomplished. It would enable Syria to make a big step forward along the path to socialism, would enhance the prestige of our country among the Arab countries and progressive mankind.

The Central Committee of the Syrian Communist Party calls on all progressive forces who uphold socialism (both in the government and outside) to unite to defend nationalization and other social and economic reforms. The cooperation of all these forces is a broad progressive national front is essential to frustrate the plans of the reactionaries and imperialism and pave the way for our country's progress and advance towards a happy future for its people.

Long live the solidarity of the progressive national forces fiighting against imperialism and reaction!

Long live the Syrian Arab people!

Forward to a socialist future!

TELEGRAM*

OF KHALED BAGDASH, GENERAL SECRETARY OF THE SYRIAN COMMUNIST PARTY, TO AMIN KHAFEZ, PRIME MINISTER OF THE SYRIAN ARAB REPUBLIC

"We welcome the progressive measures taken by you in the interests of the nation — nationalization decrees and decisions aimed at protecting our oil wealth against foreign monopolies.

"Spearheaded against imperialism and capitalism, these measures express the will of the people and correspond to the new spirit emerging in the Arab national-liberation movement, as well as to the dictates of our time — the time of transition from capitalism to socialism.

"The consistent implementation of these measures, while relying on the masses of workers and peasants and their creative initiatives and heeding the interests of small producers and shopkeepers, will consolidate our national independence and our sovereignty, open up broad vistas for further social progress, enhance the prestige of the Syrian Arab Republic and win it the sympathy of progressives everywhere.

"The realization of these major socio-economic changes and their further development will strengthen the role of the Syrian Arab people in the great struggle of the Arabs against imperialism and Zionism, for complete liberation and peace, and for Arab unity founded on the principles of fraternity and equality. These changes accord with the interests of the Arab people and their striving for democracy and socialism. The duty of all progressive national forces, then, is to combine their efforts in a united national front in order to defend these gains and safeguard them against the conspiracies of imperialism and reaction.

"In keeping with our ideals and our long struggle for socialism, and fulfilling our duty of sincere fighters for the complete national and social emancipation of our country, my comrades and I will exert every effort, together with all progressive forces striving for socialism, to consolidate these gains, carry them into effect and develop them further.

"With greetings and best wishes,

Khaled Bagdash

NATIONALIZATION DECREES IN SYRIA*

Y. Feisal

On January 2, 1965, the Syrian government promulgated laws on the nationalization of 115 industrial companies. The following should be said in this connection:

1. Twenty-one companies (with an aggregate capital of 111,700,-000 Syrian pounds and employing 5,580 workers) are nationalized completely. These companies produce sugar, glass, cement, etc., and have a capital ranging from £Syr. 2,000,000 to £Syr. 16,000,000 each.

2. Twenty-eight companies (with an aggregate capital of £Syr. 52,500,000 and employing 3,350 workers) are 90 per cent nationalized. They produce carpets, textiles, linen, canned goods, ceramics, etc. The capital of each ranges from 500,000 to 1,500,000 Syrian pounds.

3. Sixty-four companies are nationalized by only 75 per cent. Their capital is 42,600,000 Syrian pounds and they employ 2,850 workers. These companies manufacture dairy products, matches, rubber goods, etc.

Nationalization affected all large firms which have a monopoly on the production of food, clothing and other household necessities, as well as some middle-sized and even small companies. With regard to nationalizing small companies, it was subsequently announced that this was a mistake which would be corrected.

THE CAUSES OF NATIONALIZATION

Some people believe that the sole cause of nationalization is the poor financial position of the country, that nationalization is a reply to the conspiracy and has been conditioned by the desire to limit the outflow of capital from the country. Of course, their arguments should not be left out of account, but these are superficial, not basic causes.

The root cause of nationalization is the struggle between two trends of development — capitalist and non-capitalist — which is a sharp class struggle affecting also the governmental circles. It constitutes the main content of the political situation in Syria, explains the phenomena taking place in the Baath party and in the government, the changed relations between the forces of progress and reaction, and determines the alignment of social forces. The progressive forces (Communists and other supporters of socialism, the working class, the peasantry, small employers and the progressive intelligentsia, both civil and military) have realized that Syria's development along the capitalist way will bring it nowhere. They understand that the bourgeoisie is incapable of ensuring progress, that the capitalist road is associated with suffering, exploitation and misery, that it retards any development aimed at achieving complete economic independence. The present situation in Syria and the need for development call for a different, non-capitalist road. The latter will enable us to develop the economy by way of setting up a large-scale public sector, carrying out nationalization and implementing the agrarian reform; it will make it possible to extend the rights of workers and peasants and the democratic liberties of the people, to achieve closer cooperation with the socialist camp in the struggle against imperialism.

The struggle between these two trends commenced long ago in Syria. Recall the events associated with building an oil refinery, concluding economic agreements with the USSR or erecting a dam on the Euphrates — these were battles fought to build up a public sector and strengthen economic independence. Ever since September 28, 1961, monopoly capital has been trying to seize power, curtail the liberties and abolish some of the gains, such as the nationalization of the banks and the agrarian reforms, in an attempt to siderack Syria onto the capitalist road of development.

This struggle has given rise to two trends in the government: the Right trend headed by Aflyak and Bitar who sought a deal with reaction and imperialism, and the national progressive trend rooted in the people and represented by military and civil leaders. Of late the struggle between the two trends has gained in intensity, thanks to which Omran had to resign and Aflyak's influence dwindled. As a result power was concentrated in the hands of the military who enjoy the support of some of the Baathist civil leaders. It was these forces in the government which adopted a series of laws forbidding to give oil-extraction licences to foreign companies, and enacted the decrees on nationalization.

The attitudes to the nationalization decrees mirrored the struggle between the two trends now going on both in Syria and throughout the Arab world. The forces of progress and socialism have favored nationalization, while the reactionary forces have come out against it. This struggle is growing in scope, and the chances are that the forces of progress and socialism will win.

ECONOMIC AND POLITICAL IMPLICATIONS OF NATIONALIZATION

A. Money will no longer be pumped out by the capitalists from the nationalized sector.

B. Credits will be channelled to the nationalized and not the private sector as before.

C. It will be possible to make nationalized enterprises operate at full capacity and expand production, as has already been the case at glass- and cement-manufacturing plants.

These, in short, are positive aspects of nationalization. But there are also some negative consequences, although of a temporary nature. It was no surprise that nationalization caused the fluctuation of prices and of the value of the Syrian pound. The flucuations will grow unless sabotage is ended. But the wave of fear is beginning to wane, and the situation will stabilize depending on the policy which the government will pursue with regard to the small bourgeoisie (share-holders, shopkeepers), and on the extent to which it will broaden the rights of the workers.

Nationalization will also affect political opinion in the country. It has deprived big capital of a powerful weapon which it used to further its class interests. One can even say that Syrian capitalism, which can no longer promote the development of the country's producive forces has played havoc to the economy in order to worsen the position of Syria and thus accomplish its conspiracy against the people. It thereby serves the sinister aims of reaction and imperialism. Nationalization adds to Syria's chances to secure complete independence for her trade and thus strengthen economic sovereignty. It was a reflection and a concretization of the struggle between reaction and progress in Syria and in the Arab world as a whole.

OUR ATTITUDE TO NATIONALIZATION

In defining our attitude to nationalization we should proceed from considerations of principle. Economically, nationalization means:

1. Extending the public sector, which at present controls 85 per cent of all industry and is the leading sector in the country.
2. Transferring a substantial part of the means of production to state ownership.
3. Creating the possibility to enhance the role of the working class and its influence on the future development of the country.
4. All this creates better conditions for the country's advance along the non-capitalist road, along the road towards socialism.

Politically, nationalization implies:

1. Restricting the economic and political influence of the big bourgeoisie.
2. Creating a favorable soil for the cooperation of all forces believing in socialism, both in and outside the government.

3. An opportunity to improve relations between Arab states and strengthen Arab solidarity, especially between progressive Arab countries.

4. An opportunity to lay the foundation for closer cooperation with the socialist countries.

DEMANDS

The acute struggle going on around the issue of nationalization, in particular between the advocates of the non-capitalist road and their opponents, is developing at a rapid pace. Victory in this struggle depends on a numbers of factors, the most important of which are the following:

1. Correct management of the nationalized enterprises, which calls for selecting and placing at key posts able and reliable executives devoted to the cause of nationalization and socialism, and not to any one of the parties.

2. Abolishing bureaucracy in the administrative apparatus. The existing red tape and profit-seeking do a lot of harm to the economy. Management is, undoubtedly, a factor which can create a favorable attitude to nationalization.

3. Carrying into effect the measures and laws which the workers have won through their long struggle.

4. Enabling the workers to elect trade union bodies in a democratic way; holding free general elections; abandoning the practice of appointing or imposing candidates, the practice of intimidating workers, who are not Baath members, to prevent them from nominating their own candidates, as is still the case in some of the state-owned enterprises.

5. Cutting short capitalist and imperialist sabotage.

6. Using the profits obtained at the nationalized enterprises to expand the state sector and raise the living standard of the people.

7. Compensating promptly the value of shares to small holders and solving the problem of small producers who suffered from rationalization. This is an urgent matter.

8. Cutting the prices of such goods as sugar, fats, and vegetable oil.

9. Building sound relations between the nationalized enterprises and small traders.

With regard to domestic policy, it is essential for nationalization to be successful to grant democratic freedoms to the progressive forces and all groups having faith in socialism, and to ensure freedom of speech, press and assembly.

All the progressive forces should, for their part, uphold and defend nationalization measures against imperialism and reaction, which calls for the cooperation of all national progressive forces in a broad front. The Central Committee of the Communist Party has called for building such a front, just as the press of Syria has called for unity of the progressive Left forces.

TRENDS OF DEVELOPMENT

Although nationalization has had a positive effect on the trend of economic development, we cannot rest content with this. What is needed is to work actively for the realization, in cooperation with the socialist states, of the plan for erecting a dam on he Euphrates, building a fertilizer plant and laying the railway lines Kamyshly-Haleb-Latakia.

The state sector should not be allowed to remain within the present limits. It should be expanded steadily and along planned lines. It is perfectly obvious that close cooperation with the states of the socialist camp headed by the USSR will be of great importance for the realization of these plans and for training new cadres of specialists.

The first successes of nationalization are due to the broad support accorded it by the people in Syria, in the Arab world and in the international arena. The future of nationalization depends on further steps: it will either grow in scope or it will fail. It is all the national forces which are responsible for nationalization, but the main responsibility devolves primarily on the government.

Progressive nationalists, Communists and democrats should exert every effort to ensure that nationalization develops on a sound basis and is crowned with victory.

SYRIAN BIG CAPITAL AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT*

M. Salib

The role of the national sector in Syria's economic development was studied by theoreticians and leaders of political parties as far back as ten years ago.

Political and economic factors change constantly, and our attitude to this sector today is not what it was in 1957. At that time the Communists said that ". . . the task at the present stage is to defend national capital, not to nationalize it," while in 1965 they support the latest decrees on nationalization.

We maintain that both in 1957 and 1965 the Communist position has been correct. What has changed is the role of the big bourgeoisie, which was progressive in 1954-57 but has become reactionary now.

Before independence the struggle was waged between the people, led by the bourgeoisie, and the invaders. The bourgeoisie was economically interested in taking power in order to set up its own industry. The invaders sought to preserve Syria as an agrarian country importing goods from abroad.

The struggle between the national forces (the national and petty bourgeoisie and the working people), which wanted to nationalize foreign enterprises and establish a national industry, and the imperialists and their agents (feudals), who wanted Syria to remain backward and dependent, continued after independence as well.

The victory of the national forces over imperialism was the chief outcome of this struggle.

CONTRADICTIONS WITHIN THE ANTI-IMPERIALIST FRONT

Those were class contradictions, somewhat smoothed over by the common struggle against imperialism.

First, there was the contradiction between the capitalists and the workers. The capitalists strove to intensify the exploitation of the workers and deprive them of their legitimate rights. The struggle of the working people for these rights was headed by the Communists and other progressives. The capitalists sided with the feudals in order to safeguard the "inviolability" of private property, while the workers supported the peasants' struggle. Ever since 1945 the Communists urged distributing the feudals' land among the peasants, while the Socialists drafted a law defending the peasantry.

Second, it was necessary to extend the state sector. Agents of imperialism, supported in some instances by representatives of the big bourgeoisie anxious to preserve the private sector, came out against this. A typical example was their attitude to the construction of the oil refinery in Homs, to some development plans, etc. Already then the big bourgeoisie acted as a reactionary force.

PROGRESSIVE ROLE OF THE BOURGEOISIE PRIOR TO 1957

On the other hand, the big bourgeoisie played a progressive role, for it wanted the industrialization of the country. Although it was interested primarily in profit-making, its activities had an anti-imperialist character. While in power (together with the feudals), it passed laws promoting industrialization (for instance, abrogation of the customs treaty with Lebanon), increasing duties on imports competing with domestic goods, and reducing or fully abolishing duties on machines and materials needed by industry. These laws contributed to the development of the national economy. More than 100 big enterprises were built within 13 to 15 years.

The Syrian Communists advocated a more vigorous development of the national industry. While fighting for the rights of the workers, for the emancipation of the peasants and for the extension of the state sector, they bore in mind the following factors:

A. The private sector was developing, with the capitalists using profits for the construction of new enterprises. This increased the national income, which was used for extending the state sector. Believing, as Marxists, that ours is the time of socialism's triumph over capitalism, the Communists felt that industrial enterprises would become centers of development of socialism in the country, that the working class, the vanguard which would lead the country to socialism, was being forged there.

B. Along with the private sector, despite the resistance of imperialism, the reactionaries and part of the big bourgeoisie, the state sector was growing rapidly as a result of the nationalization of foreign enterprises and the construction of new ones. It was perfectly obvious that the economic agreements with the USSR, signed by representatives of the national bourgeoisie in 1957, could contribute to the expansion of the state sector, with the private sector changing radically as a result.

C. The correlation of forces in the country at that time was such that contradictions in the anti-imperialist front could not be allowed to grow. The national forces strove to frustrate the imperial-ists' plans and conspiracy, for which unity was needed. This tactic influenced part of the national bourgeoisie, which sensed that its positions were threatened by the imperialists, and not by the forces of progress.

D. Many workers, peasants and artisans (although not interested in the capitalist road of development) were not as yet convinced of the advantages of nationalized property and were therefore at times influenced by bourgeois ideology with its basic concept of the inviolability of private property.

These four factors have changed since then. So far as the private sector is concerned, the big bourgeoisie stopped expanding production already three or four years ago. No new enterprises were built, while the profits were transferred abroad (to Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Switzerland and Italy) and invested in industry there. Since capital taken out of the country consisted not only of net profits but also of that part needed to compensate for wear and tear of machines and buildings, the private industry not only ceased to make progress, but was threatened with decline.

Moreover, the big bourgeoisie launched a struggle against the state sector. The export of capital affected state revenues, hitting the part of the budget designed for economic development. In the period following the seizure of power in September 1961 the bourgeoisie continued the export of capital, restricted the state sector and inflated the bureaucratic apparatus, thus depleting the budget. Together with the FRG it played a double game in order to prevent the construction of the dam on the Euphrates.

Big capital was gradually retreating from the national positions in the struggle against imperialism, reluctant to sacrifice anything for the sake of the state, a course of its income. This was vividly exemplified by the activities of the big bourgeoisie under the el Kudsi govrnment, when it tried to turn over Syrian oil to foreign monopolies and cooperated with the reactionaries in order to influence the December elections, destroy the Left forces, abolish the agrarian reform and the decrees on nationalization, and save foreign banks.

All this goes to show that in recent years the big bourgeoisie withdrew from the struggle against imperialism.

This, however, could not change the correlation of forces in favor of imperialism. In that period new forces joined the struggle (the workers, peasants and the petty bourgeoisie), who were not influenced by the ideology of the reactionaries and the big bourgeoisie any longer, and socialist ideas began to win the following of the mass of the working people. This consolidated the anti-imperialist forces and brought about a qualitative change in their structure. Now these forces were able to unite the struggle against imperialism and Zionism with the struggle for social progress and cardinal social changes. Therefore nationalization promotes, and not weakens, the anti-imperialist struggle.

The advocates of the bourgeoisie contend that the export of capital and the slowing down of industrialization began only after the 1961 decrees on nationalization. This is not true. The big bourgeoisie began to change its position back in 1957, when it went over to the reactionaries' side. Moreover, a halt in industrialization and the export of capital are facts whose essence and consequences cannot be explained away merely by changes in their causes.

All these factors, by no means decisive, were added argument for nationalization, whose main purpose is to turn away from the capitalist path, free the working class from exploitation, and prepare the ground for socialist changes. Nationalization was aimed not only at saving the national income; it is essential for Syria's entry upon a new stage of development.

What has been said about the big capitalists does not apply to the petty bourgeoisie and to the part of the middle bourgeoisie which did not change its positions even after 1957. Nor does it signify that the private sector has lost all importance for economic development. Small enterprises not linked with foreign capital and not subject to liquidation should be reserved to their owners; moreover, every possible assistance should be given them.

The shareholders of the nationalized enterprises should receive a prompt and fair compensation so that the big bourgeoisie has no chance of winning.

THE ROAD AHEAD FOR CANADA'S COMMUNISTS*

Q. You said following your election that the Communist Party is setting its sights on becoming a national force in Canada. How do you expect to achieve this?

A. In my opinion the Communist Party can become an effective national force in English and French Canada by reacting in a timely way to all national, social and economic problems and advancing polices which help unite the people against the monopolies.

A sect cannot become a national force. Nor can a party which restricts itself to propaganda work; or which sits and waits for a "better day." It is what a party does today and every day to champion the interests of the working people that will hasten the "better day."

How can a small party like the Communist Party become an effective national force? Well, size isn't everything, although size is important. More important is the correctness of policies being advanced and the will to bring them to the Canadian people. If these two factors exist we can literally move mountains. The key to becoming an effective national force is embodied in the Communist Party's three-point program; as we learn how to bring these points in a living and concrete way to the Canadian people we will grow in size and influence.

Q. Do you visualize an upsurge of the Left in Canada?

A. Yes. Such an upsurge is beginning to find expression in Western Europe—note the election gains of Communist parties in Italy, Sweden, Finland, Belgium. It can be seen in the agreement between the Communist and Socialist parties of France for cooperation in the coming elections. It finds expression on a somewhat different plane in electoral successes of the Social Democratic Party in West Germany, in the election of a Labour government in Britain and in the electoral defeat of Goldwater and the ultra-Right in the U.S.

In our country an upsurge is also in the making, although not yet on a level with what is transpiring in Western Europe. Municipal elections reflected it in a small way, as did the results of the Riverdale and Waterloo by-elections, and the growing militancy of workers across the country. This desire for social change will expand and be stimulated by the struggle for peace, for a democratic solution of the constitutional crisis and around the struggle for far-reaching reforms to curb the power of monopoly in this period of technological advance. It is around all such movements of the people versus monopoly that the ground-work for a movement toward the left will evolve. It could well find expression in the coming federal elections.

Q. Do you believe present social developments will lead to a return to the militancy of the 1930s?

A. History rarely repeats itself. The conditions of the thirties and the conditions of today are not the same. The revolutionary processes at work throughout the world are wider and deeper than they could be three decades ago. Those who look back longingly to the thirties fail to see the forest for the trees.

Capitalism has learned from the thirties. It is still capitalism, but it has evolved new tactics to try to meet the problems of modern society. It strives to modify the cycle to prevent deep-going economic crisis. It makes concessions to the working class based on the super-profits of monopoly exploitation. It strives to regulate the economy. Laissez-faire capitalism has given way to monopoly and state monopoly capitalism with the state playing an ever-increasing economic role. All efforts are directed to saving the system, to iron out contradictions inherent in the system.

The basic contradictions of capitalism, in the first place between capital and labor, remain and become sharper. The very growth of monopoly creates objective conditions for this.

Efforts to regulate the economy, with the state playing an ever-increasing economic role, strengthens the movement among workers for genuine planning based on social ownership.

It is not accidental that a growing body of workers are striving to determine the rate of production in their plants; that the movement to curb management rights in rising. Technological progress and automation will stimulate that movement and place before workers the need to fight for reforms in the very structure of capitalism. In essence their struggles take on a political character. As they battle on this front workers will inevitably move to the next stage of the struggle, directed toward a basic social transformation of society.

Q. It has been admitted by Communist Party spokesmen that the age level of your membership is too high. What do you intend to do about this problem?

A. Basically the problem is one of ensuring that the young generation, or a goodly part of it, will be on the side of progress and against reaction and war.

It has often been said that the young generation has swung to the right. We deny this. Their heroic participation in the civil rights struggle in the U.S., the rising movement for social change in Canada, growing questioning of the capitalist system, all indicate that young people are aware of the great challenges of our time and are, in fact, in the leadership in many of these struggles.

The Communist Party is recruiting young workers, university students and others into its ranks. We intend to step up this work, not only because we wish to revitalize our party, but because it is in the interests of the entire labor movement and of progress generally.

We are giving particular attention to the big issues which confront the young generation in this period of technological change and automation. Today, more than ever, the problems of education, of training, of useful creative work, leisure and sports have a bearing on the future of the young generation. We shall do what needs to be done to ensure that the labor movement and democratic forces face up to their responsibility in this regard.

Bringing young people into our ranks is part of the necessary process of revitalizing our party, as is the constant promotion of young people to positions of responsibility and leadership.

Q. What will be the outcome of the next federal election?

A. It is too early to say. What is increasingly evident is the growing dissatisfaction of Canadians with both the Conservative and Liberal parties.

Who can say how Canadians will react to the charges of graft and corruption affecting some sections of the Liberal Party? Are the Liberals about to re-enter the "valley of humiliation" brought on by the Beauharnois scandal many years ago?

And who can say what will result from the movement for a special Conservative Party convention? One thing seems clear. The demand not only by French-Canadian but also by some English-Canadian Conservative MP's for Diefenbaker's resignation reflects a crisis in Tory ranks. It is the result of a refusal to face up to the real nature of the constitutional crisis.

When George Hogan, secretary of the Ontario Progressive Conservative Association and former executive assistant to Diefenbaker says the party "might not survive the next 30 days" he may be guilty of exaggeration; but in that remark too is reflected the crisis in Tory ranks.

The question is where will the dissatisfaction with Liberal and Tory parties go? Will it veer to the right, or in a progressive direction?

Alberta Premier E. C. Manning is now calling for the restoration of the "two-party system," hoping it will go toward Social Credit or some new political alignment. Monopoly will now move heaven and earth to prevent a massive break-away from the parties of monopoly.

In the circumstances all those who stand for progress and advance face a real challenge to work for the election of a substantial progressive group, composed mainly of the New Democratic Party, to Parliament. This would correspond with the present stage of the struggle and our party will do everything it can to help realize this objective.

To help set the tone of the campaign, to advance issues which need to be at the center, we shall run Communist candidates in a selected number of constituencies. Our participation will not be formal, but an integral part of our effort to become an effective national force.

Q. What about the ultra-Right? Is there a danger of Goldwaterism in Canada?

A. While there is no concentration of the ultra-Right in Canada it would be a grave mistake to ignore the possibility.

Manning's reactionary call for a political alignment to "defend free enterprise," the hate-literature campaign in various parts of the country, growing attacks on labor and the trade unions, the campaigns sparked by monopoly interests against the Canadian Pension Plan, the proposed national labor code and medicare, the chauvinist attacks on the national rights of the French-Canadian people, are all part of one pattern directed toward halting the democratic upsurge in Canada and forcing it to retreat.

The emergence of an ultra-Right is therefore in the cards, although its form may vary from that in the USA. Goldwaterism is an American phenomenon, but the ultra-Right is international in the sense that it expresses the desperate efforts of reactionary imperialism to halt the inexorable advance of the peoples everywhere to peace, independence, democracy and socialism.

This does not mean that reaction and fascism are inevitable. Far from it, provided correct policies are pursued by our party and all democratic forces in this country, directed toward exposing, isolating and defeating the ultra-Right wherever it raises its head.

Today, there is widespread understanding that the time to prevent war is before it breaks out. So, too, the time to defend democratic rights is now, not when they have been undermined. The democratic upsurge throughout the country indicates this is increasingly understood.

Q. Did your national committee meeting make any decisions regarding the Confederation crisis and developments in French Canada?

A. We did not make any new decisions. Our national convention had already outlined our views on the constitutional crisis and the need for a new Canadian constitution. We took note at the national committee meeting of the various maneuvers of the capitalist parties directed toward bypassing the need for a new Canadian constitution.

We noted that in English-speaking Canada the labor movement continues to stand on the sidelines instead of advancing a program based on the existence of a bi-national state. We felt this to be a missing link which needs correction if the constitutional crisis is to be settled in a way that ensures democratic advance for labor and the Canadian people.

The national committee took note of the emergence of socialist movements in French Canada and the growing and varied struggles of the French Canadian people.

It was not possible to examine all these questions in depth. Therefore it was agreed that French Canada be placed on the agenda of our next meeting, and to discuss also the question of party structure and work in French Canada.

Q. You were elected to your post by the national committee. Is the procedure democratic? How does it compare with the selection of a leader in other Canadian political parties?

A. Our constitution provides for the election of general secretary and party leader by the national committee. This has been our practice. In the past few years the national committee met during the national convention and reported its decisions to the convention.

There were some opinions that perhaps we should hold an earlier convention. In the end, it was unanimously agreed to proceed with the election at our recent meeting.

The national committee can elect its officers and change them for cause. This is not the case with the capitalist parties where decisions are made behind the scenes, where the membership has no control over leadership and where leadership stands above the party.

Q. Some newspapers, radio and TV spoke of a "crisis of leadership" in your party. Was there any truth in it?

A. No. The untimely death of Leslie Morris was a great loss which can never be fully made up. But our party does not depend on one individual, but on collective leadership embodied in the national committee and national executive.

While individuals play a role in history, we do not hold with the "theory" of one-man leadership.

The capitalist press chose to misrepresent the situation in our party because it does not see history as made by people but by some great man.

We had no "crisis of leadership," first of all because there were and are no differences on fundamentals in our leadership, and secondly because in the national committee there are many talented persons who could fill the post of secretary and leader with honor to the party.

If the press, radio and TV want to discuss a "crisis of leadership" let them look at the capitalist parties. Who can deny the growing crisis there?

MANIFESTO OF THE PARAGUAYAN COMMUNIST PARTY

Workers and peasants,

Since August 15 last, the Paraguayan people have gained new experience and become more aware than ever that there is only one road to salvation: the struggle for their demands and rights, united action, the people's democratic revolution.

PARAGUAY'S CHIEF ENEMY

Our people now see better than ever before that the U.S. government, a tool of the imperialist monopolies, is the main hostile force supporting the criminal tyranny of Stroessner and Insfran* contrary to the will of the vast majority of the nation. Within the short period of a few months it granted Stroessner and Insfran $40 million (6,000 million guaranis) to enable them to continue selling and ruining our country, persecuting, torturing and killing Paraguayan patriots.

Such is "Western democracy," defended by the U.S. rulers and multimillionaires and their local flunkeys of all hues.

Such is the vaunted "Alliance for Progress" which the conciliators from the Liberal and Febrerist† leadership, as well as reactionary putschists like Carlos Pastore and Mendez Fleitas, clutch at in common with Stroessner and Insfran.

Life has borne out what we have been telling our people: the government of Stroessner and Insfran is not a national government but a henchman of the U.S. blood-suckers. It is impossible to end the anti-national military dictatorship without fighting simultaneously for the national liberation of Paraguay, against U.S. domination. This is the meaning of the political experience our people are gaining today. Every new fact makes it clearer to them that there is only one way out: the people's national-liberation revolution.

"AID" TO THE PRIVILEGED, STARVATION FOR THE PEOPLE

The Paraguayans are also satisfying themselves that U.S. loans go into the pockets of the insignificant minority of multi-millionaire landowners, favorites of Stroessner and Insfran. The handful of profiteers and privileged military also gets a cut-in. As for the small landowners and small manufacturers, they get nothing.

---

*E. Insfran is Minister of the Interior in Stroessner's government.—Ed.
The Liberal Party represents the interests of the big landowners and ranchers.—Ed.
†The Febrerist Party unites servicemen and intellectuals.—Ed.

The U.S. colonialists have decided that Paraguay should remain a backward country and export chiefly meat and hides, as it did half a century ago.

The vast majority of the peasants receive no credits and never will. The few who will get them will be up to their necks in debt, for their produce does not sell on the capitalist world market and the U.S. government forbids Paraguay to trade with the socialist countries, which are ruled by the working class in alliance with the peasantry. No one believes in the spurious "agrarian reform" of Stroessner and Insfran any longer.

There can be no appreciable increase in production without an agrarian reform. Therefore U.S. loans will merely aggravate the inflation. The cost of living is growing and will continue to grow. But the North Americans prohibit wage increases. In two years there has been only one 5 per cent wage increase in the capital, whereas the working class needs, and has long been demanding, at least a 40 per cent raise to satisfy its barest needs.

There are many dollars in Stroessner's and Insfran's hands. These dollars have been bought with Paraquayan blood. They are the fee for the murder of scores of guerrilla patriots — Alvarez, Ojeda, Rivas, Riveiros, Villalba and many other heroes of national liberation. In the meantime, starvation is growing, The railwaymen's pay is delayed for months, and the teachers and the majority of the other working people are no better off.

There shall be no such "development"! Everything promised by the U.S. interventionists and their lackeys in the government is a lie. The handful of the privileged will go on waxing rich while the poor will become more and more impoverished. The interventionists and the government are stretching the string so tight that it is bound to snap.

The people see more clearly than ever before that there is no way out within the framework of the old regime. They say: "There has to be a change, it is certain to come about."

Only the revolution, only a genuine agrarian reform, only genuine industrialization, only free trade with the socialist camp can end the crisis, backwardness, poverty and disease.

COLLUSION FAILS AND THE DICTATORSHIP IS NO STRONGER THAN BEFORE

The third thing our people have come to realize is that all attempts of the U.S. government to fortify Stroessner's dictatorship through collusion have failed completely.

The "cheap liberals"* have got bogged down in intrigue and deception. For many years the attempts of the Liberal leadership to strike a much-desired bargain were frustrated by popular demonstrations and guerrilla actions. This was the case in 1959, 1960, 1961 and 1963. It is precisely the failure of the policy of collusion prescribed to Paraguay by Kennedy and Stevenson that has compelled the U.S. government to give the decaying dictatorship a shot-in-the-arm of millions of dollars. The U.S. government had no other means of saving and fortifying the dictatorship.

The new tactics of U.S. imperialism, which is to pay for terroristic fascist repressions in dollars, is reckless and dangerous. It is the kind of policy that led to the Cuban revolution.

In our country, it will intensify opposition to and hatred of the dictatorship and foreign domination, evoke increasing resistance and ultimately lead to a great nation-wide uprising.

The U.S. government uses its loans to Stroessner and Insfran to exert pressure on Colonel Rafael Franco's group*, the directorate of the Liberal Party, the Christian Democrats and the conciliating group of the Left Febrerists. It demands that they come to terms with Stroessner and Insfran and join with them in the municipal elections farce to be staged next October. Colonel Franco has already concluded a pact with the anti-national tyranny. He is a traitor to democracy and to his country. He has disgraced his sword by putting it at the service of the U.S. interventionists.

Following the traitors — Insfran's henchmen — Rafael Franco, Roque Gaona, Caballero Gatti and Elpidio Yegros, the collusion was joined in by the supporters of Acosta Mena. At a meeting held in Asuncion in the middle of October a deal was made between the Franco party and Acosta Mena's associates headed by Pancho Villate, son-in-law of Acosta Mena and brother and associate of Nelson Villate, Insfran's secretary. The anti-Communist statements made by Acosta Mena's people were designed to prepare the Left Febrerists for this betrayal. But the revolutionary-minded rank-and-file Febrerists indignantly reject the deal being engineered by the United States. Nor do they sympathize with the putschist legionnaire policy of Acosta Mena. That is why the latter subjected revolutionary Febrerists to police persecutions on the border, acting as a direct agent of Campos Alum and of a foreign intelligence service.

The directorate of the Liberal Party, for its part, is begging Insfran to put it on the lists for the municipal "elections." In its September 2 manifesto it hailed U.S. "aid" to the Stroessner government and expressed the wish that this "aid" should "grow in step with the progressing constitutional normalization of the country". This act of treason confirms that the Liberal Party directorate is merely a tool of the U.S. Embassy. But the Liberal rank and file repudiate the policy of collusion and inactivity more and more imphatically. The revolutionary position of the majority of the Liberals was stated in a challenging manifesto issued by the Liberal club Alon on September 5: "You are either with the oligarchy and imperialism, or with the people . . . You either accept the 'normalization process' proclaimed by the dictatorship, or work for the popular revolution."

The dictatorship is compelled to put on the mask of "democratization" in order to contain the struggle of the people and induce the U.S. to give it dollar handouts. But its maneuvers will fall through for it cannot and does not want to give freedom to the people. The Liberal and Febrerist rank and file, as well as the majority of the Colorado Party*, do not believe in "freedom" under Stroessner and Insfran. The people will not hear of collusion. Colonel Franco and his associates and the traitorous group of "cheap liberals" will choke in the fetid bog of their own making.

The people realize that so long as Stroessner and Insfran are in power no problems will be solved and there will be neither freedom nor peace. The masses are dissociating themselves from the leaders who block their actions and accept collusion, who have betrayed democracy and their own party. At the same time the prestige of the leaders who are in favor of armed struggle and united action is growing. Revolutionary trends are appearing in the Colorado, Liberal and Febrerist parties. This shows that the people are going over to the camp of the revolution.

There are very good conditions for the people to frustrate the new collusion being organized by the U.S. Embassy. Joint efforts are needed to defeat this collusion.

COUPS FAIL. THE PEOPLE ALONE CAN ACCOMPLISH THE REVOLUTION

Experience also shows the people the untenability of the policy of coups. Many representatives of the opposition who hoped for quick and easy changes through a coup no longer cherish such illusions. From the point of view of democracy, putschism is an erroneous road. An action by the military cannot succeed unless the masses join in the struggle. Conspiracies and adventurist coups behind the back of the people, without active and purposeful preparations for the revolution have always failed and will fail in the future. Stroessner and Insfran can be removed only by the coordinated actions of all the forces of the people and the army opposed to the dictatorship. The legal peaceful struggle of the legal organizations of workers, peasants and students should be combined with the popular armed (guerrilla) struggle. Powerful and determined action by the masses can prompt some army leaders and officers to come out for democracy. This is the only way to achieve victory. There is a need for a wave of the most diverse actions surging higher and higher.

The workers, peasants, revolutionary-minded young people, and democrats from every party are becoming increasingly aware of the need for joint struggle, for coordinated actions, for a combination of various forms of struggle to overthrow Stroessner and Insfran. The young members of the Colorado Popular Movement urged, in their manifesto, an end to inter-party squabbles and called upon all the opposition parties to unite for struggle. This is an expression of the genuine desire for unity characteristic of the majority of the people.

It is because of the growing popularity of the movement for unity that the traitor Acosta Mena and his gang of opportunists and police agents fraudulently calling themselves the "Party of Communists-Leninists" are fighting against unity with unprecedented fury. They post as champions of unity only in order to destroy it. They are putting out provocative anti-communist sheets to prevent the establishment of a single leadership. They are trying to blackmail the Febrerists favoring unity of action by calling them "Communist agents."

But the people, and the vast majority of the Febrerists, do not support this policy of betraying the country and the democratic revolution. Young Febrerists, Liberals and members of the Colorado Party are growing increasingly aware of the need to prepare the masses for the revolution through work among the peasants and other sections of the people. This is the only correct road also when a military coup gets off to a good start, for it is only action by the masses that can ensure complete victory and turn the coup into the beginning of a truly democratic movement. The people should be ready to act promptly and resolutely in any government crisis. Coup or no coup, only an organized struggle by the workers, peasants and students, both peaceful and armed, can guarantee victory and the formation of a provisional government which will embark on a democratic policy.

That is what experience shows. That is the great idea that is beginning to win the masses.

FROM THE STRUGGLE FOR IMMEDIATE DEMANDS TO REVOLUTIONARY STRUGGLE

The reactionary putschists and defeatists involved in the collusion urge the people to wait, i.e., to remain inactive. But this is what Stroessner and Insfran, and all those who make people starve, would like best! Something has to be done to put an end to the crisis! It is necessary to fight in some form or other.

The printers' heroic and victorious strike forced the dictatorship into retreat. The struggle of the men and women workers of the Grau enterprises against layoffs did as much. The various actions at meat-packing plants, in textile mills, or the Central Railway, in the tram workers' section, tanning factories and the Nemby stone quarries, as well as the struggle of the banking workers' and other trade unions show that the working class continues along the road of the struggle of the masses, of independent struggles. The workers are correct when they use legal means as long as they can. This is what they should begin with. The demand for a 40 per cent wage rise and the resistance to dismissals unite the working class against the dictatorship and the exploiters.

The Paraguayan Confederation of Labor is a police organization which has lost all prestige. The movement for the independence of the trade unions is on the rise. The Christian Workers' Center, a splitting organization in the service of the employers, enjoys scant support. The workers want unity in struggle.

The sugar cane plantation workers have fought for and won higher prices for cane. The seizure of land in Caaguazu, General Artigas, Estero Camba, Ciervo Cua, San Jose, Pirayu and elsewhere indicates one more form of struggle. Resentment and anger against Stroessner's and Insfran's thugs are growing throughout the countryside.

Secondary and higher school students are also in ferment. The punishment meted out to informers from the National College on April 18 was an indicative mass action against the dictatorship. The threat of a strike by the students of several colleges compelled the government to grant them winter holidays.

Retailers on No. 4 Market resisted and defeated the police who tried to disperse them.

The bourgeoisie and the people are becoming more and more discontented with the excessive taxation imposed under pressure from the U.S. interventionists.

General discontent with the United States is mounting. It expressed itself in the support the people gave to the demonstration of the office workers dismissed by the U.S. Operations Mission.

There is talk of a general strike of workers, students and shopkeepers for the abolition of the exorbitant taxes, for higher wages and greater budget allocations for public education, for the complete and effective repeal of the state of siege.

The democratic movement is rallying for a new offensive.

OVERWHELMING MAJORITY OF THE PARAGUAYANS WANT A CHANGE, A COMPLETE CHANGE

This is a fact which characterizes the situation in the country.

The opportunists and the defeatists do not see it. They look at everything through dark glasses. They see only the dictatorship and think that it has grown stronger. The opportunists self-seekers and cowards must be swept out of the way. It is possible to fight and to win improvement. The important thing is to fight together with the masses, by joint effort, with the firm determination to win.

Working people and democrats from all the parties:

Our Party has received heavy blows, and has suffered great losses, since last year. The police, aided by bandits from the false "Party of Communists-Leninists" — the informers Oscar Conzales, Sebastian Queirei, Gilberto Rivarola and their accomplices — is spreading defeatist rumors about the Communist Party having been "destroyed." It is a lie! The blows have weakened our Party, but it lives on, working and fighting in the van, on the most dangerous positions. Its wounds are bleeding, but fresh blood is being infused into it. The Paraguayan Communist Party is indestructible because it is nourished by the Paraguayan people, and history shows that the Paraguayan people cannot be destroyed!

We were hit not because the police knows much and works efficiently, but because we worked poorly, without proper caution and vigilance. To strengthen the dictatorship, the North Americans have to destroy the Communist Party, because this Party firmly holds the banner of the revolution, of national liberation. They are trying to destroy it by new methods, such as liquidation of Party leaders and fighters and the provocative police activities of the gang bearing the false name of the "Leninist Communist Party." The task of this gang is to destroy our Party from within, to convince the workers that "the Communist Party is split". This is a police lie. By expelling the group of defeatists, traitors and informers (Silvio Grande, Queirei, Tatier, Clerici and their like), we have removed an ulcer and thus ameliorated and consolidated our Party.

Let us draw lessons from the blows we have received. Let us work better. The workers and peasants can rely on our help today as they did yesterday. We will side with those who fight, be they members of the Colorado Party, Liberals, Febrerists, Catholics or non-party people.

Greater and more revolutionary battles by the people lie ahead. No one can stem this movement. The dictatorship will not hold out.

The revolution in Paraguay is a necessity, a historical law. It is part of the giant world revolution growing from day to day. The balance is being more and more tilted in favor of the peoples, of the socialist countries, of the Soviet Union, which is the right hand of the working class of the world, of all the peoples fighting for their freedom, of all the progressive and peace-loving forces.

Forward, workers, peasants, students, democrats from every party! Rise to an organized struggle for a 40 per cent wage increase, against dismissals, for fair prices on agricultural products, for the transfer of the land to the peasants, against the monstrous taxes, for the complete abolition of the state of siege, for an end to persecution, torture and murder, for the life and freedom of the national hero Antonio Maidana and all political prisoners!

Forward to the general strike of the workers, students and shopkeepers!

Down with collusions and with all conciliating leaders!

Long live the glorious guerrillas, champions of freedom!

Long live the democratic revolution of national liberation!

RESOLUTION*

OF THE POLITICAL BUREAU, PEOPLE'S UNITY PARTY OF HAITI

Last year the dictator Duvalier decided to keep power for life. The government took repressive measures of unprecedented cruelty against the leaders of the trade union, Communist and democratic movements. In addition to trade union leaders, it jailed workers who had upheld their interests against the employers, those exploiters collaborating with officials of the Ministry of Labor and other government departments.

Communists and other patriots are persecuted on the basis of any informer's report or because of the political stand they took during the 1957 election campaign. Patriots are put in prison, where the henchmen of the regime torture and even murder them. There is a veritable reign of terror in the country.

The government has considerably undermined its position by its policy. Those patriots who at one time were passive or fell for the government's deceitful propaganda are beginning to experience the effects of the alarming situation created by the regime in all walks of life. Besides, indiscriminate persecution of the relatives, friends and supporters of patriots who are in prison or fell victims to denunciations is daily swelling the ranks of the discontented, of those who seek changes, and the overthrow of the Duvalier regime.

On the other hand, despite the aggravation of the crisis of the regime and the growing hatred of the masses for the dictatorship, many patriots, and even some of those who would like to be considered revolutionaries, do not see how the desired changes can be brought about. Patriots disillusioned by the reverses of the opposition lose heart, lapse into a pessimistic mood, or play a waiting game. They go as far as to renounce fighting the dictatorship in any form, and pin their hopes on rescue operations by the U.S. Government, exiles, or certain persons in or outside the government.

The traditional opposition, particularly its foreign section, organized a series of armed actions against the regime. They failed despite the weakness and growing unpopularity of the regime. The reason was that the foreign group of the opposition had done its utmost to debar from the struggle all other organized democratic movements, most of which have for many years been fighting against Duvalier, an imperialist flunkey. The fact is that that group is in collusion with the imperialists and wants to preserve the status quo. All that the group wants is to overthrow Duvalier himself, and it is willing to serve the same masters through other persons. Despite past setbacks, the group, which is supported by the imperialists secretly and sometimes openly, has no intention of laying down its arms. It is getting ready for fresh action.

On the other hand, the democratic movement may be said to have made some progress lately. Despite protracted disputes and the difficulties that cropped up in the course of talks, the foremost organizations succeeded in forming the United Democratic Front (UDF), which is to play a very important role in the struggle against the semi-colonial, semi-feudal dictatorship, against imperialism and its lackeys in the country, for a democratic government of a broad national front defending the interests of the working class and other patriotic segments of the nation.

Whereas the democratic movement has been growing, especially since the important unity conference which was held abroad under the UDF leadership, there are individuals or groups both in and outside political parties who obstruct the advance of the UDF and of the organizations which have set it up. They are openly fighting for the triumph of an opportunist line aimed at abolishing the anti-imperialist and anti-feudal program of the Haitian revolution, the only program which can ensure the steady progress of the Haitian nation and put an end, once and for all, to conditions in which dictatorships similar to Duvalier's spring up.

As for our Party, we must say that while it has achieved some degree of success, its activity still falls short of the requirements of the revolutionary struggle. We will have to do a great deal of organizing work on a national scale to make the Party a truly mass party. We will have to make a special effort toward creating a firm and united leadership equal to its tasks and responsibilities, or, in other words, a genuinely Marxist-Leninist leadership. We must promptly take well-considered steps to enable the Party to cope successfully with its tasks and really to lead the people's democratic struggle.

With due regard to the political situation in the country and the situation inside the Party, we must carefully and scientifically examine the problems facing the Party, firmly adhering to the position of the working class and of creative Marxism-Leninism, and adopt measures prompted by reality.

To solve these various problems as speedily and effectively as possible, the Political Bureau considers it necessary to convene an enlarged meeting of the Central Committee, to be attended by representatives of the regional committees and central bodies of the Party. Active participation by these comrades, who have gained ample experience in the fight for national liberation, democracy and socialism, is particularly essential in view of the absence of many members of the leadership. It will help to adopt the right decisions.

December 1964

START A DISCUSSION OF IDEOLOGICAL QUESTIONS

The theoretical and ideological work of the Party is not limited to working out the right strategic and tactical line of the Haitian revolution, although much has yet to be done in this field. The Party must wage a sustained and active struggle to ensure that the working class and the people generally, who are fighting for their liberation, accept the position of the Party as their own position. It must work for the genuinely communist education of its membership and for the preservation of unity, and maintain its theses against distortion and falsification. It must give proper attention to new issues arising in the course of the struggle of the exploited and oppressed if it wants to find a correct and specific solution to every problem. This tense battle calls for an effective practical contribution by all Party organizations and members. Absolute fidelity to the principles of the Party and of Marxism-Leninism is a necessary condition for achieving practical results.

As we think it necessary to draw the attention of the Party as a whole and of its cells and individual members, as well as of its leading bodies, to the theoretical and ideological problems which daily confront the Party, we take the initiative of starting a discussion of a number of topical questions raised by some comrades in the course of their practical work. The first question concerns the interconnection between the Party theses and new developments in life in general and in revolutionary practice in particular.

The second question bears on the right to criticism inside the Marxist-Leninist labor movement.

The third question refers to the position of the Party on the differences which have sprung up in the international working-class movement.

LOYALTY TO MARXISM-LENINISM AND TO PARTY PRINCIPLES IS A REQUIREMENT OF THE REVOLUTIONARY STRUGGLE

Must one depart from the Patry's fundamental tasks in order to be able to analyze a new problem of development? Must one depart from the position of the working class and from the principles of the Party and of Marxism-Leninism in order critically to examine the results of Party work over a certain period? Must one renounce Party principles, the position of the working class and of Marxist-Leninist theory, in order to decide on the line of action toward an enemy of the working class and the nation, such as the present dictatorship?

We think not. The Party bases its activities on principles that have stood the test of time and struggle. These principles underly the activity of all the Communist and Workers' parties of the world that are loyal to Leninism. National and international experience suggests that whenever a workers' party deviates from these principles in solving a problem or examining a question, in developing its tactics and strategy, or in formulating its political line, it lands in adventurism or the most ordinary opportunism. There are sufficient instances of this.

Let us touch on a very recent case, that of the authors of a document called "Problems of the Communist Movement in Haiti." Despite their "revolutionary credo" and quotations from Mao Tse-tung and even from Lenin, they were unable to understand and explain what is going on in Haiti. This was because they failed to abide by the position of the working class and by Marxist-Leninist theory even though they belong to a party which calls itself a workers' Marxist party (the People's National Liberation Party). As a result, they took a Right opportunist stand on the struggle against imperialism, the chief enemy of the peoples of the world who are fighting for democracy, genuine independence and national liberation. After a few superficial remarks about "the level of social consciousness of the masses," "the blessings" of imperialism, "help" from imperialism, and so on, the authors state with shocking cynicism: "Is it right, in the circumstances, artificially to foment anti-American animosity among the masses? In advancing anti-imperialist slogans everywhere, aren't we, in fact, running the risk of being taken for unscrupulous people." This from people who pose as revolutionaries. What about the class approach? What about patriotism? What is the reason for this fall? Why this degeneration? Because the authors of the document must have forgotten, first of all, that Marxism is not a dogma but a guide to action. And also because they have abandoned the position of the working class and the principles of Marxism.

In deciding various questions, we must steer clear of the twofold danger of Left and Right opportunism, because either variety might defeat the Party, help the enemies of the people and hold up the victory of the revolution.

That is why, now that "unprincipled and impatient theoreticians, dogmatists and adventurers, far removed from the masses and their concrete struggles" are mushrooming here and there, seeking support, the task of every organization and every member of the Party is to defend the correct line of the Party and the world Communist movement against all appeals to revise it, a steadfast and uncompromising fight against pseudo-revolutionaries, against those who pay lip-service to the revolution while carrying on activities detrimental to the interests of the masses. The task of all organizations and members of the Party is to strengthen their links with the masses and contribute more actively to the education, mobilization and organization of the masses in the course of the actual struggle against the dictatorial regime, against imperialism and the reactionary classes of Haiti. Their task is to carry forward the theses of the Party and to study new problems from the standpoint of creative Marxism-Leninism.

THE RIGHT TO CRITICISM

The right to criticism is a legitimate right of every Party member or organization. But it is subject to certain laws and is regulated by the Leninist standards of Party life. Freedom of and the right to criticism must under no circumstances be used to undermine the organizational and ideological unity of the Party, justify refusal on the part of Party members or organizations to carry out their obligations, or legalize the existence of groupings, factions, or "persons standing above the Party and the provisions of its Rules."

Article 34 of the Rules reads: "As regards Party policy, lower organizations may freely and earnestly discuss a decision, individually or collectively, and submit their considerations to the leading Party bodies as long as these have not adopted it." It should be clear from this that all Party members and organizations may within the framework of the organizations concerned examine any questions concerning Party policy and convey their views to higher bodies. Since the Party is an actively operating organism, it is quite possible and natural that "different points of view, divergences on particular issues, may arise in the course of everyday work." Nevertheless, points of view contradicting the majority of the Party and its leading bodies, and differences of opinion should not endanger the Party's unity of action.

All Party members have a right, and are obliged, to search for decisions likely to advance and strengthen the Party, to choose and propose any decision likely to promote the cause of the working class and the masses generally. However, all Party members and organizations are obliged to observe the Leninist principles of democratic centralism, which calls for submission of the minority to the majority, of the lower to the higher organizations, and binds every Party member regularly to account for his activity to the bodies he is subordinated to. Art. 34 of the Rules says: "As soon as the leading body has adopted a decision, all [organizations] shall submit to it. Should a lower organization consider a decision or directive to be out of keeping with the actual local conditions, it must ask the higher organization to revise that decision or directive. If, however, the higher organization insists on its decision and demands its execution, unquestioning execution is necessary." A point of view that is at variance with the opinion of the Party does not entitle a Party member or organization to refuse carrying out decisions that have been adopted or instructions they have received. No Party member or organization may spread his or its opinion and seek its realization other than in accordance with the procedure established by the Rules. A Party member has no right to engage in factional activity, that is, has no right "to meetings outside the organizations provided for by the Rules to work out a political line and a program for action running counter to those approved by the statutory and central bodies of the Party."

Those Party members who, far from following the course indicated by the Rules, discredit the Party, disclose Party secrets and engage in anti-Party activity must be expelled from the Party. Lenin said that "every voluntary association (including a party) is also free to expel members who use the name of the party to advocate anti-party views . . . The party is a voluntary association, which would inevitably break up, ideologically and then physically, if it did not cleanse itself of people advocating anti-party views" (Coll. Works, Vol. 10, p. 47).

THE PARTY AND THE DIFFERENCES IN THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

The differences in the world Communist and working-class movement concern all the Communist and Workers' parties of the world.

Our Party, which is a Marxist-Leninist party and as such signed the 1960 Statement, must insist that "a resolute defense of the unity of the world Communist movement on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism is its duty." "It is the supreme internationalist duty of every Marxist-Leninist party to work continuously for greater unity in the world Communist movement," the Statement points out.

In these circumstances, our Party — like the Communist Party of the Soviet Union or any other fraternal party — could not keep silent when it came up against tendencies and actions aimed at substituting a line inspired by dogmatism and nationalism for the general line of the world Communist movement.

Our Party did its duty as a Marxist-Leninist party by taking a firm and unequivocal stand against disruptive activities which, if successful, would impair the strength of communism.

It is not customary in the world Communist movement to discriminate against Communist parties. There are no big and small, or senior and junior, parties. The 1960 Statement, which our Party signed along with the other fraternal parties, says: "All the Marxist-Leninist parties are independent and have equal rights; they shape their policies according to the specific conditions in their respective countries and in keeping with Marxist-Leninist principles, and support each other. The success of the working-class cause in any country is unthinkable without the internationalist solidarity of all Marxist-Leninist parties. Every party is responsible to the working class, to the working people of its country, to the international working-class and Communist movement as a whole."

Is the leadership of our Party right when it defends the unity of the Communist movement against disruptive activity and dogmatism? We answer this question in the affirmative. First of all, because our Party is a Marxist-Leninist party and must uphold the purity of Marxism-Leninism and the line of the world Communist movement formulated on the basis of the experience of all the Communist and Workers' parties of the world, in the light of Marxist-Leninist teachings. Secondly, because our Party has signed the 1960 Statement and cannot repudiate the principles of the latter.

Our Party did not confine itself to criticism of actions endangering the unity of the Communist movement. It did much to explain to its members the nature of the conflict which has counterposed the Communist Party of China to the majority of the Communist and Workers' parties of the world, and to provide them with arguments enabling them to stand firm on the line of the world Communist movement. It acquainted them with large excerpts from the 1960 Statement. It has steadily published materials revealing the nature of the differences and showing the disastrous effects of disruptive activity. It constantly familiarizes its members with materials showing the positions of fraternal parties in the face of the disruptive activities of the Chinese comrades, who do not stick at backing renegades expelled from Communist parties for their factionalism and actions incompatible with the Leninist standards of Party life. The Party did all in its power to inform its members of the positions of all parties, and even of the views of the CPC leaders on the fundamental issues of our epoch: peace, thermonuclear war, the fight for democracy, national liberation and socialism, the unity of the socialist commonwealth, the role and significance of the revolutionary labor movement and the national liberation movement, peaceful coexistence, the various forms of struggle etc.

But some Party members allow themselves to ignore published documents. They persist in alleging absurdities and in defending not only in their own organizations but, worse still, outside the Party, erroneous views conflicting with the line of the Party and the world Communist movement.

This is an impermissible situation. All Party organizations must see to it that their members study the documents which have been published, and maintain the views of the Party and the world Communist movement.

Those who do not read published documents stand apart from the theoretical and ideological work of the Party and should be punished. It is sad to hear a Party member say, "The Party has said nothing about that," for the Party has declared itself on the matter, and more than once. What is the reason for this attitude? How can anyone calling himself a member of the Communist Party behave like that?

THE UNITED DEMOCRATIC FRONT MUST PLAY ITS ROLE EFFECTIVELY*

The Front parties must step up their work if they want the Front really to play its role, if they want to unite all who suffer, morally and physically, from the crimes of the government.

Many representatives of the Front parties keep on calling for organization. From what they say, the people will effect organization by themselves — as if the people could take the initiative of organization into their own hands. Yet it is for us advanced patriots, for us fighters who are already organized on democratic principles, to get this job under way, to pave the way for and hasten the creation of democratic forms of popular organization that will lead to the overthrow of the Duvalier dictatorship. Since the mass of the people lacks, with the exception of a few labor associations, habits of democratic organization and struggle, we will delay the downfall of the reactionary regime oppressing the masses unless we skilfully direct organization.

We must get down to work. To begin with, we must learn to combine legal and illegal forms of organization on the basis of the UDF program. We must mould the political consciousness of the masses and teach them every form of struggle. This is indispensable if the masses are not to regard the armed struggle as a conspiracy aimed solely at overthrowing the Duvalier regime, and if they are to realize that the fight for democracy will continue even when the machinery of oppression has been abolished.

*Le Rassemblement, journal of the UDF, Jan. 30, 1965.

To arouse and foster the political consciousness of the masses, we must combine legal and illegal forms of struggle. Put in specific terms, this means that the legal struggle for economic objectives, for a higher standard of living, is the way to hasten and further the formation of the political consciousness of the masses. Indeed, as they fight for economic gains the masses are learning by their own experience who is their enemy or friend or potential ally. They are coming to see who is barring their path to a better life, to realize all the sooner the need to take up arms in order to destroy their enemies and eliminate the present government, which is an accomplice of their enemies. Thus it would be wrong not to rouse the people for the struggle for economic objectives.

This struggle may well be said to contribute in substantial measure to the maturing of subjective factors for the development and successful pursuit of the armed struggle. Had these subjective factors been there, Duvalier would perhaps no longer be in power.

Of course, we must remember that it is no easy task to organize the masses, particularly in a country where there is no tradition of organized struggle. This is why many patriots are at a loss where to begin. Instead of promoting the organized movement of the masses, many of them show impatience, and mistake their desires for realities. They talk much but do nothing, finding themselves in the position of disunited and helpless people. They often resort to ordinary conspiratorial methods and politics for politics' sake.

We all know that 80 per cent of the Haitians are peasants. This means that no truly popular movement can exist without the support of the majority of the peasant population, which has to be organized. But it is precisely this that complicates the problem of organization for many reasons — the very way of life of the peasants makes them exceedingly individualistic and selfish, with little inclination for any form of organization. Besides, traditional politicians have always deceived the peasants, and government officials and those who enforce laws have always humiliated, insulted and plundered them. Lastly, the infamous treatment they receive at the hands of the Macoute agents, who are in the service of the Duvalier government, have greatly increased the peasants' ingrained distrust of all who try to organize them. The peasants live according to the proverb "the burnt child dreads the fire."

All these circumstances, which are related to the problem of organization, prompt some patriots to complain of the difficulty of the task in hand. The task is difficult. But any mature revolutionary must convince himself that the revolution cannot be accomplished unless the peasants are organized, and that practical experience will help him steadily to improve political work among the peasants.

The right approach to the problem will be suggested not by books but by work on the spot, among the peasants. The peasant class is the one that confronts us with the greatest number of problems. One cannot do proper organizing work in the countryside without a specific knowledge of these problems, of the needs and aspirations of the peasantry. When the peasant has achieved economic gains under our devoted and enlightened leadership, he will fully trust us. And when we have won his trust, a beneficial wind will fan the flames of revolution in the countryside.

IMPORTANT STEP TOWARDS UNITY OF WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

A Communique* of the Consultative Meeting of Representatives of Communist and Workers' Parties of Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Britain, Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Finland, France, the German Democratic Republic, the Federal Republic of Germany, Hungary, India, Italy, Mongolia, Poland, Syria and the USSR was published in Pravda and in the Communist newspapers of many countries on March 10. Representatives of the Communist Party of the United States attended the Meeting in the capacity of observers.

The Communique and the proceedings of the Consultative Meeting have attracted the attention of all Communist and Workers' parties and of world democratic opinion.

The object of the Meeting, the Communique points out, was to hold consultations on questions of mutual interest. The participants exchanged opinions on the ways and means of surmounting the differences and strengthening the unity of the world Communist movement.

The excange of opinions, which proceeded in a friendly and free atmosphere, was fruitful and was concluded with the unanimous adoption of the documents which have now been published.

The conclusions of the Moscow Consultative Meeting are a weighty contribution to the struggle against imperialism and colonialism, for national liberation, for peace, democracy, and socialism. The participants in the Meeting were unanimous on the questions of anti-imperialist struggle, and expressed their resolve to rebuff firmly the aggressive actions of the world reactionary forces.

The keynote of the Meeting was the solidarity of the Communist movement. The participants expressed definitively the will of their parties to overcome the existing difficulties and differences, and achieve the unity of the Communists in the name of the great ideals of the working class and on the basis of a joint struggle against the common enemy. It is commonly known that during the Meeting the bourgeois press spread all kinds of fantastic stories about "insurmountable difficulties" which, they alleged, appeared at the time of the exchange of opinions. That the documents have been unanimously adopted by all the participants in the Meeting is a blow at the prophecies of anti-communist propaganda.

democratic approach in discussing issues facing the Communi movement, on the basis of genuine equality and respect for th opinions of the fraternal parties. Every delegation made its contri bution to the discussion which was imbued with the spirit of co lectivism, friendship, frankness and fraternity.

The documents of the meeting — the Communique and th Statement on the Events in Vietnam — express the profound inter nationalism of the parties participating in the consultation, thei concern for the unity of all fraternal parties, of all present-day revolutionary forces essential for the struggle against imperialism and colonialism, against the domination of monopoly capital, for active support of the liberation movement, for world peace and the security of the people.

Guided by the principles of Marxism-Leninism, the participants in the meeting placed the interests of the entire revolutionary movement above everything. They strove to halt further complications in the Communist movement, to facilitate, without detriment to any party, the provision of favorable conditions for overcoming the difficulties in its ranks, for the cohesion of all fraternal parties. They thought and acted in the common interests of world Communism. This is borne out by the spirit and content of the adopted documents. All fraternal parties, irrespective of the positions they at present hold on particular questions, will find in these documents ideas and propositions which accord with the interests of not any one part of our movement but with those of the entire world Communist movement, of all fighters against imperialism, for the cause of communism.

The Consultative Meeting of representatives of fraternal parties was held at a crucial moment for the international Communist movement.

During the past years world events have on the whole developed in a direction favorable for the cause of peace and socialism. The might of the socialist system has grown. Socialism is being built in the People's Democracies. The Soviet Union is sucessfully building communism. National liberation has attained new major successes; an ever greater number of young national states take the non-capitalist road of development, socialism as their bearing. The struggle against imperialist reaction is gaining momentum in the capitalist countries and due to this the realization that there must be unity of action of all political detachments of the labor movement asserts itself to an ever greater degree. The world balance of forces continues to change in favor of socialism and peace.

But this general trend of development asserts itself through overcoming serious difficulties and obstacles. Imperialism, primarily U.S. imperialism, is out to aggravate the situation in various parts of the world, to create new nidi of international crises. U.S. imperialism, the major international exploiter, acts as the bulwark of world reaction and the international gendarme. In recent months U.S. rulers have escalated military intervention in South Vietnam. They have taken the road of open aggression against the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, have subjected peaceful cities and villages of this socialist country to brutal bombings. There is no end to the provocations against revolutionary Cuba, against the peoples of Laos and the Congo. The imperialists are persistently striving to carry out plans for nuclear rearmament of the revenge-seeking forces in Europe. All this increases international tension and imperils world peace.

The Marxist-Leninists clearly see that the present situation demands of all Communist parties, all democratic and peace forces determined joint actions in the struggle against new aggressive sallies by imperialism. Effective measures should be taken to strengthen the peace and security of the peoples. All participants in the consultative meeting favored rendering active support to the national-liberation struggle of peoples, first of all those who have fallen victim to imperialist aggression.

The participants' common views on these questions found expression in the statement on the events in Vietnam. In this document the representatives of the fraternal parties voiced their warm solidarity with the Vietnamese people, the Working People's Party of Vietnam, and the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam which is waging a courageous struggle against foreign intervention. They urged all Communist parties and socialist countries, all forces of the national-liberation and working-class movements, all who uphold the cause of peace and progress to consolidate unity and solidarity in the struggle against imperialist aggression, for national independence, the peace and security of the peoples. On behalf of their parties the participants in the meeting demanded an immediate withdrawal of the troops of the United States and its satellites from South Vietnam and an end to armed attacks on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

The statement on the events in Vietnam is an important contribution to the anti-imperialist and revolutionary struggle. Developing active mass actions in all countries is to play a great part in the struggle against the aggressive actions of the U.S. brasshats in Vietnam.

The aggressive actions of U.S. imperialism in Southeast Asia are indignantly condemned by the Soviet people. No one should have the slightest doubt that the Soviet Union, the Soviet people will fulfill their international duty toward the fraternal socialist country — the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

All parties attending the consultative meeting have agreed that cohesion of all revolutionary forces represented by the socialist nations, the national-liberation movement and the international working class acquires a decisive significance in the present-day conditions. An essential prerequisite and basis for this is the strengthening of the unity of the world Communist movement.

The unity of the world Communist movement and the socialist camp multiplies their forces in the face of the common enemy. The differences among the Communists weaken their solidarity and cause harm to the world liberation movement, the cause of communism. The imperialists are attempting to use for their own ends the differences in the socialist community and the world Communist movement. The Marxist-Leninists cannot but draw important lessons from this situation.

It must also be taken into account that differences in the Communist movement adversely affect the activities of the fraternal parties, especially those in the capitalist countries. They do not at all contribute to the accomplishment of the main task of the Communists' struggle for the vital interests of the working people, for peace, democracy, national liberation and socialism.

Bearing all this in mind, the participants in the Meeting, as the Communique states, have expressed the firm determination of their parties to do everything in their power to cement the international Communist movement and strengthen its unity on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, on the basis of the line set forth in the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement.

Aware that the present controversies concern the political line and many important problems of theory and the tactics of the Communist parties, the participants in the Consultative Meeting have expressed their conviction that "what unites the Communist parties greatly outweighs that which at the present time disunites them." All fraternal parties have one enemy — imperialism. They have one aim — to ensure the victory of socialism and communism. All fraternal parties recognize Marxism-Leninism as their ideology. All of them declare their adherence to the common program formulated at the Moscow meetings of 1957 and 1960. Thus there are the necessary prerequisites for agreed actions of all fraternal parties in the struggle against their common enemy — imperialism, in the matter of all-round support for the peoples' liberation movement in the struggle for universal peace and peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems, for the vital interests and historical goals of the working class.

Such joint, agreed actions of all fraternal parties in the struggle against their common enemy are the real, vital basis for the cohesion of the Communist movement. At the same time this is the best way of overcoming the existing differences in its ranks. As Lenin repeatedly stressed, overcoming differences requires going by practical experience, the march of events itself, the lessons of the struggle. Social and political progress in the world and in separate countries will ultimately show which position is wrong and which is correct.

The participants in the Meeting were aware that it would take time to completely overcome the differences. They showed concern for the cohesion of the Communist movement in matters of principle. Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism teach that unity cannot be achieved either by some parties imposing their will on others, or by demanding that one or another party should abandon its political line. A principled approach in resolving the existing difficulties demands finding and concentrating on what unites all Communist parties, in spite of the existing differences. It is important already now to take steps, persistent and gradual, towards overcoming difficulties, towards unity.

Our Party favors this kind of principled approach to the struggle for unity. After the October CPSU Central Committee Plenary Meeting important steps were taken aimed at strengthening the cohesion of the socialist countries and of the entire world Communist movement on the basis of the common struggle against imperialism, for peace and socialism. In the past few months meetings and negotiations were held between the delegations of many fraternal parties. These were devoted, among other things, to seeking new ways and methods for settling the differences in the Communist movement.

Of major importance was the session of the Political Consultative Committee of the Warsaw Treaty member-countries which took place in January 1965 and was attended by a Soviet delegation headed by Comrades Brezhnev and Kosygin. This meeting of Party and government leaders of the socialist states showed that the socialist countries were united and in solidarity with each other in the face of the aggressive designs of the imperialists, and that the attempts to undermine this solidarity were doomed to failure.

The fraternal parties and the world public highly appraised the results of the trip of the Soviet government delegation headed by Comrade Kosygin to the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and to the Korean People's Democratic Republic. One can see from the joint statements adopted in Hanoi and Pyongyang that the positions of our countries in a broad range of general political issues either coincide or are completely identical. New steps were made to normalize Soviet-Chinese relations. For more than five months now the Soviet press has abstained from taking part in the public polemics so as to provide a favorable atmosphere for settling differences.

The Marxist-Leninist parties of the socialist and the capitalist countries are taking active measures aimed at strengthening the cohesion of the Communist movement. A big contribution to the cause of cohesion of the anti-imperialist forces and to the struggle for the unity of the world army of Communists was made by the recent conference of the representatives of the Communist parties of Latin American countries.

The Moscow Consultative Meeting is an important event in the extensive international work carried on by the Communists. As a result of an all-round and free exchange of opinions the participants expressed their unanimous conviction that all Communist parties should make collective efforts for strengthening the cohesion of the Communist movement.

The world Communist movement is a living organism, constantly developing together with the development of the life of society, with the changes in the conditions of the struggle waged by the working class of all countries. Accordingly, the forms of political and organizational ties between the parties also change and new ones arise in accordance with the requirements of the international revolutionary working-class movement. In the present-day conditions the Communist movement has found a good form of international solidarity — international meetings granting complete equality and independence to each fraternal party participating in them.

The question of preparing for and holding another international meeting has also been dealt with in the documents of the Consultative Meeting. On this issue the participants showed a new approach which takes into account the specific features of the present-day stage of development of the Communist movement. In the course of mutual consultations and taking into account the situation which has taken shape in the Communist movement, the parties represented at the Consultative Meeting expressed themselves in favor of seeking new ways of struggle for unity, and in this connection, new forms and methods of preparing for the Meeting. Though not assuming any organizational fnuctions, the participants nevertheless stated their views on the question of how to advance towards strengthening the cohesion of the Communist ranks.

The participants were unanimous in that it is necessary to make ample use of various methods and means available to Communists and tested in practice. Bilateral and multilateral meetings, the exchange of delegations, better information on the parties' activities, joint discussions of urgent issues, as well as other forms of Party contacts and exchange of opinions yield, as experience has shown, useful results and help close the ranks of the Communists. Joint actions against the common enemy — imperialism — are the most important of the ways leading to unity. At the same time the participants in the Meeting pointed out that active and all-round preparations for another international meeting to be held at a suitable date fully conforms to the interests of the world Communist movement.

Many events have taken place since the time of the previous international Communist meeting in 1960. New trends have developed in the world situation, new and rich experience has been accumulated in the working-class and liberation movement. It is necessary creatively to generalize that experience. But clearly this task can only be accomplished by the world Communist movement as a whole, and its very nature calls for the active participation of each Communist Party. "The participants, the Communique says, "are unanimous in the opinion that in present-day conditions, as it declared in the 1960 Statement, international meetings of Communist and workers' parties are an effective means of exchanging views and experience, enriching Marxist-Leninist theory by collective effort and working out a common attitude in the struggle for common aims."

Naturally, the democratic principles of independence and equality of all the fraternal parties should be observed in full in the process. Each Communist Party is fully independent and self-sufficient. It alone can adopt decisions binding on it. However, the participants emphasized that combining a party's efforts with those of the other parties in the struggle for the common international goals would promote the interests of every party.

They also emphasized that the international meetings were also important too as a major weapon in the struggle for overcoming differences and for solidly uniting the Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. Such a meeting, as a supreme international forum of Communists, would make it possible collectively to assess the situation in the Communist movement and determine the general features which indeed unite all the national detachments of the army of Communists. Naturally, nobody regards the Meeting as a panacea which will help overcome at once all the difficulties existing in our movement. The struggle for closer unity will call for sustained and great efforts and a positive contribution on the part of each fraternal party.

The present situation in the Communist movement, when there are differences between its separate detachments, necessitates thorough preparations for a new international meeting.

The new approach to the preparations for the meeting, contained in the Communique, is fully conducive to the provision of the favorable conditions for holding the Meeting. The essence of this new approach consists in having the entire preparatory work done on a collective basis, with the participation of all the fraternal parties. With this aim in view, it would be desirable to hold a preliminary consultative conference of the representatives of the parties that took part in the Moscow Meeting of 1960. This supremely democratic method would make it possible to take into account the opinions of all the parties.

The Consultative Meeting participants unanimously opposed the wait-and-see attitude in the matter of closing the ranks of the international army of Communists. They emphasized that it is necessary to work actively already now for creating a favorable atmosphere in the Communist movement. In this connection, the joint Communique emphasized, discontinuing the open polemics which are in character unfriendly and degrading to the fraternal parties and do damage to the common cause of the Communists, is of great importance.

Needless to say, this does not imply refusal to discuss important questions of our time, problems of theory and tactics. The Marxist-Leninists have always regarded a creative discussion of basic, and especially new problems as an essential condition for working out a correct political line. However, such a discussion should be conducted in a comradely way. It should be business-like and lead to unity, not to dissociation. It is important, as Lenin pointed out, that criticism among the Communists should concern the crux of the matter, and not assume forms capable of helping the class enemies of the proletariat.

The participants in the Meeting unanimously declared themselves in favor of the strict observance of the standards governing relations between parties as defined by the 1957 and 1960 meetings. As we know, the 1960 Statement points out that the interests of the Communist movement demand the solid observance by every Communist Party of assessments and conclusions jointly worked out by the fraternal parties at their meetings and related to the common tasks of struggle against imperialism, for peace, democracy and socialism, and the prevention of any action which might undermine the unity of the Communists of all countries.

Expressing their views on the ways of surmounting the difficulties in the world Communist movement and of its further development, the participants in the Meeting were guided by the sole aim of helping to the utmost to strengthen the Marxist-Leninist unity of the Communist ranks in the struggle against imperialism and colonialism, for national liberation, peace, democracy, socialism and communism. Therefore, they had every ground to express confidence that all the fraternal parties would respond favorably to the Meeting. Comradely exchange of opinions on the propositions set forth in the Communique, the collective effort for their implementation, and joint action in the common struggle are a reliable way of consolidating the Communist movement on the principles of Marxism-Leninism. The Consultative Meeting, which has taken place, opens new prospects and creates conditions for the accomplishment of this historic task.

For its part, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union will continue to spare no effort in cementing the unity of the world Communist movement. The Soviet Communists will never tire of doing all they can to achieve this aim, for it accords with the vital interests of the international working class, of all revolutionary and progressive forces.

COMMUNIQUE*

OF THE POLITICAL BUREAU, FRENCH COMMUNIST PARTY

Having heard Comrade Raymond Guyot's report on the Consultative Meeting of representatives of nineteen Communist and Workers' Parties, which was held in Moscow from March 1-5, 1965, the Political Bureau of the French Communist Party approves the activity of its delegation and the Communique unanimously adopted by the parties assembled in Moscow.

The Meeting, inspired by fraternal cooperation and unity, made it possible to search, through a fruitful exchange of views, for ways of overcoming the divergences in the world Communist movement and of promoting its unity against imperialism, for peace and democracy, for the independence of the peoples, for socialism.

The Political Bureau stresses that the convening of a new international conference of the parties would fully meet the interests of the world Communist movement, as it says in the Moscow Communique. It approves of the projected measures for active and careful preparations for the conference. In particular, it considers that a preliminary consultative meeting of representatives of the 81 Parties which attended the world conference of 1960 would be desirable.

The new international conference of the parties would make it possible to determine the general direction of the movement as a whole which have occurred in the international situation since the 1960 Conference. It would also help promote the unity of the world Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism, and the general line defined in the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement—an essential condition for further gains for the anti-imperialist forces of the world.

Prompted by the principles defined by the world conferences of 1957 and 1960 and by its own congresses, the French Communist Party will maintain its active solidarity toward those peoples who are victims of imperialism and colonialism. The Moscow Meeting expressed its solidarity with the heroic Vietnamese people and the Party of Working People of Vietnam, and called for international solidarity in the struggle against the acts of aggression committed by imperialism, primarily U.S. imperialism, in various parts of the world.

*L'Humanité, March 12, 1965.

The French Communist Party will work for stronger fraternal and militant bonds with all the Communists and Workers' parties. It will contribute to the attainment of the objectives set by the Moscow Meeting of March 1-5, 1965, to ensure the convening and success of a new world conference of the Communist and Workers' parties, with a view to promoting the Marxist-Leninist unity of the Communists in the struggle against imperialism, for the national liberation of the peoples, for peace and peaceful co-existence of countries with different social systems, for the vital interests and historical goals of the working class.

Paris, March 11, 1965

THE ICP LEADERSHIP ON THE MOSCOW MEETING*

On March 8 the Central Committee delegation which took part in the Consultative Meeting of representatives of the Communist and Workers' parties of various countries in Moscow informed the ICP leadership of the work of the Meeting and the conclusion drawn by it. The leadership approved the activity of the delegation, which upon consulting the leading bodies of the Party and in keeping with the powers it had received signed in the spirit of unity the Communique formulated at the close of the debate, statements, and comparison of opinions of the parties which attended the Meeting.

The ICP leadership notes with satisfaction that the Meeting assumed, and fundamentally maintained, not a deliberative but a consultative character, the character of a friendly and fruitful exchange of views on the tasks in the struggle of the world Communist movement and on the problems of its unity.

The ICP leadership considers it a positive fact that the closing document emphasizes the need to promote joint actions in the fight against imperialism, for peace and, accordingly, for more bilateral and multilateral contacts between all the parties, which is the chief way really to further the unity of the whole movement and of all the forces of liberation and progress, to localize the existing divergences and overcome the erroneous positions which are at their root.

Now that the international situation has been aggravated by the increased aggressiveness of the more reactionary leading groups of the West, this is the best way to meet the will of the masses for unity, to help shape a strategy corresponding to the new world problems which have arisen in these years, and to the complexity which the democratic and revolutionary movement has assumed. This is the best way to foster the maturing in the course of time of political conditions that are also necessary for arriving at an eventual international conference that would be unitary, constructive and fruitful.

However, experience has confirmed that this line calls for a more careful and deep-going appraisal of the international situation also in the light of the analysis made and the conclusion drawn by the conferences of 1957 and 1960. It implies that the eventual international conference should be seen not as prerequisite for but as the culmination of a gradual process of restoring unity.

The delegation of our Party emphatically drew the attention of the other parties at the Meeting to these points. It upheld our Party's opinion that any future initiative having a different trend by virtue of its untimeliness or its character would be inopportune.

The ICP leadership considers it more necessary than ever that the unity of the working-class and Communist movement—with each party retaining its autonomy—the unity of all the liberation forces, and the broadest unity of all the democratic and peace-loving forces be promoted with the greatest sense of responsibility, and that in so doing the struggle for peaceful coexistence and the anti-colonial and anti-imperialist struggle be connected indissolubly.

The Italian Communist Party will continue to make its contribution in order to forestall crystallization or exacerbation of the present divergences in the Communist and working-class movement, shatter the enemy's hope of a permanent division of the movement, and foster—through joint militant initiative, multilateral contacts in every direction, and open and constructive discussion—all that is likely to encourage and ensure the restoration of unity.

JOINT STATEMENT*

BY THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF DENMARK AND THE SOCIALIST UNITY PARTY OF GERMANY

On February 18 and 19, 1965, delegations from the CC, CP of Denmark and the CC, SUPG held discussions in Berlin, capital of the German Democratic Republic.

The Communist Party of Denmark was represented by K. Jespersen, Chairman of the Party, and P. Emanuel, I. Nirlund and I. Wagner, members of the Executive.

The Socialist Unity Party of Germany was represented by H. Matern, member of the CC, Political Bureau, H. Axen, alternate member of the CC, Political Bureau, P. Florin, member of the CC, and W. Lambertz, alternate member of the CC.

The delegations discussed problems of mutual interest. The two parties agree that a decisive step has to be taken in order to safeguard European security. The division of Europe into hostile military alliances as a result of the cold war can be ended by establishing a European security system on the principles of the peaceful coexistence of independent countries irrespective of distinctions in their social systems, and on the principle of the inviolability of frontiers. This calls for joint efforts to ease and normalize the relations between European states.

The policy pursued by the ruling classes of West Germany and supported by the United States is the greatest obstacle to a durable peace in Europe. This is evident, among other things, from the West German government's effort to gain control of atomic weapons through a multilateral nuclear force, Atlantic nuclear force, or other organizations of a similar type, as well as that government's plans for an atomic belt as a link of the aggressive "forward strategy."

The West German government's intention to apply the statute of limitations to the war criminals of the Hitler period is a further indication that giving the Bonn militarists access to the nuclear weapon would constitute the greatest threat to European peace. It would increase tensions in Europe and invite counter-measures on the part of those threatened.

The spokesmen of the CP of Denmark told about the proposals of their Party for a peace policy, which should consist in Denmark declaring itself an atom-free and neutral area. This would help establish atom-free zones in Northern and Central Europe and promote detente and disarmament in this part of the world. The Danish government's assurances to the effect that it will oppose the stationing of atomic arms on Danish soil, Denmark's refusal to participate in a multilateral nuclear force, and the statement about the principles of peaceful coexistence, particularly about the application of these principles in the Baltic area—show that these ideas are gaining ground. The CPD therefore re-emphasizes the importance of the initiative taken by it in 1963 and supported by Denmark's socialist neighbors, which readily agree to participate in guaranteeing a neutral and denuclearized zone in Northern Europe. This would be an appreciable contribution to European peace. The delegation of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany declared that it fully shares this point of view.

The spokesmen of the SUPG supplied information on the initiative which the GDR had taken to ease tension in Europe. It includes proposals for the two German states to disclaim the right to possess nuclear weapons, for the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Germany, and the neutralization of the two German states from the military point of view. An agreement could also be reached on control measures precluding a surprise attack from the territory of either German state. The proposals of the GDR envisage normalization of the relations between the two German states and West Berlin. These and other constructive proposals of the GDR have repeatedly been conveyed to West Germany and West Berlin but West Germany has not accepted them, with the result that tension has grown.

The two parties stressed the positive significance of the normalization of relations between Denmark and the GDR and the need to take steps with this aim in view. Expanded economic relations should benefit both countries. It was shown once again that there are real opportunities of fostering cultural exchanges through cooperation.

The two delegations also discussed the situation in the world Communist movement. They established that they are unanimous on the fundamental problems of the Communist movement as regards the steps which are being taken to further the unity and solidarity of the world Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism.

The two Parties stressed their fraternal solidarity with the people of South Vietnam, who are fighting for their freedom, and with the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

The discussions proceeded in an atmosphere of cordiality and friendship.

BRITAIN'S CRISIS

THE COMMUNIST SOLUTION*

Britain is again in the grip of a severe balance of payments crisis. The government has had to borrow heavily abroad to meet a huge deficit.

This crisis was growing during the summer of 1964 under the Tories, but for election purposes they tried to cover it up. It exploded almost immediately after the election.

A crisis of this kind is likely to lead to rising prices, wage restraint and unemployment. We are all involved.

So it is urgent for everyone to find out the cause and how to deal with it.

The official explanation is the same every time such a crisis occurs—Britain isn't exporting enough to pay her way.

And the remedy put forward is always the same—bring down the cost of exports, especially wage costs. So it is always the workers who pay.

The employers insist that it is the higher wages and salaries of British workers in comparison with other European workers that are responsible for the difficulties of British industry. They have been harping on this theme for years.

But European wages and prices have been rising faster than those in Britain. According to the International Monetary Fund, the annual average increase in wage rates in the United Kingdom between 1958 and 1964 was 4 per cent, not much more than half the average rise in the Common Market countries. Moreover in all the advanced countries on the continent, wages are rising faster than production.

It isn't British wage and salary increases that cause the crisis.

It is the policy of the government. That is what determines what happens to the balance of payments.

Every government since 1945 has tried to:

1. maintain British economic power and influence, at tremendous costs, in former colonial countries all over the world;
2. carry on colonial wars;
3. keep up the cold war against the socialist countries;
4. carry out its obligations to NATO;
5. maintain the City as an international financial center;
6. develop as a nuclear power;

*Abridged from a pamphlet published by the Communist Party of Britain.

7. improve British industry.

Trying to do all this has meant acute economic strain, an enormous military expenditure, lagging industry and social services.

This policy causes recurring crises.

The troops and bases overseas, now maintained directly from British taxation are costing £350 million a year—£100 million in West Germany and £250 million in the rest of the world—mostly east of Suez, where the Labor Government seems to be as passionately interested in maintaining British monopoly interests in oil, tin and rubber as the Tories were.

No other European country is paying out such a sum.

In addition, Britain is committed to the military alliances of NATO and CENTO, under the effective control of the U.S. This means an ever more costly army, navy and air force, now scattered all over the world; its purpose is to secure allies for maintaining British monopoly interests overseas.

During the last 80 years, British capitalism has poured vast sums into its empire or Commonwealth, to get super-profits on its investments. It did so in preference to bringing its own industries up to date and developing the new industries of the 20th century. There are of course powerful new industries and firms in Britain. But the bulk of our industry remains relatively backward; and the export of capital continues at the rate of £350 million a year.

To these have to be added the trading figures—the goods sold by Britain from other countries—and the final balance of payments is arrived at.

The present crisis centers round the huge deficit in this payment account—£800 million.

But if the bill for military expenditure overseas was drastically cut and export of capital checked, we would save nearly the whole of the deficit.

This is the key to solving the balance of payments crisis.

In 1964 there was a deficit of around £500 million. We sold abroad approximately £4,564 million and bought from other countries £5,063 million in goods.

How can the adverse balance be cleared?

Some imports could be replaced by British goods. Huge oil imports are brought in because big business gets large profits from it. As a result coal pits are closed down here and coal wasted.

If all the bans on trade with the socialist countries were ended this would boost exports.

We could get a big development of trade with the newly independent countries in Africa and Asia. These countries need machinery and equipment to build up their own industry; but they can only buy on long-term credits. British business men don't want these countries to develop their own industry so credits are hard to come by.

A different policy by the Labor Government could mean a reduction in imports and an increase in exports.

Britain spends a greater proportion of her national income on the armed forces than any other country in the world with the exception of the U.S.

U.S.	11%	United Kingdom	8%
West Germany	7%	France	7%

The British arms bill is steadily growing.

1959	—	£1,514 million
1961	—	£1,683 "
1963	—	£1,871 "
1964	—	£2,200 "

In 1963 military expenditure was 26% of all government expenditure (excluding National Insurance Funds); in 1964 it was between 28% and 29%.

This means a terrible waste of resources that could be used for important social purposes, for education, the health service, pensions and housing.

It means a very great waste of labor. About 360,000 workers, most of them highly skilled, are employed on defense contracts.

On defense research about 10,000 very highly qualified scientific workers are involved and a further 30,000 with lower qualifications.

Yet at this moment British industries engaged in export work are in need of both scientifically trained and skilled manpower.

If the government cut arms production by half and turned the factories now producing arms into producing civilian goods for export, it would help the whole export trade.

Faced with the crisis in the balance of payments the Labor Government has taken the same sort of measures as the Tories did.

It decided to cut imports and imposed a surcharge of 15% on top of the existing tariffs. This was a blow against the British people for it meant an increase in the cost of living. It was also a blow against foreign trade.

