N. S. Khrushchov's Replies to Questions Put by The Ghanaian Times, Alger Républicain, Le Peuple and Botataung

The Editors of the newspapers Ghanaian Times (Ghana), Alger Républicain and Le Peuple (Algeria), and Botataung (Burma) requested N. S. Khrushchov to answer a number of questions concerning the national-liberation movement in the present period. Below are the questions and N. S. Khrushchov's answers.

1. QUESTION. How do you appraise the results of the national-liberation movement of the peoples against imperialism?

ANSWER. The oppressed peoples have performed a great exploit, they have smashed the colonial system of imperialism. This is the main result of the national-liberation movement. Empires that took the colonialists centuries to build up have been destroyed in less than two decades. Until quite recently it seemed to some people that these empires were unassailable bastions. One remembers Churchill's arrogant words during the Second World War when he said he had not become the King's First Minister to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire. Today there is nothing left of that empire but, as the saying goes, odds and ends.

The abolition of the colonial regimes is now entering its final phase. Over fifty countries have achieved political independence and national statehood. This is a truly historic achievement of the masses who have fought courageously and selflessly.

It would be a gross mistake to underestimate the significance of this victory, to deny that the system of colonial slavery has collapsed and to assert that the winning of political independence is a mere formality. Such assertions would be an insult to the fighters for liberty and would be tantamount to saying that the peoples fighting against colonialism have, in fact, achieved nothing.

The winning of political independence by the peoples is a great revolutionary act of world significance. Imperialism has been deprived of direct rule over extensive areas of our planet and over hundreds and hundreds of millions of people. A huge obstacle barring the path of the enslaved peoples to liberty and social progress has been removed. A period of heroic battles fought by those peoples is coming to an end and a new stage in their struggle for emancipation is opening. These peoples formerly fought to destroy the colonial regime and expell the colonial troops and governors; today they are pulling up the roots of colonialism, the economic and political positions of the foreign monopolies, they are struggling for independent, democratic development and social progress.

The achievement of state independence, of course, does not mean complete liberation. The imperialists are attempting, wherever they can, to turn the sovereignty of the young national states into a fiction. But today the peoples are capable of thwarting the plans of the imperialists, of completely casting off the chains of imperialist oppression and exploitation and of using the political independence they have won as a powerful lever in the struggle for economic liberation, for deliverance from many other chains and fetters of imperialism.

To ensure the full independence of the young national states it is essential that their anti-imperialist struggle should not weaken but should develop, that their solidarity with the world revolutionary forces should be strengthened. The events in the Congo, Algeria and other countries have shown that the peoples of the former colonies are by no means guaranteed against the intrigues of imperialism.

Many of the countries that have won political independence are pursuing an independent, anti-imperialist policy. Can one close one's eyes to the fact that in many of the newly-free countries a national regeneration is taking place, the basis of a national economy is being built and culture is developing? How can one fail to see that in the course of the struggle for independence, the masses have been through tremendous political schooling, that their national, anti-imperialist counsciousness has become stronger and that they are more determined to follow the path of democracy and social progress?

One should see how conditions have changed in the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America under the present world alignment of forces. It is possible for any country, relying on the support of the socialist countries, on the world working-class movement and on all freedom-loving peoples, to stand up successfully to the onslaught of the imperialists, strengthen its independence, and determine its own fate in its own way.

2. QUESTION. What, in your opinion, were the circumstances that determined the collapse of colonialism?

ANSWER. In the first place I should like to emphasize again that the collapse of the colonial system is the result of the heroic struggle of the oppressed peoples themselves. The imperialists are spreading the myth that they, of their own free will, granted the enslaved countries independence out of sheer philanthropy. That is a deception. The colonialists did not quit a single country of their own free will.

Political independence has been won by struggle, and by struggle alone.

The forces of world socialism exerted a decisive influence on the struggle of the peoples of the colonial and dependent countries for their independence. The Great October Socialist Revolution undermined the world supremacy of imperialism, and the real possibility of driving out the colonialists opened up before the peoples. The victory of the Soviet Union in the Great Patriotic War against the Hitler coalition, the rout of the striking force of world imperialist reaction, and the general upsurge of the world revolutionary liberation movement that began as a result of that victory created favourable conditions for revolution in China and a number of other Asian countries, and for the successful struggle of the peoples for the abolition of the colonial regime.

