Socialist Rivalry in Drive to Further Expose POLICE BREAK Rush Daily Worker South of Mooney's

New York Unit Challenges Other Workers' Groups

Socialist rivalry among the workers and peasants and their organizations in the Soviet Union, Socialist rivalry in industrial construction in the first workers' and peasants' republic, is one of the big forces in putting over the Five-Year Plan for Socialist construction. And Socialist rivalry between the workers of the Soviet Union and the workers of the other European countries is an idea that's spreading like wild-fire among the European workers.

The idea is for the Soviet workers to increase constructive work, and the workers in capitalist countries to intensify the fight against fascism, social-fascism and capitalism.

And now here's yet another form of revolutionary rivalry-in the "Drive to Rush the Daily South:"

The members of Unit 7F, Section 3, of the Communist Party, in

New York, get the credit for originating this dandy idea. They've pledged $2.50 a week to adopt the mill town of Greenville, S. C., and see to it that the mill workers of Greenville receive the Daily regularly. And Unit 7F, Section 3, challenges all of the units of Section 3 in making collections so that the Daily Worker can be rushed to the southern workers! Snap into it, all Communist Party units, and all workingclass Take up the challenge of Unit 7F, Section 3! Don't stand by doing nothing while your fellow workers in the South appeal to you to rush the Daily Worker to them!

Adopt a southern mill village, and see to it that the Daily gets to the workers there regularly! Below the coupons today we're printing the first part of the list of those who've responded to the appeals of the southern mill workers

Against the Right Danger in Mass Work.

In a certain millinery shop of New York City, where a few members of the Communist Party work among other workers, two scab window cleaners came up to wash the windows. Some of the workers met them with cries of "Scab!" and other deserving terms. Everybody felt that something must be done. No union man or woman can allow scabbery to go on unchallenged in his or her shop.

One of the Communists approached the union's shop chairman, who is also a member of the Communist Party, and proposed that he, the that the scab window cleaners must be sent away at once—and if the foreman should refuse, that the shor story way chairman, with the Shop Committee, call over the foreman and tell him

The chairman refused to do so, on the grounds that-"We can't do anything." The scabs remained, washing the windows

This happened between 12 and 12.30. When at 12.30, the same Communist suggested that the workers wait for the scabs downstairs and give them a farewell, and some of the workers showed a favorable response, the same chairman remarked: "Well, there is a policeman standing in the hall to protect them." Thus pouring more sold water on the revolutionary spirit of those workers who felt that something must be done for class solidarity, even though a "good boss" with a 'good foreman" might be offended.

The Communist nucleus which has direction of members of the Communist Party in this shop is certifying this incident and will take

International Revolutionary Rivalry: What It Is.

What is the meaning of this revolutionary rivalry between the emancipated proletariat of the Soviet State and the oppressed workers of capitalist countries? The proletariat of the Soviet Union is building up socialism, the workers of the capitalist countries are groaning under the terrible weight of imperialist capital: then what can be the subject of the rivalry? Lenin gave the answer in the following words:

"If socialism is to be won, if socialism is to be fought for and called into being, the proletariat must carry out a twofold task, or rather the two sides of one task. First of all, by the reckless heroism of its revolutionary struggle against capital, the proletariat must carry along with itself the whole mass of workers and exploited, must organize them and lead them to the overthrow of the bourgeoisie and completely suppress any attempt at resistance on the part of the

"The proletariat, secondly, must lead the workers and exploited, as well as the petty bourgeoisie, in the work of building up the new economic order, by creating new social relations, a new labor discipline, a new organization of labor which shall put into practical operation both the latest results of science and capitalist technique and the mass co-ordination of the workers, conscious of their goal, who are building up large scale socialist production."

The proletariat of the Soviet Union is carrying out the second task in the strength and great heroism of its daily work . . . The first of the twofold tasks of the international working class faces the proletariat of the capitalist countries . . . The subject of the rivalry is therefore quite clear and simple: who will accomplish better their side of the twofold task of the proletariat, the workers of the Soviet Union, or the workers of the capitalist countries?

By MYRA PAGE. This is the story of the six hundred and ninety delegates who made labor history at the Trade Union Unity League Congress, which met in Cleveland on August 31-September 2, 1929. It is their story, jotted down as they told of it, of their working class experiences which had forced them and their fellow workers into struggle against the bosses, and roused them to send their representatives here to organize a revolutionary trade union center in the United States. This mass story should be written down, as far as possible, so that American workers who could not attend will know how genuine an outgrowth of themselves their new union center is, and how it marks the beginning of a new era for American working class. As one high point labor's epic of struggle from slavery to freedom, Cleveland is a story without beginning or end. Its roots run far into the past, and its triumphant climax remains for us to write in the years which lie ahead.