It borrowed large sums from foreign banks and from the International Monetary Fund. The conditions attached to the loans have not been revealed but they will undoubtedly tie Britain more closely to U.S. policy; and almost certainly mean great pressure to economize on social services.

Then the Government decided to raise the Bank Rate to the crisis rate of 7%. This means higher interest rates all round, and is a dose of the old stop-go medicine which will slow down the economy and create unemployment.

Finally the Bank of England appealed to the Americans and others and overnight the emergency loan of 3,000 million dollars was made available by the central banks of 11 countries.

The international loans have not really solved anything. The basic problem remains. And the international institutions, especially those of the U.S., have established a financial stranglehold on Britain which they will use to influence and restrict British Government policy.

From the day of its election the Labor Government has gone out of its way to assure big business and the City of its goodwill and understanding. We now know that there will be no serious effort to tax profits heavily, and the proposed wealth tax has been abandoned.

Mr. George Brown, Minister for Economic Affairs, has persuaded the employers' organizations and the Trades Union Congress to cooperate with the government for an incomes policy. They have signed a "declaration of intent." The idea is that they will try to get a faster rate of economic development without bringing about any rise in prices.

This will be the marvel of the century, for such a thing has never happened in the whole history of the capitalist system.

The Labor leaders claim that their incomes policy will:

Help to modernize British industry, sell more goods abroad, greatly improve foreign trade and put an end to the dreary succession of crises.

End the continuous rise in retail prices, rents and mortgages and give a better deal to women workers and low paid workers.

Be fair to workers and employers because it would control the rise of prices and profits as well as wages and salaries.

Would an incomes policy help to modernize British industry?

On the contrary, it is likely to have just the opposite effect. Already a large section of British firms manage to evade modernization. They get by and keep their costs down by paying low wages.

An incomes policy, by lessening trade union pressure, will only confirm them in their ways. Only half-hearted, make-believe modernization will be attempted.

The coal, steel and motor industries, sections of engineering and docks know that if they want to survive they must improve their productive capacity. Because they also know that their workers are fully determined to get wage increases at every possible opportunity.

The only final solution is to take over industry in the interests of the people.

Those who want to lessen the pressure for higher wages are not only delaying modernization; they are also standing in the way of extended nationalization.

The essence of an incomes policy is that the workers must refrain from pushing up wages and salaries as far as they can go when conditions are favorable.

They must keep to a limit, the "guiding light," based upon the estimated increase in production over the whole of industry.

At present this guiding light sets the limit of 3½ per cent for wage and salary increases in any given year.

This does not mean that all wages and salaries must come up to that limit. But it does mean that no group of workers, however much they produce, should try to push their wage beyond that limit.

In a lot of industries, both state and private, production per worker (productivity) is rising much faster than 3½ per cent.

Such industries are mining and electricity supply, chemicals, motors, docks, food processing, oil refining, some sections of engineering.

If wages in these sections of industry are held down then profits in them will rise very fast indeed. The idle shareholders will get richer at the expense of the workers.

When the supporters of an incomes policy talk about wages they mean all that makes up a worker's pay packet—wage rates, together with incentive payments. The whole pay packet must not rise more than 3½ per cent per year.

There are other experts who want to abolish all kinds of incentive payments altogether. Those workers who think that an incomes policy would merely restrict the rise in centrally negotiated wage rates and leave them free to push up wages in the factory, are in for a very rude awakening.

Under the guise of "modernization," incentive payments for extra effort and skill have to be stopped.

Some union leaders argue that if the workers in the higher paid industries accept wages that are lower than those they could force their employers to grant, this will in some way help the lower paid workers in other industries.

This is nonsense. If the workers in motors, or steel or some sections of engineering, refrain from pushing up their wages, this will not help the lower paid workers in local government service or public transport or the post office, or in badly paid, inefficient industries.

The extra profits that would go to the employers in motors or steel would not be available to increase the wages of workers in the cleansing departments of our city councils. Indeed if all workers have to accept wage increases of 3½ per cent per year, this will widen the gap between the highly paid and the poorly paid jobs.

Of course within a single industry, the unions could agree to advance the women and lower paid workers faster than the others. But if an incomes policy was operating this would mean that the total wage bill would only advance 3½ per cent. The higher paid workers would accept slightly less than 3½ per cent so that the lower paid would get slightly more.

Would an incomes policy help women workers?

No. It would continue the tremendous difference between men's and women's wages.

In April 1964, average earnings for men in industry were £17.12s.5d. a week. Average women's earnings were £8.16s.4d. The average working week for men was 47.8 hours and for women 40 hours.) If we had an incomes policy which laid it down that wages or salaries might only rise by 3½ per cent per year, this gap would never be closed.

So women should reject the incomes policy and demand that the Labor Government carries out its policy of equal pay for equal work. Would it control prices?

Not very likely—every week prices go up.

Take a large firm whose profits are increased because of wage and salary restraint. According to the supporters of an incomes policy, such firms would reduce their prices and all consumers would benefit.

But would they? Large monopolist firms seldom compete these days by reducing prices. A price war is a risky operation which could get out of control and sharply reduce profits. They prefer to compete by lavish and lying advertising. What puts prices up?

It is a common belief that prices always rise because wages and salaries have risen beforehand.

This is not true. The large firms are always looking for opportunities to push up prices.

In 1963 when the country was beginning to recover from the depression of 1961-2, firms at once started pushing up their prices, whether there had been a wage increase or not.

Sometimes when there was a slight wage increase, firms increased the prices of their goods enormously. The increase in engineering wages at the end of 1963 raised costs by at most 2½ per cent. Yet the price of some engineering goods increased by 8 per cent, 10 per cent and 12 per cent.

It often happens that when the prices of any raw material go up, the big firms at once pass this on to the price of the finished goods. Would it control profits?

Not in the same way that wage and salary increases are to be controlled. But firms are to be allowed to earn as much profit as they can. It is only later that there may be an enquiry as to whether these profits are "excessive."

Only when the total profits of the whole industry rise much faster than the total wages and salaries bill does the government promise to correct the position by taxation.

How it reconciles this with its promise to the employers to impose no fresh taxation on profits in its April budget is not explained.

One thing is certain—a lot of the extra profits earned by the large firms as a result of wage restraint will stick to their fingers.

So an incomes policy means that the great firms and their shareholders are to be given preferential treatment over the workers.

An incomes policy would take from the trade unions one of their most important functions—demanding and bargaining for higher wages and better conditions for their members.

Workers would see no advantage in joining unions which are compelled to keep within the bounds of a government guiding light.

HOW TO SOLVE THE CRISIS

In the general election, the Communist Party said that Britain's crisis could not be solved without radical action on two vital issues.

First, the power of big business must be challenged. Secondly, military expenditure must be drastically cut.

We warned that, unless it took these steps a Labor Government would face disaster, lose support and open the way for a Tory comeback.

Every day's events underline the truth of that warning.

British and foreign capitalist interests are now bringing the utmost pressure to bear on the Labor Government. They want measures that will help big business over the crisis, at the expense of the people.

The Labor Government must resist this pressure and break with the old, Tory policies of the past.

The crisis can be solved in the interests of the people, if the government will now undertake the kind of program we set out here.

Cut the arms bill by half; close down overseas bases and the U.S. Polaris base here.

Make special plans to help workers (scientific, manual and administrative) to transfer from the arms industry to the production of essential exports.

Abandon the NATO nuclear force or any similar project which would give the West Germans a finger on the nuclear trigger.

End the colonial wars in the Middle East and S.E. Asia. They are a running sore, undermining the economic health of Britain.

With £1,000 million, half the arms bill, we could:

Raise pensions, unemployment and sickness pay to £5 a week with £4 for a dependent wife and £1 for each child.

Build 60 new hospitals, each with 500 beds.

Build 120 new secondary schools, each with 500 places.

Build 400 miles of three-lane, by-pass roads.

Abolish all health service charges for treatment, appliances and welfare foods.

To make it effective—nationalize steel and other essential industries such as chemicals (including petro-chemicals); oil refining;

key sections of engineering including motors, electronics and machine tools; building materials and building (including firms on industrial building).

Take over the land of the big landowners.

Make a start on a great government building program for homes, schools, hospitals and roads.

Bring the Bank of England under government control.

Tighter controls over all financial institutions and strengthen exchange controls.

The workers need to be protected against the dangers of unemployment through the rapid development of automation.

Working hours must be reduced to 35 per week. Firms must retain redundant workers until other jobs are found.

There must be an all round improvement in technical training and retraining for workers, with full wages during retraining.

Trade associations must not be permitted to raise prices to make the consumers pay for increases in wages or taxation.

Building societies and hire purchase companies must not be allowed to increase interest rates.

Interest rates for housing, public building and mortgages for owner-occupiers, must be reduced.

The government should prevent the large firms which are the price leaders or dominate the retail trade from increasing prices.

Appoint trade union and cooperative representatives to strengthen the monopolies commission, and give it powers to deal with price-fixing.

The monopolies commission must examine all suggested mergers.

The government should adopt a positive wages policy.

It should declare its intention to promote equal pay for women in private as well as publicly-owned industry and encourage early negotiations on this question.

Increased wages for the lower paid workers, who need help in organizing from the unions, and more protection from the state.

Wages in the government service must quickly catch up with those in outside industry.

Retirement pensions, unemployment and sickness benefits should be increased at once to £5 a week.

The enquiry into the trade unions should be abandoned. It was a Tory scheme to discredit the unions. The Labor Government should drop it.

What this country needs is a bigger Communist Party.

The policy put forward in these pages is the only way to solve Britain's immediate crisis. This is Communist policy.

If these measures were taken they could be the first steps on the road to socialism which is, in the long run, the only final answer to Britain's problems.

INTERVIEW* WITH MAX REIMANN

IN LE DRAPEAU ROUGE

Q. In a few weeks, on May 8, it will be 20 years since the end of the war. What does the Communist Party of Germany think of the views and policies the different Bonn governments have upheld so far?

A. We regard the 20th anniversary of the termination of World War II as a call to us and to all the peace-loving and democratic forces in the Federal Republic. It is a reminder of our duty to see to it that never again is a war unleashed from German territory, to safeguard peace in Germany and in Europe. This has been, and remains, the keynote of our policy.

Scorning the lessons of history and the principles of the Potsdam agreement, West Germany has restored the economic and political might of the German imperialists and militarists with the help of the imperialist occupation forces. The Federal Republic is ruled by 94 multi-millionaries represented, first by the Adenauer government and now by the Erhard government.

Aided by the imperialist occupation forces, the monopolists dominating the Federal Republic have divided Germany. What for? In order to retain their domination and spearhead the Federal Republic against the socialist countries. The governments of Adenauer and Erhard have, for their part, resumed the old policy of armament and violence.

To realize their admittedly revanchist aims in a changed situation, they have aligned themselves with U.S. imperialism and joined NATO.

German imperialism is acquiring an increasing weight in NATO. The Federal Republic has become the strongest economic power in Western Europe; it has almost the biggest army and holds more command posts in NATO than any other member. It is West Germany that today presents the gravest danger to European peace.

Disregard for the Potsdam agreements led to a policy characterized, under both the Adenauer and the Erhard governments, by aggressive aspirations abroad and reactionary actions at home. These aspirations have invariably been aimed at revising the results of World War II through a war of conquest and revenge, at developing the capitalist system in the Federal Republic, and at going over from the postwar period to a new prewar period. This is the only explanation for the frantic desire to obtain atomic weapons and for the monstrous intention of installing an atomic mine belt along the border with the German Democratic Republic. This explains the fact that to date the Federal Republic has spent on rearmament almost 40,000 million marks more than Hitler spent prior to 1939. It explains the recent encouragement of chauvinism and advocacy of an atomic forward strategy and "camouflaged war" for the purpose of conquering the German Democratic Republic. It explains the eagerness to have emergency legislation making it possible to introduce military jurisdiction even in peacetime, and the ardent desire to exempt the Nazi war criminals from all prosecution as from May 8.

It is therefore fair to say that the views and policies of the different Bonn governments have always been anti-national and hostile to peace. Things have come to a point where there is the danger of an atomic war emanating from West Germany, a war which could not but end in the self-destruction of our population and bring indescribable suffering to the peoples of Europe. This must not be allowed to happen. It must be prevented. This is what our policy and our struggle are aimed at, all the more since the unrealistic nature and the untenability of Bonn's entire foreign policy is becoming increasingly evident. If added proof is needed, it is furnished by the visit which Walter Ulbricht, Premier of the German Democratic Republic, paid to the United Arab Republic. The results of that visit spotlighted the urgency of a new orientation of the entire West German policy.

Q. What solution does the Communist Party of Germany counterpose to the policy of Bonn?

A. Our Party counterposes a national policy, a peaceful and democratic alternative, to the peace-endangering and anti-national policy of the Erhard government and the parties favoring nuclear armament and emergency legislation, as well as of the Wehner-Erler group in the Social Democratic Party pursuing a policy of collaboration with the Christian Democratic Party.

This national policy we propose implies renunciation of atomic armament in any form, and the Federal Republic's contribution towards disarmament; support for the suggested non-nuclear zone in Central Europe; peaceful relations with all states and peoples; no emergency legislation; respect for the Constitution; social security and a change in taxation; a detente, an agreement between the two German states on disarmament and on a preparations for German reunification.

Enforcing this policy through united actions by the working class and all the popular forces fighting against the aggressive forces of monopoly capital and militarism is what the Federal Republic needs if it is to become a peace-loving and democratic state and to translate into reality the call of May 8: never again shall Germany start a new war, which this time would be an atomic war!

Q. On what basis could German reunification be achieved? What are, from this point of view, the mistakes made by Bonn? How does the CPG envision reunification?

A. I have just said how Bonn's policy may be appraised. It is an anti-national policy aimed at forcibly incorporating the German Democratic Republic, the first German state of workers and peasants, in the Federal Republic of Germany.

Those in power in Bonn have never pursued a policy of German reunification; they have always steered the opposite course. They spilt Germany and withdrew West Germany from the German national community by integrating it in NATO. Their every action deepened the gulf between the two German states. Their policy of revenge and atomic war, and the atomic mine belt they want to lay across Germany are aggravating the division and endangering the very existence of the German nation. They have given nuclear armament and militarization priority over every proposal of the German Democratic Republic for reunification.

In our opinion, the essence of the German national question in the present conditions is to prevent a new war from originating on the soil of the Federal Republic.

Two independent states exist on German territory today: the monopolist Federal Republic, and the socialist German Democratic Republic, a state based on peace, freedom and social progress. Only the prevention of atomic armament, only a detente and agreement between the two Germanys can pave the way for a peaceful solution of the national problem, for closer links between the two states. We also think that the road will be cleared to the extent that the domination of the imperialists and militarists in the Federal Republic is curbed and defeated and that the working class and all the other democratic forces of the people unite to acquire, through the free exercise of the right to self-determination, decisive influence on the state, the economy, and society.

We Communists say to the population of the Federal Republic: reunification is the affair of the German people. We demand the right to self-determination for the West German population.

We consider that a detente and agreement between the two German states should begin by either side renouncing — without preliminary mutual recognition — the use of force and nuclear weapons in any form, and pledging to freeze armaments and cut military spending. With a view to ending the division, both states should agree on the establishment of common working organs on a parity basis. In other words, we favor the setting up of all-

German commissions to discuss all questions of common interest relating to economy, trade and transport, joint scientific and technological work, experience in culture, education, social policy and public health. Conditions for the peaceful coexistence of the two German states can only be created by defeating the cold war policy and curbing the influence of monopoly capital and militarism on life in the Federal Republic.

That is how one could proceed in the future to establish a confederation of the two German states as a first step towards the democratic reunification of our people in a single peace-loving state.

The important thing, however, is to realize that unity of the working class of the two German states, cooperation of the workers' parties of the two parts of Germany, and the development of a united fighting front are necessary conditions for German reunification.

Such are our proposals regarding the initial steps towards reunification. They are part and parcel of our national policy, and when the matter concerns the nation, peace, freedom, and social and cultural progress, everyone can rely on the Communist Party of Germany.

Q. It is more than eight years since the Communist Party was banned in West Germany. Of late many people, in particular, in West Germany, have declared in favor of the restoration of the rights of the CPG. What are the prospects of your Party in this respect today? What can the democratic forces in other countries do to have the ban lifted?

A. Indeed, in recent weeks and months more and more people in the Federal Republic have been demanding legalization of the Communist Party. Prompted by democratic sentiments, our compatriots in various parts of the Federal Republic have independently of one another taken the initiative of sending petitions to the Bundestag in which they advocate freedom of action for the CPG. Thousands of people have supported this demand by signing the petitions.

A public discussion on this subject has started in the press, radio and television in which even Federal ministers are constrained to take part. The increasingly explicit demand that the ban on the CPG be ended arises from the discontent of many citizens of the Federal Republic with Bonn's policies and practices. More and more people link the demand for the reinstatement of the CPG with the hope that this will make it possible effectively to oppose the policy of nuclear war and revenge pursued by the West German capitalist munitions manufacturers and their Erhard government, to replace this policy with a policy of peace, detente and unity. There is a growing desire to hear the opinion of the Communists themselves, and not of the anti-Communists, on the fundamental problems of our time. This desire is particularly strong among the young people, who rightly want to know the truth but get no satisfactory answer from the rulers of the Federal Republic.

I know also that the ban on the CPG is being discussed among a number of members and functionaries of the Social-Democratic Party of West Germany. Most of them reject the ban as undemocratic and unconstitutional. Many Social-Democrats want the legalization of the CPG in the interest of the SDP itself, for with a legalized CPG the Wehner-Erler leadership of the SDP would be unable to pursue its policy of collaboration with the CDU-CSU and the Erhard government as freely as now. Besides, a legalized CPG would inspire those forces in the Social-Democratic Party which want an independent SDP policy.

The decree banning the CPG on August 17, 1956, was a political decision of the Adenauer government. The ruling circles wanted thereby to remove from the life of the Federal Republic the only force which could offer the people of West Germany a genuine alternative. But the Communists cannot be removed. They are part of the working class and the people.

Our Party survived Hitler's dictatorship, and it will also survive the government of Erhard and those who back it.

We demand that the Federal government take steps to lift the ban on the CPG. As a first step we propose a political amnesty and discontinuance of all the current court trials connected with the ban. I have written to Chancellor Erhard about this twice.

However, not a single German Communist entertains the illusion that the legalization of the Party will come one fine day as a gift from on high. We know that the legality of our Party will be restored only when all the Communists in the Federal Republic will do everything to uphold the peaceful, democratic and social interests of the population and thus show, in particular to the working class, that a legal Communist Party can support the workers' struggle for legitimate demands more effectively.

The movement for a legal Communist Party will grow as we succeed in convincing people that ours is the right policy, and will ultimately compel the ruling circles to authorize the free operation of the CPG.

I would like to express my heartfelt thanks to the democratic forces of your country, in particular the Belgian Communists, for the important support they have been giving to our struggle for the restoration of the rights of our Party.

Your actions against German imperialism and militarism and against their demand for atomic weapons, and your petitions to the Erhard government in support of the Communist Party of Germany have helped us considerably in the struggle to curb German imperialism and militarism and made an effective contribution towards the early restoration of the rights of our Party.

REPLY FROM KIM IL SUNG

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, KOREAN PARTY OF LABOR AND THE CABINET OF MINISTERS OF THE KOREAN PEOPLE'S DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC, REPLIES* TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE KOREAN INSTITUTE, WASHINGTON

I have received your letter.

I am very glad that you devote so much attention to the issue of reunifying the country.

As you know, our country has been suffering from territorial and national division for twenty years now.

A new generation has grown up. Yet contacts and relations between North and South Korea are still lacking, to say nothing of the reunification of the country, a long-time dream of the people. The artificial division of the nation persists.

The gulf between the North and the South continues to increase in every sphere of political, economic and cultural life, and even the national traits of our people — a single nation with a long history — are gradually becoming different.

The split of the nation precludes the rallying of the forces of the people and the use of the riches of our country for its development. It causes unbearable suffering to the whole Korean people.

The division of Korea into a northern and a southern part is a source of incalculable misfortune and hardship, particularly for the South Korean population.

One cannot expect the whole people to prosper, nor can the people of South Korea be helped out of its plight, unless the split of the country is overcome and Korea reunites.

It is perfectly natural that the South Korean masses should complain, saying that it is impossible to live in a divided country any longer. Many people with a high degree of national consciousness are courageously fighting for the reunification of their country.

The reunification of the country is an urgent task of the whole nation. In our view, it is high time for every Korean who loves his country and is concerned with its future to do all in his power for reunification.

The whole world knows that our government has been working hard, in compliance with the desire and will of the whole Korean people, for the restoration of Korean unity.

*Nodon Shinmun, Jan. 8, 1965.

We hold that the solution of the problem of reunification should not be delayed for the benefit of certain groups or privileged quarters and to the detriment of the national interest. We hold that reunification should be effected on democratic lines, in keeping with the will of the whole Korean people, with neither side trying to impose its will under any circumstances. We allow no one to impose his will on us and do not for our part intend to impose our will on others. We have always insisted on the North and South Korean authorities, political parties, mass organizations and leaders meeting at the round table for an earnest and impartial discussion of the issue of reunification, with the aim of settling it.

I want to explain once again that our government will continue to do all it can for reunification in accordance with the desire of the people and with the national interest, and that it is willing to consider anyone's opinion if it is likely to make reunification easier.

Your letter sets forth views which largely coincide with a number of reunification proposals repeatedly put forward by us.

We have always held that the reunification of the country can and should be achieved solely by peaceful means, on the principles of independence and democracy, without any outside interference.

We think every outside attempt at forcible reunification is illusory and is aimed at delivering the whole of Korea into the hands of imperialist aggressors.

The issue of Korean reunification is an internal concern of the Korean people in which no outside force should be allowed to interfere. It is for the Koreans themselves to settle the Korean question. No foreigners may decide the domestic affairs of our country. Our people are intelligent and civilized, and have sufficient means to solve their national problem by themselves.

The U.S. imperialists, who have occupied South Korea and interfere in the internal affairs of our country by following a disruptive and aggressive policy against the whole of Korea, are the main obstacle to reunification.

The U.S. imperialists have fully brought South Korea under their colonial rule in every sphere—political, economic, military and cultural.

Withdrawal of all the foreign troops from South Korea is a highly important condition for the solution of the problem of reunification. There are no foreign troops in North Korea. The Chinese people's volunteers left North Korea to a man on their own initiative as far back as 1958. But in South Korea there still are U.S. troops, The United States has no reason and no justification for keeping its troops in South Korea.

Independence and sovereignty are out of the question so long as a foreign army of aggression is stationed on any country's territory.

Anyone with the least national conscience, should insist on withdrawal of the U.S. troops and fight to drive them out of our country.

We must kindle the flames of hatred for the U.S. imperialist aggressor all over the country and rally all the patriotic forces to fight for the expulsion of the U.S. army from South Korea.

Your proposal that all foreign troops be withdrawn so that the question of Korean reunification can be settled is perfectly right.

We have always held that the question of Korean reunification should be settled by forming a united central government of representatives of every section of the people, on the basis of a free general election in North and South Korea, to be held along democratic lines, without foreign interference and provided all foreign troops were withdrawn from South Korea.

Such a general election should be held in an atmosphere of absolute freedom and democracy in which nothing could in the least prevent the people from expressing their will or suppress it. Free democratic elections are unthinkable so long as the democratic rights of the people are violated and the patriotic movement held down.

A free general election in North and South Korea implies, first and foremost, fully guaranteed freedom of political action for the parties, mass organizations and individuals, as well as freedom of speech, the press, assembly, association and demonstration, throughout either part of the country. All political prisoners who are in jail because they demanded democratic freedom and reunification of the country on the principle of sovereignty must be unconditionally released.

Every citizen should be enabled to exercise throughout Korea an equal right to elect or be elected irrespective of his party allegiance, political views, property qualifications, education, religion or sex.

It is only through a truly democratic election, held on the principles of universal, equal and direct suffrage by secret ballot, that an independent democratic united government can be formed representing the interests of the workers, peasants, youth and students, intellectuals, servicemen, businessmen, and every other section of the people.

This proposal of ours is absolutely fair, reasonable, and acceptable to all. Nevertheless, the rulers of South Korea clamor one by one for "elections under UN supervision," obstinately opposing this fair proposal.

The Korean people know well what is meant by "elections under UN supervision." It is no secret that the election of Syngman Rhee, a traitor to the Korean people, for several terms on end was secured by shuffling the election returns, that Chan Men's advent to power was engineered in the same way, and that the seizure of power by Pak Chung Hee, for its part, was legalized through "elections," under UN supervision, which have been imposed on South Korea ever since 1948.

"UN-supervised elections" are nothing but a smokescreen for the aggressive conspiracies of the U.S. imperialists aimed at incorporating North Korea in the colonial system which has been forced on the people of South Korea.

In Korea, the United States uses the UN as an instrument of aggression. The UN has no authority to interfere in the internal affairs of the Korean people.

The Korean people need no one's interference to settle the question of the reunification of their country. We must achieve reunification only by our own efforts.

Inasmuch as the South Korean authorities, incited by the U.S. imperialists, continue to object to the formation of a united Korean government on the basis of free, democratic elections, we cannot stand idle, waiting for the country to be reunified. We cannot but search for ways and means of gradually bringing complete reunification nearer, taking every measure that may benefit the cause of reunification.

You probably know that we have long ago proposed, as a transitional step, establishing a confederation of North and South Korea to settle pressing problems of the country even before its complete reunification and to promote reunification.

The confederation we propose implies the establishment of a Supreme National Committee of equal numbers of representatives, to be appointed by the two governments, chiefly for the coordination of economic and cultural development in North and South Korea, and for the promotion of cooperation and exchange in the common interests of the people, the political systems existing in North and South Korea being preserved and both governments continuing their independent activities.

The reunification commission you recommend could be regarded as an institution analogous to the Supreme National Committee proposed by us. An attempt could also be made to restore national links between the North and the South and to effect an independent reunification of the country not by establishing a confederation but through some other joint body of representatives of North and South Korea.

We have repeatedly said that if the South Korean authorities do not see their way to agreeing to a confederation, it is necessary at least to alleviate somewhat the hardships which the division of the country causes to the people, by organizing economic and cultural exchanges between North and South and dismissing political problems for the time being.

Economic exchanges between North and South would combine

North Korea's industry and South Korea's agriculture and make for the independent development of the entire national economy. They would revive the dislocated South Korean economy and so pave the way for stabilizing the life of the South Korean people, who find themselves in dire poverty.

We have already built an up-to-date industry and an advanced agriculture in North Korea. We have laid the solid groundwork for an independent state — an economic foundation enabling our country to live by its own labor in the future, upon reunification.

We have always concerned ourselves with the interests and the future of the whole people by steadfastly rehabilitating and developing the economy, completely ruined by the U.S. imperialist aggressor. We have not for one moment forgotten our South Korean compatriots. We consider it our sacred national duty to help the suffering people of South Korea.

Along with organizing economic exchanges, it is necessary to reestablish relations between North and South Korea in the fields of science, art, sports, etc., and to organize trips between them.

The South Korean authorities, which submit to U.S. imperialism, are opposed to free elections all over Korea, to the establishment of a confederation of North and South Korea, and even to economic and cultural exchanges and to trips between North and South.

In the circumstances, we insist on permitting correspondence as the least of what would help to establish contacts between North and South. This is in keeping with the people's insistence on doing away with the abnormal situation in which parents, wives and children, relatives and friends living on either side of the demarcation line cannot even correspond.

A prime condition for reunification is to eliminate the tension existing between North and South. It is appropriate to mention at this point that we have repeatedly proposed to the South Korean authorities that the U.S. troops be withdrawn from South Korea and a peace treaty be concluded committing the authorities of either part of Korea to refrain from armed attack on each other and providing for the reduction of the armed forces of North and South Korea to 100,000 or less by either side.

The huge, 600,000-strong army of South Korea is a heavy burden for the South Korean people due to the colossal amount of military spending, and gravely imperils peace in Korea.

The withdrawal of all foreign troops from South Korea, the conclusion of a peace treaty between North and South, and the reduction of the armed forces of either part of the country would constitute a tremendous stride toward reunification.

We think you are right in suggesting that the armies of North and South Korea be cut to the proportions of protective units intended to maintain internal security and order.

Besides, we are ready to adopt any measures likely to facilitate reunification. We are ready to abrogate the military pacts we have concluded with other countries, provided the U.S. army is withdrawn from South Korea and the South Korean authorities annul whatever military pacts they have concluded with other countries. We made this clear when concluding agreements with other countries.

Our government is an independent people's government formed in the conditions of freedom and in keeping with the will of the whole people. We have never relied on any outside forces. We are completely independent in politics, economy, culture, military affairs, and in every other sphere.

Our home and foreign policy is absolutely independent, and permits of no foreign interference. Our government can at any time adopt on its own initiative whatever measures it thinks necessary to further the interests of the country and the people.

We have proved the absolute sincerity of our desire for the reunification of the country.

Even after the present rulers of South Korea had carried out a coup d'etat and seized power, we repeatedly put forward proposals designed to save the nation, end the national crisis, and hasten reunification, sincerely hoping that those rulers would take a stand in harmony with the interests of the people. But they are blindly following the U.S. imperialists' disruptive policies, ignoring the vital interests of the people. They refuse to lend ear to our sincere advice. Indeed, they are doing their utmost to perpetuate the division of the country.

We blame the fact that our country has not yet been reunified on the U.S. imperialists, who have occupied South Korea with their troops and pursue a policy of national division, as well as on traitors, reactionary bureaucrats, political gamblers and swindlers like Pak Chung Hee, who are betraying the interests of the people in collaboration with the U.S. imperialists.

It is they who serve the forces of foreign aggression, oppose the independent and peaceful reunification of the country, and flatly reject unity of the national forces. It is they who uphold only their own interests and the interests of certain privileged groups which are in collusion with foreign circles, and who can never represent the people of South Korea.

They justify the presence of the U.S. army of aggression occupying South Korea and blocking reunification of our country, an army which robs, oppresses, insults and murders South Koreans. They insist on the U.S. army staying in Korea forever.

Those traitors have turned down our proposal for settling the millions of unemployed South Koreans in North Korea and giving them jobs there. They sell our countrymen like merchandise into European and American countries.

They also invite Japanese militarists to South Korea to turn it into a double colony, ruled by the U.S. and Japanese imperialists.

On instructions from the United States, the South Korean traitors, who are anxious to strike a bargain with the Japanese militarists, fiercely resist contacts and cooperation within the bounds of one and the same country. They are in a hurry to carry their criminal "negotiations between the Korean Republic and Japan" through to the end.

The key role in this deal with the Japanese imperialists is played by the very same hangers-on who served them loyally in the past. They refuse to admit their previous crimes, and have again become henchmen of the U.S. imperialists and of their former masters, the Japanese militarists.

To achieve Korean unification, we must fight, rallying the forces of the whole people of North and South Korea against the foreign imperialist aggressors and against the traitors, reactionary bureaucrats, political gamblers and swindlers who in common with them obstruct the reunification of our people.

How can we contribute to national unity and bring about reunification and, what is more, flatly reject all contacts and exchanges between North and South?

Needless to say, were they even now to ponder their mistakes and join in the struggle for the withdrawal of the U.S. army and for the independent reunification of the country, the situation would change entirely.

We are ready at any moment to hold out our hand to anyone, to go along with anyone — whatever his political views, world outlook and past activity — who defends the interests of the people and seeks the reunification of the country.

If all the patriotic forces of North and South Korea unite we can bring about contacts and negotiations between North and South, establish cooperation and exchanges between them, make the U.S. army go, and reunify the country.

In the absence of unity and struggle we can neither expel the aggressor's army nor effect reunification.

The important thing is for all sections of the South Korean people — workers, peasants, young people and students, intellectuals, servicemen and businessmen — to rally close together and launch a more resolute fight for national salvation, for the independent, peaceful reunification of the country, against U.S. imperialism and its flunkeys.

All interference in the internal affairs of our people must be ruled out. We must vigorously counteract "protection" or "supervision" by anyone, and must shape our destiny by ourselves.

When we have reunified our country on the principle of national self-determination and when the whole people have risen in a spirit of solidarity to fight, we will be able to increase the might of the country and build a wealthy, strong and independent state that will need no "guarantees" from anyone.

Our country will unquestionably become united as a result of the common national struggle of the whole Korean people.

In conclusion I would like to express the hope that you will work for the speedy independent reunification of the country.

Pyongyang, January 8, 1965.

FOR A POPULAR, DEMOCRATIC AND PATRIOTIC GOVERNMENT! DOWN WITH THE MILITARY DICTATORSHIP!

DOCUMENT* OF THE CC EXECUTIVE,
COMMUNIST PARTY OF ECUADOR

The events of September and October 1964, which took place in the conditions of a growing crisis in Ecuadoran society, revealed the aggravation of contradictions between Ecuador as a nation and imperialism, between certain sections of the Guayaquil oligarchy and the ruling military junta, between some provinces and the central authority, and within the government itself.

Resulting from the presentation of definite demands by the masses and their struggle, this aggravation shows that the crisis of the system of social and political organizations is growing in depth and scope, that there is a pressing need to solve it, and that the only solution is to establish a national, democratic government of popular unity capable of effecting radical social reforms.

The U.S. imperialists, who pursue a policy of fomenting war and aggression against the socialist revolution in Cuba and against the mounting popular struggle for national liberation and democracy, imposed upon Ecuador through various intrigues the dictatorship of the military junta. In an effort to contain the vigorous growth of the struggle of the masses and prevent it from developing into a general revolutionary struggle, the North-American imperialists intensified their neocolonialist aggression by enforcing the policy of Alliance for Progress.

This policy led to a police state. Brutal repression ensued. To begin with, a ban was imposed on the Communist Party, Revolutionary Socialist Party, Confederation of Labor, Federation of University Students, Revolutionary Youth League and many other popular democratic and progressive organizations. The autonomy of the provincial and municipal councils, the universities and certain other institutions was encroached upon. The prisons were overcrowded. Hundreds of leaders and members of political, labor students' and women's organizations were exiled. Newton Moreno was killed; others, like Luis Vladivieso, were barbarously tortured. The newspapers of the revolutionary parties, trade unions and students' organizations were suppressed. Censorship of the press, radio and correspondence was established.

Foreign policy is dictated by the U.S. State Department, as can be seen from the stand of the Ecuadoran Foreign Minister as the Washington conference of Foreign Ministers and during the drafting of the agenda of the 11th inter-American conference. The conference ignored the pressing problems of national sovereignty and territorial integrity in favor of measures for an attack on socialist Cuba, against democratic movements for national liberation and against peace champions in Latin America. An effort is being made to satisfy the interests of U.S. creditors and monopolies. U.S. loans are becoming the mainstay of the "national development" plan. The agreement on the defense of the 200-mile coastal zone, concluded with Peru and Chile, has been abandoned. Decrees are being issued in favor of quasi-national industrial enterprises that are profitable to the Americans and injurious to Ecuador. The gold reserves are being piped into U.S. banks, with the result that the national treasury is being depleted. U.S. monopolies receive protection, while the entire national income is mortgaged to meet the extortionist terms imposed by U.S. creditors.

In the meantime, the people's standard of living is going from bad to worse. The prices of prime necessities are growing, and so are electricity rates and rent. There is a housing shortage in the country; the notorious housing plan, bank and cooperatives benefit businessmen but are useless to the people.

The ruling junta has effected none of the badly needed social reforms. The so-called agrarian reform has left the latifundia intact and has in no way improved the plight of the peasant poor and agricultural laborers. The tax reform, far from exempting the working people and other indigent groups from taxes, has made the tax burden even heavier. The road-building plan has merely revealed the onerous terms offered by the U.S. creditors. The vaunted plans for building schools and combating illiteracy have in no way modified, even outwardly, the appalling picture of the ignorance of the masses. The so-called university reforms are a continuation of the attack on university autonomy and the students' rights. Paradoxically the law on lower prices for medicines has put the prices up.

As regards defense of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Ecuador, the question of annulling the Rio de Janeiro Protocol has been raised neither before the projected 11th inter-American conference nor before any other international body. The Peruvian government has been allowed unilaterally to set up frontier posts precisely in those disputed areas which make the Rio de Janeiro Protocol unacceptable. The construction of the Carretera Marginal de la Selva road, a project detrimental to Ecuador's territorial rights, has been authorized and is under way.

The country swarms with U.S. missions, experts specializing in provocations, and CIA agents who harm our national interests and live off the taxes the people are made to pay.

Corruption is in evidence at every step. There are international scandals like the one in the Foreign Ministry, embezzlement and swindling in customs-houses, shops, etc., and constant foreign trips by Ministers, so that at times the cabinet is made up of deputy ministers only. The ruling junta systematically takes part in highly expensive cantonal fiestas and other wasteful celebrations.

As a result, there is growing discontent and the struggle is gaining in intensity. The more advanced and politically conscious sections of the people have opposed the military dictatorship ever since it was established. Prior to July 11, 1963, the masses frustrated several attempts to set up a dictatorical regime. On July 11, when the dictatorship became a reality, numerous protest demonstrations were held in Quito and Guayaquil. The people have never reconciled themselves to the regime, as was stressed in the leaflets the Communist Party and other democratic and progressive organizations issued after the coup. The students expressed their distaste for the dictatorial government in different ways and came out in defence of their optonomy and rights, as the January 1964 demonstration in Quito and the meetings in Guayaquil University showed. The working people of town and country are fighting unrelentingly for the restoration of trade union rights and against unemployment, hunger and poverty, into which the regime wants to plunge them even deeper. The number of labor conflicts is growing daily. The provinces uphold their boundaries and insist on the construction of roads and schools and on improvements in the health service. The artisans, teachers and intellectuals are demanding that their rights be restored and their needs met.

There is a widespread demand for the re-establishment of constitutional order.

All this confirms the statement made at the Seventh Congress of the Communist Party and synthesized in its Program, to the effect that Ecuador is being rapidly colonized by U.S. imperialism. The ruling junta has shown itself to be a tool of this policy. All this aggravates the crisis which Ecuadoran society is passing through.

The ruling junta is in the grip of increasing contradictions.

The imposition of U.S. capital is one of the decisive characteristics. Everything is being done to force us into accepting loans on outrageously onerous terms. The main features of the crisis stem from the general crisis of capitalism. The socialist camp has gained strength and is growing. More and more peoples are casting off colonial tyranny. The struggle of vast numbers of people, of whole nations, for peace, national liberation, democracy and socialism is irresistibly gathering momentum. Imperialism is retreating in Asia and Africa, and has been mortally wounded in Latin America. The U.S. imperialists want to profit from the expulsion of their "kinsmen" and rivals by seizing some areas which are not yet free, but they are getting nowhere. Vietnam, the Congo and Korea are cases in point. Socialism is developing victoriously in Cuba, under the very nose of the United States.

Driven out of their one-time colonies, the imperialists are rushing into Latin America, where the national-liberation struggle has not won as yet in most countries and where U.S. neocolonialism still holds sway. The European and Japanese imperialists fiercely compete with the North Americans, offering easier terms for the export of their capital and goods and seeking reduced tariffs and concessions on mines, land and fishing grounds and on the construction of industrial establishments. Of a sudden, visits to Latin American by leaders of extra-continental imperialist countries have become a frequent occurrence. Japanese, Dutch and other missions arrive one after another. More and more diplomatic, cultural and commercial agreements are being signed.

Imperialism wants to squeeze into the narrow space of Latin America its enormous decrepit body, which once sprawled across the globe. The imperialists of different countries, struggling in a common agony, are disputing spheres of influence for the recolonization of Latin America by the ruthless methods of the past. It would not be surprising if the various contradictions arising between oligarchic groups turned out to be rooted in agreements and alliances between definite groups of the Latin America oligarchies and various imperialist groups. We in Latin America know from bitter experience how the imperialists set one oligarchy upon another and one nation upon another. The wars between Bolivia and Paraguay and between Peru and Ecuador are just two examples.

These contradictions between imperialists and the fierce disputes over Latin America are reflected in Ecuador's policy and having a bearing on recent events. They are a manifestation of the general crisis of the capitalist system, of the violent agony of world imperialism, which is being forced out of one position after another as socialism and the liberation struggle of the peoples make headway. The masses all over the world hail these victories. The peoples of the world are stepping up their struggle, following the example of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, the example of Cuba and the peoples of the countries that have freed themselves from imperialism.

The ruling military junta is incapable of action because it is a puppet of imperialism and a flunkey of the oligarchy. The result is a policy which aggravates the problems of Ecuador instead of solving them. Whereas contradictions over the loans for road building, the centralized collection of the revenues of some autonomous enterprises in Guayaquil and the border conflicts between the maritime provinces and Pichincha Province are acute, the contradiction between the junta and the people is much more acute and keeps on growing. The fact is that as soon as a new problem arises the junta unhesitatingly sides with the big landowners, certain groups of the oligarchy, and the U.S. imperialists. It exercises dictatorship to prevent the working class and other sections of the people from exercising their rights and upholding their demands. It has trampled underfoot all the rights of the workers, peasants and intellectuals, of the rural and urban population, and is now boasting of having established "peace." It is already clear to the masses that the junta can solve none of the nation's cardinal problems.

Distrust of the junta has grown. It is getting less and less support at home. Its internal antagonisms are mounting. Clashes between leaders take the form of violent quarrels and the removal of Ministers. In the case of the Army, contradictions express themselves in the forced or voluntary resignation or transfer of officers. Conspiratorial groups come into being that often take no care to conceal their activity.

The junta is not the only one to be distrusted. The imperialist Alliance for Progress is also losing ground among the masses. In the Army, the eternal antagonism between the ranks and the supreme command is on the rise and there are signs of corruption.

To contain the struggle of the people, the imperialists, landowners and the oligarchy on July 11, 1963, played one of their biggest political trumps. Today the fact that the junta did not live up to expectations makes their demagogy less effective.

The people realize now that the economic crisis affecting them has been aggravated during the more than one year rule of the junta. Poverty and unemployment have grown, the wages of some categories have decreased, the prices of staple foodstuffs, fees for water and electricity, and rentals have gone up. New heavy taxes have been introduced and new costly bureaucratic institutions set up. Bank credits have decreased noticeably.

The ruling classes are busy searching for ways of retaining power. This was the purpose of the July military coup and of other coups carried out in Latin America. These classes want to preserve anachronistic social institutions, above all exploitation in agriculture based on feudal ownership and production relations, to keep intact the feeble industry and the mediation of big U.S. and other imperialist monopolies in trade. The reverses of the junta have aggravated contradictions and caused confusion among the ruling classes as to the choice of policy. Some quarters favor preservation of the dictatorship provided those in power are replaced by others — military or civilians. Others, who play lip-service to constitutional order, would like to make a deal. They hope that when the junta is gone they will be able to consolidate their privileges.

But more and more people are coming to realize that what is needed is a radical change, not the replacement of one oligarchic group in power by another or of one party of the ruling classes by another, let alone the replacement of individuals. The Ecuadoran people know from painful experience that the replacement of the military junta by a seemingly constitutional, formally democratic go ernment will not help them solve the problems facing their country. The more enlightened sections of the people want far-reaching changes. And this means not only deposing the junta but also removing from power the classes which have for many years been ruling the country exclusively in their own interests. To establish democracy in Ecuador means transferring power to the masses: the workers, peasants, artisans, small tradesmen and industrialists, intellectuals, students, and so on — all the progressive and patriotic sections of the population.

That is why, in present-day conditions, something more is needed than putting forward the vague, non-committal slogan of the return to constitutional order, which camouflages the hope of returning to power cherished by the oligarchic groups that ruled under Velasco Ibarra, Galo Plaza, Ponce Enriquez and Carlos Julio Arosemena.

The problems of Ecuador cannot be fully solved until the working people, guided by the working class, come to power.

Meanwhile the masses insist on an immediate end to the dictatorship of the military junta. So do, in fact, other sections of Ecuadoran society.

As regards the return to constitutional order, it is a highly controversial problem that must be solved without delay.

The reactionary diehards want to impose on the country a Constitution legalizing all the restrictions of democracy, all of the junta's inroads on the rights of the people. These elements want a Constitution that would prevent the extension of democratic rights, that is, create a situation similar that created in other Latin American countries at the bidding of the U.S. imperialists. They centre discussion on problems of secondary importance, such as whether the President may or may not be elected to other posts. They want to divert attention from the main problem.

It is perfectly obvious that the demand for the so-called return to constitutional order expresses the opinion of large sections of the people. But then it is on this basis that the old oligarchy, prompted by the U.S. imperialists, wants to strengthen its power in order to prop up its discredited social and political institutions.

What is indisputable is that the people want to replace the military junta by a genuinely national, democratic government which would fully restore the people's rights. They want to elect a National Constituent Assembly independently, in exercise of their sovereign right. This Assembly should be able to draft a democratic Constitution confirming the rights won or demanded by the people and to enact certain basic laws — on a genuine agrarian reform really giving the land to those who till it and making possible the complete abolition of the feudal-type ownership and production relations, and on a tax reform relieving the masses of the excessive taxes dictated by the U.S. creditors and imposed by the oligarchic governments. The Assembly should strengthen national sovereignty, maintain Ecuador's territorial rights and recover the nation's wealth. It should pursue a foreign policy of peace and friendship among nations and of respect for the peoples' right to self-determination and for the principle of non-interference. It would launch an effective struggle against poverty, disease, ignorance and so on.

A broad democratic front, to be established in the process of the struggle of the masses, is indispensable if the demands of the people are to be met. It is for the masses themselves to create this front, on a basis that will prevent differences in political outlook and party affiliation being an insurmountable obstacle to joint actions for the common good.

This front should emerge in the course of joint struggle. The events of October 1963 in Guayaquil proved that the independence of the masses can be preserved in a joint struggle as well, that subordinating the interests of the people to those of the oligarchy is not an unavoidable necessity. On the contrary, correct slogans put forward by the more class-conscious sections of the people enlist the masses in the struggle for their immediate demands. As the struggle goes on, slogans and programs become popular among the masses and acquire a new ideological content suggested by actual needs.

The national-liberation front will not be democratic nor its program realistic and effective so long as splitters, dogmatists, sectarians and their like keep aloof from the mass movement on the plea that the struggle is being waged between different groups of the oligarchy. The splitters did not take part in the October events of 1963, in the struggle of the masses. They refused to support the demands of the masses, above all the demand for an end to the military dictatorship. The little they did by contending that the struggle should be waged exclusively against the oligarchy misled the masses, for it supported the assertion that the military junta was opposed to the oligarchy. But we have already seen that the junta's policy favors the oligarchy and the imperialists, that what is actually going on is an aggravation of the contradictions inherent in a capitalist society with survivals of feudalism, a society under colonialist pressure from the North Americans.

The transition to new and higher forms of struggle is impossible unless the masses fight for their concrete demands, because this struggle enhances the militancy and strengthens the organizations of the masses, freeing their class consciousness from the influence of the reactionaries. It is this struggle that sparks off revolution.

This struggle cannot be properly orientated and waged without a flexible, active, determined and united Communist Party. The CP upholds the principles of Marxism-Leninism in the course of the struggle of the masses, in their ranks, together with the masses, together with the workers' and peasants' trade unions, with the agricultural laborers', youth, students', women's and neighbors' organizations. Every demand for rights for the people, however insignificant it may appear to be, necessarily concerns the Communist Party, for the interests of the people and the Party are identical. We Communists are part of the Ecuadoran people, we have risen from their midst and we are linked with them and with their problems by thousands of ties.

To accomplish its historical tasks fully, in a responsible way and honorably, the Communist Party must act according to the Political Resolutions and the Program adopted by its Seventh Congress. All actions of our Party should be inspired by a profound sense of responsibility and be based on the experience of internationalist proletarian unity. The Communist Party should take guidance from the universal principles of Marxism-Leninism and interpret the needs of Ecuadoran society and events in its life in the light of these principles. It should be a party deeply rooted in the proletarian masses and the whole people. It should combat dogmatism at home and abroad, and the adventurism of those who under the direction of Rivadeneira, Echevarria and Arellano staged the counter-revolutionary show in Toachi and the battle of Pinol, those who are fanning differences in the international Communist movement, such as Roura and his ilk, all the traitors and opportunists like Alfredo Vera, who lose all shame in their servility to the ruling junta. Our Party should combat all deviations with unflinching determination.

The lessons of every passing day increase our strength, which is growing as we gain experience and steadfastly pursue our line, whose revolutionary correctness is confirmed daily. This strength lends vitality to our organizations. Our strength is the strength of the invincible Ecuadoran revolution.

The Communist Party of Ecuador, loyal to the principles of proletarian internationalism and Marxism-Leninism, is being steeled in the struggle against the junta, for the liberation of the country, against the survivals of feudalism, against the oligarchy, for national democracy, for the well-being and the culture of the Ecuadoran people. It exercises internal democracy and applies criticism and self-criticism, acting as the focus of disciplined organizat . It is capable of measuring up to the events which history entrusts it with guiding, and of actively fulfilling its obligations toward the people, with a clear vision of its goal.

Therefore we call upon the people to fight jointly for a genuine solution of the problems facing them.

We urge all the forces of the people, their organizations, all the democratic, progressive patriotic political parties, the working class, the peasantry, the students, the intellectuals, the women, to fight jointly, to act in concert, for the overthrow of the dictatorship of the military junta, for the establishment of a provisional democratic government of popular unity that will restore all the flouted rights of the people and convene a Constituent Assembly elected by the masses through free and sovereign suffrage.

DOCUMENTS OF THE AFRICAN INDEPENDENCE PARTY OF SENEGAL

In November 1964 the Central Committee of the African Independence Party of Senegal held a meeting in preparation for the Second Party Congress. The two important items on the agenda were: how to overthrow the Senghor anti-national government, and the problem of rallying the democratic forces to take power and establish a government of national unity.

After a critical analysis of the activities of the Party, the CC members noted that despite the successes achieved in rallying the patriotic forces, the AIP still had to surmount considerable obstacles. The CC unanimously adopted the Declaration on Patriotic Unity and resolutions on Islam in Senegal and on democratic freedoms.

DECLARATION ON PATRIOTIC UNITY

Senegal has entered the last stage of a general economic, social, political and cultural crisis.

In the economic sphere, it should be pointed out that although our country lives on handouts from France, other Common Market countries and the United States, its budget is dwindling. It has an adverse balance of trade and experiences serious difficulties in agriculture and industry. Even if all the reserves are used, the 1965 budget will have a deficit running to many thousands of millions of Arican francs.

In the social sphere, the situation is characterized by the fact that all the classes and sections of the population suffering from the dictatorship and the economic stagnation are rising with determination to fight. The regime is condemned everywhere. There are signs of an awakening of the people all over the country, which creates a perilous situation for the authorities. The peasants are opposing eviction; the workers are threatening the regime with a general strike over its attempts at further wage cuts; the students are beginning to act in order to call a halt to the regime's scornful attitude to the nation's educational and cultural requirements. The office employees, who suffer from extortions and debts and are constantly threatened with dismissal, are resisting oppression in various ways. The business circles are insisting on changes in trade, industry and handicrafts to secure an appropriate position for Africans in these fields; they take the offensive wherever they can. Lastly, the police, gendarmes, servicemen and other personnel charged with maintaining public order are on the verge of rebellion, being exasperated by arbitrary practices, favoritism, confusion, venality and negligence.

The religious circles have gone over to the offensive.

In the political sphere, the regime has reached a high degree of decomposition. The leaders of the ruling Senegalese Progressive Union are possessed by mutual suspicion. Scandal and denunciation are rife. The various factions and groups either exchange stabs in the back or settle accounts openly. The last of the patriots who have accidentally found themselves in the SPU are beginning to see light and to search anxiously for a pretext to withdraw from it. In its present state the SPU is unable to govern the country. Senghor, who is challenged more and more often and rebuked more than anyone else, cannot lead our people any longer.

All this adds urgency to the question of overthrowing and replacing the Senghor government, which is subservient to neo-colonialism.

A government controlled by a part of the SPU led by Senghor should give way to a government of a genuine and broad national alliance.

This calls for a quick regroupment of all the patriotic forces of Senegal. This regroupment presupposes such forms of unity as rule out temporary agreements. precarious alliances and endless negotiations enabling the authorities to deal treacherous blows at our people.

The Senegal people retain a bitter memory of the abortive merger of the Union of Senegalese Democrats and the Block of Senegalese Democrats, of the call for unity in the trying days of August 1960* and December 1962 that brought no response. Hence the need to abandon old methods without delay and to find new forms of unity.

The African Independence Party, which has never stinted effort and has been very active in the field, thoroughly analyzed the situation in the country at the CC meeting. While hailing the birth of the National Democratic Front (NDF), the Central Committee critically and self-critically discussed its actions and positions relating to the struggle for unity. It pointed out mistakes and shortcomings and resolved to remedy them.

Considering the gravity of the situation in the country and the tasks confronting the patriots. it expressed its determination to do everything to eliminate the remaining obstacles to the unity of our people in the struggle for renovation and national greatness.

The AIP once again appeals, solemnly and ardently, to the Senegalese section of the African Regroupment Party (ARP), the Senegalese National Front (SNF), religious leaders, the patriots still in the Senegalese Progressive Union, the mass organizations, and all individuals and leaders fighting for the interests of our people.

More than ever before, the situation demands the unity of all the sons of the country. Patriotic unity is becoming the main issue on which the success of our advance depends.

Every effort should be made to unite the masses in powerful national and patriotic organizations.

The political organizations — ARP, SNF, AIP, NDF — should proffer a friendly hand to one another and unite. The youth, women's trade union and other organizations should carefully examine and solve the pressing problems of unity.

All the sound forces of Senegal should rally and in a powerful drive sweep away the Senghor government of national betrayal.

Senegal needs genuine renovation to be able to play the part it is entitled to in the concrete solution of the problem of African unity and glorify its sons in the battle against imperialism and neo-colonialism.

At this crucial stage of the struggle of our people, the CC calls upon all the Party members and sympathizers, all of them together and each individually, to make a maximum contribution to patriotic unity. It has decided to convene the Second Party Congress at the end of 1965 somewhere in Senegal in order to search, with due regard to the present situation at home and abroad, for ways and means of building an independent and democratic Senegal.

Down with the Senghor regime! Long live the unity of the patriotic forces of Senegal!

Dakar, November 1964.

RESOLUTION ON ISLAM IN SENEGAL

Islam in Senegal has been, and remains, a national question of prime importance due to its political role and the deep roots it has struck among the masses.

That is why, in November 1964, the CC profoundly analyzed the issue of Islam in Senegal bearing in mind the present-day requirements of the national, democratic and patriotic struggle.

The CC considers that the negative attitude of the Senghor regime to Islam in Senegal, its impermissible interference in religious affairs, and its attempts to subdue the Moslem leaders and force them to their knees are added proof that, on the whole, Islam plays a progressive, national and patriotic role in Senegal.

This is a force which the anti-national, anti-social and anti-democratic government of Senegal cannot but oppose.

The CC of the AIP, the vanguard of the people, respectfully requests the top Moslem leaders to do everything to strengthen unity in the national, popular and patriotic struggle, in the best traditions of El Hadj Omar, El Hadj Malick Sy, Serigne Bamba, Maba Diakhour and others.

Our Party regards itself as the continuator of the political struggle and national resistance which were headed by these outstanding Senegalese.

After a critical and self-critical analysis of the mistakes made by both activists and the Party leadership, the CC took note of these mistakes and decided to correct them with the utmost energy, irrespective of rank or prestige.

Aware of the fact that many of the best sons of our people are members of the AIP and that Islam is a national problem, the CC calls upon the Party, its activists and leaders always to adhere to the fairest and most correct attitude towards Islam and all the Moslems, to display respect for religious beliefs and tolerance of religious rites.

The CC expects the Party members always to be with the people, strengthen their natural links with the people, abandon whatever breeds disunity, and pay special attention to whatever helps to rally the masses in the struggle against the neo-colonialist regime of Senghor.

Dakar, November 1964

RESOLUTION ON DEMOCRATIC FREEDOMS, FOR THE RELEASE OF MAMADOU DIA, ABDOULAYE LY AND OTHER POLITICAL PRISONERS

Ever since the outbreak of the profound crisis shaking our country, the ruling clique from the Senegalese Progressive Union has been using every pretext to step up repression and abolish the last vestiges of democracy. The African Independence Party, the Bloc of the Senegalese Masses, and the Senegalese National Front have been dissolved; so have the Senegalese Democratic Youth Union, the General Confederation of the Working People of Black Africa and the Senegalese Youth Council. The General Confederation of Senegalese Students is also in danger of disbandment.

In recent months the authorities have been more and more often taking resort to unlawful arrests and searches and to political murder. Every single political opposition organization has a leader in prison or exile.

For instance, Mamadou Dia and four ex-members of his government, Ibrahima Sarr among them, are in Kedougou Prison.

Abdoulaye Ly and Abdoulaye Gueye, leaders of the Senegalese section of the African Regroupment Party, and many activists are detained in the Hann concentration camp and in the civil prison of Dakar.

Many members of the Senegalese National Front and the AIP and other patriots are sharing their lot. Majhemout Diop, General Secretary of our Party, is still in exile.

This infamous policy shows that the regime is agonizing. It cannot prevent the popular forces from uniting even now that it has deprived them of their leaders.

The struggle for democracy, for the release of political prisoners and for the return of exiles is an integral part of the struggle for unity, the main task of today.

The CC calls upon all the members of the Party to step up the struggle for the release of Mamadou Dia, Abdoulaye Ly and Abdoulaye Gueye, and for the repeal of the prison term of ten years unlawfully imposed on our General Secretary, Comrade Majhemout Diop.

The CC has also decided to give more effective expression to its solidarity with all the victims of the regime and with their relatives and friends, and has worked out appropriate practical measures at this meeting.

THE OPEN SOCIETY:

Paradox and Challenge

By Stanley Ryerson

A lucid discussion of the nature of freedom, in the light of claims usually made for the "open society" of the West. The paradox arises from the inability of the "Free World" to fulfill the promise of its democratic institutions. The challenge consists in the need to change society if the full potential of democracy is to be realized. In the conditions of the United States and Canada the author believes, socialism will enrich both democracy and the individual.

THE COMMUNIST MOVEMENT IS STRENGTHENING ITS RANKS*

Anyone who wants to understand the signs of our time should carefully study the Communique unanimously adopted by the Consultative Meeting of 19 Communist and Workers' parties. The focal point of this important document, resulting from five days of discussion by Communist parties from every part of the world, is the statement that the world Communist movement, the greatest and most significant political force of our time, is strengthening its ranks and marching on.

The very fact that the meeting was held, and its course and results are a further indication of the power and vitality of Marxism-Leninism. The Meeting was a concrete confirmation of the Communique proposition that "what unites the Communist parties greatly outweighs that which at the present time disunites them."

Unquestionably, there are serious differences in the world Communist movement due to definite historical, economic, social and ideological causes. But that is not the decisive thing. What is new and decisive, and what makes the Moscow Meeting and its Communique important, is that the world Communist movement has the strength through collective meetings of all the fraternal parties to promote its unity of action, restore and further its solidarity, and proceed with confidence to overcome differences. The new and important thing about the discussion at the Meeting is that the discussion made it possible to find, on the basis of fraternal collective agreement, a practical and constructive way of cementing the unity of the world Communist movement and hence to strengthen the will for doing everything to ensure the solid unity of our movement.

★ ★ ★

The Communique of the Moscow Meeting outlines the international situation in clear terms, saying that "consolidation of the positions of socialism, upsurge of the national-liberation and the international working-class movements, and growth of the forces advocating the maintenance and strengthening of peace, constitute the basic trend in world development under the present conditions."

*Neues Deutschland editorial, March 12, 1965.

This important proposition of the Communique generalizes the progress made by the world Communist movement since November 1960, when it last met. The commonwealth of socialist countries is developing and expanding. Certain anti-imperialist national states have grown stronger, the more progressive of them taking the road to non-capitalist development. A substantial number of peoples have gained national independence during the last four to five years. The number of Communist and Workers' parties has increased, and so has the influence of socialism, of Marxism-Leninism.

As a result, the balance of world forces is shaping more and more in favor of socialism. World peace has been preserved. Tension in some areas of the world has been lessened. Plans of aggression against Cuba and the German Democratic Republic have been foiled.

Although some bourgeois circles take a more or less sober and realistic view of the new balance of forces, we must not shut our eyes to the fact that the more reactionary and aggressive forces of world imperialism, particularly in the United States and West Germany, are making more frantic efforts, resorting to military gambles and provocation, to thwart the peoples in their search for a detente and for peaceful coexistence. The Moscow Meeting was unanimous in the opinion that divergences in the community of socialist countries and in the Communist movement hamper an early realignment of the world forces in favor of peace and socialism and encourage the extreme Right-wing of world imperialism. The aggressive forces of imperailism, said by their ideologies to pursue "both a policy of agreement and a policy of conflict," have now shifted the emphasis to the policy of conflict. This is evident from the acts of aggression in Vietnam and the Congo, plans of aggression against Cuba, and the "forward strategy" being used against the GDR.

Obviously, those reactionary forces, specifically in West Germany, misinterpret the situation. Last January the conference of the parties and governments of the Warsaw Treaty countries pulled up the West German militarists short. It drew up a constructive program of popular struggle for European peace and security. The actual balance of forces also expressed itself in such facts as Alexei Kosygin's trip to the Far East, Walter Ulbricht's visit to the UAR, the success of the Leipzig World Fair, powerful mass actions by the working people in developed capitalist countries, and the increased unity of action of the working class in many capitalist countries.

The rallying and growth of our forces are factors in curbing imperialist aggression. However, the Moscow Meeting declared that it is in the interest of the peoples to achieve a superiority of the peace forces throughout the world that will from the first raise an insurmountable barrier to imperialist military ventures and will in time—and ultimately forever—deprive them of the possibility to carry out their plans of aggression. The Meeting felt that the greatest unity of the world Communist movement—the basis for a front of all the peace supporters of the world, a front that will lead to further changes in the alignment of the political forces on the world scene—is the decisive condition. The Meeting was also important in showing ways and means of bringing about this unity.

The Communique stresses that it is necessary and perfectly possible, even when there are differences between parties, to seek unity of action of the Communist and Workers' parties against imperialism, for peace and national liberation, democracy, socialism and communism. The Meeting called on all peace supporters the world over to fight against the American imperialists' aggression against Vietnam. It declared for using every opportunity and every means to encourage and expand the activity of the Communist and working-class movement. This purpose could be served by bilateral and multilateral meetings and consultations between fraternal parties, international theoretical seminars to clarify definite problems, exchanges of delegations to promote contacts between parties, and other forms of contact and exchange of opinions. Needless to say, bilateral and multilateral meetings can never replace an international conference of the Communist and Workers' parties. But they can and should help prepare such a conference, which alone can formulate a well-argumented and accurate appraisal of the international situation and agree to the common tasks of the movement.

"Therefore, in the opinion of the participants, active and all-sided preparations for a new International Meeting, to be held at a suitable date, fully conform to the interest of the world Communist movement," the Communique stresses. All the participants in the Meeting unanimously declared that the main point of a new international conference of the Communist and Workers' parties should not consist in aggravating divergences but in a collective and comradely formulation of Marxist-Leninist answers to the new pressing problems of our time and in united actions aimed at promoting peace and socialism. The theoretical and political investigation of new problems—this is one of the main tasks of the future conference.

The Meeting, which proceeded in an atmosphere of fraternity and friendship, and was inspired by the desire for Communist unity, reached an agreement on the ways of engaging in all-round and careful preparations for an international Communist meeting. The Moscow Meeting considers it necessary to create favorable conditions for all the fraternal parties to participate in the preparation of the conference. With this aim in view, the Meeting recommended calling a preliminary consultative meeting of the 81 parties which attended the 1960 Meeting, to discuss questions posed by the new international situation. This approach to the preparation of a new conference is constructive and truly democratic. It envisages active participation by all the parties, mutual consultations, and collective agreements. The preparation and holding of a consultative meeting of the 81 parties would undoubtedly help create the favorable atmosphere of mutual understanding and cooperation between the fraternal parties which is necessary for the success of a new world conference. The fact that the 19 parties attending the Moscow Meeting declared in favor of discontinuing open polemics which are unfriendly in character and degrading to the fraternal parties fully accords with that lofty goal—mutual understanding and solidarity of the world Communist movement.

★ ★ ★

In keeping with the Program of our Party and the principles of proletarian internationalism, the Central Committee of the SUPG made an active contribution to the preparation and successful holding of the Moscow Meeting. In the complex conditions of our struggle, situated as we are at the frontier between the two world systems, we SUPG members are particularly aware of every uptrend or downtrend in cooperation and solidarity in our movement. This is why our Party welcomes the positive outcome of the Moscow Meeting. Our enemies see that their hope that our movement would split has been dashed. In line with the Moscow Communique, the SUPG will continue to do all that meets the interests of the unity of the Communist movement and promotes cooperation between fraternal parties and countries. We are certain that the positive results of the Moscow Meeting will ease the tension in the Communist movement and help in stepping up the activity of the world Communist movement, and hence in further changing the balance of world forces in favor of socialism and peace.

INTERNATIONALIST RESPONSIBILITY*

The participants in the Moscow Consultative Meeting expressed their firm determination to do all in their power in order to rally the world Communist movement and strengthen its unity on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism and in line with the documents of the 1957 and 1960 conferences. This is the most important result of the Meeting, which was inspired, as its Communique points out, by the desire to work vigorously for the unity of the Communist movement and for its historical tasks.

*Trybuna Ludu editorial, March 14, 1965.

The Communique stresses that in the present situation unity in the common fight against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism is more necessary than ever before, and that cohesion of all the revolutionary forces of our time—the socialist community, the national-liberation movement and the international working class—is indispensable for the success of this fight. This cohesion depends on the unity of the world Communist movement. Differences in the Communist movement weaken its unity and harm the world liberation movement.

The Moscow Meeting expressed the conviction that what unites the Communist parties outweighs that which at present disunites them. It reaffirmed that even when there are differences over the political line and important issues of theory and tactics, it is necessary to work for united action. This unity is essential in the struggle against imperialism, for rendering all-round support to the liberation movement of the peoples, for the struggle for world peace and the peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems, for the vital interests and historical goals of the working class. "Concerted action in the fight for these common goals is the most effective way of surmounting the existing differences," the Communique points out.

The participants concentrated on ways and means of overcoming the differences and strengthening the unity of the world Communist movement. They stressed the need for the Communist parties to seek closer relations between themselves and to cement the unity of the world Communist movement on the democratic principles of independence and equality of all the fraternal parties. They urged the use of every possibility and every method, including bilateral and multilateral meetings and other forms of inter-party contacts and exchanges of views.

The participants were unanimous in the opinion that international conferences of the Communist and Workers' parties are an effective form of exchanging views and experience, discussing new problems and new world events, enriching Marxist-Leninist theory by collective effort, and working out common positions in the struggle for common aims. Such conferences, held on the principles of complete equality and independence of each party, may prove very useful in surmounting the differences. It is in the interest of the world Communist movement to carry out active and exhaustive preparations for a new international conference, to be held at a suitable date. The Communique discusses this question in great detail, pointing out the need for joint efforts to enable all the parties to take part in preparing the conference. This calls for efforts to improve the atmosphere in the world Communist movement. The conference should serve the common cause of all Communists. Emphasis and concentration on the urgent tasks of the movement will, more than anything else, bring the positions on the fundamental issues of our time closer together.

The Communique declares for a preliminary consultative meeting of the 81 parties which attended the 1960 Conference, to discuss the question of convening a new international conference.

The Meeting also came out in favor of discontinuing open polemics, which are unfriendly in character and degrading to the fraternal parties. The exchange of opinions should continue along party lines, without mutual attacks. It is necessary strictly to observe the standards of relations between parties as defined by the 1957 and 1960 Conferences, which opposed interference by the parties in each other's internal affairs.

The participants in the Moscow Meeting agreed that all the Communist parties should realize their internationalist responsibility for the destiny and unity of the world Communist movement. The Polish United Workers' Party unreservedly supports the position adopted by the Moscow Meeting and will, for its part, do everything to promote the aims outlined at the Meeting. Along with the other parties represented at the Consultative Meeting, our Party expresses confidence that the results of the Meeting will be favorably received by the fraternal parties.

ON THE MOSCOW CONSULTATIVE MEETING

REPORT* BY ZENON KLISZKO, MEMBER OF THE POLITICAL BUREAU AND SECRETARY OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, POLISH UNITED WORKERS PARTY, TO THE THIRD PLENARY MEETING OF THE CC, PUWP (March 16-17, 1965)

I would like to report briefly on the Consultative Meeting that was held in Moscow from March 1-5, 1965. The parties that took part in the meeting adopted two documents: the Statement, expressing solidarity with the heroic struggle of the Vietnamese people against U.S. aggression, and the Communique.

The chief objective of the Consultaive Meeting was to exchange opinions on the convening of a new conference of the Communist and Workers' parties. All the delegations agreed that the Meeting was consultative in character and should exchange opinions on the issues of restoring the unity of the world Communist movement, on the desirability of a new international conference of the Communist parties, and on the methods and procedure of preparing for it. We were also unanimous in stating that no binding decisions should be adopted at the Meeting and that the participants should merely express their common opinion on questions on which their positions coincided.

These principles determined the character of the Meeting, which proceeded in the spirit of complete democracy, sincere and free discussion, friendship and solidarity.

No polemical statements were made about parties not attending. All delegations were prompted by the desire to overcome the present difficulties in the world Communist movement and ensure its unity.

In keeping with the line determined by the Fourth Congress of the PUWP and the directives of the Party leadership, our delegation expressed the following point of view:

The general trend of world events, and above all the situation developing in the world Communist movement, make it necessary to prepare and convene a new conference of all the Communist parties, with the aim of working out a common position of the Communist parties and the socialist states on important socio-political developments of our day. It is especially necessary to determine the principles of a common strategy against imperialism at the present stage, with due regard to the changes that have taken place in the alignment of forces and in the political situation during the last four years.

Many new problems have been brought to the fore by the development of the national-liberation movement and the socio-political evolution of the countries of the "third world." There is a need to specify the nature of the non-capitalist path of development in the light of the experience of the last four years, which speaks of the indisputable turn of many Arab, African and Asian countries towards social radicalism.

However, the most important tasks to be dealt with by a new Communist conference arise from the situation in the Communist movement. In the supreme interests of peace, socialism, and the freedom of the peoples, it is imperative to overcome the split and ensure unity on the main aspects of the foreign policy of the socialist countries and the activities of the Communist parties.

Our delegation declared that we were aware of the difficulty of promptly eliminating the ideological differences in our movement; this would take time, and practice would have the decisive say. The task which, in our opinion, confronts the Communist movement today is to devise such methods of cooperation as will enable us to preserve the unity of our policy vis-a-vis imperialism despite the ideological differences.

We believe that the common social system of the socialist countries, the Communist parties' common ideology of Marxism-Leninism, and the community of the vital interests of the working people of all countries are adequate prerequisites.

Our delegation voiced the opinion that the political unity of the world Communist movement hinges on the relations between the parties in power in the socialist countries and, more particularly, on a coordinated foreign policy of these parties and countries.

We called attention to the fact that the new leadership of the CPSU had in several months of activity produced ample proof of its goodwill and done much to strengthen the unity of the socialist camp and the Communist movement.

We expressed the conviction that in preparing for a new conference the Communist parties of the socialist countries should take special care to ensure the observance of the principle of mutual consultation on all important problems of foreign policy, and avoid steps likely to aggravate differences. This would create the right atmosphere for rallying the Communist movement, and for preparing and holding the conference successfully.

We declared in favor of a new procedure for preparing the conference, such as would correspond to the present conditions and enable the parties to take part in the preparation of the conference in keeping with the principles of full respect for the equality and independence of each party. Under this procedure, decisions about the new conference, the methods of preparing it, and its date should be taken at a preliminary consultative meeting of representatives of the 81 parties which attended the previous international conference. This meeting should be agreed upon and prepared through bilateral and multilateral consultations between parties.

Our delegation spoke out resolutely for the discontinuance of the rude and abusive polemics in the world Communist movement.

The position of our delegation coincided with that of the other parties and found expression in the joint Communique which was published on March 10 last. The Communique contains proposals for methods of preparing the new international conference, for the preliminary consultative meeting of the 81 parties, bilateral, multilateral and regional meetings, and the principles of exchanging opinions in the world Communist movement.

No proposals were made for the date of the new conference or the consultative meeting of the 81 parties. This question is to be agreed upon later.

The Communique focuses the attention of all the parties on the need to preserve and strengthen the unity and solidarity of the socialist countries and of all the parties of our movement as the decisive factor in the struggle against the imperialist policy of aggression, for socialism, the independence of the peoples, and peace.

Comrades, we are convinced that the Consultative Meeting in Moscow was useful. It proposed a number of steps which, if supported by the rest of the parties, would help in gradually surmonting the differences in the international working-class movement and in restoring its unity.

We do not regard the conference as a panacea which will remove all the difficulties in our movement overnight. But we think that the procedure of preparing the conference proposed by the Moscow Meeting can play an important part in lessening the divergencies and rallying our movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism.

Nowadays, when there is no single world Communist organization with a world center, nor can there be any, only conferences of all the parties, convened from time to time, can provide an adequate and competent forum for deciding common questions of the movement and coordinating its anti-imperialist strategy.

As Comrade Gomulka noted in his speech yesterday, our Party fully supports the position stated in the Communique of the Moscow Meeting and is ready to take an active part in realizing the proposals contained in it. No task is more important and urgent today than to work for the unity of the socialist camp and the solidarity of the world Communist movement. The fulfilment of the historical tasks of the working class, the trend of world events and the destiny of mankind depend in large measure on this.

The socialist system, which embraces more than one-third of mankind and attracts the numerous newly-free peoples, owes its strength equally to its socio-economic advantages and to the unity of the socialist countries.

That is why we think it so important to remove the differences which have appeared in the socialist camp and the world Communist movement in recent years.

Our desire for unity is prompted by internationalism, and is based on a concrete political assessment of the interests of our state and our people.

We therefore support every initiative aimed at cementing the unity of the socialist world and hence the idea of a new international conference.

THE MOSCOW CONSULTATIVE MEETING

STATEMENT* BY THE PRESIDIUM OF THE CC, CP OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On March 16 the Presidium of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia discussed the report of the CPC delegation to the Consultative Meeting of the Communist and Workers' Parties held in Moscow from March 1-5, 1965.

The Presidium of the CPC Central Committee welcomes the Communique approved by the representatives of the 19 fraternal parties and declares that our Party is resolved to do everything for carrying out the agreed decisions. The Communist Party of Czechoslovakia will continue to work for the unity of the world Communist movement on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. Therefore it fully shares the opinion that all the Communist parties should vigorously promote unity of action in the struggle for common aims and search, through negotiation, for effective ways of ensuring the high militancy of our movement, of creating favorable conditions for a new world conference of all the Communist and Workers' Parties.

THE ROAD TO UNITY

K. Dudera

At a meeting in Moscow from March 1-5, the reppresentavies of Communist and Workers' Parties exchanged views on ways of overcoming the differences and strengthening the unity of the world Communist movement. The Communique published after that consultative meeting may be described as a call to all the Communist parties, to the Communists of the world, to do all in their power in order to restore the unity of the movement on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, on the basis of the line laid down in the documents unanimously approved by the Communist and Workers' parties of the world in 1957 and 1960.

The fact that some of the parties which had been invited did not send their representatives to the Consultative Meeting shows that overcoming the differences and strengthening the unity of the world Communist movement is no easy matter and will take time. But the present international situation and the interests of the struggle against imperialism imperatively demand renouncing everything that might aggravate the existing differences and doing what can be done even now for better relations between fraternal parties.

*Rudé Právo, March 17, 1965.

Rudé Právo, March 11, 1965.

The international situation has clearly worsened of late. And while the main trends of world development as they have manifested themselves during the last decade are the same—consolidation of the positions of socialism, progress of the national-liberation and working-class movements, and the growth of the peace forces—the forces of world reaction have stepped up their activity, especially in the recent period. The differences in the world Communist movement hinder the pursuit of the policy of peaceful coexistence and joint actions against the U.S. imperialists, who are trying to aggravate the situation and launch acts of aggression against both the socialist countries and the liberation movement of the peoples, especially in Southeast Asia.

Just when the Consultative Meeting was in session in Moscow, U.S. bombers raided the Democratic Republic of Vietnam again. The U.S. imperialists, who are suffering one setback after another in the undeclared war against the liberation forces of the people of South Vietnam, are trying to camouflage their defeat by direct attacks on a socialist state, the DRV, thinking that the differences in the world Communist movement allow them to take the risk of extending the conflict to the whole of Southeast Asia. This fact alone shows who benefits by the differences between Communist parties, particularly between the Communist parties of the socialist countries.

That is why the Communique of the Consultative Meeting stresses that "in this situation it is more than ever necessary for all Communist parties to show their sense of internationalist responsibility and to unite for the common struggle against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism and against the rule of monopoly capital, for active support of the liberation movement and in defense of the people who are victims of imperialist aggression, and for the struggle for world peace based on respect for the sovereignty and integrity of all states."

The participants in the Meeting were of the opinion that although there are differences between Communist parties on a number of important problems of theory and practice, it is possible and, indeed, necessary to work for unity of action in the struggle against imperialism, in the matter of all-round support for the liberation movement of the peoples, in the struggle for world peace and the peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems and for the vital interests and historical goals of the working class. In this struggle, emphasis should be laid on what unites the Communist parties, and this far outweighs the differences. A persevering fight against imperialism, for peace, is also the most reliable basis for reuniting and rallying the world Communist movement.

However, certain steps are needed if this unity is to be achieved and strengthened. The Moscow meeting therefore considered all proposals and stressed that the important thing now is for the Communist parties to work in common for better relations between them, to use every opportunity for bilateral and multilateral meetings and other forms of contact and exchange of opinion between parties. With this aim in view, the parties represented at the Meeting declared in favor of discontinuing open polemics, which are unfriendly in character and insulting to fraternal parties. This is not to say, however, that there should be no more exchanges of opinions on important problems of today. These exchanges are necessary and useful provided they are conducted in a comradely form, without mutual invective. International conferences of Communist and Workers' Parties are the most suitable, and also the most effective, form of comradely exchanges of opinions. This is fully borne out by experience. Hence the Moscow Meeting rightly maintained that such conferences, held in keeping with the principles of the complete equality and independence of each party, can go a long way towards surmounting the differences and cementing the Communist movement, and recommended that a preliminary consultative meeting of representatives of the 81 parties which took part in the 1960 Meeting be called to discuss the holding of a new international meeting.

The Czechoslovak Communists have always regarded it as their internationalist duty to promote the unity of the world Communist movement. The CPC, whose representatives took part in the Moscow Meeting, will do everything to improve relations between Communist parties, and create favorable conditions for the participation of all the fraternal parties in preparations for a new international conference of the Communist and Workers' parties, and will take an active part in these preparations.

We are confident that this manifestation of goodwill in the interest of overcoming the differences and strengthening the unity of the world Communist movement will bring as favorable a response from Communists the world over as it does from the membership of our own Party. Today all the Communists and Workers' parties have an opportunity of contributing by deeds to the restoration of unity, which is an earnest of success in the struggle against imperialism, for peace, for the victory of socialism all over the world.

"TIME NOT RIPE FOR 81-PARTY CONFERENCE"*

The Executive Committee of the Communist Party has received the report of its delegates to the consultative meeting of 19 Communist and Workers' parties on March 1-5, together with the information communique adopted at the meeting, which has been published.

We participated in this meeting on the basis of the understanding that it was solely a consultative meeting.

Our Party endorses the appeal for the greatest unity of action for all Communist parties, irrespective of their viewpoint in the present controversies, against imperialism, and especially against U.S. aggression in Vietnam, in support of the colonial liberation struggle, for world peace and a policy of peaceful coexistence.

INCLUSIVE

Our Party reaffirms its aim, expressed in all our executive committee resolutions, of striving for the unity of the international Communist movement on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and the 1957 and 1960 Statements.

For the fulfilment of this aim we have always maintained that any international conference aimed at resolving the differences in the movement must be fully representative and inclusive of all Communist and Workers' parties.

The possibility of such an inclusive International Communist Conference will depend on the further efforts of all parties to create favorable conditions; the promotion of joint actions, irrespective of ideological differences, against imperialism and in the common struggle for the aims of national liberation, peace, democracy and socialism; and bilateral and multilateral exchanges and consultations between parties.

It will depend also on the conducting of the necessary discussions of theoretical and tactical issues in a comradely fashion without attacks against other parties or intervention in the internal affairs of other parties.

BILATERAL

With regard to the suggestion of a preliminary consultative conference of 81 Communist and Workers' parties, on which the opinions of parties are invited, we do not regard this proposal as practicable so long as the present problems, which have so far prevented the meeting of an inclusive international conference, remain unsolved.

Therefore we will oppose any attempt to convene such a conference at this time.

We affirm our view that an inclusive international Communist conference will only become possible when the main parties, particularly the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Communist Party of China, reach agreement on the composition and convocation of such a conference or preparatory committee for such a conference.

Therefore, we urge renewal of the bilateral talks between the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Communist Party of China with this aim in view.

TOWARDS UNITY OF COMMUNIST MOVEMENT*

The consultative meeting of the representatives of a large number of Communist and Workers' parties, which began in Moscow on March 1, is an important step towards strengthening the unity of the international Communist movement.

The deliberations are therefore being watched with profound interest and sympathy by millions in all parts of the world, by all who sincerely desire peace, the liquidation of imperialism, colonialism and neocolonialism and the progress and prosperity of the peoples.

With every day that passes, the urgency grows for making evermore resolute efforts to heal the breach in the international Communist movement.

The U.S. aggression in Vietnam underlines the fact that the imperialists grow more bestial as the day of their final doom comes nearer.

The most dangerous and bellicose provocations, aimed at carrying mankind again and again to the brink of a world war, are being carried out by U.S. imperialism.

An effective answer to these actions of the imperialists cannot be given by a divided socialist world, a split Communist family.

All Communists, who sincerely desire to combat and defeat the new imperialist threats to peace and to the national independence of peoples, understand fully the vital necessity to redouble their efforts to bridge the differences in the international Communist movement.

There is only one way to arrive at a common understanding and a common approach. This is the same way which has been used ever since the international Communist movement came of age.

That way is the way of mutual discussions and consultations. Given the will for unity, for arriving at agreements, participants in such discussions and consultations can thrash out a commonly agreed approach and line.

The international meetings of Communist and Workers' parties in 1957 and 1960 were able to arrive at agreement, precisely because all present recognized the necessity for unity.

At the same time, all participants accepted the international discipline of the revolutionary proletariat, while simultaneously emphasizing the each national Party has complete freedom and independence to work out its own policies in relation to its country's problems within the framework of the agreed international line.

The consultative meetings of representatives of Communist and Workers' parties now being held in Moscow will, it is hoped, lead to valuable results.

It is to be regretted that some of the parties invited to the meeting refused to attend despite efforts made by the Communist Party of the Soviet Union to clear all possible genuine doubts which may have prevented any of the invited parties from attending the meeting.

What is, however, most alarming is the new round of abusive polemics, launched by the leadership of the Communist Party of China against other fraternal Communist parties, particularly the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

This round of violent and venomous verbiage is obviously meant to coincide with the consultative meeting in Moscow.

The truth, however, is that this round of polemics coincides also with the U.S. aggression in Vietnam, and, therefore, can only delight the hearts of the imperialists.

All Communists as well as all other anti-imperialists are shocked at the attitude taken by the Chinese leadership, at this critical moment for peace in Asia and the world.

The Communist parties of the world cannot, however, abandon their duties to the peoples and to the great cause to which they are dedicated, merely because of the unfortunate stand taken by the Chinese leadership. On the contrary, they must intensify their efforts for unity of the world Communist movement.

The representatives of the 19 parties now meeting in Moscow are consulting among themselves, exchanging ideas and experience in the light of the main changes that have taken place in the world situation and in the international Communist movement since the 1960 conference of Communist and Workers' parties.

They are exchanging ideas on the ways to overcome the differences in the international Communist movement. They are discussing the question of the proposed next world conference of Communist and Workers' parties.

Of course, as the name implies, this is a purely consultative meeting: it will not adopt any finalized political decisions. But that in no way lessens its significance or importance.

The presence of the representatives of so many parties, despite the opposition and disruption caused by dogmatists and sectarians, indicates that the vast majority of the Communist parties of the world are determined to do all in their power for the unity of the world Communist movement.

The democratic movement in India wishes them full success in their noble efforts.

FOR NATIONAL VIGILANCE AND COOPERATION*

On February 13 King Hussein changed his cabinet. The cabinet government, headed by Wasfi al Tall, is made up chiefly of high-ranking officials. The change is interpreted in different ways. Some link it to the situation in the country and it is seen as an attempt to reduce growing public resentment at the corruption and venality, which have attained unprecedented proportions since the Talhuni cabinet resigned. Other say that it is aimed at effecting certain reforms in the state machine, lifting certain police bans, relaxing the tension occasioned by the political and economic crisis in the country bolstering the prestige of the existing political system.

It is widely held among the national forces and the population at large that in addition to the causes listed above, the change of cabinet is due to the increased activity and pressure of the imperialists and reactionaries, the growing threat from Israel, the suspicious visit paid by Talbot, U.S. Under Secretary of State, and the attempts of Sultan Abdul Aziz, the Saudi Arabian Defense Minister, to re-establish the tottering alliance between Saudi Arabia and Jordan. The same quarters link the change to the desire to work up tension between Arab countries, undermine Arab solidarity, and form a Saudi Arabia-Jordan axis with the backing of the British and U.S. imperialists, to be joined by other Arab countries, such as the Lebanon and Kuwait, with the aim of resisting the revolutionary liberation movement in the Arab countries, and the revolutionary policies and progressive social reforms being carried out in the UAR, Syria, Algeria and other Arab countries. These reforms jeopardize the interests of the imperialists, their flunkey—Israel—and the reactionary rulers of the Arab and Middle East.

One of the main tasks of the contemplated "axis" is to reject the resolutions adopted at the meeting of the heads of Arab countries or at least to do everything possible to prevent their implementation, particularly as regards the diversion of the waters of the Jordan River and the activity of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO).