The formation of the world system of socialist states brought about a radical change in the balance of strength in the world that was to the disadvantage of imperialism. This, to a very great extent, accelerated the development of the national-liberation movement. The flames of the national-liberation revolution swept over Southeast Asia, the Middle East, Africa and Latin America. The Soviet Union and other socialist countries gave real support to the fighting peoples and the young national states. This is the lesson taught by the Suez crisis, the failure of a number of imperialist intrigues in the Middle East and the experience of heroic Cuba. The struggle of the oppressed peoples had the active support of the proletariat of the developed capitalist countries. The great revolutionary forces of the day merged into a single stream—victorious socialism, the national-liberation movement and the revolutionary struggle of the proletarians of the capitalist countries. This ensured the success of the peoples in their storm of the bastions of colonialism.

3. QUESTION. How do you appraise the struggle for the abolition of the last colonial regimes?

ANSWER. I think the victory of the oppressed peoples is not far off, it is near at hand. Freedom fighters are smashing the last colonial regimes. In 1960 there were still more than 100 million people bearing the yoke of colonialism, but today, as a result of the valiant struggle of the peoples, more than half of them have liberated themselves. The conscience of mankind cannot, however, remain untroubled as long as the peoples of Angola, "Portuguese" Guinea, Mozambique, Southern Rhodesia, South Africa and other countries are being subjected to humiliation and terror by foreign enslavers and racists. All who hold freedom dear cannot reconcile themselves to the continued occupation of South Korea and Taiwan by the U.S. imperialists, or their war against the patriots of South Viet-Nam.

The speedy abolition of the colonial system has become the cause of all the world's progressive forces. All peoples must be free, there should be no place for colonialism on earth. We believe the situation to be absolutely impermissible in which the Portuguese colonialists, the South African racists and the British and American imperialists, with the support of their Nato alies, still hold about 50 million people in the fetters of slavery.

You will remember that the United Nations Organization adopted, on the proposal of the Soviet Union, a Declaration on the independence of colonial peoples and countries. The colonialists and racists were denounced before all mankind. It must not be forgotten that the Declaration gives, as it were, moral support to the peoples still remaining in colonial bondage. These peoples can achieve liberation only by a stubborn struggle, by their own hands. The socialist states and the countries that have already achieved liberation deem it their duty to assist that struggle in every way, morally and materially.

Every nation that has fought against the colonialists has had the firm support of the Soviet Union and other socialist states. Today we again declare for all to hear that the peoples struggling for their liberation can definitely count on the same support in future. The time of colonial regimes has passed and there is no power that can save them.

4. QUESTION. What, in your opinion, is the main content of the national-liberation struggle under present-day conditions?

ANSWER. Each people determines the content and forms of struggle according to conditions obtaining. The conditions in the various countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America are not identical. I have just spoken about peoples who are fighting for their liberation, for their state independence. Obviously this is the main content of their national-liberation struggle at the present time. In another group of countries, state independence is a screen for the rule of extreme reactionary, tyrannic, puppet regimes that rely on the support of the imperialists. It must be said that here the rule of the colonialists is being retained, although in a somewhat veiled form. The peoples of such countries regard the overthrow of these hated regimes as their most urgent task.

Most of the peoples, however, have already won political independence and naturally other tasks confront them today. Their struggle against colonialism, against imperialism, has acquired other forms and a different direction. Lenin taught us that national liberation cannot be complete unless economic independence is achieved. The struggle for economic independence and social progress has now indeed become the central problem for the vast majority of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

The peoples of the newly-free countries are seeking a way out of poverty and hunger, they want to live lives worthy of human beings. Is it normal that between ten and twenty times less manufactured goods are produced per capita in these countries than in the economically developed countries, that 25 to 30 times less steel and 50 to 100 times less electric power are produced? In this age of the flourishing of science and technology no people anywhere on earth should live under medieval conditions; it is time to put an end to the division of countries into developed and underdeveloped. All peoples have made their contribution to the development of world civilization, all peoples deserve to enjoy all the benefits of modern culture, science and technology.

And so, deliverance from backwardness and poverty, the creation of an independent economy that is capable of ensuring progress, the strengthening of political independence, the development of democracy—such, in my opinion, are the chief problems confronting the young national states. But to do all this, it is first necessary to put an end to the economic supremacy of the imperialists. The foreign monopolies that exploit the wealth of the less developed countries constitute the chief obstacle on the peoples' path to progress. Unless economic independence is achieved, unless the people are delivered from imperialist plunder, it will be impossible to raise their living standards and ensure their well-being.