I am giving the story as it came to me, in fragments from workers' lives and flashes on to labor scenes which, when brought together, form a massive, stirring whole.

The first session of the convention I sat between a miner's wife from Superior, Pennsylvania, and a young Negro auto worker, from Detroit. She was a dark little woman with a baby in her lap which alternately threw itself bodily to and fro, up and forward, gurgling at the ceiling, and then, tiring of this game, whimpered and fumbled for its mothers breast or pulled her hair. The woman bounced and whispered to it, and gave it the breast, meanwhile attempting to take notes and hear all that was being said. Those fifty miners' wives who had sent her here as their representative from their woman's auxiliary of the National Miners' Union would want to know everything that had happened. She and her husband and baby had traveled all night in a truck with fifteen other miners and their wives and small children.

BIG FAMILIES, NO WORK.

Conditions back there were something awful, she said. Men with big families to support and no work for months. Others with two or three days a week, and that not regular. Her man had been luckier than some. But most, their kids were wanting for shoes and coats and crying for bread. The U. M. W. had gone to pieces, since Lewis sold out the strike, and men were nigh desperate when the new National Miners' Union and Workers International Relief came. Now they were pulling themselves together, and with everybody jes' sticking, and other workers backing them up, the miners and their wives would fight these

Jim, the well-built young Negro on my right, told of the ferocious speed-up on the belt in Ford, Packard and other plants where he had worked, and the rising tide of revolt among the tens of thousands of auto workers in Detroit, leading to spontaneous walkouts and the formation of a vigorous Auto Workers' Union there. Yes, there were many hundreds of colored men in the industry, and they and the white were fighting along side by side. High time they got together, too.

Everybody was on their feet, as Foster mounted the platform and declared the convention open. Cheers and lusty singing of the International. We looked around. The hall was filled, both floor and galleries. There were many familiar faces. Sam, formerly a wobbly organizer at seventeen years of age, now following his machinist trade in a midwestern city and carrying on revolutionary work among his shop mates. A conference of 150 unorganized workers had sent him to this convention as their representative. When, six weeks before, Sam had gone to this town to work, he found the hundreds of metal workers there totally unorganized, without a union, shop committees or revolutionary organization of any kind. Now, shop committees had been established in a half dozen plants, a shop paper was appearing each month and getting wide circulation; an active local of the Communist Party, with seventeen working class members was directing the work, and big mass meetings of workers had proven so successful that the American Legion and city government had undertaken to drive Sam out of town. But he was still there, grinning. Fired from one shop, he found work in another. Ask Sam if the workers were ready for action, just given the lead!!

Louise, an auto worker from Detroit. A little firebrand, carrying on effective work, especially among women. Bill, looming above the crowd-railroad switchman, and president of his local union, which under his leadership was building its membership and successfully defying the reactionary dictates of the International and A. F. of L. officials. Henry, employed in the Great Northern shops, where unions had been smashed after the 1922 strike, working to reorganize the men on a firmer, more militant basis. Angelo and Mary, needle pushers from Philadelphia, whom I had not seen in seven years. And many others. These were the type of workers who had been chosen by their shop mates to represent them at this convention. Close to the rank and file, coming right from the job and class struggle.

Never had I seen so many young faces at a labor convention, or so many women and Negroes. And so many cotton dresses and work shirts! It was going to be different, all right, from an A. F. of L. or Amalgamated Convention, where middle aged men, in new suits and stiff collars-fat-bellied officials and skilled workmen from labor's aristocratic upper-tenth-pretended to legislate for American labor. Here at Cleveland was American labor, straight from shop, mine and field. No longer were the officials to be allowed to speak for labor, it would speak for itself. What would it say, what action would it take?

A silence fell over us, as Foster began the keynote speech of the congress in his quiet, analytical way. We stretched forward, straining o hear every word. There he stood, a former railroad worker, leader of the great steel strike, and our trusted organizer. At his back was a silly painting of a middle class estate, while overhead hung the red banner. The stage scenery had a grotesque familiarity. What labor convention in the United States ever lacked this misplaced element! Nevertheless, this time we would make a symbol of it-labor stepping forth from capitalist society and pronouncing its doom.