Talk about the causes of the change began even while negotiations were under way on the formation of a new cabinet. As a result, certain patriots who had been offered cabinet posts declined the offer, chiefly because Wasfi al Tall is known for his links with the imperialists and for his opposition to Arab solidarity and to close links with the UAR.

King Hussein was compelled to attempt to reassure public opinion in Jordan and the rest of the Arab world. His letter to Wasfi al Tall stressed that the policy of Arab solidarity and of support for PLO would be carried forward. The King and Wasfi al Tall hurried to Cairo to assure UAR officials of their allegiance to that policy.

However sincere the King's protestations may be and however serious the efforts of the new cabinet with regard to internal affairs and the Arab front—efforts toward removing the legitimate mistrust which is widespread among the people and the national and progressive forces in Jordan and elsewhere in the Arab world —the U.S., British and West German imperialists, their hanger-on, Israel, and all their agents, the feudal lords, big capitalists, monopolists and extreme reactionaries in the Arab East, will undoubtedly go on making frantic efforts, bringing pressure to bear, threatening intervention and hatching conspiracies. Their purpose is to strike a blow at the Arab national and progressive movement and Arab solidarity and to bring into being a reactionary axis of Arab governments that will support imperialism and reaction in the Arab East.

It is just as unquestionable that any attempt by the rulers of Jordan to undermine Arab solidarity will be staunchly resisted by our people, by our national and progressive forces, and by the Arab liberation movement as a whole.

The experience of our country and other Arab countries shows that a regime which relies on imperialist support, on terrorism and subservience, and takes a stand hostile to the interests of the people cannot be stable. It shows that the stability of a regime depends on the extent to which it is supported by the people, by their national and progressive forces, and is willing to meet the demands of the people half-way, to uphold their rights, freedoms and standard of living.

The decisive events taking place in our country and in other fraternal Arab countries, and work for the effective liquidation of the conspiracies of imperialism and Israeli reaction demand that all of Jordan's national and progressive forces should immediately rally together, put an end to their own disunity—which benefits none but the imperialists and reactionaries and can only prolong the domination of interference by the imperialists and their agents—and set about solving the more important problems of our country and our people.

The Communist Party of Jordan calls on the masses—workers, peasants, refugees, young people, intellectuals, students, women, soldiers, patriotic-minded officers and other enemies of imperialism, Zionism and reaction—on all sections of society irrespective of their ideological and political views, to heighten their vigilance, close their ranks in combating imperialist, reactionary and Zionist conspiracies. The task is to embark Jordan on a policy of promoting Arab unity and carrying out the country's obligations concerning the diversion of the tributaries of the Jordan, and all the resolutions passed by the two conferences of heads of Arab countries. Jordan must not be allowed to become a center of reaction and Rightist activity, a base for conspiracies against the UAR, Syria and Iraq.

The Communist Party of Jordan sincerely and disinterestedly calls on all the national and progressive forces of the country to engage in collective action and to cooperate in formulating a progressive national charter binding on every participant in the national movement, a charter that will help to rally the people, the revolutionary forces of society, and all men of goodwill, closer together in the struggle for a state of national democracy in Jordan. Such a state should win the support of the people;

—sincerely serve the interests of the people and protect their freedom;

—be loyal to the policy of Arab solidarity, promote it and safeguard it against the intrigues of imperialism and its flunkey, Israel;

—make serious efforts toward rejecting conditional aid from the imperialists and the domination of neo-colonialist monopolies;

—promote the national economy and strengthen the nation's defenses by equipping the armed forces with arms from fraternal and friendly countries;

—foster the unity of and cooperation with the Arab countries that have won freedom, with the Soviet Union and other socialist and friendly countries;

—bring about radical and progressive measures and reforms in every sphere—industry, agriculture, public health, education, and social security—in order that our country, Jordan, may live in complete political, economic and social harmony with the fraternal free and progressive countries of the Arab East;

—cooperate with the governments of those countries for Arab unity, which serves peace, liberation, progress and socialism in the Arab countries and all over the world.

THE BATTLE FOR THE CONGO AND THE NOVEMBER AGGRESSION*

A. Lerumo

On November 22nd, 1964, Belgian and United States troops boarded military aircraft on the British-occupied island of Ascension, off the coast of Angola. They flew to Stanleyville in the Congo and there joined in the savage war of destruction spearheaded by the fascist scum of white South Africans and others on Tshombe's payroll, against the people of the Congo and the Revolutionary Government headed by Christopher Gbenye.

It was the most blatant act of agression by regular foreign troops in Africa since July 1960, when the United Nations Security Council ordered the Belgian government to "withdraw its troops from the territory of the Congo." It was also a continuance of the all-out struggle which the combined forces of international imperialism have been waging for control over the Congo ever since Patrice Lumumba, in the presence of King Baudouin, launched the new Republic with an announcement to the world that he and his people would insist not only on the appearance but also on the reality of independence. From that day onward the Congo has been a crucial battlefield in Africa's struggle for liberation.

The people's struggles in the Congo, and the rising tide of national resistance all over Africa, had forced the Belgian colonialists to recognize that direct colonial rule was no longer viable. Following the example of Britain and France, the Belgians hoped confidently that under the cover of a purely nominal independence they would be able to continue dominating the country as before, controlling its economy, its civil service and police, and extracting vast profits from its resources and cheap labor for the benefit of the Union Miniere and other powerful monopolies.

These hopes were rudely shattered. Lumumba was no puppet, and under his courageous leadership the Congo people stood upright, after generations of colonialist oppression, to assert their will to freedom. The uncompromising Independence Day speech at Leopoldville was followed by purposeful measures to establish the sovereignty and integrity of the Republic. The Belgian officials who monopolized the top places in the police and other state services were replaced by Africans. Lumumba acted swiftly to strengthen ties of friendship between the Congo and other independent African states, and with the Asian and socialist countries. The authority of the Congo was secured at the United Nations.

These determined measures produced a state of shock, almost amounting to panic, not only in Belgium but in all the imperialist countries. The powerful anti-African financial interests, with their close ties with the state machinery, in Wall Street, London, Paris, Johannesburg and Salisbury, with their vast stake in African wealth and exploitation, awoke to the threat posed to the enormous profits they were harvesting not only in the wealthy Congo itself but in all African territories, not least the strongholds of colonialism in the south. In normal conditions of the capitalist jungle, these interests are forever at one another's throats. But, faced with this crisis, they joined forces in a joint "rescue operation" of collective imperialism, an alliance of beasts of prey to crush the reality and the spirit of Congo independence and drown it in blood. A tremendous barrage of lying propaganda was launched against the Republic, and against Lumumba in particular. Vast sums of money, and every resource of intrigue and corruption, were set in motion to disrupt and undermine the newly-established government and its inexperienced cadres whom the Belgians had systematically deprived of opportunities for education and administrative positions.

The key move of the colonialists was to fragmentize the Congo; in particular to use their creature Tshombe to break away mineral-rich Katanga as an "independent state"—in reality as a neo-colony. In 1960 as in 1964, Tshombe did not hesitate to enlist the worst enemies of African freedom and dignity to slaughter his fellow-countrymen. Mercenaries were recruited from amongst Belgians, white South Africans and Rhodesians, Nazi adventurers left over from the second world war, French Foreign Legionnaires and OAS thugs, their hands dripping with the blood of Algerian patriots.

With indecent haste, the Belgian imperialists dropped the pose of conferrers of independence on the grateful Africans. The Belgian Government poured its troops, equipped with the latest NATO arms, into the Congo. The sinister, utterly unscrupulous American Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) spread its tentacles everywhere. Millions were poured out to corrupt politicians, to spread economic disorder and social unrest, in an all-out effort to smash the Republic and to destroy Patrice Lumumba and the spirit of revolutionary African liberation which he personified.

THE APPEAL TO THE UNITED NATIONS

Lumumba, faced by this direct military aggression and imperialist intervention, was in a painfully difficult position. The only regular armed troops at his disposal were the Force Publique—recruited and trained by the Belgian colonialists for the purpose of suppressing the Congolese people and their national liberation movement. Although the Belgian officers had been replaced, the loyalty and discipline of this force, and its reliability in a war of patriotic defense against Belgian troops, were extremely questionable. As soon became abundantly clear, Colonel Mobutu, its head, was already taking his orders from the CIA. To whom then was Lumumba to turn? The independent African states were, at that time, far fewer in number (of 35 African states today, only nine achieved independence before 1960) and few were in a position, either politically or militarily, to help stem the imperialist aggression. (It is worth recalling that even the Ghana army was then still officered by British army men.) The socialist countries would, no doubt, have been prepared to stand by the Republic—had they been asked to do so. Lumumba himself, in one of his last public statements, declared: "The Soviet Union proved to be the only one of the great powers which, from the very beginning, supported the people of the Congo in their struggle."

But the Lumumba government issued no such appeal—and when one considers the extent to which President Kasavubu and other colleagues of the late Prime Minister were already involved in United States intrigues, it is not difficult to understand the reason why.

On the advice of the other African governments Lumumba then took the only other alternative which then seemed open to him—he appealed to the Security Council of the United Nations for assistance to repel Belgian aggression. If the United Nations' deeds had matched its words and professions, if it had even been an organization whose executive machinery was prepared to carry out the clear-cut and unambiguous decisions of its leading bodies, this appeal would have saved the situation. But the United States and other colonialist powers dominated the administrative apparatus of the United Nations headed by the secretary-general, the late Mr. Dag Hammarskjold, and these powers were determined by hook or by crook to get rid of Prime Minister Lumumba and to re-establish foreign domination over the Congo.

The decision of the Security Council, backed by the Afro-Asian and the socialist countries, was precise in its wording and clear in its intentions—to assist the Republic of the Congo to repel the Belgian aggressors. The Belgians were told to get their troops out of the Congo. The secretary-general was authorized in consultation with the Lumumba government to provide that government with such military assistance as it needed, and until "with the technical assistance" of the United Nations it could build adequate defenses of its own. And that was all. But the colonialists distorted and far exceded this mandate; and the United Nations force was used not to implement the resolution but to sabotage its purpose. Instead of being placed at the disposal of the Lumumba government, United Nations troops acted as an independent force to intervene in Congo affairs against their host, Lumumba, whose request was their only authority for being there. The results were tragic. When, at the last moment (it is impossible not to feel that things would have turned out very differently had he done so sooner) and as a last resort, Lumumba tried to mobilize his real strength—the mass support he overwhelmingly enjoyed—he found his entry to the radio station barred by United Nations roops.

The end of the tragic story is well known: the illegal dissolution of Parliament by Kasavubu and Mobuto at the behest of the CIA, the illegal deposition of Lumumba, his kidnapping and assassination. (How ironic that the criminals responsible for this foul deed are today among those championed by Washington, Bonn, Paris, Brussels, London and Pretoria as members of the "legal government!"

These outrageous crimes of the Belgian, United States, British and other colonialists aroused a continual and mounting storm of criticism and opposition at the United Nations. Time and again the African, Asian and Socialist delegates exposed and angrily denounced the use of United Nations authority to cover blatant neo-colonialism. The Soviet Union refused—and still does—to pay a penny towards the infamous "United Nations" adventure in the Congo. It was such pressure which led to the abandonment of the "Katanga secession" plan, the recall in July 1961 of the Congo Parliament, and the eventual departure, in 1964, of the "United Nations" military force.

But, by then, neo-colonialist, especially United States, economic penetration, corruption and indirect domination had established their ascendancy. The colonialists no longer needed the fiction of Katanga "Independence," and the man who had identified himself with that sorry cause, Moishe Tshombe was retired from the limelight and from the Congo. He left, with plenty of money (his choice of a place of exile is illuminating!) for fascist Spain, and it seemed justifiable to hope that we had seen the last of him in public affairs. It was a mark of the desperation of the neo-colonialists and the bankruptcy of their agents in Leopoldville, that they should, in the latter part of 1964, have brought back this discredited politician in the role of "Prime Minister" of the Congo.

Neither the various puppet administrations at Leopoldville nor their United States and other imperialist backers had come an inch closer to the solution of the many problems of this key African country. The pace of exploitation, of the shipping abroad of the wealth of the nation, was accelerated, but the conditions of the masses deteriorated. The progressive measures initiated under Lumumba, such as Africanization, were reversed; Belgian and other colonialist personnel flocked back into what was once again developing as a haven of white domination; dollars for "aid" streamed into the pockets of politicians and civil servants. While corruption and extravagance flourished in high places the conditions of the starving masses went from bad to worse. On the borders of the Congo the tide of the African Revolution rose higher and higher; the neo-colonialist regime in Brazzaville was overthrown and the shaky military dictatorship in the Sudan was on its last legs. The Congo itself was seething with revolt; the masses of the people remained loyal to Lumumba's colleagues Gizenga and Gbenye; Kasavubu and other imperialist agents clung to office only by virtue of foreign support and the so-called "United Nations" forces were about to depart. Only extreme measures could stem the tide of popular revolt around the revolutionary Gbenye government—and the CIA men calculated that only a Tshombe could be ruthless and unscrupulous enough to carry them out.

His return, in the role of "Prime Minister" was paraded as a move for "national unity," and Mr. Gizenga was released from his long detention on a remote island and allowed back to the capital under closer surveillance, to give some color to this maneuver. But few were deceived. The Organization of African Unity, in session at Cairo, refused to allow Tshombe to attend; the democratic revolutionary government forces headed by Gbenye were making a triumphant advance, routing the demoralized and undisciplined remnant of the Force Publique, occupying many important areas including the city of Stanleyville.

Quickly shedding the pretense at patriotic national unity, Tshombe resorted to the methods which had made him so universally hated in 1960 and 1961 of employing fanatically anti-African white terrorists as mercenaries, and even appealing for open United States and Belgian government military intervention against the people of the Congo.

Within three months of Tshombe's return from Spain all the key posts in the administration were once again being handed back to the Belgians. Even the special correspondent of the London Times in Elizabethville revealed that, in the civil service:

> Nominally the Africans remain in charge, but planning and execution are being handed over more and more to Europeans, mainly Belgians. Mr. Tshombe has, for example, authorized the employment of Belgian police officers to reorganize the Elisabethville police force and, it is reported, the police forces of other provinces as well.

Not unsurprisingly, The Times correspondent does not blame the Belgians for "this sort of close relationship" with Tshombe. They have "a legitimate interest," he comments cynically, "in seeing that their goose goes on laying its profitable copper eggs."

It is no accident that Tshombe should look for, and find, willing volunteers among the whites of Southern Africa, inculcated from childhood with fanatical anti-African race prejudice, and only too eager to join in the jolly sport of shooting down blackskins. Mr. Christopher Gbenye, head of the Revolutionary Government of the Congo, charged in a statement from Paulis, Northern Congo, that more than 10,000 men, women and children had been slaughtered by this "army of savage white mercenaries." It can hardly be supposed that the Belgian, American and British personnel, official and unofficial, who are more than adequately represented in the Congo, could have remained in ignorance of these appalling atrocities. None of them uttered a word or protest.

Yet all of a sudden, in the middle of November, a tremendous barrage of propaganda was launched in the imperialist press, television and other media, about the threat to the lives of the few hundred Europeans and white Americans said to be held as "hostages" in the territory under the control of the Revolutionary Government centered at that time at Stanleyville. This propaganda furnished the excuse for the direct aggression of November 22nd, in which United States and Belgian troops were flown from the British-controlled island of Ascension to reinforce Tshombe's white mercenaries attacking revolutionary Stanleyville.

THE AGGRESSION OF NOVEMBER 22nd

It is revolting beyond words that under cover of this allegedly "humanitarian" mission, three big imperialist powers should join in an act of blatant aggression and intervention in an African state. Where were all these fine humanitarian sentiments, one may ask, when Verwoerd's fascist mercenaries were massacring helpless men, women and children in Congo villages? Or are we to take it that Labour Britain, the United States, self-proclaimed leader of the "free world," and Belgium, care nothing for the lives of dark-skinned people, but are prepared to rush in with troops the moment a far smaller number of fair-skinned people are said to be in danger?

As Dr. O'Brien (The Observer, December 6th, 1962) pointed out:

> Many Africans regard the 'Congo-Belgian-American mercy mission' as the use of a humanitarian pretext for the extension of the rule of the Belgians and their associates, through the complaisant Government of Leopoldville, over the whole of the resources and the strategic space of the former Belgian Congo. The condemnations of this intervention by African Governments and by the Commission of the Organization of African Unity in no way exaggerates the bitterness of African opinion on this; if anything, they understate.

Dr. O'Brien concludes his article by suggesting that the "Europeans and Americans," "having rescued some hundreds of whites from the blacks," should now "set about rescuing several millions of blacks from whites." But it is very questionable indeed whether any whites at all were "rescued," whether they were ever in any danger, and whether in fact the deaths of whites that took place must not be squarely laid at the door of the so-called "rescue operation" itself.

In his statement released in Nairobi by the Kenya Press Agency on December 8th, Mr. Gbenye placed the blame for the death of foreign nationals and prisoners of war fairly and squarely on the shoulders of the mercenaries and interventionists. He denied that any people at all had been "held as hostages" and declared that the Revolutionary Government had "always safeguarded and will safeguard the security of persons" of all races and nationalities.

Mr. Gbenye related what had actually happened in the "negotiations" with Belgian and U.S. representatives — which stands in direct contrast with the versions of the same events put out by the colonialists. As long ago as August, he himself had held diplomatic discussions with Mr. Spaak and Mr. Devlin, Washington's special envoy.

Further discussions were held in Nairobi between his envoy, Mr. Thomas Kanza and Mr. William Attwood, the U.S. Ambassador, under the chairmanship of President Jomo Kenyatta.

> At 11 p.m. on November 21st I received a message from Paul-Henri Spaak that it was my duty to ensure the security of Belgian nationals living in the regions of the Congo already liberated. At 3 a.m. on November 22nd I replied to Spaak that it was my duty to ensure the security of all inhabitants of the Republic under my control without any difference of race or religion.
> At 6 a.m. on November 22nd, hardly three hours after my reply, the Belgian and American aggression started. The U.S. and Belgium bear the entire responsibility for the consequences.
> Hundreds of foreign nationals, prisoners of war and Congolese nationals would not have met their deaths if the unjustified aggression of the U.S. and Belgium had not taken place.

Thus not only was the "mercy mission" claim put forward as the pretext for the imperialist aggression, completely unjustified in itself. But in fact the aggression itself brought about precisely what it was supposed to prevent — namely, the death of a number of Belgians and other foreigners.

Moreover, the picture of the actual military operation presented to the public in imperialist countries was completely false as well. They put forward a version from which one would imagine that there was no actual fighting, but that they successfully accomplished their allegedly humanitarian mission of removing whites to Elizabethville without difficulty. In fact heavy fighting took place in Stanleyville during the joint attack by Tshombe's mercenaries and the regular Belgian and U.S. troops against the liberation forces. More than ten American planes were shot down and over 500 mercenaries were killed.

Mr. Gbenye said that over 300 prisoners of war fell in fact under the bullets of the mercenaries themselves. This figure is not surprising when he points out that, in their indiscriminate fury of slaughter "more than ten thousand Congolese men, women and children have been massacred by the army of savage white mercenaries."

But the International Red Cross, so perturbed about the supposed danger to a relatively small number of whites has said nothing at all about this mass slaughter by Tshombe's hired killers.

LEGAL SUBTERFUGE

The imperialist powers tried to justify their direct intervention and aggression in Stanleyville by the subterfuge that they were in the Congo on the invitation of the "legal government." The dubious "legality" of the Leopoldville junta has been thoroughly and ably exposed earlier. As is known, Kasavubu had no authority to dismiss Lumumba and suspend Parliament, and every step subsequently taken by him has been illegal in terms of the Constitution.

But even more telling in African eyes is the fact that the Tshombe gang is openly acting not as an African government, but as an open and unashamed agency of foreign imperialist interests. Hardly had the motley gang of United States and Belgian government troops together with hired white assassins from South Africa and Rhodesia entered Stanleyville, when Tshombe was off by plane to France, Germany and Belgium to report on his satisfactory carrying out of orders and to seek fresh funds.

The fact of the matter, legal quibbling aside, is that the Tshombe outfit and its hired gangsters are, and behave like, a savage horde of foreign vandals, massacring entire villages of men, women and children, raping and looting at will. And this is true whether their skins are pink or brown, whether they consist of the so-called Congolese Army (formerly the Force Publique) or the loot-crazy mercenaries. The accusation of "racialism" flung by the colonialists at the African leaders who object to foreign intervention in the Congo is far more applicable to themselves; their press and propaganda assumes with supreme chauvinistic arrogance, that the whites in the Congo are above criticism and must be "rescued" regardless of the cost in African lives. A far different—and profoundly revealing—aspect is presented by Peter Stenager, a white reporter writing from Leopoldville to the Johannesburg Sunday Express on December 13th, in an article the main purpose of which is to praise the "courage" of the South African mercenaries (several of whose names and addresses are given). After boasting of the superior aggressiveness of the South Africans, and complaining over their treatment and poor pay, he continues:

> But for the mercenaries' discontent over wakes there have been compensations in Stanleyville. Richly stocked and unlooted by the rebels during their occupation of the town (my emphasis, A.L.) it has been ransacked by mercenaries and Congolese regular troops—unpalatable as this fact may be. The rich cellar of the Stanley Hotel, where most of the Rhodesian and South African men are billeted, has been plundered. Drinks are on the house every night. Meals are free, so is lodging. Every room occupied by mercenaries is stacked with transistor radios, electric shavers, portable record players, records, jewellery, clothing, cigarette lighters, cigarette cases, cigarettes, cigars. The shops of the town are ransacked. The spoils of war have been enjoyed to the full. . . . Several safes — including the strongroom of the bank in Kindu, have been blown. . . . About R60,000 (£30,000) was taken. . . .
> Many of the mercenaries are besotted and obsessed with loot. Many are now stealing from each other, and tempers are flaring. Even guns are being drawn on each other.

This graphic picture of the "forces of law and order" painted by a reporter who is by no means biased in favor of the Revolutionary Government, tells its own story. Could here be any greater contrast between the so-called "rebels" — who were really concerned with life and property and left the "richly-stocked" town "unlooted," and the savage gangsters "besotted and obsessed with loot," now fighting among themselves like dogs over the spoils?

Just to round off the ugly picture, Mr. Stenager concludes his report with news of fresh "mopping-up operations" when the mercenaries and Tshombe troops went into an African village near Stanleyville "suspected of harboring rebels."

> As I flew out of Stanleyville to file this report, hundreds of prisoners were being brought in for "interrogation." Tomorrow the executions, followed by the bodies being dumped in the river, will begin again.

No wonder he reflects that a "feeling of insecurity" prevails in Stanleyville, a feeling that "a counter-attack by rebels in mass force could take place again." The "feeling of insecurity" will persist in Stanleyville, and every other city of the Congo, until the colonialist rabble of drunken, thieving, murdering, raping savages, white and back, are indeed defeated by a massive counter-attack by those whom this otherwise vivid and truthful reporter miscalls "rebels," but who are obviously the only sane and patriotic force in the country which can end the nightmare agony of the Congo and bring tranquility, national reconstruction and civilized, law-governed, progressive government to this suffering heartland of Africa.

As I write these lines, on the eve of the new year, 1965, there is heartening news of fresh advances by the patriots; and all Africa will hope, and do all we can to ensure, that the new year indeed sees our brothers and sisters in this strife-torn land enter into the legacy of Lumumba, of peace and independence. And also that the criminals in Leopoldville will at last face the justice and retribution they so richly deserve.

But justice and retribution cannot stop short at the Tshombe gang. Justice demands that their principals—the sinister plotters in the United States, and in Brussels, London, Bonn, Paris and Pretoria—must also answer for the crimes of their tools and agents. These pious humbugs must be taught that crime does not pay; and that the life of a simple peasant in Stanleyville—or for that matter in Vietnam—is just as precious and valuable as that of a fairskinned gentleman who abuses African hospitality, even if he wears a missionary's dog-collar.

THE KATANGA OF AFRICA

The battle for the Congo is not the concern of the Congolese people only; it has become the vital and immediate concern of the people of all Africa. As President Ben Bella pointed out in such striking words:

> The whole Congo today has become a Katanga, the Katanga of Africa which menaces Tanzania, menaces Brazzaville Congo, menaces Zambia, menaces Uganda, menaces Angola. . . . If we do nothing about it today the Congo will fall, tomorrow Brazzaville Congo, the day after tomorrow Burundi and Tanzania and after that Zambia, and after that, why not Conakry, Bamako, Cairo, and why not Algiers. . . . The fight for freedom is a common one.

The open imperialist aggression of November 22nd may well prove to have been one of the costliest operations since Suez, in terms of the complete exposure and unmasking of colonialism and neo-colonialism in Africa. The mass demonstrations of the public in many African countries and of African students abroad, like the unequivocal denunciation by the Organization of African Unity, and the fierce condemnations by African, Asian and socialist countries at the United Nations, serve warning on the imperialist powers that Africa will no longer tolerate this alien regime, resting entirely on foreign financial and military support, in the midst of the Continent. In fact to tolerate it means suicide for national independence everywhere; for if the colonialists are allowed to get away with this aggression with impunity there is no African territory which can count itself safe from similar intervention in the future. And we are not prepared to stand by while the former masters of the continent, who have never resigned themselves to their departure, plot and prepare for the recolonization of Africa.

It is not only, therefore, for principled reasons of African solidarity but also because of the imminent threat of imperialist aggression and intrigue in each African state, that every possible aid must be given to the brave revolutionary patriots of the Congo to rid themselves of the regime of traitors and puppets at Elizabethville. The threads run from the Congo to Angola and Mozambique, to Salisbury and Johannesburg, and to the capitals of the NATO countries, to which Tshombe went running immediately after the November aggression to beg for still more money. They are threads which form part of the web being spun to entrap us all.

There is a further and deeper lesson in these grim events at the close of 1964. It is a humiliating pill to swallow for all Africans that such an act of aggression can still take place without response from our leaders and our countries save that of protest and denunciation. It was altogether proper that we should have protested—and neither history nor the Nigerian people will easily forgive those like the representative of that country at the United Nations who undermined the African protest. But protests alone will not avail us against foreign aircraft and mechanized invaders. The African countries must unite and pool their resources. They must embark on speedy and effective measures to modernize, industrialize, and develop their countries on socialist lines. They must be ready to defend Africa, rid its soil of racialism and colonialism, and deal a devastating counter-blow against any aggressor.

INTERVIEW WITH GASTON SOUMIALOT*

In L'HUMANITE

"It will be a turning point in the history of our liberation movement," said Gaston Soumialot, Defense Minister of the Congolese People's Government, speaking of the coming Cairo conference that is to bring together representatives of all the Congolese trends fighting against Tshombe. "All the patriotic forces will be rallied together for the first time."

The decision to hold the conference was announced in Cairo, in the presence of representatives of several different trends. "We will work out a charter and unify the military command," Soumialot specified. "The purpose of the conference is to dispel the misunderstandings there may be among us. The division of the patriotic forces has been playing into the hands of Tshombe and the imperialists.

"We all have one goal—the independence of our country. The conference will greatly further our cause."

Q. What is the military situation in the Congo today?

A. In February and March we won nineteen districts back from the Tshombe mercenaries. Tshombe is on the defensive now. Hundreds of mercenaries were killed. Tshombe's troops only hold big cities like Stanleyville and Paulis . . . But they can no longer move from town to town along the roads. There is fighting going on five kilometers from Stanleyville.

The whole people are on our side. Young people are joining our ranks en masse. Yet we pay nothing to our soldiers. They only get food and arms.

Our guerrillas use American arms captured in battle. We set traps and ambushes for the mercenaries to replenish our stores. Besides, we always have arrows, spears and rocks. I assure you that some of the rocks hurled by our young men are most effective. Those weapons enable us to camouflage ourselves in the jungle all the better.

Q. Do the mercenaries still bomb liberated villages?

A. Yes, they go on bombing the population. There are killed, as injured, whom we cannot for lack of medicines and doctors. Epidemics have broken out. The sanitary situation is aggravated by a famine involving several districts. To be sure, we receive medical supplies from Algeria, the United Arab Republic and the Sudan but that isn't enough. That is why I'm going to visit several capitals shortly so as to explain our situation and repeat the appeal I addressed to the peoples of the world at a press conference.

*L'Humanité, March 15, 1965.

We urgently need medical supplies and doctors.

I think that appeal will be heard in Africa, for we are fighting for the whole Africa. And I hope that it will also be heard elsewhere.

The seizure of the Congo by the imperialists would imperil the whole of Africa. The Congo is the heart of Africa. How can the body live and develop when the heart is stricken?

Q. How have you organized the liberated areas?

A. A civilian administration takes over as soon as we free an area—say, a village. We rebuild the roads and bridges. We've opened schools in some areas.

Lastly, we organize the cultivation of abandoned plantations and of the fields of the various villages to feed the population.

This year we've harvested a fine coffee crop. The mines are also being worked.

As regards the abandoned plantations, our government has set up the Abandoned Estates Office, a management body which will some day account to the owners for the use of the returns.

It goes without saying that farming is chiefly in the hands of women, for the men are fighting.

Q. Are there any Europeans left in the liberated areas?

A. There are some near Coquillatville, for one. But they are very few. The reason is simple—mercenary bombings don't spare the Europeans, and so all the Europeans go in the end, even though we exert no pressure on them.

FOR DEMOCRACY AND PROGRESS

STATEMENT* BY THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF BRAZIL

The Communists address to all the patriots and democrats who are ready to fight against the present reactionary military dictatorship the proposal for a broad united front for democracy and progress.

While upholding the following program as a whole, the Communists advance it as the basis for united action and will support anyone who will fight at least for one of the points of the program, namely:

1. Restoration of democratic freedoms and all civil rights laid down in the Constitution. Trade union autonomy and protection of trade union freedoms. Election of trade union officials without interference on the part of the government. Freedom of organization for the peasants, and strict observance of the Statutes of Agricultural Laborers. Normalization of the activities of the students' organizations, including the National Union of Students, and freedom of instruction. Abrogation of the "constitutional act." General amnesty and immediate release of all the political prisoners.

2. Defense of the autonomy of the states and municipalities with regard to the Federal government. Elections in the states and municipalities within the time limits established by law. No extension of the powers of elected officials. The right of all political parties to take part in elections, without any discrimination for political or ideological reasons.

3. Immediate revision of wage rates, beginning with the minimum wage, with due regard to the growing cost of living. Practical measures against the high cost of living, such as price control and active struggle against speculators. An end to evictions.

4. A finance and economic policy free from the diktat of the International Monetary Fund and capable of ensuring the steady development of the national economy. Protection of the national oil enterprise Petrobraz and other state-owned enterprises. No concessions to the imperialist monopolies, for concessions injure national interests. Protection for home-produced goods against foreign competition.

5. An independent foreign policy of peace, and establishment of relations with all peoples. Restoration of relations with the government of Cuba. Support for the liberation struggle of all the peoples still under colonial oppression. Promotion of trade with all countries.

6. Replacement of the present dictatorial government by a government free from the influence of the putschists and reactionaries who have usurped power, a government which could with the support of the people ensure democratic freedoms and hold a free presidential election and elections to a Constituent Assembly.

SPEECH* BY FIDEL CASTRO

This is the eighth anniversary of March 13, an occasion which brings us together for the sixth time on the stairway of this University. It has become a tradition, a sacred duty of all revolutionaries and all university students.

These past years have seen certain changes in the university that are reflected in the composition of our students. The first year, almost all who came together here were comrades of José Antonio Echevarria, of all those who fought that day. Many of them took an active part in the university students' struggle against the Batista regime.

Many of those students have graduated during the past six years and many of them work on various fronts of the revolution. And it is only natural that many of the university students, and those who today fill this stairway, are younger comrades enrolled in recent years. I see many young people among the students present here.

Comrade Armando Hart Davalos, Minister of Education, seized the opportunity to comment with some irony that we do not realize that the young people studying at the university today are not of the same age as we, and I replied, "I'm afraid that's true."

However, the important thing is for us not to lose the spirit proper to youth, and for the young people not to lose their revolutionary spirit. I think we should always agree on this, irrespective of age. Let recollections of the struggle of our people not assume a somewhat academic character. Let them not become something like cold history. Besides, our struggle is by no means over. We can by no means say that the revolutionary struggle of our people is over. We are far from affirming that no great tasks have been left for our young people.

That is why the deep-going, intimate link between the first waves of the revolution and all subsequent waves is never lost. Each day which is like March 13 is a great, a radiant day in the life of our country. We recall this date to redouble our impetus, to redouble our efforts in the struggle.

The history of a country, of its victories and achievements, is being made every day, through everyday effort and labor. It is not made by the heroism of one day but by daily heroism, not by what is accomplished on a particular day but by what is accomplished every day.

*Abridged. The speech was delivered by Fidel Castro, First Secretary, National Leadership of the United Party of the Socialist Revolution of Cuba, and Prime Minister, Revolutionary Government of the Republic of Cuba, on March 31, at a mass meeting at Havana University dedicated to the eighth anniversary of the storming of the Presidential Palace in Havana by a group of young patriots, at the time of the Batista dictatorship.

Today the history of our country is being made in the cane fields, in the factories and educational establishments. It is being made by hard work of thousands, tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands of the often nameless sons and daughters of our people. It is being made by the teachers working in the mountains, by the doctors who save human lives in the remotest corners of the country, by the peasants working in regions that are hard to reach and scarcely enjoy the elementary blessings of civilization. It is being made by soldiers standing on guard for the revolution in exposed areas or face to face with the enemy, by the workers who produce millions of tons of sugar, by the hundreds of thousands of people in town and country who cut sugar cane in sweltering heat to make possible the production of the tons of sugar which all of us Cubans describe as gains of our economy.

History is being made by the students in the lecture-halls. We make history in the long hours we spend analyzing and investigating, trying to understand, learn or unravel something. The history of our country is being made through diligent and persevering labor, through a constant and invariable readiness to defend this labor, to defend its fruits.

The history of our country is being made now and will be in the making for a long time to come. No young man or woman will have to regret the fact that they were too young when the struggle began. No young man or woman will have to feel regret, thinking that they will be late for the struggle.

I recall the early days after the victory of the Revolution. Many men and women hailed the insurgents. Among those welcoming the victorious columns of the insurgent army there doubtless were many of the workers who a few months later lost their lives while unloading a cargo of arms, in the explosion resulting from an enemy act of sabotage.

Among the crowd there were many who afterwards fell fighting the mercenaries at the Bay of Pigs. There undoubtedly were young men like Manuel Ascunse, Delfin Sen or Conrado Benitez, who afterwards lost their lives at the hands of infamous counter-revolutionary assassins, while carrying out the noble and humane task of teaching our peasants.

Among the crowd there were people who had performed heroic deeds and made great sacrifices defending the Revolution on the most diverse fronts, and who afterwards gave their lives for it. There were many heroes among them, many martyrs who made possible the triumphs and achievements of the Revolution, who enabled the Revolution to survive and to resist its enemies.

The Revolution has still much to do. It still has to fight for many goals. It has powerful enemies, with U.S. imperialism as the chief enemy. This enemy threatens us and will threaten us for a long time to come. He will not reconcile himself easily to the revolutionary gains of our people, even though he has no choice. Thousands of kilometers from here, he is attacking other peoples, is mounting a criminal attack on the people of North Vietnam, and also on the revolutionary people of South Vietnam.

That enemy is intervening in the Congo. He sends his ships and marines and aircraft to every part of the globe. He takes advantage of division among the revolutionaries, of the deplorable division existing in the socialist community. He calculates, and analyzes, and uses all that is likely to weaken the revolutionary front.

In other words, there are circumstances fraught with danger for the peoples, for our people and for other peoples fighting for their independence and freedom in various parts of the globe. Those circumstancs are fraught with danger for all of us.

Today I will not enlarge on the problems arising from the differences and divergences in the socialist camp. We do not even know when we will have to discuss these problems thoroughly, for the point is not to discuss for discussion's sake but to achieve something positive and useful for ourselves, not for imperialism, not for the enemies of the peoples.

Our small countries, which have no armies millions strong nor an atomic force, countries like Vietnam and Cuba, are intelligent enough to look calmly into things and to realize that it is they, the countries finding themselves in a peculiar position—one lying 90 miles from the American empire and the other being raided by U.S. aircraft—that are hardest hit by these differences and divergences which are weakening the socialist camp.

The point is not to analyze here the disputed theoretical or philosophical questions but to bear in mind the great truth that division is utterly unreasonable and absurd in the face of an enemy who is attacking, an enemy who is becoming more and more aggressive. Division in the face of the enemy has never been the right strategy, a revolutionary strategy, a wise strategy—at any period of human history, from the day the first revolutionary emerged, from the time when revolutions were a social phenomenon in which the masses took part spontaneously, to the time when revolutions became a conscious act, a phenomenon and a task fully understood by the peoples, which occured with the rise of Marxism.

In this revolutionary process, we have all been taught from the outset that all that divides weakens, and that disunity harms our people and benefits the imperialists. From the first, the mass of our people realized the need of unity, and unity became a cardinal issue of the Revolution, a demand of the masses, a watchword of the whole people. Now we ask ourselves: have the imperialists disappeared? Are they not attacking North Vietnam? Are not ordinary men and women losing their lives there?

Who is expected to believe it when he is told that division is convenient and useful? Surely the strategy which the imperialists are following in South Vietnam to put down the revolutionary movement is clear. First they attacked North Vietnam on the pretext of retaliating, and then they usurped the right to attack whenever they please, and continued to use large air force units against the South Vietnamese fighters.

What is the situation now? The imperialists are talking of a naval blockade. They are sending their marines and aircraft carriers to South Vietnam. They are massing aircraft to crush the revolutionary movement in South Vietnam. They want to use every weapon at their command to attack the guerrillas in South Vietnam, reserving the right to attack North Vietnam when they see fit and to wage an air warfare that entails no casualties on their part, to drop bombs from hundreds of planes and then allow themselves the luxury of sending helicopters to pick up the flyers of downed planes. The imperialists certainly want a very convenient form of struggle. They certainly want a war that will entail only losses in materiel, that is, in so-and-so many planes.

The people of both South and North Vietnam are undoubtedly suffering as a result. Men and women are losing their lives in the South as well as in the North, killed by machine guns and by American bombs.

The imperialists declare without the slightest hesitation that they propose to continue all those operations, since even the raids on North Vietnam failed to help overcome the split in the socialist family. Can anyone doubt that the split is encouraging the imperialists? Can anyone doubt that a united front would have made the imperialists think twice before launching their reckless attacks and their increasingly brazen intervention in that area of the world? Who can be convinced of the contrary? By means of what arguments and what sort of logic Who benefits from it all? The imperialists only. And who are the victims? The Vietnamese. Who suffers? The prestige of socialism, of the world Communist movement, of the world revolutionary movement. This should really pain us, for the emancipation movement is not a demagogic phrase but a slogan which we have always cherished.

Ours is a small country that does not aspire to become the hub of the universe or the center of the world revolutionary movement. And when we speak of these problems we do so in absolute sincerity, and without any selfish intent. We who speak of them have won revolutionary power by fighting and not through bourgeois elections. We speak of them on behalf of a people who for six years staunchly resisted all imperialist plots and threats. We speak of them on behalf of a people who never wavered in strengthening the revolutionary movement and the socialist community, and who are firm in their resolve to defend the Revolution against the imperialists and therefore unhesitatingly took the risk of a thermonuclear war, the risk of being attacked with nuclear weapons when, exercising our absolute right, which we have not renounced, we agreed very legitimately—an act we will never regret—to the instalment of strategic nuclear missiles on our soil.

We agreed to the instalment of these missiles and, furthermore, disagreed to their removal. I think this is an open secret.

Our country and our people, in whose name we speak, receive no American credits or foodstuffs under the "Food for Peace" program, nor do they have any dealings whatsoever with the imperialists. No one has ever taught us revolutionary conviction and sincerity, any more than our liberators were taught, in 1868 and 1895, to take the road to independence, the road of dignity. Our people have proclaimed the First and Second Havana Declarations, which we have copied from no document and which are a pure expression of the profoundly revolutionary and internationalist spirit of our people.

Since this is the spirit and the ideas of our Revolution, demonstrated whenever necessary and without the least vacillation, compromise or contradiction, we are entitled to ask—as are many other peoples: "Who benefits from this discord but our enemies?" And we have a perfect right, an absolute right which I believe no one will dare question, to abolish, to banish that discord and those Byzantine battles from our country and from the midst of our people.

Let it be known that it is our Party that carries on propaganda and sets the course in this country, and that in this country the issue comes under our jurisdiction. And if we do not want the apple of discord to come to our country because we do not like it, no one can smuggle it in. The U.S. imperialists are our only enemy. And the only insurmountable contradiction we have is that between us and U.S. imperialism. Imperialism is the only enemy against whom we are ready to break any lance.

We do not understand the language of division. In the specific case of a country like Vietnam being attacked by imperialism, there is only one position we can adopt. Nor do we do this because we go—as the imperialists may think—by the proverb "When you see your neighbor's house burning, wet yours." For when we see our neighbor's house burning, we want to share this difficulty.

We are not scared by those developments. Indeed, they fortify our spirit, and our position is that Vietnam should receive all the necessary aid. We are for helping it with arms and manpower. We are for the socialist camp taking the risk that may be necessary for Vietnam.

We are well aware that in the event of any major international complication we will be among the first targets of imperialism. But this has never worried us. We are not going to keep our mouths shut and play the fool, hoping that our lives may be spared. This is, in all frankness and sincerity, our well-considered and dispassionate position. We adopt it because we have the right to think and to reason, the legitimate and inviolable right to do as we think is just and fitting for revolutionaries. And let no one imagine he can lecture us on revolutionary behavior.

I hope no one will make the mistake of underestimating or ignoring the character of our people. I say this because the U.S. imperialists, one of whose features is contempt for everyone else, contempt for the small nations and underestimation of their character, have made lots of mistakes. The imperialists made a bad mistake by underrating our revolutionary people. It would be sad if others were to make similar mistakes. Our sincere policy has been, and is, to unify. We are not, and will never be, anyone's satellites. We take a very dispassionate, honest and sincere stand on the whole problem.

This is no time to burrow in papers and archives. I think that when the imperialists are attacking us it is ridiculous to do as in the fable—to start an argument as to whether they are greyhounds or spaniels, and whether they are made of paper or of iron. Let us leave all papers and archives and documents to history. Let history decide who did the right thing and who didn't, who was right and who was wrong. Let history reveal what everyone thought and said and did. But let history do it. After all, it's disgraceful to wash dirty linen in front of enemies, who, moreover, are attacking the smallest and weakest, not the strongest.

We have many things to do. We are faced with numerous extremely difficult tasks. We must cut millions of tons of cane to foil the imperialist blockade. We cannot do it by burrowing in papers but must work hard, using a machete.

There are great dangers in store for us. But we cannot combat them through Byzantine discord or academic garrulity. We must combat them by revolutionary firmness and integrity, by the readiness to fight.

The revolutionaries cannot effectively fight the imperialist enemy in any part of the globe when they are disunited and when they insult and attack one another. They have to be solidly united in order to fight. To those, however, who do not think this the right tactic for the world Communist movement we say that to us here on this small island, on our soil, in the front line, ninety miles from the imperialists, it is the right tactic.

It is to this way of thinking that we will adjust our line and our conduct.

I believe we pay proper homage to the memory of our dead comrades, of those who fell in battle. For this revolution grew out of a rising of the whole people, it was born of the people's sense of dignity, of the progressive and revolutionary spirit of the whole people. For the struggle which today intertwines and fuses with that of the other peoples of the globe against imperialism began practically a hundred years ago when arms were taken up for the first time to fight colonialism and exploitation in our country. The struggle has continued steadily along this line, and our people have never abandoned or betrayed it but have always firmly followed this clear-cut line. Such is the spirit of the people, such is their tradition.

The struggle was joined in, as it proceeded, by all the finest people of our country, and many of them lost their lives in it. The first men were not Marxist-Leninists. Carlos Manuel de Céspedes was not a Marxist. Nor was Marti, for he could not be a Marxist at that time, in the historical conditions in which his remarkable struggle developed. In those days, we would have been like them, just as today they would have been like us, for the revolutionary spirit of our people and their immediate task were the decisive factors at every stage. And we may say that the path travelled since then has been long and so has the development of our revolutionary thought, for at the beginning of the second half of the last century our country was not faced with the tasks of the proletarian revolution. The task at that time was to fight for independence, against Spanish colonial power.

We advanced to independence and national rebirth when a far more formidable force, U.S. imperialism, was on the rise. The struggle against this force became the great historic task of our people, who had to gain independence from that force and to resist its aggression, bearing the banner of the revolution aloft. This task coincides with the tasks facing other peoples of this continent and in Africa, Asia and Oceania, of all the peoples fighting with growing determination against colonialism and imperialism.

There has always been one path, one revolutionary line. Many heroes, many patriots and martyrs took this path. And those who have been carrying this banner on, those who have been following this line, represent the will of all. They are responsible not only to the present and future generations, but also to those generations which fought in the past.

On a day like this, when we are recalling those who have fallen, we are thinking that there is only one thing that comforts us and makes up for everything. It is the realization that those who fell did not fall in vain.

On past occasions, and on this very stairway, we paid homage to the memory of the fallen, but we did it sorrowfully, with a sense of hopelessness, thinking painfully that those sacrifices had borne no fruit. But when we recall those comrades, symbolized by the name of José Antonio Echevarria, on a day like this, in circumstances such as these, we are comforted, reassured and gratified by the thought that their sacrifice was not useless. We feel that today also, those who fought before, and who fell fighting, are with our people as the revolution progresses, as our people ascend the paths of history and of revolutionary thought, toward an unprecedented development of our ideas.

You, the youth of today, must feel that you are the successors of those people, their standard-bearers, those who have taken up their banner and are carrying it forward, marching on along the ascending path of our people, for the glorious historic cause of our country.

You are the new waves of the revolution and we are confident that you will live up to your position and prove worthy bearers of the banner of José Antonio Echevarria and his comrades.

Patria o muerte!

Venceremos!

THE NEGRO-LABOR COMMUNITY*

Gus Hall

The events of this past year have set in clear perspective the nature and place of the Negro-labor community in the U.S. political scene. This community was the center of the mass base for the crushing electoral defeat of the ultra-Right Goldwater challenge. It was this roadblock to reaction that swung the decisive large industrial states into the anti-ultra-Right column and was also responsible for the qualitative improvement in the composition of their Congressional delegations and state legislatures.

In the southern states reaction still has two weapons that prevent this force for progress from exercising its full potential: continued disfranchisement, and white chauvinism and prejudice reinforced by terror. To the extent that these weapons were nullified, however, the Negro-labor community in the South also began to play this role. This, of course, was especially true of the contribution of the Negro citizens in the southern states.

In the 1964 elections the political influence of the Negro-labor community hit a new high. But this was only a harbinger of the positive hard fact of U.S. political life, and of what is to come—of the fact that from now on, the Negro-labor community is more and more going to be a determining factor in the direction that U.S. political affairs will take. It will increasingly become the central political stimulus and point of reference for all forces of progress, and the main deterrent to all forces of reaction and retrogression.

The openly cynical, anti-democratic maneuvering over the question of reapportionment of electoral districts is a reflection of this development. The reactionary politicians are trying to gerrymander the Negro-labor community from its position of growing political influence. Reaction is alarmed because the democratic principle of "one man, one vote" shifts the political mass base of our electoral process toward the Negro-labor community just when this community is beginning to exert its new united power. The gerrymanderers are trying to segregate the Negro-labor community into separate districts in order to water down its influence.

When it was possible to create artificial divisions in the Negro-labor community, its influence could be dissipated by such gerrymandering schemes. But as the political consciousness and the unity of this community grow, the gerrymanderers are having an ever more difficult time.

THE NEGRO-LABOR ALLIANCE

The Negro-labor alliance has been the foundation on which the forward direction of American life has rested for a long time, although this has not always been obvious because its influence has been indirect and without organizational forms.

This is an alliance of the oppressed and the exploited. It is an alliance based on mutual self-interest and the oneness of the enemy. It has deep roots in our history. At each critical turning point it has tended to close ranks and its influence has grown. Within the overall framework of this long-term and short-range mutual self-interest, there have been and continue to be areas of conradictions. These contradictions create problems but they have not in any way changed the basic essence of this alliance or its role in our history.

The 20 million Negro-American citizens are an oppressed people, subjected to a system of segregation and discrimination which has its historic roots in the plantation system of slavery. U.S. capitalism has adopted this special system to divide the working class and the people to cut down the resistance to its oppression and exploitation. Jim Crow is an instrument for extracting maximum profits from the Negro and white workers.

As is the case with colonialism on the world scene, the ending of the system of Jim Crow has emerged as the most crucial domestic question for the United States. Its time has arrived and it cannot be long postponed. On it, all class groups are forced to take a stand, for it is not only the future of the 20 million Negro-Americans that is involved. The future of the entire country rides on how this question is solved. This includes our democratic institutions, our educational system, the pattern of our economy, the future of organized labor, and so on.

The force that will largely determine the nature of the solution is the Negro-working class community. While the Negro people are all victims of special oppression, there is a growing class differentation among them. In this, the Negro workers, who are part of both the U.S. working class and the oppressed Negro people, are of cardinal importance.

The destruction of the evil system of discrimination and segregation, directed against the Negro citizens but used to divide all the victims of monopoly capital, has emerged as an absolute condition for progress. The mass movement that now fights for its elimination has therefore emerged as the generative force that sparks the struggle for progress on all fronts.

All societies with class divisions inevitably produce one class whose self-interest propels it to become the leader and the center of gravity for all forces of progress. In our times life has assigned this responsibility to the working class. On its broad shoulders rests the advance of civilization. The opposite side of this historic coin is that simultaneously there also arises a class that embodies all that is reactionary and backward. In modern times, the sewer that carries all this refuse and dirt and sickness is the class of capital. One class leads in the struggle for progress; the other creates obstacles to it. One is constructive; the other is destructive of all human values. One propels social advance; the other attempts to turn the wheels of history back. One class covers its resistance to progress with an ideology of cynicism, demagogy and an appeal to prejudice and backwardness. The other inscribes on its ideological banners all concepts that guide and support man in his rise to a higher form of civilization.

In each country, the rise of these class forces is a distinct historical process. With time each of the classes increasingly takes on its specific role and nature, and this process continues until it leads to a qualitative shift which completely discards the reactionary class and the system that gave rise to it.

This class framework is as valid and real in determining the course of affairs in the United States as it is everywhere else in the world. With all its weaknesses our working class in the United States has fulfilled its historic responsibilities and is continuing to do so. The fact that it has not fully taken on what history demands of it, or that it has not carried the struggle to its final conclusion, does not in any way disqualify it as the most advanced element of our society.

It is only on the basis of this objective class relationship that one can give leadership in the struggles to end all evils of capitalism. Any attempt to deal with social or economic problems by ignoring or rejecting it will lead to blind alleys. The very heart of capitalist propaganda is the denial of the class nature of capitalism and the role of the working class. The influence of such ideas penetrates even into the ranks of the progressive movement.

Only an understanding of the class forces and their role in society makes it possible for one to understand the phenomena of alliances, coalitions and united front formations in struggle. These are relationships built around parallel and mutual self-interests, which can and do cut across class formations. Because of its objectively designated role in history the working class attracts all sectors of the population whose self-interests are served by a progressive direction in life. In some cases, these self-interests run along parallel lines only for brief periods. Coalitions in such cases are of brief duration and are usually around very specific issues. But this does not in any way minimize their importance. The history of human progress is in fact a history of the rise and fall of coalitions and alliances based on parallel mutual self-interests.

There are also coalitions that are based on long-range mutual self-interest. Such coalitions run the course of whole historic epochs.

With these things in mind, I want to deal with the historic role and nature of the Negro-labor alliance in the United States. This is a very distinctive kind of alliance, one that runs the course of epochs. Without an understanding of this central phenomenon of our society, one cannot fully understand the American scene.

In a sense, the Negro-labor coalescence is more than an alliance or a united front formation. It is a political and an economic community, an overlapping, interlinked unit. As the consciousness of this grows in its ranks, this community will become the power that will determine the direction of events in our country.

On a world scale, the working class is emerging as the class on whose shoulders the future of civilization rests. Because it is the leading element in the world socialist, anti-imperialist, peace community, it is now the decisive force determining the course of world events. Hence the elements in the community are more than allies of one another; they are parts of one historical revolutionary process, part of one progressive community—of an interlinked unit. And one can understand the nature and role of this community only if one understands the nature and role of the working class.

AN INTEGRATED WORKING CLASS

A distinctive feature of the historic formation of the U.S. working class has been the moulding of a class composed of Negro and white workers, a class of many national backgrounds. This fact has always provided U.S. capitalism with a special ideological weapon of prejudice. Nevertheless within capitalist society there is nothing so inevitable, so absolute as the emergence, growth and political maturing of the working class. The development of class consciousness, class unity, class struggle is rooted in the very process of exploitation. To deny the rise and the historic role of the working class is to deny the very class nature of capitalism.

And so, in spite of the obstacle created by the system of discrimination by the practice of keeping Negro workers out of some industries altogether and confining them to the hardest, lowest-paying jobs in others, and by the constant infusion of the poison of white chauvinism as an inseparable component of capitalist ideology—a united, integrated working class is taking shape and assuming its designated historic place. Indeed, the process of formation of an integrated working class of Negro and white workers as the basis of the Negro-labor community has paved the way for an integrated nation in which all of our people live in equality.

The historic path to a united, integrated working class has been marked by many obstables and many setbacks. Such a process is slow because it is fundamentally a process of development of a class ideology and class outlook. Ideology is the result of experience upon experience. For long periods the white workers could not see their overall class interests because of the heavy fog of chauvinism and prejudice. The fog has slowly dissipated, though much of it still remains.

With the lifting of the fog, the process of unification takes place through a series of qualitative leaps. The unionization of the basic mass production industries remains a modern landmark as one of these qualitative leaps. It went a long way to destroy the ideology behind the craft unions—one of hiding the working-class nature of society. The craft union ideology was an instrument that long divided the Negro and white workers.

The CIO, and especially the Left-led unions, made historic contributions to this development. Their formation firmly established the concept that all workers, Negro and white, of all trades and professions, belong to united industrial unions and locals.

A graphic illustration of both processes — the formation of an integrated, united working class and the development and rise of the Negro-labor community—was the Conference to Organize the Negro Steel Workers into the New Steelworkers Union, held in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania in 1937. This was a conference representing all sectors of the Negro people and their organizations, meeting with the leaders of the newly emerging steel union. This participation was a clear indication of how the leaders of the Negro people's organizations understood both the role of a united, integrated working class in defense of its own class interests and that of the Negro-labor community in the struggle against Jim Crow. This Conference was an important step in the development of both of these processes.

The process of integration and unification of the working class is continuing. The Negro workers have become a part of the most militant and most union-conscious sector of the U.S. working class. This process and the growth of the class consciousness in the ranks of the working class are parts of the same development. Class consciousness is the most formidable antidote to the poison of chauvinism and prejudice.

The process of class integration has made its clearest advances wherever the need for class unity has been most obvious. Thus each economic struggle has been a classrom for integration and unity. In such struggles, class and individual self-interests rise to the surface, and the evil, divisive purpose of chauvinism becomes more obvious and therefore more easily exposed.

The influence of the rising integrated, united working class on the struggles of today is not always fully appreciated because its influence is not always direct or dramatic. But as the fog lifts, as the workers get a new qualitative sense of their class position, they will increasingly have a greater influence on the character of all mass currents and movements. The methods of mass struggle today already show the influences of working-class experience. The sit-ins, boycotts, picket lines, mass demonstrations, combining economic struggle with political action, and the tactic of alliances and united front relations, are all variations of methods originally developed in the fires of the class struggle. And the leaders and spokesmen of religious and social organizations take a more forthright stand for civil rights where they sense the influence of members of the working class in their organizations and communities.

The vote for the Civil Rights Bill was a barometer of how the elected officials assessed the mood of the people in general. But above all it was an assessment of the mood of the Negro-labor community in the big industrial centers. Workers are most often not the spokesmen or the leaders of reform movements. But invariably it is the Negro-labor community that is the mass base of all of them. Therefore, to appreciate fully the present role and influence of this community, one has to study its grass-roots base, and the details of relations and forces that never appear in headlines or are not immediately evident. But it is from this base that all movements get their staying power and their militancy. Movements that do not have the support of this mass base are usually very short-lived.

THE NEGRO-LABOR COMMUNITY IN THE SOUTH

Jim Crow and unorganized shops are closely related twin evils in the South. They are, in fact, two faces of one policy designed for one purpose—maximum profits for big business and the landowners. The net result of this policy is a "Southern differential" of lower wages, longer hours, mass poverty, mass misery. The brutal oppression of the Negro Americans, combined with an open policy of violence against unions and progressive organizations—this is the strategy of big business for keeping the South a sort of semi-colonial preserve for extreme exploitation, high profits, cheap labor, runaway shops, and disfranchised people ruled by a racist, fascist-like gang through terror and murder. Big business wants this kind of South not only because of the immediate profits it yields but because it is a bulwark of reaction throughout the nation. The ultra-Right Goldwater attempt to use the South as a base in his bid for power strikingly illustrates the point.

The heart of the forces that will break this stranglehold of reaction on the South is the Negro-labor community. Toward this end, it is necessary to find the links that bring together the drives to end Jim Crow and to abolish the non-union shops. The trade unions will have to understand that they will never conquer the one evil by ignoring its inseparable twin. Jim Crow is anti-union; the anti-union policies are instruments in perpetuating Jim Crow. These are the two sides of the coin. The struggle against the common enemy in the South demands a new level of unity and integration of the working class and a new quality in the relations within the Negro-labor community. This is the central challenge facing the leaders and the rank and file of this community. There is a great need for a national conference of the Negro-labor community to map out a joint mass plan for ending segregation and discrimination, ending the brutal terror against Negro citizens, and against unions and union organizers, and bringing equality, the right to collective bargaining, and equal protection under the law to all citizens of the South. Such a common drive would be the greatest stimulus to the progressive forces on all fronts.

HISTORIC ROOTS

The history of the American people is full of examples of how the objective forces in our society have pressed toward the formation of both the Negro-labor community and an integrated, united working class. Because these early efforts did not result in the full-blown product, or because there were numerous setbacks, is no reason to call them failures. Nor are these grounds for rejecting the idea that these things are in the process of development. Each of the experiences in our history has added something to this development. And each new development has in turn made the objective conditions more ripe, and has thereby slowly increased the pressure of the objective screws of history.

In the last century, the Knights of Labor constituted the first real attempt to organize a national working-class union. They were outlawed and condemned. But even these early class formations had in them the seeds of the unified, integrated class of Negro and white workers. The objective forces were just beginning to turn the screws on. In the South the Negro workers led the heroic efforts to organize unions under the conditions then existing.

Long-range and permanent assemblies in the South of today can be most meaningful if they rest on large industrial union locals of an integrated working class which have put an end to the practices of discrimination in their shops, which have outlowed Jim Crow by union contract and union constitution. This relationship can then become the basis for a Negro-labor community that can determine the direction of union affairs in the South.

It was during the Civil War that the Negro-labor community left its first indelible mark on our history, and the post-Civil War period is evidence of the fact that it did not take long for the capitalist class to realize the potential danger to its selfish aims which the development of such a community presented. It quickly let loose on both a campaign of murder and terror.

The capitalist class allied itself with the forces against the slave-based South only when its narrow self-interests were served, and not for one minute longer, Ethical, moral or humanitarian considerations were not factors that motivated them. As long as the capitalist class of the North profits from slavery, it supported the slave society of the South. Only later, when the slave system became an obstacle to the expansion of their profit-making empires, did the capitalist class give its support to the struggle against the slave society of the South. This was a very brief period because capitalism was interested in doing away only with those features of slavery that were adverse to their narrow self-interests. In fact, it adopted as its own the features that aided their drive for profits. This is the background for the present system of segregation ad discrimination, of white chauvinism and terror practiced against the Negro Americans.

The relationship of the working class to the issues and forces involved in the Civil War was quite different. For example, how different the course of our history might have been if the working class of Eengland had not stopped the English Government from entering into armed struggle against the North when the Civil War was hanging in the balance. The working class was the only force that opposed the armed attack. It put up an historic battle. It is true that the working class was motivated by its long-range self-interests. But these were also the self-interests of human society in its struggle forward.

The Civil War period also has rich lessons on the nature of alliances based on parallel self-interests. The victorious alliance against slavery finally included the slaves, the workers and the frontier farmers, as well as sections of the capitalist class, and the clergy and professional people, mainly in the northern states. Though these were allied against slavery, the contradictions between the classes in the alliance did not disappear. The advanced sections of the working class fought to include and combine the struggle against wage slavery with the struggle against chattel slavery. The capitalist class fought against all concepts of classes and class struggle within capitalism. Most of the popular leaders for the abolition of slavery took a favorable position to the struggles of the working class. These were swallows heralding the future course of development of the Negro-labor community.

But not all of the anti-slavery forces could see the relationship of the rising working class and its aims to the struggle against the slave system.

These differences in the alliance created stresses and strains, but the objective screws pressed the alliance against slavery. The precursors of the labor-Negro community of today were even present in the actions of the beginnings of an organized labor movement in the South.

Not all of early labor understood the urgency, from the standpoint of their own self-interest, of the need to end the slave system. Some argued that an end to their "wage slavery" would then force an end to the slavery system in the South. But then as now the special oppression of the Negro Americans constituted a roadblock to progress. Then as now it was in the self-interest of all exploited and oppressed to join together in an alliance to put an end to Jim Crow.

Thus the Negro-labor political and economic community is a specific U.S. historical development. It has roots in history, and is fed by present-day objective factors. In the very center of this community is the developing united. integrated Negro and white working class, ever more conscious of its class nature and its assigned role in our present and future history.

It is important to understand the nature of this community and the role of the working class in it because all future progress basically emanates from this source. It is important because all who try—for whatever reason—to create divisions in this community are acting to disperse and to dissipate the main driving forces of progress. What we are called upon to do is to find the issues, the organizational forms, the understanding that will help the objective conditions further to unite this community.

ON THE CONSULTATIVE MEETING OF REPRESENTATIVES OF COMMUNIST AND WORKERS' PARTIES

RESOLUTION* OF PLENARY MEETING OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE SOVIET UNION MARCH 26, 1965

Having heard Comrade M. A. Suslov's report on the Consultative Meeting of representatives of Communist and Workers' parties, held in Moscow on March 1-5, 1965, the CC, CPSU fully endorses the Communique and the Statement on the events in Vietnam adopted by the Meeting and approves of the activities of the CPSU delegation.

The Central Committee considers that the Meeting constituted an important step in strengthening the unity of the world Communist movement in the struggle against imperialism and colonialism, for national liberation, peace, democracy and socialism.

The results of the Meeting show that the participating Communist parties are firmly resolved to do everything in their power to cement the unity of the world Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism and the line set forth in the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement.

The Central Committee fully agrees with the participants in the Meeting that the strengthening of unity presupposes above all a higher sense of internationalist responsibility on the part of every Communist Party and the active participation of each Party in joint actions in the common struggle against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism, in support of the liberation struggle of the peoples, against the rule of monopoly capital, for world peace and affirmation of the principles of peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems, for socialism and communism. Of special importance today are joint actions by the Communist parties of all countries, of all the peace-loving and democratic forces, to repulse the U.S. imperialists aggression against South Vietnam and other peoples subjected to imperialist aggression. A call to this effect is contained in the highly important Statement adopted by the Meeting on the events in Vietnam.

The CC, CPSU regards as correct and fully approves the measures taken by the Presidium of the CC in agreement with the leadership of the Party of Working People of Vietnam to render further aid and support to the heroic struggle of the Vietnamese people and to strengthen the defense capability of the DRV with a view to repelling the aggression of the U.S. imperialists.

The CC, CPSU is in full agreement with the views and considerations set forth in the Communique. For its part, our Party will do everything necessary to give effect to these views and considerations and to ensure that they lead to a strengthening of the unity of the world Communist movement on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism.

The CPSU shares the conclusion of the participants in the Meeting that differences in the Communist movement, weakening its unity, cause damage to the cause of the world liberation movement, to the cause of communism. Our Party, like the other fraternal parties that took part in the Meeting, holds that the present situation imperatively calls for effective measures to overcome the difficulties in the Communist movement and to restore the unity of its ranks.

The CC, CPSU supports the proposals, worked out by the Meeting participants in an atmosphere of complete equality and mutual respect for the opinions of all the parties, concerning the ways and means of strengthening the unity of the Communist movement. These proposals call for joint actions in the struggle for common aims, collective efforts to improve relations between parties, bilateral and multilateral meetings and other forms of contact between parties, and the discontinuation of open polemics abusive and uncomradely in form. At the same time it is necessary to promote a comradely exchange of opinions on the important problems of our time and strictly to observe the standards governing relations between parties as defined by the 1957 and 1960 conferences.

The unity of the fraternal parties could also be promoted by convening, at a suitable date, a preliminary Consultative Meeting of representatives of the 81 parties which took part in the 1960 Meeting. Such a meeting would make it possible to decide, by the most democratic methods, on the ways and forms of preparing a new International Conference of representatives for the new International Conference and its convocation at a suitable time would be in the interest of the world Communist movement—this conclusion reached by the participants in the Consultative Meeting is fully supported by the CPSU.

The CC, CPSU approves the measures taken by the Presidium of the CC since the October (1964) Plenary Meeting to strengthen fraternal friendship with the socialist countries and the unity of the world Communist movement, including the steps taken to promote contacts and cooperation with all the Communist and Workers' parties.

The CPSU will continue steadfastly to pursue the Leninist line laid down in its Program and in the Declaration and Statement of the Moscow meetings, firmly upholding the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, and working together with the other Communist parties to unite all the socialist countries, all the Marxist-Leninist parties, all the revolutionary forces of our time, in the fight against imperialism and colonialism, for national liberation, peace, democracy and socialism.

URGENT MEASURES FOR THE FURTHER DEVELOPMENT OF SOVIET AGRICULTURE

REPORT* BY L. I. BREZHNEV, FIRST SECRETARY, CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE CPSU, TO THE CC, CPSU, MARCH 24, 1965

Comrades, last November the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union passed the important decision to merge the industrial and rural Party organizations at regional and territorial level. The decision won the wholehearted approval of the Party and the people.

A great deal of organizing and political work has been done since the November Meeting of the CC on the setting up of single Party, government, trade union, and Komsomol bodies. Party conferences have been held at territorial, regional and district level, with more than 700,000 Communists attending, and more than 34,000 speaking in the debate.

The delegates to the conferences discussed the decisions of the October and November meetings of the Central Committee. They stressed that the setting up of single Party bodies would make for a further improvement in the work of Party organizations, and increase their leading role in the management of economic and cultural affairs.

Single regional and territorial Party committees have been elected at Party conferences in the 85 Regions and Territories where the Party organization had been divided into industrial and agricultural ones. Single Regional and Territorial Executive Committees of Soviets of Working People's Deputies have also been set up. District Party committees have been elected at District Conferences. The Party committees of production boards have been abolished.

The Central Committee of the CPSU has supported the proposal of the Central Committees of the Communist Parties of the Union Republics and regional and territorial committees that some districts be divided into smaller units. A number of new rural districts have been set up with the aim of promoting economic and cultural development. At present we have 2,434 District Party committees, an increase of 611 over the number that existed at Collective-State Farm Boards. Experienced personnel have been sent to reinforce the district committees.

*Pravda, March 27, 1965.

The organizational structure of the Party bodies has been brought into line with the Rules of the CPSU. The restoration of single Party bodies on Leninist principles has increased the role of the Party organizations and put an end to their separation resulting from uncalled-for reorganizations. The Party organizations now have every opportunity for fruitful work.

The Central Committee of the CPSU is submitting to this Plenary Meeting the problem of urgent measures for the further development of agriculture. This question is being raised because there have been serious shortcomings and mistakes in agricultural management in recent years, which were laid bare at the October and November plenary meetings of the Central Committee.

With a view to steadily advancing the socialist economy of our country, and improving the Soviet people's standard of living, we must take a number of important measures to increase agricultural output. We consider the development of agriculture the concern of our entire Party, of all our people.

I. THE MAIN RESULTS OF AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT IN RECENT YEARS

Comrades, our agriculture is based on the most advanced social system, one that has stood the test of time and has proved its invincible vitality. Thanks to the socialist system, the Communist Party has been able to do much to promote agriculture.

The September 1953 Plenary Meeting of the CC of the CPSU was an event of vast importance. It charted the right course in agriculture. And we must say frankly that we achieved definite results as long as its decisions were being carried out. Much was done to strengthen the collective and state farms organizationally and economically, to improve their material and technical base, and to increase material incentives for people engaged in agriculture.

Tens of thousands of agricultural experts and organizers went to work in the countryside at that time in response to the Party's appeal. The reclamation of virgin and disused lands went a long way toward increasing grain production. In the first five years after the September meeting of the Central Committee sown areas were considerably expanded, yields rose, and gross and marketable output of farm produce went up.

Unfortunately, these positive results were not consolidated and carried forward. We are confronted by the fact that agricultural development has slowed down in recent years and that our plans for increasing agricultural production have remained unfulfilled.

According to the target figures, gross agricultural output should have grown under the Seven-Year Plan (1959-65) by 70 per cent, but the actual increase over the six years that have already passed is 10 per cent. From 1955 to 1959 gross output rose by an annual average of 7.6 per cent, whereas in the last five years it was only 1.9 per cent annually. The rise in yields of the basic crops has slowed down. The average yields of grain crops between 1955 and 1959 showed an average increase of 1.7 centners per hectare over the previous five-year period, but between 1960 and 1964 the rise was only 0.8 centners.

A similar state of affairs is observed in stock farming. The rate of increase in the cattle population dropped to half that of the previous five-year period. As for hogs, sheep and poultry, their numbers showed a considerable decline over the same period. The average milk yield per cow on the collective and state farms has decreased by 370 kg.

These data suggest that while there was a noticeable advance in agriculture up to 1959, little headway has been made since then.

What are the main reasons for this situation?

First, the weak spot in agricultural management is that the demands of the economic laws governing socialist economic development were not fully taken into account, and, indeed, were ignored altogether. We mean above all such laws as those of planned and proportional development and expanded socialist reproduction, as well as the principles of coordinating public and personal interests, providing material incentives, and so on. As we know, reality severely punishes those who disregard these laws, who ignore them and use a subjective approach.

Purely arbitrary practices have been gaining ground in the practical leadership of agriculture in recent years, especially as regards planning, price formation, financing and credits. For example, it cannot be considered normal that the procurement prices of a number of agricultural products do not cover production costs, with the result that collective and state farms incur great losses.

Frequent, and occasionally far-fetched, reorganizations created an atmosphere of nervous tension and confusion. They made it impossible for managers to look ahead, and undermined their faith in their own ability. Quite often it became the rule to run collective and state farms by issuing bureaucratic instructions and peremptory orders, instead of doing thoughtful and painstaking work and making a deep analysis of the situation.

Secondly, very big tasks were set before agriculture, but they were not adequately supported by economic measures, specifically by properly fixing prices for agricultural produce and manufactured goods, allocating appropriate investment funds and improving material and technical supply. State investments in agriculture were 11.3 per cent of the total investment in the economy in the five-year period (1954-1958), while the target figures for the Seven-Year Plan (1959-1965) put them at only 7.5 per cent.

As distinct from any other branch of the economy, the construction projects of state farms and especially of collective farms were not fully supplied with the necessary materials and equipment. Often large sums were spent on projects which were not required urgently for production purposes. As a result, this expenditure did not produce the necessary economic effect and so was detrimental to the economy.

Thirdly, very little was done to achieve an all-round improvement in farming methods and to raise soil fertility. Many collective and state farms violated the rules of crop rotation and the elementary rules of agronomy. Central bodies issued many different stereotyped directions on land cultivation, the crop pattern, the change-over from one system of farming to another, and the keeping and feeding of cattle, without allowing for the natural and economic conditions of production and local experience. All this hampered methodical economic management. It reduced the responsibility of agricultural bodies, and did not lead to more efficient use of the land.

Lastly, when speaking about the reasons for the lag in agriculture, we must admit that there were also serious shortcomings in the work of Party, government and agricultural bodies. Needless to say, the work of staffs was made more difficult by frequent reorganizations. But even so, we did not fully use the opportunities we had. We did not work well enough among people, did not make sufficient use of experts and of agricultural science, and failed properly to organize the analysis and dissemination of advanced know-how.

Comrades, we encounter the consequences of errors in agricultural management in every part of our country, but their adverse effect was particularly marked in the non-black earth areas. Take Smolensk Region. Gross agricultural output there has increased by only one per cent in the last five years. The region has yet to reach the prewar level of production of the most important field crops.

Crop yields in the region are still low. The milk yield per cow on collective and state farms has decreased by nearly 400 kg. The only branch of agriculture that is showing a profit is flax-growing.

We cannot help being seriously concerned about the state of affairs in agriculture. The Presidium of the CC CPSU has worked out and is now submitting to this Meeting important economic measures intended to strengthen the collective and state farms organizationally and economically.

We realize that we must improve agriculture in order to build communism successfully. To solve this problem, which is the concern of the whole people, we must put agriculture on a firm economic foundation. Lenin considered this problem one of the major problems of the Party's economic policy, for it affects the bedrock of the Soviet state—the relations between the working class and the peasantry.

We must correct the mistakes made in agriculture as speedily as possible, and put an end to subjectivism. We must use, on a broad economic basis, material and moral stimuli to foster production. This calls for serious effort and radical changes in the working methods of the Party, government and economic bodies, of all of us.

II. THE SYSTEM OF AGRICULTURAL PROCUREMENTS NEEDS TO BE IMPROVED

Comrades, the Presidium of the Central Committee attaches great importance to the problem of improving the system of procurements and purchases of agricultural products. It has many shortcomings and needs to be improved.

Its main defect today is that it creates uncertainty on the collective and state farms, and prevents proper planning of production. The collective and state farms receive purchasing plans for a period of only one year, often with great delay. Furthermore, these plans are often amended during delivery, and collective and state farms are given additional assignments often exceeding the planned targets.

Collective and state farms have been known to appeal to the state for seed after completing grain deliveries. In 1962 the state sold them 1,373,000 tons of seed. This year requests have again been made for two million tons of seed.

In a number of belts, the price for the purchased grain does not cover the cost of its production. These practices are detrimental to the state. They undermine collective and state farms, and provide no incentive to the farmers.

We all know from experience the difficulties involved in grain procurements. The fact that the grain purchasing plans in the last ten years were fulfilled only three times—in 1956, 1958 and 1964—shows how faulty and unrealistic they were.

Reality demands that we improve the entire grain procurement system. First of all, we must go over to stable procurement plans covering several years. These plans should harmoniously combine public interests with those of the farms concerned.

The Presidium of the CC, CPSU is submitting to this Meeting the following proposals:

First, that the plan adopted for grain purchases in 1965 be reduced from 4,000 million poods to 3,400 million poods;

Second, that these 3,400 million poods remain fixed and stable for the entire period covered by the coming Five-Year Plan, including 1970.

Stable plans for grain purchases in the coming six years should be fixed for all republics, regions, territories, districts, collective and state farms.

We suggest the following draft plan for grain purchases in the Union Republics for the period 1965-70;

	Million poods
USSR AS A WHOLE	3,400
Russian Federation	2,103
Ukrainian SSR	617
Byelorussian SSR	15.3
Uzbek SSR	17.5
Kazakh SSR	586
including Tselinny Territory	443
Georgian SSR	4.3
Azerbaijan SSR	8.2
Lithuanian SSR	4.6
Moldavian SSR	24.4
Latvian SSR	4.0
Kirghiz SSR	10.4
Tajik SSR	1.8
Armenian SSR	1.2
Turkmen SSR	1.2
Estonian SSR	1.8

As you see, comrades, the Presidium of the Central Committee is proposing a fundamentally new system of planning grain procurements. This is a vital necessity today and it will effectively help the productive forces of agriculture. We are certain it will win the approval and support of the Party and the people.

Simultaneously we suggest raising—beginning with this year's harvest—basic purchasing prices for wheat, rye and some other cereals, and also for sunflower seed produced by state farms. So-called sliding-scale prices are to be annulled. The new purchasing prices for wheat and rye are suggested as follows:

PURCHASING PRICES
(in rubles per ton of basis conditions)

	For collective farms		For state farms and other establishments
	wheat	rye	wheat	rye
Russian Federation (exclusive of the north-western, central and Volga-Vyatka regions)	86	81	59	63
North-western, central, Volga-Vyatka regions of the Russian Federation, Polesye in the Ukraine, Byelorussian SSR, Lithuania SSR, Latvian SSR and Estonian SSR	130	130	130	130
Ukrainian SSR (exclusive of the Polesye and Moldavian SSR	76	76	45	45
Kazakh SSR	80	80	65	60
Kirghiz SSR	85	80	65	60
Uzbek SSR, Georgian SSR, Azerbaijan SSR, Tajik SSR, Armenian SSR, Turkmen SSR	90	85	90	85

The new purchasing prices for grain will benefit all. They have been evolved with due regard to the local conditions. Take, for instance, Byelorussia and the Baltic republics. Their procurement quotas will be much lower. Moreover, prices for grain purchased from collective and state farms in these areas will be increased from 50 to 100 per cent against those operating today. If the collective and state farms in these areas work better and reap good harvests—and we have no doubt about that—they will derive an extra income from grain sales to the state over and above plan. As for the collective and state farms in the major grain-growing areas, such as the Ukraine, Siberia, North Caucasus, the Volga country, Kazakhstan, the Urals, and the Central Black Earth Region, they will be able in the new conditions further to increase their profits from grain sales to the state.

Comrades, the Presidium of the Central Committee thinks it necessary to inform this Meeting that the proposed amount of grain purchases will not fully meet growing requirements and the need to build up state reserves. Therefore, along with planned procurements, we should make provisions for above-plan purchases of staple food crops from farms having a surplus of marketable grain.

The state will encourage the free purchase of farm produce, and will stimulate it by means of stable prices. It will do everything to promote commodity relations in agriculture. To stimulate the sale by collective and state farms of agricultural produce over and above plan, it is proposed to establish a 50 per cent increase over the basic purchasing price of wheat and rye.

We hold that stable state procurement plans and new purchasing prices for basic cereals—wheat and rye—will help to lay a solid foundation for our grain farming, and put an end to the low grain production capacities of collective and state farms in a number of belts. These economic inducements will serve as a most important instrument for raising labor productivity and overcoming the lag in this leading branch of farming within the next few years.

Naturally, these measures will entail additional expenditure, and the state is prepared to cover it by redistributing budget appropriations. We are convinced that this aid will enable collective and state farms to produce and the state to purchase much more grain than today. Besides, the farms will have more grain to meet their own requirements. This, in fact, is the main idea of the new system of grain procurements.

Prominent in our plans for increased grain output are the Ukraine, the Volga country, North Caucasus, Siberia and the Central Black Earth Region, which have long been famous as the country's major granaries. The new important grain-growing areas, such as Kazakhstan and the Urals, where vast tracts of virgin and disused lands have been reclaimed, must also extend their production capacities.

The Presidium of the Central Committee has considered the state of agriculture in the non-black earth belt, which can and must, for its part, occupy a creditable place in grain production. In the past, large areas were sown to rye, oats, buckwheat and other crops throughout this belt.

This belt accounts for over 40 million hectares, or one-fifth of the cultivated area of the USSR. It has a stable rate of precipitation and can produce bumper crops every year, provided the standard of cultivation is adequate. However, it has not received proper attention in recent years, with the result that its crop farming has declined. Our plans envisage measures to promote farming in this belt.

Comrades, we are having difficulties in keeping the country properly supplied with buckwheat, millet and rice. Less attention has lately been paid to their production and this has led to a substantial reduction in sown areas and in total output.

We must reconsider our attitude to cereal crops. We must encourage production of buckwheat and millet, as well as rice. An adequate purchasing price could be one of the incentives.

The importance of a proper price policy on agricultural products is evident from our experience in increasing output of cotton and sugar-beet. Many comrades here will remember that in 1949 raw cotton prices were substantially raised, and that this led to a rapid increase in its production. Then, between 1958 and 1962, bonuses and exchange sales of grain and other goods to the cotton-growing collective farms were abolished. As a result, yields and total output declined.

Early in 1963 cotton prices were raised by 20 per cent for the collective farms and 12 per cent for the state farms, and exchange sale of grain was re-established. As a result, cotton yields went up to 21.5 centners per hectare the next year as against 18 centners in 1962.

This was also the case with sugar-beet. In 1958 stimuli for increased production of this crop were abolished. What happened? Yields and procurements went steeply down. In 1962 the purchasing prices of beet were raised from 23 to 29 rubles per ton, and bonuses in sugar for growers were restored. The result: in 1964 yields went up considerably and procurements almost doubled.

I would like to mention the state of rice cultivation in our country. The demand for rice is growing from year to year. But rice cultivation is not getting the attention it merits. In the last five years we have had to import almost 1.5 million tons of rice. This has cost us a pretty sum. Wouldn't it have been better to invest that money in rice cultivation at home?

The Party, government and agricultural bodies in a number of regions in the Ukraine, Kazakhstan, the Central Asian republics, the Krasnodar and Stavropol territories and Rostov Region are taking practical measures to increase rice output. This year the rice area can be expanded by 30,000 hectares.

If we all tackle the problem we will have plenty of rice. Measures to increase rice output should be included in the Five-Year Plan, so that in order to fully provide the needs of the country and cut out imports.

These are the economic measures which the Presidium of the Central Committee is submitting to this Meeting with a view to increasing grain production.

Comrades, it is a well-known fact that animal husbandry directly depends on crop farming, primarily grain output. Increased grain production lays a solid foundation for progress in stock-breeding. The Presidium of the CC, CPSU is planning a number of economic measures to facilitate the advancement of this important branch of the economy.

As matters stand today, stock-breeding at many collective and state farms is unprofitable.

We are faced with an obviously abnormal situation: the more meat a farm produces, the greater is its loss. Surely we cannot put up with this.

This has also led to a sharp drop in the sheep population in a number of regions. Take Yaroslavl Region, the homeland of the famous Romanov breed. Before the war they had 470,000 sheep; today only 186,000 are left. In Kirov Region the number of sheep has decreased by more than half over the same period and in Bryansk Region by 33.4 per cent. In 25 regions in the north-western, central and Volga-Vyatka areas the sheep population has gone down from 16,700,000 in 1928 to 7,500,000 in 1964, or by more than half.

State farm managers and collective farm chairmen, as well as agricultural, Party and government bodies cannot but be held responsible for this state of affairs in sheep-breeding. They have not done everything possible to make this branch profitable.

We must take steps to eliminate shortcomings in animal husbandry. First and foremost, we must establish, as from this year, a specific procurement plan for animal products for the republics, regions, territories, districts and collective and state farms covering several years. It should take into account development prospects, specialization, natural, economic and other conditions.

With due regard to the suggestions of the CP Central Committee and the Councils of Ministers of the Union Republics, and with the aim of preserving the livestock population in order to increase the output of animal produce, it has been decided to fix the state procurement plan for cattle and poultry in 1965 at 8,500,000 tons instead of 9 million tons fixed earlier. We must reduce somewhat purchasing plans for other animal products.

The following draft procurement plan for animal products in 1967-70 is suggested:

	1965	1966	1967	1968	1969	1970
Cattle and poultry (live weight in thousand tons)	8,500	8,930	9,460	10,020	10,680	11,400
Milk (thousand tons)	33,000	34,620	36,235	38,390	40,800	43,400
Eggs (millions)	9,400	10,000	10,840	11,920	13,510	15,000
Wool (thousand tons, in terms of scoured wool)	348	361	373	387	407	430

To hasten the growth of output of animal products, we need to take certain additional measures in terms of state assistance to collective and state farms. The drafts to be handed to you suggest, in keeping with local conditions, the following additions to purchasing and procurement prices at collective and state farms: cattle from 20 to 55 per cent, hogs from 30 to 70 per cent, sheep from 10 to 70 percent, and in the mountainous regions up to 100 per cent.

This increase in purchasing prices will not affect the retail prices of bread, cereals, meat and meat products.

As you see, the state is additionally investing large sums in animal husbandry as well. We are doing this to help the collective state farms make this branch profitable. The Party, government and agricultural bodies, the collective farm chairmen and state farm managers should use this help to radically improve animal husbandry within the next two or three years.

The Councils of Ministers of the Union Republics must, on the basis of average increases in existing meat prices, differentiate the production of meat without loss.

Many regions are asking that when drawing up purchasing plans the specified fat content of milk be reduced to the actual average level achieved. The request is justified, and an appropriate decision has been drafted. The prices paid for skimmed milk in the past are being restored. This will bring additional profits to the collective and state farms.

Stable plans for purchases of animal products over a number of years plus state aid will enable collective and state farms better to plan the development of animal husbandry. They will be able to calculate in advance how many head of livestock they can keep on the farms, what buildings they must construct and how they must secure fodder stocks. In short, collective farmers, state farm workers and specialists will be able to tackle all the specific problems of increasing output of animal products creatively, as thrifty masters.

The measures taken earlier by the Government and the Central Committee to lift the restrictions on keeping livestock in the households of collective farmers, factory workers and office employees will greatly promote the effort to increase the supply of animal products.

The projected measures to step up output of animal products will prove effective only if we do everything to build up sufficient fodder stocks. It is for the collective farmers, state farm workers and agricultural specialists to decide how this should be achieved. They know local conditions better than anyone else. They know better what to sow on their fields and what fodder to use.

We have no doubt that collective and state farms will fully use the recommendations of research institutions and experimental stations, and practical achievements in choosing the fodder they want to sow.

However, mention should be made of one particular source of increasing fodder supply. We must urgently take measures to improve grassland and pastures. Our country has about 300 million hectares of hay fields and pastures, but a considerable part of them is neglected. This applies particularly to the Moscow, Leningrad, Novgorod, Pskov, Kalinin, Ryazan and some other central regions.

Let us find the means, allocate the machinery and improve the state of these lands. The collective and state farms can do much by themselves, but the state will apparently have to help them in land reclamation, clearing undergrowth, etc.