What is meant by winning economic independence? It means liberation from the domination of foreign capital, the abolition of the colonial structure of the economy, the creation of an independent, sound and viable, ramified economy that is not based exclusively on the export of raw materials. The successful fulfilment of the task will to a considerable extent depend on the speed with which feudal and semi-feudal survivals are abolished and the peasantry, the majority of the population, are freed from usurer and landlord bondage, and from plunder by foreign monopolies.

The experience gained by the liberated coutries has already shown that a state sector if, of course, it is created for the purpose of fighting against imperialist monopolies, is of great importance in effecting the liberation from foreign bondage and developing a national economy. A state sector of this kind facilitates the concentration of funds in the national interests, prevents their fragmentation and accelerates economic development.

The nationalization of the property of foreign monopolies, the development of industry, the creation and consolidation of the state sector, agrarian reform in the interests of the peasantry—these are the measures prompted by reality. The masses are interested in the fulfilment of this general democratic programme, and the national bourgeoisie, provided it is not tied up with foreign monopolies, may participate in its fulfilment. However, the fulfilment of the programme—it is important to stress this—is impossible without internal social reforms and without the anti-imperialist, revolutionary forces being in power.

The winning of economic independence is a complex process. It demands revolutionary enthusiasm and competent administration of the country and the economy.

We are glad to see that the peoples whom the colonialists disdained and considered incapable of ruling the state, are producing from their midst many talented administrators and economic executives. We know very well from our own experience that if the people are free their strength and energy are inexhaustible. The people are capable of overcoming all obstacles.

The imperialists and their yesmen will not be able to suppress the efforts of the people to achieve economic emancipation. It is as inevitable as the political emancipation of the peoples.

Every nation makes its own specific contribution to the solution of the problem of national regeneration. But no matter how the concrete forms and methods of this process may differ, it is clear that the nations can achieve their aim only by struggle against imperialism and internal reaction, only by democratic development and social progress.

5. QUESTION. What line of further development do you think the peoples will choose?

ANSWER. The choice of a path of development is a matter for the peoples themselves. Personally, I am deeply convinced that the peoples, some sooner, others later, will decide in favour of socialism. The masses have every ground to expect the liberation struggle to bring them a better life. The peasants want to work freely on their land, freed from feudals and foreign planters. The workers, who want higher wages and radical changes in their living conditions, are in the front ranks of those fighting for a non-capitalist path of development and for social progress for their countries. The intellectuals want to pass their knowledge on to the people, develop the national culture and be relieved of the need to hawk their talents. All the working people want to enjoy political rights without hindrance, they want to participate actively in shaping state policy, and fight for a free and happy life.

National regeneration will be real when its fruits are made available to the whole people. The peoples, however, know from their own experience that capitalism brings them new privations, new sufferings and denigration. They did not rise against the colonialists, and thousands of patriots did not give their lives so that local exploiters, instead of foreigners, could sit on the backs of the working people.

Experience gained in carrying out the general democratic programme shows more and more clearly that capitalism cannot lead the people in the struggle for national regeneration and social progress, cannot serve the peoples as an ideal. It is true that advocates of the "Western way of life" try to deceive them by painting capitalism in bright colours. But which of the peoples of the liberated countries has not experienced such "blessings" of capitalism as colonial slavery, monstrous exploitation and poverty. At the same time they have before them the example of the peoples of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. This example increases the magnetic power of the ideas of socialism a hundredfold. That is apparently the reason why even those statesmen of the young national states who champion "Western" development and are actually implanting capitalism, do not risk putting forward a capitalist programme openly. They adjust themselves to the temper of the masses and also talk about socialism although they fear social reforms like fire.

As far as revolutionary-democratic statesmen are concerned, they sincerely advocate non-capitalist methods for the solution of national problems, and declare their determination to build socialism. We welcome their declarations. We are glad that the people have produced leaders who have been through the stern school of struggle against colonialism and who have the interests of the masses at heart, who know their needs and understand that socialism brings genuine national regeneration. We fully support the measures they have taken, which are in accordance with the aspirations of the people and are directed against the foreign monopolies and against feudal and capitalist institutions.