In simple, forceful language Foster told how things stood, in this "land of the free," for the toilers. Here we were, pitted class against class. The rich getting richer and the poor poorer. Speeding up beyond physical endurance, in order for capitalists to get more profits out of us. Then the broken ones cast to the dump heap. Rationalization throwing four millions out of work. Imperialist war threatening. And everywhere in the capitalist world workers suffering like this and fighting against the bosses' greed. Only in Sovet Russia, where workers had taken power, were things different. In America, the masses of labor, betrayed by the A. F. of L. and the "progressives" were rising in revolt. A strike wave was under way, Gastonia, Elizabethton, Marion, New Bedford. The miners' battles in Pennsylvania, Illinois, West Virginia. Auto mechanics striking work in Michigan and California. Shoe workers strikes in Boston and Lowell and those of food workers and needle trades in New York City. Everywhere, walkouts for workers'

We were here to organize and lead these revolts to build a powerful revolutionary union center, to fight against capitalist speed-up and race discrimination, to organize the unorganized, fight American imperialism and its war danger, and defend the Soviet Union against its capitalist enemies. We were here to man and direct the struggle of American labor against capitalism and for a workers' society.

Once again we were brought to our feet as representatives from the Gastonia strikers filed onto the platform. A slip of a girl, a gaunt, middle aged woman and a young boy.

Daisy MacDonald stepped forward to speak. "I'm mighty glad to come to this convention, as representative of the Gastonia locals of the National Textile Workers' Union, to tell you how much your backin' us up is helpin' us strikers there in the South. How much we appreciate it. And if ever you need it, we'll do the same by you. All of us working people must stand together. And we want you to know that whatever the bosses do, we're goin' to stay by the union and stick until we win our demands.

"Now I want to tell you somethin' of why we went on strike an' what we're fightin' for. . . . Mothers with small children have to go into th' mills to work for twelve hours, all night. My husband and I had to leave our little ones at home, alone. . . . No chance or place to sit down, all night long. Men gettin' ten and eleven dollars a week. We couldn't give our kids th' ejication we want 'em to have. They have to stay ignorant. We jes' barely did live. No coal, jes' wood. And it was worse for th' colored folks. Colored women sweepers getting seven dollars a week, where I worked. And they've got the same problems as we white workers have. They got to live and raise their kids. So we should stick together, and help one another out.

"When the union come, we know it was for our good, 'n we signed

"The bosses tried every way possible to break up our union. But they couldnt do it. Police. Arrests. Turning us out of homes into the streets. Spies. Promises. Threats. Nothing broke our spirit. We only fought harder. Then they decided to git our leaders." (The story of the June days followed.) "So now we got to fight harder than ever, to free our leaders'n build our union. And with your 'n the laboring people's help everywhere, we'll win."

Later, in private talk, she said, in a quiet, matter-of-fact voice, "If the jury decides against us, 'n they try to send our leaders to th' electric chair or give 'em long sentences, afore we'l let 'em do it, there's goin' to be a war down thar."

When questioned, she told us she and her family were living in the union tent colony. She and her husband were blacklisted, and until the union won recognition they couldnt get work in any mill in the Carolinas. "But this is better than it was afore. We had nothing to lose, anyhow. We barely could live. Now we've got something to work and fight for in life."

The Continuous Working Year and the Five-Day Week

By SCHLANER.

Detailed consideration was given, as soon as it became known, by the foreign press, to the plan for reorganizing Soviet industry on the basis of the uninterrupted working year. Although it is only about three months since the project was published in the Soviet papers, the idea of the unbroken working year has undergone an enormous evolution. The advantages and the significance behind this idea have been grasped with an astounding rapidity by the broad strata of the Soviet

Even in the most outlying districts of the Soviet Union a mass movement in favor of the continuous working year has taken shape so spontaneously that it has proved difficult indeed for the legislative organs to secure the necessary planfulness in effecting the transfer to the new working methods. The idea of the continuous working year has even penetrated into the farming industry, and reports to hand indicate that both the new, big-scale farms run by the State and even some collective farms, combining the holdings of small peasants, are introducing the new working methods as well.

The same applies to the offices of administration in the towns and provinces, to the machinery of distribution managed by the State and the cooperatives, to the schools, the universities, "cut-treatment" centres and the like as apart from hospitals, theatres, cinemas and all organizations catering for the cultural, recreational and sport requirements of the workers.

A VERITABLE REVOLUTION.

This reform is of immense importance, not only in the economic, but also in the cultural respect. Indeed, one can hardly speak of a reform, but rather as a veritable revolution in the cultural development of the working class. That revolution will come as the result of the fact that simultaneously with the continuous working year the five-day week will be introduced, that is, that after four days of work the worker will have his regular day of rest on the fifth and last day

This reduction of the working week with its equal distribution of the workers enjoying their off-days on every day of the week opens up wide vistas with regard to the matter of raising the cultural level and bettering the skill of the working masses. As we shall later show. in this way it will even be found possible not only to provide all the workers with a sound training in their trade, but also to provide a middle and to a certain extent also a higher technical education.