A few words about maize. This crop yields good harvests in many areas, both for grain and silo, and it would be wrong not to use the rich opportunities it affords for increasing fodder production. We consider it necessary to say this here at this Meeting of the Central Committee because in some places the attitude to maize is wrong and people jump from one extreme to another. Maize should take a worthy place wherever its yields are high.

Comrades, the introduction of stable plans, the raising of basic prices for a number of farm products, and the system of above-plan purchases at higher prices will create new conditions for every farm, every management and every Party organization in a new situation. They will provide excellent opportunities for fruitful work and give them greater confidence.

From now on it will be possible, taking account of local conditions, to determine the crop pattern in advance, to restore crop rotation wherever it was upset, and to develop and introduce on the basis of scientific achievements and the latest experience progressive methods of cultivation and measures to increase livestock population and productivity.

A stable purchasing plan for six years ahead and encouragement of greater output of marketable produce will contribute in large measure to agricultural progress. They will allow full scope for the initiative of specialists and managers, and will give them the opportunity to freely display their abilities and enterprise and get rid of stereotyped methods in crop farming and animal husbandry.

The CP Central Committees in the Union Republics, the regional territorial and district Party committees, the government and agricultural bodies have the difficult and important task of providing every collective or state farm with stable procurement plans for the coming six-year period with due regard to local climatic and economic conditions and to soil fertility. And this must be done without any mistakes, comrades.

Success will largely depend on the proper planning of purchases: either all farms will rapidly develop in the new conditions, or, if mistakes are made and the plans are not worked out objectively, some farms will make good progress while others will not. This is why we must at once begin careful work on stable economic, agronomical and zootechnical plans, to be conveyed to every collective or state farm.

We must agree once and for all that these plans may not be altered by anyone. A stable plan will not diminish the responsibility of Party and government bodies for increasing output of agricultural products and fulfilling state assignments. Indeed, it will increase their responsibility.

If we say that the plan has the force of law, then it has to be binding on all: it may not be amended, but neither may it remain unfulfilled!

All the regulating levers of the state should be used to ensure that the collective and state farms all over the country, while having different opportunities, enjoy approximately equal economic conditions for development. Progress on any farm will depend in decisive measure on the effort of its management and specialists, on the enthusiasm and industry of its personnel, on the fruitful work of the Party, government and agricultural bodies.

III. CONSOLIDATE THE MATERIAL AND TECHNICAL BASE OF AGRICULTURE

Comrades, during the current seven-year period the material and technical base of agriculture has somewhat improved and the number of tractors, lorries and farm machines has increased. Agriculture has been getting more electricity. Our industry, our workers, engineers and technicians have done much to supply it with modern machinery.

However, the quantity of the machinery in use on collective and state farms is still inadequate. We are still short of tractors, lorries, combines and other complex farm machines, of cultivators, harrows and seeders. This shortage slows field work and reduces yields.

It is hardly normal for autumn ploughing to last not 18 to 20 days, but up to two months, as it often does, and to be discontinued when the frosts come, whereas every peasant knows that he must finish autumn ploughing early if he wants a good crop. For lack of sufficient numbers of combines and other machines, the harvesting of cereals often takes from 30 to 40 days, which entails great losses.

To advance agriculture, we must greatly augment the material and technical supply of collective and state farms. We must manufacture much more farm machinery and improve its quality, its reliability and durability.

In expanding the output of tractors and other machines, it is essential to ensure that machine parts, units and mechanisms are standardized. We can no longer tolerate a situation in which every new machine creates a problem of spare parts, and the list of spare parts keeps on growing.

Workers, engineers, technicians and Party organizations at industrial enterprises should do everything to supply farm machinery on time and radically to improve its standards. The agricultural authorities should, in their turn, discard the practice of making numerous alterations in the orders for farm machinery they place with industry.

Efficient use and careful maintenance of the available machinery are highly important. It is essential to heighten responsibility for the proper use of farm machinery, to increase material incentives for the engineers, technicians and machine operators, and to improve the supply of spare parts and materials to collective and state farms.

First of all, repair facilities must be improved. This is a most important matter that brooks no delay. We can provide the collective and state farms with large quantities of new machinery, but we will achieve less than satisfactory results unless we provide dependable repair facilities. Present facilities enable us to carry out only 60 per cent of the necessary repairs without delay and at a reasonably high standard. Practically 13,000 farms have no workshops for so much as current repairs.

Repair facilities were gravely undermined when the machine-and-tractor stations were reorganized. More than 600 well-equipped repair works and shops were transferred to Economic Councils and other non-agricultural organizations. Many of the shops were sold to collective farms some of which cannot use them to the full while nearby farms lack repair facilities.

Some shops are poorly supplied with machine tools and power equipment. During the past four years agriculture has received only 36,000 metal-cutting machines, which is less than one machine per farm. We must remedy this abnormal situation.

The prices of farm machinery, spare parts and materials have to be reviewed, as the price of electricity supplied to agriculture, with the aim of closing the price gap between industrial and agricultural electricity consumers. Unfortunately, the budget does not allow us to carry out these measures this year. The State Planning Committee and the Ministry of Finance of the USSR must find the funds to solve this problem next year.

We must encourage the establishment of mechanized units, machine-hiring and machine-and-animal-husbandry stations, and meadow reclamation stations that will help perform various specialized operations. We can concentrate in these units and stations powerful machinery whose purchase by individual farms is unprofitable and inexpedient from the state point of view.

These units and stations could sign contracts with collective and state farms for the extraction and application of lime and peat, for land improvement, excavation work, the improvement of grassland and pastures, farming operations in high-altitude regions, and so on.

It is a decisive condition for increasing production to have sufficient numbers of highly qualified machine operators, engineers and technicians. People on collective and state farms have long considered, and rightly so, that the machine operator is the kingpin in the countryside. Indeed, crop yields, total harvest, farm incomes, and the standard of living of collective farmers and state farm workers depend primarily on the efficiency of machine operators.

We must give more attention to the training of engineers, technologists, tractor drivers, combine operators and other mechanics for agriculture. We must also see to it that they have material incentives to increase production, make better use of machinery, and keep it in good repair.

To ensure that the important problems of advancing production, and of specializing and consistently intensifying agriculture are solved, the Presidium of the CC, CPSU considers it necessary substantially to increase investments. We are now drafting a new five-year plan envisaging the investment of 71,000 million rubles in state and collective farms.

State investments will include 41,000 million rubles for the provision of production facilities and the purchase of machinery, and 21,000 million rubles out of this sum are to be spent on building and assembly work. This is a tremendous amount. In fact, it is almost as much as has been invested in agriculture in the nineteen years since the war.

There is to be a considerable increase in output of tractors, bringing annual output to 625,000 by the end of the five-year period, that is, almost doubling last year's figure. In five years agriculture is to be supplied with 1,790,000 tractors, including 780,000 ploughing tractors and 10,700 million rubles' worth of other farm machines. Output of grain combine harvesters is to grow from 84,000 to 125,000 annually.

You know of the great difficulties that our agriculture encounters because of the shortage of motor transport. Of course, we cannot in five years supply the collective and state farms with all the lorries they need. We believe, however, that in the next five-year period we can double the output of lorries and send up to 1,100,000 lorries to the countryside—as against the 394,000 supplied during the past five years.

Output of tractor trailers, machines and equipment for stock farms, loading and unloading facilities, excavating, land-reclamation and irrigation machinery is also to increase considerably.

To fulfil this vast program for more tractors, lorries, combines and other farm machines, we will have to build about 80 new plants and shops. The State Planning Committee of the USSR intends to invest more than 4,000 million rubles in their construction during the five-year period.

Approximately 200 new repair works and more than 1,000 specialized shops will be built by the Farm Machinery Board, and repair facilities now in use will be reconstructed. In addition, a large number of new shops will be built on collective and state farms and old ones reconstructed.

Huge power stations have been built in our country in recent years. Nevertheless, 12 per cent of our collective farms still have no electricity for lighting. Agriculture consumes only 4 per cent of the electricity generated in the country, and uses only half of it for production purposes.

We must take vigorous measures for the electrification of agriculture. The State Planning Committee, the State Committee for Power and Electrification, the Ministry of Agriculture, and scientists must be asked to prepare a program for the extensive electrification of agriculture with a view to solving this most important problem in the next few years.

While on the subject of measures to advance farming, it is necessary to emphasize the importance of the chemical industry. We must make it absolutely clear that the envisaged measures become far more effective as chemicals are introduced into agriculture on a large scale. The chemical industry has to improve its work, increase the rate of production and supply of high-quality mineral fertilizer, pesticides, herbicides and defoliants.

I wish to lay particular stress on the importance of developing irrigation in arid areas and of carrying out drainage works in excessively moist areas. Provision has been made to irrigate an area of more than 3 million hectares and to drain 6 million hectares in the next five-year period. This involves a vast amount of work. I wish to remind you that the irrigated area in the country has increased by only 2.4 million hectares, while three million hectares have been drained during the past 20 years.

Irrigation work is to be conducted mainly in the Central Asian Republics, in southern Ukraine, and in parts of North Caucasus and the Volga country. We must strictly forbid the construction of an irrigation system without at the same time constructing a collector-drainage network. These irrigation schemes must be real engineering installations built according to the latest standards of hydro-engineering. Unless this is done, irrigated land cannot be kept fertile for long.

The production of grapes and other fruit and the cultivation of tea, subtropical and valuable industrial crops should be further developed in the southern republics and regions of our country where the collective and state farms' perennial plantations occupy a considerable area.

I have already mentioned the serious position of agriculture in the non-black earth belt. The five-year plan should therefore give proper attention to measures to ensure that the deficiencies in agriculture in the non-black earth areas of the Russian Federation, the Baltic republics, Byelorussia and the Polesye Region of the Ukraine are eliminated as soon as possible. Highly intensive dairy-farming, pig-breeding, poultry- and grain-farming, the production of potatoes, flax, hemp, hops, and other crops will be further developed in these areas.

It is high time to deal at state level with the problem of calcinating acidic soils, and also of extracting peat to be used as fertilizer in this area. As from this year the state is assuming the cost of calcination and land-reclamation works. The economic plan should include measures to combat soil erosion and we must earmark appropriate funds and facilities for the purpose.

The Presidium of the CC, CPSU is including in the plan for this year and in that for the next five-year period, measures to give adequate priority to the problems of investment, material and technical supplies for agricultural production, rural construction and the promotion of collective and state farming.

As from 1966, the State Planning Committee of the USSR and the Councils of Ministers of the Union republics will provide the necessary material and technical facilities for capital construction on collective farms, just as they do in the case of state farms. All farms must be supplied with the necessary material facilities in time and to the full.

IV. USE SCIENCE AND LATEST METHODS TO PROMOTE AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION

Comrades, agricultural science has been assigned an important role in the measures which the Central Committee of the Party has drawn up to remedy shortcomings in agriculture and promote its growth. Science owes its great power to the unity of theory and practice. An admirable feature of Soviet science is that it serves the peoples.

In addition to producing profound theoretical works that have contributed to world science, outstanding Russian scientists have played a direct part in the decision of important practical questions. We must do everything to promote the traditions of our compatriots, our brilliant scientists.

Our country has a ramified network of research and training institutes and experimental agricultural stations at which a large contingent of scientists are working fruitfully. Among our justly respected scientists are K. Skryabin, V. Pustovoit, P. Lukyanenko, V. Kuzmin, B. Sokolov, F. Kirichenko, V. Remeslo, A. Sokolov, K. Bakhtadze, V. Milovanov and many others.

However, the achievements of our agrobiologists and their practical assistance to agricultural production could have been greater if faulty theories and dogmas, conceived without adequate scientific thinking and maintained by injunction, had been eliminated in good time.

Science does not tolerate a subjective approach and premature conclusions that have not been verified in practice. It can proceed only on objective data confirmed by precise experiment, by experience in production, by reality.

Genuine science takes nothing for granted. It cannot be the monopoly of individual scientists, let alone of administrators, whatever their authority. Unfortunately, we have lately had cases of people, who were scientifically incompetent, assuming the role of judges in arguments between scientists and so shackling their initiative and obstructing the free creative discussion of scientific problems.

The Academy of Sciences of the USSR and the Lenin All-Union Agricultural Academy are now taking steps to unite the efforts of scientists in order to ensure that science makes rapid progress and helps agricultural production.

The Soviet people are fully entitled to expect a worthy contribution to agriculture, not only by those working in agricultural and biological sciences, but from chemists, specialists in machinery, physicists, economists, physiologists, mathematicians, and scientists in other branches of knowledge.

We must do everything to enable our scientists to work fruitfully in agriculture. Science will receive the fullest encouragement and assistance by the Party and the Government. In turn, the Party and the people expect highly effective research. We believe in the capability of our scientists and want them to be more daring, to make bolder incursions into life, delve into the mysteries of living nature, to maintain close contact with the collective and state farms and equip practical workers with new discoveries and achievements.

Splendid practical workers who have vast experience have come to the fore in the course of the development of our socially-owned agriculture. Their achievements and their work provide inexhaustible opportunities for raising productivity in agriculture. We must see to it that the experience of the foremost workers is widely used in practice.

In the past we had many excellent ways and means of encouraging the best workers. These have been forgotten. I mean the awarding of orders and medals, certificates of merit and valuable gifts, and extensive displays of the achievements of the finest workers and enterprises at the USSR Agricultural Exhibition, which was a real center for the popularization of the best methods in agriculture.

The Ministry of Agriculture and the Central Committees of the Trade Unions should join forces with the government and Party bodies in the Union Republics, territories and regions to work out as soon as possible measures for a more effective propagation and assimilation of the latest experience and for the encouragement of the best workers in agriculture.

Comrades, our agriculture has a vast body of highly competent specialists. Unfortunately, the attitude to specialists has been incorrect in recent years, their knowledge and experience have often been ignored, and in a number of cases they were prevented from discharging their important duties.

Lenin taught us to be attentive, considerate and appreciative toward specialists and to value them. He used to say. "To correct in an offhand manner the work of hundreds of the best specialists, to dismiss it with trite-sounding jokes, to boast one's right 'not to endorse' — is this not disgraceful?

"One must learn to treasure science, to reject the 'Communist' conceit of dilettanti and bureaucrats, one must learn to work systematically, making use of one's own experience and one's own practice." (Coll. Works, Vol, 42, p. 344, Fifth ed. /in Russian/). Well said!

We should radically change our attitude to specialists and scientists in agriculture, should give them systematic assistance and support, should encourage their initiative, and surround them with care and attention. They should in reality be made organizers of production, proponents of agronomical and zootechnical knowledge, of all that is new and progressive.

Agronomists and livestock experts are the technologists of agricultural production, their role is as great as that of engineers in industry. The Party regards these specialists as its reliable and highly qualified assistant in the effort to advance agriculture. We trust our specialists who have been reared by the Communist Party. With active support from heads of enterprises and from Party and government organizations, agricultural specialists will draw on their potentialities to ensure the steady growth of crop yields and of livestock productivity.

V. CERTAIN QUESTIONS CONCERNING THE ORGANIZATIONAL AND ECONOMIC STRENGTHENING OF THE COLLECTIVE AND STATE FARM

Comrades, the development of proper socio-economic relations in the countryside is an important condition for the growth of the productive forces of agriculture. Two historically-conditioned types of socialized farming have developed in our country — collective farms and state farms, each type being based on the corresponding form of socialist ownership — public ownership and collective-farm, cooperative ownership.

Experience has shown that the right combination of these two types of farming enabled us to reorganize agriculture on socialist lines. Both will presumably continue to coexist and progress for a long time. What we must do at this stage is not to rush the transformation of one type into the other, but to do everything to enable both types to develop and flourish.

The economic measures planned by the CC, CPSU create conditions for the successful development and consolidation of both the collective and state farms. However, to make fuller use of the new potentialities for the rapid advancement of agricultural production, we must remove a number of serious shortcomings in the leadership of state farms and particularly of collective farms.

In this sphere, a great many arbitrary and — to be frank — ill-considered decisions were imposed some of which were at variance with the essence of collective farming and with real conditions. The past few years have seen mergers of farms in many parts of the country. Some collective farms have become so big as to become unmanageable. In setting up state farms on the basis of collective farms, the economic aspect of the matter was sometimes ignored, with the result that many of the new state farms proved cumbersome and hard to manage. At present some of them operate at a loss.

All this shows that the cardinal problems of socio-economic relations in the countryside must not be decided in an off-hand manner or by injunction. These problems affect the vital interests of millions of Soviet people, which means that they are policy matters and so should be settled carefully, without undue haste, and not until the economic situation favors it. On the other hand, it would be just as unwise to rush now into splitting up the merged farms.

We must not ignore the fact that the democratic principles of collective farming are grossly violated in many cases. On some collective farms most of the members hardly take any part in discussing and settling cardinal problems of farming. Furthermore, some collective farms have lately disregarded the provisions of the Rules of the Agricultural Artel (Cooperative) whereas the Rules are the backbone of the management and functioning of the cooperative.

The collective farm is a cooperative organization which cannot function and progress normally if its democratic principles are flouted. Hence these principles must be strictly observed on every collective farm.

We must admit that many provisions of the existing Rules of the Agriculture Artel have become outmoded. There is a need for improvements in the Rules. The time has come to draft new Rules taking account of the positive experience of collective farming in recent years. It is also necessary to begin preparations for the Third All-Union Congress of Collective Farmers, which should convene not later than next year. The Congress should be preceded by district, regional, territorial, and republican congresses.

There are many other questions concerning the organizational and economic strengthening of collective and state farms. Everyone knows that well-organized work and strict accounting are indispensable for the proper management of a farm. Profitability should underlie any objective appraisal of the operation of collective and state farms. Unfortunately, the self-supporting principle is not very popular on our farms today.

Take, for example, the state farms. The state allocates funds, establishes plans for the delivery of produce, and fixes prices. It also determines the amount of the pay fund, and even the number of personnel and the categories of workers, including managerial workers and service personnel. The losses incurred by state farms are met by the state. The self-supporting principle is upset by the actual economic relations between the state, on the one hand, and the state and collective farms, on the other.

We should no longer be excessively rigid in distributing investments and subsidies for state farms. The state farms should all become completely self-supporting in the next few years. The profit they make should be left at their disposal, so that they can expand, increase capital construction, encourage good workers, and improve the cultural and living standards of their staffs.

To enable the state farms to use the profit made through efficient work for expanded production, the planning bodies should provide for appropriate manpower, building funds, materials, mechanisms and equipment to be made available to the farms.

The Ministry of Agriculture should in collaboration with Union Republic and other authorities, as well as with economists, prepare specific proposals for putting the state farms on a completely self-supporting basis.

Financing the collective farms and granting them credits are matters of great importance. We have to sort out things and put them right also in this important field. The Ministries of Agriculture and Finance and the State Bank should prepare proposals to improve the system of financing the collective farms and extending credits to them, and submit their proposals to the CC CPSU.

Many collective farms are heavily indebted to the state and this hinders their work. In order to ease the situation, primarily for the economically weak collective farms, and to enable the farms to function normally, the Presidium of the CC, CPSU considers it possible to write off their debts.

The existing procedure of taxing collective farm incomes needs to be revised. At present the taxable income of the collective farm includes part of the production costs, namely, expenditure on the remuneration of the farm members, and also the value of the unfinished product. This is wrong. A draft has been prepared amending the decree on income tax levied on collective farms and introducing a new procedure, under which taxes shall be levied on the net and not the gross income of the collective farm.

We must take appropriate steps for the further consolidation and protection of the common socialist property of the collective and state farms. To begin with, we must ensure proper use of the land, put an end to a wasteful and rapacious attitude to the land.

Today we have to be thriftier than ever before. We must be economical in everything. It is not a question of a passing campaign, but a constantly thrifty attitude to everything: machinery, fuel, the operation of motor transport; here must be no loss or waste of materials, products or money. This concerns everyone from the collective farmer and the worker to the manager. A resolute effort must be made to tighten labor and state discipline on the collective and state farms.

Material and moral incentives for the workers in agriculture are an important condition for the growth of production. There are many unsolved problems here. The system of remuneration on the collective and state farms is far from perfect.

The Ministry of Agriculture of the USSR should in conjunction with agricultural bodies in the Union Republics, with scientists, specialists, and leading collective farmers, review the experience gained and submit proposals to improve remuneration on the collective farm. They should also consider the question of setting up monetary funds and stocks of products to guarantee payment for the work of the collective farmers.

It is also necessary to study the questions of material inducements for collective farmers and state farm workers who are directly engaged in land cultivation and animal husbandry and who achieve the best results.

The system of remuneration of the managerial workers and specialists of state farms and trusts, which was introduced in the past, has not justified itself. We should discard it and pay state farm managers and specialists regular salaries according to the amount of work they do, their qualifications and length of service. They should receive their salaries every month and in full.

Now for another point. Letters coming in from the countryside suggest the introduction there of the same prices for consumer goods as have been fixed for the town. The Presidium of the CC, CPSU thinks this feasible as from May 1965 for most of the goods and as from January 1, 1966, for certain kinds of goods. Former members of the collective farms whose land has been turned over to state farms and other state-owned enterprises and organizations are asking that the law on pensions for collective farmers be extended to them as well. This question is also being settled in their favor.

The economic measures for the development of agriculture submitted to this Meeting will undoubtedly enable us to strengthen the collective and state farms organizationally and economically, to increase material incentives for those working in the countryside and raise the output of farm produce.

VI. RAISE THE STANDARD OF PARTY WORK IN THE COUNTRYSIDE

Comrades, in view of the great tasks in our country's economic and cultural development, the leading role of the Communist Party in the life of society is growing immensely. Communism is being built by the mighty creative effort of the people. This places on the Party the special responsibility of steadily improving organization, political, economic and ideological work.

The situation places great demands on the Party cadre. The cultural standard of our people has improved and their political outlook has broadened. Our Party and government cadres must steadfastly develop a Leninist ability to lead the masses in order to measure up to their role of leader in Communist construction.

More efficient organizing work by the Party is absolutely indispensable for the implementation of the proposed measures for teh further development of agriculture. Experience has shown that the higher the level of organizational leadership, the greater the economic achievements.

We must admit that some Party organizations still exercise little influence over the economic activities of collective and state farms. They overlook serious shortcomings and the standard of their work among the people is low. The work of some Party organizations still lacks militancy and purposefulness.

The Central Committee of the Communist parties of the Union Republics, the territorial and regional Party committees, and each one of us need to adjust our methods of work so as to discard all that is superfluous and harmful in Party work. We must stop giving peremptory orders and bureaucratic instructions, and stop exercising petty tutelage and usurping the functions of the managers and experts of collective and state farms. We must do away with all conceit and put an end to all ostentation and fuss.

The task is to rally the people to carry out the measures planned by the CC, CPSU, to ensure the consistent realization of these measures. This depends, first of all, on the effort, energy and perseverance of Party organizations, and on the ability of their leaders to organize the masses.

A special effort should be made to increase the role of the primary Party organizations on collective and state farms. They are in the frontline, directly carrying out the policy and directions of the Party. At present there are 50,000 primary Party organizations in the countryside, with a membership of more than two million. That is a great force, comrades, a force capable of efficiently accomplishing the tasks set by the Party.

The sercretaries of the primary Party organizations of collective and state farms should be given substantial help and support, all the more so because many of them have been elected to their post for the first time or are overburdened with work in their special field. Perhaps we ought to increase somewhat the number of full-time Party secretaries on the collective and state farms.

Comrades, we have just restored the district Party unit. Many fine new people have assumed leadership of the district organizations. Our duty is to help the district Party committees to get to work quickly and vigorously.

The CC CPSU places great hopes on the district Party committees, which must carry out important assignments for the organizational and economic strengthening of the collective and state farms. They must coordinate and guide the work of the local government bodies, the trade unions and Komsomol organizations in the countryside, and guarantee the implementation of the measures for agricultural development planned by the Party's Central Committee.

Constant attention to the advancement of the collective and state farms and to increased agricultural production should be the determining aspect of the work of Party bodies. The task is to see to it that the ranks of efficient workers grow, and to help people to acquire greater skill in agricultural production. We must have more and more highly skilled farmers, stock-breeders and farm machine operators in every village.

The Party organizations must daily concern themselves with the satisfaction of the cultural and other needs of the workers in agriculture, so that their housing conditions improve from year to year, and that the villages are provided with good clubs, libraries, schools and shops. We all know that production plays the decisive role in the development of any social system. But it would be wrong to forget about the cultural problems of the countryside. To provide proper cultural and living conditions means, among other things, promoting collective and state-farm production.

Our work will be crowned with success if we use such powerful forces as the local government bodies, the trade unions and the Komsomol. Whenever taking an important step on the road to communism, our Party has invariably done everything to heighten the activity of these political organizations of the working people. The CC CPSU hopes that these organizations will find a fitting place for themselves in the people's effort to advance agriculture.

Much better use should be made of such a powerful factor for organizing the masses as the press. Hundreds of national, republican, territorial and regional newspapers are published in our country. Recently the Central Committee decided to resume the publication of district newspapers.

Our press should have a thorough knowledge of problems of agricultural development. It should promptly publicize new developments, raise major questions of collective and state-farm production, and hold up the best examples for the masses to emulate.

Numerous propagandists are active in the countryside. At meetings and in personal talks with collective farmers and state farm workers, they explain our Party's policies and the meaning of important events taking place in our country and elsewhere, and rally the people for efficient and fruitful work. It will be their task to popularize the decisions of the Meeting.

Party organizations must help propagandists in every way in their important work. The secretaries of Party committees should get together with them more often, should analyze their experience and help them improve their work. We must help them to rally the people for great achievements, to imbue them with a revolutionary spirit.

In the face of the great and difficult tasks in agriculture, we must stress once again that ideological staunchness and unshakable confidence in the correctness of the Party's policy is the force which helps all of us to overcome every difficulty and effectively to solve practical problems.

The experience of the Communist Party shows that the higher the ideological standard and thoretical training of Party, government and economic executives, the more competently they lead the masses and the more fruitful their work. Our cadre must continue to master Marxism-Leninism. They must make a deep study of the law of socialist economy, and improve the forms and methods of their political work among the masses.

The measures for the development of agriculture worked out by the Presidium of the CC, CPSU create favorable conditions for Party work in the countryside. The task now is to put all the tremendous material and organizational forces into action, and to use them to the full to enhance the enthusiasm and encourage the initiative of the masses in their work, and to secure high labor productivity, which, in the final analysis, is the most important factor in the further development of agriculture. "To build up a new labor discipline," Lenin said, "to build up new forms of social relations between people, to build up forms and methods of drawing people into the labor effort is . . . the most gratifying and the noblest of tasks." (Coll. Works, Fifth Russ. ed., Vol. 40, No. 316)

Comrades, the measures for the development of agriculture that have been submitted to you, and the large state investments they entail are a vital necessity and are aimed at meeting an urgent need of the whole people. We are certain that they will help us put the collective and state farms on a sound material basis and create objective conditions for the steady and planned advancement of agriculture.

The main task now is to put an end, once and for all, to a subjective approach to the management of socialist agriculture and to make wide use of economic and moral stimuli in every sphere of collective and state farm production. The farms must have more economic autonomy; the Party, government and agricultural bodies, and farm managers and experts must play a greater role and bear greater responsibility for the state of affairs in agriculture.

All our measures and all our efforts should center on the solution of the main problem of agriculture, which is to raise the standard of farming, to secure high yields, to increase the productivity of livestock, to guarantee the profitable operation of all branches of agricultural production.

The measures proposed by the Presidium are inspired by the desire to steadily improve the material and cultural standards of all Soviet people and strengthen the alliance of the workers and peasants.

We must bring home to the Party membership and to all our people the significance of the proposed measures, and of the vast expenditure the state is going to make. On the other hand, our cadre should understand very clearly that this is only the beginning of the important work we have to do. We must heighten our cadre's sense of responsibility, strengthen Party and state discipline all along the line, and be most exacting toward everyone—leaders and the rank and file alike.

We must all be demanding of ourselves and conscious of our responsibility for the implementation of our plans in agriculture.

I wish to express the confidence that our Leninist Party, in close unity with the entire Soviet people, will do everything necessary for the steady progress of socialist agriculture.

Comrades, this Meeting is taking place at a significant time. The Soviet people have accomplished a feat unprecedented in history.

A Soviet man, a member of the great Party of Communists, was first in the world to step out into space. It is a great victory for our socialist country, our heroic people, our Communist Party. On behalf of this Meeting, allow me to congratulate Pavel Ivanovich Belayev and Alexei Arkhipovich Leonov, and the Soviet scientists, engineers, designers and workers, on their brilliant victory.

In these stirring days our people have won another important victory. The elections to local Soviets recently held in all our fraternal Republics demonstrated once again the unbreakable union of Communists and non-Party people.

All this inspires our Party and all Soviet people to new feats of labor for the glory of the country, for the triumph of communism.

SUPREME INTERNATIONALIST DUTY OF A MARXIST-LENINIST PARTY*

A Communique on the Consultative Meeting of representatives of Communist and Workers' parties in Moscow has been made public. The participants in the Meeting held consultations on questions of common interest and exchanged opinions on ways and means of overcoming the differences and strengthening the unity of the world Communist movement.

As the Communique stresses, the meeting proceeded in an atmosphere of fraternity and friendship and was imbued with the spirit of active struggle for cementing the cohesion of the international Communist ranks on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism and the line defined by the Moscow conferences of 1957 and 1960, whose documents, the Declaration and the Statement, contain a profound analysis and characterization of our time, and a correct, realistic appraisal of the correlation of world forces.

Events since the two Moscow conferences have fully confirmed the conclusions and appraisals of these documents. As is stated in the Communique, consolidation of the positions of socialism, upsurge of the national-liberation and the international working-class movements, and growth of the forces fighting for the maintenance of peace have constituted the basic trend in world development. Rapid progress has attended the economic and cultural advance of the socialist states, growth of people's initiative, and perfection of socialist democracy. The appeal of socialism has increased still more. The anti-imperialist, anti-colonial struggle of the peoples has gained in scope and intensity. The working people in the capitalist countries have been fighting ever more resolutely against exploitation, against the imperialists' reckless schemes, for the vital interests of the masses, for democracy and social progress, for peace and international mutual understanding.

Our Party sees it as its important duty to defend the fundamental propositions and uphold the general line of the world Communist movement collectively worked out in the Declaration and the Statement and unanimously adopted by the fraternal parties.

Current events show that international reaction and above all U.S. imperialism are resorting to ever more brazen actions against the socialist countries and the newly-free countries, against the revolutionary movement of the masses. The developments in Vietnam and the Congo, the constant provocations against the Republic of Cuba and the imperialists' aggressive actions in other parts of the world aggravate the international situation and gravely endanger world peace and the security of the peoples. This demands that all the Communist parties and socialist countries should fight shoulder to shoulder in the common battle against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism, against the rule of monopoly capital, for rendering active support to the liberation movement, in defense and for the strengthening of world peace.

Our Party and the Bulgarian people are working actively for the triumph of the policy of peace and peaceful coexistence. The correctness of this policy has been borne out by world developments, by history. Pursued in the interests of the peoples, it has promoted the growth of the anti-imperialist, class and national-liberation struggle and the rallying of the peace-loving and democratic forces.

The Statement on the events in Vietnam, adopted by the Moscow Consultative Meeting, expresses the internationalist solidarity of the fraternal parties with the people of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, with the Party of Working People of Vietnam and the South-Vietnamese patriots who are waging a courageous struggle against the imperialists' brazen aggression. The participants in the Meeting called upon the Communist and Workers' parties and all the progressive and democratic forces of the world to act concertedly in defense of the freedom and national independence of the Vietnamese people.

The Bulgarian Communist Party and all our people unreservedly support the peoples fighting for freedom and national independence, the peoples still suffering from imperialist and colonialist oppression. They have proved this on many occasions.

Unity of all the revolutionary forces of our time is indispensable for success in the fight against imperialism. These forces are the socialist community, the national-liberation movement, and the international working class. Their unity is unthinkable without the unity of the world Communist movement. The decisive importance of the unity and solidarity of the fraternal parties was stressed in the 1960 Statement: "It is the supreme internationalist duty of every Marxist-Leninist party to work continuously for greater unity in the world Communist movement."

The Bulgarian Communist Party has always regarded it as its chief task to work for stronger ideological and political unity in the world Communist movement, for the close cohesion of the countries of the socialist community. It has always considered development and consolidation of relations of friendship and cooperation with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, with the Soviet people and the peoples of the other fraternal countries to be the most reliable guarantee of our national independence and successful socialist construction.

The disagreements in the Communist movement weaken its unity and do damage to the cause of the world emancipatory movement, the cause of communism. The participants in the Moscow Consultative Meeting pointed to ways of surmounting these disagreements. They expressed their conviction that what unites the Communist parties far outweighs that which disunites them. The Communique stresses that it is quite possible and necessary that the fraternal parties should work for unity of action in the struggle against imperialism, in the matter of all-round support for the national-liberation movement of the peoples, in the struggle for world peace and peaceful coexistence, in the defense of the vital interests of the working class.

All opportunities and means should be used to this end—bilateral and multilateral meetings and other forms of party contacts and exchanges of opinion. The Communique stresses that international conferences of the Communist and Workers' parties are an effective means of exchanging views and experience, enriching Marxism-Leninism and working out common positions in the struggle for common aims.

The Consultative Meeting in Moscow and the Communique adopted by it are fresh proof of the desire of Marxist-Leninist parties to search for and find ways of overcoming the disagreements in the world Communist movement, of cementing its unity and solidarity on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, the Declaration and the Statement. There is no doube that this desire will meet with favorable response among those who cherish this unity and solidarity.

Our Party, the Party of Dimitri Blagoyev and Georgi Dimitrov, also took part in the Moscow Meeting; it supports the conclusions and estimates contained in the Communique. Its long and glorious history is one of boundless devotion to our great Communist teaching, uncompromising struggle for its ideological purity. In the work and struggle for world Communist unity our Party sees a guarantee of the victory of socialism and communism, of the success of the struggle against imperialism and war, of the triumph of peace, national independence, democracy and social progress.

RESOLUTION* OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF FINLAND

Having heard, at a meeting held on March 20 and 21, the report of its delegation to the Consultative Meeting of representatives of Communist and Workers' parties, the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Finland stated that the Meeting had served a useful purpose. The CC, CPF resolution points out that the Meeting took into consideration the opinion of the CPF regarding the differences in the world Communist movement and measures to overcome them.

The great importance of the Moscow Meeting lies in the fact that its participants took an initiative aimed at restoring world Communist unity on the Marxist-Leninist principles set forth in the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement. The Communique of the Meeting notes that although there are differences over the political line, theory and tactics, it is perfectly possible and necessary to work for united action in combating imperialism, in supporting the peoples' liberation movement, in fighting for peace, for the vital interests and historical goals of the working class. The Consultative Meeting approved of world meetings of Communist and Workers' parties as one of the forms of solving common problems. Bilateral and multilateral meetings of fraternal parties, while important, cannot work out a common line for the entire world Communist movement. Hence the need for world conferences of all the parties. The new world conference should be carefully prepared. Conditions should be created for all the fraternal parties to take part in preparing it in order to improve the climate in the world Communist movement.

The CC, CPF approves of the proposal of the Meeting for the discontinuance of unfriendly and abusive polemics and for their replacement by a serious and comradely exchange of opinions on questions of common interest to the fraternal parties. Interference in the internal affairs of any parties should be avoided. Each party solves its problems in the interest of its people. The autonomy of each party and the solidarity of all the parties are principles supplementing each other.

The CC, CPF considers that the CPF delegation represented its Party at the Moscow Consultative Meeting in strict accordance with these principles and thus contributed to the success of the Meeting. The CC recommends the Political Bureau to follow developments in the world Communist movement, maintain contacts with the fraternal parties, take part in regional conferences of Communist parties, especially those of the Nordic countries, and help convene a world meeting of all the parties.

The CC, CPF is confident that the struggle for world Communist unity will contribute to the victory of the peace forces over those of war.

SIGNIFICANCE OF MOSCOW CONSULTATIVE MEETING OF COMMUNIST AND WORKERS' PARTIES*

The recent Consultative Meeting of representatives of Communist and Workers' parties and the Communique unanimously adopted by them constitute a major step forward and an important contribution to the struggle of the Communists for the unity and solidarity of their great international movement. The documents of the Meeting are eloquent proof of the atmosphere of friendship and fraternity in which it worked. They also demonstrate the usefulness of the discussion in which representatives of 19 parties took part, displaying a high sense of responsibility. The fruitful results of the Meeting are evident, as is shown by the approval voiced in statements and comments by many Communist and Workers' parties of the socialist and capitalist countries, as well as by the progressive press.

The representatives of Communist and Workers' parties unanimously adopted decisions of vast importance for the world Communist movement at the present stage, for further progress in the international situation and the entire world revolutionary movement. The successful outcome of the Meeting is due to their loyalty to the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, to the program jointly worked out at the international conferences of 1957 and 1960, to the common interests of the world Communist movement, loyalty to the main goals and tasks of the revolutionary movement of the peoples.

The Meeting participants did not limit themselves to voicing the firm determination of their parties to exert every effort for closing the ranks of the Communist movement. They backed up this determination with a careful examination of concrete ways and means of overcoming the differences and difficulties. They expressed firm conviction in the importance of a new international conference of representatives of the Communist and Workers' parties and decided to launch preparations for it in all fields—ideological, political and organizational, having in mind the participation in it of all the fraternal parties. They adopted the proposal to convene a general consultative conference of representatives of the parties that took part in the Moscow Meeting of 1960.

Displaying a new approach to the vital tasks of our movement, the representatives of many Communist and Workers' parties headed by the tried and tested Party of the Soviet Union displayed a correct and profound understanding of the qualitative changes that characterize the situation confronting the world Communist movement today.

Since the international conference of the Communist and Workers' parties in 1960 the situation in the world has changed in favor of the forces of peace, socialism and national liberation. The working-class and liberation movements continue their onward march, gaining new experience as they are confronted with new problems requiring creative solution. It is important to correctly appraise this and draw lessons from the experience thus gained, and from the situation that has developed in the world Communist movement. The appraisal should be made by common effort, with the active participation of all parties, with observance of democratic principles and respect for the equality of the parties. Top-level international Communist forums are the best way of ensuring the realization of the tasks of the movement and concentrating attention on principles really uniting the different national contingents of Communists.

Overcoming the difficulties will take some time, of course. One should not expect that the possible international conference will work a miracle and remove all the difficulties at one go. What is important today is to conduct active joint preparations for it. It is also necessary to end the open polemics, which sometimes takes an unfriendly and abusive form. It is necessary, however, to continue fruitful discussions and creative exchange of opinions and experience regarding important aspects of the present situation and theory and tactics. These discussions should be sincere and friendly. and the desire shown to find practical solutions which would cement the unity of the Communist movement, not divide it and deepen the split. Marxist-Leninists the world over cannot but support the stand of the Consultative Meeting on the issue of solidarity of the international army of Communists.

The creative character of the decisions of the March Meeting was the result of the careful study by its participants of all the important problems bearing on the Communist movement, and the destinies of all mankind, the result of their close cooperation and mutual confidence.

Consolidation of the positions of socialism, the upsurge of the national-liberation and working-class movements and the growth of the forces advocating the preservation and consolidation of peace is the main trend of world development today. At the same time it should be noted that world reaction and above all U.S. imperialism are growing increasingly active in different parts of the world, trying to aggravate the international situation. They are committings acts of aggression against socialist states and countries that have cast off the colonial yoke, against the revolutionary movement of the peoples.

The imperialists are out to take advantage of the differences between states of the socialist community and in the world Communist movement, the disagreements and disputes which weaken Communist unity and so do damage to the cause of the world liberation movement and communism.

Hence the need for Communists to focus attention on the principles and aims which unite them and which far outweigh that which disunites them at present. Despite the differences over the political line and many important problems of theory and tactics, there is every ground to believe that Communists will be able to close the rift in their struggle for common aims. The importance of the unity of the world Communist movement stems from the need to fight against imperialism and its aggressive actions, for peace, national liberation and socialism.

In order to achieve the unity and cohesion of our movement and remove the existing disagreements, it is necessary to wage a joint struggle against the common enemy, imperialism, support in every way the liberation movement of the peoples, and uphold peace, peaceful coexistence and the vital interests and historical goals of the working class.

Centering of the Communists' attention on what unites them, on the organization of united actions aimed at strengthening their solidarity and unity in the fight against the common enemy will enable them to consolidate their ranks. But this unity cannot be achieved by imposing the will of one party on all the other parties or by demanding that this or that party abandon its political line. The most important thing today is to continue tireless, persistent and patient efforts to remove the existing obstacles, to work for closer unity on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.

The Lebanese Communists view the March Consultative Meeting in the context of the above-mentioned aspects of the struggle for unity. They hail the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the initiator of this Meeting, which is working selflessly to strengthen the unity of Communists. The Lebanese Communists highly appreciate the exchange of opinions that has taken place, the documents adopted at the Meeting, and the prospects it has opened up. They consider the decisions of the Meeting to be fresh proof of the creative power of communism, an important stage in the struggle for the unity of the Communist movement and of all the anti-imperialist and anti-militarist forces fighting for liberation, peace, progress and socialism.

JOIN EFFORTS TO STRENGTHEN COMMUNIST UNITY*

The membership of the Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party and the working people of Mongolia are deeply satisfied by the outcome of the Consultative Meeting of Communist and Workers' parties, held in Moscow from March 1-5 last. They see the Communique unanimously adopted by the Meeting as a highly important document showing the right way to the consolidation of all the revolutionary forces of our time against the common enemy, and to closer unity of the world Communist movement, on Marxist-Leninist principles.

The documents of the Meeting show that the participants were well aware of their internationalist duty and the responsibility of each Marxist-Leninist party for the world revolutionary movement.

It is characteristic of the world situation today that against the background of a considerable strengthening of the positions of socialism and the steady growth of the forces fighting for peace, democracy and national liberation world imperialism is stepping up its offensive against the working-class and national-liberation movements of the peoples of various countries, launching acts of aggression against the socialist countries and countries that have shaken off colonial rule. The Communique stresses that this situation makes it more imperative than ever for the Marxist-Leninist parties and all democratic and peace-loving forces to join efforts and strengthen their solidarity in the fight against imperialist aggression, for national independence, peace and the security of peoples.

The Statement on the events in Vietnam, approved by the participants in the Consultative Meeting, is a vivid indication of their internationalist solidarity in the anti-imperialist struggle. The working people of the MPR, who resolutely condemn the U.S. imperialists' armed intervention in the internal affairs of Vietnam and their acts of aggression against the DRV, wholeheartedly approve of this document, which expresses fraternal solidarity with the heroic Vietnamese people, the Party of Working People of Vietnam and the National-Liberation Front of South Vietnam in their legitimate fight against the U.S. militarists and their hangers-on.

The fact that the Moscow Meeting took a new important step to overcome the differences that have arisen in the world Communist movement, to cement the movement on the basis of Marxism- Lenin-ism and proletarian internationalism, of the line set by the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement, was an outstanding result of the Meeting. This step and the principled approach to the issue of closing the ranks of the Communist movement fully accord with the position of the MPRP on questions relating to the promotion of the unity and solidarity of the Communist parties and socialist countries, a position which found expression in the decisions of the 14th Congress and subsequent meetings of the Central Committee of our Party.

The participants in the Meeting, expressing the firm resolve of their parties to surmount the differences, which are doing great harm to our common cause, made a collective effort to find ways of strengthening the unity of the Communist movement.

The Communique stresses the possibility and necessity, in present conditions, of joint agreed actions by all the fraternal parties in fighting the common enemy, imperialism, giving maximum support to the liberation movement of the peoples, and fighting for world peace and the peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems. It regards these actions as the surest way to overcome differences and as a realistic basis for the consolidation of the world Communist movement. The unanimity of the Meeting on this point expresses the aspirations of all who place the interests of the world Communist movement, of peace and communism, above everything else.

The Communique devotes a great deal of attention to the necessity of all the Communist and Workers' parties making collective efforts to improve relations between parties, using all opportunities—bilateral and multilateral meetings and other forms of contact and exchange of opinions.

The recent meeting of the Communist parties of twenty-two Latin American countries, the meeting of the Political Consultative Committee of the Warsaw Treaty countries, the DRV and KPDR visits of the Soviet delegation led by Comrade A. Kosygin, the visit paid to our country by the CPSU delegation led by Comrade A. Shelepin, other reciprocal visits by leaders of the socialist countries, and Communist meetings were an important contribution to internationalist solidarity and closer links between fraternal parties and countries, to their Marxist-Leninist unity and cohesion.

Our Party, like the other Marxist-Leninist parties, thinks it necessary to continue meetings and active contacts between fraternal parties in the interest of more militant solidarity and unity of all the forces standing for peace, democracy, national independence, socialism and communism.

The Communique reaffirms the proposition of the 1960 Statement to the effect that nowadays world meetings of the Communist and Workers' parties are an effective form of exchanging views and experience, enriching Marxist-Leninist theory by collective effort and working out common positions in the fight for common objectives.

The MPRP has always favored the idea of convening a new meeting of the Communist and Workers' parties, which should help to overcome the difficulties existing in the Communist movement and to work out common internationalist positions of the Communists of the world on the basis of a collective Marxist-Leninist estimation of the important events and changes that have taken place in the world since the latest world meeting.

In view of the actual situation, the parties attending the Consultative Meeting took a new and concrete approach to the question of preparations for a world meeting of the Communist and Workers' parties. They declared for preparing the new meeting vigorously and thoroughly, on collective and democratic lines, with all the fraternal parties cooperating.

The valuable initiative of the Meeting, aimed at holding a preliminary consultative meeting of the eighty-one participants in the 1960 Meeting to discuss the question of a new world meeting, benefits all the Communist parties and is a contribution to their unity.

Our Party, like other fraternal parties, attaches great importance to joint efforts to create in the world Communist movement an atmosphere favorable to preparations for and the holding of a new meeting. Many fraternal parties have stopped open polemics and have been doing everything to promote the solidarity of the Communist movement.

The situation in the Communist movement will not be normalized until open polemics, which are unfriendly and insulting, are discontinued and until factional activity in any form is ended.

Our Party, which strictly adheres to the standards of inter-party relations established by the Moscow Meeting of 1957 and 1960, has always been opposed to some parties interfering in the internal affairs of other parties, and to the imposition of the will of some parties upon others.

The existence of differences over the political line and tactics should not lead to a slackening of fraternal links and cooperattion between socialist countries or Communist parties.

It is the supreme duty of every Marxist-Leninist party to abide by the principles of proletarian internationalism and to do all in their power to overcome the difficulties existing in the Communist movement.

The representatives of the Communist and Workers' parties who took part in the Moscow Meeting were guided in their discussion of matters of vital importance by the desire to contribute to the unity and solidarity of the world Communist movement. Their collective initiative and joint efforts in searching for new ways of furthering unity of action in the struggle for common goals will undoubtedly be appreciated and approved by every contingent of the great Communist movement.

The Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party will, with a profound awareness of its internationalist duty and great responsibility, continue its effort for an active contribution to preparations for a new meeting of the Communist and Workers' parties, to the provision of a favorable atmosphere in the world Communist movement, and hence to greater unity and solidarity of the movement on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.

JOINT COMMUNIQUE* OF THE COMMUNIST PARTIES OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA AND BELGIUM

Talks with E. Burnelle, Chairman of the Communist Party of Belgium, and B. Gordover, member of the CC, CPB, were held in the Central Committee of the Communist Party Czechoslovakia on March 10 and 11.

The Belgian comrades were received by A. Novotny, First Secretary of the CC, CPC. The talks were also attended by V. Koucky, Secretary of the CC, CPC, and O. Kaderka, head of the Foreign Department of the CC, CPC.

The representatives of the CPC and CPB exchanged information on the policies and activities of the two fraternal parties, carried on in keeping with the agreed line of the world Communist movement as laid down in the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement. They expressed firm determination to promote the unity of the world Communist movement against imperialism and colonialism, for peace and peaceful coexistence, for democracy and socialism.

The Belgian comrades gave a positive appraisal of the results of the March Consultative Meeting of representatives of Communist and Workers' parties, and approved of the Communique unanimously adopted by the Meeting.

The talks, which took place in a comradely atmosphere, reaffirmed the two parties' community of views on all major problems of our time. The representatives of the two fraternal parties also declared in favor of closer cooperation between the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia and the Communist Party of Belgium.

THE OUTLOOK

THESES* FOR THE 19th CONGRESS OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF AUSTRIA

I

The four years since the 18th Congress of our Party have been years of contradictory development.

Many of our proposals were carried into practice. The ideas put forward by us gained in impact. The class point of view we have been upholding—to the effect that a maximum of benefits for the working people should be sought in any situation—spread among the greater part of the working class and led to appreciable results in the sphere of wages and social policies. The parity commission on which many workers once pinned big hopes lost much of its prestige, nor did the establishment of a new Council bring greater respect for it. The struggle over the nationalized enterprises resulted in beating off the attacks of foreign capital and Austrian reaction, and prevented the transfer of Siemens Werke to the German monopolies.

Broad anti-fascist, patriotic actions were carried out in countering neo-fascist and anti-Austrian sorties. They were joint actions by Communists, Socialists and Catholics. Our fight against the return of the Hapsburgs forced the Socialist leadership to revise its attitude to the idea of their return. The relations between Austria and her socialist neighbors improved considerably, and trade with Eastern countries has been playing an increasing part, primarily as regards the nationalized enterprises.

There can be no doubt that these changes and improvements are due in substantial measure to our proposals and ideas, and to our fight. On the other hand, our attempt to win seats in Parliament miscarried, and the number of our members and our activists decreased. This contradictory development is the chief problem facing our Party. Apart from the difficulties stemming from the political situation, it was caused by shortcomings and mistakes in Party work.

II

Some of the favorable changes are due to the fact that the traditional tactic of vilifying Communists and rejecting every constructive proposal or initiative emanating from them is less effective now that international tension has eased somewhat. We, for our part, promoted this development by maintaining the principle of peaceful coexistence, according to which no international dispute can justify an atomic war. We have always felt that it is wrong to argue about which is more important—the fight for peace or the fight for socialism. The fight for peace gathers momentum in step with the fight for the establishment of a society in which there will be no class making profit from war. By the same token, the fight for this society is worth while only when it is linked with the fight to preserve the lives of people, who should enjoy the benefits of the new system. This applies especially to world political crises resulting from imperialist acts of aggression, such as those against Cuba, Vietnam and the Congo.

Our views are inspired by general propositions regarding the class struggle, by the principles of humanity, and by the special interests of our people and our working class, who would be wiped out by an atomic war. We found a larger audience whenever we pointed out that upholding neutrality, the policy of active neutrality, is the important contribution which the peace forces of Austria must make to world peace. However, we were unable to bring it home to the masses that the West German monopolies are exerting increasing pressure on Austria and that the danger threatening our country as a result of the resurgence of German militarism is growing. Outside our Party, those who are warning against the threat to our country's neutrality and independence on the part of German imperialism are very few, even in those groups which, like ourselves, are against Austria joining the EEC. This constitutes not only the principal weakness of the peace forces of Austria but, evidently, the principal weakness of our own struggle for peace. Joining the EEC in any form would be a heavy blow to our sovereignty. It would imperil the nationalized enterprises and our democratic gains.

III

The changed balance of world forces—the expansion of the socialist community, powerful popular revolutions in the colonies and semi-colonies, the uptrend of the working-class movement and the growth of the peace forces in the capitalist countries—has made it possible to aim at averting a world war and at establishing a lasting world peace. It has also confronted the working-class movement in the capitalist countries with new problems in the struggle for a socialist revolution. In combating and competing with the socialist world, the developed capitalist countries were compelled to adopt methods and tactics which make it impossible for the working class to fight capitalism by using the notions and views that were valid between the two world wars.

In the developed capitalist countries, the role of the state and of the regulation measures it employs, primarily in the interest of big capital, has increased immensely. Alarmed by the concrete example of socialism, these countries are constrained to pursue the policy of achieving a high level of business activity and industrial growth in order to provide the highest possible level of employment. The working-class movement has ample opportunities of securing concessions on wages and social policies, as well as on the issue of providing full employment. The exploiter classes can no longer exert direct pressure on wages. They seek greater profit by boosting prices, by means of inflation as an invariable concomitant of a favorable economic situation, and by subtler methods of intensifying labor. On the other hand, the considerable growth of production and higher productivity of labor, and far-reaching technical achievements enable the workers to buy consumer goods they could not afford before—true, at the price of overtime work, falling heavily into debt and working at high pressure.

Such is the contradictory and misleading picture of the "welfare state": full employment along with the fear of losing one's job; an economic situation that by and large is favorable along with slumps in certain economic fields; a growing standard of living for the working people along with the much faster growth of the employers' profits; higher real wages along with more and more cuts and curtailments due to the increasing cost of living and depreciation of money; tremendous technological progress along with as tremendous a waste of products, raw materials, manpower and health; a world of unprecedented wealth that is also an unprecedented vacuum in which the development and happiness of the individual comes last.

Since World War II there have been no regular economic crises affecting the condition of the workers and leading to further impoverishment. There have been crises and slumps which, however, never reached as far or as deep as the world economic crisis of the late twenties and early thirties. Poverty is still widespread in the advanced capitalist countries but there is no progressing impoverishment.

We do not orient our policy on economic crises and on impoverishment but counter the plans of big capital with proposals for full job security, for an increasingly favorable economic situation—proposals in the interest of the workers which it will take all of the militancy of the working class to realize.

IV

For all that, capitalism remains as capitalistic as ever, and more useless, more at variance with common sense and more threatening to life than ever before. The growing importance of state intervention within the framework of a capitalist economy shows that the capitalist has become redundant. The employer is above all else an appropriator, as an Austrian economist put it. Capitalist private ownership prevents the full use of production capacities and continuously increases the cost of living, restricting the growth of real wages. It is no longer in a position, particularly in view of the prospects of automation, to provide people with work and to free them from economic crises and upheavals. Capitalist economy based on profit is the breeding ground of all the dangers to peace, of more and more tendencies and acts of aggression increasing world political tensions. Big capital, both national and foreign, is the mainspring of all the tendencies to set up authoritarian regimes, and is at the root of all the inroads on democratic liberties and gains

As in the past, capitalist ownership of the means of production is an obstacle to every effort to extend democracy and ensure effective participation of the working people in the management of political and economic affairs. The working people, who produce all the riches, in no way influence the choice of the items produced, the methods by which this is done, or the persons for whom they are produced. Profit, not the public interest, is still the decisive factor in determining the direction and content of production and research. Big capital controls the more important levers for moulding public opinion, and therefore exercises control over the workers and their leisure hours outside the production premises.

V

Orientation on the peaceful road to socialism has become possible and, indeed, necessary as a result of the changed balance of forces, of changes in the capitalist countries. The revolutionary working-class movement would degenerate into a sect if it disregarded the new factors. Orientation on the peaceful road to socialism does not imply that the road is bound to be peaceful and there will be no struggle. But it alone makes it possible to form in the capitalist countries the broad alliance of the decisive popular forces which can suppress attempts by the exploiting classes to retain their power through civil war. There can be no orientation on socialism in Austria without orientation on the peaceful road to socialism.

This orientation calls for the setting of stage-by-stage goals whose attainment would limit the power of capital and extend that of the working people.

To advance to socialism by peaceful means, it is necessary, on the one hand, to restrict the power of capital by changing the nature of property, by eliminating capitalist influence on the nationalized enterprises, by nationalizing the key enterprises in industry, banking and insurance still in capitalist hands, and, on the other hand, to extend and renovate democracy, ensure participation in the management of production and the economy generally by the working people, through democratization of the machinery of state and the whole of public life. Needless to say it takes struggle to accomplish these tasks.

VI

The growing tendency for peasant farming, which produces for the farmer, to be replaced by farming that produces for the market, and for the processing of farm produce at the farmyard to be taken over by big private and cooperative undertakings, and above all the intensive mechanization of agriculture have thoroughly changed relations in the countryside. The agricultural population is steadily decreasing; so is the number of small and, to a lesser degree, medium enterprises. Most young peasants also work in industry, even if they continue to live in the countryside. The same is true of most of the small farmers. More than fifty per cent of all farmers are also engaged in other basic or subsidiary industries. By far most of the rural settlements today are of the industrial rather than the agricultural type. The problem of the outflow of population has become the central problem of the countryside.

More and more branches of agricultural production are being "industrialized" due to the complete mechanization of field operations, the establishment of poultry and hog factories, etc. Even the medium peasant farms cannot go on receiving credits; retain the present terms of sale and purchase, and their competitive capacity in relation to the enterprises in various fields of production unless they expand cooperation. The beginnings in this sphere, so far very modest, should be encouraged in every way. This is resisted chiefly by the Economic Alliance of the Austrian People's Party. The release of the working peasants from the unnatural alliance with big industrial and commercial capital, and their advance alongside the working class are the decisive condition for Austria's peasant farming to remain viable.

On most Austrian peasant farms, including the majority of the big farms, the land today is cultivated solely or mainly, by the farmer and his family. This is why all those who own land, with the exception of the big landowners, are now either semi-proletarians ("part-time" farmers) or small commodity producers unless they are simultaneously engaged in large-scale trade or something like that. In fighting against monopoly capital and large-scale landownership they can — and it is in their own interest that they should — become allies of the workers.

VII

The fact that decisions of vital importance are made without consulting public opinion, and the spiritual vacuum resulting from the domination of certain methods or shaping public opinion are resented by a section of the intelligentsia. This heightens interest in Marxist thought and in the socialist perspective. Serious discussions along democratic lines, showing that we respect views differing from ours, a debate on spiritual questions into which we Communists must inject our Marxists views, and constructive proposals directed against official disrespect for culture and research are all in keeping with the interests and requirements of many intellectuals, and our Party should therefore devote greater attention to discussions with the intellectuals.

VIII

The working people's readiness to approve of the orientation on the peaceful road to socialism will depend in large measure on the conviction that the socialist revolution will bring new democratic liberties and gains without eliminating the liberties and gains already achieved, and without abolishing the existing freedom of the individual. The socialist revolution is the greatest democratic revolution in history, for it removes the poisoning and corrupting influence of capital. But so far it has been victorious primarily in economically backward countries where there was no solid parliamentary tradition and where the establishment of new government institutions was conditioned by the fact that the revolution had been accomplished through civil war or after World War II. Violations of socialist democracy in the socialist countries were conducive, among other things, to the spread of false notions as to the relationship between democracy and socialism both within and outside the revolutionary working-class movement.

The socialist revolution has always involved far-reaching democratic changes. It has revolutionized the educational system, which for the first time in history affords the masses opportunities for the full development of the personality. It has ended a disgraceful situation in which considerations of private gain influenced government decisions of vital importance. It has opened for the workers the road to the control and management of the enterprises, and has led to the greatest emancipation of women. But we also take account of that which has been negative in the experience of socialist construction, and proceed from the experience of our own country when we say:

In Austria, socialism will add to the existing liberties new ones that cannot be introduced until capitalism has been eliminated.

We seek a road providing greater opportunities for free artistic and scientific endeavor and guaranteeing freedom of conscience and respect for the sentiments of the religious. Private property in small-scale industry, the handicrafts and agriculture will perform an important function, with the cooperatives — to be managed on democratic lines — playing an increasing role in this private sector.

The peaceful road to socialism will be taken by several parties. As they advance along it the existing parties will undergo changes and arrive at socialism together.

The common struggle now being waged by different groups against monopoly capital speaks of the emergence of an alliance of different parties, which in the course of socialist construction will represent different sections of society.

IX

The orientation of the Communist parties of the developed capitalist countries on the peaceful road to socialism suggests conclusions that important for their present-day policies. Since the road to socialism will be taken by several parties and since cooperation of the democratic forces is indispensable for the realization of socialist objectives stage by stage — because socialism has prospects only if democratic alternatives in the direction of socialism are put forward already today -- the issue of allies in general and that of unity of action of the working-class movement in particular is of decisive importance. There can be no socialist perspective without a policy of united action and without orientation on the rallying of the democratic forces.

The trade unions could play a special role in realizing this perspective because, being a single class organization, they comprise representatives of different parties and are of decisive importance in the fight for the democratization of public life and for socialism. This is why it is so important to democratize the trade unions. They are also a most important organization for agreement between Socialists, Communists, Christian workers and non-party people, the platform on which it is easiest of all to implement unity of action of all industrial and office workers — Socialists, Communists, Christians and non-party people.

Socialist and Communist unity is the nucleus around which the democratic forces can rally to fight neo-fascism, for democratic demands, national sovereignty, and peace. The Communists consider it their chief task to support this policy of democratic unity. To renounce this task would mean renouncing the socialist perspective.

X

There are favorable objective conditions in Austria that make it possible to achieve socialist objectives stage by stage and the immediate objectives of democratic renovation. Most of the basic heavy industries have been nationalized and so have the big banks. Austria has a developed system of communal services. The geographical proximity of socialist countries makes it easier to wrest concessions from the bourgeoisie in the most diverse fields. The industrial and office workers make up 70 per cent of the gainfully employed population. Although they have yet to become the decisive factor in society, they could win important rights to a say in the management of the enterprises and the economy generally. The principal objectives in the struggle for socialism are the following:

(a) Democratization of the machinery of state and public life; a genuinely democratic electoral reform giving equal weight to the vote of each elector, free and open exchange of opinions on the radio and on TV; genuine freedom of instruction in the higher schools.

(b) Coordination of production, research, investment, and the sales policy of the nationalized enterprises; removal of the representatives of capital from the key agencies of the nationalized enterprises and banks; extension of nationalization to the whole of large-scale industry and to the insurance companies; coordination of programming and planning policies within the nationalized sector which would be of importance to the whole national economy because it would end discrimination against the nationalized sector in setting up new enterprises, and would also pave the way to the solution of the problem of the proper location of industry in Austria's underdeveloped areas.

(c) Workers' participation in the management of the enterprises and the economy as a whole, including questions relating to price formation, investments, and so on; the nationalized enterprises should come first in this respect.

XI

The policy of social partnership is the main obstacle to the utilization in Austria of the favorable strategic opportunities of unsaddling big capital. It means completely renouncing an active and independent labor policy in respect to capital and rejecting the socialist perspective. It demobilizes the working class, misleads the democratic forces, and strengthens big capital by renouncing the opportunities which the working people have in Austria. It stifles working-class initiative and leads the working class astray in ideological matters. It is the main cause of the shift to the right in Austrian policy last year.

It is on this conviction that the policy of social partnership is fraught with disastrous consequences that our attitude toward the coalition policy of the Socialist Party of Austria (SPA) is based. We are criticizing the SPA not because it is represented in a coalition cabinet but because within that coalition it pursues the policy of social partnership.

The SPA's claim to leadership might be seen as an indirect admission that the Austrian working peopl edo not exert sufficient influence on government policies and that their influence could be far greater. But we are fighting against a policy which confines itself to parliamentary combinations, and against enhancement of the role of the Free Party of Austria (FPA). We wholeheartedly welcome the resistance which class-conscious comrades from the SPA are putting up to the policy of the leaders of that party. It is impossible to pursue a policy promoting our national sovereignty in collaboration with the enemies of Austrian neutrality. Nor can one put forward any alternative serving the socialist perspective while making cause with confirmed opponents of socialism.

We make our support of SPA policy conditional on whether it stands for the democratic alternative and for actions by the working people in support of this alternative and the socialist perspective. We support every step which the SPA takes in the interest of the working people and of progress. We realize that no decisive gains in the social sphere, in the sphere of home policy and foreign policy, on the issue of democratization, etc., can be scored unless the greater part of the Socialist workers take up this demand and, in common with their class brothers, bring strong and effective pressure to bear on the SPA leadership to make them heed the demands of the working class. This is why we regard it as our chief political task to seek agreement with the SPA comrades. In fighting for unity of action, we can have only one line, the line prompted by the interests of the working class. This is the reason why we support every initiative toward rallying the workers against capital and reaction, why we are fighting against the policy of social partnership with the utmost determination, and why consolidation of the Communist Party is so important.

We know that socialism in Austria ean be built only in collaboration with the Socialist workers. Therefore, unity of action with the SPA comrades is very important to us. But we also know that the policy of social partnership strengthens the positions of capital. We are therefore fighting against this policy as a modern form of opportunism in the working-class movement.

The Party's campaign for seats in Parliament is an essential component of our general policy, particularly in view of our orientation on democratic renovation. Our policy in the election campaign is directed — in line with our general struggle — against capital and reaction, against the Austrian People's Party (APP) and the Free Party of Austria (FPA). Furthermore, it is a resolute struggle against the SPA policy of social partnership. The chief difficulty in our struggle for seats in Parliament is, in addition to the unfair electoral system, the fact that elections to the National Council are coming more and more to be alternative elections between the two ruling parties. Our ideas will influence the masses to a greater extent also during elections provided we succeed, in greater measure than before, in implementing our policy and carrying out our plans.

XII

The reason why we have been criticizing the policy of enhancing the rol eof the FPA — a policy which the SPA leaders are pursuing because they lay claim to the leadership of the country — is not only that it inevitably involves anti-Communist sorties. We have been combating it also because it was leading to the rejection of agreement with the democratic elements in the APP, made a rightward shift in that party and in the government possible, and did tremendous harm to the opposition, the so-called reformists in the APP. It was against the background of recent developments in the Church and in the Catholic camp at large that the policy of enhancing the role of the FPA delivered a crippling blow to the opportunities for a democratic alternative. Besides, it increased ideological confusion among the workers. As for the reformists, it enable them to smooth over the contradictions in the APP. Lastly, it facilitates possible attempts at building bourgeois blocs.

Of vast importance for democratic unity are the developments taking place in the Catholic camp and in the APP. Left Catholic journalists are courageously opposing fascism and advocating peace, and occasionally even the socialist perspective. Hence, to rally the democratic forces and realize the prospects we are holding out to the working class, we need an effort toward agreement with the democratic elements in the Catholic camp and in the APP.

We Communists know that we cannot travel by ourselves the path we propose to the working class. We also know that many Socialists, as well as groups of Catholics, have similar ideas about the future of our country. This is why we earnestly call for a policy of unity of action and democratic unity. This is why our chief task is to pursue such a policy. This is why we regard the defeat of anti-communism as a prerequisite for a progressive outlook in our country.

XIII

We are elaborating these ideas on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, with due regard to the specific conditions in our country and our working class. We have no interests other than those of the Austrian nation, nor aims other than those of the Austrian working class. We see defense of the interests of the Austrian nation, and maintenance of the neutrality and independence of Austria against German militarism, as a platform on which all the patriotic-minded people of our country can unite.

Proceeding from scientific socialism and taking account of the conditions of the class struggle in our country, we want to ascertain the democratic alternative of today and the socialist outlook for the future. We know that we owe the new opportunities to the changed balance of world forces, the rise and development of the socialist community, and the powerful revolution going on in the colonies and semi-colonies. We are most closely linked with every country where capitalism has been abolished, with all those peoples who are looking forward to socialism, with all the movements fighting against every form of colonialism. Proletarian internationalism underlies our world outlook, and guides us in action.

We think that one cannot be a real socialist unless one supports every effort aimed at achieving socialism. We think that one cannot be a real internationalist unless one supports every effort to achieve national sovereignty, against colonialism. One of the weaknesses of the Austrian working-class movement is that despite its long-standing internationalist tradition, it has yet to find effective forms of expressing its solidarity.

But we are an autonomous party which works out its own concepts with due regard to the experience of the international working-class movement and the conditions in its country, a party which conducts its political struggle in line with the interests of its own working class. This may result in our arriving, in some form or other, and by virtue of a distinctive geographical position and distinctive conditions, at views differing from those of fraternal parties. We hold that these divergences should be discussed in a serious and friendly form, without anathematizing and excommunicating anyone. The fact that in the past we sometimes failed to take proper account of this autonomy led to certain political mistakes.

We are Austrian Communists. As Communists we are closely linked with the world Communist movement. As Austrians we proceed from the conditions in our country and from the experience of our own working-class movement. As Austrian Communists we uphold the interests and prospects of the Austrian working class. Thereby we serve the common interests of the international working-class movement.

XIV

The chief ideological task of our Party is to convince the rank and file and the activists of our Party that this policy must be pursued in every sphere. The main ideological weakness of the leading Party bodies is that so far we have succeeded to a very insignificant degree in promoting political initiative stemming from this orientation, and the chief responsibility for this falls on the Party leadership. Outdated notions, views and working methods still play a big role. This accounts for the fact that while our proposals and ideas, which accord with present-day conditions, are meeting with growing response, the Communists are not active enough as proponents of these proposals and ideas and many of them do not even know that these ideas and proposals, which are being translated into reality, have been advanced by their own Party.

The chief ideological task of our Party is to reorganize its work and orientate the comrades on the new political tasks we have put forward in the theses "Austria's Road to Socialism" and reaffirmed in the resolutions of the Eighteenth Party Congress. Only those Communists who are convinced of the correctness of the Marxist conclusions suggested by the changed balance of forces can convince the Austrian Socialist workers of the need for unity of action, and convince the Austrian democrats of the need for democratic unity. Concepts alone are not enough. They convince only when they are followed by action.

XV

The struggle for socialism in Austria is a pressing task. Austria has all the material prerequisites for the transition to socialism. The Communists consider it their task to provide political and spiritual prerequisites for this transition. Our arguments, which justify the class point of view by daily experience, are aimed at this. So are our concepts of nationalization, automation, school reform, and so on, which are the nearest democratic objectives on the road to socialism. We want the 19th Congress of the Party to increase the appeal of the idea that Austria's program is a socialist program.

XVI

All the immediate objectives, and those to be achieved stage by stage, are conditional on the issue of eliminating big capital from the political and economic spheres. The present coalition government is a government of social partnership. Only by combating the political foundations of this government system can big capital be removed. There are democratic forces in the country destined to accomplish this. The idea of a government of democratic renovation supported by the democratic and patriotic forces, the government we are striving for, implies that the big capitalists and their hangers-on shall be removed from the government, the chambers and the unions, and that the spokesmen of foreign monopolies will disappear from the Austrian political and economic scene along with them.

Socialism is on the order of the day. Orientation on socialism should be on the Communist order of the day. The Austrian working class, and the people as a whole, need a strong Communist party to fight for national sovereignty, for peace, democracy and socialism.

STATEMENT*

OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, SOUTH VIETNAMESE NATIONAL LIBERATION FRONT

For more than ten years now South Vietnam has been the object of U.S. imperialist intervention and aggression. In the recent period the U.S. imperialists have sent in a large number of their own combat troops, including missile units, marines and B-57 bombers, besides mercenaries from South Korea, Taiwan, the Philippines, Australia, Malaya, etc.

Today they have gone to such lengths in pursuit of their infamous ends as to order their own as well as their stooges' air forces systematically to raid North Vietnam and Laos. They are not only persistently waging a criminal war of aggression in South Vietnam but also seeking to spread the flames of war to all of Indochina and South-East Asia.

The U.S. puppets in power in South Vietnam are daily committing more and more outrageous crimes against the people of this country. Traitors devoid of conscience, they kowtow to the aggressors, inviting (like a man who lets a snake into his chicken coop to devour his chickens) the armed forces of the USA and its satellites to slaughter the South Vietnamese people, to occupy and plunder our sacred soil, and brutally to oppress and exploit our people.

The people of Vietnam, of the whole of Indochina, of South-East Asia and the whole world for whom peace and justice are precious are outraged by the criminal aggression of the U.S. imperialists and voice their vehement protest against it.

In this extremely grave situation the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front once again declares its firm and unshakable resolve to carry the War of Resistance to the U.S. imperialists to the end.

1. The U.S. imperialists are violating the Geneva agreements. They are the most brazen aggressors and warmongers, the mortal enemies of the Vietnamese people.

It is common knowledge that the U.S. imperialists aided and abetted the French colonialists in their aggressive war against the Vietnamese people. During this war, which ended in a debacle for the aggressors, they gave the French colonialists $2,600 million in aid as well as hundreds of thousands of tons of arms, and sent in 200 military advisers to help crush the Vietnamese people's fight for independence and freedom. But the heroic people of Vietnam, resolved to fight to the end and to die rather than submit to slavery, and wholeheartedly supported by the peoples of the whole world, won a resounding victory and liberated half of the territory of their beloved lands from the enemy. This led to the conclusion in Geneva in 1954 of international agreements solemnly recognizing the sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia, restored peace in the area and laid the foundations for the peaceful reunification of Vietnam.

Knowing full well the value of these agreements, the Vietnamese people have strictly observed them from the very beginning and are resolved to remain faithful to both their spirit and their letter in the future as well.

The U.S. imperialists and their stooges in South Vietnam on the contrary, flouted these agreements from the very outset and eventually scrapped them completely. For the last eleven years they have been openly waging a brutal aggressive war in South Vietnam in an effort to subjugate and enslave its people, to reduce it to a colony and military base, and to perpetuate the division of Vietnam.

The ink had not yet dried on the Geneva agreements when the U.S. imperialists hastened to muster their myrmidons into the SEATO military bloc and demonstratively placed South Vietnam under the "protection" of this bloc, which was tantamount to putting it under U.S. control. Ever since then the USA has been intervening more and more flagrantly in the affairs of South Vietnam. From the end of 1954 to 1959 the U.S. imperialists and the Ngo Dinh Diem puppet government repeatedly conducted ruthless campaigns of persecution and extermination of patriots, such as the campaigns in Chuong Tan Bieu and Thoai Ngoc Hau, staging massacres of the peace-loving, patriotic-minded population, killing former members of the Resistance and wiping out religious sects and all those who did not support them.

No sooner had peace been restored than South Vietnamese blood was spilt in Duy-Xuyen Huong-dien, Cho Duoc, Vinh Chinh and many other places, including the streets of Saigon. Steadily extending and intensifying the brutal punitive operations, the U.S. imperialists and their henchmen adopted in 1959 the fascist-like Ordinance 10/59, which outlawed as "Communists" all public and political associations as well as individuals in South Vietnam who did not fall in line with them. It is estimated that in this period the U.S. hangmen and their aides killed or threw in prison hundreds of thousands of South Vietnamese patriots for the sole reason that they worked for peace, insisted that the Geneva agreements be fulfilled, urged consultations concerning a general election with a view to reuniting the country, or merely because they would not submit to the hangmen.

These crimes committed by the U.S. imperialists and their henchmen naturally evoked indignation throughout Vietnam and caused a storm of protest all over the world.

Public opinion in Vietnam, in all of Asia, and throughout all the five continents condemned these crimes and demanded that the U.S. imperialists and their henchmen cease their aggression against the South Vietnamese people and observe the Geneva agreements of 1954.

But in spite of the protest voiced by all peace-loving peoples the U.S. imperialists stubbornly continued the predatory war in South Vietnam.

In the past eleven years the U.S. imperialists have spent, in the guise of "aid," $4,000 million on implementing their aggressive colonialist policy in South Vietnam; of this sum more than 80 per cent has been used directly for military purposes. The U.S. rulers attach a special importance to this aggressive war. President Johnson, like the late President Kennedy before him, the U.S. National Security Council, the Departments of Defense and State, and the CIA have closely followed developments in South Vietnam. Honolulu has become the scene of regular monthly meetings between the men of the White House and the Pentagon and U.S. commanders in the Pacific area on how best to carry out their plans of intervention.

In order to take the conduct of the aggressive war in South Vietnam directly into their own hands, the U.S. imperialists have set up, in addition to the American military mission, their own military command in Saigon headed by Paul Harkins. Recently they established what is called a joint U.S.-Vietnamese command but which actually is a U.S. agency wielding extensive powers and subordinated directly to the U.S. President and Department of Defense. Nearly all high-placed U.S. officials, including members of the government and generals, have been in South Vietnam on inspection tours and to help in working out aggressive plans. Moreover, the U.S. government has sent some of its leading generals to direct the war on the spot. One of these is General Maxwell Taylor, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The U.S. imperialists and their henchmen are using all modern means of warfare except nuclear bombs to intimidate and kill the South Vietnamese with the sole aim of subjugating them and transforming South Vietnam into an American colony and military base.

In the past 11 years they have conducted more than 160,000 punitive expeditions, big and small, killed more than 170,000 people, wounded or maimed through torture nearly 800,000, imprisoned over 400,000 in 1,000-odd prisons, and raped tens of thousands of women. They have razed to the ground countless villages, herded more than five million people into 8,000 concentration camps which they call "prosperity zones," "resettlement centers," "strategic settlements," etc., and used chemical weapons which have poisoned tens of thousands of people and destroyed crops and fruit trees over an area running into hundreds of thousands of acres. They have destroyed thousands of pagodas, churches, chapels and temples and killed tens of thousands of priests and monks. Under the iron heel of the U.S. aggressors and their hangers-on fertile South Vietnam lies bleeding and ravaged. The ruthless fascist regime they have set up is even more brutal than Hitler's Nazi regime or the most fearful tyrannies of the Middle Ages.

These facts fully expose the U.S. imperialists and their lackeys, and their aggressive, perfidious nature. They have not only violated all the provisions of the cease-fire agreement and the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference of 1954, but have brazenly scrapped all these international agreements. And not only have the Washington rulers and the Vietnamese traitors ignored the Geneva agreements; they have also flouted on the spirit and letter of international law and the decisions of the Bandung conference. Such are the facts. To cover up their piratical nature, the U.S. imperialists seek to throw dust in the eyes of the peoples of the world, but in vain. This applies also to the so-called White Book recently put out in Washington. A fabrication from beginning to end, it is the old clumsy device of a criminal shouting "Stop thief!" But at the same time it makes it still more glaringly patent that the U.S. imperialists are out to intensify and escalate their criminal war. In a word, the situation in South Vietnam is this: the U.S. imperialists are waging a criminal aggressive war, shamelessly violating the Geneva agreements; they are the most dangerous aggressors and war provocateurs, the mortal enemies of the peoples of Vietnam, Indochina and the world.

2. The heroic people of South Vietnam are resolved to expel the U.S. imperialists, to liberate their country, to build an independent, democratic, peace-loving and neutral South Vietnam, and to bring the reunification of their native land.

The people of South Vietnam want peace, but they are equally determined not to allow U.S. imperialism and its henchmen to trample their land and fetter them with the chains of slavery. They will sooner die than submit to bondage. The 14 million South Vietnamese have risen as one man to a decisive, heroic, selfless struggle to defeat the U.S. aggressors and the Vietnamese traitors, to liberate South Vietnam and win independence, democracy, peace and neutrality and thereby help to safeguard peace in Indochina and South-East Asia generally. The patriotic war waged by the South Vietnamese people accords with the most elementary, basic principles of international law, which include the right of the peoples to self-determination and to wage patriotic war in self-defense against aggression from without. In their liberation war the people of South Vietnam use diverse types of weapons against the enemy, and the main supplier of these weapons is none other than the U.S. imperialists, who have suffered heavy defeats time and again in recent years.

Although they entered the struggle with bare hands, the people of South Vietnam have built up their strength and won many victories. And they are confident that they will win by their own efforts and with the wholehearted support of the peoples of the world. The U.S. imperialists and their stooges are now in a hopeless impasse. Faced with the powerful popular revolutionary tide sweeping South Vietnam, they are making desperate efforts to save themselves. To find a way out of the extremely perilous situation they are plunging headlong into military adventures fraught with the gravest danger.

The growing shipments of U.S. arms to South Vietnam, the build-up of naval air strength, the concentration of mercenaries from South Korea and other satellite countries, the air raids on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and Laos—these and other measures are by no means a sign of strength. On the contrary, they are the insane acts of a brutalized enemy that has lost his head. But they can intimidate no one. The present escalation of the war by the U.S. imperialists is in itself another defeat for the aggressive colonialist policy they have pursued in South Vietnam for the past eleven years; it is added testimony to the bankruptcy of this policy, of their "special war."

But if the U.S. imperialists are already bogged down in this "special war," war on a wider scale would involve them in still greater difficulties. Were they to extend the war to North Vietnam, all of Indochina or still farther afield, they would unquestionably suffer a still more ignominious and speedy defeat.

The South Vietnamese National Liberation Front once again declares that the U.S. plan to secure—by building up the U.S. air, naval and land forces in South Vietnam, bringing in satellite troops and launching air raids against North Vietnam and Laos—"positions of strength" that would force the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front and the South Vietnamese people to sell their birthright in negotiations with the USA, is wishful thinking on the part of political madmen and military adventurers. The people of South Vietnam have this to say to the U.S. imperialists and their agents: the U.S. imperialists now have no choice but to get out. If, in spite of everything, you persist in prosecuting your war, you will suffer the most crushing and most ignominious defeat. On behalf of the heroic South Vietnamese people 14 million strong, the National Liberation Front solemnly declares: the people and their armed forces are firmly resolved to carry on the fight until they have achieved their goals—independence, democracy, peace and neutrality. The South Vietnamese people are resolved to continue dealing shattering blows at the U.S. aggressors and their servitors and are bound to win in the end. All negotiations with the U.S. imperialists are now completely pointless inasmuch as they persistently refuse to withdraw their forces, war materials and means of warfare, as well as the troops and means of warfare of their satellites, and to dismantle their military bases, and inasmuch as the traitors are continuing to barter away the sacred rights of the South Vietnamese people to independence and democracy while the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front, the only true representative of the 14 million South Vietnamese, is denied the decisive say.

3. The heroic South Vietnamese people and liberation army are resolved to do their sacred duty to the end and expel the U.S. imperialists in order to liberate South Vietnam and defend North Vietnam.

Vietnam and the Vietnamese people are an integral whole. North and South Vietnam belong to the same family. This feeling of of kinship is strong in each and all of us. This is as true as the fact that the sun rises in the East, and there is no force on earth that can shake the truth. In the present sanguinary war, in this life-and-death struggle against the U.S. imperialists and their lackeys, the heart cannot but feel the pain when the hand is severed. It is only natural and logical that the people in North Vietnam should be determined to do their duty to their brothers and sisters in South Vietnam.

On behalf of the 14 million South Vietnamese people, the National Liberation Front makes this solemn pledge to its 17 million brothers and sisters in the North: the heroic South Vietnamese people and their army of liberation are resolved to fulfil their sacred mission to the end—to drive out the U.S. imperialists, liberate South Vietnam and defend the North in order to effect the reunion of their homeland.

To find a way out of the critical situation and evade inevitable defeat in South Vietnam the U.S. imperialists and their lackeys have of late been recklessly sending planes and warships to bomb and shell North Vietnam. They have, however, been punished according to their deserts. Over 50 U.S. jets have been shot down. The army and the people of South Vietnam, rejoicing over this fact, warmly welcome the outstanding victories of the army and the people of North Vietnam.

The heart feels the pain when the arm is severed! To protect our kinsmen in the North the army and the people of the South strike back in retribution at the U.S. aggressors and their stooges. To each blow by the U.S. imperialists against the North of our homeland the army and the people in the South will reply in double and treble measures.

In February, when the aggressors and traitors attacked the North, the liberation army in the South delivered telling blows at important military bases and the main forces of the enemy, put out of commission 20,706 enemy officers and men (among them some 600 Americans killed, wounded or taken prisoner), captured 4,144 weapons of various kinds, and damaged or destroyed 111 planes of various types.

The South Vietnamese National Liberation Front warns the U.S. imperialists and Vietnamese traitors: having failed to conquer the 14 million people of South Vietnam, you can hardly hope to be able to crush the entire Vietnamese nation of 30 million. Military gambles and escalation of war, far from helping you to find a way out of the impasse, will, on the contrary, only hasten your destruction.

In order to get out of their predicament in South Vietnam the U.S. imperialists and their lackeys have also repeatedly bombed and shelled the liberated areas in Laos, violated the border and invaded the territory of Cambodia, used poisonous chemicals and bombs to kill Cambodians. But the peoples of Laos and Cambodia have given a worthy rebuff and dealt counter-blows at the U.S. aggressors and their hirelings.

The people of South Vietnam warmly welcome the unbending heroism and militancy of the peoples of these two neighboring countries. They are resolved firmly to stand by the peoples of Laos and Cambodia in the struggle against the common enemy — U.S. imperialism and its lackeys. The people and the Liberation Army of South Vietnam are determined to rout the U.S. aggressors and their agents in our country, which has become a springboard for acts of war and piracy on the part of the USA and its stooges against the kingdoms of Laos and Cambodia.

The people of South Vietnam once again welcome the outstanding success of the recent conference of the peoples of Indochina.

The National Liberation Front and the people of South Vietnam warn the U.S. imperialists and their lackeys that should they dare to extend their aggression to the whole of Vietnam, and spread the flames of war to Indo-China as a whole, the invincible power of the 30 million people of Vietnam and the unconquerable power of hundreds of millions of people in Indochina and Asia generally will destroy them.

4. The people of South Vietnam express their profound gratitude to the peoples of the whole world who cherish peace and justice, for their sincere support, and declare their readiness to accept any aid, including arms and other war materiel, from their friends on all the five continents.

The just, patriotic struggle of the people of South Vietnam enjoys the sympathy, support and approval of all peoples who cherish peace and justice. The peoples of the world accord the people of South Vietnam not only moral support — they have helped and are helping them materially as well. Needless to say, the people of South Vietnam and their spokesman—the National Liberation Front—are fully entitled to accept this valuable aid, and warmly welcome it.

The National Liberation Front has always relied mainly on its own strength and possibilities, but it is prepared to accept any aid, moral and material alike, including arms and munitions, from all the socialist countries and nationalist states, as well as from international organizations and peace-loving people of the whole world. Moreover, the front reserves the right to buy arms and military equipment from other countries to strengthen its self-defense potential in this war.

The international conference of solidarity with the people of Vietnam in the struggle against the U.S. imperialist aggression and in defense of peace, held at the end of last year and attended by representatives from over 50 countries and 16 international organizations, gave a positive reply to these urgent and fully legitimate demands. If the U.S. imperialists continue to bring their own and satellite troops to South Vietnam and spread the war to North Vietnam and Laos, the National Liberation Front will appeal to the peoples of other countries to send their youth and servicemen to South Vietnam to combat the common enemy jointly with our people.

Should the need arise, with the U.S. imperialists continuing to sow suffering and death in South Vietnam, the National Liberation Front will call on the sons and daughters of south Vietnam who moved to the North in keeping with the cease-fire agreement and who for ten long years have lived far from their native places, to return to the South and take up arms in order to destroy the enemy and save their country and families.