The revolutionary-democratic leaders of a number of liberated countries are seeking methods and forms for the transition to a non-capitalist path of development. In the opinion of Marxists-Leninists a suitable form for this transition would be the state of national democracy. It would rely on a united anti-imperialist front of all social forces prepared to fight for independent democratic development. It would open up broad possibilities for drawing the masses into political life, into rebuilding the nation on democratic lines. It stands to reason that this does not preclude other forms of development along the path of national liberation and social progress.

Life itself will introduce much that is new, both in the forms of transition to socialism and in the rate of social change. At any rate, there can be no doubt that life demands progress, and all progress leads towards socialism. Socialism, however, cannot be introduced by decrees, the stage of democratic development cannot be skipped and measures cannot be effected for which the necessary social and economic conditions have not been created and which do not have the support of the masses. The consummation of the anti-imperialist, anti-feudal, democratic revolution will provide the best possible conditions for the transition to socialism. In many countries the main thing today is to develop this revolution, to draw broad masses of the people into creative revolutionary activity, in the course of which they will go directly forward to the new goal, to socialist reforms. In this way, while the general democratic tasks are still being carried out, tasks that in themselves are not socialist in character, the prerequisites for the transition to socialism are created.

There is another thing that is not open to doubt. Socialism cannot be built on positions of anti-communism, by opposing the countries in which socialism is victorious, by persecuting Communists, valiant fighters for the national liberation of their countries from the imperialist yoke, ardent patriots and fighters for the new social system, for social progress.

6. QUESTION. Where, in your opinion, lies the danger of the new form and methods of the colonial policy of imperialism?

ANSWER. The abolition of the colonial regimes does not mean the abolition of colonialism. In the majority of the liberated countries the imperialist monopolies retain dominant positions in the economy and by the brutal exploitation of the working people extract gigantic profits—according to economists, something like 5,000 million dollars a year. The imperialist powers are also continuing to fleece the economically backward countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America by means of non-equivalent exchange. By selling them manufactured goods at inflated prices and buying up mineral and agricultural raw materials cheaply, the monopolies "earn" tremendous sums—a further 14,000 million-16,000 million dollars a year. The imperialists have also retained considerable political influence in many of their former possessions. They do not and cannot reconcile themselves to the prospect of the complete abolition of colonialism. The wise Arab proverb may well be applied to them "Don't expect peace from an old enemy."

The time of the MacMahons and Kitcheners, the leaders of colonial pacification and punitive expeditions, has gone for ever. The imperialists now use, in the main, other ways and means which, taken together, form the concept "neo-colonialism". First and foremost the aim is to retain and even strengthen their control over the economic development of the liberated countries. They want these countries to develop on capitalist lines which would actually close the way to national rebirth. They are trying to tie them securely to the world capitalist economy and thus keep them in the position of exploited nations, in the position of agrarian and raw material appendages of the industrial powers. Imperialist monopolies are increasing their penetration of those countries, entangling local capital in a mesh of partnership—needless to say unequal—and subordinating it to their needs. They do everything possible to prevent the creation of a state sector that could be an effective instrument of independent democratic development.

The imperialists are making persistent efforts to get their puppets in power, to embroil the liberated countries in aggressive blocs, such as Seato and Cento, and in reactionary regional alliances such as the OAS, and to maintain military bases on their territory. They spare no efforts to break the solidarity of the anti-imperialist forces and split the united front of the patriots. They provoke squabbles between liberated countries, strife between tribes and nations, rivalry between political leaders, etc.

The neo-colonialists conceal their campaign against the freedom of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America behind the black flag of anti-communism, behind alleged protection from the influence of the Soviet Union. They wave that flag and try to isolate the most militant forces of the national-liberation movment, split the ranks of the patriots and draw the attention of the people away from the real enemy. By an appeal for "class solidarity" the imperialists attempt to recruit allies for themselves, to unite under their leadership all the propertied classes and groups in the newly-free countries.

U.S. imperialism is today the main bulwark of modern colonialism. It is effecting colonial expansion in Latin America, Asia and Africa, and is ousting the former colonial masters. In the U.S.A. itself racists carry out the disgraceful practices of racial discrimination and deal savagely with the Negro masses who have risen in a just struggle for freedom and elementary human rights.