In view of the extraordinary economic and technical importance of this question, we give below a systematic outline of the logical effects and accruing benefits of the continuous working year in order to show in what manner this innovation will entirely alter the economic and cultural life of the Soviet Union.

IMMEDIATE ECONOMIC ADVANTAGES.

Up to now all workers had their rest day on the one and the same day. This meant that, with 52 Sundays and 13 different holidays all plants stoed idle for a total period of 62 days per annum. In addition the workers knocked off two hours earlier on Saturdays and on the eve of all holidays, so that this in itself meant the loss of 14 full working days every year. Besides there regular factory stoppages, industrial plants also lost in some cases 24, in other cases 12, working days during the summer, this depending on whether the workers employed were allowed a fortnight's or month's annual leave.

As a result, industrial enterprises worked only 263 or 274 full (eight or seven hour) working days. An exception was furnished by plants where the technological aspect of the working process could not permit at all of any such periodical stoppage of plants, e. g., in the case of chemical plants and metallurgical works which, however, only for 15 to 16 per cent of the total number of workers employed in the whole of industry.

Thus, the transfer to the continuous working year will signify in the first place an increase in the potential output capacity of industrial plants by anything from 25 to 38 per cent; while instead of working 263 or 274 days in the year, plants will work 360 days, stopping only on the five revolutionary holidays occurring during the year.

Taking the basic capital of the industries run by the state at about ten milliard roubles, it follows that the full exploitation of this newly discovered reserve, as we might call it, will have the same effect as the fresh capital investment of two to three milliard roubles. It must be added, though, that it will not be possible, in the first year, completely to utilize this increased productive capacity.

In many industries, e.g., in the textile, leather and some other industries, a difficulty will be met with in this regard, owing to the limited possibilities of supplying the necessary additional raw material that will be required. In working out the programs governing industrial production (control figures), for the fiscal year 1929-30, the increase in production, as calculated in conjunction with the introduction of the continuous working year, was placed at something like six hundred million roubles, which is equal to about five per cent of the total volume of production. In actual practice, it is most probable that this figure will be outstripped really.

PRODUCTION RISES—COSTS DECREASE.

And we find, for instance, that the Leningrad District Economic Council calculates that the complete transfer of all industries in the Leningrad district could effect an increase in production amounting in value to 400,000,000 roubles. The fact must also be taken into consideration that other advantages of an important economic value will also accrue in addition to the perfectly mechanical increase in the length of time during which machinery and plant will be run for exploitation. Such advantages include increased labor productivity, industrial rationalization, and a reduction in production costs.

The total result will produce an all-round economic effect far beyond that merely due to lengthening the working period of plant and equipment. This applies primarily to the cutting of production costs. Costs will not only be reduced on the basis of government estimated costs-which remain practically unchanged-but also on account of many technically necessary, though unproductive costs which plants have to meet in order to maintain their equipment in working order during stoppages of industry. Thus, for instance, glass works alone use fuel to the value of more than one million roubles per annum on Sundays which is totally unproductive.

The law has laid it down that, in carrying through the reform, the yearly working hours of the workers are on no account to be increased. This is leading, on the one hand, to a big reduction in the

From the dark wet garden two more dogs came running.

"They'll bite!" said Mishka.

The boy answered somberly: "If it had been one, I'd have fixed him all right with a good stick."

"What's your name?"

"Trofim." "Let's get back."

"Wait a minute, there's going to be a fight."

"What for?"

Trofim made no reply.

He stood there dressed only in a shirt ripped across the breast, bareheaded and barefoot. Across his shoulders, in place of a jacket, he wore a tattered piece of canvas sacking, tied together beneath his chin by a piece of string; so that little, taciturn Trofim looked like a tiny comical priest, in brief vestments.

The dogs sniffed around in silence.

Then they began to growl, showed their teeth, and fell upon the one that held the bread between his teeth, whirled around in a flying mass, drew apart again, and once more sprang at each other.*

For a long time Trofim regarded them with somber, unblinking eyes. then he said in a grim, sepulchral voice : .

"It would be good to have teeth like a dog." Mishka shrank ni fear. He looked at Trofim searchingly. Who was this boy, anyway, in his short priest's vestments?