The wrath of the people of South Vietnam and the peace-loving peoples of the whole world is turned against the U.S. imperialists and their flunkeys, who cannot accept mercy. They will have to answer for all the grave consequences of their aggressive actions. On behalf of the 14 million people of South Vietnam, the Central Committee of the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front expresses once again its profound gratitude to the peoples of the socialist and nationalist countries, to international organizations and all the peace-loving peoples for their sincere support of the just and patriotic War of Resistance in South Vietnam. More than ever we deem it our internationalist duty to do everything in our power, whatever the sacrifice, in order to make a worthy contribution to the great common struggle of all peoples in defense of independence, democracy, peace and social progress in Indochina, South-East Asia and throughout the world, to the defeat of the international gendarme—aggressive U.S. imperialism.

5. Our task is to rally the whole people, arm them and continue to advance heroically, firmly determined to fight and defeat the U.S. aggressors and the local traitors.

Major victories have already been won in the armed struggle waged by the South Vietnamese people against the U.S. aggressors and their accomplices.

The U.S. imperialists and their lackeys only seem to be strong; in reality, they are weak, frustrated and isolated more than ever before. The South Vietnam people, firmly remembering their vow rather to die than be slaves, will defeat their enemies—the barbarians and plunderers.

The National Liberation Front and the people of South Vietnam derive their strength not only from the justice of their cause; they are rapidly growing stronger materially and organizationally. They have always been the victors; the longer they have to fight the stronger they become; and their victories are growing in number, and impact.

We are the worthy countries of the traditions of Dien Bien Phou and the thousand-year-old history of the Vietnamese people's struggle against invaders, and we have elevated these traditions to a new height. The National Liberation Front and the people of South Vietnam are fighting heroically in an extremely favorable situation when all the oppressed peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America have risen in the struggle for freedom. The socialist countries and the democratic and peace forces all over the world constitute an important factor of human progress, a factor which curbs and destroys imperialism and colonialism in all their forms. If the U.S. imperialists and their lackeys recklessly spread the flames of war to the whole of Indochina, the peoples of this area and of all South-East Asia will resolutely take to arms and sweep them into the ocean.

The people of South Vietnam and their sole genuine representative—the National Liberation Front—will undoubtedly win the final victory.

The Central Committee of the National Liberation Front calls on the heroic people of South Vietnam and their armed forces staunchly fighting on all the war fronts to grip their weapons still more firmly, vigorously to develop their fearless militancy, resolutely and firmly to carry out the following tasks:

—unite the people in a monolithic whole;

—arm the people and rally them as one man to the struggle to defeat the U.S. aggressors and the local traitors;

—the Liberation Army and the people's armed forces should boldly go forward, continuously, resolutely and unerringly strike at the U.S. aggressors and their lackeys, giving them not a moment's respite, and vigorously destroy the enemy forces;

—the population of the rural areas should continue to destroy the remaining "strategic hamlets," roots the enemy out of his strongholds, expand the liberated districts, combine the liberated villages and districts into a single whole, develop them into strong bases of support, engage the enemy whenever he is seen, fight to win, staunchly holding and defending their native villages and fields;

—the population of Saigon, Huê, Da-Nang and other towns should build up their revolutionary organizations, hold demonstrations, activize the struggle in all fields, demanding that the U.S. imperialists and their henchmen stop the war in South Vietnam and exposing the Vietnamese traitors who aid the aggressors and barter their country and people;

—the whole people, cadre workers and servicemen should heroically march forward under the banner of liberation, and fight unflinchingly to rout the U.S. aggressors and their accomplices and save the country.

Even if we shall have to fight for another 10 or 20 years or more and endure still greater difficulties and privations, we are prepared and determined to fight to the end, as long as a single U.S. soldier remains on our soil.

The history of the Vietnamese people goes back a thousand years. It is a heroic history of a heroic people. In the past 10 years of the struggle against the U.S. imperialist aggressors and their henchmen a brilliant page has been inscribed into this history by the people and the Liberation Army of South Vietnam.

We have won and are continuing to win victories while the U.S. imperialists and their agents have suffered and are suffering defeats in this war. This demonstrates that we are invincible, that the aggressors and their agents are weak. If we have been able to win victories over the United States in the past 10 years and more, today we have every condition to defeat them. If the U.S. aggressors and their lackeys have suffered defeat after defeat in the past 10 years or more, today they are growing weaker and will suffer still heavier defeats. And if the U.S. imperialists spread the war to the North, their defeat will be no doubt even more disgraceful. Confident that victory will be ours, we are determined to carry on the fight, unerringly levelling smashing blows at the U.S. aggressors and their henchmen in order to liberate the South, defend the North and reunify our homeland.

RESOLUTION* OF THE CC PRESIDIUM CP OF JAPAN

LET US LAUNCH VIGOROUS UNITED ACTIONS AGAINST THE AGGRESSION IN INDOCHINA, AGAINST THE JAPAN-SOUTH KOREA TALKS, THE REVIVAL OF MILITARISM AND THE REVISION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

I

The situation in Asia and Japan is entering a crucial stage. Its primary characteristic is that the U.S. imperialists, having found themselves in an utterly hopeless situation as a result of the heroic struggle of the people of South Vietnam, have only resorted to an escalation of the war of aggression in Indochina. In defiance of world opinion, they have resumed bombing of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, and are launching massive air raids on that country.

These events have shattered all illusions about U.S. imperialism and laid bare the sinister nature of its policy of aggression and war. They have also created the extremely grave danger of a major military provocation in Asia that may even develop into a nuclear war.

At the same time U.S. imperialism, acting in collusion with its British counterpart, which is pressing forward its neo-colonialist plans centred on Malaysia, is plotting to form in Asia a combat-ready anti-Communist military bloc of Japan, South Korea and Taiwan. The aim is "to make Asians fight Asians" and "internationalize" the war of aggression in Indochina still further by sending South Korean, Chang Kai-shek and Philippine troops and by Japan rendering medical, economic and other assistance to South Vietnam.

Angered by this sinister intensification of the U.S. imperialist policy of war, the peoples are voicing their protest in huge demonstrations all over the world, particularly in Asia. The common fight of the Asian peoples against the U.S. imperialist aggression in Indochina and against its expansion is becoming a vital element of the battle for world peace, for the independence of the peoples.

Another characteristic of the situation in Asia and Japan is the growing role of Japanese monopoly capital and the Sato government in the intensification of the U.S. imperialists' policy of aggression in Asia.

During the Japanese-American talks last January the Sato government promised to expedite its assistance to the U.S. aggression in South Vietnam, the completion of the Japan-South bloc of Japan, South Korea and Taiwan, to launch intrigues aimed Korea talks, and the establishment of an anti-Communist military at asserting the concept of "two Chinas," and to allow the open delivery of nuclear weapons into Japan under the Japanese-American "security treaty."

An increasingly hostile policy towards China, the forcible "repeat entries" of U.S. atomic submarines into Japanese ports, the visit of Japan's Foreign Minister Shiina to South Korea to speed up the Japan-South Korea talks, and other facts show that the Sato government, assuming the role of an agent of U.S. imperialism, helping it to pursue its policy of "containing China" and committing aggression in Asia, is doing its utmost to keep to the road of dependence and aggression, so as to turn Japan into a "great power" in the Far East. It is a road leading Japan to the position of a base of U.S. imperialist aggression, fomenting in the Japanese people a hostile attitude towards the peoples of Asia, and drawing Japan into a war of aggression. Already the USA is using the military bases on Japanese territory for its aggression in Indochina; ships of the U.S. Seventh Fleet are sent from the Japanese port of Sasebo.

Peace and security in Asia and the rest of the world now depend in great measure on the struggle of the Japanese people against the dangerous military and foreign policy of the Sato government. Of special importance in this struggle is the movement to frustrate the Japan-South Korea talks, which the U.S.-Japanese reactionaries want—at a time when the South Korean regime of Pak John Hee is again strengthening its military establishment at the bidding of the U.S. imperialists — to conclude in April by signing an agreement.

A third characteristic of the situation in Asia and Japan is that in view of the situation described above, the Sato government is conducting an offensive against the Japanese people on a broadening front and stepping up the restoration of Japanese militarism and imperialism dependent on U.S. imperialism.

The aims which the Sato government pursue under cover of demagogic propaganda about an "independent foreign policy," "social development" and "tolerance and harmony" were revealed by the secret document of the National Defense Agency bearing the code name of "Operation Three Arrows," which was exposed in Parliament on February 10 last.

Two years ago the anti-patriotic, reactionary ruling circles of Japan mounted, under the direction of the U.S. imperialists, a far-reaching plot to sabotage the Constitution and do away with democracy in Japan. This plot envisaged a second Korean war in keeping with U.S. imperialist plans of aggression, and an open revival of Japanese militarism. This makes it all the clearer how greatly the independence and security of Japan and Japanese democracy are threatened by the existence on Japanese territory, contrary to the Constitution, of an American army controlling Japanese self-defense troops.

The onslaught of the U.S. and Japanese ruling circles on the democratic rights and living conditions of the Japanese people is growing stronger and stronger. In keeping with its intention to revise the Constitution in a reactionary spirit, the Sato government is carrying out reforms of the state machinery, the judiciary and local self-administration system, etc. An increasing effort is being made to revive militarist ideology and militarize education as is shown by the proposed revival of *Kigensetsu.

The anti-national, anti-popular policy of the Sato government makes the life of various sections of the Japanese people more and more unberable, and greatly jeopardizes the nation's economy. Hence the increased importance of the Japanese peoples' fight against the U.S. and Japanese reactionaries and the Sato government's policy of reviving militarism.

II

The present situation creates objective conditions which, being interconnected, favor the further development of the popular struggle and open a new stage of this struggle.

First among these conditions is that the enemy's anti-national, anti-popular policy induces more and more people to fight.

The U.S. imperialists' aggression in Indochina, the use of Japanese seaports by American atomic submarines, the stepping up of the Japan-South Korea talks, the exposed Operation Three Arrows, etc., all bring powerful protests from every section of the Japanese people.

The relentless onslaught on the living conditions of the people, the considerable increase in fees for social services and the attendant tremendous rise of the prices of consumer goods, the growing cost of medical service, the reactionary reform of the public health system, etc., lead to mounting discontent among large sections of the people, including supporters of the Liberal-

Democratic Party* and members and supporters of the Party of Democratic Socialism and *Komeito.

The struggle for vital demands is being joined in by people from different walks of life: workers suffering from low wages, dismissals, speed-up, and industrial accidents; peasants ruined through the import of American surplus products, the government's policy of "improving the structure of agriculture," and as a result of severe frosts, and forced to leave their farms in search of a job; small and middle businessmen, with whom the number of bankrupties has reached a postwar high; housewives vainly trying to make both ends meet; students protesting against the increase in tuition and entry fees; the unemployed and the sick.

Another objective condition is that popular unity is coming into existence in the struggle against the enemy onslaught.

The democratic forces tend increasingly towards unity and solidarity. Following the joint democratic actions in Yokosuka against the enry of American atomic submarines, an agreement was reached between two national organizations on unity of action in the port of Sasebo to keep U.S. atomic submarines off.

Seven youth organizations, among them the youth department of the general Trades Union Council (SOHYO), the Socialist Youth League and the Democratic Youth League, joined forces to "win the spring labor battles, frustrate the Japan-South Korea talks, prevent the reactionary revision of the Constitution," and so on.

Thirty-five organizations, including the Communist and Socialist parties and organizations for peace and international friendship, united in the Association for Assistance to and Solidarity with the People of South Vietnam.

The new movement for democratic unity is growing fast, with progressive-minded intellectuals cooperating. It has set up the Public Coordinating Committee against the reactionary revision of the Constitution, and the National Association for the Return of Okinawa and Ogasawara.

Closely connected with the spring labor battles are joint actions against a revision of the public health and mutual insurance systems. These actions are being launched throughout the country by many democratic organizations, first of all by the Communist and Socialist parties, the Party of Democratic Socialism, and SOHYO.

A third objective condition is the aggravation of contradictions in the enemy camp.

Japan's policy towards China has caused sharp differences even in the Sato government and the Liberal Democratic Party. Members of this party are also protesting against the increased cost of water in Tokyo. On the cost of medical treatment, the government has even been opposed by some organizations of monopoly capitalism. Even the bourgeois press has protested against U.S. air raids on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and against the secret plan of the National Defense Agency to establish a "wartime state system." The more fiercely the U.S.-Japanese reactionaries pursue their anti-national, anti-popular policy, the more the internal contradictions and antagonisms grow in their camp.

Komeito (literally, "party of clean politics") was founded in 1964 as the political organization of Soka Takkai, a religious society which has a membership of about 11 million.—Ed.

A fourth objective condition is the gains of the Communist Party of Japan, which is leading the struggle against the U.S.-Japanese reactionary forces, and enjoys growing support among the masses. Since its historic Ninth Congress the Party has been working to strengthen its unity. In line with the tasks stated in the Central Committee report to the Congress, it has been actively establishing a united front, organizing the struggle of the masses, and reinforcing its ranks.

III

The important thing at present is for all the democratic forces to counter the U.S.-Japanese reactionaries' policy of war and aggression, exploitation and plunder with explicit demands and a joint struggle for peace in Asia and all over the world, for the independence and security of Japan, in defense of the vital interests and democratic rights of the Japanese people.

The struggle of the Japanese people is gathering momentum. However, it is far from measuring up to the exigencies of the rapidly changing internal and international situation. The chief reason for this, as our Party has repeatedly pointed out, is that complete agreement at the center and in the provinces among the Communist Party, the Socialist Party, the trade unions and the democratic organizations is still lacking, agreement which would provide the basis for democratic unity.

Taking advantage of this, the U.S.-Japanese reactionaries are stepping up their offensive against the Japanese people. In the circumstances, democratic unity and solidarity are an urgent necessity.

Our Party calls on the democratic forces soberly to appraise the present grave situation, overcome all misunderstandings and difficulties, put aside controversial issues and speedily achieve unity of action on common tasks in the struggle against the anti-national, anti-popular policy of the U.S.-Japanese reactionaries.

Our Party calls on all the democratic forces to launch joint actions at the center and in the provinces, in industry, in towns and country.

Unity can be attained—there are no insuperable obstacles to it. If unity is not achieved now, this will be regretted for a long time to come.

Our Party gives priority to the pressing political tasks of the nation: fighting against the U.S. imperialist aggression in Indochina; frustrating the Japan-South Korea talks; keeping Japanese ports closed to U.S. atomic submarines; preventing a reactionary revision of the Constitution, the Operation Three Arrows, the revival of militarism, heavy taxes, high prices, low wages and worsening social security; bringing about the restoration of diplomatic relations with China, and the return of Okinawa and Ogasawara. It spares no effort to achieve unity of action of the Communist and Socialist parties and the trade unions.

At present, when a passive attitude to unity of action is still widespread among certain democratic forces, the effort of our Party and the vanguard contingents of the democratic forces for unity is of special importance. To establish unity, it is necessary to end passivity and act without delay, to set up united-action committees in various fields of the struggle and on separate problems, and to secure resumption of the activities of the National Council against the Japanese-American "security treaty."

Our Party and the foremost democratic forces should work among the masses and fight together with them, organizing their demands. They should also organize a mass discussion of the present serious situation and of the need for democratic unity. Not until the masses themselves demand unity will the National Council against the "security treaty" be able to resume nationwide activities.

The mass meeting to be held in Tokyo on February 15 on the initiative of our Party and the Democratic Youth League is to be the signal for mass united actions through the country.

We call on all those who want independence and democracy, peace and a neutral Japan, and happiness for the Japanese people to unite for the great political struggle against the U.S.-Japanese reactionaries' policy of war and aggression, against the aggression in Indo-China, against the Japan-South Korea talks and the use of Japanese ports by American atomic submarines, for the expulsion of the U.S. imperialists from Asia and Japan, against the revival of Japanese militarism.

SPEECH* BY WALDECK ROCHET

GENERAL SECRETARY OF THE FCP, AT CENTRAL COMMITTEE MEETING MARCH 31 - APRIL 1, 1965

In my contribution to the lively and fruitful debate on Gaston Plissonier's report I shall deal with the main political lessons of the municipal elections. Briefly they are as follows:

1. The Communist Party achieved considerable results and consolidated its positions. Communist-led municipal councils were returned with an increased majority. The Party won new councils, including those in Le Havre, Nimes, Alès and other big cities. Today it administers more cities with a population exceeding 30,000 than any other party. In the country as a whole, the electoral lists presented or supported by the CP generally poll large votes.

2. The electorate approved of the democratic unity lists presented as a result of agreements between Socialists, Communists and other republicans. On many occasions these lists, supported by a Communist or Socialist majority, came out on top. We scored our biggest success in Paris, where 38 candidates, among them 24 Communists, were returned in six electoral areas on democratic unity lists.

3. The UNR suffered considerable losses. In Paris, the first ballot brought it 100,000 votes less than in 1959. Many middle class or petty bourgeois voters who had supported de Gaulle in the previous elections turned away from the UNR and cast their votes for such old Right-wing parties as the Independents and the MRP.

The contradiction of the mass base of Gaullism, which we noted during the referendum and the elections to the Chamber of Deputies in October and November 1962, became more pronounced.

THE FCP IS MAKING HEADWAY

All this testifies to the growth of opposition to one-man rule, with the working class and the toiling masses of town and country forming the backbone of the opposition.

Our explanation of the success of our Party in the last elections is simple. This success was the result of good work by the Communist-led municipal councils, the Party's consistent policy of opposition to one-man rule, and, lastly, its persevering effort for the unity of action and for an alliance of all the democratic forces. For, besides campaigning for Communist majority lists, we contributed to the success of numerous unitary lists on which the Socialists were in the majority, as was the case in Lorient, Montauban and elsewhere, and of other Left lists, as, for instance, in Brive.

The unity tactics of our Central Committee were faithfully applied by the Party organizations in both rounds all over the country, Grenoble included.

ELECTORATE APPROVED OF AGREEMENTS ON UNITY

Our objective was clear; to defeat the candidates of the UNR and other reactionaries and ensure the victory of the alliance of the labor and Left forces needed for defeating the regime of one-man rule and establishing genuine democracy.

In the debate on the report some Central Committee members asked, with good reason, how far the agreements on unity between Socialists, Communists and other republicans had been approved by the electorate.

All the comrades replied that the democratic unity lists presented by the Communists and Socialists had won extensive approval of the Communist and Socialist voters wherever they had been constituted normally, with the consent of the local organizations of the Socialist Party (SFIO) and its representatives on the municipal councils.

In an effort to preserve the split, the bourgeois press is making much of the fact that in some cities, such as Amiens, Boulogne-Billancourt and Isy-les-Moulineaux, no Socialist-Communist lists were elected. But in these cities the Socialist organizations and Socialist councillors were strongly divided. Some of them agreed to run on joint lists with the Communists, while others, in particular mayors whose term had expired, rejected unity and joined the reactionary lists of the MRP and the Independents.

Such was the cause of the reverses. It follows that these examples are no proof of the people's unfavorable view of unity. They merely show that agreements between Socialists and reactionaries misled the working people and seriously injure Left unity and alliance. Had the Socialists, Communists and other republicans united throughout France against the UNR and other reactionaries, the results of the elections would have been much more favorable.

In any case, it is clear that not a single candidate of the Socialists and the Left forces in general, and perhaps even of the Communists, would have been elected in Paris without democratic unity lists. This also applies to the rest of the country.

That is why we consider that the chief lesson of the elections is that unity of action of Communists, Socialists and all other republicans without exception is the only way to end one-man rule and to establish a government of democratic unity firmly pursuing a policy of progress and peace.

ABOUT THOSE WHO ARE PREPARING A SUBSTITUTE FOR GAULLISM

Various sections of the bourgeoisie are fiercely resisting this development, either because they want to preserve one-man rule or because they want to replace it by another reactionary regime.

The point is that contradictions are visibly growing within the French bourgeoisie itself. The big monopolies have certainly not given up the regime of one-man rule, but it is evident that some sections of the big bourgeoisie are busy preparing what they call "post-Gaullism" to prop up the present regime or establish some new system serving their interests. As the situation changes the big bourgeoisie is compelled to change methods and even the system of government in order to remain in power.

That is why, in analyzing the fact that some of the Gaullist voters have in recent years joined up with the Independents and the MRP, we should take account of its contradictory aspects.

On the one hand, among the voters who in the recent elections said "Yes" to de Gaulle but withheld support of the UNR there are working people, in particular numerous members of the middle classes and the petty bourgeoisie who are justifiably discontented with the Gaullist policy and whom we should strive to win over for democracy.

On the other hand, the Independents and the MRP are reactionary parties which exploit the legitimate discontent of certain social groups hit by the policy of the monopolies to pave the way for "post-Gaullism" serving the interests of the big bourgeoisie.

That is why some bourgeois circles are even now trying to strengthen the Independents and the MRP, making them out to be "centrist" parties with which the Socialists could and should come to terms in order to prepare the substitute to Gaullism. This explains why such reactionary papers as l'Aurore and le Figaro violently attacked the joint Socialist-Communist lists while lavishing praise upon such Socialists as Defferre, who had chosen an alliance with the reactionaries.

This is indicative of the readiness of certain sections of the big bourgeoise to use Defferre's candidature for replacing Gaullism by another reactionary power serving capitalism. One of the conditions made is that Defferre should go farther to the right, to the point of more or less renouncing his own party.

This is bound to run into formidable difficulties, for while Defferre himself seems ready to try this gamble, many active Socialists are evidently against a general political agreement with the Right parties. For all activists, all Socialist workers, know as well as we do that the so-called "centrist" parties with which Defferre has decided to align himself are out-and-out reactionary parties.

WHAT "CENTRIST" POLICY MEANS

To bring clarity into this matter, we have only to recall, as Comrade Jacques Denis has done, the role these Right parties played in numerous governments between 1947 and 1958.

On the social plane, they always stoutly opposed the demands of the working people and invariably militated against secular education. They proved incapable of solving the Algerian problem. They waged the war for several years without ever trying peace talks. Eventually many members of the National Center of the Independents became ignominious supporters of the OAS.

Their foreign policy was notorious for complete subservience to the United States and, hence, resistance to an international detente, complicity in the cold war policy, and the sacrificing of French independence to the struggle against communism.

Finally, in 1958, they contributed in decisive measure to the establishment of the Gaullist regime, which they have supported on many occasions since then.

Of course, there can be no question of the working class and the democratic parties refusing to take advantage of the political contradictions between various groups of the French bourgeoisie. On the contrary, we consider that these contradictions should be used to the full in order to deliver telling blows to monopoly power and to end one-man rule as early as possible. However, they should be used in such a way as to lead to a new, genuinely democratic regime and not back to the past.

DRAW MORE AND MORE SECTIONS OF THE WORKING PEOPLE INTO THE STRUGGLE FOR DEMOCRACY

The way to achieve this great aim — abolishing one-man rule and establishing genuine democracy — is not to make the working class follow in the wake of this or that group of the bourgeoisie. The task is to promote unity of the working class with all democratic forces.

To justify their alliance with the Right parties, some Socialist leaders say that the Left votes are not enough to defeat the UNR and its allies.

During the municipal election campaign we showed that this argument is merely an excuse, for in many cities where the Socialist and Communist voters constituted the absolute majority the local Socialist leaders preferred, nevertheless, to align themselves with the Independents and the MRP rather than accept the Communist Party's proposal for unity.

On a national scale, however, it is true that the Left parties — Communist, Socialist and Radical — do not yet command a majority of votes.

Hence the imperative need for the democratic parties to do everything to win over for democracy increasingly large sections of the people, including the numerous working people and members of the middle classes still under the influence of Gaullism or the "centrist" parties.

However, this goal does not justify alliance either with the UNR or with other Right parties, and if the Left parties enter into this alliance they will betray their own cause and discredit themselves, much to the delight of the bourgeoisie and to the benefit of the reactionaries.

The only real solution is to form a broad alliance of the majority which would gradually unite, on a common platform, the working class, the working peasantry and the urban middle sections against the monopolies. This calls, above all, for increasing unity of action of Socialists and Communists and for an agreement between all the parties, workers' trade unions and democratic groups without exception.

THE COMMUNIST PARTY'S IMAGINARY RIGIDITY . . .

That is why the struggle for working-class unity and for an alliance of all the working people remains the main political task for us Communists. This unity and this alliance are all the more necessary since, despite the setback suffered by the UNR, one-man rule persists and has immense potentialities.

Unfortunately, the SFIO leaders' present orientation, expressed in numerous agreements with Right parties, does not promote Left unity, and an alliance of the progressive and democratic forces.

During the election campaign the editors of le Populaire, trying to justify these agreements with the reactionaries, claimed that unity with the Communist Party was hard to achieve because the CP had presented excessive demands and had even abandoned, to a certain degree, the flexible tactics it had applied in the previous elections.

This assertion is completely unfounded. All Communists know full well that in the cantonal elections of 1964 Communist tactics was determined by the same goal — to defeat the UNR and reaction.

We advanced no other special demands, except that unitary lists be drawn up with due regard to the influence of the political groups making up the alliance.

In reality, the difficulties that have arisen between Socialists and Communists are due above all to the implementation of the decision of the SFIO National Council widely recommending alliances with the Independents and the MRP.

. . . AND SFIO'S SHIFT TO THE RIGHT

It is the SFIO's shift to the right and not the imaginary inflexibility of the Communist Party that is responsible for the present difficulties. Whether they like it or not, there is a shift to the right, expressed both in documents adopted by various SFIO bodies on different occasions and in practical steps during the municipal elections.

The resolution on the political orientation adopted by the 54th Congress of the Socialist Party in June 1963 said: "The coalition of all Left democrats will be a very important political factor. But it may fail to muster a majority strong enough to support a government. With the present alignment of electoral forces in France, the democratic Left may — unless they secure the support of the Communist masses — prove incapable of carrying out their program and so play into the hands of the Rights in whatever form — classical or fascist — they may present themselves."

In contrast to this, the resolution which the SFIO National Committee passed last December made no mention of the need for a Communist-supported coalition of the democratic Left forces to combat all the Rights.

True, the resolution of 1964 still admitted of the possibility of certain agreements with the Communists if they are absolutely necessary to defeat the UNR, and we noted this as a positive fact. But the new and by no means positive development is that the same resolution openly recommends electoral alliances with such Right parties as the Independents and the MRP. It is no longer a struggle against all the Rights in their classical or fascist form, but an alliance with a considerable section of the reactionaries, described as "centrist" for the occasion.

★ ★ ★

In order to justify the shift to the right, Gérard Jaquet explained in le Populaire that the agreements concluded during the municipal elections were temporary and were not to be followed by a general political agreement either with the Right parties or the Communists.

We readily admit that there is a difference between temporary electoral agreements and general political agreements. But we are entitled to ask whether or not the electoral agreements with the Right parties are to lay the groundwork for a future general political agreement with the MPR and the Independents.

Gérard Jaquet and Claude Fuzier write in le Populaire that after the elections an effort should be made towards political clarification. That is correct. But they advance the idea of a "confederation" or "federation" of the Left non-Communist, so-called "Left democratic" forces.

We see nothing wrong about the contemplated Left non-Communist alliance, but we say that it will be too weak to defeat the Gaullist regime and the other reactionary forces. In fact, this alliance, if it materializes, will represent 20 to 25 per cent of the electorate at most.

Therefore, a solution to the problem should be sought, not in establishing a Left non-Communist alliance, but in reaching agreement, on a common platform, between all the democratic parties, organizations and groups without exception.

It is to be regretted that the Socialist leaders reject this general agreement, for it alone paves the way for success in the struggle against one-man rule, for genuine democracy.

CONCERNING DEFFERRE'S CANDIDATURE

It is a very alarming fact that by supporting Defferre as a presidential candidate the Socialists have already set course for a political alliance with the Rights.

When Defferre allied himself in Marseille with the National Center of the Independents and the MRP, rejecting all Communist proposals for unity, he thereby made an absolutely clear political choice. Moreover, in the second round of the voting, he received the official support of the national leaders of the UNR, and this shows him up even more clearly.

That is why the support of Defferre's candidature by the Socialist Party presents a growing obstacle to an alliance of the Left forces, of the republicans.

Not long ago a group of Left writers, lecturers and artists called upon all the democratic parties and organizations to agree on a common candidate.

The Communist Party has always favored such an agreement. Since December 1963 we have repeatedly declared our explicit desire that all the democratic parties, Socialist and Communist in the first place, should reach agreement on a common program of action to oppose the candidate of the regime of one-man rule with a candidate of the alliance of all the democratic forces.

On the other hand, we have warned, and do so now, that if our proposals concerning the program and political objectives continue to be rejected, the Communist Party will nominate its own candidate and urge all the working people and all the republicans to come out massively for its policy of unity and alliance.

WE SHALL FIGHT ON FOR UNITY

We intend to fight on for unity, now and in the future, after the presidential elections. To us, the presidential elections are merely an episode, a stage in our general battle for democratic renovation, while the reasons for which the Communists, Socialists and other democrats should unite are of a fundamental and durable nature.

No one denies that there are disagreements between the Socialist and the Communist parties. Indeed, had they not existed, we would be in one party today. But we do not think that these disagreements are of a character ruling out Socialist-Communist unity in the struggle against one-man rule, for social progress and peace and, eventually, for socialism.

For more than two years, Communists and Socialists have been taking numerous parallel or joint actions to uphold the economic and social demands of the working people, to advocate secular education, to safeguard the freedom of local self-government, to resist the "strike force," to promote peace and achieve an arms reduction. We believe these joint actions and numerous agreements on unity in municipal elections have drawn Socialist and Communist working people closer together, and this is the important thing. We urge our organizations and our activists to do everything to preserve and strengthen these bonds of amity.

The obstacles to unity being raised by some leaders like Defferre show that long and persevering work is needed to establish unity. Unity does not come by itself, spontaneously, for the bourgeoisie has a vital interest in preserving the split and therefore uses every means to maintain confusion and prejudice among the working people and thereby to stem progress to unity.

This is why the Party organizations, above all the local ones, should step up the struggle for unity and draw into joint actions not only the mass of the Socialist working people, but also working Christians and non-party people. For they all have the same interests and equally strive for progress, peace and freedom.

With this aim in view, we should intensify our propaganda among the masses and make it more convincing. This calls for increasing the distribution of l'Humanité and the publication of numerous newspapers by the Party cells, especially at factories.

THE NEED TO FIGHT FOR ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL DEMANDS . . .

As Comrade Plissonier's report quite correctly stressed it is, above all, in struggle that unity of action is achieved and strengthened. It is in joint actions that working people of different convictions come to know and appraise one another, to realize that unity in all battles — both for immediate demands and for political changes — is essential for victory.

Party organizations should therefore pay greater attention to the defense of the economic and social demands of the working class, the urban middle sections and the working peasantry. The struggle for economic and social demands is all the more important since the still existing Gaullist regime continues its reactionary policy of subservience to the monopolies.

That is why our Party, which does not dissociate the interests of the working people from those of the nation as a whole, will go on actively supporting every action for social demands, in particular for full employment, a general increase in wages and pensions, shorter hours without pay cuts, bigger family allowances, a lower age limit for pensioners, an end to the rise in rent, and respect for the right to strike and for trade union freedoms.

. . . AND FOR PEACE

Lastly, the struggle for peace remains a prime task for us Communists, all the more pressing since the American aggression against the Vietnamese people increasingly endangers world peace.

We side wholeheartedly with the Vietnamese people, who are fighting for freedom and independence, and we shall step up the fight for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from South Vietnam and the implementation of the Geneva agreements of 1954.

Foreign policy problems are polarizing the political forces in France more and more.

The position of our Party is clear. The resolution of our 17th Congress calls for an active policy of peace which would help disengage France from military pacts and make possible a genuinely national policy within the framework of peaceful coexistence.

We consider that in the present international situation it is not in the interest of France to sacrifice its national independence to membership in one military bloc in order to fight another military bloc — contrary to what the supporters of European integration under U.S. leadership claim.

That is why we are fighting to ensure that France sets out to ease international tension, advocates the settlement of international tension, advocates the settlement of international conflicts through negotiation, opposes all "national," "multilateral," "Atlantic" or "European" strike forces, contributes to the solution of the German problem through negotiation in the interest of European security and, lastly, advances disarmament proposals.

We must launch an extensive ideological and political campaign to bring this policy of peace and national independence home to our people and to win their support for it.

STEADILY IMPROVE PARTY WORK IN EVERY FIELD

Party organizations and all Communists working in mass organizations and movements should step up their activity whether they are fighting for economic demands, for democratic freedoms, or for peace.

Our Party can and must fulfil these tasks, for it has emerged from the recent battles stronger than before.

Our Party will rally around its Central Committee more closely than ever and continue its advance, steadfastly implementing the line set by the 17th Congress, that is, fighting on two fronts — against sectarianism and dogmatism, and against opportunism. This is not to say, of course, that we are free from shortcomings, that everything is perfect in our work. We must remove our shortcomings and continuously improve Party work in various fields.

We know that the struggle against one-man rule and reaction is not over and that new great political battles lie ahead. But the loss of positions by the UNR and the first results achieved in the struggle for closer unity hold a promise of political changes.

Our Party will score further successes in the struggle against one-man rule, for social progress, for democracy and peace as it vigorously fights in the spirit of the 17th Congress for greater unity of the working class and all the democratic forces.

RESOLUTIONS* OF THE CC, FCP

1. THE CONSULTATIVE MEETING OF COMMUNIST AND WORKERS' PARTIES IN MOSCOW

The Central Committee of the French Communist Party, at a meeting in Saint-Denis on March 31 and April 1, heard the information report of Comrade Raymond Guyot, member of the Political Bureau, on the work of the Consultative Meeting of 19

*L'Humanité, April 1 and 2, 1965.

Communist and Workers' parties held in Moscow from March 1-5. It approved the activity of the FCP delegation to the Meeting.

The Central Committee is gratified that the Consultative Meeting achieved its aims—to search, in a fraternal and constructive spirit, for the best means of strengthening the cohesion of the world Communist and working-class movement in the fight against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism, for the national independence of the peoples, for peaceful coexistence and peace, for democracy and socialism.

The Consultative Meeting stated in its unanimously adopted final Communique that consolidation of the positions of socialism, upsurge of the national-liberation and working-class movements and growth of the forces fighting for the preservation and consolidation of peace is the dominant trend in present-day world development. At the same time world reaction, primarily U.S. imperialism, is becoming more and more active in various parts of the world, seeking to aggravate the situation and committing acts of aggression against socialist countries, countries that have freed themselves from colonialism, and the revolutionary movement of the peoples.

The Central Committee fully approves of the main idea of the Communique, namely, that in the present situation effective unity of the world Communist movement, the basis of all the progressive forces of our time, is more necessary than ever before.

The divergences in the world Communist movement are weakening this unity and hence injuring the cause of peace, national liberation and communism. The Meeting therefore urged all the fraternal parties to display a still higher sense of internationalist responsibility and spare no effort in joint actions to defeat the common enemy, imperialism.

Thus the Moscow Consultative Meeting vividly demonstrated the active solidarity of the participating parties with the heroic people of Vietnam, with the Party of Working People of Vietnam. It called for greater international solidarity in the face of the U.S. imperialist aggression. The French Communist Party will intensify its struggle for the freedom of the Vietnamese people and all the peoples suffering from imperialism and colonialism. As the U.S. aggressors are expanding their barbarous actions in Vietnam and creating a grave danger of world war, all those who cherish peace and the future of mankind have a vital task to fulfil in common.

The divergences existing in the world Communist movement should not be an obstacle to joint actions of all the fraternal parties against imperialism. On the contrary, such actions will help create favorable conditions for overcoming these divergences.

The FCP has lately undertaken a number of political and practical measures in this respect to promote its fraternal relations and active cooperation with all the fraternal parties. It will continue its vigorous effort aimed at furthering the joint struggle of our parties in behalf of the masses, of the peoples. It is in this spirit that the FCP has proposed to the Communist parties of the European capitalist countries holding a conference to discuss certain common problems and tasks. The FCP believes that the conference agenda could include questions of the struggle against a multilateral nuclear force and for European security, for peace in Vietnam and for solidarity with the Vietnamese people, for solidarity with the Spanish people.

Along with the parties represented at the Moscow Meeting, the FCP declares for discontinuing open polemics of a nature inimical and offensive to fraternal parties, and for strict observance of the standards of inter-party relations unanimously laid down by the conferences of 1957 and 1960, standards which, among other things, prohibit factionalist activities and interference by any one party in the internal affairs of other parties.

The FCP unreservedly shares the opinion that a new international conference of the parties would fully meet the interests of the world Communist and working-class movement. A world conference, prepared collectively and held on the principle of equality of all the parties, would make it possible to determine in common the general orientation of the entire movment with due regard to the important changes in favor of the forces of peace, national liberation and socialism that have taken place in the international situation since the last conference. It would help strengthen, on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism and the general line determined in the 1951 Declaration and 1960 Statement, the cohesion of the world Communist and working-class movement and thus increase its militancy.

Consequently, the FCP supports the propositions of the Meeting of the 19 fraternal parties regarding the active and careful preparation, on a broad collective basis, of such a conference and, in particular, of a preliminary consultative meeting of the 81 parties that took part in the world conference of 1960.

Conscious of its internationalist duty, the French Communist Party will steadfastly contribute to the attainment of the objectives proposed to all the fraternal parties by the Moscow Consultative Meeting with a view to strengthening Communist unity on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, in keeping with the vital interests and historical aims of the working class.

Saint-Denis, April 1, 1965.

2. RESULTS OF THE MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS AND THE PARTY'S WORK TO ESTABLISH A UNITED FRONT

The Central Committee approves the report of Comrade Gaston Plissonier on the lessons of the municipal elections and on the development of the Party's work to establish a united front.

The results of the municipal elections are of great political significance. They reflect the attitude of the French people to the challenging problems of today and to government policy.

The interest which millions of voters took in questions of national significance is a highly positive aspect of the elections.

The results of the elections show above all a decline in the influence of the government and a reverse for the UNR, despite the active participation of its ministers and deputies in the election campaign, despite Pompidou's open intervention in favor of the government's candidates, despite the constant allusions to patronage on the part of de Gaulle himself. The failure of the UNR was particularly evident in the big cities. In Paris, 16 Gaullist deputies and one minister were blackballed and the UNR lost 153,000 votes, polling 10 per cent less votes than in the 1962 elections.

The loss of ground by the UNR indicates that the working class is dissatisfied with the capitalist monopolies' policy pursued by the regime of one-man rule. The peasants are also hostile to this policy; large sections of the urban middle classes and the petty bourgeoisie have expressed similar sentiments.

The consolidation of the positions of the French Communist Party and the success of its lists and of the joint democratic lists in which the Party took part were another feature of the elections.

The Communist Party has retained, with considerable gains, the leadership of the municipal councils of all the big cities which it headed before. It has won the leadership of eight new councils in communes whose population totals more than 30,000. Its lists have won in numerous small and medium communes, and thousands of Communist deputies have been elected to municipal councils.

The agreements on Socialist-Communist unity, which led to the presentation of joint lists, had the approval of the electorate.

In Paris the joint lists polled more than six per cent more votes than the total polled by the democratic parties in 1962. The UNR attempt to secure a majority in the municipal council was defeated, and joint democratic lists won in 9 out of the 20 electoral areas.

Joint lists defeated the UNR and other reactionary parties in several large suburbs of Paris.

A new development is that part of the electorate, faced with the choice between the lists of Gaullists and those that included Gaullist delegates or were even supported by the UNR, on the one hand, and joint democratic lists, on the other, refused to support the candidates nominated or supported by the government, and approved the joint lists of the democratic forces.

This fact shows that it is possible and necessary to win over for democracy those voters who were misled by UNR demagogy and who cannot be regarded as reactionary—any more than voters misled by the other Right parties.

The elections have delivered a further blow to one-man rule. They mark progress towards working-class unity and the alliance of all democrats. They have created better conditions for putting an end to the present policy and advancing towards genuine democracy.

★ ★ ★

To demonstrate their disapproval of de Gaulle's policy, part of the electorate chose to vote for the lists of other reactionary parties. This was a result of the regrettable attitude taken by the Socialist Party, which on many occasions persisted in allying itself with those parties, occasionally at the cost of weakening its positions in the municipal councils, as was the case in Marseille. The reverse suffered by the Gaullist party compels some ruling groups of the bourgeoisie to contemplate the replacement of the present power by another reactionary power within the framework of the system established after 1958. These political forces, which have already done so much harm to the country and led to the setting up of one-man rule, are trying to canalize to this end the discontent of of the French, who have had enough of the anti-social and anti-democratic policy of the de Gaulle government.

The question is whether the struggle against one-man rule will result in a succession of reactionary regimes, or whether it will have a democratic outcome. The aim is to end the reactionary power of the monopolies and replace it by genuine democracy. This should not be sought by trying to make the working class follow in the wake of this or that group of the capitalist bourgeoisie.

On the contrary, it is necessary to work for a broad alliance of the majority of the progressive, democratic and national forces, and this calls, first of all, for broader unity of actions of the Communists, Socialists and other republicans.

That is why the French Communist Party reaffirms that only agreement between the democratic parties, organizations and groups on the basis of a common program to be carried out jointly can pave the way for the necessary democratic changes.

This outlook determines its attitude to the forthcoming presidential elections. As the 17th Congress of the Party stated, "it is a matter of not only replacing one man by another, but of opposing the candidate of the regime of one-man rule with a jointly nominated candidate truly representing the movement of the masses and the alliance of all the democratic parties and organizations without exception, with the aim of establishing a new democracy."

The anti-Communist character of Defferre's election campaign in Marseille, the blocs that were formed, and the open support of the UNR are, unfortunately, indicative of this presidential candidate's orientation on alliance that would even include the Pinay group, an orientation based on the anti-democratic Constitution of de Gaulle.

The FCP reaffirms its support of a common candidate with a common program; it will continue to work towards this solution. If this solution proves impossible despite its successes, the FCP will nominate its own candidate.

The municipal elections signify a victory for FCP policy. They corroborated the decisions of its 17th Congress. By ensuring success for the lists presented or supported by the Communist Party, the voters expressed their approval of:

—the party which keeps its promises and whose deputies in the municipal councils work in the interests of the population despite the obstacles put up by the regime;

—the staunch opposition the Communists have been offering to one-man rule since its very inception, and the democratic perspective proposed by them;

—defense of the interests of the working people and their families, of democracy and peace;

—the clarity, fairness, and fervent spirit of unity which distinguish the policy of the FCP.

It follows that the task of the Party members and organizations is boldly and energetically to implement the policy of the 17th Congress, with due regard to the progress made. Extending the united front to include every democrat, and above all Socialist-Communist unity of action, are essential for further progress in the struggle against one-man rule. The success of unity depends on the following two main factors:

1. Propaganda work by Party organizations to ensure a better understanding of the policy proposed by the Communists. The success in the elections should in the nearest future be followed up with numerous public meetings organized by Party cells and sections, and simultaneously with energetic efforts to carry out the decisions of the Party national conference on l'Humanité and the press. The impact and successes of the Party's ideas and actions should also help win thousands of new members, especially before April 28, the closing day of the Maurice Thorez enrolment campaign coinciding with the 65th anniversary of the birth of our outstanding leader, whose death we mourn.

2. Intensified joint actions by all the social strata suffering from the policy of the capitalist monopolies. At the present stage these actions can and should develop:

—in defense of all the demands of the working people—higher wages, full employment, shorter hours—as well as in defense of a democratic fiscal system, a social policy on housing problems, and other vital social and democratic demands supported not only by the democratic parties, trade unions and organizations, but also by organizations representing the most diverse social strata;

—in defense of world peace, above all with the aim of ending the U.S. imperialist aggression in Vietnam, for general, simultaneous and controlled disarmament, for a foreign policy favoring France's disengagement from military pacts, and for a genuinely national policy within the framework of peaceful coexistence.

Recent months have seen further progress in building unity of all democratic forces to win genuine democracy. Further steps have been taken towards Socialist-Communist unity. The results of the municipal elections show that there is no other way of removing the present power and establishing a democratic regime.

Saint-Denis, April 1, 1965.

3. THE SITUATION IN VIETNAM AND SOUTHEAST ASIA

The situation in Vietnam and Southeast Asia is deteriorating from day to day. The U.S. leaders are waging a real war against the people of South Vietnam, a terrible war in which they do not stop at using toxic gases, bombing schools and destroying civilians. At the same time they are committing increasingly grave acts of aggression against the DRV. It is a flagrant encroachment on the rights of the peoples, an open violation of the Geneva agreements of 1954, which guarantee the independence of Vietnam and categorically prohibit the setting up of military bases and the presence of foreign troops on its territory. Furthermore, the U.S. imperialists' tactics of escalation gravely imperil peace and threaten to plunge the world into a nuclear conflict overnight.

The French Communist Party reaffirms its complete solidarity with the Vietnamese people fighting for their freedom and independence. It calls upon all working people, all democrats and patriots to step up the struggle for an end to the U.S. military interference in the affairs of South Vietnam and to acts of aggression against the DRV, for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops, and for the right of the South-Vietnamese people freely to shape their destiny.

Powerful demonstrations of peace fighters, young people and women have already been held in different forms, with Communists taking an active part.

The French Communist Party vigorously supports the Peace Movement's initiative of making April 6 a national day of struggle for peace in Vietnam. The Communists will take measures to organize powerful united actions in the most varied forms, including demonstrations, marches, and deputations to the U.S. Embassy and consulates.

Let the will of the French people to preserve peace and ensure the Vietnamese people's right to self-determination be expressed more and more emphatically from day to day, particularly on April 6.

Saint-Denis, March 3, 1965.

4. APPEAL FOR THE FOUNDING OF THE MAURICE THOREZ INSTITUTE

On October 9, 1964, the Central Committee of the French Communist Party adopted a decision on the founding of the Maurice Thorez Institute in Paris.

The Institute is to perpetuate the tremendous theoretical and practical contribution of the Chairman of the French Communist Party, an outstanding fighter of the world Communist movement.

As a center of intellectual activity, the institute is to help researchers and politicians better to appreciate the life and work of a man who witnessed and took part in the greatest events of our epoch.

No one has done more than Maurice Thorez for the development in France of Marxism-Leninism, this humanism of our time, for the building of a genuine working-class party, a party fully devoting itself to the service of the people and the nation.

Maurice Thorez's works dealing with democracy, the ways of transition to socialism, the possibility of averting war in our time, the united front of the working class and the alliance of the democratic forces are a model of theory closely combined with political practice. They are a classical contribution to the theory of scientific communism. Their influence has been and remains decisive for the development of public life in our country.

Maurice Thorez has the credit for wresting the revolutionary and democratic legacy of France from the bourgeoisie, which disgraced and abandoned it. He will for ever remain the best fighter for the unity of the French nation and the greatness of our people and a defender of their culture.

His teachings on proletarian internationalism, the struggle against all forms of colonialism, and the right of nations to self-determination are part of our history and light up the way to our future. The same is true of his view of the world, which he described as marching to socialism owing to the victory of the Great October Revolution.

Collected and classified at the Maurice Thorez Institute, the documents, study materials and manuscripts which served as the basis for his creative activity and are intimately connected with his works will be placed at the disposal of researchers and activists. Together with the works of Marx, Engels and Lenin and all other works devoted to the working-class and democratic movements, they will help educate thousands of new fighters for socialism and peace.

In this way, the education of the entire younger generation striving steadily to advance their culture in the interest of the great cause of social renovation will be made easier.

This work will involve considerable expenditures. To be able to build and equip the institute, we must have 100 million old francs by April 28, the day when we shall be commemorating the 65th anniversary of the birth of Maurice Thorez.

We appeal to the hearts and minds of all progressives. We call upon them to contribute to the Maurice Thorez Fund and enthusiastically to advocate this Fund in order to promote the great battle for peace, democracy, and socialism, which brings freedom.

ON THE DEMOCRATIZATION OF THE COUNTRY AND THE TASKS OF THE CPG

RESOLUTION OF THE EIGHTH MEETING OF THE CC, CP OF GREECE

I

The situation in the country remains tense. It is characterized by an aggravation of the antagonism between the broad masses and the democratic forces ever more insistently demanding through democratization of the entire life of the country, on the one hand, and the plutocratic oligarchy and the forces of internal and external reaction, which are stubbornly striving not only to retard the process of democratization but also to halt it altogether and restore in one or another form the previous state of affairs, on the other.

The mass movement, whose growth largely determines the trend of developments, was decisive in both foiling the plans of the internal and external Right-wing forces and taking some steps towards democracy.

The united mass struggle headed by the Communists has resulted in the partial satisfaction, despite frantic resistance on the part of the monopolies and the government, of some economic demands of the working people and the solution of certain problems facing the country. The democratic forces have strengthened their positions in the trade unions, in local government, in the cooperatives and other mass organizations. The militancy born of the popular struggle has been preserved and strengthened. The reactionaries did not dare to carry out their sinister putschist plans, which were exposed in good time by the CPG and EDA (United Democratic Left Party). The court, the plutocratic oligarchy and the foreign imperialists were prevented from setting up a Center-Right government and bringing about a deal between the Center Union and ERE (National Radical Union).

The mass struggle of the Greek people, along with the heroic struggle of the Cypriots and the firm support of the Soviet Union and the other peace-loving countries, helped in large measure to prevent the imperialists and the domestic reactionaries from settling the Cyprus question in the interests of NATO.

II

The main force opposing the slightest step towards fuller democracy is the ERE, spokesman and obedient tool of the foreign monopolies and the local plutocratic oligarchy, the most reactionary, neo-fascist force in our country.

Steadily losing ground among the people, the ERE has launched, with the encouragement of the government and the full support of foreigners and the oligarchy, an offensive against the democratic forces and the gains of the people. It is engineering plots against peace and tranquility in the country. The task of the democratic movement, of all those who want tranquility and democratic order, is to expose and repulse the neo-fascist plans and aspirations of the ERE, win over those sections of the people still under its influence, neutralize the forces on which it relies, and foil its attempts to take advantage for its own neo-fascist purposes of the popular discontent at the failure to satisfy the vital demands of the people. The Communists, all democrats and patriots should counter the offensive of the ERE by rallying their forces, intensifying the struggle for democracy, exposing the crimes, treachery and corruption of the ERE, repelling its provocations and resolutely opposing in united mass struggle any attempt on its part to intimidate the people and impose a putschist solution on them. Acting in common, the democratic forces will frustrate the plans of the plutocratic oligarchy, the court and the foreigners, backed by the Right in the Union Center, to set up a Center-Right government as the first step towards restoring the power of the ERE and embarking on an anti-popular and anti-national policy.

III

The inconsistent policy of the Center Union government, its vacillations, retreats and concessions in the face of the fierce offensive of the Right forces add to the painfulness of the democratization process. The government's approach to the solution of the main problems facing the country, despite some positive features, do not meet the real needs of the country and the aspirations of the people and fall far short of the pre-election promises.

The issue of democracy remains most acute. The CPG appreciates the government's action in publishing of documents pertaining to the plan (exposed by the Left forces at the time) on the basis of which the then ERE government effected the 1961 coup in the guise of elections. The chief conclusion from this is that the democratic forces should unite to prevent the ERE from repeating such crimes. Hence the increasing urgency of the issue of democracy. For key offices are still held by people loyal to the Right forces; the emergency legislation of the civil-war period has not been abolished; people convicted for political reasons remain in prison; "loyalty" certificates remain in force; thousands of citizens are deprived of political rights; political emigres are not allowed to return; the National Resistance Movement is denied recognition and persecuted. Thus, the Center Union government's steps towards democratization have been very modest. It has made dangerous concessions — as, for instance, on the question of the leadership of the General Confederation of Labor, and has resorted in some cases to such undemocratic measures as the requisitioning of strikers and use of violence against them, or the banning of mass meetings.

As regards the problem of Cyprus, a serious national problem and one that agitates the entire people, the government has offered some resistance to the pressure of the imperialists and the reactionary Right forces, which in company with the Rights in the Center Union leadership, are stubbornly pressing for a new Zurich. But basically the government has not dissociated itself from the NATO policy which is responsible for the tragedy of Cyprus; it has failed to use the tremendous opportunities afforded by the support of the Soviet Union and the other socialist states as well as non-aligned countries, for solving the Cyprus problem in an anti-imperialist, peaceful way, in the interests of the Cypriots, in the interests of peace and the security of the peoples.

In its foreign policy the Center Union government, despite some steps such as the restoration of relations with the People's Republic of Bulgaria and the signing of agreements with it, or the visit to the Federal Socialist Republic of Yugoslavia, has not fully freed itself from the fetters of imperialism. It has not embarked on an independent Greek foreign policy. Its policy continues to be determined by the interests of NATO. It has consented to the establishment of a NATO missile center in Crete and of the multilateral nuclear force; it countenances either overtly or covertly, the imperialist crimes in the Congo and South Vietnam.

In the economic sphere, the Center Union government has done little or nothing to solve the acute problems plaguing the working people. Nor has it tackled general economic problems. Some of its actions (acceptance of worse terms for the agreement with ESSO-Papas*, recognition of Greece's old foreign debt, agreements on new state foreign loans on onerous terms, etc.) increase the country's dependence on foreign monopolies. The state budget does not meet the needs of the people and the interests of the national economy. It aggravates the unbearable burden of military expenditures and taxes on the working people and does not essentially promote national economic development. The government restricts the role of the state in capital construction by resorting to foreign loans and making industrialization and economic development dependent on the "good will" of private capital and primarily of foreign monopolies, which are only interested in extorting super-profits and in the economic enslavement of Greece. The economic policy of the Center Union government is being more and more adapted to the demands and interests of foreign and local monopolies, which intensify the exploitation of the working people and the plunder of the nation's wealth. The government's insistence on association with the European Common Market has evoked the resistance not only of the working people and the middle strata, but also of the business circles, which have begun to demand a postponement of a step fraught with dire consequences for Greek economy.

IV

The period since the Seventh CC meeting has witnessed major actions of all social strata and classes headed by the working class for economic and social demands, against the neo-fascist campaign, for peace, against the imperialist interference of the Americans and NATO in the affairs of Cyprus and in the internal affairs of our country.

The chief lesson learned by the factory and office workers, peasants and other social groups is that the government's concessions and the satisfaction of some of their demands were primarily the result of their actions and struggle.

The past year has borne out the correctness and vital importance of "The Program of Struggle for the Restoration and Extension of Democracy, for the Economic and Social Progress of the Country." This program should guide our activities today as well, serving as the basis on which we can and must rally the masses, all the democratic and patriotic forces. The struggle for the realization of this program is a component of the struggle for the program of national-democratic reforms. Progress in implementing the democratization program as a result of the struggle of the people will create the prerequisites for effecting national-democratic reforms.

At present emphasis should be laid on the struggle for the following basic demands:

a) Removal of fascist elements from the state apparatus and disbandment of the terroristic detachments in the countryside (TEA), the reactionary officers' organization IDEA, the Central Information Service (KIP) and all semi-government organizations. Immediate abolition of all emergency and anti-democratic measures; restoration of trade union and democratic freedoms; release of political prisoners; repatriation of political emigres; general amnesty. Introduction of a proportionate electoral system.

Legalization of the Communist Party, which is a pressing problem, will be of decisive importance for normalizing life in the country.

The demand for a legal CPG will be realized if it is taken up by the masses, by a broad and vigorous mass movement accompanied by extensive ideological and explanatory work. The CC meeting again brings the question of legalization of the CPG, raised in the CC letter of April 25, 1964, before the government, the parliament and the political parties and calls upon the people to fight for it.

The meeting extends warm greetings to the fighters still held in jail by the Center Union government despite their innocence, and urges the people to demand their immediate release.

The meeting notes the great importance of the international support given to this struggle of the Greek people.

b) Satisfaction of the urgent and vital economic and social demands of all the working people. Reduction of military expenditures. A resolute and consistent policy of industrialization. Immediate postponement of the abolition of customs tariffs and rejection of any association with the Common Market. Revision or annulment of shackling agreements with foreign capitalists. Extenion of trade with the socialist countries to provide the country with means of production.

c) All-round support of the struggle of the fraternal Cypriot people for complete independence, territorial integrity, liquidation of foreign military bases, demilitarization of Cyprus, the right to self-determination, and the affirmation of the rights of the Turkish minority. The CPG exposes and denounces the machinations and interference of the imperialists, who, speculating on the natural desire of the Cypriot people to cast off the shackles of imperialism and re-unite with Greece, are trying, under the cover of "enosis," to push through a solution of the Cyprus problem which would accord with their imperialist interests in the East Mediterranean. Refusal to take part in the NATO multilateral nuclear force. Denunciation of the imperialist interference and provocations in Indochina, the Congo and elsewhere, and support of the national-liberation struggle of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

The CPG notes once again that today more than ever before it is in the national interests of Greece to withdraw from NATO and to pursue a genuinely independent national policy, a policy of neutrality, a policy of friendship and cooperation with all countries.

To ensure the satisfaction of these demands, which conform to the aspirations of the entire people and to the genuine interests of the country, it is necessary to intensify the popular movement, improve its organization and leadership, employ all forms of struggle, for partial demands to national struggle on major issues, and constantly to promote the unity of action of the democratic forces.

Of utmost importance is the powerful unity of the trade union movement, tireless work by Communists among factory and office workers aimed at overcoming the shortcomings in this movement and helping it to win in 1965 new victories in the struggle for the economic demands of the working people, for the democratization of their organizations and creating the conditions for convening a unity congress of the General Confederation of Labor conducted on a truly democratic basis.

At the same time the movement of the peasants, middle strata and intelligentsia, should be broadened and the works of the Communists in their mass organizations should be improved.

An important role in the struggle of the people for democracy and social progress is played by the democratic youth movement. Efforts should be continued to develop the mass movement of the younger generation, which is on the upgrade already, and to repulse the reactionaries' offensive against that movement.

It is also important to promote the women's democratic movement, to organize the women's struggle for their demands, for peace and democracy.

The movement for peace should become a well-organized mass movement.

Parliamentary activities and struggle, if combined with the mass popular movement, can make an important contribution to the struggle for democratization and for broader democratic unity.

V

Putting forward the program of struggle for democratization, the CPG organizes the struggle of the people for the fulfilment of the promises made by the government, for the satisfaction of their demands and the solution of national problems, for genuine democracy in all spheres of public life. It supports any step of the Center Union government benefiting the people and the country, its every action against the Rights and their anti-democratic and neo-fascist aspirations. At the same time the CPG deplores, denounces and opposes all government actions running counter to the interests of the people, and as well as its policy of "fighting on two fronts" which hampers the struggle for democracy and for the unity of the popular and democratic forces and serves the interests of the Rights.

There exist forces today capable of preventing a neo-fascist comeback in any form and ensuring a democratic approach and the solution of the problems facing the people and the country. They are the forces which fought and overthrew the hated police regime of the ERE and which comprise the overwhelming majority of the people. Abnormal putschist solutions are rejected also by those sections of the people who follow the Rights. The forces of democracy are superior to the forces of neo-fascism and they can, given organization, unity, cooperation and coordinated actions, frustrate the neo-fascist plans of the Rights, isolate the Right elements in the Center Union government, and secure a turn in the government's policy towards greater democracy. The CPG considers that this calls for a policy of broad alliances which, as was shown by the municipal elections and the parliament's decision to bring to trial Karamanlis and his accomplices, is feasible.

In the course of this struggle our Party will convince the masses that resolute democratization can be ensured by a government which, relying on all the democratic forces in and outside parliament, will embark on a genuinely democratic program. This will demand the broadest possible democratic cooperation and unity and persistent effort to overcome the psychosis and prejudices stubbornly cultivated by the reactionaries, and to eliminate the pernicious influence of anti-communism in all its forms.

The present situation calls for redoubled efforts to remove the shortcomings and mistakes in the organization and guidance of mass actions, and in our tactics. The most serious of these shortcomings are:

The "Program of Struggle for the Restoration and Extension of Democracy, for the Economic and Social Progress of the Country" worked out by the CC CPG and published on February 28, 1964, is not in the center of attention of Communists and has not won sufficient mass support. The principle of combining the immediate partial demands of the working people with general democratic and national demands has not been understood and is not being carried into effect. The importance of providing every mass action with good leadership is underestimated. Mass actions are not always correctly and persistently directed towards a definite pre-set aim. The essence of our tactics in respect to the Center Union and its government is sometimes distorted, creating the danger of losing, in the new conditions as well, the ability to differentiate between the forces of the Left and those of the Center, and this can have serious consequences. The clearer this differentiation, the more consistent our policy towards the Center Union, the more persistent the work among the masses and among the Center Union supporters and functionaries with the aim of establishing broad popular unity, the greater will be the possibilities and pre-requisites for broader cooperation and unity of the democratic forces.

The struggle against Greece's participation in the multilateral nuclear force was not vigorous enough. The struggle against the putsch planned by the Rights was not always combined with the struggle for democratization, and at one time was even divorced from it. Communists have not succeeded in securing sufficient mass support for the demand for the abolition of emergency legislation and the legalization of the Party.

These shortcomings are due, among other things, to the difficulties involved in adapting the work to build a united front to the new conditions, in drawing more people into the struggle for more democracy.

VI

The expansion of the U.S. imperialist armed intervention in South Vietnam and the aggressive actions against the Democratic Republic of Vietnam create a dangerous situation in Indo China and seriously imperil world peace. The Meeting expresses solidarity with the heroic people of Vietnam and calls upon the Greek people to step up the struggle for the immediate withdrawal of the troops of the United States and its myrmidons from South Vietnam, for an end to the armed attacks on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, for peace and the security of the peoples.

★ ★ ★

Together with the CPSU and the other fraternal parties the CPG is exerting efforts to preserve the unity of the world Communist movement. Our Party considers that a new international conference of all the Communist and Workers' parties should be convened for this purpose. In order to prepare such a conference and overcome the existing serious difficulties all the parties should display persistence, good will and patience.

VII

Improvement of organizational and ideological work, and of Party leadership in general is essential if the Party is to fulfil the tasks facing it, to organize and provide correct guidance to the mounting mass movement.

The sharpening of the struggle between Marxism and bourgeois ideology, the specific conditions in which our Party exists and works, the increased activity of various anti-Party dogmatic and revisionist elements demand much closer attention to all aspects of ideological work. We must steadfastly uphold the purity of theory and our line both in the Party and among the masses, give the masses correct guidance and tirelessly work to win their support. Our ideological struggle will be effective if it always remains militant, if we rebuff hostile ideology and propaganda and anti-Party deviations from correct Marxist-Leninist positions, systematically expound the line and program of the Party, advance a thoroughly considered policy on the political, economic, ideological, cultural and social issues confronting the people for their immediate demands and the movement for democratization, national-democratic reforms and socialism.

February 1965.

FOR STRONGER UNITY IN THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

STATEMENT BY THE CC, CPG

The Consultative Meeting of representatives of 19 Communist and Workers' parties held in Moscow on March 1-5 is an important contribution to the consolidation of the unity of the world Communist movement, to the struggle against imperialism and colonialism, for national independence, peace, democracy and socialism.

The CC, CPG expresses its full approval both of the consultative character of the Meeting and of the documents it adopted.

The Consultative Meeting took place at a time when U.S. imperialism, supported by the more aggressive quarters in the other imperialist countries and seeking to prevent the growth of the forces of socialism and the national-liberation and working-class movements, is becoming more and more active and undertaking aggressive actions and provocations seriously endangering the freedom of the peoples and universal peace. This calls for greater vigilance, unity and active mobilization of the anti-imperialist and revolutionary forces.

The CC, CPG fully endorses the appeal of the participants in the Consultative Meeting to all the Marxist-Leninist parties to work without delay for united action by all the progressive and democratic forces to render assistance to the heroic Vietnamese people and secure the immediate termination of the armed attacks on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and the withdrawal of the armed forces of the United States and its satellites from South Vietnam.

The CC, CPG shares the conclusion reached at the Consultative Meeting that what unites the Marxist-Leninist parties far outweighs that which at present disunites them. The differences notwithstanding, it is quite possible and necessary to achieve united action in the fight against imperialism, in rendering all-round support of the liberation movement of the peoples, in the struggle for peace and peaceful coexistence of states, big or small, with different social systems, in the fight for the vital interests and historical goals of the working class. Unity of action in the struggle for these common goals is the most effective means of surmounting the existing differences and strengthening the unity of the world Communist movement.

The CPG hold that bilateral and multilateral meetings, and other forms of exchange of opinions between fraternal parties, should be used for solving common problems. In present conditions, international conferences, at which the principles of complete equality and independence of each party are always strictly observed, are a reliable and effective means of exchanging experience of value to all concerned, overcoming differences, working out common positions of the world Communist movement on pressing international problems, and enriching Marxist-Leninist theory. Therefore thorough preparation for a new international conference, to be held at a suitable date, fully accords with the interests of the world Communist movement.

Immediate discontinuation of open polemics and abusive attacks, efforts to avoid taking any step that might undermine the unity of the Communists of all countries, respect for the principle of non-interference by any party in the internal affairs of other parties, continuation of the discussion on disputed issues in a comradely spirit are indispensable for creating favorable conditions and a healthy climate for the convening and successful holding of a new international conference.

The CC, CPG agrees with the Communist and Workers' parties which attended the Consultative Meeting that a preliminary consultative meeting of the 81 parties that took part in the 1960 Meeting should be held to discuss the question of convening a new international conference.

The CPG, for its part, will do everything in its power to fulfil its internationalist duty; it will join efforts with other fraternal parties in strengthening the unity and solidarity of the world Communist movement on the unshakable foundation of Marxism-Leninism and the historic documents of the Moscow conference of 1957 and 1960.

March 17, 1965.

STATEMENT* OF THE SWISS PARTY OF LABOR

The Swiss Party of Labor received with great interest the communique of the Consultative Meeting of representatives of Communist and Workers' parties in Moscow. It, too, considers that what unites the Communist and Workers' parties far outweighs that which disunites them, and that, despite the existing disagreements, it is necesary and quite possible to establish unity of action in the fight against the common enemy, for common aims. The common enemy is imperialism, and the common aims are: the consolidation of the socialist camp; complete political and economic liberation of the countries that have freed themselves from the yoke of imperialism; emancipation of the peoples still under imperialist rule; abolition of all racial discrimination, above all in the United States and the Republic of South Africa; defense of the vital interests of the working people of the capitalist countries, and their struggle to destroy capitalism and build socialism.

The main aim, the most urgent and most important task of the Communist and Workers' parties everywhere is to prevent a new world war, to fight for general and complete disarmament and to ensure peaceful coexistence, which will enable all the peoples to shape their own destiny and to embark on the road of progress and general well-being.

Unity of the world Communist movement hastens and facilitates the achievement of these aims and promotes the cause of socialism, while disunity and division in the world Communist movement hamper the achievement of these aims and play into the hands of imperialism. The Swiss Party of Labor therefore supports any attempt, any measure and any form of exchange of opinions and experience which could contribute to the elaboration of common positions in the struggle for common aims. It declares its agreement with the proposals of the Consultative Meeting and, for its part will do everything to help overcome the existing differences and restore the unity and solidarity of the world Communist movement.

Leadership of the Swiss Party of Labor, March 20, 1965.

MOSCOW MEETING*

The Communique of the Moscow Consultative Meeting of Communist parties held early this month has been published The Meeting concentrated on a search for ways and means of overcoming the differences and strengthening the unity of the Communist movement, the great force of our time that changes the world and frees man from the evils of capitalism, the war menace, and the scourge of poverty and exploitation.

We see the Meeting and its positive outcome as a victory for the Communist movement and, hence, for all the peoples. It will be recalled that at first the imperialist press hoped that the Meeting would not take place. When, however, the Meeting became a fact the imperialist press predicted its failure. But the prediction did not come true. Indeed, there is evidence of the fruitful character of the Meeting, which "expressed the firm determination of their parties to do everything in their power to cement the world Communist movement and to strengthen its unity on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism and the line defined in the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement."

The Meeting was attended by representatives of Lenin's Party, which accomplished the October Revolution and ushered in a new era of world history, by representatives of other socialist countries building a new life, of parties carrying on their fight under capitalism, and of three Latin American parties, including the United Party of the Socialist Revolution of Cuba, which has paved the way to liberation and socialism for the entire Latin American continent.

The peoples are gratified by the fact that this meeting took place, that it will strengthen the Communist movement, whose responsibility is so great. This movement, founded on the best traditions of the proletariat and the immortal behests of Marx, Engels and Lenin, came into being after the victory of the first socialist revolution. Today, a hundred years after the founding of the First International, the ideas of socialism are a reality for one-third of mankind. They have brought about a great change by rousing to struggle all the peoples, even those whom brutal imperialist oppression seemed to have placed outside the march of history.

The Meeting pointed out that consolidation of the positions of socialism, upsurge of the national-liberation movement, and growth of the forces advocating the maintenance and strengthening of peace constitute the basic trend in world development. On the other hand, it noted that world reaction, primarily U.S. imperialism, which refuses to reconcile itself to its defeat, is launching acts of aggression against the socialist and the newly-free countries and against the revolutionary movement.

Today unity is more imperative than ever, for imperialism is capitalizing on the differences to promote its own ends. And "what unites the Communist parties greatly outweighs that which at the present time disunites them." All the revolutionary forces — the socialist community, the liberation movement and the international working class—need unity if they want to act in common.

The Communist and Workers' parties, which in this complex world have to operate in different conditions, may have different views on certain problems. But they have common teachings and interests — those of the international proletariat and the peoples, which call for greater Communist unity in the fight for socialism and against imperialism, for active solidarity with the peoples fighting for liberation from imperialist oppression, for world peace and the peaceful coexistence of all countries, big and small alike, irrespective of differences in social system.

Unity is a great goal, one to work for painstakingly, indefatigably and actively, exerting collective efforts and waging a joint struggle, using every opportunity and every means, holding bilateral and multilateral meetings, improving relations between the equal and independent parties, and convening international meetings to elaborate common positions in the interest of the struggle for common aims.

The participants declared for comprehensive and active preparations for a new meeting, to be attended by all the fraternal parties. An opinion of paramount importance voiced at the Meeting was that the meeting should be preceded by a preliminary consultative conference of the eighty-one parties which attended the 1960 Meeting and that this called for consultations with all these parties.

The participants also declared in favor of the observance of the Communist principles governing relations between parties, against the interference by one Party in the internal affairs of other parties, and for abstention from harmful public polemics while carrying on fraternal exchanges of views.

There is no doubt that this process will be crowned with success. Communists and all the anti-imperialist forces of the peoples may rest assured that the vigorous struggle for Communist unity on solid principles, a struggle using proper methods, will ultimately yield the desired results.

Our Party, acting in accordance with the line laid down by the 1957 and 1960 meetings and striving for the unity of the Communist parties, hails the results of the Moscow Meeting. At the continental meeting held at the end of 1964, our Party, like other parties of Latin America, reaffirmed its "determination actively to contribute to world Communist unity based on Marxist-Leninist principles and the policy documents of the 1957 and 1960 meetings," considering it necessary to do its utmost "to pave the way to unity, ensure mutual understanding in the socialist community, and avoid all that increases the danger of a split, hampers fraternal and constructive discussion and makes it difficult for the fraternal parties to act in a united front with the aim of overcoming the present divergencies and turning all their energy to the fight against the imperialists and other reactionaries." The communique of that meeting also said that "we must base ourselves on common points of view expressing our common ideology, Marxism-Leninism, and do everything to ensure that solid unity on questions of principle wins the upper hand."

The meeting of the Latin American parties also declared in favor of discontinuing public polemics, finding appropriate ways of settling disputed issues, and ending all factional activity. It supported the idea of holding bilateral and multilateral meetings of the Communist parties.

Such are the views of the Uruguayan Communists, who welcome the success of the Moscow Meeting. We are confident that its results will contribulte to the unity of the Communist movement and help to intensify the struggle against imperialism and for peace. An earnest of this is the ardent call for international solidarity with the heroic people of Vietnam.

THE DIFFERENCES IN THE WORLD COMMUNIST AND WORKING-CLASS MOVEMENT

RESOLUTION OF THE ELEVENTH (FOURTH) PLENARY MEETING OF THE CC, PPI

Having heard and discussed the report of the Provisional Bureau, Central Committee of the People's Party of Iran, on the differences in the world Communist and working-class movement and on the attitude of our Party toward these differences, the 11th (Fourth) Plenary Meeting of the CC, PPI resolves:

1. To approve the report of the Provisional Bureau of the CC.

2. Recent years have seen the rise in the world Communist and working-class movement of fundamental differences over a number of questions bearing on the strategy and tactics of the movement. The absolute majority of the fraternal parties, including our own Party, adheres to one position on these questions, while the Communist Party of China and certain other fraternal parties which support its views adhere to a different position. The differences are between those who uphold the principles of Marxism-Leninism, on the one hand, and those who advocate dogmatic and sectarian views, on the other. Unfortunately, these differences have gone so far as to endanger the unity and solidarity of our movement.

In view of the diversity of the internal and external conditions in which the fraternal parties have to operate, divergences within the revolutionary movement over particular questions are possible. It is extraordinary, however, that the CPC leaders should have turned these divergences — which could have been, and still can be, settled through comradely discussions and exchanges of opinions, without impairing the unity and solidarity of the Communist movement — into a special platform and a means of fighting against a number of fraternal parties. They have plunged the Communist movement into an atmosphere of internal discord at a time when it should preserve its unity and use the favorable international situation to the utmost to realize its revolutionary ideals.

3. As far as the strategy and tactics of the world Communist and working-class movement and the differences within the movement are concerned, our Party has always adhered to a definite position. It took part in drafting the documents of the world meetings of 1957 and 1960, and put its signature to them. It also approved of the decisions of the 20th and 22nd congresses of the CPSU, which are of fundamental importance for the Communist movement as a whole.

At various stages of the controversy in the international movement, spokesmen of our Party clearly stated its position at world conferences. Our Party has repeatedly published on its press documents and articles explaining its position in the totality of the questions, or on particular questions, under discussion. It did so because taking a neutral stand on the fundamental differences which have arisen in the world Communist movement is wrong. In the circumstances, the right thing to do in keeping with the principles of proletarian internationalism, for the benefit of the unity of the fraternal parties and for a correct settlement of the differences between them is to uphold the right positions and principles against those who adhere to the wrong positions and principles. This has been, and will be, the main task of our Party.

4. The issues on which the CPC leadership and those who support its line express incorrect views are varied. Most of them bear on the strategy and tactics of the world Communist and working-class movement. Among them are the issues of the character of our epoch, the main contradictions of the present period, war and peace, peaceful coexistence, the forms of transition to socialism, the personality cult and the estimation of Stalin as a person. Since these issues cannot be set forth in detail in this resolution, this Meeting states that its position on them is identical with the position maintained in the report of the Provisional Bureau of the CC.

5. This Meeting states that the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, its 20th and 22nd congresses and its leadership played an outstanding part in the matter of conceiving, shaping and promoting the fundamental creative line which today is upheld by the majority of the fraternal parties. The CPSU, which is the vanguard of the world Communist and working-class movement, has invariably played the main role in upholding the creative principles of Marxism-Leninism, exposing dogmatic and revisionist views, upholding the principles of unity and solidarity of the world Communist and working-class movement, maintaining world peace and steering a realistic course toward its preservation and promotion, and defending the revolutionary and liberation movements.

Our Party has on more than one occasion stated that the CPSU, the most experienced and seasoned contingent of the world Communist movement, is the recognized vanguard of the movement. The vast experience it has gained while waging great battles for socialism and communism and upholding peace and friendship among the peoples contributes in substantial measure to the right solution of the problems of our movement. Its example, an embodiment of proletarian internationalism, inspires the fraternal parties in their sacred struggle.

Our Party has always attached paramount importance to the maintenance and promotion of fraternal friendship with the CPSU. It considers that one of its major tasks is to continue extending and strengthening this friendship.

6. Our Party has in the past taken certain steps to maintain its position on international questions. But it cannot consider them adequate, for there is a tremendous need for explanatory work among its rank and file and the population. In view of the devices which the CPC advocates of dogmatic concepts use to spread their ideas, the Party must resort to such propaganda media as will make its activity more effective and increase its influence.

THE SITUATION IN THE COUNTRY AND OUR PRESSING TASKS

THESES OF THE ELEVENTH PLENARY MEETING OF THE CC, PPI

I. THE CHARACTER OF THE PRESENT REGIME

Despite certain changes in the class character and the methods of the regime*, its main features and methods are unchanged.

First of all, the regime is anti-national. The renunciation of the country's traditional neutrality, membership in CENTO, the conclusion of a bilateral agreement with the United States, the placing of the nation's oil resources at the disposal of imperialist monopolies, the adoption of an open-door policy and the granting of priority rights to imperialist capital in Iran, the acceptance of fettering imperialist loans, the placing of the Army under the supervision of foreign advisers, and the granting of political immunity to these advisers are some features of the regime's anti-national character.

Secondly, the regime is anti-democratic. The Shah's absolute power over the legislative, executive and judicial branches, the security service's control of the country, inhuman sentences by military tribunal sitting behind closed doors, torture, executions, mass murder, exile or deportation without due process of law, the banning of national democratic parties, press censorship and the prohibition of opposition newspapers are but some features of the regime's anti-democratic character.

As for the principal methods of the regime, which stem from the above peculiarities, they still consist in terrorism and reliance on the imperialists, particularly the U.S. and British imperialists.

2. The Shah — the key figure of the regime has been unable to settle the contradictions of our society. The exceedingly unfavorable economic situation, the chronic stagnation of the market, the low productivity of agriculture and industry, growing unemployment, the soaring cost of living, the increasing burden of state loans, a chronic budget deficit, a wide gap between revenue and expenditure, the free penetration and unhampered domination of foreign capital, chaos and corruption in the machinery of state, a chronic crisis of education, a deeply discontented society, and so on, are all obvious facts admitted even by spokesmen of the regime.

3. Under the pressure of various internal and external factors, the regime had to make some concessions. It set about carrying out reforms, and began to use more varied tactics.

The PPI called public attention to the necessity for solving the contradictions of our society, for regenerating it socially and economically, and indicated the direction this regeneration should take and the content it should have. The maturity of social conditions and the revolutionary activities of the national democratic organizations, particularly of our Party, as well as the hardships and privations of the people, on the one hand, and the persistent effort of the Shah and his government to preserve the existing system (which has lost its historical bearings and blocks the development of our country), on the other, put Iranian society in a precarious position, aggravated class antagonisms, and narrowed the social base of the Shah and his regime.

This situation has alarmed the imperialists. In those countries where feudalism can no longer be preserved, they are ready, in pursuing their neo-colonialist policies, to lean more heavily on the bourgeoisie which is dependent on them. That is why the imperialists, above all the U.S. imperialists, who are anxious to retain their profits and consolidate their neo-colonialist positions, some time ago urged the Shah to take measures in order to dampen revolutionary sentiment in society.

4. The steady decline of feudal and patriarchal relations, and the rapid spread of capitalist relations in town and country constitute the main socio-economic content of the changes which are occurring in Iran and which were promoted by the agrarian reform and certain other measures of the regime. This development is taking place in a country oppressed politically and economically by the colonialists and governed by a reactionary regime, and is therefore going on slowly, painfully and unevenly.

Class differentiation in the countryside is on the increase. The class of tenant farmers is disintegrating into bourgeoisie, petty bourgeoisie, proletarians and semi-proletarians. In the specific conditions of Iran, this differentiation adds to unemployment in the towns and produces certain negative social effects.

Another important development in Iranian society today is the rise of a comprador bourgeoisie as a result of the appearance of mixed banks, industrial establishments and trading and agricultural companies. This bourgeoisie has brought Iran's economy under its control and is playing as important a role in the country as the feudal lords did in the past. The aim of the regime is to sell the state plants listed in the Shah's program, abolish state monopolies, which the Mansur government regarded as a condition for economic progress, and strengthen the private sector in the country to the detriment of the state sector. All this enables foreign capital to penetrate into the country and to gain key positions.

The feudal lords are changing too. They either become capitalist landowners or, helped by a regime which wants to preserve their influence and position in society, invest their capital in industrial, financial and commercial undertakings. In other words, while changing their class character and gradually disappearing as a class by itself, they remain among the ruling classes.

Class differentiation also involves the handicraftsmen and small traders in the towns. Unable to withstand growing competition on the part of the imperialist monopolies and the Iranian capitalists who are dependent on the monopolies, they are ruined and many of them join the vast army of the town poor.

Slums are springing up on the outskirts of big cities, and unemployment is hitting increasingly large sections of the population.

5. In view of these changes, our former definition of the class character of the regime, which we described as a feudal-comprador dictatorship, is no longer accurate. It would be more accurate to say that today the regime is becoming transformed into a dictatorship of different sections of big capital linked with the imperialists and landowners. The Shah is trying gradually to replace his social base, feudal and patriarchal system, which is no longer viable. He wants to bring a powerful comprador section into being in the town and a kulak section in the countryside, and to create a new, capitalist base for himself in order to turn Iran into a full bourgeois monarchy.

6. It is in these conditions that the regime has introduced certain changes into its methods of government. While terrorism and reliance on imperialism are still among its methods, it has now supplemented them with certain other political devices, such as reforms, the establishment of various societies, the making up of a "revolutionary" ideology, and the claim that it is implementing a program for "scientific" research and introducing various "innovations."

II. THE NATURE OF THE REFORM, AND THE SHAH'S NEW METHODS

7. The agrarian reform is the most important of the reforms being carried out by the regime.

The law on the agrarian reform and the amendment to it are half measures. They bear a deep imprint of the reactionary socio-political aspirations of the Shah and his regime. The reform will give land to every landless or land-hungry peasant. Levying a tax on the peasants in favor of the landowner under the pretext of collecting a debt they owe for the land, leaving vast tracts of fertile land at the disposal of the landowner on the plea that feudal exploitation is being replaced by capitalism, and a number of other features of the reform cannot do away with the domination of the landowner in the Iranian countryside, ensure the emancipation of the peasants and end the appalling poverty of the rural population. The reform does not provide a radical solution for the agrarian and peasant problems in our country, for it is chiefly aimed at increasing capitalist exploitation, which, in turn, is bound to breed sharp contradictions and to bring additional hardship to the peasants.

Speaking at a peasant congress, the Shah officially demanded — in exchange for the half-hearted agrarian reform and the non-committal promise to abolish the landowner regime — that the peasants submit to his despotic power to the point of swearing allegiance to him. Thereby he showed that his true aim is to preserve and strengthen despotic rule.

For all the shortcomings of the reform, one should see its relatively positive content and, on the other hand, beware of two mistakes: failure to realize its true socio-political aims because of its objective content, and failure to realize its objective content because of the authors' subjective aims, and hence adoption of an absolutely negative policy toward the reform.

8. The granting of suffrage to women is another reform which the regime boasts of. The Shah's court regards itself as the emancipator of Iranian women. Yet the fact that women have been formally granted the right to take part in elections — which we consider a step forward — is a result of the struggle which the progressive forces in our country, both women and men, waged for half a century and is due to the present international situation.

Women have been granted substantial rights in most of the Moslem countries of Asia and Africa. In Iran, the granting of suffrage to women has no serious practical importance for the simple reason that there are practically no free elections here. Besides, it does not solve the problem of women radically. Iranian women still lack many civil and social rights, such as the right to divorce, to custody of the children in the event of divorce, the right to inherit, the right to work, and to be paid for their work, on an equal footing with men, the right to appear in court on a par with men, to travel and so on. They suffer from the distressing custom of polygamy. Besides, they suffer from the same social scourges as are the lot of men.

9. The regime claims that it has taken steps to improve the living standard of the workers. And it is making a great deal of fuss about the law on profit-sharing by the workers.

The purpose of that law is to conceal capitalist exploitation, win the workers' support for expanding capitalist production, enlist their cooperation with the exploiting classes, divide them and blunt their class consciousness. Actually, the workers' incomes will not go up because most of the plants and shops covered by the law (which does not extend to the oil industry and some of the state-owned plants) operate at a loss owing to the economic crisis. Those workers who under this law will receive a negligible share of the profits constitute a small proportion of the Iranian working class.

The regime is the enemy of the workers but it poses as their friend on the ground that it has included them in electoral committees, enables them to sit in the Majlis, and set up "trade unions" for them. The "workers' unions" under the Ministry of Labor are one of the elements of the Shah's policy of implanting various organizations from above, a policy designed to exercise control over the working-class movement and to use the workers' votes. What the regime has brought the workers is a high cost of living, low wages, unemployment, police persecutions and other privations.

10. The regime claims that it has reformed the administrative apparatus. A long time passed before the government, following a series of "administrative revolutions," introduced a relevant bill into the Majlis. The bill drew extremely sharp criticism from public opinion, particularly office workers. The government is trying to force the bill through.

The unwieldly administrative machinery which swallows a sizable proportion of budget appropriations, is a heavy burden on the people, and even on petty government officials.

Only a social revolution can destroy the existing machinery of state, remedy its chronic ills, and create a people's system of government, simultaneously improving the living standard of the absolute majority of the office workers.

11. Today the building up of the Iranian Army is supervised by American advisers. Numerous shackling agreements have turned the Army, contrary to the desire and will of almost all officers, NCO's and privates, into a puppet force. The regime, far from taking measures to make the Army a national democratic army, accentuates its anti-national and anti-democratic features. It removes honest and patriotic-minded men and officers either through arrest and repression or through discharge. It extends police surveillance to the armed forces, which it wants to convert into the Shah's household troops.

12. The regime claims that it has reformed education and the health service. It is making a great deal of fuss about the Educational Corps, Cultural Progress Corps, Health Corps, etc. The devoted work of the members of these bodies, which have been set up by the government, including the Educational Corps, merits high praise but it cannot solve the burning problems of our education and health service.

Iran is in crisis as far as schools, teachers and textbooks are concerned. Tuition fees at all levels are too high for the Iranian family. The regime's reckless measures, far from helping to eliminate the illiteracy of more than 80 per cent of the population, are aggravating educational problems. Whereas a substantial proportion of budget appropriations is spent — overtly or covertly — on military projects, allocations for education and medical care are negligible.

13. Better relations with the socialist countries are one of the regime's new features in the foreign-policy sphere.

The improvement of relations with the Soviet Union — a result of the Soviet government's efforts and of its loyalty to the principles of peaceful coexistence — is conducive to the political and economic independence of our country, and the progressive forces therefore welcome it. It accords with the Iranian people's invariable aspiration.