Colonial expansion by the imperialists of other countries, especially the West-German and Japanese monopolies, also constitutes a serious threat to the liberated countries. The same trusts that fed the brown plague of Hitlerism are now trying to get their hands on the wealth of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

The danger of the new forms and methods of colonialism is mainly in their veiled character. Formerly it was easier to recognize the enemy. He acted openly in the person of the insolent colonial civil servant, the overseer with a whip or the foreign soldier with a bayonet. Today he wears the garb of an expert on questions of "aid," a respectable businessman, an economic or military adviser, a young fellow from the "Peace Corps," or an emissary from the International Monetary Fund. That, of course, complicates the struggle against neo-colonialism.

The imperialists are sadly mistaken, however, if they think they can manage to fool the peoples. The anti-imperialist struggle has led to a tremendous growth in the political consciousness of the masses, has increased their alertness to the intrigues of the colonialists, has strengthened their determination to follow the path of national independence and social progress.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union and other Marxist-Leninist parties are persistently exposing the policy of the imperialists, are helping the peoples recognize the methods of neo-colonialism, and are taking vigorous action against imperialist intervention in the affairs of any people that has risen in struggle for its emancipation and against the imperialist export of counter-revolution.

7. QUESTION. Is there not a contradiction between the policy of peaceful co-existence and the national-liberation struggle?

ANSWER. I think that life itself, the experience of the national-liberation movement, has already provided a convincing answer to this question. It is a fact that the peoples have achieved the greatest successes in the struggle for political independence in the postwar period, a period that has, in the whole, been marked by the peaceful co-existence of countries with different social systems. It was then that the world colonial system collapsed, and imperialism, held back by the might of the community of socialist states, proved unable to hurl its main military forces against the peoples who had risen in the struggle for their liberation. In this connection I could quote Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, that outstanding fighter against colonialism, who said that if it had not been for the Soviet Union the movement for emancipation from the colonial yoke in Africa would have experienced the full force of cruel and brutal suppression.

Over 50 national states have appeared on the political map of the world under conditions of peaceful co-existence. The flames of a victorious national-liberation struggle leaped to the Western Hemisphere and the glorious Cuban revolution triumphed.

There is nothing unexpected in this from the Marxist point of view, it is fully in accordance with objective laws. The principle of peaceful co-existence of countries with different social systems, if it is understood in the Leninist way, does not mean a reconciliation with imperialism, damping down the revolutionary struggle and curtailing the national-liberation movement. This principle concerns relations between states with different social and political systems. It envisages the co-existence of those countries without wars, without any intervention in internal affairs, and the maintenance and development of normal diplomatic, economic and other relations between states. It goes without saying that it does not by any means imply that the struggle between states with different social systems ceases under the conditions of peaceful co-existence. On the contrary, peaceful co-existence presupposes an economic struggle in the form of economic competition—the capitalists call it rivalry—and also political and ideological struggle. It presupposes vigorous action on the part of the socialist countries and of all the forces of peace and progress against the aggressive and colonialist intrigues of imperialism. But, I repeat, that is a struggle that must develop in peaceful conditions, without any interference in the internal affairs of the co-existing countries.

The national-liberation struggle and the class struggle against capital are a different thing. These are internal questions for every nation. There are, of course, people—bourgeois politicians and even some who call themselves socialists— who would like to extend peaceful co-existence to this field as well. These people try to weaken the liberation struggle of the peoples against the imperialists and colonialists and also the class struggle of the working people against capitalism. But we Marxists-Leninists know that as long as oppression and exploitation exist in society the struggle against them will not cease. We know that as long as there are national and colonial slavery, the national-liberation struggle will continue. We give that struggle our full support. No Marxist-Leninist has ever regarded peaceful co-existence between countries with different social systems as meaning the preservation of the status quo, as a sort of armistice with imperialism, as a "guarantee of protection" against the revolutionary process of national and social emancipation. No one applies this principle to relations between imperialism and the oppressed peoples, since the principle of co-existence does not place a veto on the struggle of those peoples. On the contrary, Marxists-Leninists have always believed that the oppressed peoples can win their freedom only by a determined struggle against their enslavers, when necessary by taking up arms.

That is why we always have been and always shall be against the peaceful co-existence of exploiters and exploited, between oppressors and oppressed. That is why we favour the peaceful co-existence of capitalist and socialist states and at the same time give all possible aid to the peoples conducting a national-liberation struggle.