He would fly at Mishka's throat like a dog, bear him to the ground, an dtake away his jacket and his cap. Nowadays rich people were being killed all over, and Mishka was riched than Trofim.

In his terror Trofim seemed still bigger, as he stood there in the moonlight, in the dead, deserted field, that was packed with ravanous dogs, tearing at one another's throats. In reality there were no more than five dogs there, but to Mishka there seemed to be thousands, snarlin gand baring their teeth; and when they had torn each other to pieces, they would go over to the station and begin tearing the people to pieces.

Suddenly Trofim said:

"Are you afraid of dogs?"

"Are you?" "I'm not afraid of anything."

"How old are you?"

Mishka glanced at Trofim out of the corner of his eye, and tried to sound as if he too feared nothing: "Then we're the sam eage: I'm fourteen too."

Mishka raised himself on his toes a little, in order to seem taller. "I'm soon going to be fifteen 'I'm small for my age, but I'm old anyway, and I can lift two poods."

"How?" "Anyway you like: weights or in a sack."

They went back to the station friends.

Mishka learned that Trofim came from Kazan district, that he had been in four cities, had left home six months earlier, and was making his way toward Tashkent. If he succeeded in getting there, he would not return to his home. Things were very bad there in Kazan district, not a thing to eat; Trofim's father had died long before, only thrtyeight he had been. Twice he had been in the war and had not been killed, and then he had died in the famine.

"Now things are bad for all the mujiks. We have to be giving, but no one ever gives us anything . . ."

"Got to get into the Party!" sighed Trofim.

"Into which?" "The Bolsheviks."

"Would they really take you in?"

"Some they take in, some not."

"They dont talk so well about the Bolsheviks," said Mishka. "There are all kinds of Bolsheviks," said Trofim, sighing again. At the station a single lantern flickered.

It was late. Mishka's head was heavy with gloomy thoughts.

In the car, under the cars, behind the cars, people lay, without stirring, without speaking, as if they lay in wait for something, their teeth set, their hungry mouths sealed.

In the dark dread stillness, pierced by the single lantern, a woman and a child wept bitterly, monotonously. The one voice was dull and muffled-drawn from inner depths of pain, the other a despairing wail. It cut through the air like a whilplash, it rasped, scarcely audible, like the rasping of a violin.

The voices intertwined with one another, weaving, straining,

rattling hoarsely, they caught up with one another, like two streams.

These two streams carried on their current the bitter agony that had been cast up by fate on the vast Kirghiz steppe. On the little station there was no escape, neither forward nor backward. Trofim said to Mishka, pointing to the woman;

"She came here from far away and she cant go on any more." 'Why, do you know her?"

"I know all of them, I've been here four days, hanging around the station. She came here with her husband, but her husband died. See, over there, that's where they buried him . . ."

numbers of the unemployed, and on the other hand, is also making for the more far-reaching "ationalization of production.

Since under Soviet industrial conditions, rationalization methods can usually only be introduced providing the labor power thus set free is at once provided with other opportunities of work, rationalization measures can never be so quickly and ruthlessly carried out as in the case in other countries. But as, in consequence of the transfer to the continuous working year, a huge potential dearth of labor power will suddenly be felt, most favorable conditions are thus created to speed up the work of carrying out fundamental plans for rationalization.

MEETING DIFFICULTIES SUCCESSFULLY.

In those branches of industry where, owing to limited supplies of raw materials or owing to the fact that it will be impossible to inincrease production for fear of glutting the market, there will be an effective concentration of factories. In Moscow, for instance, the work of three large cigarette factories will be concentrated in two factories, the workers of the closed down factory being absorbed by the two factories in question, which will be run continuously the whole year through. This will effect a saving in costs of about 700,000 roubles, 470,000 a year; besides releasing factory buildings which can be at once used for some other industrial purpose.

Similar chances for far-reaching concentration are also offered in the case of the leather, soap and fat industries, and more particularly in the textile trades. Single factories are also transferring te the continuous working week which are not able to increase production over their industrial programs. As in their case 20 to 25 per cent of the machinery can thus be stopped-and one-fifth of all the workers employed will be resting each day-it will be possible to concentrate the work on the best machines.

In quite a number of different branches of the light industries the construction of new fac ories already planned will be given up, as the resulting increase in production will be effected by simply transferring to the unbroken working year. The economics thus effected will be applied to the finencing of the heavy industries. The light industries will be mainly extended over the original Five-Year Plan by making use of the factor; buildings released as the result of industrial concentration. Owing to this speeding up of the process of industrialization, in the next the to four years something like one and a half million worke will be absorbed into industry over the number previously planned.