The argument which the opponents of this relative improvement put forward, saying that it tends to strengthen the present regime or that it is a "deal" between the Soviet Union and the Anglo-American imperialists, is absolutely wrong. Ever since it came into being, the Soviet Union has sought better and more extensive relations with Iran, and the Iranian people have always taken a favorable view of it.

Undoubtedly, the relative improvement of relations between Iran, on the one hand, and the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, on the other, weakens the positions of imperialism in our country, which, in turn, contributes to the consolidation of our political and economic independence.

14. Another new foreign-policy feature of the regime is the conclusion of a tripartite treaty of economic, cultural and technical cooperation between Iran, Turkey and Pakistan, signed in Ankara in 1964 as the Regional Welfare Pact.

The treaty is a result of the changed balance of world forces and indicates a crisis of the CENTO pact. Iran, Turkey and Pakistan want to use this treaty, which the Anglo-American imperialists allegedly have had nothing to do with and which the three signatories have given a Moslem touch, for demagogical purposes. The treaty shows that the Iranian government in the present international situation would not mind having greater opportunities for maneuver in common with its CENTO allies.

Our foreign policy is still inspired by the Anglo-American imperialists and is linked with the foreign policy of one country. The partial changes which have come about in it could not have changed its character as a whole.

15. One of the methods to which the regime has in recent years been resorting more and more often is the setting up of parties, "trade unions," peasant cooperatives, women's and youth leagues, various clubs and other centers, and the holding of congresses, referendums and meetings. These measures are intended to help the regime in carrying out its schemes, and are part of the policy of implanting organizations from above.

Whatever the true aims of this method, it objectively makes for the emergence of various social groups on the political scene in both town and country, and shows that it is becoming increasingly difficult to govern the country by the rigid methods of a tyrannical regime.

16. To attract foreign capital and to protect its interests, the regime has issued a series of laws which grant — even according to official quarters — greater privileges to foreign capital than the legislation of other countries.

We hold that foreign investments in the forms and in the situation which are shaping up in our country are injurious to sound and rapid economic growth. They increase Iran's dependence on imperialism instead of laying the material groundwork for economic independence. Instead of increasing the national wealth, which should be a source of general well-being and hence of growing incomes for the working people, they facilitate its plunder.

One of the more important tasks of the nation's economic policy is to abolish foreign capitalist domination in Iran.

17. The regime boasts of its oil policy. It makes out this policy, which is a betrayal of our national interests, to be a source of progress and prosperity for the country. The regime, itself a product of conspiracy by the old monopolies, has no goal other than to protect imperialist control of the nationalized oil wells and their continued plunder.

The regime has brought our rich oil deposits to the hammer, and every day delivers more and more of them into the hands of the oil monopolies. These acquire, jointly or severally, the priority right to exploit part of the oil wells. The sale of the wells by auction continues by the terms of the law on the auction sale of all the oil wells of the country (divided into 12 fields).

The regime's oil policy essentially accords with its desire to attract foreign capital and to acquire as much money as possible to make up for the chronic budget deficit and to cover the growing military and administrative expenditures. As oil extraction brings huge profits, the imperialists prefer to invest in Iranian oil rather than in other branches of business. The regime, for its part, shows particular zeal and perseverance in this sphere.

Certain quarters close to the regime admit that the greater part of the profit from oil either returns to the imperialists through foreign trade or through the Planning Organization, is spent on the armed forces and the administrative apparatus, which is also linked with the imperialists, or is pocketed by the home exploiters, primarily the Shah.

18. Despite the ostentatious measures and boastful claims of the regime, continued subservience to imperialism, deciding all questions in favor of the imperialists, the suppression of the liberation movement, terrorism and repression, have always been its distinguishing feature and main content. The reforms serve as an attractive facade for a regime which is reactionary by its very nature. Since they are inconsistent and half-hearted, are being effected at a time when the country has lost its political and economic independence, do not follow a single development plan, lack public support, and are being carried into practice by a corrupt administrative machinery, as well as for other reasons of a similar nature, they cannot eliminate the main evil of our society, its backwardness.

During the government referendum on various laws, including the utterly reactionary law on the sale of state-owned plants, our Party chose the tactic of boycott in order to prevent whatever illusions might be bred by the regime's demagogy, and not to take a single step that might strengthen the Shah's despotic regime. Time has proved this tactic correct.

The economic plight of the country and universal poverty, as well as the growing political consciousness of the people, have widened the gulf between the government and the nation. In view of the acute crises which affect the regime, the above factors make it possible to bring about useful changes. Experience has shown, however, that unless the subjective factor is properly used, that is, unless the revolutionary and opposition organizations are well prepared and act as a unit, taking advantage of the situation, the regime will hold its own against the objective factors unfavorable to it.

III. THE OPPOSITION AND THE ISSUE OF A UNITED FRONT

19. At the early stage of the rule of the present regime there was a decline in the national movement, which had suffered a reverse. But as the regime went through various crises—under the Eqbal, Sharif Amami, Alam and Mansur governments—and owing to the explanatory and organizing work of the opposition parties and groups, popular resistance to the regime grew. Throughout the country, in town and country alike, there began strikes, demonstrations and other joint actions by the workers, peasants, students, office employees, shopkeepers, handicraftsmen and members of the clergy.

20. Worthy of note among the major events of late years are the popular demonsrtations which took place in Teheran, Tabriz, Shiraz, Qum and elsewhere in June 1963. These demonstrations, which originated on a religious basis, soon went beyond the bounds set by their organizers, and developed into popular actions against the Shah. The unarmed demonstrators displayed extraordinary courage. The regime crushed these actions with unparalleled cruelty.

Despite the selfless bravery of the participants, the demonstrations bore no fruit because they were poorly organized and lacked proper leadership.

21. At present the regime is faced with a broad opposition movement embracing various social groups and political organizations. The PPI, the National Front and other progressive organizations, which belong to this heterogeneous opposition, represent the people's resistance to the regime.

This national democratic opposition is fighting the regime from the left. On the other hand, some members of the ruling classes, who are dissatisfied with the regime for various reasons, specifically on account of certain reforms, are fighting the regime from the right.

22. The clergy is basically heterogeneous but most of its members are linked with the middle classes and to some extent reflect the psychology and tendencies of these classes. Those members of the clergy who are now opposed to the regime, especially since the Majlis passed the law on the immunity of the American advisers, openly advance anti-imperialist slogans and advocate the independence and freedom of their country.

23. The National Front (NF) is one of the influential national democratic opposition parties. It has organizations both in Iran and abroad—in Europe and America. Its Iranian organizations have for some time been passing through a profound crisis. The European organizations of the NF are the most consistent as regards the issue of peace and the situation in Iran.

The NF is not homogeneous. It falls into the most varied trends from conservative liberal to revolutionary democratic, for its members are connected with different classes, such as the national bourgeoisie and the urban petty bourgeoisie, and the intellectuals.

The NF in general and its European organizations in particular are noteworthy for a leftward shift. Today the NF shows greater radicalism in its utterances against the regime and imperialism, including the U.S. imperialists. Its program now includes certain progressive socio-political watchwords. The shift occurred under the impact of the international situation, particualrly the struggle of the people in the underdeveloped countries, the impact of Iranian public opinion, and the direct influence of our Party's struggle and propaganda. But despite these positive changes, the NF continues its tactics of rejecting joint actions with the PPI.

24. The appeal for dissolving the parties and fusing them in a single organizations, to be called the National Front, has been the slogan of the Executive Committee of the NF in Europe ever since the last congress.

Our Party has repeatedly pointed to the fallacy of this concept and the theory it is based on, namely, that political differentiation between the masses of the exploited in a country like ours is impermissible. Our Party considers that the classes in our society are sufficiently developed to have organizations of their own expressing their special class interests. We hold that a front of parties should be the totality of independent organizations united by a single program for action. The facts show that our Party's appeal is meeting with an increasingly widespread response in the ranks of the NF, at home as well as abroad.

25. The issue of a united front is not, in the view of our Party, limited to the unity of the PPI and the NF. The main content of a united front consists in cooperation of all the anti-imperialist classes and sections of the people, of which the alliance of the workers and peasants is the backbone. This is why work among the workers and peasants, the use of legal trade unions and cooperatives in town and country, and the effort to draw as many workers and peasants as possible into the fight against the regime are the principal condition for the establishment of a united national front against colonialism and tyranny. The Party should get rid of shortcomings in its work among the peasants, who are becoming more and more active and influential as political fighters. It should find proper forms of propaganda and organization to establish the right relations with the peasantry and to use this vast revolutionary force.

It is wrong to counterpose our Party's slogan of unity of action with the NF to the issue of the need for the alliance of the workers and peasants, as some people occasionally do. Our Party will steadfastly continue its policy of unity of action with the NF despite the disruptive tactics — deliberate or otherwise — of the present NF leadership. On the other hand, it has always held, and still holds, that its main task is to organize the popular forces under the leadership of the working class.

26. Our Party is also following the policy of unity in relation to other opposition organizations, including the Socialist League (SL). The SL leaders are trying to dissociate PPI members from the Party leadership. SL propaganda often betrays hostility to the Soviet Union and the PPI. Nevertheless, we are willing, as we have said in our letter to the SL, to engage in any serious talks on united action with the SL against the present regime.

IV. THE TACTICAL AIM AND THE DEMANDS OF THE PPI

27. Our tactical aim is to eliminate the present anti-national and anti-democratic regime and form a national democratic government. This government should work for peace and friendship among the peoples, the political and economic independence of the country, democratic rights and freedoms, the material and spiritual progress of the country, and the well-being of all working people in town and country.

28. In contrast to the policy of stabilization in the interest of reaction and imperialism, our Party is seeking radical changes for the benefit of the people.

Our society is one or two hundred years behind the foremost societies of the world. Yet it has great natural and manpower resources. To overcome its extreme material and spiritual backwardness and attain the level of the foremost nations, it must make very rapid progress in every sphere. This calls for the establishment of an appropriate social system, that is, a national democratic system.

29. The national democratic government of Iran should pursue a policy of neutrality and of friendship with all peoples, particularly the peoples of the socialist and neutralist countries. It should withdrawn from CENTO and abrogate shackling treaties and commitments to the imperialists, particularly the U.S. imperialists. It should expel foreign advisers from the country.

The national democratic government should pursue a sound economic policy on scientific lines. The economic development of our country must be non-capitalistic.

The national democratic government should embark on industrialization in order to provide the material and technical base for a strong and independent state and to provide universal well-being and prosperity. It should carry out an agrarian reform on the principle of distribution without compensation of all the land owned by the Shah, the mosques and the state. It should promote peasant cooperatives among the landless and land-hungry peasants and introduce modern farming methods all over the country.

The national democratic government should restore the abolished constitutional standards, introduce democratic liberties, annul the inhuman sentences passed by military tribunals, amnesty all the political prisoners, provide conditions for the return of all the political prisoners and exiles to normal life and work, and guarantee the free operation of parties, trade unions and the press. It should govern the country on the basis of decentralization and local self-government, and should safeguard the rights of the peoples of Iran.

With a view to eliminating illiteracy, the national democratic government should create a progressive system of public education, enact insurance legislation, establish the right ratio between the cost of living and wages, and give jobs to the unemployed, making full use of the country's opportunities for this.

30. In view of the changes which have occurred in recent years in Iran and abroad, the Party Program, which underlies the political and ideological activities of our Party, should be reviewed and improved.

V. THE ROAD OF DEVELOPMENT OF OUR COUNTRY

31. There can be no doubt that were democratic principles respected in our country, that is, were the free operation of parties and trade unions, freedom of the press, of elections and demonstrations truly guaranteed, and were the despotic regime with its security service and military tribunals succeeded by a law-abiding government, the Iranian people would strive to solve the acute and pressing problems of society by means of peaceful struggles and through a peaceful transition. But in the present conditions, at a time when there is not a hint of freedom and when a bloodthirsty dictatorship crushes all opposition with the utmost cruelty, oppresses increasing sections of the people, and counters the slightest action against its schemes and methods with persecution, arrest, exile, torture, execution, mass murder and punitive expeditions, the opportunity for the normal solutions of acute social problems has been ruled out by the regime itself. This is why all the national democratic organizations, which suffer from the Shah's tyranny, are coming more and more to the conclusion that the present regime has to be overthrown by force.

32. While our Party draws the conclusion that in the present conditions the forcible way is the one of the two ways of development of the revolution that today comes to the fore, it holds that it must not fully rule out the possibility of a different prospect—that of a peaceful way—appearing in the future. To avoid the blind alley of one-sided tactics, our Party should carry on its work with due regard to the existence of both possibilities and to the greater likelihood of the non-peaceful development of the revolution.

33. Naturally, determining the form of transition is not enough to accomplish the revolution. A careful study of the internal and external conditions of our country, proper preparations and timing, the right choice of practical slogans and suitable forms of using force, organizing action in such a way as not to rely exclusively on the strength of the vanguard, etc., are indispensable for taking the right line of action and proceeding with proper foresight. The Party leadership is duty bound to carry out adequate preparations, and to act with a profound awareness of its responsibility and with due account of the interests of the Party and the movement.

34. To state that a violent revolution is more likely does not mean denying the necessity for organizing work, as some think. Restoring the strength of its organization in the exceedingly difficult conditions of today is a cardinal and invariable task which our Party must accomplish if it is to play a fitting role in the transformation of society. A solidly united Party organization is the paramount condition and necessary basis for struggle. Without it the Party cannot maneuver, cannot use different forms of legal and illegal, peaceful and non-peaceful struggle.

35. To state that the non-peaceful development of the revolution is more likely does not mean, on the other hand, renouncing the habitual forms and methods of struggle, renouncing the struggle to wrest concessions from the regime, the struggle for a general amnesty, for democratic liberties, for the closest unity of all the forces opposed to the regime, renouncing strikes, etc.

The Party can lead the movement to victory in the face of all turns in the situation, of all ups and downs, provided it makes proper use of every opportunity, correctly defines the cardinal task, and makes proper preparations. Furthermore, our Party should carefully avoid opportunism, passive tactics, adventurous policies and sectarian methods.

SMASHING THEIR CHAINS*

An Afro-Asian economic seminar was held in Algiers from February 22-27, 1965. It was attended by 68 delegations representing various countries and liberation movements of Asia and Africa.

One of the items on the agenda was the issue of hastening the liberation of the peoples still under colonial oppression.

The first resolution passed by the seminar says: "Firm support for the fight against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism, and above all against U.S. imperialism, for the fight to win and consolidate national independence, constitutes one of the supreme international duties of humanity, one of the most pressing tasks in the struggle to maintain world peace and safeguard the security of the peoples."

This firm support, the resolution points out, should express itself, specifically, in the dispatch of arms and military equipment, medical and school supplies, prime necessities and funds, in the training of military, technical and administrative personnel, the provision of special travel facilities, and so on.

The seminar recommended launching a broad fund-raising campaign in support of the national-liberation movements, boycotting the colonialist countries, and serving economic and diplomatic relations with them.

The liberation movements should also receive worldwide diplomatic support.

"At the same time," the relevant resolution says, "the seminar recommends that governments and organizations in Asia and Africa exercise revolutionary vigilance in aiding and supporting the national-liberation movements in order to foil imperialist attempts to undermine the movements from within."

One of the seminar resolutions specifies that "those countries which are still waging an armed fight for their liberation should be aided with due regard to the genuinely popular nature of their fight. The countries that wish to help them should first ascertain whether the organizations they are going to help express the aspirations of the people and whether they are really waging an effective fight against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism."

With the seminar over, the editors of l'Alger Republicain, organ of Algeria's National Liberation Front, asked the representatives of some national-liberation movements to share their impressions of the seminar and to comment on the progress of the liberation battles in their countries.

"PORTUGUESE" GUINEA

Abilio Duarte

AFRICAN INDEPENDENCE PARTY OF GUINEA AND THE CAPE VERDE ISLANDS

During the seminar the Afro-Asian peoples attending it showed that they are well aware of their strength and their weaknesses, and of the need for real and dynamic unity in the economic, political, social and cultural spheres.

That is why we regard the new platform which has just been drawn up a most important step toward the progress of our underdeveloped countries, and a unanimous and irrevocable decision to end colonialist, imperialist and neo-colonialist exploitation in our lands for all time.

As you know, so-called Portuguese Guinea is divided into two zones: the liberated zone, which covers the entire south of the country and stretches northward in a broad belt, and the other zone, where our people's army, our guerrillas and people's militia are still battling against the Portuguese forces of repression.

In recent months our Party has concentrated on reorganizing its basic structure at section and zone level and on building up and reorganizing our people's revolutionary armed forces. On the other hand, it has concentrated on measures to develop industry, trade, education and the health service in the liberated areas.

This activity, which accords with the strategic plan approved by our First Congress, consists, among other things, in the redistribution of the various units of our people's army all over the country. These units, closely cooperating with the guerrillas, launch frequent attacks on enemy positions.

With this reorganization and redistribution, our struggle is entering a new stage. The enemy, attacked and harassed everywhere, is sustaining increasingly heavy losses.

Our activity in the liberated areas may be summed up as follows:

Agriculture. Last year production of rice, a staple food crop, increased from 25,000 to roughly 30,000 tons, or by almost 20 per cent.

Agricultural cooperatives have been set up in various parts of the liberated zones as experimental farms.

Trade. We compelled the Sociedade Commercial Ultramarina, the second biggest company in our country, which had monopolized trade in the south, fully to discontinue business and to close down its branches.

Our Party has set up "people's shops," which supply a substantial part of the population in the liberated areas with foodstuffs.

Education. We have improved the few old schools and opened dozens of new ones.

From 1961 to 1964 our Party provided a university education to sixty-three young people, or three times as many as the Portuguese colonialists have trained in five centuries.

Health. We have set up health centers at the guerrilla bases and in various villages. They aid the population and the less seriously wounded servicemen.

FRELIMO

The seminar was the first to adopt specific resolutions in order to render effective aid to the liberation movements.

We were also impressed by the fraternal atmosphere of the discussions. There was no indication of differences between the delegates representing independent countries and those from countries still under colonial rule. This enabled the delegates from the countries fighting for their independence frankly to voice their opinions and to speak of their needs. A very important thing for us is what we learned about the experience of other countries, the difficulties they encounter with regard to national problems and imperialist infiltration.

You know that our Party, Frelimo was founded in June 1962 and held its first congress in September of that year. We have felt since then that we must create in Mozambique basic conditions for waging war against Portugal, for we have seen that she was not prepared to negotiate the independence of our country with any political group. We therefore organized the masses to ensure that our fighters found support among them. The work took us exactly two years. We declared war on the Portuguese colonialists last September, and have been scoring success after success ever since.

I must say that the material aid our African and Asian brothers have been giving us is very valuable. They send us arms, and modern ones too. The fight is going on and we will do all in our power to step it up and to extend the front. Its progress is most encouraging, and the morale of the population and the fighters is excellent. We therefore think we will win independence sooner than we had hoped if things go on like that and if we suffer no reverses.

It is important for us to have Mozambican personnel ready to assume the political, economic and social organization of the liberated areas.

Speaking of the training of personnel, I am at a loss to say how much we appreciate the help we have been getting from Algeria. It has been very useful and without it our struggle would hardly have been as successful as it is today. You know that the first group of our military personnel was trained in Algeria, which was also the first country to help us financially. It is with our Algerian brothers that we have discussed and settled some of our difficulties. We are confident of Algeria's support and we hope other countries in Africa and Asia will follow her example.

PEOPLE'S MOVEMENT FOR THE LIBERATION OF ANGOLA

The Afro-Asian Economic Seminar was an event of considerable importance to us. It was the first major effort by the Afro-Asian world to improve the coordination of our work aimed at promoting and consolidating our political, economic and social independence.

Today there is still a difference between the aid the imperialists render to their puppets and the aid which the anti-imperialist countries extend to the national-liberation movements. The imperialists are more consistent and close-knit. When it is a question of helping those who protect their interests they do it thoroughly. Vietnam and the Congo are cases in point. The aid rendered to those who are truly fighting should be more dynamic. The time for talk is over, let us hope the resolutions that have been adopted will be carried out.

We send our more competent people to the areas where armed resistance is particularly active to carry on reorganizing and mobilizing work and to provide military and political leadership. After summing up the difficulties which the Angolan revolutionary movement encountered in 1963 and 1964 and which were mainly due to the situation in the neighboring Congo (Leopoldville), the PMLA had completely to reshape its military and political apparatus to face the new situation.

Our units create insecurity everywhere in order to paralyze the entire colonialist economy, primarily by striking at its basis, the lumbering industry.

Part of Cabinda, or one-quarter of the territory, has already been freed and in the enemy-occupied areas our guerrillas continue to harass enemy troops. Elsewhere in Angola we are carrying on political work to step up the fight by opening new fronts.

The fact that our struggle has not yet assumed the desired scale is due above all to the interference of Leopoldville in Angolan affairs and to that government's attitude toward us, which in November 1963 went to the point of expelling representatives of our movement from the Congo.

However, while the attitude of that country, with which we have the longest frontier and whose people are fighting for genuine independence, may be an obstacle to the early attainment of our independence, there is no doubt that this obstacle can be surmounted.

Whatever the trend of events, the year 1965 will see intensified political and military activities on our part. It will be an important turning point in our people's struggle for real liberation from every form of foreign domination.

The seminar was also a fitting reply to the imperialist monopolies. It revealed once again the considerable discrepancy there is between the prices of the raw materials sold by undeveloped countries and the prices of the manufactured goods sold by the imperialist countries. This state of affairs seriously affects industrial progress in the underdeveloped countries. To cite an example, Indonesian exports between 1950 and 1962 dropped by 7 per cent, while its imports showed a 27 per cent increase.

This trade policy is, therefore, a threat to the Afro-Asian countries, particularly as regards their standards of living, for prices keep climbing. Analyzing the situation, delegates to the seminar exposed the obstacles which imperialism is raising to the development of Asian, African and Latin American countries, and condemned it.

The British protectorate ended in 1962. But the British, who were intent on prolonging the occupation period, decided to form federations of South Arabian countries, including Aden. The people began to fight against this imperialist plan.

The fight became organized as the National Front, which comprises workers, peasants, servicemen, intellectuals, and members of the national bourgeoisie. Formed in October 1963, the Front began an armed struggle all over the federation against the British invader and the feudal sultans in the pay of the colonialists. The British countered with violent repression and unprecedented outrages.

I also wish to point out that the Front is waging a resolute struggle against the imperialists in the face of opposition by several parties, which seek a compromise with the invader on the plea that our country might become a second Congo.

The aim of the Front, supported by the mass of the people, is to gain political, economic and social independence, so that it may subsequently form a federation with the Yemen. It wants to establish a single free and independent state.

We consider that the economic seminar held in Algiers has produced useful results by promoting African consciousness.

We believe that during the meeting to be held in preparation for the Summit in Accra, the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organization could concentrate on examining effective methods and specific means by which friendly people and governments should help the liberation movements battling against classical colonialism, as well as against neo-colonialism and imperialism generally.

The issue of the liberation struggle is highly important in view of the solemn declaration made by the Spanish delegation to the 19th Session of the UN General Assembly. Pledging the honor of its government, the delegation declared:

"The populations of Fernando Poo and Rio de Muni are masters of their future and enjoy the principle of free self-determination. . . . You may rest assured, gentlemen, that Spain will take care to rule out bloodshed or holocausts in Equatorial Guinea. Our African brothers will achieve their goal by peaceful means.

"We have already informed the Committee of Twenty-Four, as well as other UN bodies, of our point of view, and no one has the right to question our intentions."

Our organization has taken due note of this declaration. The PNLF has set about stepping up the political struggle in Equatorial Guinea and providing conditions for an early discussion with all the members of the organization in order to work out a decisive program, that is, to present a memorandum on behalf of the population of Equatorial Guinea to the Spanish government and to demand that Spain set the date when Equatorial Guinea will become independent.

ZIMBABWE AFRICAN PEOPLE'S UNION

The seminar was the first of its kind and we think the Algerians should be congratulated on having organized it so ably.

It should be remembered that even though political independence has been won, the Afro-Asian countries were the imperialists' milch cows for too long a time. For the first time ever, the Afro-Asians have decided that their riches shall be restored to their peoples and stop serving the industrial development of the capitalist world. The end of the exploitation of Afro-Asian countries, and the reconstruction of the colonial economy means less prosperity for the capitalist powers and perhaps the final expulsion of neo-colonialism from African and Asian countries. It is their economies that make these countries an easy prey for the neo-colonialists. If the resolutions are properly carried out, the result will be real independence that will not be political only.

The seminar has adopted decisions of great importance for the liberation movements. They include the decision on boycotting South African and Portuguese goods, and the decision on increasing financial and technical assistance in each particular country to none but truly revolutionary people's movements.

So far assistance was divided between two movements, one of which is pro-imperialist. The sooner this stops, the better for African and Asian countries. As regards the forms of aid, economic assistance is certainly as necessary as moral support, but what is the use of either without military aid?

*African name of Rhodesia, the self-governing British colony.—Ed.

The present stage of our struggle is exceedingly complicated. It is deplorable in the sense that we have reached a point where the complete defeat of our colonialist enemies is the only solution we can contemplate. The colonialists reject all compromise and we can no longer put up with the injustice we have suffered from for years. We tried to find a peaceful, constitutional solution but all that we achieved was still harsher repression. Smith, Rhodesia's head of government, said that as long as he lived an African government there was out of the question. As for the position of the British government, it is hard to understand. That government pretends that it is searching for a solution but it is no more than a diplomatic fraud to secure the support of the Commonwealth countries. It can call a constituent assembly when it chooses. It can abolish the present Constitution any day without consulting Smith. But the point is that the British government and the colonialists are one farily. The economic links between them are very strong and there is nothing to hope for since the British government has allowed Verwoerd, Smith and Salazar to form an alliance.

The only solution is in our hands but it will entail enormous losses on either side.

Five thousand of our people are in prison camps. Twenty-three have been sentenced to death and may be executed any day. The police continue to murder Africans in cold blood.

A state of emergency has been proclaimed in several areas of the country. Since last November the areas reserved for Africans have been occupied by the police, which confiscates the harvest, livestock and other property. We are in a state of undeclared war, or rather of a war that the colonialists have declared on us, nor can the outcome of this war be decided by means of prayers.

We have finally resolved to overthrow the colonial regime by force. Unless Britain grants us independence immediately, we will win it ourselves, but we will never accept a compromise that would place us midway between oppression and independence.

SOUTHWEST AFRICA

Kankuetu and Kanjii

SOUTHWEST AFRICAN NATIONAL UNION (SWANU)

The peoples suffering from apartheid consider the seminar very important for our struggle, for as soon as we have won independence we will be faced with the new problems discussed here and that all the African and Asian countries will have to tackle. The essential thing is to render the liberation movements the greatest possible assistance. However, this assistance will be no more than a contribution and the outcome of the struggle will depend on our own effort.

I would like to speak briefly of SWANU, which represents all the oppressed people of our country. When, in 1959, SWANU came into being, the objectives of the struggle were defined as follows:

1. To unite and rally the people of Southwest Africa, irrespective of color of skin, creed or religion, in a single national front.

2. To fight unrelentingly for the Southwest African people's right to self-determination.

3. To further the economic and cultural progress of our people.

4. To cooperate with Africa's national-liberation movements in the struggle for a united Africa.

5. To cooperate with allied movements in Africa, Asia and other continents with the aim of abolishing imperialism, tribal strife, racism and every form of oppression and economic exploitation of the peoples of the world.

The founding of SWANU was a turning point for all the peoples of Southwest Africa fighting for freedom. Since then all the illusions entertained by those who relied entirely on the UN have been dispelled. Indeed, we have revealed that no matter how many petitions are addressed to the UN, this organization cannot subdue the South African government and make it change its policy, which is hostile to the indigenous population, that is, the Africans. SWANU has adopted a policy of practical action and has begun to rally the population against oppression and exploitation by the colonial regime.

We do not expect to retrieve our country by peaceful means, for the enemy confronting us says in so many words that he will not restore it to us without bloodshed. The people of Southwest Africa want peace but when it is a question of independence . . . they are ready to counter force with force. Algeria has furnished us with a concrete example of what can be done and we will not be an exception. SWANU, a movement of true patriots aiming at action and inspired by the idea of freedom, is ready to go on to a new stage of the political liberation of the country.

Our goal is a free Southwest Africa.

SOUTH AFRICA

AFRICAN NATIONAL CONGRESS (ANC)

In our view, economic planning and cooperation to promote economic independence are necessary means of striking imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism a blow that will finish them off. They are also the only means by which the imperialist stranglehold, political inveiglement and imperialist military aggression can be resisted.

Perhaps the salient feature of the seminar was the unprecedented unanimity it showed with regard to our joint struggle against imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism. This is why we think the seminar was a signal success. And we are greatly indebted to the Algerians, who have been working steadfastly throughout the seminar to foster and strengthen unity and solidarity. If all the resolutions passed are carried out it will not be long before imperialism becomes a thing of the past.

ANC is firmly convinced that armed struggle by the African people and other oppressed peoples of our country is the only way to end apartheid and foreign domination in South Africa. It will be recalled that with this aim in view Umkonto we Siawe* has been methodically carrying out acts of sabotage by destroying installations belonging to the government, communication, and estates. We realize that sabotage alone cannot force the Verwoerd regime into surrender. We have therefore, sent, and continue to send, hundreds of our young men to fraternal countries to take military training. At the same time we continue to mobilize the entire African population and to train it for a nation-wide offensive.

Our country is already drenched in African blood as a result of massacres and arbitrary executions. These atrocites must and shall be avenged.

We have called on the world to isolate the Verwoerd regime diplomatically, economically and militarily. The majority Afro-Asian countries have responded to our call. Their task is to take collective measures against the imperialist countries openly opposing this call.

We stress an aspect of the economic sanctions that makes the Verwoerd regime particularly vulnerable. It is the embargo on oil.

---

*The military arm of ANC.—Ed.

We address a special appeal to the oil-producing African and Asian countries and to the Arab countries to contribute to this particular aspect of the boycott.

Inside the country we are faced with a revolutionary situation fraught with explosion. The subjective conditions are ripe and the objective conditions are ripening. This is shown by the mass demonstrations which our people hold whenever their leaders are dragged before Verwoerd's tribunals turned into human shambles, where one death sentence succeeds another.

Our people, aware of the solidarity of fraternal countries, have vowed to wade through rivers of blood if they must, to achieve their ultimate goal, to overthrow the apartheid regime and form a popular government which would restore the mineral resources—the wealth of all the South Africans — to the people whose property they are, a government which would give the land to those who till it, and would nationalize all the basic industries and monopoly industry. In reply to Verwoerd's increasing terrorism, the peasants, the revolutionary intellectuals and the workers say, "Freedom or death!"

ELECTIONS TO THE SEJM AND PEOPLE'S COUNCILS, AND TASKS OF THE PARTY ORGANIZATIONS

POLITICAL BUREAU REPORT* TO THE THIRD PLENARY MEETING OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, POLISH UNITED WORKERS PARTY

We are entering another campaign of elections to the Sejm and the People's Councils.

During this campaign our Party, the United Peasant Party and the Democratic Party — all the forces of socialist democracy making up the People's Unity Front—will account to the people for the fulfilment of the 1961 electoral program on a nation-wide scale and in the wojewodztwos, powiats, towns and gromadas, and will submit to the electorate a program for future activity.

That program will be based on the general provisions of the next five-year plan and on the home and foreign policy directives adopted by the Fourth Party Congress and approved by the congresses of the other parties, as well as by the trade unions and youth and other mass organizations.

I. ECONOMIC PROGRESS IN THE PERIOD UNDER SURVEY

We appraise the past four-year term in office of the Sejm and the People's Councils from the standpoint of the 20 years that have passed since liberation and since we began to rehabilitate and develop People's Poland in new social conditions and within new, just frontiers.

From 1946 to 1949 we laid the groundwork for a socialist system and re-established our war-ravaged economy.

From 1950 to 1960 we rapidly expanded our heavy industry and set up a number of new industries indispensable for the all-round development of a modern economy. The dynamic growth of industrial production and vast investments drew millions of people into non-agricultural occupations. While concentrating on industrialization of the country, we began to use new working methods and new machinery in agriculture. We considerably improved the standard of living and promoted the skills, education and culture of large segments of the population.

*Abridged from Nowe Drogi, No. 4, 1965.

Between 1961 and 1964 we gave priority to the more comprehensive development of the country's productive forces on a modern technical basis.

Today, on the threshold of new elections, it is perfectly fair to say as we sum up that the working class and the people as a whole have by strenuous effort during the past years reached the main targets, if not all the targets, of the fifty-year plan. We have overcome serious difficulties in the country's development and made signal progress in many branches of the economy and in the education of personnel.

The developing of the fuel and power base of the country should be classed as one of the results achieved from 1961 to 1964.

Our socialist industry has been making good progress. We have put over a hundred new major industrial plants into operation.

In four years our industry increased output by 38 percent, whereas Western Europe, including Britain, the FRG and France, showed only 20 percent increase during the same period. The gap in economic development between Poland and the most developed capitalist countries of Europe narrowed still more. The rate of growth of industrial production in our country is keeping pace with the average rate in other Council for Mutual Economic Aid (CMEA) countries.

Our foreign trade developed faster than in previous years. Exports were well ahead of the growth of industrial output, which enabled us to import more raw materials, consumer goods, machinery and capital equipment. At the same time there occured favorable, if still insufficient, changes in the pattern of our exports, due primarily to the increased share of machines and mechanical equipment and of manufactured consumer goods, while fuel and raw materials exports declined somewhat. To promote foreign trade, and specialization and division of labor within the socialist system, we expanded cooperation with the CMEA countries along these lines.

In agriculture, the process of intensification made more rapid progress from 1961 to 1964. The results achieved are due to a substantial increase in investment and to the supply of means of production to the countryside and the state farms, as well as to to universal use of graded seed and to far-reaching measures to breed pedigree livestock.

Great economic progress was registered in the western territories reunified with the motherland. They are inhabited by approximately 8.5 million Poles. An appreciable increase — as against previous years—in investment in these territories helped to advance industry, agriculture, housing construction and school education.

The working people's incomes in the socialized sector of the economy grew from 164,000 million zlotys in 1960 to 215,000 million zlotys in 1964, which exclusive of social benefits, meant an increase of 22 percent in real wages, or of 8 percent per working person.

Due to increased pay in a number of economic branches, and to increased labor productivity and improved occupational skills, the average pay of all those engaged in the national economy went up. There was a comparatively great increase in pay in the low-income brackets, reducing the disproportion in pay rates. This was due, in particular, to raising the minimum pay from 600 to 750 zlotys, accompanied by a reduction of the tax on wages and by the complete exemption of wages below 1,000 zlotys from tax.

State expenditure on pensions increased from 11,000 million to 16,000 million zlotys. In the same period the lowest pensions, involving 600,000 people, were raised by 14 to 19 percent.

The overall result of the country's economic progress expressed itself in a 25 percent increase in the national income. We diverted about 500,000 million zlotys from the national income for capital construction, which already bears fruit and will bear still more fruit in the next few years.

The development of the material and technical base of the country led to changes in socio-political relations and fostered socialist democracy. Self-government by the workers and peasants gained in importance in everyday life and in the economy, in industry and in the countryside. In industry, workers' self-government conferences became more active and their beneficial influence on economic activity and planning is becoming more and more tangible. In drafting the new five-year plan, ample opportunities were provided for the workers' collectives to put forward alternative plans. Throughout the countryside, agricultural groups and other forms of cooperation are becoming increasingly active. The People's Councils have greater powers and have increased their role in economic life and in management.

We carried out certain measures to improve the functioning of our economy. We set about revising planning methods and the management system, above all in industry and building. We extended, if still in inadequate measure, the powers of many enterprises — for example, in the export industries. We began to revise output indices and devised more effective methods of branch and local coordination. We are preparing further improvements in planning and management.

The term in office of the present Sejm and People's Councils was distinguished by substantial and solid achievements in the development of the country's productive forces, economy and culture. But during the same period we had to surmount difficulties, bring plans into line with actual requirements and the changing situation, fight for a more active contribution to construction by the working people, and tighten discipline. We never concealed setbacks and difficulties from the public. On the contrary, we spoke of them openly in order the sooner to deal with them.

Difficulties in economic development made for a certain slackening of the rate of economic growth in 1962 and 1963, but they did not prevent us from accomplishing the main tasks set by the five-year plan and the 1961 electoral platform. The productive forces continued to develop apace and the economic potential of the country — the foundation of the people's well-being — grew continuously.

The results achieved during the past four years hold an important place in the twenty-year history of the great transformation of our country. They have greatly benefited the people.

We may well pride ourselves on our modern industry, whose production potential is ten times as great as before the war and five times as great as in 1950. We now have a numerous and considerably more proficient working class. Hundreds of thousands of various specialists aware of their duty and proud of their jobs have been trained in People's Poland.

We owe it to the work we have done during the past decade that every year we will be deriving greater benefits from the accumulated wealth — the material and spiritual potential created by the effort of the whole people. We have a powerful foundation on which to build new great projects.

II. PROGRESS IN 1966-70 AS ENVISAGED BY THE FOURTH CONGRESS. THE ROLE OF THE SEJM AND THE PEOPLE'S COUNCILS IN ITS ACHIEVEMENT

The program we will present to the nation meets the vital interests of the country and the whole of society. It expresses the collective thought and will of the Party, as well as of the People's Unity Front.

The economic development program will be the focal point of our electoral platform. All our initiatives are inspired by the desire to provide a better standard of living for the people.

Further industrialization holds a key position in the country's development program. A substantial increase in industrial production, the leading branch of the economy, will be achieved not only by expanding and modernizing the capacities we have but by building new large capacities.

The value of the total output of our socialist industry between 1966 and 1970 is to go up by 45 to 47 percent, with the chemical, engineering, power and non-ferrous metal industries developing at the highest rate.

The main task facing industry, the workers and engineers, is considerably to improve technical indices and quality in keeping with the growing requirements of the home and foreign markets.

In the engineering industry, the branches that have the highest technical standards, namely, those manufacturing electronic equipment, automatic machinery, electric equipment, metal-working machine-tools, and machines and equipment for the chemical industry, are to have priority. These branches are of decisive importance for the production of modern high standard export items.

In the chemical industry, attention is to center on output of synthetic fibres and plastics. Numerous new plants are to be built and the production begun of new materials for other branches of the national economy and for the market.

We will continue to expand the fuel and power base and the extraction of the country's natural resources in proportion to the opportunities for investment we will have.

Steel output is to increase to almost 11 million tons, which should be enough to supply the needs of the national economy, provided the metal is used more sparingly, the grades of steel and rolled stock improved and more up-to-date plant used.

The planned growth of industrial production will largely be secured by making better use of available capacities, and by increasing the numbers of workers, working in two or three shifts and continuously operating plants turning out raw materials and semi-manufactured goods in short supply. Greater recourse to work by shifts in industry, which so far is very limited, particularly in the engineering industry, will enable us not only to increase output but to make proper use of work places without substantial investments.

The tasks set before industry for the next five years are arduous. A discussion of the best ways of accomplishing them in line with the decisions of the Second Plenary Meeting of the CC showed that we still have potentialities for increasing output, improving quality and modernizing production, as well as for reducing costs per unit produced. The drafts of alternative factory plans prepared by workers' self-government bodies and by managements under the guidance of Party organizations show that there are more effective variants of production and investment which should be taken into account when approving the five-year plan in final form.

The chief target of our agricultural program is to increase output by 14 or 15 percent. This will require a considerable increase in deliveries of means of production to the countryside and in investments.

Economic progress in the next five years will depend on the rate of growth of foreign trade and the further reshaping of its pattern.

It is essential that exports keep ahead of the growth of industrial output and the national income. This should be achieved by increasing the export of machinery and other equipment, as well as of other industrial products, in such a way as to ensure that by the end of the next five years their value equals half the value of our exports.

The rapid growth of export, particularly that of manufactured goods, will expand our import opportunities. Many key investments are likewise subordinated to foreign trade requirements, the aim being to reduce imports paid in foreign exchange and to increase accordingly the export of national products where this is economically justified. The rapid growth of foreign trade will make it possible to increase trade in consumer goods and hence to enrich the home market and the better to supply the population.

These targets call for large investments. In fulfilling the next five-year plan, we will have to spend 830,000 to 840,000 million zlotys, or 38.5 percent more than in the present five-year period, on industrial construction, agricultural development, social needs and the public services. It follows that the rate of growth of investment will be higher than that of the national income, which makes it indispensable, among other things, to provide for a wide range of projects. Therefore we must very firmly oppose the tendency to increase investments and their share in the national income still more. This is a condition for the harmonious development of the economy and for the real and steady improvement of the people's standard of living.

The assignment of jobs to the younger generation will be one of the main targets of the 1966-70 plan.

Extensive investment will provide a wide range of projects. Simultaneously we must give priority — on the basis of a profound analysis of available capacities — to such modernizing and organizing measures as are likely to attract manpower reserves with little or no investment. There will be numerous new opportunities for employment also outside industry — in agriculture, the public services and the handicrafts.

The fulfilment of the new five-year plan in conformity with its main targets will substantially increase the national income and enable us to raise real wages and the incomes of the population. The individual consumption fund should go up as a result by almost 25 percent, or by almost 18 percent per capita.

The tasks we are putting forward are arduous but feasible. Our people can and must accomplish them.

THE ROLE OF THE SEJM AND THE PEOPLE'S COUNCILS IN THE PROMOTION OF SOCIALIST DEMOCRACY

During the present Sejm's term in office its role in our socialist democracy has increased. The steady functioning of the Sejm as the supreme body exercising control over government activities has become a normal practice. The Sejm meets at regular intervals and its commissions are active. The legislative activity of the Sejm has contributed to the consolidation of socialist law and order and to the growth of the prestige of state power.

The extension of the control functions of the Sejm is typical of its past activity. Government reports to the Sejm, information reports by Ministries and other departments to Sejm commissions, direct appraisal of groups of deputies with the local situation, and reports by the Supreme Control Chamber all indicated that the Sejm and its commissions and members kept in close touch with developments throughout the country and with the nation's major problems. The development of the institution of recommendations and proposals increased the Sejm's influence on the activities of the government, the Ministries and other departments, and has made criticism and intervention on the part of the deputies more effective. The Sejm was particularly active in working on economic development plans and drafting budgets.

The connection between deputies and constituents is typical of the socialist representative system. During the first three years of the present Sejm's term in office the deputies had 25,000 meetings with their constituents. However, these contacts were not maintained in a systematic manner in all the wojewodztwos and not all the deputies took part in them in equal measure.

There is a need further to extend contacts between deputies and constituents, to go into specific everyday problems of vital imporance, into public sentiment and opinion, to extend contacts between members of the Sejm, on the one hand, and members of the People's Councils, activists of the Party and the People's Unity Front, on the other, and also to coordinate the deputies' local work more closely with their parliamentary activity.

The past period of activity by the local elective bodies has brought serious changes into the powers and the style of work of the People's Councils. The nature of these changes was determined by the decisions of the Eighth Plenary Meeting of the CC in June 1961. At that time we stressed above all the necessity for decentralizing powers and responsibility in the Councils, and the need to promote their coordinating functions.

The main purpose of those decisions was to improve the work of the People's Councils, encourage their initiative and independent action in economic management and in the rallying of the population to fulfil our day-to-day construction plans.

The decentralization of economic management heightened the responsibility of hundreds of thousands of Party and non-Party activists for the state of the national economy. It increased their influence on the solution of important economic problems. Thereby it strengthened the democratic foundations of our social organization.

The transfer of many planning and managing functions from the center to the People's Councils at all levels expressed itself in the pattern of their budgets. The total quota of the budgets of local People's Council increased from 58,000 million zlotys in 1961 to roughly 77,000 million zlotys in 1965.

The highly dynamic growth of local budgets was due above all to the doubling of expenditures on agriculture and education, which from now on are covered almost entirely out of local budgets.

The problems of inter-branch territorial coordination of the work of various production and service establishments, as well as of mutual coordination in production, employment, service, cultural and social matters are acquiring prime importance. Only all-round coordination at local level can, in collaboration with central departments and associations, ensure the proper utilization of reserves, and reduce investment and production expenditures.

Local coordination should extend to every field of economic activity and should be recognized as a necessary component of the work of all the local administrative and economic agencies, a component producing optimum results in economic management.

The People's Councils must take part in drafting programs for economic activity and the technical reorganization of their districts and the units situated in them. These programs should reflect the economic potentialities of the districts concerned, reveal shortcomings and abnormalities in their previous development, and offer optimum variants of economic development.

The demand that the powiat, town and gromada Councils be allowed greater leeway in using the budget appropriations saved by them out of above-plan incomes is correct. This should result in greater economic returns, afford the Councils greater opportunities of taking the initiative, and enable them to fulfil their tasks more effectively.

IMPROVE MANAGEMENT AND STRENGTHEN THE LINKS BETWEEN THE COUNCILS AND THE PEOPLE

The concept of socialist state is a representative system based on the people sending their elected representatives to the organs of state power at all levels. The political forces and mass organizations operating in our country, which enhance the role of the representative bodies, are at the same time carrying on work aimed at promoting the initiative of millions of working people, improving all the various forms of public control over the functioning of the state apparatus and the management of socialist enterprises. Workers' self-government in production and in the sphere of the public services, self-government in the cooperative movement, whose influence extends to millions of people engaged in the movement, especially in the countryside, the tenants' self-government bodies, represented by block and settlement committees, and autonomous agricultural groups involving a sizeable part of the village constitute a mass school for management and administration, a school which inspires people with a sense of responsibility for the affairs of the state.

Consequently, the forms of organization of socialist democracy in our country are very broad and varied. To impart an appropriate content to them means educating and raising the efficiency of people day by day, steadily strengthening the links between deputies and constituents, increasing the role and influence of the representative bodies, and of the commissions they set up, on the activities of the administrative agencies. This necessarily means enhancing the responsibility of the executive bodies—the government and the presidiums of the People's Councils—to the Sejm and the People's Councils, and exercising control through the relevant commissions of the Sejm and the People's Councils over the activities of the central and local administrative bodies.

A special role in this extensive system of socialist democracy is assigned to the People's Councils, particularly those of their sections which are directly linked with the electors—to the town, district and gromada People's Councils.

The functions of the sessions of the Councils, and of the commissions and presidiums elected by them, as well as of the executive apparatus are being substantially extended. This is due to the increased coordination powers of the Councils in respect of the bodies and enterprises under central jurisdiction, to the extension of the powers of the commissions in respect of the Council departments, the further growth of local budgets, and hence the increased responsibility of the Councils and greater control by them.

The importance of the Council sessions has to be increased. It is true that they have become more effective in recent years and that the standard of the materials submitted to them has improved. But their work has many elements of perfunctoriness and the deputies' participation in the discussion of the various activities of the Councils' executive apparatus is still inadequate. Often the executive apparatus drafts Council decisions without consulting the organizations and collectives concerned. The method of questions by deputies during and between sessions is used to a very small extent. The Council sessions still give little attention to the problems of the key industries in terms of coordinating their solution with local economic activities. The links between trusts and Councils are not strong enough.

With a view to enhancing the authority of Council decisions, we must considerably increase the role of the commissions and deputies in verifying execution of the decisions.

The Council commissions at all levels should rally a large body of volunteers to recommend various measures, exercise draft decisions, and carry out analyses and tests.

To be able to work fruitfully, commissions and deputies should, first of all, maintain steady and all-round contacts with the electorate, give proper thought to electors' criticisms and proposals, and vigorously exercise direct and indirect public control.

In the newly-elected Councils there should be no such thing as passivity on the part of some deputies and a scornful attitude to meetings with the constituents—shorcomings which have marked the activity of the present Councils. The deputies are also duty bound to accept complaints, statements and proposals from their constituents at fixed hours. The prestige of the Councils and their members is gauged largely by the number of the problems they solve.

A better performance by the administrative bodies implies combating bureaucratic and arbitrary practices, low-standard work, and delays and red tape on the part of government offices and various Council departments in dealing with requests from the citizens. The code of administrative procedure adopted during the term in office of the present elected bodies went a considerable way toward improving the public services and promoting law and order. The Councils verified the proper execution of code provisions, and worked out the principles of dealing with applications and of supplying applicants with appropriate information. They brought a certain system into the matter of considering citizens' requests.

But these efforts have not yet become universal and are not effective enough. There is a continuous stream of complaints and statements flowing into the central bodies. Some of them are unsigned. These complaints and statements are prompted by distrust of the local bodies, a distrust which in turn is due to the indifference or scorn which this or that department of the administrative apparatus shows toward citizens' problems.

To combat these harmful practices, it is first of all necessary to pursue the right policy on personnel and to exercise effective public control on a large scale. It is necessary to improve the educational and political standards and the proficiency of administrative personnel. A great deal also depends on better functioning of the central bodies, which sometimes impose unnecessary tasks, many of which the lower bodies cannot cope with, demand countless reports, send the Councils circular letters and thousands of instructions that regulate the Councils' current activities much too scrupulously. The higher administrative bodies should concentrate on providing guidelines and exercising control over the execution of their instructions, and see to it that the staffs observe the principle of responsibility for independent decisions.

The Council deputies and commissions, whose paramount mission is to improve relations between government offices and citizens, has a special role to play in combating specific cases of bureaucratic approach, incompetence or evil intent. This should be made easier by having meetings with the electorate, receiving and examining complaints at work places, asking questions as to the protection of the interests of various groups of the population, exercising strict control over the procedure of examination of requests in government offices and Council departments, and systematically informing the electorate of the outcome of the examination of their requests or proposals.

The fruitful performance of their varied functions by the Councils should benefit in greater measure than before from the activities of the committees of the People's Unity Front, which unite over 500,000 volunteers. By cooperating with the Councils, block committees and other organizations, the Front committees greatly influence many aspects of our public life.

The electoral programs of the Front committees were carried out satisfactorily throughout their term of office, despite objective difficulties and financial restrictions.

The introduction of new forms of public control in trade, public catering and cooperatives under trade-union guidance will make it possible to enlist the effort of tens of thousands of volunteers in the fulfilment of the tasks of the Councils in protecting citizens' interests and in combating ignorance, abuses and theft. This task is all the more important because it is at local level that economic abuses and parasitism—which the Councils cannot combat effectively unless they resort to extensive public control — manifest themselves most frequently.

The Councils should draw cooperative organizations into the work of the local organs of people's power in greater measure, and should help them in carrying out important economic tasks.

The Councils should pay special attention to agricultural and rural housewives' groups and to the Rural Youth League.

During the present Councils' term in office the Party bodies concerned themselves in increasing measure with the Councils' problems. They did more than before to promote the specific activities of the Councils and the democratic forms these activities took, increase the role of the social factor and the effectiveness of Council sessions, ensure the exercise of their powers by the commissions, and enhance the deputies' prestige. Not all the Party bodies have made comparable progress in this respect. The old habit and tendency of duplicating the functions of representative bodies, which results in diminishing their constitutional role, still tell. This is why we must improve political guidance of the work of the Councils, consistently do away with injunction and the practice of duplicating the Councils in the performance of their functions, and increase the responsibility of their presidiums and commissions for the leadership of the national economy and for management at local level. The task of the Party bodies in promoting the constitutional role of the Councils is to conduct political work among the deputies and local administrative personnel, to guide the activities of deputies' clubs, and thereby to ensure the leading role of the Party membership in the social and professional machinery of the Councils' activity.

Greater activity by Communist deputies will ensure that Council sessions concern themselves primarily with the truly decisive local problems and become agencies for real and not perfunctory control over the activity of the presidiums as executive and administrative bodies and of the staffs subordinated to them, and that the commissions truly exercise control over the work of the departments. This concept of the role of the Party as the motive power of the Councils' democratic machinery will increase our role in society and make for increasing Council participation in socialist construction.

THE TASKS OF THE PARTY IN THE ELECTIONS

The elections to the Sejm and the People's Councils confront the Party with challenging tasks. It is useful to repeat here that the role of Party organizations is not limited to guaranteeing the proper course of the election campaign in terms of organization. The Party's activity during the election campaign should be aimed, as in the past, at fostering the political and economic activity of the masses, at increasing their socialist consciousness and sense of common responsibility for the destiny of the country and the towns, villages or gromadas concerned.

The election campaign provides conditions for improving the standard of work toward spelling out and fulfilling the decisions of the Fourth Congress, for extending the opportunities for the Party's political and organizational influence in order to strengthen the links between the Party and the people's government, on the one hand, and the working people in town and country, on the other.

The cardinal task of the Party in this campaign, particularly at its early stage, is an honest appraisal by the People's Councils and the committees of the People's Unity Front of the work done, and accounting to the electorate for the implementation of the electoral program of 1961.

Deputies' meetings with citizens, talks and discussions at factories, in the countryside, and various rallies make it possible not only to assess the work done by the organs of state power but also to ascertain the opportunities there are for the further economic and cultural advancement of each district. New local electoral programs of the People's Unity Front will take shape in the course of extensive dialogues with the electorate, of a comparison of local needs with national plans and with the means at the disposal of local authorities.

As they carry on their political work of drafting programs for the new organs of state power, Party organizations should skilfully bring local interests into harmony with the national interest, show the electorate the interconnection and inter-dependence of local and national plans, combat parochial attitudes, and decide local matters in the interest of the whole country.

Electoral programs should not be mere sets of promises. They should be programs for the activity of the organs of state power and of the population, realistic programs that rally the working people by drawing their attention to key national and local problems.

A political task of vast importance confronting the Party organizations today is to ensure the careful and proper selection of candidates for the Sejm and the People's Councils.

In nominating candidates fo relection to the People's Councils at all levels, the Party bodies must, as a rule, ascertain the opinion people at his work place have of his performance and his social activity. Candidates put forward by workers' collectives should be discussed at open Party meetings. In the case of candidates representing a certain social environment, such as the teaching profession, the health services or the handicrafts, it is necessary to ascertain the opinion of the relevant staffs and voluntary organizations.

As in the past, electoral lists of the People's Unity Front should include, in addition to members of our Party and other political parties, a substantial number of non-party people comrades. The proportion of non-party members during the present term in office was 3.4 percent on the gromada Councils, almost 29 percent on the powiat and town councils, and 19 percent on the wojewodztwo Councils. The cooperation of non-party activists representing diverse sections of the population and mass organizations in accordance with the general principles of the PUF is most desirable and should continue in the new Councils to be elected.

During the coming election campaign we intend to discuss candidates more extensively than before at village meetings, in settlement and town electoral districts, and everywhere else. The new candidates nominated during these discussions, and all comments and doubts regarding the nominees, should be carefully studied and taken into consideration — provided they are reasonable — when taking a final decision on the list of candidates. The experience of previous election campaigns shows that consideration of the proposals of the public not only contributes to the nomination of suitable candidates, but also creates a sound political atmosphere of support for all the Front candidates, ensures the massive appearance of the electors at the polls, and makes for closer links between the organs of state power and the public.

Increasing claims will be made on deputies as the role of the Sejm and the People's Councils grows. In addition to excellent political, moral and social qualities, candidates should be distinguished for their active part in the implementation of the Front program. They should enjoy high prestige and the trust of the population. Besides, they should have a sound knowledge of popular sentiment and of the problems facing various segments of the population. It is a question of composing the Councils in such a way as to enable them not only to properly represent the social composition of our society but also to perform the role of organs of state power in practice, coordinate economic activities at local level, indicate the right direction of administrative activity and exercise control over it.

The social and professional composition of the Councils at all levels should reflect the composition of the electorate in the right proportion. It should reflect the changes in this sphere resulting from industrialization, shifts in industry and investment, progress in agriculture, and improvements in the people's cultural standard.

The Councils elected previously had a greater proportion than before of deputies from among the workers and people representing the staffs of large industrial establishments. Furthermore, they had a considerably greater proportion of deputies who had received a complete elementary, secondary or higher education. These changes, which are in keeping with the evolution of our social organization, should be carried forward in the coming election campaign, and should make for increased participation in the Councils by workers, engineers, technologists and economists engaged in industry and building. Hence it is necessary to have on the Councils corresponding proportions of activists of trade unions and the cooperative movement, and of people active in science, culture and the health service—with due regard to local conditions.

Our Party will continue to seek greater participation in local government bodies by women, above all those active in the Women's League and in rural working women's groups, as well as those representing youth organizations—the Rural Youth League and the Socialist Youth League, who initiate many social events, with the youth participating en masse.

In determining the proportional composition of the future People's Councils, account should be taken of the need to preserve continuity in their work and to reinforce them with new people. Many Councils are in need of new people well versed in economic matters, while leaving former active and tested deputies in the electoral lists, we must see to it that the composition of the Councils is renewed.

Our Party will accomplish its tasks in the election campaign in close collaboration with the United Peasant Party and the Democratic Party. This is why the fundamental provisions of plans for the election campaign, guidelines for political work among ehe masses, lists of candidates, and draft election programs should be carefully discussed—prior to announcement at meetings of the PUE committees—by the local coordinating committees of the political parties.

The working people's growing sense of responsibility for the affairs of the country, their increasing sense of dignity, their growing participation in the management of enterprises and the administration of gromadas and towns, in the joint administration of Poland, constitute a valuable achievement of our system and are the result of our educational work. The election campaign will provide every opportunity of fostering this social consciousness. If we are to attain this, the election campaign should not be reduced to a mechanical procedure but should become an act of mobilization of the public for the fulfilment of current and long-range tasks in socialist construction. It should bring the organs of people's power still closer to the people and contribute to the rallying of the whole of society around our Party within the People's Unity Front.

SPEECH* BY WLADYSLAW GOMULKA

We are again advancing to the elections in a political alliance with the United Peasant Party and the Democratic Party. Our Party will play the leading role in this alliance of three parties, which during the elections will find vivid expression in the joint list of PUF candidates, an alliance based on the autonomy of each party, welded by common general objectives and aspirations, and cemented by daily cooperation over many years.

The political alliance of the PUWP, UPP and DP, and the joint lists of candidates and the organs of state power brought into being by it constitute a tremendous political achievement of People's Poland.

Anti-Polish propaganda centers abroad and the anti-socialist elements at home know from experience that no direct attacks on our socialist system meet with a favorable social response. In twenty years the overwhelming majority of the people and the younger generation, which has been educated in new social conditions, have become fused ideologically with socialism as a system superior to the capitalist system.

It is not surprising that our enemies, while carrying on violent anti-Communist propaganda, avoid direct attacks on the socialist system. They do not venture to recommend the capitalist system to the Polish people in so many words, and the more astute of them even suggest carrying on anti-Communist propaganda, and actually carry it on, under the slogan of "improving" socialism—in the bourgeois sense, of course.

The socialist and democratic masks which the enemies of socialism and democracy put on cannot mislead anyone. The fact that enemy propaganda has to use them is proof of the popularity of socialism, of people's democracy, among our people. The socialist system of People's Poland came into being and grew by the will of the masses and is based on a large network of genuinely democratic institutions.

Our Party, which is operating in a political bloc with the UPP and DP, is not only the spokesman of the working class, that leading force of the people, but also the party of the alliance of the workers and peasants, the party of the alliance of the working class and the intellectuals, the spokesman of the working people in town and country, the proponent of the interests of the whole people. Our Party, which numbers over 1.6 million full and candidate members, unites not only the foremost segment of the working class but also a large number of peasants associated with our ideology, and a very substantial proportion of intellectuals active in various fields.

Hence, the three-party system in our country does not mean that the different parties forming it represent different working classes and social strata. This system is rooted in our country's traditional multi-party system. In the new, socialist conditions it expresses itself in the activity of the UPP and the DP, which are not Marxist parties but have embarked on socialist construction in People's Poland under the leadership of our Party.

The political alliance of the PUWP, UPP and DP provides a solid foundation on which all sections of society, the working people in town and country, rally around people's rule and the objective of socialist construction.

The People's Unity Front offers ample scope for patriotic-minded non-party people — irrespective of their religious convictions or political record — who are aware of their duty toward society and want to serve their country, which is building socialism. It also allows scope for the socio-political groupings of Catholic laymen, not as bodies representing all who profess Catholicism, but as representatives of the social strata which seek in the Christian world outlook a justification for their favorable attitude to people's power and for their patriotic activity.

Based on these principles, the PUF, which rallies all the active social forces around the political alliance of the three parties under the leadership of our Party, is in harmony with socialist democracy and with the chief trends of its development in our country.

During the term in office of the present Sejm and People's Councils our country expanded and strengthened the bonds of friendship, alliance and mutual assistance with all its neighbors, with the Warsaw Treaty countries and with other socialist countries. On the international scene it came out as an ally of all the peoples defending their freedom, their right to independent existence and sovereignty. As for its policy toward the capitalist countries, our country based it on the principle of peaceful coexistence.

Our voice, our initiative in favor of detente, disarmament and the peaceful settlement of conflicts, our contribution to the peace policies of all the socialist countries helped Poland to gain in international prestige and world renown.

Upon the election of new organs of state power we will in common with our allies consistently pursue our foreign policy of peace and consolidate the position of Poland as a member of the great community of socialist nations. Fraternal friendship and close alliance with the Soviet Union and the other Warsaw Treaty countries, a political, economic and defensive alliance, which from the early days of People's Poland has safeguarded our state frontiers and the security and development of our country, are the invariable guiding principle of our foreign policy.

The weight and importance of the Polish-Soviet alliance are exceptionally great. It has three main, closely interconnected aspects:

1. The Polish-Soviet alliance is a highly important factor for the security and development of our country and, therefore, meets the vital interests—both current and historical—of the Polish people and state.

2. The Polish-Soviet alliance is a key component of the Warsaw Treaty, which raises an insurmountable barrier to the intrigues and plans for aggression of the West German imperialists and hence plays a tremendous part in guaranteeing European and world peace.

3. The Polish-Soviet alliance also meets the vital interests of the Soviet Union and its peoples, for it promotes the security and international position of the Soviet state.

This alliance is also an important factor for the unity of the socialist camp and is, therefore, in the interest of all the socialist countries and world peace.

The vast importance of the Polish-Soviet alliance is realized and fully appreciated not only by our Party, but also by the Polish people as a whole. It is also realized by the enemies of People's Poland and of socialism, by all the apologists for reaction and imperialism.

In fighting against People's Poland—a fight which is part of the general imperialist fight against the world socialist system and its leading force, the Soviet Union—our enemies use diverse methods, mostly maneuvers designed to undermine the friendship and alliance joining Poland and the Soviet Union. As far as our enemies and all opponents of socialism are concerned, this is the important thing in the present stage of the struggle between the two social systems.

The strength of all the socialist countries hinges on unity. To deprive them of unity, to loosen the bonds of alliance joining them together, particularly the bonds with the Soviet Union, means dooming them to weakness and allowing the enemies of socialism to eat them up by the "evolutionary" process. People's Poland owes its strength and dynamic development not only to the socialist system, which releases the creative energy of the people, but also to its friendship, cooperation and alliance with the socialist countries, with the Soviet Union, to its membership of the socialist community, to its foreign policy, which is guided by our Party and is invariably based on the internationalist principles of unity and solidarity of all the socialist countries.

We Poles are unafraid of the revenge-seeking intrigus of the Bonn government and the West German militarists. They, for their part, do not entertain the illusion that their territorial claims on Poland can be played as a Polish-German game of chess. Poland has no common frontier with the FRG but only with the GDR, which has long since recognized the Polish-German frontier along the Oder and Neisse. Territorial claims made by one state on another state separated from it by a third would be absurd did not the FRG pin its revanchist hopes on a world war.

That is the key to an understanding of the policy of Bonn, which doggedly clings to its revanchist illusion as it tries hard to secure nuclear weapons for the Bundeswehr.

Poland insists that the Western powers officially recognize the Polish-German frontier along the Oder and Neisse, not because in the absence of such recognition it will be uncertain of the stability and inviolability of this frontier, but because it wants to promote European peace, which is threatened by the West German militarists, by the Bonn government and its policy of territorial claims. Official recognition of our western frontier by the West would be a step beneficial to peace and hence to Poland. It would be a blow only to the West German forces of aggression and other similar forces allied with them and basing their policy on the concept of an armed conflict in Europe and the rest of the world.

The time will no doubt come, sooner or later, when the Western powers officially recognize the present Polish-German state frontier as final. The Polish people would accept such an act with proper respect. But it would in no way influence our foreign policy, our attitude to the Soviet Union, to the unity of the socialist countries. In today's world, which is divided into two social systems, the security and inviolability of our western and northern frontiers would continue to be based, even after the Western powers, including the FRG, had recognized them as final, on the unbreakable alliance with the Soviet Union and other socialist countries.

However, there is no promise today of a positive change in the attitude of the West, particularly the FRG, toward our frontier along the Oder and Neisse.

Today, twenty years after the defeat of Hitler Germany, the significance of the Polish-Soviet treaty of alliance is as great as in the early postwar years, when the socialist countries of Europe, faced with the threat of a revival of German imperialism and of a new aggression on its part, were rallying together and strengthening their defenses.

Today the socialist countries' unity is just as necessary, just as indispensable, for the maintenance of peace, for a peaceful solution of the German problem, for the struggle for disarmament and the elimination of hotbeds of armed conflict, for the safeguarding of the sovereignty of the peoples against imperialist intervention.

Shifts in the balance of world forces in favor of socialism and the national-liberation movement have entailed a crisis of the imperialist "positions of strength" policy and increased in some ruling quarters of the West the tendency in favor of peaceful coexistence. But the forces of aggression, which are trying to resolve the crisis of their "position of strength" policy through various acts of aggression, as is evident from the continuing imperialist intervention against the peoples of Africa, Southeast Asia and Latin America, particularly the present U.S. intervention in Indochina, which is coupled with increasingly frequent attacks on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, still predominate.

America's intervention in South Vietnam in support of the anti-Communist regime so hateful to the population, gangster methods of blackmailing the DRV, the bombings of DRV territory, the killing of innocent people, of women and children, by the U.S. invaders, have created a situation threatening world peace.

The U.S. intervention in Vietnam must stop if a new dangerous world crisis is to be avoided.

Of decisive importance for reversing the course of events imperilling peace and for waging a victorious fight against imperialism, in defense of peace, against neo-colonialism, for the freedom of the oppressed peoples, is the solidarity of all the revolutionary forces of the world—the Communist movement, the commonwealth of socialist nations, the national-liberation movement and the international working class. Had not the solidarity of these forces, based chiefly on the unity of the socialist camp, been impaired, imperialism could not have ventured on the series of acts of aggression which it is committing today against the national-liberation movement.

Unity of action of the socialist camp and the world Communist movement in the struggle against imperialism, for peace, for the freedom and independence of the peoples, is an absolute necessity of our time. With a view to strengthening this unity, our Party has joined a considerable majority of the Communist and Workers' parties of the world in declaring for the preparation and convening of a new conference of all the Communist and Workers' parties. The first step toward it was the Consultative Meeting of 19 parties held in Moscow. The Communique, which sums up the results of the Meeting, recommends holding "a Preliminary Consultative Conference of representatives of the 81 parties that gathered at the 1960 Meeting" in order to discuss the question of a new international meeting. Our Party unreservedly supports this recommendation of the 19 parties and fully approves of the content of the Communique released by them. We, for our part, will do all in our power to contribute to the solidarity of the socialist countries and the world Communist movement as a whole. The Polish people and all the peace- and freedom-loving peoples have a big stake in this.

RESOLUTIONS* OF THE CC, RUMANIAN WORKERS' PARTY

I. REINFORCEMENT OF THE PARTY RANKS AND THE TRAINING AND PROMOTION OF PERSONNEL

The Central Committee puts on record that the task of further strengthening the ranks of the Party, set by the CC meeting in April 1962, has been fully carried out. Towards the end of 1944 the Party had 1,337,847 full and candidate members, as against 919,873 in April 1962. Workers make up 44.16 percent of the membership, peasants 32.98, and intellectuals, office employees and other categories 22.86 percent, the proportion of industrial and agricultural specialists, teachers, lecturers and other cultural workers being 9.43 percent.

The meeting notes an increase in the Party membership in the main spheres of economic, social and cultural activity. In such important industries as metallurgy, mining, the oil and power industries and engineering, Party members and candidate members account for 30 to 32 percent of the personnel.

There is a substantial increase in Party membership in the countryside. Compared with April 1962, the number of full and candidate members from among the peasants has more than doubled, with the result that many new Party organizations have come into being in the countryside and the Party has gained in strength considerably.

The enrolment in recent years of prominent scientists, cultural workers, engineers, technicians, university lecturers, teachers, writers and artists will greatly help Party organizations to cope with scientific and technological problems of production and promote science, literature and art.

The national composition of the Party reflects that of the population. Rumanians account for 87.33 percent of the membership, Hungarians for 9.28, and Germans, Serbs and people of other nationalities for 3.39 percent.

The ideological and political maturity of the membership has grown and its cultural standard has improved. Almost all the full and candidate members are engaged in Party studies in some form or other. More than 90 percent of the Party workers have finished central or regional Party schools or night schools of Marxism-Leninism.

Party bodies steadfastly concern themselves with the promotion of professionally and politically competent people enjoying prestige to key posts in the Party, the mass organizations, the government apparatus and the economy. Over 76 percent of the Party workers have been doing Party work for five years or more. Over 67 percent of the managers and 58 percent of the head engineers of enterprises of national importance have an industrial service record of more than ten years. All this is a result of the Party's effort to have a stable body of personnel well versed in Party work and industrial management and to promote their competence.

The annual membership meetings and conferences held between October 1964 and January 1965 were attended by 96.1 percent of the full and candidate members, with 436,000 Communists, or one-third of those attending, taking part in the debate. They showed the steady progress of organizational and political work, the enhancement of the Party's leading role in every field, the Communists' striving to solve the major problems of their work, and their increased sense of duty. They also showed an improvement in the style and methods of work of the Party bodies and organizations, and revealed their consistent adherence to the principle of collective work.

These meetings and conferences furnished added evidence of Party unity and of the determination of the membership to devote all their energies to the implementation of the political line of the Party.

Altogether 276,630 Communists were elected members of district, city or local Party committees, or group organizers. More than half of the members of the Party bodies and almost two-thirds of the secretaries of local Party organizations and committees were re-elected, and 122,000 Communists were elected for the first time. This ensures continuity and the passing on of experience, as well as the reinforcement of Party bodies with new members.

This meeting of the CC appreciates the fact that while maintaining the right proportion of industrial workers, the membership elected numerous peasants and other workers in agriculture, engineers, technicians, economists and cultural workers to the leading bodies of the Party.

Discussion in Party organizations of major economic, social and cultural problems and important initiatives of the Party and the Government in domestic or foreign policy is of special moment for socialist construction and efficient Party work.

Having analyzed the results achieved in reinforcement of the Party ranks, the Central Committee of the Rumanian Workers' Party resolves:

1. To continue focussing attention on the political, moral and professional qualities of applicants for membership with a view to reinforcing the Party ranks still further. Party building work should be geared, as before, to the consolidation of local organizations in the key branches of economic and cultural activity. A special effort will be made to strengthen the Party organizations at new enterprises, construction projects, in production teams, agricultural cooperatives, schools and trading establishments.

2. Party bodies and organizations should steadfastly concern themselves with raising the ideological and political level and encouraging the initiative and political consciousness of the membership, which should be educated in the spirit of patriotism and socialist internationalism, and equipped with a knowledge of Party and government decisions, the Party's position on the main issues of the world Communist and working-class movement, and the foreign policy of our state.

3. The Central Committee instructs the Party bodies to continue promoting the best workers and peasants, the best technicians, engineers and other intellectuals who have a sound political and ideological grounding, high professional qualifications and executive and organizational experience, enjoy prestige among the masses, and wholly devote themselves to the implementation of the political line of the Party, to leading posts in the Party, the mass organizations, the economy and the state apparatus.

4. It is the duty of Party bodies and organizations carefully and patiently to help leading personnel, especially newly-promoted workers, to improve their style and methods of work and carry out their tasks as fruitfully as possible.

5. Party bodies and organizations should periodically analyze the practice of admitting new Party members and of training and promoting personnel, the style and methods of work of Party bodies, and the ideological and political training of full and candidate members of the Party, and take appropriate measures.

6. Party bodies should pay special attention to the promotion of inner-Party democracy, to the consistent application of the collective principle in every aspect of their work. They should see to it that the entire membership takes on active part in the discussion and fulfillment of their tasks by Party organizations, and should enhance the guiding role of the Party in every field of activity.

II. THE RESULTS OF THE ELECTIONS TO THE GRAND NATIONAL ASSEMBLY AND THE PEOPLE'S COUNCILS

The Central Committee considers that the elections to the Grand National Assembly and the People's Councils were a vivid proof of the democratic nature of our society, and of the high patriotic and civic consciousness of all the working people of our country.

The elections demonstrated the unbreakable unity linking the people with the Party and the Government. The almost unanimous vote cast for the candidates of the People's Democratic Front was indicative for our people's full approval of the home and foreign policy pursued by the Rumanian Workers' Party and the Government of the Rumanian People's Republic, of our people's firm belief in the correctness of this policy.

Political and organizational work was conducted among millions of working people during the election campaign. About 9,500,000 citizens attended meetings with candidates and submitted more than 170 suggestions, and most of them pledged to help translate them into reality. A total of 141,884 deputies were elected to the People's Councils, 44 percent of them for the first time.

The task of the central and local government bodies is to ensure the realization of the numerous valuable suggestions made by citizens during the election campaign. Party bodies should assist the People's Councils in improving their work, help the deputies perform their important functions, and generalize the valuable experience gained during the election campaign in order to strengthen the Party's links with the masses.

In view of the complexity of the tasks in socialist construction, the Grand National Assembly should regularly discuss major economic, social, cultural and political problems. The deputies are duty bound to maintain close contact with the population and to report periodically to their constituents.

The Central Committee of the Rumanian Workers' Party expresses confidence that in preparing for the Fourth Congress of the Party the workers, peasants, intellectuals and all the citizens of our country will redouble their efforts to complete socialist construction and ensure the vigorous development of our country for the good of our people, for the good of socialism and world peace.

RENOVATION AND EXTENSION OF DEMOCRACY

STATEMENT* BY THE ELEVENTH CONGRESS OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF NORWAY

The pace of development is swift in our time. The worldwide system of open colonial oppression has collapsed in the course of a few years. More and more coutnries are winning national freedom. The capitalist world system is losing ground while the socialist world system is rapidly strengthening its position. The appeal of socialism is steadily growing all over the globe. More and more people and countries are taking the socialist road. Socialism is renovating the world.

On the other hand, the peoples are faced with serious problems fraught with danger. The arms race continues, swallowing up enormous values. Thousands of atom bombs are poised threateningly over the world. In an effort to hold other countries and peoples under their sway, the imperialist countries constantly create situations which may lead to a disastrous big war. The U.S. action in Vietnam today is the most dangerous instance of this.

In West Germany, militarism again has its hands free, which spells an increasing danger for Europe as well. However, the peace forces of the world are strong enough to prevent war provided they act together.

The socialist system, the new national states, and the people's active fight for peace in every country are the surest safeguard against the war danger. By joining their forces they can thwart the schemes of adventurers bent on war, and enable the policy of peaceful coexistence to pave the way for a peaceful world.

The Communist Party of Norway sees it as its task to work for Norway's and the Norwegian people's active resistance to all war provocations, and to foster their international effort for detente, disarmament and peace.

In so doing, the CPN comes out against all racial discrimination and condemns it as inhuman. We will work for our people actively expressing their support for the national-liberation movements, which are fighting for freedom and the right to self-determination.

National sovereignty and independence are prerequisites for the Norwegian people to be able to shape the future of the country.

*Friheten, April 2, 1965.

They will also enable us, a peace-loving people, to contribute in full measure to peace, peaceful coexistence, detente, and total disarmament. Although Norway has a small population, it can play a positive role in world politics.

The Norwegian people should be on their guard against new attempts to maneuver Norway into the Common Market or other economic or political blocs of a similar nature, which would further prejudice our national sovereignty in important spheres. Norway's foreign relations, in both the economic and the political fields, should be based on the principle: Norway and the whole world.

A BROAD ALLIANCE TO EXTEND DEMOCRACY

Our society has also undergone great changes as a result of rapid progress in science and technology.

The country has benefited from a long period of economic uptrend, and the working people have been able to improve their living standards by promoting the growth of production and fighting for economic and social progress.

However, this improvement has been out of step with the growth of production. Although the Workers' Party has been in power for thirty years now, there has been no stimulus for democratic changes in the capitalist social system that would put progress on a solid basis. No steps have been taken to democratize the economic life of society.

On the contrary, there has been a marked concentration of capital. The power of big capital has grown considerably in these years, and has come to influence government policies in increasing measure. The Workers' Party and its government have chosen to rule WITH big capital rather than AGAINST.

In place of that policy, the task to set before Norway's working people today is the fight for reforms limiting the power of big capital and extending democracy.

Norwegian politics are in need of socialist renovation. The nation needs a new policy recognizing the class struggle and putting forward a clear socialist perspective.

Class relations in Norwegian society show that there are objective opportunities for a broad popular alliance to restrict the power of big capital. This alliance could go much further than the working-class movement and its parties.

Workers, office employees, peasants, fishermen, handicrafts-men and other small producers, scientists and technologists would be natural allies within this association based on far-reaching common interests.

THE MAIN ISSUE OF DEMOCRACY

By fighting over a long period, the Norwegian people have many democratic rights. The CPN regards it as its natural duty to oppose any curtailment of these rights. The Communists are for greater democracy in every social sphere.

Extension of the people's democratic rights is a condition for the all-round development of Norwegian society. The people shouuld at every stage have a sovereign right to choose their own way. These principles determine the Communists' attitude to our democracy.

Today it is also necessary to democratize the foundation of society — economic life, the industries — in order further to release the creative forces of our people. The material and cultural growth of the country is a result of the working people's effort. Every working man or woman should therefore have the right to take part in all important decisions bearing on labor relations and other social matters. An active contribution by major trade unions and other social and cultural organizations of the people should be an important element of our democracy, one giving it vigour and content. The struggle for democracy in labor relations is in the forefront now.

It is a question of having representatives of the factory and office workers — to be elected by the employees themselves or by their organizations — in the very management of big enterprises, on boards and councils, so as to make real co-management and control possible.

To extend and renovate democracy the government should gain control over the more important private sources of investment and financing and pursue in these spheres a policy in line with the interests of the nation. A sizeable body of public representatives in major private institutions, which would enable the state to control bank loans, and the establishment of a state bank of commerce coud be the first step in this direction. Public control should also extend to the activity of insurance companies in the sphere of loans.

To gain full control over the country's economic command positions, the state should take over the biggest banks, primarily the Norske Creditbank, Bergens Privatbank and Christiania Bankog Kreditkasse, and the key monopoly enterprises.

Our Party considers itself duty bound to take the initiative of fostering democratic progress at as rapid a pace as possible, both locally and in terms of the provinces and the country as a whole.

Democracy should be guaranteed and built up at the national as well as communal level. It is particularly important to stop the present process of transferring to the administrative bodies the power which belongs to the bodies elected by the people, such as the Storting and the communal councils. The establishment of mammoth communes is fraught with the danger of undemocratic administration at the expense of democracy in the communes. All the major communes should have the administrative bodies decentralized to bring the responsible executive bodies nearer to the ordinary man and his problems. Closely linked with this is the important task of counteracting in every commune increasing inroads by the state, which disrupt communal self-government.

To safeguard self-government and democracy in the communes is a matter that has the greatest bearing on the prosperity of the people and on democratic progress.

It is necessary to introduce an absolutely equitable electoral system that will give us a Storting corresponding to the number of votes polled by each party all over the country. There is a need for democratic reforms making it possible to dissolve the Storting and announce extraordinary elections. The CPN favors nation-wide referendums on issues of great importance for the country and the life of the people.

The CPN sees it as its task to advocate renovation of the policy of the entire working-class movement in the country. This policy should include all that is valuable in our people's democratic traditions, and its ultimate goal should be to establish a parliamentary socialist republic.

GREATER EFFORT BY SOCIETY FOR THE COUNTRY'S PROGRESS

In the prevailing capitalist conditions, the development of the country is becoming more and more lopsided. Certain areas of the country and communes are threatened with depopulation. Society should take proper measures to remedy this trend. It should channel investments to industrially underdeveloped areas by controlling and regulating them, make large investments for its part and allot state funds and facilities for the development of big and small centers in the various districts.

Industrialization can be carried out both through direct public investment and on private lines. In line with the task of democratizing economic public measures. Today it is necessary and expedient to leave the solution of many minor industrial problems to private individuals. Society should stimulate measures facilitating new industrial development where it is needed first and foremost.

The CPN will concern itself with these questions specifically, both at local level and in terms of the provinces and the country as a whole. It will initiate appropriate measures upon ascertaining requirements and possibilities. Naturally, it will seek the broadest possible cooperation with all who are interested in the early fulfilment of this great development task of the country.

The development of agriculture, forestry and fishing industry should also be promoted with due regard to the interests of society and the individual. One of the nation's tasks today is to ease conditions for the small farmers instead of making things difficult for him. It is in the interest of both society and the individual to safeguard the existence of the rural population.

Price increases must be stopped if the economy is to develop on a sound basis. Inflation is not needed to ensure full employment and economic growth. It badly undermines the economy and causes growing concern. Rising prices affect primarily wage labor. To protect the interests of the working people, it is necessary to use, among other things, the powers given by the law of prices. In particular, society's price policy should come out firmly against the huge profits the big capitalists now make.

The great increase in labor productivity shows that working time can be reduced far more quickly. Automation and the steadily growing intensity of labor stress the need for the working-class movement as a whole to demand a five-day week and the reduction of working time to forty hours a week as one of the reforms that should be carried out in the near future.

There are tasks to accomplish in the social and cultural spheres as well:

—Pensioning should be so organized as to enable everyone to enjoy this social achievement before he is too old; adequate old age pensions should be provided for all irrespective of their previous incomes.

—Housing construction should be substantially expanded — to no less than 40,000 to 45,000 new flats annually. Credit terms for construction should be such as to enable everyone to acquire suitable housing. Interest on housing loans should therefore not be raised. Allowances should be preserved.

—Basic nine-year school education should be introduced throughout the country within a short space of time, on the fundamental principle that all young people should, wherever they live and whatever the economic position of the family, shall have equal rights and opportunities to receive a general education, which will make possible all further studies. Knowledge is an imperative necessity in our time and society should give the youth the opportunity to acquire it. Everyone should gain access to cultural benefits. Research is a public concern of paramount importance.

DISENGAGEMENT FROM NATO

The 11th Congress of the CPN stresses that the fight for peace, for the prevention of a new world war, is every Communist's foremost task today. The Norwegian people should as a nation make a positive contribution to peace, to the promotion of relations between peoples based on the principles of peaceful coexistence.

When the Storting meets again in session Norway will have contractual opportunities of withdrawing from NATO. Norway should get rid of this alliance with the imperialist powers and adopt a neutral status guaranteed by the great powers. There is a need to discuss the possibility of forming a neutrality alliance of the Northern countries. A group of neutral, non-aligned states in the North would be a highly important peace factor.

Even before disengaging itself from NATO, Norway could take the initiative of easing tension. The Norwegian government should stop slavishly accepting every measure or act of provocation by the United States and our other imperialist "allies." It should have the strength to uphold its own views.

In NATO, Norway should emphatically oppose the formation of a multilateral nuclear force and other measures likely to lead in fact to the proliferation of atomic weapons. Norway's policy on bases should consistently uphold the principle: all facilities for the armed forces of other countries should be abolished and all military maneuvers on Norwegian soil involving foreign armed forces ended. Norwegian troops should be commanded by Norwegians.

A Norwegian initiative aimed at making the North an atom free zone under an appropriate treaty would contribute appreciably toward relaxing tension. Our people's resolve to defend their national freedom should not be exploited for the atomic strategy of "balance of fear." The Congress refers to the provisions of the Party Program regarding the defense of the country's neutrality, an independent, democratic and national defense in keeping with the natural conditions of the country.

The CPN states its fundamental position in favor of a cut in armaments and of complete disarmament throughout the world. The Party will work to ensure that Norway takes the initiative of fostering this development and proceeds to set a positive example. The UN should be strengthened as an important factor for peace and international cooperation.

UNITY OF THE WORKING CLASS MOVEMENT

The working-class movement must rally closer together and strengthen its unity if Norway's working people are to carry out the great decisive action that must extend democracy and bring about socialist renovation. The existence of a strong and united trade union organization in our country provides a solid class basis for the promotion of unity in the trade union, economic and political spheres.

It is exceedingly important for the trade unions to take an active part in the political activity of the working-class movement. They should seek for forms of activity that will rally the membership for an active political contribution in favor of common demands. The CPN regards political party membership as a personal matter and is therefore against the principle of collective membership of political parties.

What presents a serious difficulty for the organization of joint action is that there are three political parties in the working-class movement today. The right of each party to seek new members should be respected, but it is also necessary for all the three parties to realize that joint actions benefit the working-class movement as a whole.

Differences over fundamental issues as well as on matters of practical politics should not be an obstacle to the joining of forces to solve problems on which views converge. A common fight for common interests lays the most solid foundation for working-class unity. But all the three parties should contribute to the achievement of progress in this respect.

The CPN will for its part cooperate in establishing comradely relations between all working people at work — places and in workers', office employees', fishermen's and peasant organizations. Such relations are essential for solid unity.

This is how the CPN will work to pave the way for renovation throughout the working-class movement, a renovation that can help our people to make great strides forward.

The CPN calls for a rallying of forces in order to lead the people on, to a socialist society, through extended democracy.

THE SITUATION IN THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

STATEMENT BY THE 11TH CONGRESS OF THE CPN

The 11th Congress of the Communist Party of Norway takes note of and approves the line pursued by the Party's Central Board with regard to the disagreements in the world Communist movement.

That line was set forth in a Central Board statement in January 1963. In that statement and in a later and more detailed document — the new Program adopted by the Party Conference in 1963 — the Party took a stand on the more important questions with which the international debate has been concerned. The Party line was also expressed in subsequent statements, specifically at the Party Conference in April 1964.