As you see, there is not the slightest contradiction between Lenin's policy of peaceful co-existence of countries with different social systems and the national-liberation struggle. To ascribe any other meaning to the principle of peaceful co-existence is to distort this Leninist principle, to distort our position. We are fighting vigorously against such distortions.

Equally groundless are the attempts to represent the struggle for disarmament as an effort to disarm the peoples who have risen in struggle against imperialism. Is it not clear that disarmament concerns mainly the arsenals of the Great Powers who have the main body of armaments concentrated in their hands. The peoples of the colonies and the newly-free countries, too, stand to gain if the imperialist war machine is dismantled, they stand to gain from the elimination of imperialist military bases in their countries. In the final analysis disarmament will strengthen the security and independence of the young national states. If an end were put to the arms race, fairly large funds would be released in the young national states which could be used to meet the needs of economic and cultural development. The socialist states, in their turn, would also be able to considerably increase their economic, scientific and technical aid to the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America. But as long as the imperialists reject disarmament, the liberated countries are right in strengthening their defence potential.

International tension and the war preparations of the imperialists prevent the young national states from concentrating on the fulfilment of their own primary tasks. The imperialists, using the cold war hysteria, are trying to draw the liberated countries into military blocs, set up military bases on their territory, force those countries to participate in the arms race.

From what has been said it can be seen that the struggle for peaceful co-existence and for disarmament is a vital issue for the peoples of the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America. The Moscow Treaty on a partial nuclear test ban is the first, but nevertheless important, step in the right direction, and it is fully in accord with their interests. The majority of young national states joined the Treaty, and thereby displayed statesmanship and solicitude for the fate of the peace. Further efforts in this direction are needed. We fully support the African states that proposed to turn Africa into an atom-free zone. We offer full support to their struggle against the French imperialists continuing their nuclear tests in the Sahara. Any further steps making for the lessening of international tension and the consolidation of peace will meet with our understanding and support.

8. QUESTION. Would you again please explain your position on the issue of peaceful and armed forms of struggle of the peoples against the colonialists?

ANSWER. Our Party has repeatedly outlined its position on this issue, but I will gladly do so again. First of all, I should like to say straight away that there is no universal recipe suitable for all countries and peoples. The employment of one form of struggle or the other depends on concrete conditions, primarily on how strongly the colonialists and their henchmen resist. We know that some of the peoples oppressed by imperialism won their independence by armed struggle. Theirs were sacred wars which we always have supported and continue to support. Others achieved independence by peaceful means. We believe that both these forms are legitimate and expedient when they lead to national liberation.

Guinea, for instance, was able to throw off the colonial yoke without an armed struggle. The mass movement of the Guinean people against the foreign enslavers that continued for a number of years undermined the foundations of the colonial regime and created a situation in which Guinea was able to achieve independence without an insurrection, after rejecting the "French community" which was being imposed on her. The Guinean people have strengthened their independence with the support of the other freedom-loving peoples.

Things took a different turn in Algeria. The Algerian people drove out the French colonialists after many years of bloody armed struggle. Their heroism won the admiration and respect of all freedom-loving peoples. They always had the full sympathy and support of the Soviet people. Nor was it a purely platonic support. The U.S.S.R dispatched large quantities of weapons to the Algerian patriots free of charge. We also afforded Indonesia, Yemen and other countries serious help in their armed struggle.

We lent all our power to the support of the Egyptian people when they were faced with the necessity of dealing the imperialist aggressors an armed rebuff. The Soviet Union and other socialist countries are actively helping the young national states to strengthen their defences, establish and train armed forces to protect from the inroads of the imperialists the independence they have won. We Marxists-Leninists firmly abide by Lenin's principled position—we believe that the peoples do not take up arms and shed their blood of their own free will; the violence of the colonialists forces them to it, and when a people is forced to rise in armed struggle it is the duty of all internationalists to give them every possible aid and support. That is our position in respect of the armed struggle of the peoples for their national liberation.