This Congress states that the Party has unanimously supported that line. This provided the basis for the CPN's contribution to the effort to reduce the damage which the exacerbation of the struggle between parties has caused to the world Communist movement. On the basis of this unity the Party was able to support the increasingly insistent demand of our movement that the differences which naturally arise be held in businesslike and comradely forms and that the dispute be prevented from extending to the relations between socialist state. In carrying on this effort, the Party has always maintained that all the Communist parties are on common ground and that what unites our parties is far stronger than that which at the moment disunites them.

Concerning the preparation and convening of a new world Communist conference, the CPN has consistently upheld the view that such a conference can restore unity provided all the parties agree to attend. The latest experience shows that comprehensive preparations are required to achieve this aim and that they will take much effort and time. There is a need for consultations and contacts between representatives of all the parties, for meetings between two or more parties to discuss and clear up questions of common interest, and for committees representing several parties to discuss the new problems that have cropped up in our international movement. All this is needed for the gradual development of new forms of unity of our movement. Special attention should be focussed on the common tasks and objectives in the fight against imperialism and neo-colonialism, against monopoly domination, for the people's liberation movement, in defense of all the peoples hit by imperialist aggression, for a world peace based on respect for the independent and territorial integrity of every country. This concentration on pressing tasks will help more than anything else to bring the various views on the cardinal problems of our time closer together.

The 11th Congress of the CPN stresses that these efforts should be based entirely on the standards of cooperation between parties set by previous world conferences, namely, the complete equality and independence of all the parties, and non-interference in the internal affairs of fraternal parties. The willingness of every party to contribute to the effort for reestablishing the unity of our world movement is a requisite for the observance of these standards.

The 11th Congress of the CPN states that the Meeting of 19 Communist parties held from March 1-5 last proceeded as a consultative meeting searching for new ways and means of promoting the solidarity and restoring the unity of the Communist movement. The Communique of the Meeting pointed to a number of measures likely to foster unity. This Congress also welcomes with satisfaction the Conference of 20 fraternal Latin American countries held in Havana in January 1965, as an important step toward strengthening our international front and consolidating its unity.

This Congress supports the proposal put forward by several fraternal parties for a conference of all the Communist parties of the capitalist countries of Europe to discuss their joint struggle for common aims. It will be an important step toward unity of action in the fight against imperialism, for the fullest support of the liberation movement of the peoples, for world peace and the peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems, and for the vital interests and socialist goals of the working class. Joint actions in the fight for these common goals are the surest way to promote unity and fraternal cooperation in our movement.

STATEMENT BY THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF SPAIN

The Executive Committee of the Communist Party of Spain, having discussed with great interest the Communique of the Consultative meeting held in Moscow at the beginning of March, approves of the proposals contained in the Communique.

We consider the Meeting an important contribution to the search for appropriate ways of strengthening world Communist unity on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.

It is imperative for the consolidation of our movement that every Communist display the highest sense of responsibility. We must all forge, gradually and through sincere and fruitful exchanges of opinions and experience, fraternal ties which should naturally exist between parties guided by Marxist-Leninist principles.

At present we are faced with a danger which cannot be ignored in discussing the issue of unity of the socialist camp and the world Communist movement — the barbarous aggression of the U.S. imperialists against the Democratic Republic of Vietnam. A socialist country has been subjected to piratic attacks, with the use of such means of warfare as gases, which even the Nazis did not dare to use. This foul aggression demands concerted action by all the peoples, the Communists in the first place, in defense of the heroic Vietnamese people. The U.S. imperialists' aggression gravely endangers world peace. Unless countered with united actions by all the peace forces, they may draw the world into a nuclear conflict with terrible consequences.

It is to be admitted that the differencs in our movement and the sharp form the polemic has taken, as well as the splitting activities, far from helping to curb the more aggressive circles of U.S. imperialism, will serve as a kind of stimulus to them. This state of affairs does not contribute to unity but, on the contrary, aggravates the split of the colossal forces of the peace camp, which can and must resist the imperialists. This alone should be sufficient reason for all the Communist parties to rally their ranks and try to overcome the obstacles to closer unity.

The CPS considers that in a world where profound social changes are taking place, where the might of the socialist camp is growing from day to day, and where the ideas of Marxism-Leninism inspire a considerable part of the working class and the people to fight for national and social emancipation, forms of unity and cooperation between Communist parties cannot remain unchanged. While retaining their internationalist content, relations between Communist parties can be improved and strengthened as they fight for common aims, as they study and jointly solve new problems posed by social development.

There are two inseparable premises to proceed from: on the national plane, it is the duty and responsibility of each Communist party to shape its policies and tactics in complete independence and autonomy; on the international plane, each Communist party should maintain fraternal relations with the other Communist parties in defending common interests and in fighting against imperialism.

This is not a nominal duty but a component of Communist ideology, which is as profoundly internationalist as it is hostile to bourgeois nationalism. Fraternal contacts between Communist parties, and the unity and vitality of the world Communist and working-class movement are indispensable for greater cohesion of the forces for peace, democracy and socialism.

The complete equality of all the Communist parties has been proclaimed at world Communist conferences. Today there is no party, nor can there be any, whose decisions are binding on the other parties. At the same time, no party can interfere in the internal affairs of another party. At both world conferences, these principles were first proclaimed by the CPSU, which clearly defined the features which should characterize our movement today. These principles should lead, not to dispersion and disunity, but to a still greater effort for the greatest international solidarity, without prejudice to the broadest autonomy on the national plane. The fact that there is no leading party increases the responsibility of all the Communist parties without exception, from the biggest to the smallest, for the preservation of unity and solidarity.

The CPS approves of the conclusions of the Moscow Consultative Meeting, for it considers that these conclusions will promote the unity of action of the entire Communist movement. We thus merely reaffirm the position we have adhered to from the first.

Let us recall, in this connection, what our Party said at the end of 1961: "We should realize that in the world Communist movement discussions will take place and problems will arise in the future as well. The more the Communist movement develops, the more reason there will be for this. But it is necessary that those discussions be held, and those problems solved, on Marxist-Leninist principles; that each party bear in mind, not only its own narrow interests, but also the common interests of the revolution and of peace; that in the course of the discussions the parties strive for solidarity, for unity on the fundamental issues and on questions of the international policy of the Communist movement."

Accordingly, we stressed that the polemic in the movement was a polemic between comrades and should therefore be conducted by democratic methods—through discussion, criticism and persuasion—and that such methods as coercion, ultimatums or excommunication be ruled out.

Such was the meaning of our support of a new Communist conference. In November 1963 our CC came to the following conclusions:

"In the present circumstances, it would be useful to convene a conference of the World Communist movement . . . If agreement is reached to hold such a conference, we shall attend it not in order to sit in judgment of one or another party and to condemn it. We shall go to the conference prepared to engage in comradely discussion in order to achieve agreement on the basis of Marxist-Leninist principles. And even should such an agreement prove impossible at this juncture, we would come to the meeting with a desire to strengthen and not break the existing ties, with a desire to promote unity and to continue the discussion in a calmer atmosphere. We would come with the conviction that only discussion and experience can help the Chinese comrades to realize their mistakes and prevent an aggravation of the split."

We therefore support the proposal for a preliminary consultative conference of the Communist and Workers' parties to discuss the question of holding a new world Communist conference. We also favor bilateral meetings, talks, consultations and any other activity aimed at coordinating the efforts of the Communist parties, paving the way for the consultative conference, and at the same time working out, through a comparison of views, the method of organizing the world conference, and its agenda. At the same time we consider that public polemics should stop or should at least be conducted strictly on the basis of principle, without insults and accusations that explain nothing and merely poison relations, and prevent consolidation of Communist unity.

We see, and we think everyone else sees, the difficulties these proposals may encounter. But they can and should be surmounted through dialogue and fraternal discussion, by joint persevering effort, everyone realizing that no effort can be more thankful than the effort to solve the problem of unity.

The Communist Party of Spain will continue to do everything to strengthen fraternal bonds with all the Communist parties, being confident that thereby it will promote the interests of its working class and its people, which are inseparable from the interests of the world Communist and working-class movement.

Executive Committee,
Communist Party of Spain,
March 1965.

GUS HALL PLEDGES FIGHT FOR FREEDOM AND PEACE*

I want to thank The Worker for inviting me to speak at the 41st anniversary meeting. This meeting is a further demonstration of the vital and indispensable role of The Worker as a fighting voice for all that is progressive in American life.

With a sense of watchfulness, and keeping the pressure on, we join with all democratic-minded Americans in hailing the victory of Selma and the Voter Registration promise. The struggle to eliminate Jim Crow is on the threshold of possibly its most important breakthrough.

The long struggle, the demonstrations, the marches, the sit-ins, the parades, the days and nights in jails and prisons, the sacrifice of lives, the resolutions and the protests—are about to harvest their most important victory. But the struggle must go on. The cold-blooded murder of a Detroit working-class mother of five in Alabama this morning should serve as a warning that the enemy has not given up.

We Communists do not look for any special credits, but we are proud of the fact that of all the present political, religious or labor organizations now supporting the civil rights struggle, we have the longest record of continuous service, a commitment that goes back almost 50 years. We now join with the millions in hailing the victories of Selma and Montgomery and pledge to continue to participate and to give our full support until the day when Jim Crow will be no more in any corner of our 50 states.

The wonderful scientific achievements of man and the improvements in the affairs of human society are all shrouded by a danger, a fear of a nuclear conflict that will destroy not only these achievements of today and yesterday, but places the future existence of civilization itself in doubt.

RESPONSIBILITY

The world is again being escalated to the brink and is fast reaching the point where turning back will be most difficult, if not impossible.

We Americans carry a heavy responsibility because the source of the escalation is here. The culprit is in our midst. And no amount of demagogy, fakery or denials can now cover up the criminal acts of mass murder being committed by the armed forces of the United States against the peoples in Indo-China. U.S. imperialism stands naked and convicted as the invader, the aggressor, the murderer of men, women and children of Indo-China.

The murderous and insane use of explosives, the use of napalm fire bombs, the use of chemical bombs that spread phosphorous fires that cannot be extinguished by water—and now the use of poison gas bombs—all against civilian centers, has established a new low in bestiality, a new low in the degeneracy of moral concepts.

The so-called explanations only further expose the warped mentality of the instigators of these crimes. To the shocked world the Presidential Press Secretary states: "The President was not aware of the use of poison gas." As a matter of fact, this was going on when he visited Vietnam as the Vice-President. Rusk and McNamara keep repeating: "It has been done before." Indeed it has—but the world is not going to accept such criminal nonsense to cover up this barbaric deed. The logic of such an explanation is that it is all right to drop A-bombs because it has been done before.

The world has a right to know, and is asking: "Where is the possible difference in the morality of using the people of Vietnam as a testing ground for new poison gases and chemical warfare from the morals of the fascist gangsters who used the lives and bodies of six million Jews for testing ever newer means of automatic mass murder? There is no basic difference.

Where is the difference between the debased racist morality of a Governor Wallace who orders the killing and clubbing of civil rights workers, and the wanton murder of the people of Vietnam, who are also fighting for the right to vote—a right promised in the Geneva Treaty of 1954, but denied by the intervention of U.S imperialism? Governor Wallace this morning also justified the murder of Mrs. Liuzzo by saying it has been done before.

There is a most urgent and crucial need for the American people to understand the full meaning and import of this experimentation with new methods of mass murder.

The Pentagon has been busy developing a new branch of military science. It is a military branch developed specifically for war against a whole people.

This is the Pentagon's response to the colonial-liberation revolutions. These liberation revolutions have the support of whole peoples and nations. Therefore, the new military technique is geared either to conquer or to destroy whole peoples or nations.

In Vietnam attempts were made to herd the people into imprisoned communities behind concentration camp — like walls and fences. This was followed by the use of a new catalog of weapons aimed to destroy anything that grows or lives.

VILLAGES POISONED

Let me read to you some on-the-scene observations from the most timely and history-making book, Vietnam: Inside Story, by Burchett:

"One of the means devised by the U.S. Command for its special war is the use of air-sprayed chemicals against food crops—the trees were bare of leaves or fruit—it destroyed all the food crop and livestock.

"Cambodian Minister of Foreign Affairs stated—'Between June 13-July 23, 1964, U.S. planes dumped toxic powder on six villages —killing 76 people, most of them children'—and this was in Cambodia. The State Department stuck to its 'safe for humans' fakery —but admitted the villages were poisoned by mistake."

Yes, indeed, it has been done before.

The world is observing the hypocrisy of U.S. government officials sitting in world bodies talking about raising more food in the underdeveloped countries—while it is destroying for years to come the possibility of raising food in one of the richest food-growing areas in the world.

With deadly chemicals and bombs, experiments have been and are being conducted to defoliate large farm areas, to kill every growing plant, flower, tree, grass or weed.

Now to all this the Johnson Administration admits the most shocking addition to this new branch of imperialist militarism. To the weapons of defoliation, chemical warfare has now been added, the weapons of depopulation—the policy of destroying and gassing of whole communities.

It has been reported that one of the features of this war to defoliate and depopulate is that the pilots are not assigned specific targets. Why should they? The target is the people. The target is anything that is green or moves. No wonder some of the Marines accidentally shot each other.

The overall issue is the injustice and the brutality of imperialist aggression—the oppression and enslavement of a people. The specific charge the world now lays at the doorstep of the Johnson Administration is the immorality and the utter insanity of the policy of defoliage and depopulation. A total war against a people — the depopulation of nations. The responsibility for this policy must rest above all on the President of the United States. That he accepts the advice of the fanatics, the voice of the Militarists, the evil conspirators against world peace in his official family — is also his responsibility.

For years the destiny of our land and its relations to the world were influenced by the diabolic schemes of the Dulles Brothers. One, as Secretary of State, the other as head of the CIA—they kept the world on the brink of disaster—as a matter of principle, as a matter of policy.

Now we have another set of brothers coming up. They have taken up where the Dulles' left off. Both are in high places determining U.S. Policy in South East Asia. They are the architects of the policy of defoliage and depopulation. They are as fanatical as were the Dulles brothers. They are the Bundy brothers. That such evil voices have influences on our policies is again, in the first place, the President's responsibility.

The ultra-Right militarist turned Ambassador, Maxwell Taylor, just this week expressed the outlook of these forces in our government when he said, "The war in Vietnam is now a war without limits." President Johnson's denial is meaningless when the world know that it is the Maxwell Taylors and the Bundys who are sitting in the seat of tactical decision-making.

The New York World Telegram this week editorially plugs for the same path of suicide. It stated: "But it is a truism, that in war anything is fair—any belligerent if he wants to win uses whatever device he can find to promote the end."

DEPOPULATION

It is this degenerate mentality of imperialism that justified a total war of depopulation against a people. It is the concept of a war "without limits" that is behind the escalation of the war, an escalation which, if not halted, is bound to reach a point of no return.

The United States is the aggressor. It is conducting a brutal, unprecedented war of "depopulation."

But Johnson and Rusk keep repeating: "Nobody has come forward wanting to negotiate." What was the meaning of U Thant's proposal, if no looking for a way out? The U.S. policy is not only a policy of aggression; it is coupled with an arrogant policy of unconditional surrender. It is this that blocks all possibility of negotiation.

What is there to negotiate? People who are fighting for their independence are not going to negotiate about becoming enslaved again. Freedom and independence are not items that can be negotiated away. This is the epoch where they must be accepted as a way of life. On the basis of equality and independence, there is no doubt in my mind that the people of Vietnam will negotiate. They will negotiate:

—For mutually beneficial trade and friendship pacts;

—For guarantees that their independence and neutrality will be honored;

—For the evacuation of all foreign troops from their soil.

In independence, the people of Vietnam must have the right to determine how they want to live. Such negotiations would be in the interest of world peace, the independence of nations, and the best self-interest of the peoples of Vietnam and the United States.

The policy of defoliage and depopulation is designed to destroy, to enslave. The U.S. policy is not for negotiations, but for unconditional surrender. It is an imperialist policy.

In the now famous "Guernica," Pablo Picasso captured and preserved for all time the brutality and the bestiality of the Hitler-Mussolini-Franco bombings of the cities and hamlets of Spain.

The "Murals of Hiroshima" have etched into the human conscience the evil and murderous nature of the arch-killer of millions, the U.S.-dropped atom bombs.

The killer is on the loose again.

Where is the artist who will sketch for the present and future generations the savagery, the cold-blooded sadistic brutality of the United States military in using the peoples of Indo-China as a testing ground for new weapons of destruction, explosives, fire bombs, and poison gas bombs?

TOTAL WAR

This moral decay is demonstrated by the policies of total war against a people, the criminal acts of poisoning all livestock, the chemical destruction of all crops, the policy of depopulation by poison gas bombings. This is further demonstrated by the criminal act, as reported this morning, of injecting poison into at least 15 thousand bags of sugar after the ship was illegally seized by U.S. Government pirates on the high seas—sugar belonging to a nation with whom we have friendly relations—poison that was purchased by the Federal government, poison that was pumped into the bags of sugar by employees of the Federal government—a Federal government department whose head sits on the highest councils of government. These are acts which if continued in today's world, will isolate the United States as an "outlaw nation." All this paints a gruesome picture of a dying system. Like fascism, these are the trade-marks of capitalism as it is trying to turn back the clock of time. But we who know history also know there is nothing that can save capitalism.

SPEAK FOR PEACE

These are policies of imperialism for the sole benefit of the big corporations. They are not policies of our people. They are against the best interests of our nation. But our silence as a people is interpreted as silent support.

There were no meaningful civil rights bills, or voter-registration bills, until the crescendo of voices in protest reached mass proportions.

The policies of imperialist aggression will also continue until the voices of peace speak louder than the influence of war-crazy fanatics in and out of government.

The American people are not for the policy of aggression. But like the civil rights movement, they must find the ways of expressing this thought through mass demonstrations.

The world must preserve civilization while human society marches forward because in the final analysis social progress and nuclear suicide are mutually exclusive. We must never forget that because today we can still say: The choice is for us to make—it will not necessarily always remain so.

Turning back from this path of aggression and national suicide is the act of courage today, the act of patriotism and service to our country. It is the necessary stepping stone to world peace.

VENEZUELA IN THE FIGHT FOR FREEDOM

RUDE PRAVO INTERVIEWS* EDUARDO GALLEGOS MANSERA, MEMBER OF THE POLITICAL BUREAU, COMMUNIST PARTY OF VENEZUELA

Eduardo Gallegos Mansera and other comrades from Venezuela spoke about the attitude of the CPV to the armed struggle which Venezuelan patriots have been waging in the mountains and in the pampa for more than three years now and about other forms of revolutionary struggle.

The interview took place the day when word came of a new wave of terror against Venezuela's Communists and other opponents of the regime, especially those who together with the Communists make up the National Liberation Front. Asked to comment on the reasons for the persecutions, Mansera pointed to the role Venezuela has been assigned by the U.S. imperialists.

Half of the U.S. investments in Latin America have been placed in Venezuela. With oil and iron ore accounting for almost nine-tenths of the invested capital, Venezuela has been reduced to the status of supplier of raw materials to imperialist monopolies, becoming a kind of raw-material appendage of the United States.

Venezuela is the world's biggest exporter of oil, which it extracts at the daily rate of 3.4 million barrels. Besides, 20 million tons of 63 percent iron ore is mined there annually. Ninety-five percent of the oil is exported, almost half of it to the United States. Output of managanese ore and bauxites is increasing.

You cannot expect the U.S. monopolists to give up such a choice bit of their own free will. In fact, they are doing everything to maintain their hold on the natural wealth of Venezuela and to prevent our country from gaining genuine independence. Along with political factors, this is the chief reason for the ruthless suppression of the Venezuelan patriots' struggle to free their country from U.S. monopoly domination.

What are the political factors?

In the first place, the tremendous influence of the Communist Party, which extends to the working class and the peasant poor and is also very strong among the students (Communists polled 6,670 votes, 68 percent, in the election to the student committees of Caracas University). The same is true of the other universities and of secondary schools. The student movement is the most radical and progressive force in the country.

The Communist Party is operating underground. Only four out of the 15 members of our Central Committee are not in prison. One of them is fighting together with the guerrillas, two are underground, and I live abroad. Our General Secretary, Jesus Faria, has been in prison for eight years already and his health now causes serious concern. But despite all the blows it is struck, the Party is winning increasing recognition.

The Party constitutes the backbone of the broad National Liberation Front, which includes the influential Left Revolutionary Movement and other Left groups. This alone shows that the Party is carrying on its political work among the broad masses, and that it can rely on them.

Asked what form of struggle the CPV considers most important today. E. Gallegos Mansera replied that it was armed struggle. He added, however, that the Party did not regard it as the only form of revolutionary struggle and combined it with the struggle for the economic demands of the working people and with all the other forms of mass political struggle, using legal opportunities as well. The fact that the Venezuelan Communists and other revolutionary patriots have been waging an armed struggle for three and a half years now, is not a reckless adventure. It was the situation in the country, characterized by brutal suppression of the working-class movement and of the struggle for genuine independence, that led the Party to the conclusion that the armed struggle was the only way of a revolutionary solution in Venezuela.

The guerrilla units, i.e., the Armed Forces of National Liberation, are operating on an area of about 13,000 square kilometers inhabited by almost 120,000 peasants. They engage in combat chiefly in the mountain regions of the states of Sucre, Falcon, Miranda, Trujillo, Lara and Portuguesa. Numerous and highly mobile guerrilla groups are also active in the pampa and in the areas of Barines and Apure. Not long ago the Leoni government launched a large-scale offensive against the guerrillas. It committed thousands of ground attacks and airborne troops sent helicopters to search for guerrillas, and bombed areas where it thought guerrillas were hiding. But it failed to stamp out the guerrilla movement because the guerrillas, supported by the peasants, invariably evaded encirclement, although the operations against them were led by officers specially trained in the United States. The failure of the offensive prompted the government to renew terror against the Communist Party and other opposition forces, against the student movement and the legal Left press.

E. Gallegos Mansera and other Venezuelan comrades cited some facts characterizing this new wave of repressions against patriots.

In February the police were ordered to open fire on a peaceful demonstration of workers and students in Caracas. They killed one and wounded twelve people. In March, after another bloody clash between students and police, P. Valera, Governor of the Federal District, prohibited manifestations in the capital. Democratic MPs from the Popular Nationalist Vanguard, the Revolutionary Popular Party and the National Democratic Front called for a demonstration of protest against this encroachment on democratic rights. More than 100,000 residents of the capital responded. The police again used arms, killing one student and wounding thirty students and workers. Hundreds of demonstrators were arrested. Students' and workers' demonstrations were also fired on in other cities. But this terror cannot break the militant spirit of the Venezuelan workers and students.

Almost simultaneously with the opening of fire on demonstrating patriots, the Caracas police raided trade union headquarters and arrested the chairman of the Venezuelan trade unions and other activists. Some servicemen were also arrested. Incidentally, the arrested officers included several extreme Rightists in addition to Communists. This was done to create the impression that the Government deals with equal ruthlessness with opposition from the right and the left, while its real aim is to crush the Left force.

Several days ago 25 members of the opposition were arrested. Communists are not the only ones to be hit. The seizure of the office and printing plant of El Siglo has deprived the opposition of a legal voice.

The current wave of terror is not the first, nor will it be the last, of course. It is typical of the situation which has prevailed for several years now.

We know that a long and grim struggle lies ahead, said E. Gallegos Mansera. He stressed once again that the armed struggle waged by Communists and other patriots was necessitated by the peculiar position of Venezuela, a country fully dominated by U.S. imperialism, whose influence there is much stronger than in any other Latin American country, a country where elections are a mere travesty and where legal opportunities of struggle for social and national emancipation are restricted more and more. However, Mansera said, we consider the armed struggle to be only one, if decisive, form of revolutionary struggle at present. He added that if the U.S. imperialists stepped up their intervention in Venezuela, the Communists and other patriots would be able to rally the masses and repel it.

FOR PROGRESSIVE CHANGES

APPEAL OF THE NATIONAL LIBERATION FRONT TO THE NATION

The National Liberation Front (FLN) calls upon the people to fight in the face of the government crisis. Division and anarchy are growing in the Democratic Action Party, a tool of U.S. imperialism and the Creole oligarchy and hence responsible for the hunger and for repressions against the people. The Republican Democratic Union and the National Democratic Front, set up to combat the sectarianism and hegemony of the Betancourt camarilla, are having difficulties in acting as a camouflage for this camarilla, a role imposed on them by their leaderships.

The growing cost of living impels the disillusioned masses to fight openly against the government. The dozens of demonstrations and meetings held in Caracas, the transport workers' strike in Merida, the two strikes of taxi and lorry drivers and other actions in the interior of the country are eloquent proof of the discontent and militancy of the people.

The scope of the mass movement has frustrated the government's carefully planned attempts to create, by authorizing certain popular manifestations, the impression that some civil rights have been restored. The promised release of ex-MPs and other popular leaders and discontinuance of repressions have proved to be a fraud. Shootings, raids on trade union headquarters, imprisonment of strike and demonstration organizers, wholesale arrests, violation of all civil rights and liberties and other Betancourt methods have never been abandoned.

The siege of the peasant areas where the guerrillas hold the banner of freedom and national dignity aloft is being intensified. Particularly violent punitive operations have been launched in the states of Falcon, Monagas-Sucre, El Bachiller, Lara and Trujillo. We protest against them most emphatically.

The army, which has been turned into the chief instrument of repression and in which discontent is rife, is in a state of crisis and division.

This menace of chaos should be countered with a democratic alternative in the interest of the population at large.

Some sections of the ruling class see a way out of the crisis in attempts to restore Betancourtism in its original form, i.e., in alliance with COPEI, and to return to the bloody five-year period.

Others are thinking of a coup, pure and simple, of an open terroristic dictatorship. We seriously warn them that that will not only fail to end the crisis but will amount to a declaration of civil war on the people, something which our Front will be compelled to retaliate in a most energetic way on behalf of the patriotic and nationalist forces it unites.

We are convinced that this situation and these dangers call for the broadest alliance of all the forces striving for a democratic peace and capable of making it a reality.

There are groups in the three government parties which are offering some resistance to the continuation of the Betancourt policy and to other attempts of the government to end the crisis through increased repressions and through surrender to imperialism. But they are not strong or resolute enough to bring about a change. Having no interests that conflict with those of the country, they could make a major contribution to the solution of the crisis.

It is common knowledge that our Front is an alliance in which all the nationalist and patriotic forces of the people have associated themselves in order to form a government capable of ending U.S. monopoly rule, freeing the peasants, providing better conditions for large sections of the town population and restoring the sovereignty and independence of the country. Our Front will go on fighting for such a popular, nationalist and democratic government, for this is in the interest of the progress and happiness of our people. Far from preventing the unity of its revolutionary forces with the groups of the opposition, with the anti-Betancourt circles in the government, with democratic and nationalist-minded officers, our Front promotes it to hasten the establishment of a democratic peace enabling all of us to continue the struggle for our ideals, for the full restoration of rights and guarantees.

This unity can lead to the restoration of peace and democracy on the basis of the following pressing demands:

1. Complete amnesty, without retaliation or vengeance. Restoration of the rights of political parties and all Venezuelans. Strict respect for constitutional guarantees, especially freedom of the press.

2. Improvement of the standard of living of the masses, particularly the workers and peasants. An end to price rises. Higher wages.

For national pacification!

For amnesty and unrestricted rights and guarantees for all Venezuelans!

Against hunger, the high cost of living and unemployment!

For freedom of the press and respect for all constitutional rights!

THE NATIONAL STRUGGLE CONTINUES*

Ali Yata

In the name of democracy, in which we have deep faith, in the name of freedom, to which we have always been dedicated, in the name of the sacred rights for which mankind has been fighting for centuries and which our people have won at the price of enormous sacrifice, we are starting this newspaper, which we most joyfully devote to the Moroccan people.

We would like to begin by stating that this newspaper is not the organ of any party or organization, nor the mouthpiece of any specific group or of the propaganda agencies of any official or unofficial quarters. This newspaper does not depend on any organizations or officials at home or abroad. It will strive to express the national aspirations and to uphold progressive views based on science. This will undoubtedly put it within reach of greater numbers of citizens and make it an exponent of their views and a defender of their positions.

The objective of the newspaper is briefly stated in its title. We have called it Al Kifah al Watani (The National Struggle) because we hold that we are still fighting against imperialist domination in its old and new forms, a domination which has plunged our country into the abyss of socio-economic backwardness persisting to this day.

The national struggle is not over, nor will it be, until the devastated areas of the country's north and south are completely freed, until we retrieve the lands seized by colonialist settlers and deliver our economy from the imperialist monopolies which are still oppressing it and plundering our riches, and until we ensure that the state budget and the development of our life depend, not on favors and aid from foreigners, but on our own forces, on our energy and our specific methods.

The national struggle is indispensable for our national liberation and the consolidation of our independence. It is indispensable as an earnest of our sovereignty and of the use of freedom in the interest of the country and its people. We must say that most of the evils we now suffer from are due to the fact that certain people have for many years considered the national struggle to be at an end. They have therefore been waging a different struggle for which the time is not ripe. It is a mistake and those who have made it should admit it. We are not responsible for it.

By continuing the national struggle, we can develop our economy harmoniously and comprehensively, bring about prosperity and abundance, and meet the basic requirements of our people, whom we can free from the horrors of poverty, illiteracy and homelessness.

By waging the national struggle, we can create favorable conditions for the restoration of the rights of the have-nots, who constitute the overwhelming majority of the people and have nothing but their labor power.

That is why this newspaper will vigorously contribute to the national struggle by fostering it and raising it to a higher plane. It will strive for national unity and concentrate on achieving the solidarity of progressive opinion, which is particularly necessary at present.

Accordingly, the newspaper will endeavor to give truthful and sincere accounts of reality, firmly to uphold the national interest, and perseveringly to champion the rights of the people.

Our newspaper will participate in the struggle which the fraternal Arab peoples are carrying on for progress and unity. It will contribute its share to resistance to imperialist pressure, intrigue and aggression wherever they occur.

Our newspaper will publicize the political, economic and social changes taking place in the underdeveloped countries, and will popularize the remarkable victories of the new world, the radiant world of socialism.

This, then, is the line which the newspaper Al Kifah al Watani is going to follow with the support of the people.

STATEMENT* OF THE FRENCH COMMUNIST PARTY

ON THE EVENTS IN THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Defying the right of the peoples to self-determination, U.S. imperialism has launched a new aggression. Its armed forces have occupied Santo Domingo in order to drown in blood the Dominican people's striving for progress and freedom.

The sole purpose of this aggression is to protect the interests of the U.S. monopolists and the landowners who exploit the riches of the Dominican Republic and who installed a military junta following a coup against a legally elected government. This aggression is a glaring violation of international law and the U.S. Charter.

As in Vietnam, in Santo Domingo the U.S. imperialists have arrogated to themselves the role of world gendarme up in arms against the ideas of national independence and progress. All this is fraught with the gravest danger to world peace.

Expressing the sentiments of millions of French working people and democrats, the French Communist Party declares its complete solidarity with all the Dominican patriots who are heroically combating the imperialist aggression.

MATERIALS OF THE UNION OF THE PEOPLES OF CAMEROON

DECLARATION OF THE UPC REVOLUTIONARY COMMITTEE

At its Seveth Plenary Meeting on March 23-25 last the Revolutionary Committee of the Union of the Peoples of Cameroon analyzed the political situation in Cameroon resulting from the electoral farce of March 20, and discussed the more pressing African and international problems bearing on the Cameroon revolution.

"POPULARITY" THROUGH TERROR

Analyzing the internal situation, the Revolutionary Committee exposed the noisy propaganda campaign of the lackeys of the present regime making out that Ahidjo enjoys popularity. It called the attention of Cameroonian and world opinion to the grave situation in our country.

The political situation in Cameroon is characterized by terror, genocide, and the absence of democratic liberties. It is the result of the activities of the more than 100,000-strong force of repression which include troops of the French community, the army, the gendarmerie, the police and the militias serving the regime and commanded by officers of the "France military mission."

BUILD-UP OF FRENCH OCCUPATION FORCES

Far from leaving our country as demanded by our people, the French occupation forces have increased their strength with troops moved in from the Congo (Brazzaville).

Every pretext is used for mass arrests and bloody repressions against peaceful civilians. The fascist legislation of 1959-63, specifically the notorious ordinance of March 12, 1962, enables the authorities to court-martial citizens on the charge of spreading "rumors," tittle-tattle and false information in a biased manner". To intimidate the population, mercenaries of the army of repression exhibit the heads of brutally murdered patriots in the market-place in many localities. Former butchers of Algeria, OAS-men and many other international fascist and racist elements feel complete masters in the country and daily commit Nazi-style atrocities. More than 20,000 patriots have for many years been rotting in Ahidjo's prisons and concentration camps, where they are mistreated in the most inhuman fashion.

*President of Cameroon.—Ed.

ONE HUNDRED PER CENT BY DAY AND NIL AT NIGHT

The UPC Revolutionary Committee considers that at a time when the political climate in the country is poisoned by Ahidjo's mercenaires and when guns are thundering at Mungo, Bamileke, Mbam and Sanaga-Maritime, elections are out of the question. It therefore regards the March 20 plebiscite as a travesty of elections similar to the one now being staged in the Congo under the control of Tshombe's mercenaries.

Speaking in Makenene during his campaigning trip to the Mbam area last December, Ahidjo fulminated against the numerous "Cameroonians in town and country who live a legal life by day and an illegal life at night, the adversaries and enemies of the regime."

Who can believe that these enemies of the regime miraculously reformed overnight and came out in support of Ahidjo, who, without fear of ridicule, claims that he has polled 99.99 percent of the votes?

THE SITUATION DEMANDS A UNITED NATIONAL FRONT

The Revolutionary Committee declares that no plebiscites worthy of the name are possible until the imperialist troops are withdrawn from the country, the political prisoners released, the fascist system of terror abolished and all democratic freedoms restored.

It salutes the memory of the many patriots who are killed daily by Ahidjo's mercenaries.

It earnestly appeals to the patriots of all political and philosophical trends to rally closely together in a broad united democratic front and fight resolutely against the neocolonialist dictatorship of Ahidjo. Everyone should join the common struggle and demand, using the means at his disposal:

—immediate and complete withdrawal of all foreign troops and military advisers;

—abrogation of the agreements which restore foreign rule in independent Cameroon;

—unconditional release of all the political prisoners and an amnesty for them, an end to the prosecution of Cameroonian patriots living in the country and abroad;

—restoration of, and respect for, political rights and trade union freedoms throughout the country, in particular repeal of the emergency laws, etc.;

—abolition of the existing neocolonialist institutions;

—genuinely free elections.

INTERNATIONAL SOLIDARITY

Having analyzed the situation in Africa and the rest of the world, the Revolutionary Committee notes with satisfaction the successes achieved by the forces of socialism and peace. It considers that the national-liberation movement in Africa, Asia and Latin America is on a steep rise.

The Revolutionary Committee expresses concern about the aggravation of the situation in Southeast Asia as a result of the aggressive intrigues of U.S. imperialism. It emphatically condemns the U.S. air raids on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam. It demands the withdrawal of the U.S. troops from South Vietnam and reaffirms the militant solidarity of the UPC with the Vietnamese people.

It supports the struggle of the American Negroes for freedom and equality and condemns the assassination of Malcolm X by murderers hired by U.S. racists and reactionaries.

The Revolutionary Committee severely condemns the criminal attempts of the West German and other imperialists to arm Israel, this tool of world imperialism, against the Arab countries. It reaffirms its militant solidarity with the Arab peoples fighting against Zionism, for the return of the Palestinian patriots to their homeland.

LONG LIVE FIGHTING AFRICA!

Having discussed problems of the revolutionary struggle of the African peoples, the Revolutionary Committee salutes the fraternal peoples of the Congo, Angola, "Portuguese" Guinea, Mozambique, South Africa, Niger and Senegal, who are daily striking powerful blows at imperialism, colonialism and neocolonialism. It expresses the unshakable allegiance of the Cameroonian people to the common cause of achieving complete independence for, and genuine unity in, the African motherland.

THE NOUAKCHOTT CONSPIRATORS

The Revolutionary Committee considers that the restoration in Nouakchott of the African-Malagasy Union under the new name of the African-Malagasy Cooperation Organization is part of a new imperialist conspiracy against the African revolution, designed to rob the Charter of the Organization of African Unity of its progressive content and turn the Organization into a Holy Alliance against the revolutionary movement of the African masses. It is also aimed at inducing the heads of revolutionary states to commit treason and at organizing throughout Africa the persecution of true African patriots, honorable leaders who have fought against colonialism and continue to uphold Africa's dignity and independence.

To achieve their evil aims, the flunkeys of imperialism and disguised enemies of Africa, such as Ahmadou Ahidjo, are trying to intimidate revolutionary African states by means of a violent campaign against "interference." Their ill-considered demands constitute gross interference in the affairs of other countries on which they want to impose their will. They are out to turn the forthcoming Afro-Asian conference in Algiers and African summit meeting in Accra into a handy instrument of blackmail. In addition, they give their blessing to the imperialist military intervention in the Congo and Cameroon, and their protection to imperialist military bases in their countries.

They do not see all that as interference. Ahidjo and his like persist in branding as interference the fight of the best sons of Africa for the complete elimination of the main cause of Africa's backwardness—imperialist rule in any form.

AN AFRICAN REVOLUTIONARY FRONT IS NEEDED TO DEFEAT REACTION

The Revolutionary Committee holds that this reactionary onslaught, this new counter-offensive of neocolonialism proves correct the UPC's invariable attitude to the problem of African unity. The UPC firmly declares once again that genuine African unity, i.e., unity for the real independence and progress of our continent, can only be achieved through the masses fighting with determination against imperialism and its lackeys. This calls for the close cohesion of all the patriotic forces of Africa.

The Revolutionary Committee therefore urges all the revolutionary forces of the continent to rally in an African revoltionary front for genuine unity, against imperialism and reaction.

THE DUTY OF THE CAMEROONIANS AND OTHER AFRICANS

The Cameroonian people, whose heroic struggle is part of this struggle of the African peoples, will not be intimidated either by plebiscites organized 100 percent by agents of neocolonialism, or by the growling of this wounded beast.

The Holy Alliance of Ahidjo, Tshombe and Tafawa Balewa will not break the resistance of our people.

On the contrary, the continent-wide onslaught of reaction and Ahidjo's histrionic attempt to represent himself as a recognized national leader have prompted all the progressive forces of the nation to step up resistance and launch a policy of broad alliance.

In view of this, the Revolutionary Committee calls on all the citizens to unite in the fight to overthrow the puppet Ahidjo and to achieve democracy, well-being and peace. All the opponents of the present regime—workers, peasants, office employees, intellectuals, students, people of all religions, traditional chiefs and the patriotic-minded elements of the bourgeoisie—should unite and overcome internal disagreements in order to carry out the main task of the day, that is, to sweep away Ahidjo's regime and establish a new democracy in Cameroon.

Let us unite in a single Democratic Front to step up the struggle of the masses!

Let us give effective support to the armed resistance put up by the patriotic National Liberation Army of Cameroon under the leadership of Chairman Ernest Quandie! Let us intensify in every way and on every front the life-and-death struggle against the anti-national regime of Ahidjo!

The valiant Cameroonian peoples shall win!

March 25, 1965

NATIONAL UNITY*

W. Massaga

MEMBER, UPC REVOLUTIONARY COMMITTEE

National Unity is a traditional slogan of the Union of the Peoples of Cameroon, that cannot have the same meaning when uttered by spokesmen of the Ahidjo regime, who have appropriated it (just as they have appropriated other UPC slogans in keeping with fascist propaganda methods. Hence the need to explain what is at issue, why we should strive for national unity, who should make this unity a reality, and how this should be done.

THE PUPPETS' THESES

The men of the present regime, drunk with power, expect five million Cameroonians to give them a free hand in upholding the interests of several thousand upstarts of neocolonialism. Their interests demand continued plunder and fêting at the cost of the people's sweat, tears and blood. After five years of "real" independence, of official assurances that the popular rebellion has long been stamped out and that the regime's every effort has been aimed at winning economic independence, spokesmen of the regime no longer sum up results, or even give false promises. They simply demand full support from every citizen. They want the total submission of the people. This conclusion follows from an analysis of the official campaign for national unity.

In this campaign, the government bases all its spurious arguments on a thesis explicitly formulated in Ahidjo's speech in April 1963. The substance of this thesis, whose inanity and democratic character are insulting to our people, is that since independence and reunification were achieved in 1960-61, nothing can justify any opposition to the government.

"NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT" — A MOUNTAIN OF CORPSES

Proceeding from this misleading and dogmatic thesis, Ahidjo's group and its propagandists utter high-sounding phrases which in reality mean nothing. Ahidjo and his government have issued the slogan of "union of hearts." Official propaganda continuously exhorts the citizens to unite in the name of "happiness" and "national development." The latter formula is particularly dear to the supporters of the regime. The government invokes "national development" to justify its terroristic measures and its war against the population, to silence the working people, to pacify the youth or to divert the attention of the people from acute social problems. The talk of "national development" can mislead the uninitiated.

It is possible to deceive the people, to gain a delay by force and ruse. But this is also the best means of opening the eyes of the people, whose wrath will be terrible. In the face of the official campaign of lies, a simple question arises today: what have our rulers accomplished in these ideal conditions in five long years?

Two different answers are given to this question.

TWO ANSWERS

On the one hand, there are people whom the government calls criminals, bandits, bad citizens and self-seekers hiding in the forests abroad—all those Cameroonians whom it wants to send to the gallows. These people hold that the plight of the Cameroonian peasants, in particular the overwhelming majority of the small peasants, is going from bad to worse under Ahidjo's bloody dictatorship. This "handful of troublemakers" also considers that Cameroonian workers are finding it more and more difficult to make both ends meet, that the cotton plantation workers in the north of the country, virtually doomed to forced labor, the workers of Cameroon's Development Corporation and the agricultural laborers of the Mungo region are earning just enough to survive, that the Douala dockers, most of whom are not paid more than a hundred francs a day, thank heaven for having a job, that the working people suffer from the steadily rising cost of living.

These so-called bad citizens—the workers, peasants, petty officials, small tradesmen and artisans—consider the result of five years of neocolonialism to be negative. They think a change is needed.

So does our Party, which, despite imperialist measures of repression, has always led the struggle of the masses for this goal. The Cameroonian people know this. Our Party has never promised the working people a paradise on earth. It simply considers that everyone should enjoy the fruits of his labor and have the right to know how the taxes which burden ordinary people are really spent. Our Party declares that it is impermissible in a country calling intself genuinely independent, that the people should slave for the enrichment of plunderers, that the colonialists should be robbing them just as they did in the worst days of foreign rule.

The government, its flunkeys, supporters and friends take a different view. All that is left to those wishing to be "good citizens" is to repeat the official version: everything is for the best in this best of Cameroons; the population is prospering; agriculture is being modernized; peace reigns in the country; the people are grateful to Ahidjo, their "saviour," and support his party, the Cameroonian Union.

THE CAMEROONIAN UNION IS A TOOL OF FASCISM

The alleged adhesion of the people to Ahidjo's Cameroonian Union means nothing, nor is the Union itself of any consequence. The regime recognizes this, as the current campaign shows. Even leaders of the "great national party which has united the entire people" do not believe in the Cameroonian Union.

Ahidjo's Cameroonian Union, an instrument and a vivid image of his concept of national unity, is, in fact, a ramified apparatus of administrative and police coercion. To join the Cameroonian Union has never meant adhering to any ideal or program. It is merely an act of submission to the regime, often forced by the very existence of fascist system. This is why the Union has never since it was founded been an arena of struggle, constant denunciations and counter-denunciations, violent settling of accounts under constant police surveillance, and a rat-race for privileges and cushy jobs.

The Cameroonian Union has delivered our people to fascism, of which every citizen is aware even in his sleep. Thousands of fair-minded citizens have had to join the ruling party in the hope of escaping police persecution, arrest and death. They were told that membership of this party would bring them jobs, but they have been bitterly disappointed.

AHIDJO AND TRADE UNION UNITY

Trade union unity is a vital necessity. All the working people of our country strive for it in order to be able the better to uphold their civil and craft interests, which are inseparable from the interests of the nation. But the neo-colonialist regime is of a different opinion.

The agents of neocolonialism see trade union unity as neutralization of the trade unions, just as they want a national unity that will neutralize the people. They want to unite the working people in order to suppress them the more effectively, to prevent them from uttering a single word, not only about the grave crisis in the country, but also about the purely professional interests of petty officials and small artisans and tradesmen.

To achieve this, Ahidjo's regime has imposed upon the working people trade union leaders who are its most loyal servants and who at the time of classical colonialism earned the solid reputation of traitors and of hangers-on of the colonialists. This trade union leadership, which is hostile to the working people and fully devoted to Ahidjo, makes common cause with police agents planted by the regime, and as a result the working people live in constant fear of dismissal, arrest or death.

CHANGES NEEDED

Our rulers, who are trying in this way to enforce their concept of national unity, forget one thing: they can bully, gag and murder people, but they are powerless against the awakening masses and their growing determination to fight. The fascist bondage in which the regime would like to keep the people for ever is loosing: things look bad everywhere—in the ruling Cameroonian Union, in the administration, in the countryside, in the army, in the trade unions.

Changes are needed! This demand is voiced more and more insistently by different sections of the population all over the country. This means that Ahidjo's "national unity" has already fallen through and that genuine national unity of the people is in the making.

Our Party, all the patriots, all the citizens not affected by corruption, can achieve real national unity only through the struggle of the whole people for genuine independence, democracy and peace. These three demands meet the aspirations of the masses. They constitute the basis on which all our people can and must unite. They open the only way to national salvation.

THE PEOPLE WANT PEACE

The vast majority of our citizens want peace. After almost ten years of a grim war in which foreign invaders massacred more than 100,000 of our brothers and sisters, every upright and sober-minded citizens longs for peace.

The puppets claim that peace cannot be achieved without razing the villages of patriots and herding their residents into concentration camps and fortified settlements, that it is necessary to destroy all the forests in order to drive out the resistance-fighters, to crush them like flies, to kill, burn and hang all the members of the UPC, to jail, torture and kill all nonconformists.

Such a solution is impossible militarily, stupid politically and criminal from the human viewpoint. The more than ten years of bitter experience have shown that this is futile and inhuman folly.

To speak as Ahidjo and his supporters do, of the need to "crush the rebellion" in order to restore peace means deciding to continue the war, and admitting that it brings profit, that the imperialists pay in cash for the blood and suffering of the Cameroon people.

THE PEOPLE WANT DEMOCRACY

Democracy is the only way to peace in our country. Our people will never accept false peace in exchange for freedom. No people strives for war, but every people is capable of making the greatest sacrifices to regain their rights and live a happy life.

Let it be known to the puppets who want the peace of slaves or graveyards, and those of our fear-stricken brothers who preach non-violence — as if happiness could be won through surrender — that nothing will be achieved by ruse.

As long as our citizens are compelled by persecutions to hide in forests or remote localities, as long as they are denied the right to protect their crops and wages without fear of concentration camp or torture, as long as they are unable to travel freely without the constant risk of being robbed, arrested or killed by the mercenaries of neocolonialism, and lastly, as long as the glorious Cameronian people are denied their sacred right to have a government and a regime of their own free choice, peace in Cameroon will remain an illusion.

THE ONLY SOLUTION IS TO ABOLISH THE REGIME

It is clear, therefore, that we shall never have peace with the fascist dictatorship, a regime which can exist solely by trampling democratic freedoms underfoot, a regime of war. This regime can, of course, arm itself to the teeth, build up the monstrous machine of repression, and impose its power on a certain part of the population. But the Cameroonian tragedy will continue.

As everyone knows, neocolonialism is an invention of the imperialist monopolies designed to disguise their domination and their exploitation of the people, to preserve or even boost the profits of foreign capitalists by giving political power to their puppets, who are generally recruited through corruption, or to those whose economic interests are closely linked with foreign capitalist interests.

The power of the agents of neocolonialism is a screen concealing the continued plunder of national wealth. It worsens the plight of the people and gives rise to a parasitic caste, the bureaucratic bourgeoisie, having its own "clubs" and "parties" and living a dissolute life. This bourgeoisie hates the people. Its philosophy is determined solely by the desire to stay in power in order to keep its pockets full, to stay in power by hook or by crook and for as long as possible, sticking at nothing—not even assassination and genocide. It is fascist-minded through and through.

That is why all of us who want peace, democracy and progress in Cameroon have but one way out—to unite in order to overthrow the neocolonialist regime, restore national sovereignty, establish democracy and achieve peace.

PATRIOTIC FRONT

An alliance of all the anti-imperialist classes, social strata and citizens for a general offensive against the regime of national dependence, the source of tyranny and war—this is what the slogan of national unity of the Cameroonian people means today.

Clearly, it is a United National Front of struggle for real independence, democracy and peace, and not a fascist-like group like Ahidjo's Cameroonian Union that can pursue a genuine policy of national unity.

The call for such a front was issued at the end of 1960 in a joint statement by UPC and its mass organizations. In December of the same year this call was enthusiastically supported by the National Union of Students. Since then, the experience of our Party, which has been striving to unite the patriotic forces, has shown that:

—the United Front should not consist of only the most revolutionary-minded patriots;

—the Front cannot be expected to come into being only as a result of difficult talks with the leaders of political, trade union and cultural organizations or leaders believed to favor the national revolution. Under a fascist system these organizations are either virtually outlawed or serve the regime. Their leaders live in fear, and doubt everything—their organizations, the people, victory;

—the United National Front cannot exist as an organized and effective force unless it makes the neocolonialist regime reckon with it. And this means, first and foremost, that it must be a result of mobilization of the masses capable of resisting fascism;

—the people's readiness to fight and the opposition of the masses to the neocolonialist regime, which are necessary for this mobilization, are becoming increasingly evident.

This means that the United Front should be established by the joint efforts of our Party and all true patriots. It is necessary to promote the spirit of patriotic solidarity, to multiply joint actions if only on a limited scale, and steadily to heighten the militancy of our people in order to bring about the elan that will impel the national organizations and all patriotic-minded citizens to adopt a common platform for resistance and offensive.

Consequently, to establish the Front, something more is needed now than to look to the top, to the leadership of our Party and the leaders of other more or less nationalist-minded organizations or groups. It should be formed around and next to us, through joint actions and not fruitless discussions. This means covering with every patriot the part of the road that he can cover with us on the firm basis of the minimum program of national salvation.

THE UPC — THE GUIDING AND UNIFYING FORCE

At the moment not all the Cameroonians who are opposed to the neocolonialist regime are agreed as to how to end the drama through which our country has been passing for almost ten years. This prevents putting an end to the suffering of our people and plays into Ahidjo's hands. Repression and corruption have divided the popular force which fought together for independence, and some people outside our Party, which is resolved to carry on the revolutionary struggle, still cherish illusions, hoping to bribe Ahidjo's deputies, as if they were richer than the imperialists. Others pin their hopes on tribal solidarity and expect to "get" Ahidjo within the framework of his "democracy."

Still others dream of imperialist-inspired coups, as if our people, having broken out of one prison, would agree to land in another. Lastly, there are those who offer no solution at all and merely vociferate against armed struggle.

All these groups are infested with agents of the regime. They include patriots who have been intimidated, confused and deceived by the enemy but who, nevertheless, remain opposed to the regime. It is our duty not only to open their eyes to the blind alley into which their illusions and idle dreams can lead them. We should enlist their participation in the resistance movement in proportion to the degree of their political consciousness and patriotism. Revolutionary vigilance should not weaken our links with the masses and affect our work among them, and there should be no confusion in this work. We are rallied around our Party on the basis of the program of action of the UPC, on the basis of its Rules, its discipline, its line reaffirmed by the Party leadership—the Revolutionary Committee. As regards the genuinely anti-imperialist forces of our people, the minimum program, which meets the vital needs of the Cameroonian people, provides a platform for their unity and joint actions.

ARMED AND POLITICAL STRUGGLE

That is why we must fight and defeat—both in our own ranks and among our fellow-citizens—those who adhere to extreme positions. We must continuously expose the all-or-nothing policy, honestly correct our mistakes and overcome obstacles to the unity of all the forces, all the citizens opposed to imperialism.

Extremism is very dangerous. It can paralyze the people in the crucial moments of struggle and render them defenseless in the face of imperialist intrigue. It is a result of not only the activity of the agents of the present regime, who are plotting to sow discord among the patriots. It can also result from the actions of those fighters and patriots who may by a sectarian conduct paralyze the policy of setting up the Front. Those who want a "change" but reject the idea of victory by the people and for the people are deliberately pursuing this policy. While clamoring for national unity, they raise false problems to obstruct the most representative and vigilant patriotic forces. These advocates of a refurbished neocapitalism want to profit from the struggle of our people, just as the puppets have used for themselves and for the imperialists the hard-won independence of our people. They say that armed struggle is distasteful to them. But the seven years of their rule, and the five years of the neocolonialist dictatorship of Ahidjo and his backers have shown that unless the Cameroonian people do their utmost to overthrow the regime, that gang will go on sowing terror and death until they themselves die of old age in their ministerial chairs.

The UPC realizes that no revolutionary struggle can be limited to military operations. It stands to reason that the people's armed resistance cannot succeed without mobilization on every front, without the support of mass actions and political struggles combining the efforts of all the opponents of the regime. National unity and the United National Front are unthinkable without this sustained political cooperation.

RALLY THE REVOLUTIONARY ENERGY OF THE CITIZENS

Therefore, to waste time on sterile lamentations means abetting the enemy. The unending complaints about the UPC not sweeping away the regime, about the National Liberation Army not storming the capital, Yaounde, and not eliminating the flunkeys of imperialism one after another make it easier for the puppets to promote their plans of psychological warfare. This attitude breeds doubts and discourages the population. To ensure real progress, every fighter and every patriot should first of all ask himself whether he is doing all he can now do to overthrow the neocolonialist regime.

Only in this way can we rally the revolutionary energy of the Cameroonians, strengthen solidarity, and achieve national unity in order to win freedom, progress and peace for Cameroon.

NEW ELEMENTS OF THE SITUATION FOLLOWING THE ELECTIONS

REPORT* OF V. CODOVILLA AT PLENARY MEETING OF CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF ARGENTINA, MARCH 27-28

At this meeting we shall, among other things, generalize the experience we have gained during the recent election campaign and establish, on the basis of facts, whether or not our electoral tactics were correct.

WHY WE DECIDED TO VOTE FOR THE PERONISTS

I think we can say that, in general, the whole Party agreed with the Central Committee that it was not simply a question of the victory of one or another party, but of the future orientation of domestic and foreign policy in this period of great battles that would be decided in the election campaign.

On the national plane, the task was to bar the road to the oligarchic-imperialist reaction and clear the way for the new elements engendered by the economic and political situation in the country, whose productive forces are still poorly developed, and by the need for deep-going democratic, progressive changes.

On the international plane, it was necessary, in this age of transition from capitalism to socialism and communism, of consolidation and development of the socialist countries, of the upsurge of the movements for national and social liberation and of the working-class, popular and peace movements, to march in step with the working people and wage a common struggle in conformity with the concrete conditions of our country, thus helping to step up the fight throughout the world against the imperialist aggressors and at the same time accelerating revolutionary development in our own country.

Proceeding from these premises in its analysis of the correlation of forces and the class composition of the parties which would contend the March 14 elections, the Party leadership arrived at the conclusion that they should be regarded not as ordinary elections, but as elections which could lead to substantial democratic and progressive changes in the country.

Therefore, when it decided to vote for the Peronists, under their various names, the Party leadership approached the problem not merely from the viewpoint of an electoral struggle, but sought to utilize the elections for strengthening its contacts with the Peronist-led masses, who are steadily shifting to the left, and for achieving unity in the struggle for the common demands of the working class and the entire people. The Party leadership did not make a special issue of whether particular Peronist leaders heading this or that electoral list were revolutionaries or not. It was decided to vote for all lists so as to create favorable conditions for joint actions. We achieved that, in the main.

As you will remember, we have been raising the question of rapprochement with the Peronists, having in mind their turn to the left, ever since the CC meeting of July 1962. We have been doing so, not for the sake of establishing temporary contact, but in keeping with our long-range policy which is bound to lead, eventually, through joint actions for various demands, to the unity of these forces with us for building first a united front of struggle and then a single party of the working class and the people, a party adhering to the principles of Marxism-Leninism.

We are pursuing this policy because owing to certain historical factors the bulk of the working class and the working masses generally is still under the influence of bourgeois nationalist ideology and because it is impossible to solve the cardinal problems facing the country without first winning these masses over to proletarian ideology. Hence our slogan, "Through mass actions to the conquest of power."

As the masses were, and still are, in varying degrees, under the influence of the Peronist leaders, we have in our work, to take them as they are and not as we would like them to be. Unless they are won over for joint actions, we will not be able to realize our slogan.

To win over the Peronist masses does not necessarily mean winning over all of them but that part whose social composition is close to that of our Party, in order to jointly establish a militant and numerically strong vanguard.

DID THE PERONISTS PUT FORWARD A PROGRAM?

Some comrades insisted that we should not vote for the lists of the Peronists because they did not put forward a program. That was a crass error. The Peronists as a matter of fact presented a program of the future parliamentary activity of their representatives and a general one of deep-going economic, political and social changes.

Their very extensive program, which I shall mention here in brief, provides for the following:

"An independent foreign policy based exclusively on the principles of the preservation of world peace and the maintenance of harmonious relations and trade with all countries. An energetic foreign trade policy aimed at expanding markets and defending international prices, and the use of all suitable means to achieve these aims, such as conclusion of bilateral agreements, a state monopoly on foreign trade, and economic contacts with all countries. Respect for the right of peoples to self-determination and recognition of sovereign governments in all international organizations. Repudiation of all forms of colonialism, imperialist policy and political, economic or military interference in the domestic affairs of other countries. Denunciation of all international military treaties as well as treaties compromising the independent policy of the nation. Respect for the right to asylum. Economic and social planning in the country with the active participation of the state, employers, and organizations of workers and specialists. Planned channeling of the national income into the basic branches of the economy through proper utilization of state capital investments, stimulation of private investments, restriction of excessive consumption and reorganization of the securities market in keeping with the financial requirements of the plan. Nationalization of the key industries, improvement and modernization of management of the state-owned enterprises. A special regime of nationalization for banking, insurance, trade and currency exchange. Annulment of the amendments of the Savio Law.* Abolition of all laws giving privileges to foreign capital to the detriment of national interests; new investment of foreign capital and utilization of previously invested foreign capital in a way that would delineate the framework of their application, rationally limit the export of profits, and ensure effective control. Agrarian reform. Liquidation of the latifunda with a view to giving the land to those who till it, and fixing the size of landed property in accordance with the zone and type of production. Mechanization of all forms of feudalism in agriculture, and economic security for the tillers of the land."

Other program statements of a political, social and cultural nature could be cited, but I think the aforesaid is sufficient.

The task today is to help, by relying on the actions of the masses, the Peronist MP's put this program into effect. Contact should be maintained first of all with the MP's of working-class origin.

It is necessary today, more than ever before, to urge the Peronist organizations to take joint action if they want to realize the basic propositions of their program.

CAUSES DETERMINING THE POLARIZATION OF THE ELECTORATE AROUND THE TWO MAIN GROUPS

The Party foresaw a polarization of forces around the Civic

*The law on the nationalization of metal-making enterprises.—Ed.

Radical Union of the People (CRUP) and the Peronists, for the positions of the two conformed, in the main, to the interests of the different classes although there are social strata with conflicting interests in both groups. That is exactly what happened.

What did these two groups say before the elections?

The CRUP presented itself to the electorate as a champion of order and democracy, the official party of a stable government, the party of economic and social progress which was making slow progress because of obstacles but which would expedite the implementation of its electoral program of 1963 after the elections. Hence its slogan: "We have a government; cherish it."

Thus the CRUP hoped to secure, and did secure, the support of those political circles whose common interests coincide with the interests defended by the CRUP and which feared a plunge into the unknown, i.e., the victory of Peronism with a possible military coup similar to that which occurred after the March 1962 elections.

What do the CRUP and the sections which voted for it represent from the class viewpoint?

They are essentially sections of the bourgeoisie some of which, while not opposed to foreign investments to "stimulate" industrial and agricultural production, want the government to control foreign policy; they are groups of the petty industrial and commercial bourgeoisie; that part of the agrarian bourgeoisie benefiting from the profitable sale of their produce through state organizations; executives of industrial and commercial companies; most of the civil servants, who vote for the government out of fear of losing their jobs in the event of drastic changes in the composition of the government; part of the specialists and handicraftsmen, and so on.

Justicialism, or Peronism, for its part, appeared before the electorate not as the aggressive force it used to be, but as a renovating force prepared to take part in the struggle of the masses, the parliamentary struggle included, in order to effect profound changes in the economic structure and political superstructure of the country; as a defender of democracy and national sovereignty against the aggressive actions of imperialism, U.S. imperialism in the first place; as a defender of the right of the peoples to self-determindation, and so on.

These and other similar ideas, taken partly from our program, struck deep roots in the minds of the working masses.

Although Justicialism relies on heterogeneous forces, it received its biggest vote from the workers of town and country (specifically the poor urban sections, the industrial suburbs of Buenos Aires, Cordoba, Rosario) and partially from the peasants discontented with the government's tax policy depriving them of much of their incomes, and with the credits policy which meets the interests solely of the rich peasants and big landowners.

The Peronists were also supported by the sections of the people discontented with the government's economic and social policy favoring big capital, with the high cost of living and the worsening living and working conditions, as well as by that part of the petty bourgeoisie driven to despair by the concentration of industry and trade in the hands of big national and foreign trusts and monopolies, a process which will inevitably lead to the ruin and disappearance of the petty bourgeoisie.

Besides, it is perfectly clear that many voters cast their ballot for the Peronists not because of devotion to Peron or for emotional reasons so as to affirm, for instance, Peron's right to return to the country (a right which we Communists have always fully recognized) but above all because they consider that at present the Peronist movement is the only force which, in the event of a convincing electoral victory, can realize their aspirations.

Finally, Peronism was supported by all those who strive for revolutionary democratic and progressive changes in the economic and political structure in order to ensure peace, well-being and national independence.

Our Party's support of the Popular Union and other Peronist groups undoubtedly helped to accentuate the class, anti-oligarchy and anti-imperialist character of these elections and to hearten those Peronists who were discouraged by the defeatism of some of their leaders and intended to cast blank ballots, which would have played into the hands of the oligarchy and imperialism.

WHO WON AND WHO LOST IN THE ELECTIONS?

In this connection it is pertinent to ask (although the answer is generally known) who won and who lost in the recent elections.

From the viewpoint of the electoral struggle, I think we can say that neither the Popular Union nor the CRUP won the absolute majority. Their forces were about equal, and both received one-third or a little more of the votes.

But from the political and social viewpoint there can be no doubt that the victory of the Popular Union, despite the bourgeois nationalism of some of its leaders, was a victory for the working class and broad sections of the population.

The other bourgeois and petty-bourgeois parties, including the Democratic Socialist Party, the Democratic Progressive Party and the Christian Democratic Party, either retained their positions or lost many votes.

But a real defeat was sustained by the ultra-Rights, by the Alsogarays, Aramburus, Manriques, Almadas, Solaris and their like, and, together with them, by the pro-Yankee forces, the spokesmen of the oil, electric power and other monopolies, as well as the landed oligarchy.

This is very important for the future development of the political life of the country.

As far as our Party is concerned, it is quite clear that it brought the Peronists not only votes (the estimates vary from 250,000 to 300,000, the real figure however is even bigger), but also the enthusiasm of the people—which, as we have said, was absent in some Peronist circles. In a number of localities our Party made a decisive contribution to the victory of the Peronist lists.

GOVERNMENT UNDER PRESSURE

The big capitalist and landowners, especially foreign and U.S. monopolies in the first place, are more strongly than ever pressuring the government for concessions, and are constantly threatening a military coup.

The fact that the Radicals and Peronists have emerged from the elections with approximately equal forces and that a certain balance has been established between them has obliged the plotters to postpone their planned coup.

But vigilance shoulld not be slackened, for "gorilla" circles—both military and civil—are preparing to stage a coup to forestall the great battles looming as a result of the wosening living and working conditions of the working class and the entire people.

It is already clear today that the United States is out to force the government to revise the existing oil contracts and to grant new concessions. The same is being done with regard to the state electric company SEGBA and the automobile industry. The big U.S. companies which have built automobile assembly plants in the country and are producing increasing amounts of spares for them are demanding, as Rockefeller has declared, greater privileges.

The International Monetary Fund, the International Bank of Development and other organizations warn, for their part, that they will give "aid" to the government only if it allows them to control the finances and the basic branches of production and the national economy as a whole.

FOIL THE JOINT OFFENSIVE OF THE EMPLOYERS AND THE GOVERNMENT

Why do we insist on Communist-Peronist unity of action? Because this unity will draw the other democratic forces into united actions. These actions are urgently needed to beat back the mounting offensive of the employers and the government against the living and working conditions of the workers and the people generally.

There is no doubt any longer about the intention of the big local capitalists and foreign trusts and monopolies to launch an onslaught on living and working conditions under the pretext that the country is experiencing an ecomonic crisis and that all should make sacrifices to overcome it.

Sacrifices in the name of what? Of still more fabulous profits for the big landowners, capitalists and imperialist monopolies? This must not be allowed to happen!

That is why the working people have been going on strike against dismissals made on the grounds of rationalization, for higher wages and better working conditions, for back pay, etc. They have achieved a certain measure of success—as a result, which shows that concessions can be wrested from the capitalists only in struggle, even though this struggle may be a bitter and sometimes prolonged one.

Does the crisis the capitalists are talking about really exist? No, it does not. A year or two ago there were certain symptoms of an economic slump developing against the background of the chronic structural crisis, but these symptoms gradually disappeared as the output of crops and livestock products increased as well as their export at prices suiting big producers, and as industrial production (especially at mixed enterprises with the participation of foreign capital) grew which partly satisfied the needs of the domestic market.

It is becoming increasingly clear that the foreign capitalists make the most of the awakening of the Argentinian economy so as to penetrate into our country, compete with the home market and swallow up the national industry, regulating and more and more restricting production for the some market and thus maintaining monopoly prices. The failure of the home market to expand is due chiefly to the insufficient purchasing power of the working class and the people in general because of the low wages and the growing prices on consumer goods, and also because of rapid inflation. The cost of living will continue to rise following the drastic increase in transport fares, petrol prices, etc. If the masses do not act to put an end to a situation in which the rich grow still richer and the bulk of the population, still poorer, the whole national economy will come to harm.

UPHOLD TRADE UNION UNITY AT ALL COSTS

In their offensive the employers and the government are using all means, including corruption of trade union leaders, to deepen the split in the trade union movement and are to this end tearing away more and more organizations from the General Confederation of Labor, which, although inconsistently, sometimes adopts class and anti-imperialist positions, and to set up a new trade union center that would take its orders from the ORIT.

It is, therefore, necessary now, more than ever before to defend trade union unity within the GCL. This defense is part of the common struggle for a united working-class movement on the basis of its democratization and the class struggle.

The Movement for Unity and Trade Union Coordination is already playing this unifying role. Besides, it is helping to step up the fight for the immediate social and economic demands of the working people of town and country and to orient the working class in the struggle for a democratic and progressive way out of the existing situation.

THE GROWING INFLUENCE OF OUR PARTY AND THE PERONIST MASSES' SHIFT TO THE LEFT

The elections have demonstrated the growth of the political consciousness of the working people, especially those sections influenced by Peronism. It is quite obvious that had our Party been able to take part in the elections it would have polled a big vote. There is no contradiction between this statement and the fact that in the provinces where the Party took part in the local elections it did not obtain the expected number of votes.

The polarization of forces prevented this.

The support our comrades enjoyed among the Peronist masses before and during the elections is indicative of the spread of Communist ideas among them. And, I repeat, that if our Party had been able to participate in the elections it would undoubtedly have received a considerable number of votes not only among the Left Peronists, but also among non-party people sympathizing with communism who voted for other parties.

The election results were as follows: 35 percent of the votes received by the Peronists, 30 percent by the Radicals and about 30 percent by other parties.

But Marxist-Leninists should analyze the results of elections also from the class point of view.

As has been said, most of the votes obtained by the Peronists came from workers, peasants and representatives of the petty bourgeoisie who disagreed with government policy. The Peronists also received the votes of our Party. The majority of these votes came from people from the above-mentioned social strata, i.e., from the advanced revolutionary force.

ELIMINATE ALL REMNANTS OF SECTARIANISM IN THE PARTY

One of the biggest impediments to the growth of our influence among the masses, and particularly among the Peronist masses, and to the establishment of new Party and mass organizations, are the survivals of sectarianism, manifested in disbelief or insufficient confidence in the present level of political consciousness of the working class, including those of its sections still under Peronist influence. This is the reason why some of the older comrades from the leadership at all levels consider themselves to be the sole representatives of the political line of the Party.

Another outcome of sectarianism is lack of confidence in young, i.e., new cadres, and hesitance in promoting them.

Despite the constant complaints about the shortage of cadres in view of the increased scale of Party work in the various mass movements, new cadres are not promoted to leading posts in mass organizations, which would help them acquire political experience and admistrative know-how.

This makes it incumbent on us to pay greater attention to the principle of collective leadership in all Party organizations, to distribute assignments in a better way, to show more confidence in the organizational and creative abilities of the Party organizations and leaders at the middle level, so that some leaders should no longer feel obliged to take a hand in everything in order to expedite the fulfilment of assignments, and thus enable the local organizations independently to discuss and solve their problems on the basis of the general line of the Party.

RESOLUTION ON THE CONSULTATIVE MEETING IN MOSCOW*

The CC, CPA, at a meeting in Buenos Aires on March 27-28, unanimously approved the report of the delegation of our Party to the Meeting of representatives of 19 Marxist-Leninist parties held in Moscow on March 1-5, and expresses its full agreement with the Communique of that Meeting.

The significance of the Meeting in the Central Committee's opinion is that with it the world Communist movement has made one more step towards the consolidation of its ranks.

Indeed, the representatives of the parties that took part in the Moscow Meeting did not limit themselves to reaffirming the need to work for stronger Communist unity, but adopted a stand of active struggle to overcome the disagreements, and pointed the way to the cherished goal—unity of all the Marxist-Leninists of the world.

As the Meeting noted in its Communique, the differences on problems of international policy, strategy and tactics weaken our movement and increase the aggressiveness of our common enemy, imperialism, U.S. imperialism in the first place. These differences can be overcome and the unity of the world Communist movement restored through joint actions by all the parties in the fight against the common enemy. What unites us far outweighs that which disunites us.

*Nuestra Palabra, April 14, 1965.

In view of this, one of the pressing tasks today is to promote in every way active solidarity with the heroic Vietnamese people subjected to the brutal and criminal aggression of that international gendarme, U.S. imperialism.

The Central Committee approves the proposal, contained in the Communique, that all possibilities and means should be exploited for solving the common tasks of the Communist movement, including bilateral and multilateral meetings of fraternal parties, such as the November 1964 conference of the Latin American Communist parties. International conferences, as the 1960 Statement stressed, are the most suitable means for exchanging opinions and experience, overcoming disagreements and working out common views on problems with which the international Communist and working-class movement is concerned.

The Central Committee agrees with the opinion, stated in the Communique, that careful preparation is needed for convening at a suitable date, a new international conference. The Central Committee shares the view that the best, most democratic form of preparing for this conference would be to hold a meeting of representatives of the 81 parties that took part in the 1960 Meeting in order to adopt the final decision on the date, place and agenda of the new international conference, and also to decide on organizational measures for holding it.

The Central Committee supports the proposal to discontinue open polemics between fraternal parties, which are of a vituperative nature. At the same time the Central Committee considers it desirable to continue, in a comradely spirit, discussion of the questions of theory, international policy and tactics on which views differ. The Central Committee also declares its support of the standards governng relations between Marxist-Leninist parties as defined by the 1957 and 1960 meetings and is against interference by one party in the internal affairs of another party.

The Moscow Meeting pointed to the importance of the struggle for merging the three great streams of the revolutionary movement of our time: the socialist countries, the working-class movement in the developed capitalist countries, and the national-liberation movement of the peoples oppressed by imperialism. Our Party fully agrees with this.

The Central Committee, aware of the responsibility of our Party and all the fraternal parties for the destines of the world Communist movement, declares once again that it will spare no effort to strengthen its unity on the immutable principles of Marxism-Leninism, the Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960. The Central Committee expresses its appreciation to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union for having helped to convene and hold the Consultative Meeting.

RESOLUTION ON THE EVENTS IN VIETNAM*

The savage aggressive forces of U.S. imperialism are continuing their criminal bombing of peaceful towns and villages of North Vietnam. They have again, as in Korea, resorted to toxic gases and phosphorus bombs with the inhuman intention of destroying not only the staunch patriots of the National Liberation Front (Viet-Cong), but also peaceful civilians in South Vietnam. With unprecedented cynicism, they speak about strafing, "by mistake," a school building and killing 43 children.

At the same time President Johnson declares his determination to continue his aggressive policy, while Secretary of State Dean Rusk brazenly tries to justify the use of toxic gases which has horrified all civilized mankind.

All the peoples of the world are filled with growing aversion for the aggressors and are more and more loudly declaring their active solidarity with the heroic Vietnamese people. In the van of this campaign of international solidarity are the socialist countries headed by the Soviet Union, the true friend of the peoples fighting for freedom and national independence. The Soviet Government has repeatedly warned the U.S. pirates that by continuing their acts of brigandage against the Vietnamese people they are heading for an inglorious end. In keeping with its consistent policy of peace, the Soviet government demands that the conflict be settled in a peaceful way on the basis of the Geneva agreements of 1954, which provide for the immediate withdrawal of all occupation troops and instruments of war to enable the long-suffering and courageous Vietnamese people freely to shape their own destiny.

The Central Committee salutes our people, who have condemned, in various forms, the criminal aggression of the United States and voiced their solidarity with the fraternal people of Vietnam. However, the Central Committee urges the Argentine people to express this solidarity still more actively, through actions and demonstrations in the streets and protests by all democratic parties and trade union and cultural organizations. U.S. imperialism, the main enemy of the Vietnamese people which has committed aggression against them, is also the main enemy of the working class and the entire people of Argentina.

The CC, CPA hails the recent statement of the General Confederation of Working People of our country denouncing the aggression against the Vietnamese people and the use of toxic gases. The appeal of the GCWP, expressing the sentiments of our people, should immediately be supported by the working class in the trade unions and at the enterprises and by all our people. It should become the powerful voice of our people and develop into effective actions of solidarity to help stay the aggressor's criminal hand.

If the Illia government wants to remain loyal to its party's promise to protect the right of the peoples to self-determination, it should take into account the sentiments of our people expressed in the elections of March 14, and publicly protest to the U.S. government and the UN over the use of toxic gases against the Vietnamese people in violation of all norms of international law.

At the same time the Central Committee calls upon the working class and the entire Argentinian people to be vigilant in order to prevent the reactionaries—the oligarchy, imperialism and the Pentagon generals—from drawing the Illia government into this dirty war of aggression, and to declare for all to hear their emphatic protest against the criminal use of toxic gases against Vietnamese men, women and children. The Central Committee urges the working class and the entire Argentinean people to voice their warm solidarity with the government and heroic people of North Vietnam and with the courageous patriots of South Vietnam, whose valiant struggle cannot be crushed by machine guns, napalm bombs and toxic gases, and who have already freed 75 percent of the territory of their country with a population of 8 million people from the colonial yoke.

The Central Committee reiterates its impassioned appeal to the working class and the entire people of Argentina to unite and fight for:

—the immediate cessation of the bombings and the use of toxic gases in Vietnam by the U.S. criminal aggressors;

—the withdrawal of the U.S. occupation troops from South Vietnam;

—respect for, and implementation of the Geneva agreements of 1954 signed by 14 countries, which ensure peace in Indochina and guarantee the national independence of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and the right of the people of South Vietnam to self-determination.

Not a single Argentinean soldier for the war in Vietnam! Not a gram of meat, not a gram of grain, no medicines, no foodstuffs, nothing for the barbarians and aggressors!

Voice active solidarity with the government and the people of North Vietnam and with the fighting patriots and the people of South Vietnam!

To stay the hand of the U.S. aggressor in Vietnam means to stay the hand of the main enemy of our people.

Only unity and struggle will stop the aggressor and, having consolidated peace and peaceful coexistence, eliminate the danger of nuclear war.

RESOLUTION OF CC EXECUTIVE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF ECUADOR

The Consultative Meeting of Communist and Workers' parties, held in Moscow on March 1-5, and the Communique issued by it have greatly contributed to the struggle to cement the unity of the world Communist movement and overcome the differences in its ranks.

The estimations contained in the Communique and its definition of the forms of struggle for international Communist unity testify to the sincere and firm determination of the participants to work for this unity and to wage a joint struggle in order to free mankind from exploitation, shake off the humiliating tyranny of imperialism and save the peoples from a disastrous nuclear war.

These propositions are of special significance for our Party in view of the conditions in which our people live and the circumstances in which our struggle is developing.

★ ★ ★

The Meeting concentrated on the exigencies of successful popular struggles and on the present situation and the tasks of the masses the world over in view of the increased criminal activity of world reaction, above all U.S. imperialism. It laid special emphasis on the need to rally the world Communist movement.

Thereby the participants demonstrated their profound sense of revolutionary responsibility, and their boundless devotion to the great cause of the liberation of mankind.

They noted that victory in the struggle against reaction called for unity of all the revolutionary forces, and above all unity of the Communist movement, the decisive force in the great battles of today.

These propositions, contained in the Communique, apply to Ecuador and should become our guiding principle.

It is 20 months since we found ourselves under an infamous military dictatorship taking its cue from U.S. imperialism. Supported by out-and-out reactionaries, this dictatorship oppresses the people and pursues a policy leading to a higher cost of living, unemployment, and the abolition of the few hard-won democratic rights of the people. It is selling the country to imperialism and persecuting the democratic forces, particularly the working-class movement and its Communist Party, at which it strikes one blow after another.

The situation in Ecuador is, therefore, a vivid example of the increased criminal activity pointed out in the Communique.

But as time passes and the policy of the military junta bears its pernicious fruits, popular discontent is mounting. Once again the class struggle is on the rise. The working-class and peasant movement is beginning to present demands. The student movement continues to wage hard battles against the dictatorship and scores signal victories. The masses are voicing their discontent, and public opinion throughout the country denounces the junta's policy of hunger, national betrayal, squandering, swindling and plunder. These are portents of imminent great battles.

To win these battles, the Communique points out, the Communists need solid unity and resolute coordinated actions. This unity is needed on the international as well as on the national plane, as the conference of the Latin American Communist parties stressed last December.

Just as the aggravation of differences on the international plane facilitates imperialism's infamous efforts, so the criminal activity of the small group headed by Echevarraia, Roura, Arellano, Rodriguez and their supporters, has been causing damage to the revolutionary struggle of the people. This activity had an adverse effect on the people's resistance to the reactionary coup on July 11, 1963, and thus facilitated the establishment of the dictatorship.

This harmful activity continued, sowing discord among the revolutionaries. The splitters, who wanted to strike a blow at our Party, were condemned by the majority of the revolutionaries.

Just as the Moscow Meeting stressed the need to fight jointly, in keeping with the requirements of the present international situation, so we should strive resolutely for the unity of the Ecuadoran revolutionary forces fighting for the liberation of our people. This will be the most effective form of our participation in fulfilling the great tasks of our international movement.

★ ★ ★

Proceeding from this appraisal of the international situation, the Consultative Meeting clearly defined the fundamental principles for overcoming the disagreements in the world Communist movement:

"The participants expressed the firm determination of their parties to do everything in their power to cement the world Communist movement and to strengthen its unity on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism and the line defined by the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement."

This is a reaffirmation of the validity of the principles of our immortal doctrine, Marxism-Leninism, and of the correctness of the decisions of the 1957 and 1960 conferences, at which the world

Communist movement gave a definition of the present epoch and indicated forms of our future actions.

Therefore the Communique, like the decision of 1960, states that "consolidation of the positions of socialism, upsurge of the national-liberation and the international working-class movement, and growth of the forces advocating the maintenance and strengthening of peace constitute the basic trend in world development today."

We identify ourselves with this approach to the question of ways of rallying the world Communist movement on the basis of principle and with the main positions of the Communique.

As regards the splitters in our Party, who have used the differences in the world Communist movement as a pretext for their disruptive work, the Communique clearly defines the international principles we should adhere to whenever we decide a question of unity of our Party.

We have always declared that the unity of Ecuadoran Communists can only be achieved on the principles of the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement, on the basis of recognition and implementation of the resolutions of our Seventh Congress, the Program, the Rules and the political line approved by the Congress, on the basis of recognition of the leadership elected and the decisions adopted by the Congress.

Any other kind of "unity" would mean abandoning the right position, repudiating the principles and standards of our Party and surrendering to the splitters who have betrayed the Party and the people.

★ ★ ★

The Consultative Meeting also indicated the way to overcome the differences in the world Communist movement.

Since "what unites the Communist Parties far outweighs that which at present disunites them," the Communique declares that unity is not only desirable but also possible.

The Consultative Meeting pointed to the right method of removing the differences: cooperation in the fight for the great goals of our movement, "united action against imperialism, in rendering all-round support to the liberation movement of the peoples, in the struggle for world peace and the peaceful coexistence of all countries, big and small, with different social systems, and in the fight for the vital interests and historical goals of the working class."

It is only action that will bear out or disprove divergent concepts and bring about solid unity of the world Communist movement. This will facilitate the defeat of our worst enemy, imperialism.

We Ecuadoran Communists hail this orientation. It is the road along which we are marching, with inevitable shortcomings and mistakes, as we fight against the handful of splitters and traitors. This group is slandering the Party and its leadership in order to draw the Party into an endless debate. The right answer to this is to extend our mass actions, our struggle on every front, against the military dictatorship and its masters—the imperialists and the home reactionaries. It is only in struggle that our people will be able to distinguish between sincere and devoted revolutionaries and those who, under cover of revolutionary phrases, are fighting against our Party rather than against the dictatorship.

★ ★ ★

The Communique points out that, as was already noted by the 1960 Meeting, world Communist unity is effectively promoted by international conferences of Communist and Workers' parties, bilateral and multilateral meetings and exchanges of opinions without unfriendly or abusive actions.

Our Party has always favored this method and said so to fraternal parties.

This method has already been proven effective in recent months. Last December witnessed two multilateral meetings: that of the Communist parties of Latin America and that of the Communist parties of the Arab countries. Both meetings revealed agreement and outlined more effective forms of joint action.

This is also true of the bilateral meetings between the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Party of the Working People of Vietnam, the Korean Party of Labor, and other parties.

We are convinced that this method, and strict observance of the Communique recommendation (for a consultative conference of the 81 parties which took part in the 1960 Meetings) will greatly promote the removal of the disagreements. Specifically, we consider that giving the conference of the 81 parties a purely consultative character will greatly help to enlist participation of all the parties, for they will have no reason to fear that the conference may take decisions harmful to their interests.

★ ★ ★

Both the multilateral meetings of 1964 and the Communique of the Moscow Meeting denounce the use of improper methods in relations between fraternal parties.

The Communique of the conference of the Latin American Communist parties contains the following clear-cut and energetic statement:

"This Conference also considers that the unity of each party is a necessary condition for the further development of the revolutionary process in the country concerned. Consequently, all factional activity, whatever its nature and origin, should be emphatically condemned."

The Communique of the Moscow Consultative Meeting states:

"The participants declare themselves in favor of strict observance of the standards governing relations between parties as defined by the 1957 and 1960 conferences, and against any interference by any Party in the internal affairs of other parties."

We fully support the vigorous condemnation of all splitting activity in the Communist parties.

Having analyzed the Communique of the Consultative Meeting of Communist and Workers' parties which was held in Moscow in March 1965, the Executive Committee of the CC, CPE expresses its agreement with the Communique and declares that it will do everything in its power to carry out the recommendations contained in it.

We therefore call upon all our organizations and all the comrades to make every effort in order to remove shortcomings, step up work among the Ecuadoran people and intensify the struggle with a view to replacing the military dictatorship by a popular and democratic government, consolidating our organization and promoting our ideological training. Thereby we shall contribute to the defeat of imperialism, to the triumph of the national-liberation movement of the oppressed peoples, to the decisive victory of the working class, to the cause of building socialism and communism all over the world.

ON RECENT POLITICAL DEVELOPMENTS

RESOLUTION* OF COMMUNIST PARTY OF INDIA

I

Nearly four months have passed since the Seventh Congress of our Party. This short period has been marked by extremely serious developments in the international and national arena. The imperialists in their mad drive against world peace and national liberation, democracy and socialism, have further intensified and enlarged their aggressive war in Vietnam. This imperialist offensive is, of course, an integral part of its bid for world domination. Its naked strategy of aggression and neocolonialism is, however, not confined to Indo-China. It is projected in other countries of this Asian region through tactics of interference, pressure and blackmail.

In its aggression and war, U.S. imperialism now relies on the differences in the socialist camp and on the forces of domestic reaction in the countries whose independence it wants to undermine.

The machinations of U.S. and other imperialist powers have been recently witnessed in the Ceylon elections. They openly worked for the Bandaranaike government.

The U.S. imperialists not only continue to supply arms to Pakistan. They are also instigating that country against India to further heighten Indo-Pak tensions. The unending series of Indo-Pak border incidents cannot but be viewed except in this context.

The U.S. imperialists want to discredit and humble India into increasing submission to its blandishments and pressures.

One of their principal aims is to force India first to compromise and then to abandon its policy of non-alignment.

Imperialism naturally sets great store on the continued conflict between India and China over the border question. Recently the signing of the Sino-Pak agreement has manifestly emboldened the Ayub regime in its intransigence and in its provocative moves against our country.

Serious difficulties have arisen in the economic situation of the country, particularly owing to certain anti-popular and pro-monopoly policies of the government. Sufferings of the masses have grown further, giving rise to widespread and mounting discontent.

Imperialists and reactionaries are again seeking to utilize this situation, both inside and outside, to put pressure on government in order, first, to secure reactionary modifications and then to reverse the nationally accepted policies of the country.

The recent period has been one of growing decline and disintegration of the leadership of the central government, with serious repercussions all around. This, together with the cases of corruption which have lately come into the open and the partisan manner in which the government has sought to handle them, has greatly lowered its stature and prestige even among the supporters of the ruling party.

Imperialism and reactionaries within the country are taking full advantage of this situation in order to strengthen the positions of reaction, both within and outside the government. The conciliatory attitude of the leaders of the government towards reaction on the one hand and their attempts to minimize and shield corruption on the other have in no small measure facilitated the maneuvers of reaction.

II

In spite of its protestations of carrying forward the positive internal and foreign policies evolved in the life-time of Nehru, the government is showing serious vacillations and weaknesses in the face of the pressure from the imperialists and reactionaries. These vacillations and weaknesses in their turn further encourage and strengthen the imperialists and the forces of internal reaction.

The sinister character of this fresh round of imperialist pressures for the virtual abandonment of the policy of non-alignment has been strikingly revealed in what has come to be known as the Sudhir Ghosh affair. The American hand behind the whole dirty story is now obvious.

The effect of these new imperialist pressures on our foreign policy can be most vividly seen in the attitude adopted by the Government of India on the U.S. aggression in Vietnam.

The pro-imperialist parties and the monopoly press, as well as the Right inside the ruling party and the government, have been arguing in defense of U.S. aggression. The main burden of this "defense" is that the U.S. military forces in Vietnam are fighting against what is called the "Chinese advance into Asia." India, it is argued, is also interested vitally in halting this "advance" and hence must support the Americans in their war for "democracy"!

There is no doubt that this "reasoning" prevails in circles which have a hand in the making of India's foreign policy. Added to the other imperialist pressures, this line of approach results in the shameful vacillations and hesitations in government policy on Vietnam.

The Government of India's failure to act against U.S. aggression in Vietnam, its failure to demand a halt to this aggression and the use of gas, napalm and other horrible weapons, and to insist on the withdrawl of U.S. forces has not helped to win friendship and support among the anti-imperialist, Afro-Asian countries. On the contrary, India's image has been tarnished further because of this yielding to imperialist and reactionary pressure on the most urgent international issue of today.

III

We are in the last year of the Third Five-Year Plan. Whereas the tempo of development should be of a high degree after 14 years of planning, our economy, however, continues to be beset with a whole number of difficulties, some of which are extremely serious.

The Finance Minister himself has admitted that the situation is one which is causing anxiety and he has also listed the following features: "The rising prices, the difficulties in raising adequate resources for investment and the sharp decline in our foreign reserves."

The government and the ruling party claim that they have to a certain extent curbed galloping prices, especially of food-stuffs, that they have increased the availability of food, that they are taking measures to increase agricultural production, that they have given tax relief to the common man and so on.

But these claims have really little substance. Despite the temporary lessening of the acuteness of the situation and some very minor relief given by the Union Budget to a section of the people, the problem of rising prices is far from solved. As far as the resources for our Plan are concerned, the government refuses to find correct solutions.

India's foreign exchange reserves have declined to well below Rs. 100 crores. Notwithstanding an all-time rise in our exports in 1964, deficits in the balance of payments are still growing and that too at a time when India's foreign liabilities have reached the staggering figure of almost Rs. 2,500 crores.

Repayment of foreign debts and interest charges on them have already become a serious problem. The government, however, has worked out a line to meet this situation by giving more and more incentives and concessions to foreign monopolists. Now India has to borrow even to pay her outstanding foreign debts and interest charges.

There is no room for complacency because the food situation in these few months has been slightly better than last year. In the first place, the situation always improves with the harvesting of new crops.

Secondly, one must not ignore the fact of heavier imports of food grains under PL-480. Taking advantage of India's chronic food deficits, the U.S. imperialists are now trying to further modify their PL-480 agreements. They have begun to demand that at least half of the payments be made in dollars.

The decision of the government to set up a food corporation and start state-trading in food grains is no doubt a welcome one. But this they propose to do by buying not even three million tons of food grains out of the total of 15 million tons of marketable surplus. Again, the government is relying mainly on the wholesale trade to obtain the stocks instead of seeking the cooperation of the cultivator.

The government is even averse to taking vigorous action against the hoarders and speculators.

Even the government has had to admit that considerable stocks have already gone into the hands of the hoarders and speculators. Unless the present approach and policy of the government is radically changed, the entire food situation is going to once again reach a critical stage during the coming lean months.

Far from being brought down and stabilized, prices still remain out of control and may continue to rise again. The failure of the government to evolve an effective policy to hold the price line through effective fiscal and other economic measures continues to pose a serious problem for the masses and indeed the country's economy as a whole.

The permanent solution of the food-grain problem lies in the increase in agricultural production, breaking the stagnation on that front and making the country self-sufficient in food for the growing population as well as in raw material for its expanding industry. But the food-grains production has stagnated at a level even below 85 million tons a year (the target was again lowered to this figure from 100 million tons, the originally reduced Third Plan target).

Now in the Fourth Five-Year Plan more money is proposed to be spent in raising agricultural production (for irrigation, fertilizers and other improvements). An Agricultural Prices Commission is appointed to work out a price level remunerative to the producer.

But the main hindrance to raising agricultural production as pointed out in certain official and semi-official investgations recently being discussed (e.g., Ladejinsky's report) is the fact that a large number of peasant producers are still tenants and sharecroppers who have neither the wherewithal nor the incentive to invest in improving their agriculture and raising production.

The government and the ruling party, despite their own resolutions, are not taking necessary measures to complete agrarian reforms throughout the country by abolishing the remnants of tenant and sharecropping exploitation and by rigorously implementing proper land ceiling laws.

Another pre-requisite for raising agricultural production is to ensure remunerative prices for the peasant producer and the supply of industrial goods he needs at fair and stable prices.

The question also arises of making use of the vast labor force of the landless rural poor available for production, both through rehabilitation of fallow lands and by setting up agro-industries, etc.

But the government, instead of taking vigorous measures in these directions which naturally involve action against landlord and/or trade monopoly interests, takes the easy path of increasing American PL-480 food-grain imports, which in the long run has only a deleterious effect on our agriculture and economy.

It requires to be stressed that PL-480 transactions represent a danger not only to our economy but also the independent development of our national policies which reactionary forces, fattening on the American presence in India, seek in various ways to subvert.

The difficulties in raising adequate resources for our development plans and the crisis of our foreign reserves, were looming large.

These difficulties were used by interested parties and vested interests to build up pressure to curtail the Fourth Five-Year Plan, to change the direction of economic development, viz., the accelerated building of basic industries in the public sector so essential for achieving the economic independence of the country.

Already the present scheme of development planning was solving the question of raising the resources not by mobilizing to the maximum the internal sources, nor by completing radical agrarian reforms and thus creating conditions of raising accumulations in agrarian sector, nor by taking over foreign monopoly concerns, the export-import trade and nationalizing banks and rapidly expanding the public sector so that its earning capacity increases.

The line is one of raising resources by increasing the tax burden on the common people and by drawing upon foreign loans and assistance. The heavy debt-service (repayment of interest) of these foreign loans, the inadequacies and deficits in our export trade, as well as the black-marketing of foreign currency by the monopolists and exporters—all this has led to a serious crisis of the foreign reserves.

The government is now trying to solve these difficulties, as has been already noted, by giving generous concessions to foreign monopoly capital in order to attract them to increase their investment in our country.

Given these concessions, the foreign, especially U.S., monopoly capital finds a favorable field for exploitation in developing India and wants to enter in a big way and even penetrate such strategic branches as oil production, petro-chemicals and fertilizers.

The government has been yielding to this pressure and is proceeding to give wide concessions to foreign monopoly capital.

If the growing collaboration with and penetration of foreign private capital is allowed on these terms, it will only facilitate the attacks of Indian and foreign monopoly on the public sector, hinder our march to economic independence and pave the way to a sell-out of foreign capital.

In this connection, it is to be particularly noted that the main trend of the Budget is to provide new opportunities to monopolists and big business for further increasing their wealth.

Thus, the difficulties and the crisis in the economic field, which arise out of the capitalist path of development which the ruling party is pursuing are sought to be overcome not by turning away from that path, not even by honestly implementing even the moderate measures put forward in their own Bhubaneswar resolution, but by ever more concessions and surrenders to Indian and foreign monopoly capital.

These dangerous trends and developments of the last few months, if not resisted and reversed, will instead of solving the difficulties, worsen, in the long run, the conditions of the masses and endanger even the gains our economy has made.

For instance, one of the positive achievements of our economic development so far has been the building of heavy and basic industries in the public sector and thus laying the foundation for the industrialization of the economy and of its economic independence.

The public sector has grown in magnitude and importance. In many respects, it matches and even surpasses the achievements of the private sector. Though state-capitalist in character, it has made some contributions to strengthen our national economy and loosen the grip of foreign monopoly capital in our country.

But side by side with this welcome growth, private monopoly capital has also grown and concentrated in its hand immense economic power.

The urgent need today is to warn and rouse public opinion against this dangerous trend and mobilize the working-class and democratic forces to reverse it.

In fact, the situation in the public sector is ripe for vigorously taking up the demand for nationalization of the coal mining industry, for further strengthening the public sector in oil. It is necessary to give a sharp rebuff to foreign oil companies in their effort to penetrate the public sector and to take effective and strong measures to clip their empire in the field of refining and distribution of oil products.

The situation is ripe for demanding the nationalization of banks and of export-import trade, as well as for organizing vigorous actions to improve the wage standards of public sector employees, to protect their democratic rights and to demand workers' participation in the management and democratization of the public sector itself.

In short, the economic situation is one which urgently calls for orientation of government policies so that foreign and Indian monopolists and other exploiters are not in a position to take advantage of our present difficulties, with a view to distorting the rapid independent development of all branches of our economy.

The situation, in particular, underlines the supreme urgency of economic and other measures to improve the living conditions of the workers, peasants and other sections of the people.

IV

In this period, the unity and integrity of the country has suffered a heavy blow on account of certain developments connected with the introduction of Hindi as the official language of the Indian Union. Even though there is no flare-up now, a democratic lasting solution to this vital problem has yet to be found.

The failure of the central and state governments to take effective steps for the equal development of all regional languages and to ensure the complete replacement of all English by the regional languages for all educational, administrative and legal purposes in all the states; their failure to implement the 3-language formula in its real spirit, the bunglings and provocative steps of the central government in introducing Hindi as the official Union language in this background, all these have caused serious misgivings in the minds of large sections of the non-Hindi speaking people to the effect that their regional languages would be adversely affected and that Hindi would be imposed upon them to the detriment of their own future.

This led to a large-scale agitation which, in certain places, was taken advantage of by anti-social elements for indulging in acts of vandalism and destruction of public properties. This mass agitation was fully utilized by reactionary parties and vested interests to whip up chauvinist feelings on the language issue and seriously weaken and disrupt the forces of democratic unity.

Serious threats to democratic unity have come in this period not only from the language chauvinists, but also from the growing forces of casteism and communalism.

During the Kerala elections, both the official Congress as well as the Kerala Congress whipped up communal passions and communal hatred—particularly in the old Travancore—Cochin area—to such an extent as to affect even the mass base of the left parties.

In several states, rival Congress groups as well as right reactionary parties are more and more whipping up casteism and communalism to serve their own ends. Even the leadership of certain left parties are falling victims to this.

All this has meant an increasing threat to the forces of class and democratic unity and weakening the rising forces of struggle of the working-class and the common peoples against the grip of feudalism and monopoly.

A serious new threat to India's parliamentary institutions and their operation and indeed to the very foundation of democracy has now arisen.

Instead of trying to solve the problems of the masses the government is taking increasing recourse to repressive measures, especially the notorious DIR, against the democratic movement. Authoritarian trends have grown in the recent months as never before. Emergency and the unbridled powers under it are used for purposes which have nothing to do with defense of the country. The democratic gains of the people are today in jeopardy.

In these conditions, only the reactionary forces who are out to undermine our independence and subvert parliamentary democracy can find encouragement and new opportunities for their machinations and evil designs.

All those who stand for strengthening of parliamentary democracy, for the rule of law, for the democratic rights of the citizens enshrined in the Constitution, must take a serious view of these developments.

The National Council of the Communist Party of India draws the urgent attention of all democrats to the above developments. which show conclusively that there have been significant departures from nationally accepted policies and marked weaknesses in their implementation.

The Seventh Congress of our Party meeting in Bombay at the end of 1964 had, after considerable discussion and a detailed examination of government policies, come to the following conclusions in its political resolution:

"The government has not made basic changes in the national policies. It carries forward both the positive, as well as the negative aspects of the policy in general."

At the same time, the resolution had correctly pointed out:

"But there has been a change in the internal structure for the worse. Under the mounting pressure of right reaction, both inside and outside the Congress, the government has made dangerous anti-popular concessions on issues of food and price policy, suppression of democratic rights, etc."

While pointing out that the democratic movement had, through mighty campaigns and struggles not only compelled the right to retreat on occasions but also forced the government to make concessions in favor of the people, the resolution warned:

"The situation may deteriorate further unless popular democratic forces are able to check and reverse it through determined struggles . . .

"In the new situation, the vigilance of the organized democratic movement and active intervention of the Communist Party and other progressive democratic forces have assumed new importance. The task of building up the unity of democratic forces for the defense of India's progressive policies and for a shift to the left can no longer be ignored, except at the peril of India's future."

Having examined the current developments since the Seventh Congress of our Party, the National Council is of the opinion that not only the reactionary policies pursued by the government have not been reversed, but some of them have, in fact, been further intensified. Although the basic positive policies have not been abandoned or reversed, certain very serious shifts have unfortunately taken place within the broad framework of these policies.

The vacillations in foreign policy have increased in recent months under the pressures of imperialism and the right reactionary forces, both inside and outside the government. In internal policies there has been a further yielding of concessions to foreign capital and the Indian monopolists.

The increasing attacks on the democratic rights and civil liberties for intimidating and weakening the mass movements are again another evidence of these anti-democratic shifts.

In the context of the increased imperialism and reactionary pressures on the government which relies more on conciliation with reaction than on the masses of the democratic movement, the danger of a general shift to the right is more real and more threatening than ever before.

The further deterioration in the situation, the increased menace of imperialist and reactionary pressures on government policies and the growing vacillations and weaknesses in these policies, as evidenced by the facts outlined above, must be seen in the background of the failure of the democratic forces to unite and to intervene actively through organized struggles in defense of the progressive policies and against the right reactionary offensive.

The warning given by the Seventh Congress regarding the urgent necessity for the unity of the democratic forces, for their vigilance, action and intervention, must be reiterated today with ever greater force. Today the danger of a shift to the right is more real and threatening than ever before.

The right reactionary forces have in this period consolidated and gone on the offensive in an organized and concerted manner, On the other hand, the democratic forces have remained divided and scattered, the striking power of some of them often frittered away in actions which, instead of weakening the right, only strengthen it.

The National Council of the Communist Party of India appeals to all democratic parties, groups and individuals, who seek to halt the drift away from the country's basic progressive policies, to realize the gravity of the situation facing the country and sink their differences with a view to forging that national democratic unity which alone can carry the people forward towards national regeneration.

The pressures of imperialism and reactionaries within the country have further sharpened the social contradictions and enhanced the objective possibilities for isolating imperialism and reaction and developing the country's democratic movement on a broad basis. Given the correct approach and tactics, ever new sections of the people can be drawn into positions of struggle against imperialism and reaction, for defending the nationally accepted basic policies and for ensuring a shift to the left.

The recent months have seen increased mass actions in defense of their vital interests on the part of the working-class and other sections of the working people. In 1964 total man-days lost in working-class actions increased by 100 per cent as compared to 1963.

Big mass actions and struggles of the secondary school teachers, doctors, of state and central government employees, IAC pilots and other technical personnel and of bank employees for wage increases, for example, point to the possibilities before the democratic movement. This is further highlighted by the victories in the Ahmedabad and Calcutta civic polls.

What is necessary in the present situation is to mobilize the potentially far stronger forces of the masses into concrete mass actions in defense of the interests of the people of the country.

The Communist Party has placed before the people the urgent task of uniting the democratic forces to fight both the anti-popular policies of the Congress rulers and the right reactionary forces' efforts to subvert the basic policies and bring about a shift to the right. The Communist Party believes that the united national democratic forces can succeed not only in halting the right offensive but also in bringing about a shift to the left.

In carrying out this urgent task the democratic movement needs to be on guard against any unprincipled compromise in alliance with reactionary parties in the name of fighting the Congress rule. Such a course only offers opportunities for reaction to strengthen its position.

The National Council places before all democratic and socialist forces in the country the urgent task of building and consolidating their unity for the defeat of right reaction, reversing the antipopular policies of the government and for bringing about a shift to the left.

While once again drawing attention to the immediate platform of action put forward by the Seventh Congress of the Communist Party of India and urging cooperation and joint campaigns on any or all items in this platform, the National Council invites all the left parties, all progressive forces and personalities, including democratic Congressmen to join together in campaigns and actions on the most urgent and immediate issues.

Struggle must be carried forward in defense of the living standards of the working class, for bonus and dearness allowance, led by the Sangram Samitis and the trade unions. Special attention must be given to the fight for the democratization of the public sector both as regards its management as well as the living and trade union rights of the working class. Such democratization has become an urgent necessity to fight back the growing attempts of monopoly cauital to infiltrate into the public sector in various forms and utilize it for its own aggrandisement.

Struggles must be organized on the most pressing problems facing the peasantry in each state: for effectively ensuring fair rents, security of tenure of the tenants, distribution of fallow lands to poor peasants and agricultural laborers, ensuring of fair prices to the agricultural producers and, on that basis, effective procurement.

The struggles against pro-monopoly economic policies call for united actions. The campaigns must be intensified for nationalization of banks, oil and coal and for state trading in food grains which have become a vital necessity particularly to combat the growing attacks of monopoly on these sectors of the economy. The fight against concessions to foreign private capital must be waged unitedly by all democratc, including Congressmen, who realize the danger of the country's independent development arising from these concessions.

Actions against the vacillations and weaknesses of the government of India, particularly on the urgent issues of U.S. aggression in Vietnam and in defense of the positive features of our foreign policy must be stepped up, jointly with other patriotic sections of our people and the peace bodies and mass organizations.

A united campaign on the language issue must be undertaken in each state for the introduction of the regional language to replace English as a medium of instruction and administration, and also for a democratic solution along the lines suggested in the CPI National Council resolution. Students and teachers, writers and artists, in particular, must be drawn into this campaign.

The struggle in defense of democracy, against the use of DIR, for the release of detenus, for the lifting of the emergency and against the imposition of Presidential rule in Kerala must be organized jointly by all left parties and other democrats in cooperation with civil liberties and other organizations.

In each of these campaigns and struggles, the Communist Party will seek the cooperation of all democratic forces which are prepared to act together with the Party.

The National Council is fully aware that certain parties, groups and individuals, while willing to act on one issue, hold different views from that of the democratic movement on another.

However, a marked feature of this period has been the taking of a resolute stand against certain of government's pro-monopolist economic policies by a number of progressive Congressmen and even Congress committees. Certain congressmen have openly come out against the arbitrary imposition of President's rule in Kerala.

On the issue of foreign policy and particularly in regard to the opposition to U.S. aggression in Vietnam, a number of Congressmen have expressed themselves strongly and joined hands with other democratic sessions in demanding the withdrawal of U.S. forces from South Vietnam. But all these Congressmen may not be prepared to join the democratic movement on other issues.

The Communist Party will offer its cooperation on each issue to those sections of democratic opinion as are interested in that issue without demanding support on other issues, where it is not forthcoming.

Notwithstanding the maneuvers and pressures of imperialism and reaction, and the anti-democratic and anti-popular policies of the government, the last word, however, rests with the people.

The economic and political situation in the country today emphasizes the need for a vigorous unitd national mass action by all progressive and democratic forces. Only by developing such united mass actions and mass political activity in every city and throughout the country can the organized democratic movement effectively intervene in meeting the challenge of imperialism and domestic reaction.

Only thus is it possible to compel the government which is yielding to reactionary pressures to change its course and firmly stand by the nationally accepted positive policies and carry them forward. United political intervention on a national scale has become the supreme need of the hour for the defense of the vital interests of the working people.

The unleashing of such mass action in economic, political and other spheres of our public life will naturally have to be developed into a powerful nationwide movement in which all progressive and democratic forces, through multiform activities, will play their rightful part.

With this perspective of mass actions and mass struggles in view, the National Council of the CPI appeals to all left parties, democratic mass organizations and progressive individuals to observe a special week beginning with May 10 for bringing about united mobilization:

—For demonstrating our national solidarity with the brave fighting people of South Vietnam in their struggle against U.S. imperialists and their puppet; for the withdrawal of the U.S. forces from Vietnam; against the U.S. arms aid to Pakistan and against imperialist machinations against India and other Afro-Asian countries;

—Against the arbitrary imposition of President's rule in Kerala in disregard of all principles of parliamentary democracy; against the use of DIR and other emergency powers for attacking and suppressing the country's democratic movement; for the release of all leaders and workers of the democratic opposition and the democratic movement who are now in detention without trial; for defense of civil liberties, democratic rights and the basic principles of parliamentary democracy and finally, for scrapping of the oppressive Defense of India Rules and emergency powers;

—For voicing the urgent economic and other demands of the workers, peasants and other sections of the people.

The National Council of the Communist Party of India solemnly declares that the Communist Party will do all in its power to make this week a success and thus open up a new phase of sustained democratic mass political activity and struggles throughout the country.

INDIA GOVERNMENT MUST ASK THE U.S.A. TO STOP ATTACKS ON VIETNAM*

The National Council of the Communist Party of India declares its complete solidarity with the heroic freedom struggle being waged today by the South Vietnamese people under the leadership of their Liberation Front, against the barbarous aggression of the U.S. imperialists.

In total violation of the Geneva agreements, repudiating all canons of international law and resorting to the most savage forms of warfare—the U.S. imperialists have sought desperately to crush the liberation struggle of the people of South Vietnam.

*New Age, April 18, 1965.

But all their concentration camps and torture chambers, all their arson and murder campaigns, all their inhuman gas, napalm and phosphorous bombs have failed to crush the indomitable spirit of the people of South Vietnam.

Even the newspapers of the imperialists themselves admit that 75 to 80 percent of the territory of South Vietnam is controlled by the liberation movement.

Facing a complete debacle and rout in their diabolical efforts to crush the people of South Vietnam, the U.S. imperialists began a series of bombing attacks on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (North Vietnam) on February 7. These attacks which have not ceased since that date, constitute open and unashamed aggression against a sovereign country.

The number of U.S. military forces in South Vietnam has been rapidly increased during this period and is now openly admitted to be more than 30,000. U.S. officials have boasted that these U.S. troops may now even be used for ground fighting.

U.S. airmen are carrying out daily bombing attacks both on the positions occupied by the South Vietnamese Liberation Front and on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam.

The Communist Party of India vehemently condemns this deliberate aggression and its wanton escalation. By these acts, the U.S. imperialists have won for themselves the hatred and hostility of hundreds of millions all over the world, including large numbers of sane and peace-loving people in the U.S.A itself.

The U.S. imperialists, facing worldwide demands for a halt to their aggression and for the immediate withdrawal of all their forces from South Vietnam, are now attempting to maneuver with a view to deceive the millions who yearn for peace.

The much-trumpeted offer by President Johnson of "unconditional negotiations" must be seen in this light as an attempt to cool down the flames of anger against them, which are sweeping the world. But they have utterly failed in this effort.

Progressive mankind sees clearly that the U.S. imperialists have turned down the demand of all peace-loving people for a halt to their aggression.

On the contrary, the U.S. imperialists have intensified their bombing attacks, and fresh reinforcements for U.S. troops are pouring into South Vietnam.

Further, the U.S. imperialists refuse to allow any talks with the South Vietnam Liberation Front, which alone has the right to represent the fighting South Vietnamese people.

The Communist Party of India is amazed at the manner in which the Government of India has attempted to interpret President Johnson's appeal as a change for the better in U.S. policy.

The Indian people see no such change: on the contrary, the escalation of the bombings and the increase in the U.S. refusal to agree that the South Vietnam Liberation Front must be a participant in any talks for a lasting solution in Vietnam shows clearly that, whatever the words, U.S. imperialism is not only determined to continue its aggression, but also to increase its violence with every day.

This attitude of the Government of India is not accidental. Despite the repeated appeals of the democratic movement, the government has refused to condemn the U.S. aggression in Vietnam.

Even in regard to the horrible crime of gas warfare, the government's attitude was hesitant and wavering: the formal condemnation of gas warfare was considerably delayed and the manner in which it was made in Parliament appeared apologetic and vacillating.

What has been even worse and has blackened India's image still further has been the reported attitude of India's representative in the ambassadorial negotiations held at Belgrade last month for the drafting of a non-aligned governments' appeal for peace in Vietnam.

The Indian representative opposed any mention in the appeal of U.S. responsibility for the aggression in Vietnam despite the openly expressed view of the majority of the International Control Commission of which India is a chairman and despite the fact that India was party to this majority view. The Indian representatve at Belgrade went further to demand that "both sdes" be equally blamed.

The Communist Party of India demands that this weak and vacillating attitude of the Government of India which has done great damage to India's reputation in the world, be abandoned.

The government must reflect the strong feelings of the democratic masses on this urgent matter and demand on this urgent matter and demand an immediate halt to U.S. aggression and the withdrawal of all U.S. forces from South Vietnam.

The Communist Party calls on all Indians who desire peace in Asia and the world, all who stand against imperialism and for the national independence of peoples, to join hands in a ceaseless campaign for a halt to the U.S. aggression in Vietnam, demanding that all U.S. forces quit South Vietnam now.

Once the aggression is halted and the aggressors removed from South Vietnam, a Geneva-type conference should be called to ensure a lasting peace on the basis of full guarantees to the people of South Vietnam to decide their own future without imperialist intervention.

WITHDRAW PRESIDENT'S RULE IN KERALA*

The National Council of the Communist Party of India condemns

*New Age, April 18, 1965.

the unconstitutional imposition of President's Rule on Kerala without allowing the newly-elected Assembly to function, by enabling the Party that secured the largest number of seats of any other party combination to explore the possibilities of forming a government.

Unable to form the government, the Congress Party not only prevented the Communists (Marxists) from forming the government but refused to release even those of them who were elected to the Assembly; nor did it allow any other party to form a government either. All this is actuated by purely partisan reasons and is a violation of all canons of parliamentary democracy of the Constitution itself.

All who cherish democratic rights and parliamentary democracy must take up this challenge and come together to rouse public opinion and people to action, and force the government to withdraw President's Rule and allow the democratic process to operate in order that an attempt can be made to form a government in Kerala and the elected Assembly allowed to function.

CAMPAIGN IN DEFENSE OF DEMOCRATIC RIGHTS*

The National Council of the Communist Party of India condemns the continued and increased resort to DIR and arrest of leaders of working-class and other democratic struggles as recently in Tripura, Madhya, Pradesh, Maharashtra and Assam and other states.

It condemns the continued detention of the leaders and cadres of the Communist Party (Marxist) who were arrested on December 30, 1964 and thereafter.

That all these arrests were necessitated by the needs of defense and security of the country is refuted by public opinion.

On the other hand, the detention of the rival Communists in Kerala was used by the ruling party to pursue its partisan interests in the recent Kerala Assembly elections.

The National Council of the Communist Party of India demands the immediate unconditional release of all these detenus. It demands the withdrawal of emergency and cancellation of DIR which have been a violation of the Constitution, by the highest judicial opinion in the country.

It also demands the withdrawal of the President's Rule in Kerala so that a chance is given to the democratic process to operate.

A campaign for these demands is a campaign for democratic liberties and for the defense of parliamentary democracy which must be organized jointly by all left parties and other democrats in cooperation with the proposed Civil Liberties Union and other organizations.

The National Council resolves to initiate such a campaign in cooperation with all left and democratic forces which are prepared to act together with our Party.

POSITIVE CONTRIBUTION TO COMMUNIST UNITY*

NATIONAL COUNCIL WELCOMES MOSCOW MEET DECISIONS, OUTLINES TASKS FOR CPI

The National Council of the Communist Party of India in its meeting on April 5 adopted the following resolution on the consultative meeting of Communist and Workers' Parties in Moscow.

The National Council of the Communist Party of India, having heard the report of the delegation of our Party, which participated in the consultative meeting of Communist and Workers' Parties held in Moscow from March 1 to 5, welcomes the two documents unanimously adopted by the meeting, viz., the Communique and the Statement on the Vietnam events, and approves of the work of its delegation.

The Party Congress in Bombay had successfully concluded the discussion that was organized throughout the Party on the ideological differences in the world Communist movement and on the ways of restoring unity on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, and had laid down the Party's stand on both these issues in its resolution.

This resolution served as a guide for the work of our delegation at the consultative meeting.

The National Council is of the opinion that the holding and successful conclusion of this consultative meeting was an important and positive contribution to the task of achieving cohesion and unity in the world Communist movement though it faced certain difficulties due to opposition of the leadership of the Communist Party of China.

Of the utmost importance is the unanimous conclusion of the meeting that, despite "the differences relating to the political line and many important problems of theory and tactics" which exist in the world Communist movement, it is "quite possible and necessary to strive for unity of actions in the struggle against imperialism, in the cause of giving all manner of support for the liberation movement of the peoples, in the struggle for world peace and peaceful coexistence of the states with different social systems. . . ."

The National Council warmly welcomes the call for international solidarity actions against mounting brutal aggression of U.S. imperialists in South and North Vietnam, and in support of the heroic struggle of the Vietnamese people for the consolidation of their sovereignty and independence and the reunification of the country without foreign interference.

The National Council welcomes the fact that the consultative meeting has reiterated the objective of holding an international conference of all Communist and Workers' Parties and has put forward a three-point program of preparing for such a conference, both from the point of view of content and form, the organizational point of view, and for creating the favorable conditions for the participation of all parties in such a preparation.

The National Council fully endorses this three-point proposal for preparing for the international conference of Communist and Workers' parties.

—To stop open polemics which are in character unfriendly and degrading to fraternal Parties, while continuing discussion and exchange of views on important contemporary questions in friendly terms, without mutual attacks;

—Strict observance of the norms of relationship between parties as defined by the 1957 and 1960 meetings and no interference of any party in the internal affairs of another party;

—Bilateral and multilateral meetings of representatives of the fraternal parties, and other forms of party contacts for exchange of opinions on the common tasks of the world Communist movement and finally calling a preliminary consultative meeting of the representatives of 81 parties which took part in the meeting of 1960 to discuss the question of a new international meeting

But the leadership of the Communist Party of China has rejected the proposal of the conference to stop open polemics which are in character unfriendly and degrading and observe the norms of relationship between parties as defined by the 1960 meetings.

It is the opinion of the National Council of the Communist Party of India that the Communist and Workers' Parties must persist in their efforts to achieve unity of the world Communist movement by firmly implementing the principled stand and measures outlined by the Moscow consultative meeting.

It is only by persisting in developing joint initiatives for common action against imperalist aggression, for the support of national-liberation movements and for world peace, and by developing contacts, cooperation for exchange of opinion on common tasks between Communist and Workers' Parties that the cause of world Communist unity will advance and succeed in overcoming splitting and disruptive tendencies.

The Moscow consultative meeting, which was held in the spirit of a strict observance of the democratic principles of independence and equality of all fraternal parties has rendered a service by charting out a positive and constructive path for achieving world Communist unity.

The Communist Party of India, in order to make its contribution to this common objective, will undertake the following tasks:

Educate the entire rank and file of the Party on the common tasks and problems of the world Communist movement and of its unity as laid down in our Congress resolution on "Ideological Controversies and the Unity of the International Communist movement."

Activize the Party ranks in the struggle to rally the masses for international solidarity actions, against imperialist aggression, for support to natonal liberation struggle in Asia, Africa and Latin America and for world peace.

To take initiative in holding bilateral and multilateral talks with brother parties for exchange of opinions and working out common tasks in the struggle for national liberation, democracy and world peace.

A NEW MASSACRE IN SULAIMANIYAH BY THE ARIF-YEHIYA CLIQUE

STATEMENT OF THE IRAQI COMMUNIST PARTY

The military clique ruling Iraq persists in ignoring the will of the Iraqi people and Arab and world public opinion. It has been intensifying hysterical propaganda against the Kurdish patriots and carrying on direct preparations for a renewal of the civil war. It has staged provocations against the peaceful Kurdish people and bloody clashes with them.

On the night of April 3, the clique ordered a barbaric massacre in Sulaimaniyah, without even taking the trouble to think up a "justification" for this crime, while official propaganda concealed the truth about it.

On the eve, some check-points on the outskirts of the city fired a few shots which were followed by a flood of fire in the main streets released by army and police units from the military center and police stations. The tanks, armored cars and troops surrounded the city and moved into its main streets and squares. The shooting lasted several hours, in the course of which the authorities raided the homes of more than 60 residents of Sershkam district. This operation, conducted without any pretext, was to demonstrate strength and intimidate the citizens.

Next morning tanks surrounded Khebat and Sershkam districts. House-combing was conducted in a violent way reminiscent of the rampages of the "National Guards." Many citizens were arrested.

At five o'clock the "blockade" of these two districts was lifted and the troops moved towards the center of the city where people usually spend their leisure in cafés, restaurants and shopping centers. Upon reaching the center the troops opened violent fire on unarmed passers-by, shoppers and people in cafés. The commander of the 19th Battalion admitted at a meeting of soldiers and policemen in the evening that the government troops had fired in the city 15,000 shots on that day and 10,000 shots the day before. This time it was not only a show of strength; more than 15 citizens, and Arab government employees among them, were killed and dozens wounded. The government forces failed to find on those killed or wounded any weapons that could be used as a formal pretext for opening fire on them.

When the shooting ceased the citizens were ordered to walk home hands up, as prisoners-of-war. Many of them, fearing that they would not reach home safely, sought shelter in the houses of their acquaintances nearby.

During the shooting women—wives, sisters and mothers—rushed out into the streets in search of their relatives.

The owners of many cafés ran together with the others, leaving behind everything. The corpses were removed only on the next day.

After this new slaughter hundreds of families fled the city fearing persecutions and death. Among them were Egyptian teachers lecturing in the city. Throughout April 4 the streets remained deserted and the shops closed both out of fear and in protest.

In connection with this bloody drama the military commander of the region, General Fadhil Mohammed Ali, and the Governor of the Liwa Province, Mahammed Rashad el Ganabi, issued an official statement addressed to the residents of the city. In this statement, dated April 4, they declared the determination of the authorities "to safeguard order, security and the Constitution" and warned that the houses and even whole villages giving shelter to outlawed persons would be immediately and mercilessly razed to the ground.

On April 4 the commander of the armed forces of the region admitted at a meeting of soldiers and policemen that "those killed were unarmed and innocent people," that "there was an Arab official among them," that the army and police forces had suffered not a single casualty, and that "robbery and plunder" were one of the aims of the massacre. He was also compelled to admit that this crime against peaceful civilians was a violation of all moral and religious norms and, finally, that the shooting had actually begun against Kurdish patriots on the outskirts of the city.

Other sources reported that the military dictatorial clique had declared the region of Kurdistan "an area of military operations" already on April 5, that the army was conducting actual operations and that raids had been carried out in various districts. Abdul Rahman Arif was put in charge of the military operations in the north. According to the latest reports from Sulaimaniyah, yesterday the authorities organized a new massacre in that city.

Fellow-countrymen of different nationalities and political convictions!

Opponents of imperialism and tyranny throughout the Arab world!

Fighters for justice and truth the world over!

Raise high your voice of protest against this criminal carnage and resist the dictators, who are out to drown the country in a sea of blood and reduce the Kurdish towns and villages to ruins! Demand punishment of those responsible for the murder of innocent residents of Sulaimaniyah and Kurdistan!

The responsibility for the new crime in Sulaimaniyah rests with the Arif-Yehya clique, this chauvinist reactionary clique which participated in the unjust war against the Kurdish people launched during the fascist Baath rule and continued throughout three months following the November 1964 coup. Today this clique, despite the lessons of history, is restarting this war.

Long live Arab-Kurdish brotherhood!

Long live the struggle of the Kurds for their legitimate national rights!

Glory to the immortal martyrs!

Long live a peaceful settlement of the Kurdish problem!

FOR A PEACE-LOVING AND DEMOCRATIC FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY*

CPG PROGRAM FOR THE BUNDESTAG ELECTION OF SEPTEMBER 19, 1965

The CDU-CSU has been ruling in Bonn for fifteen years now. Throughout this time, the program of the Adenauer and Erhard governments has been dominated by the "positions of strength" policy. Pursuing this policy, they split Germany, made the FRG a member of NATO, the Western powers' military alliance, and re-armed West Germany. Their purpose in so doing was to gain a dominant position in Western Europe, bring the GDR "back" to the fold of the "Reich" and continue the old course—toward the frontiers of 1937, a pan-German Reich, and a "new order" in Europe. But they want to go even further. They want Bonn's sphere of influence to include the newly-established national states of the Middle East, Africa and Asia, which should be made easier, or so they think, by what they call development aid.

This political program was unrealistic from the outset. It was based on conceptions now fully shattered by actual developments, by changes both in Germany and in the rest of the world. The "positions of strength" policy, the arrogance of the ruling circles and their persistence in old plans for domination made nations in East and West distrustful of the FRG and led to an increasing isolation of our country. The failure of this policy became evident when Adenauer had to resign. But Erhard began to carry on the same policy, with the result that it finds itself in crisis.

Did the West German population want that policy? The electorate was never asked whether it was for or against the establishment of a West German state and, hence, for or against a split Germany, for or against armament and NATO membership, for or against nuclear armament and emergency legislation. Our Constitution states that the entire power belongs to the people. Nevertheless, the government has invariably confronted the people with a fait accompli.

Flick and Abs, Adenauer and Erhard, Strauss and Mende are all obsessed with the idea of reversing the course of history and of continuing it from where, twenty years ago, Hitler and his warlords were forced to stop. Unable, as usual, to make a proper evaluation of their strength and the strength of others, they are banking on a weakening of the socialist world and on the divergences in the socialist community. They hope to succeed in isolating the GDR and in bringing it to its knees. But the Soviet Union and other socialist countries are gaining in strength, and their influence on history is growing. The GDR's peace policy and efforts to safeguard international security are supported by all the socialist countries. The treaties between the GDR and the Soviet Union, the decisions of the Warsaw Treaty countries, and statements by the Chinese People's Republic leave no room for doubt on this score. The prestige of the GDR, respect for it as a German state which pursues a policy of peace and has done away with a disastrous past, is growing as the Bonn regime forfeits the so strenuously restored credit of the German nation.

Uncompromised by the possession of colonies, the FRG had ample opportunities of establishing good relations with young national states. But Bonn did not realize that the peoples of Asia and Africa refused to put up any longer with colonialist methods, whether old or new. Bonn's attempt to reinforce Israel, that imperialist outpost in the Middle East, through secret arms deliveries and thus to exert pressure on the Arab states has failed completely. The defeat of the Hallstein doctrine* is obvious.

The peoples of the NATO countries have not forgotten the lessons of the Hitler war. They are perturbed and outraged by the rise of neo-Nazism in West Germany. They see the Federal government as an obstacle to international detente. They refuse to "burn their fingers" on Bonn's reckless adventures.

Anyone who sees the facts as they are is bound to come to the following conclusion:

The "positions of strength" policy, a policy of threats and military blackmail, holds no prospects for us. The political program of the CDU-CSU is doomed to failure. None of its aims can be attained—neither supremacy in Western Europe, the annexation of the GDR, the "rolling back" of the socialist world, nor the neocolonialist subjection of the newly-free national states.

The longer this policy is pursued, the more reckless it becomes. Its implementation threatens to become suicide. The issue of replacing this policy by a new one is now becoming one of "to be or not to be."

Erhard and the forces backing him resist necessary changes with might and main. Instead of drawing lessons from their setbacks, they persist in a rigid home and foreign policy "from positions of strength," demanding nuclear weapons and insisting on emergency legislation.

---

*The Hallstein doctrine expresses Bonn's claim to the role of spokesman for the whole of Germany, and provides for the revision of relations with any country, giving de facto recognition to the GDR.—Ed.

The announcement of the plan for atom mine belts showed how very dangerous that policy is. It is a policy that will spell our ruin unless we end it. That policy is a component of the plan for turning the cold war into a fratricidal one, for seizing the GDR by force, without declaring war. As for the Soviet Union and the other allies of the GDR, they are to be blackmailed by threatening to escalate a "small war" to a worldwide nuclear conflagration.

Erhard and Mende, Hassel and Trettner call that an "undercover war." But such a war would mean nuclear suicide for the FRG. If the FRG were the one to attack, it would be reduced to ashes in a few hours. We must all join forces to prevent such an outcome.

Resistance to atomic armament should be the first commandment of German policy. The territory of the FRG should never become the breeding ground of a new war. A fratricidal war between Germans should never break out.

What the government parties have for fifteen years made out to be a "reunification" policy is a fraud. The arming of the FRG and its entry into NATO were bound to make, and did make, reunification less and less feasible. By signing the Paris agreements, the Federal government sold out to the Western powers our right to self-determination, and granted foreign troops the right to occupy the country till the year 2000 or later. The atomic "forward" strategy threatens to destroy our last chance. Germany cannot be reunified by means of atomic arms but can only be destroyed.

Reunification cannot be initiated unless the FRG revises its present ruinous policy of territorial encroachments, in favor of a new policy aimed at easing world tensions, disarmament and negotiations with the GDR.

The threat to freedom does not come from without but from within, from the top—the millionaires and their ministers and warlords. In the past they handed power to Hitler in an effort to retain their rule and their profits. Today they are implanting neo-Nazism in West Germany for the same reason. To achieve their aim, they need past masters of terrorism and persecution at the head of their business corporations and ministries, their justice and press. They want to discontinue the prosecution of Nazi war criminals by applying the statute of limitations, and to make us live in one society with murderers.

The meaning and purpose of emergency laws is to establish a regime of arbitrary rule and violence over the people, to stifle all opposition, to put the Federal Republic under martial law in peace time. In this manner the "powers that be" in our country want to remove the Constitution, to abolish the right of the trade unions to association and to strike, the powers of the Bundestag, freedom of the press, and all legal order in the state.

The people of the FRG must have greater freedom to safeguard their vital interests. This is why we Communists are fighting shoulder to shoulder with all democrats against emergency laws and militarist rule, for adherence to the Constitution and for more extensive democratic rights.

Economic stability and social justice cannot exist where big business and its agents—proponents of the policy of atomic strategy—rule the roost. In West Germany, 99.7 percent of the population own less property than the other 0.3 percent, who appropriate the wealth created by the people. This wealth is stowed away in the vaults of the big banks, spent on armaments or a life of luxury for the few. Big business makes fabulous profits, which it boosts through rationalization and automation. As for the people, they are expected to moderate their requirements and make sacrifices.

Despite a high level of business activity and the growing proportion of employment, the working people's share in the social product has in late years been dwindling, while that of big business has been growing. New price increases threaten to outpace wages. The purchasing capacity of the mark is declining.

The Adenauer and Erhard governments have introduced a taxation system which affects millionaires less and the working people more than in any other industrial country. The state has enormous means at its disposal. Its arms expenditure knows no bounds. But as regards medical care and industrial safety, old age pensions, sick benefits, education and culture, the FRG is sinking more and more to the level of an underdeveloped country. This cannot go on. The finance and tax policy must no longer serve to augment the big capitalists' rule and their profits. Policy should be shaped in the interest of the people.

Whom to elect?

At meetings, in interviews and in the press, every candidate and every party should be asked the following three questions:

Do you advocate safeguarding peace by preventing the atomic armament of the Federal Republic in any form?

Do you advocate the necessity for the FRG taking the initiative on disarmament and on the use of the means to be saved in this way in the economic, social and cultural interests of the working people?

Do you uphold the Constitution? Are you for the extension of parliamentary democracy and, hence, against all emergency laws?

THE POLICY OF "COMMUNITY" AFFORDS NO ALTERNATIVE

We Communists assess a policy from the standpoint of the common interests of the workers, of all working men and women, of our people as a whole. We also assess it in terms of the interests we have in common with the members and supporters of the SDP.

Social Democrats and Communists work in identical conditions in industry. We are members of one trade union. In the sphere of social issues, we are facing the same associations of manufacturers, and in the political sphere, the same parties of the Bonn coalition. We have common goals—to defeat the CDU-CSU and their policies, restrict the power of the millionaires and militarists, make them take greater account of the interests of the working people, and provide conditions for subsequent peaceful construction under a free and just social system.

Unfortunately, the Social Democratic leaders of the Wehner-Erler group have not lived up to the expectations of many members and functionaries, of many supporters and voters. In following their policy of "community" with the CDU-CSU, they refuse to oppose an independent point of view to the bankrupt policy of the government. They are vying with the CDU-CSU in fomenting nationalism and anti-communism, thereby backing a policy directed against the relaxation of international tension. On the cardinal issues of foreign, military and home policy, they are going back more and more on the demands of their own party.

Brandt, the SDP candidate for Chancellor, promises a peace policy. But how is this promise to be reconciled with his own insistence on FRG participation in a NATO mutilateral nuclear force or with the relevant decision of his party's Karlsruhe congress? After all, such partipication would not prevent the atomic armament of the Bundeswehr. On the contrary, it would be a further step toward the acquisition of an unlimited right to possess atomic weapons.

The SDP electoral program promises that the party will vigorously tackle tasks of "social significance" in the fields of social security and medical care, schools and public education, transport and territorial planning. These are urgent tasks. But how are the vast sums needed for their accomplishment to be released since the SDP leaders want to continue spending at least as much on armaments as the Erhard government? How are the ideas of humanism and friendship among the peoples to become uppermost in the world outlook of our youth and our people as a whole if the spirit of militarism and a new crusade against the East is not abandoned?

Despite the stand taken by the trade unions and most of the SDP members and supporters, the Bundestag group of that party is ready, under pressure from Wehner and Erler, to agree to emergency legislation and to its early enactment. It claims that it wants to prevent something worse and to prevent the abuse of executive authority. But the emergency legislation would invest the government and the generals with dictatorial powers against the people, the trade union, the Bundestag and Land governments. This attack on the Constitution by the SDP leaders is a stab in the back of the trade unions fighting for democracy in the FRG, for social rights and the people's participation in management.

In view of the foregoing, we state:

The SDP policy is out of keeping with the responsibility resting on that party. The line followed by its leaders today, the policy of "community," affords no alternative to the policy of the CDU-CSU. Their position, their policy and their actions have unfortunately not justified the hope of many SDP supporters that they would pursue a better policy.

A NEW POLICY REQUIRES SELF-DETERMINATION

The Federal Republic of Germany needs a legal Communist Party. The CPG differs from the parties now represented in the Bundestag in that its deeds are not at variance with its words. Anyone who pursues an atomic policy is going against the interests of the people and is therefore bound to mislead the electorate with false promises. We Communists want the people to know the truth. We can achieve our aims only in common with the majority of the working class and the people as a whole. If we, the workers, peasants, intellectuals, handicraftsmen and tradesmen decide to take the matter into our own hands, the strength of the people and the weakness of the policy of atomic war will become obvious.

We Communists believe in the strength of the working class. The entire history of the working class shows that this class receives no gifts from the ruling classes and can gain little so long as it is divided. But it becomes a mighty force and can achieve everything for itself and for the whole people when it is thinking of the interest of all and acting by the joint effort of its major organizations, the trade unions. This is why we Communists call on our SDP comrades to fight for their own demands, for the implementation of trade union resolutions against atomic armament and emergency legislation, for an active policy on wages and for co-management. We call on them to ensure that those resolutions also become a guideline for SDP policy. We say to them: Let us clasp hands and establish working-class unity of action! This is the key to changing the situation in our favor and to creating democratic conditions in the FRG.

We, the workers, peasants and intellectuals, constitute the overwhelming majority of the people. When asked about our attitude to the people's right to self-determination, we Communists answer: It is not for the minority but for the overwhelming majority of the people to make policy.

To establish a broad front of resistance to atomic armament and emergency laws means respecting the people's right to self-determination in solving problems of vital importance.

This is the main task at present, or the government will confront public opinion with a fait acompli even before the election. It is of decisive importance for the development of the FRG after the election. As a result, we will ensure that any future government finds itself, more than ever before, under the pressure of the workers and their unions, of the peasants and intellectuals, of the people's will. As a result the ground will be cleared for the formation of a government excluding those who pursue the policy of revenge and and a state of emergency, a government of Social Democrats, trade union functionaries and bourgeois peace supporters, which will reject the policy of the "last risk" and will be ready to take steps toward mutual understanding, a serious approach to the issue of relations wtih the GDR and of peaceful coexistence, will respect and uphold the constitutional rights of the people.

TOGETHER WITH THE CPG, FOR A POLICY OF NATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY

Our population does not need any Lebensraum in the East or elsewhere in the world to achieve well-being and gain prestige. Our future cannot be assured through the arms race and the claims to foreign territory. The prestige and importance of our country depend on its contribution to peace, on the achievements of our workers, peasants, technicians, scientists and artists.

The CPG is striving for democracy and freedom for the people. Freedom of the individual begins with the workers winning respect for themselves as individuals in industry, with the winning of the right to labor, to equal opportunities and social security.

In the interest of the democratic rights of the majority of the people, the trade unions as organizations of industrial and office workers representing the interests of 75 percent of the population should be fully entitled to participate in the decision on all questions in every establishment and in the economy as a whole, in the administrative apparatus and in the whole of society.

The Bundestag can fulfil its constitutional role provided monopoly power is restricted by co-management on the part of the working people and their trade unions.

Freedom of opinion and of the press, freedom of research and instruction, of science and art, implies freeing spiritual and cultural life from the pressure of psychological war hysteria and from the misrule of big business.

Granting freedom to the CPG would provide a powerful counterbalance to the arbitrary rule of the millionaires and militarists. The CPG recognizes all rights and obligations arising from the Constitution. A legal CPG would strengthen democracy and contribute to the pursuit of an independent policy by the Social Democratic movement. It would bring a breath of fresh air into the stifling atmosphere of political and spiritual life.

The CPG is striving for social security and justice. These aims cannot be attained unless the workers and other working people fight together against the rule of injustice, the omnipotence of a handful of multi-millionaires and the reactionary policy of Bonn. Social security and justice imply:

—full implementation of the program of the Association of German Trade Unions;

—an active policy on wages, and a bigger share of wages in the social product at the expense of superprofits;

—trade union participation in the decision of all questions in industry and the economy as a whole, in the political and government sphere, with a view to preventing corruption and the arms race.

The CPG is striving for a sound peace economy. The arbitrary policy on prices, the stoppage of factory shops, lack of respect for the working man and destruction of his labor power, and the squandering of the national wealth on preparations for war and destruction show that the concentration of economic might in the hands of a small group of multi-milionaires is a social and political evil. The CPG bases its national policy on the fact that there exist two German states: the capitalist Federal Republic of Germany and the socialist German Democratic Republic. Their governments should recognize this and negotiate with each other.

Who in the Federal Republic can usher in this policy of common sense and goodwill? The working class—provided it approaches the solution of the German problem with due regard to its own peaceful, democratic and social interests. As far as the workers and their unions are concerned, to follow a national policy means:

—greatly increasing resistance to the atomic armament of the FRG in any form and to the policy of strength and revenge;

—providing conditions for the reunification of Germany by establishing mutual understanding between the working-class organizations of the two German states;

—establishing a broad militant front in collaboration with every segment of the population, and removing the opponents of mutual understanding between Germans from the levers of government.

That is what the people's initiative should be in deciding the German question, an initiative needed today. It would eliminate the danger of a fratricidal war and create an atmosphere of detente between the two German states.

The government parties say: "We are all in the same boat." The SDP leaders, for their part, recommend to the people the policy of "community." Community with whom and to what end? In order to follow Flick and Erhard, Hassel and Trettner over the precipice?

Had not the people better unite and, using the combined strength of the workers, peasants, intellectuals, the realistic-minded members of the bourgeoisie, and the younger generation, remove Flick and Erhard, Hassel and Trettner from their key posts in the economy, the government and the armed forces and replace them and their policy by sensible people and a sensible policy?

We Communists want this kind of community. Only this community can defeat the past and bring a better reality and a secure future. This community is a force capable of ensuring that a new policy is embarked on in Bonn, that the FRG becomes a socially just and democratic state, that the unification of Germany takes place in a peaceful and free atmosphere.

DOCUMENTS* OF THE CC, PORTUGUESE COMMUNIST PARTY

DRAFT PROGRAM OF THE PARTY. COMMUNIQUE OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE

1. The objective of the Program of the Portuguese Communist Party is scientifically to define the tasks of the Party at the present historical stage on the basis of the docrine of Marx, Engels and Lenin. By drafting the Program and submitting it to the whole Party for appraisal and discussion, the Central Committee is carrying out its task, which is to offer the Party a Program.

The draft Program is based on an analysis of the present economic, social and political situation in Portugal. It defines the fascist government as a government of the monopolies linked with foreign imperialism and of the latifundists, and shows that the policy of the fascist government is directed against the interests of the proletariat (industrial and agricultural workers), the peasantry (small and middle cultivators), the urban petty bourgeoisie, certain sections of the middle bourgeoisie, and the intellectuals. It stresses that the people in the Portuguese colonies are exploited and dominated by the Portuguese colonialists and that the Portuguese people are exploited and dominated by the foreign imperialists. It describes the national struggle against the fascist dictatorship as an anti-monopoly and anti-imperialist struggle. And it defines the present stage of the revolution as democratic and national.

2. The democratic tasks of the revolution are to end fascist tyranny, establish political freedom, abolish the power of the monopolies and latifundists, and effect a series of deep-going reforms that will benefit the overwhelming majority of the Portuguese population.

The national taks of the revolution are to end the imperialist domination of Portugal and Portugal's colonial domination of other peoples, promote the growth of the national wealth, and guarantee the sovereignty, territorial integrity and genuine independence of the country.

The draft Program lists eight fundamental objectives of the democratic and national revolution.

—to abolish the fascist state and to establish a democratic system;

---

*Hoante, Feb. 1965.

—to eliminate monopoly power and to promote the general economic development of the country;

—to carry out an agrarian reform giving the land to those who till it;

—to improve the living standard of the working classes and the people as a whole;

—to democratize education and culture;

—to free Portugal from imperialism;

—to recognize and safeguard the right of the people in the Portuguese colonies to immediate independence;

—to pursue a policy of peace and friendship with all the peoples.

The draft carries further, specifies and systematizes the reforms to be sought and the measures needed to achieve the above objectives. It stresses that the democratic and national revolution has to attain all these objectives, and maintains that their attainment depends in decisive measure on the unity and struggle of the working class and the masses generally.

3. The draft Program justifies the need to unite the non-monopolistic classes and strata in a vast anti-fascist front to be based above all on the unity of the working class (particularly the industrial and rural proletariat) and on the alliance of the working class and the peasantry. It also stresses the importance of the urban petty bourgeoisie and, outside the social forces of Portugal, of the alliance with the people of the Portuguese colonies. Saying that one of the cardinal tasks of the proletarian party is to unite the anti-fascist, democratic and patriotic forces, the draft underlines that only the proletariat, led by the Communist Pary, can promote the unity of all the anti-monopoly classes and strata, organizing them and inspiring them with revolutionary enthusiasm, lead them to victory over the dictatorship, and fight — consistently and to the finish — for all the fundamental objectives of the democratic and national revolution.

The draft Program says that as matters stand in Portugal today, the prospect of overthrowing the fascist dictatorship lies in a national rising, an armed popular insurrection. It specifies the main conditions in which this can take place and indicates the fundamental tasks of the Party in leading the working class and the masses to victory. The draft insists that only the struggle of the masses can lead to a victorious popular insurrection. It emphasizes the role of the masses, of organization and the use of different forms of struggle, and gives an estimation of their relative importance.

4. The draft Program points out that the first and most important step of the democratic and national revolution when it has overthrown the fascist dictatorship will be to put power in the hands of a Provisional Government whose chief task should be to establish democratic liberties and hold free elections to a Constituent Assembly. It speaks of the necessity and conditions for the Communist Party going into the Provincial Government, and outlines the immediate and urgent measures that the Government will have to take in order to consolidate the victory and be able to hold free elections.

5. The draft Program stresses that the revolutionary process is not limited to the democratic and national revolution and that the Portuguese Communist Party, vanguard of the proletariat, a Marxist-Leninist party, sees the fight for the democratic and national revolution as a component of the fight for socialism. It gives the main general characteristics of the proletarian revolution and of the construction of a socialist society, and shows that in order to go over from capitalism to socialism, it is indispensable to establish the dictatorship of the proletariat, which may take the most varied and distinctive forms.

Concerning the issues of the socialist revolution in Portugal, the draft affirms that when the fascist dictatorship has been overthrown, accomplishment of the democratic and national revolution will provide favorable conditions for the proletariat winning power without a fresh insurrection, and says that the path to take will in the end be determined by the actual conditions.

6. The draft Program describes the main features of communist society, the experience and example of the October Revolution, the U.S.S.R. and the socialist community as a whole. Thereupon it sums up the organizational principles of the PCP, speaks of the Party's role and fight, and stresses that the Party is a contingent of the world Communist movement in which all the parties are independent, equal and sovereign. It calls on the working class and other working people, the intellectuals and the youth to make the Party Program their own program and to fight for its realization.

7. The Central Committee is submitting the draft Program to the whole Party for discussion.

The draft outlines the revolutionary perspective of the day-by-day struggles of the Party and the working classes and its discussion should be linked with the discussion of the immediate tasks of the Party. Its discussion will contribute to the ideological and political unity of the whole Party, to the unity of action of all the Party organizations and members in properly implementing the political and tactical line of the Party.

Based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism, the draft Program is a valuable weapon in the fight against all deviations. Its discussion by the entire Party will contribute in important measure, not only toward fighting against and defeating every manifestation of Right-wing opportunism, but also toward fighting against and defeating the sectarian, Leftist and anarchist tendencies of petty bourgeois radicalism, which at present constitute the main danger.

When it has been discussed and approved, the draft Program of the PCP will become a basic document of decisive importance for the entire activity of the Party and for the struggle of the working class, the masses, the people generally. It will become a guide in the fight to overthrow fascism and to accomplish the democratic and national revolution.

The working class and other working people, led and inspired by the Program of the PCP, will fight under the banner of the Party and advance to freedom, democracy, national independence, peace and socialism.

CC. PCP

IN DEFENSE OF WORLD COMMUNIST UNITY

REPORTED BY SERGIO VILARIGUES

"The fact that differences arose within the world Communist movement years ago has had a highly negative effect on the progress of the struggle of the working class and other working people for their economic demands, peace, democracy and socialism. Also, it greatly prejudices the development of the national-liberation struggles of the peoples who are still under the tyranny of imperialism and colonialism, and the consolidation of the independence of those countries which gained it recently.

This is how S. Vilarigues, member of the CC Secretariat, began his report, in which he then outlined the method of overcoming present difficulties.

"This reality makes it the duty of all the Communist and Workers' parties to search for a solution to their differences."

THE MEETING: ROAD TO UNITY AND COHESION

S. Vilarigues next set forth the position which the CC, PCP had adhered to since January 1963 by declaring for patient and friendly talks between fraternal parties and for the preparation of a meeting of all the Communist and Workers' parties. He spoke in critical terms of the various obstacles raised by some fraternal parties to the holding of such a meeting. But even the new problems that have arisen during the past four years would be ample justification for "a collective analysis and a common decision on them."

"The fact that the imperialists are gleefully rubbing their hands in view of the serious differences which have arisen in the Communist movement is no reason for this alram. What is alarming is that the Communist and Workers' parties should not have done everything to end their differences and to prevent a split at all costs. Holding the meeting would be the best way to block this split.

"As we know, the coming meeting is not intended to impose anything on any party. It is aimed at analyzing present-day problems in a fraternal spirit and at finding solutions to them on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and the general line established by the meetings of 1957 and 1960.

"Naturally, should any party choose to stay away from the meeting despite efforts by all the other parties to convince it to cooperate, it will be free to do so. We do not, however, think it has a right to try to prevent the meeting on the plea of lack of unanimity.

"Meanwhile preparations for the meeting should consist entirely in bringing the points of view of the different parties closer together and in revealing in a constructive spirit all the common elements that should unite them. The cohesion of the world Communist movement and the unity of the socialist camp are a necessary condition for reinforcing and extending the anti-imperialist world front. This is why our Party was agreeable to the Drafting Committee meeting at a later date, March 1965."

FIGHT AGAINST SPLIT

Speaking of the importance of working-class unity, S. Vilarigues stressed that history "shows that the working-class movement tends to unite and that the Communists and the more class-conscious workers have always fought for working-class unity, on both a national and an international scale.

"Only the bourgeoisie has a stake in a split of the Communist and working-class movement. It therefore uses every means and sticks at nothing to obstruct and prevent unification of the proletariat, to prevent the growth and materialization of the workers' desire for unity."

As far as the PCP is concerned, the problem of the existence of a single party in Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Japan and other countries "is as clear as daylight."

"Our Party will accept no declaration nor agree to any political talks with whoever has been expelled from his party for his refusal to carry out the decisions of higher Party bodies, even if we were to think he was right."

S. Vilarigues underlined that "the PCP takes guidance in its entire work" from the thesis of the 1957 Moscow Declaration, which condemns the activity of groups undermining the unity of the Communist parties.

He next spoke of the disruptive activities going on in the world Communist movement and of its manifestations in Portuguese life:

"There is room in the Party for disagreement on this or that point of orientation but none for several lines or orientations, for groups undermining its cohesion on any pretext whatever."

With reference to the favorable opportunities which fascism usually provides for anti-party groups, S. Vilarigues said:

"All that the fascist camarilla of Salazar and his police want is to combat and destroy those who consistently strive to end the reign of terror, exploitation and oppression. The facts daily show at whom the brunt of repression is aimed and who are the men, women and young people who suffer most as a result. Many leaders of the Party are in Salazar's prisons after sustaining the worst tortures. Dauntless fighters for Party unity, they are as devoted to their Party as ever."

THE POLICY OF PEACEFUL COEXISTENCE, AN IMPERATIVE NECESSITY OF OUR TIME

S. Vilarigues stressed that the Party line on peace is based on Leninist principles and adheres to the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement. "Either the peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems, or a destructive war—this is how the question is posed today."

"Peaceful coexistence does not reject the class struggle," but makes it easier.

The struggle of the oppressed peoples for independence is not merely a right. It is a need—irrespective of whether or not it leads to a cruel national-liberation war.

Thus "the PCP has declared for the right of the people in the Portuguese colonies to take up arms against their oppressors. Moreover, it has supported the armed struggle of the people in Angola, Guinea and Mozambique, and has signified its solidarity with this struggle."

"Peaceful coexistence," S. Vilarigues added, "is a higher form of the class struggle on a large scale, imposed on imperialism and undesirable to it." In these circumstances "we are really in a position to prevent the imperialists now from dragging the world into a new war, which could be nothing but a destructive thermonuclear war."

S. Vilarigues analyzed the latest gains in the struggle of the international working class, the national-liberation movement and all the peace-loving peoples against the military plans of the imperialists headed by the U.S. imperialists—gains which are due to the steadfast policy of peace which the Soviet Union, the main bulwark of socialism and world peace, and the other socialist countries have been pursuing.

In conclusion S. Vilarigues said: "Rallying their forces in order to lend their defense of peace greater vigor and scope is one of the major tasks facing the Communist and Workers' parties. This is a new and strong argument that, while by no means justifying an early convening of a new meeting makes it nevertheless imperative."

POLITICAL ENLIGHTENMENT AND PRACTICAL ACTION

S. Vilarigues dealt with some ideological issues.

"We cannot and must not," he said, "disregard the fundamental thing which concerns our own country, that is, the tasks facing our Party inside the country in view of the situation in the world Communist movement."

"Only through sustained political enlightenment and organizing work always linked with practical action is it possible to defeat both Left sectarian trends and Right opportunist deviations," to uphold the unity and political line of the Party, to rouse the membership to "enthusiastic action," and to mass struggle.

"Only concerted mass struggles can make all that is sound and progressive in Portugal a palpable reality, a force strong enough to lead the Portuguese people to a national rising against the fascist dictatorship."

"All the Communists should work among the masses, primarily the working class, for they are the force giving us a firm foothold on earth and they can move mountains. It is they who give us all the wealth of the revolution, a strong will, constantly regenerating confidence and energy for revolutionary action for democracy, peace, social progress, socialism and communism."

PLENARY MEETING OF THE CC, CP OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA

On April 22 and 23 last, the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia discussed the question of drafting the fourth five-year plan of ecoomic development for 1966-70. The meeting was attended by the first secretaries of the district committees of the CPC, the chairmen of the regional National Committees, and representatives of the National Front organizations. The CC approved guidelines for the further activities of the government, economic, Party and other public bodies and organizations in completing the draft plan. The report on this question was presented by O. Cernik.

The CC examined the progress made in drafting the fourth five-year plan in terms of fulfilment of the tasks set by the Twelfth Congress with a view to furthering the development of socialist society. The Twelfth Congress called for promoting the national economy on the basis of the levels attained in production, science and technology, eliminating imbalances between the levels of the productive forces in industry and agriculture, achieving harmony between production and consumption, and continuing, in step with economic progress and the growth of public wealth, to improve the people's standard of living through consistent implementation of the principle of material incentive. The CC resolved that in accomplishing these tasks the emphasis should be on readjusting the economy from quantitative to qualitative indices so as to ensure its advancement.

Political and organizing work in every economic field, and the devoted effort and the initiative of the working people following the January 1964 plenary meeting of the CC, CPC, led to the removal of the major imbalances of previous years, the resumption of the smooth operation of the national economy, and a better supply of consumer goods. The favorable results achieved lately make it possible to continue strengthening the economy and to set about promoting it. The progress made in the first quarter of this year is particularly indicative of favorable opportunities of accomplishing the tasks set by the Twelfth Congress. This progress is a concrete expression of the Party's active policy in ensuring fulfilment of the tasks approved by the CC, CPC last year.

The guidelines for the draft of the economic development plan for 1966-70 are the point of departure for further active work on the all-round development of production and for more efficient economic management.

The guidelines, which proceed from the fundamental tasks set by the Twelfth Congress, show why the development of social production will be more progressive and technically more complex than in the previous period. They provide for greater emphasis on the productivity of social labor in ensuring this development. Thereby they afford opportunities of building up the national income at a high rate and doing away with a situation in which the national income is used faster than it is built up. They envisage a stable correspondence between the level of personal and public consumption and the level of social production, and determine for the next few years the more economically expedient proportion of accumulation in the national income. Engineering remains the branch determining the main trend of economic development.

The guidelines provide for the further development of Slovakia and the evening up of the economic and cultural standards of the two regions of the country as a prime political and economic objective. They enable the new system of management and planning to help effectively in reducing production outlays, using fixed funds, steadily raising labor productivity and releasing labor power employed inexpediently.

Thus the guidelines constitute a draft plan for economic development designed to reduce the effect of existing adverse trends to a minimum, putting economic progress on a solid basis and laying the groundwork for the steady intensification of the economy. Being based as they are on the available knowledge of the present-day potentialities of the national economy, the guidelines aim at optimum utilization of all the resources and ensure observance of the requirements of proportional economic development in the course of reproduction. They accordingly determine the volume and pattern of supply on a national scale.

In drafting the fourth five-year plan, special importance is attached to gradual modernization of the economy and to the introduction of structural changes, primarily on the following lines: hastening agricultural progress, above all by using industrial methods more extensively and by increasing the share of industry in the provision of the material and technical facilities for agriculture; expediting the technical reconstruction of the economy through the priority development of engineering, which is the material base of mechanization and automation, and the chemical industry, which is the material base for the chemicalization of the entire economy. The share of the industries producing consumer goods, specifically the food industries, will also be increased through their gradual modernization with the aim of improving the standard of living and of supplying the needs of foreign trade.

In providing the growing national economy with labor power, it should be borne in mind that since the degree of employment of the population is high, growth of the national wealth will depend on increased labor productivity. Every enterprise is faced with the ensuring greater output while keeping the increase in labor power difficult tasks of using every opportunity to raise labor productivity, to a minimum, and making progress as planned while gradually reducing working hours. The CC stresses the need to muster all the reserves in order to achieve an early increase in labor productivity particularly by using available capacities and by organizing labor more effectively. Furthermore, the principle of using raw materials and power judiciously should be consistently enforced in every branch of the economy.

With regard to further economic progress, the CC maintains that more effective capital construction and competent use of basic funds in every field of economic and public activity are among the decisive factors. Hence the distribution of industrial investments under the future five-year plan is aimed at considerably stepping up investment in the chemical industry, at providing an adequate material base for agricultural production, and at strengthening, reconstructing and modernizing the food industry and the consumer goods industries generally. Aimed at the speedy removal of imbalances which in the past hampered steady economic growth, the allocations will be mainly channeled into the power industry and the transport system. In the non-production fields, investments will go into comprehensive housing construction, education and culture, the health services and social security. In the production sphere, larger investments are to be made in new capacities and plant, in improving workers' conditions.

The rapid advance of science and technology, and the more effective use of their achievements are a major condition for more effective capital construction according to higher standards and for the solution of problems of the higher productivity of social labor. Research and experimental work should therefore be geared primarily to problems whose solution will help in gradually introducing structural changes, improving the use of fuels, power and raw materials, hastening the growth of progressive lines—chemicalization, electronics and computing techniques, mechanization and automation in the production and non-production fields, rationalization of production, the introduction of progressive technologies in the processing industries, agriculture and building. Engineering and chemicals are to receive the greatest attention in research and experimental work.

The CC holds that up to 1970 improvements in the standard of living should proceed along the following main lines:

—guaranteeing a stable market while providing the working people with material incentives; —making the most effective use of public consumption funds, which should be used thriftily;

—paving the way for the gradual termination of stagnation in the expansion of paid public services;

—striving for a maximum in housing construction;

—carrying out the program for shorter working hours in keeping with the decisions of the Twelfth Congress of the CPC by gradually introducing a five-day week.

The CC stresses that as far as foreign economic relations are concerned, greater participation by the CSSR in international socialist division of labor is the fundamental method of promoting the Czechoslovak economy.

The CC notes that the guidelines also afford opportunities for rapid economic progress also after 1970. Planners should proceed from the actual potentialities. They should be careful not to overrate these, especially as regards investment and greater employment, and should strive for a dynamic, viable draft plan for economic development, whose fulfilment at the relevant stages would be guaranteed by the availability of adequate reserves.

The tasks set by the Twelfth Congress, which are gradually being carried out by the Party CC will underlie the further development of our socialist society. Their accomplishment will make for the further economic growth of Czechoslovakia, better satisfaction of the requirements of the people, and the promotion of their political and ideological unity. Realization of the guidelines for the economic development plan for 1966-70 plus introduction of the new system of economic planning will appreciably benefit our socialist society economically as well as politically and culturally.

Thousands of working people—researchers and designers, staff members of ministries and economic departments, economists, engineers, technologists and scientists—will take part in drafting the plan during the months ahead. This work should be tackled according to a well-considered program, such as will lead to higher standards of production, better management, more consistent intensification of production, the elimination of imbalances, and more effective economic growth.

An indispensable task of the period ahead is to make way for all that will benefit society, to rely on those who are capable of furthering social progress, contributing to the development of the country's productive forces and the improvement of social relations. The Party will continue to insist that its members, while extending their political horizons, improve their professional skills, and tackle the problems of economic and social relations thoughtfully and from a scientific standpoint.

RESOLUTION OF THE CC, CPC

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia, which at its plenary meeting on April 22-23, 1965 heard a report by Comrade V. Koucky, discussed the present situation in the world Communist and working-class movement. It also discussed the results of the Consultative Meeting of Communist and Workers' Parties held in Moscow from March 1-5, 1965. The CC, CPC welcomed the Meeting as an important step toward strengthening the unity and promoting the militancy of the world Communist movement against imperialism, for peace, national liberation, democracy and socialism. The CC, CPC agrees with the documents adopted by the Meeting and approves of the activity of the CPC delegation.

The CC, CPC fully supports the appeal of the Moscow Meeting for joint actions against imperialism, which is using every means, including aggression, to deprive the peoples of the right to independent development, freedom and progress and to hold back the process of revolutionary change taking place in the world, the motive force of which is the commonwealth of socialist countries, the powerful national-liberation movement and the struggle of the working class in the capitalist countries.

The CC, CPC emphatically condemns the barbarous U.S. raids on the Democratic Republic of Vietnam and the U.S. intervention in South Vietnam. World opinion rightly insists that the United States stop its dangerous acts of aggression, which are a threat to peace, unconditionally withdraw all its armed forces from South Vietnam, and respect the Vietnamese people's right to decide their own affairs without foreign interference.

In keeping with the internationalist sentiments of the working people of the CSSR, the CC, CPC will continue to give full support and assistance to the Vietnamese people in the just struggle. The Central Committee approves the actions and measures which its Presidium and the Government of the CSSR are taking to render the required aid.

The West German militarists' plans of revenge and their attempts to increase international tension, to abuse the position of West Berlin for this purpose, and to gain access to arms of massive destruction are inseparable from imperialist actions against the CC, CPC re-emphasizes its unshakable resolve to cooperate with the security of the peoples and the policy of peaceful coexistence. The other socialist countries and all the peace-loving peoples in foiling these dangerous designs, which jeopardize peace in Europe and all over the world.

The socialist community, which is supported by millions of progressive people throughout the world, is strong enough today to uphold the cause of peace and progress. It is able to do so thanks primarily to the Soviet Union, which consistently implements the Leninist general line of the CPSU, purposefully contributes by its firm and at the same time prudent policy of ensuring a healthy international climate and the normalization of relations between countries, and is the most solid bulwark of the peoples fighting for peace, national independence, democracy and socialism.

At a time when imperialist aggression in various parts of the world must be counteracted, it is highly important to strengthen the unity of the anti-imperialist front and to heighten its militancy. The main responsibility for this rests with the Communist and Workers' parties. This is why the CC, CPC fully shares the views stated by the fraternal parties at the Moscow Consultative Meeting, that everything should be done to overcome the differences existing in the world Communist movement, to strengthen its cohesion on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, proletarian internationalism and the line laid down in the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement.

The CC, CPC hails the joint conclusions and proposals aimed at fostering the unity of the movement. It will actively carry them into practice. In this connection it approves of the specific measures that were proposed with an eye to extending and deepening bilateral and multilateral relations between the CPC and fraternal parties, which will make it possible to hold fruitful exchanges of views and clear up questions of cooperation and broader problems of the world Communist movement. The CC, CPC sees the organization of joint actions by the Communist and Workers' parties as the most effective way of promoting their unity and solidarity, and will take an active part in them.

The CC, CPC declares once again for an end to hostile polemics in the Communist movement, and deplores the fact that certain parties are continuing it. At the same time it considers that it would be useful to continue constructive discussions of current problems of the joint struggle against the common enemy and of the ways of building socialist and communist society, in keeping with the Leninist standards of relations between fraternal parties .

All these steps would gradually create favorable conditions for a new world conference of the Communist and Workers' parties. This conference, to be called after adequate preparations and comprehensive exchanges of opinions, would unquestionably make a noteworthy contribution to the restoration of the Marxist-Leninist unity of our movement and to the establishment of a common line of strategic and tactical action by our parties. Hence the CC, CPC also supports the idea of a preliminary, preparatory meeting of representatives of the 81 fraternal parties which signed the Moscow Statement of 1960.

The CC, CPC regrets to state that the leadership of the Communist Party of China, the Albanian Party of Labor and certain other parties disapproved of the Moscow Meeting and proposals for closer unity of the international revolutionary movement.

The CC, CPC, proceeding from the essence of the entire Communist movement and from the need systematically to foster awareness of the international allegiance of the Czechoslovak Communists and the whole of our people to the revolutionary struggle of the international working class and progressive forces of the world, instructs all the Party bodies and organizations steadfastly to educate the working people in the spirit of proletarian internationalism and socialist patriotism, and to see to it that the Party membership is regularly and promptly informed on matters concerning the international situation and the Communist movement.

Our Party, which in its activity has always maintained the unity of national and international interests, will continue to do all in its power in order—together with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and other fraternal parties—to make the most effective contribution to new victories for communism and peace on earth.

NIAN DAN EDITORIAL*

The Standing Committee of the National Assembly of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam has received the declaration of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR, dated April 29, 1965, as an ardent response to the DRV National Assembly's appeal to the national assemblies of various countries of the world. The appeal calls their attention and the attention of the peoples of their countries to the grave situation created by the U.S. imperialists in Vietnam, and asks them to support the just objective of our people and to help end the acts of aggression and war provocation being committed by the United States against Vietnam.

The declaration of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR stresses: "On behalf of the whole Soviet people, the Supreme Soviet of the USSR declares that the Soviet people will always and in everything be on the side of the heroic Vietnamese people, who are waging a just struggle for the freedom and independence of their country."

The declaration expresses the Supreme Soviet's unqualified approval of the position of the National Assembly and the Government of the DRV regarding settlement of the Vietnamese problem. It notes that the U.S. imperialists' policy of aggression was the direct and only cause of the present tension in Vietnam and Southeast Asia generally. It insists that the United States respect the Geneva agreement of 1954 on Vietnam, withdraw all its troops and military personnel from South Vietnam, remove its arms and other war supplies, end its policy of intervention and aggression in South Vietnam, stop its acts of war against North Vietnam and all encroachment on DRV territory and leave it to the South Vietnamese people to settle their affairs in keeping with the program of the National Liberation Front, their only genuine and lawful spokesman. The people in both parts of Vietnam should be afforded the opportunity to decide for themselves the issue of peaceful reunification of their country without foreign interference.

The declaration of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR also expresses indignation of the whole Soviet people at the barbarous acts of the U.S. imperialists in Vietnam. It confirms that the Soviet Government is taking all the measures required for safeguarding the security and sovereignty of the DRV and that the USSR will—when necessary and in compliance with the request of the DRV Government—send volunteers to help the Vietnamese people in expelling the U.S. aggressor.

*May 6, 1965.

In waging their revolutionary struggle, the Vietnamese people have always had the great support of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. In the past, in the trying years of revolutionary activity, Vietnamese Communists were sincerely supported by the Communist Party and the people of the Soviet Union. The remarkable victory of the Soviet Union over the German fascists and the Japanese militarists in World War II created favorable conditions for the Vietnamese people that enabled them to achieve victory in the August Revolution and to found the Democratic Republic of Vietnam. During the war, while resisting the French colonialist aggressor, the Vietnamese people also had the active support of the Soviet Union, China and other fraternal countries. That support was an important factor which helped our people to defeat the French aggressor and to free the North.

During the past eleven years the Soviet Union, like China and other fraternal countries, has been actively helping the Vietnamese people to heal their war wounds, to rehabilitate and advance their economy and culture, to build the material and technical base for socialism in North Vietnam. The brilliant success achieved by our people in national development owes much to the great assistance rendered by the Soviet Union, China and other socialist countries.

The U.S. imperialists have thrown the Geneva agreements of 1954 overboard and invaded South Vietnam. They are planning to occupy the region, turn it into a colony of a new type and into a U.S. war base, and perpetuate the division of Vietnam. As it had been sustaining one bad reverse after another from the South Vietnamese people, the United States in the recent past tried to come out of the impasse by stepping up and expanding the war, intensifying aggression against South Vietnam and carrying out furious air raids on DRV territory. The people of Vietnam are resolved to push the U.S. aggressor back, defend the North and free the South with a view to reunifying the country on peaceful lines.

The Soviet Union, China and other socialist countries, the peace- and freedom-loving peoples of the whole world, are on our side. They actively support our just struggle.

Soviet Party and Government leaders have repeatedly made clear that the Soviet Union resolutely supports the struggle of the Vietnamese people against the U.S. imperialist aggressor and his puppets.

At the beginning of February our country was visited by a Soviet delegation led by A. Kosygin, Chairman of the Council of Ministers. It stated that the more than 200 million strong fraternal Soviet people are at one with our embattled people. In the joint declaration signed in Hanoi on February 10, 1965, the Vietnamese and Soviet delegations defined the position of the Soviet people as follows: unity with the Vietnamese people in the fight against U.S. imperialism, support for the struggle of the North Vietnamese people to build socialism and defend the North, support for our Southern compatriots' fight for liberation from the U.S. aggressor and his hangers-on.

The joint Vietnamese-Soviet declaration, signed in Moscow on April 17, 1965, by the Vietnamese Party and Government delegation led by Le Duan, and by the leaders of the Party and Government of the Soviet Union led by L. Brezhnev, is plain evidence of the unity of views of our two parties, which condemned the U.S. imperialists' acts of military aggression in Vietnam and refuted President Johnson's recent lying assertion about so-called peaceful settlement. This declaration by the two parties confirmed Soviet support for the Vietnamese people's struggle against the U.S. aggressor. It upheld the position of the National Assembly and the DRV Government, as well as the position of the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front, concerning settlement of the Vietnamese problem.

Lately the movement in support of the Vietnamese people, against U.S. imperialism, has been growing in scale among the various sections of the population in almost every part of the Soviet Union. Workers, collective farmers, officers and men of the Armed Forces, the socialist intelligentsia and the scientists of the Soviet Union have held a series of meetings condemning the U.S. aggressor, voicing their solidarity with the struggle of the Vietnamese people and demanding that the U.S. imperialists get out of Vietnam. Many Soviet citizens have volunteered to go to Vietnam and help our people to fight the U.S .imperialists. The Soviet people have by their noble conduct set a splendid example of socialist solidarity, proletarian internationalism and determination to resist imperialism, the class enemy of the entire socialist community.

The Declaration of the Supreme Soviet again points out that the Soviet people resolutely support the struggle of our people against the U.S. imperialist aggressor. Soviet assistance and support inspire the fighting men and the people of our whole country, who are stepping up their fight against the U.S. aggressor, striking him increasingly powerful blows in order to frustrate the U.S. policy of aggression against South Vietnam and to end the bombings of North Vietnam.

The Vietnamese people express their sincere gratitude to the Communist Party, the Supreme Soviet, the Government, and the fraternal people of the Soviet Union for their valuable help and support.

A lucid discussion of the nature of freedom, in the light of claims usually made for the "open society" of the West. The paradox arises from the inability of the "Free World" to fulfill the promise of its democratic institutions. The challenge consists in the need to change society if the full potential of democracy is to be realized. In the conditions of the United States and Canada the author believes, socialism will enrich both democracy and the individual.

THE GREAT VICTORY OF THE SOVIET PEOPLE

Report* by L. I. Brezhnev

Comrades! Friends!

Twenty years have passed since the last shots of the Great Patriotic War resounded over an earth ravaged by bombs and shells. At the hour when night turns to day the long-awaited news swept like lightning across our boundless country. "The war is over! Victory is ours! The enemy has capitulated!" Those who witnessed what took place that day in the streets of the towns and villages of our country will never forget the infinite joy, the pride in our glorious and heroic army, in our native land, in our great Soviet people!

The day of victory over Hitler Germany will always remain one of the most radiant and unforgettable days in the history of our socialist state, the history of our struggle for communism.

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet and the Council of Ministers of the USSR, congratulate the people of our country and our glorious Armed Forces on the occasion of the 20th anniversary of that historic victory.

Delegations from fraternal socialist countries and from Communist Parties have arrived to celebrate Victory Day. We tender our heartiest greetings to the delegations present in this hall:

—the delegation of the People's Republic of Bulgaria, headed by comrade B. Velchev;

—of the Chinese People's Republic, headed by Comrade Lin Fing;

—of the Republic of Cuba, headed by Comrade Manuel Lusardo Garcia;

—of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, headed by Comrade Z. Firlinger;

—of the German Democratic Republic, headed by Comrade W. Stoff;

—of the Hungarian People's Republic, headed by Comrade M. Aitai;

—of the Korean People's Democratic Republic, headed by Comrade So Cher;

*Pravda, May 9, 1965.

—of the Mongolian People's Republic, headed by Comrade Ts. Dugersuren;

—of the Polish People's Republic, headed by Comrade Stszelecki;

—of the Rumanian People's Republic, headed by Comrade E. Bodneras;

—of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, headed by Comrade Ngyem Suan Yem;

—of the Socialist Federative Republic of Yugoslavia, headed by Comrade L. Kolishevski;

—of the Algerian People's Democratic Republic — the government delegation headed by Comrade H. Bumedyen and the Party delegation of the National Liberation Front headed by Comrade Ben Mahjub!

With us here tonight is Comrade Georgy Traikov, President of the Presidium of the People's Assembly of the People's Republic of Bulgaria. We cordially greet this distinguished representative of the fraternal Bulgarian people!

We warmly greet delegations and individuals who have arrived from abroad, representatives of the international Communist and national-liberation movements, leaders of trade union, women's, youth and other public organizations.

We also tender our heartiest greetings to the military delegations from the fraternal socialist countries and the friendly countries of Asia and Africa who have arrived for the celebrations.

We are happy to tender our cordial greetings to the war veterans who have come to Moscow from the socialist countries and from France, Britain, the USA and many other countries to join in our victory celebrations.

Comrades, the fate of our country, the future of the whole world were decided in the war against bestial fascism. What would have been in store for our country, for the Soviet people and the other peoples of the world if we had not countered the evil forces of fascism? Tens and hundreds of millions of people would have been enslaved and annihilated, whole states would have perished and civilization would have been destroyed. The dark night of fascist obscurantism would have descended upon many countries and continents.

Those monstrous schemes, however, were not destined to be carried out. Forces were found in the world that were able to defeat fascism. The Soviet people, their glorious and heroic army, led by the Leninist Party of Communists, played the decisive role in defeating mankind's worst enemy. We greatly appreciate the contribution made by other nations in the war of liberation against Hitler Germany, the services rendered by our allies in the anti-Hitler coalition. But the fact remains that the brunt of the war was borne by the peoples of the Soviet Union.

The whole world was filled with admiration for the valour, courage and might of our gallant Red Army. Progressive people everywhere felt at once that in the great land of socialism the mighty forces of revolutionary people had risen to defend not only their own lives, honor and liberty, but also the liberty and independence of all people. Hope of liberation was kindled in the hearts of the millions who had been enslaved by fascism.