At the same time, any thinking person who faces reality must see that today the task of most of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America who have created their national states, is not only that of defending their country against the aggression of some imperialist power, but that of achieving economic independence, developing the economy, raising the living standard of the people and developing democracy. Nobody will believe that the problems of the national regeneration of the liberated countries can be solved on the battlefield. The important thing for the countries that have achieved national independence is to reconstruct their economic and social system, improve the living standards of the masses, eliminate the dominance of the foreign exploiters and to destroy the political positions of their internal allies. The centre of gravity in this struggle—a struggle that is undoubtedly anti-imperialist in character—lies in consummating the national-liberation, antifeudal, democratic revolution.

9. QUESTION. The imperialists are trying in every way to hinder the development of relations between the socialist states and the liberated countries. What is your appraisal of these relations, and what, in your opinion, are the prospects?

ANSWER. The imperialists certainly would give a lot to isolate the newly-free countries from the socialist community. They would like to be left alone with those countries; in that case it would be very much easier for them to implement their policy of dictate, and carry out their neo-colonialist plans. But, as the saying goes, God doesn't give a butting cow horns, and the imperialists are not strong enough to prevent the extension of co-operation between the young national states and the socialist world. As far as we are concerned, we are glad that this co-operation is growing, and see in it one of the logical forms of development of present-day international relations.

History has many examples of alliances between states based on a temporary coincidence of interests, on fortuitous diplomatic schemes. Time passed and those alliances collapsed and were cast into limbo. The relations between the socialist community and the young national states and the national-liberation movement, rest on a different foundation. They are based on a community of basic interests. What is it we have in common? We have a common enemy—imperialism, a common purpose—to end for ever colonial and imperialist oppression, establish durable peace and co-operation on terms of equality between peoples, and ensure the mass of the people a free and happy life.

The Soviet Union and other socialist countries do not pursue any aims in respect of the newly-free countries that are contrary to the interests of the peoples of those countries. We do not seek any advantages for ourselves. We have no bases on the territories of these countries and do not want any. Unlike the imperialists, we do not strive to draw those countries into military blocs. Any attempt to enslave or exploit other peoples is alien to the socialist states, owing to the very nature of their social system.

The ideals of socialism require the complete abolition of colonialism, the removal of all inequality from international relations, and an opportunity for every nation to be master in its own house. For this reason every step towards strengthening the political and economic independence of the young national states, towards bringing the national-liberation movement and the world of socialism closer together is also in our interests and we regard it as a real contribution to the struggle against imperialism.

All this gives me good reason to state with full confidence that the relations between the socialist countries and the peoples who have begun an independent way of life have a fine future. For our part we shall do everything necessary to ensure that these relations develop successfully, that they become still closer and more diversified. The peoples of the Soviet Union will always be the faithful friends and brothers of the liberated peoples.

We must protect our friendship in every way, we must rebuff the imperialists who are trying to undermine it; we must also struggle against any attempts to isolate the national-liberation movement from the peoples of the Soviet-Union and other socialist countries and from the world working class; we must expose the harm that is done by advancing geopolitical and even racist slogans as a substitute for the anti-imperialist basis of the solidarity of the peoples fighting for their liberation. Only imperialism and internal reaction would stand to gain from the spreading of racist conceptions in the newly-free countries.

We are certain these attempts will come up against the political maturity of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America, and will be frustrated.

10. QUESTION. How do you appraise the significance and prospects of economic cooperation between the socialist states and the newly-free countries?

ANSWER. In my opinion, the chief value of economic co-operation between the socialist states and the liberated countries is that it helps the peoples of those countries lay the foundations of a national economy and achieve economic independence.

In the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America, about 500 industrial and other projects are being built with the aid of the Soviet Union. Total Soviet credits and other allocations for the economic development of the liberated countries have now reached almost 3,000 million new rubles. Over 400 projects have been or are being built with the aid of Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Poland, Bulgaria, Rumania and Hungary. The People's Republic of China is also rendering the liberated countries economic aid.

It would, however, be incorrect to evaluate the real significance of aid given by the socialist states on the basis of these figures alone, and not on the basis of the nature and purposes of the aid and its role in the struggle of the young nations for economic emancipation.

The imperialists, as you are aware, talk a lot about their efforts to help the liberated coutries. But what is that aid? Actually it serves as a means of enslaving and exploiting the economically backward countries, clears the way for foreign capital. Their aid, furthermore, is only the return, by means of investment, of a small part of the capital plundered from those countries by the monopolies.

The aid given by the socialist states pursues very different aims. We are sincere in wanting to help those countrie get on their feet, achieve economic emancipation, build the foundations of a modern industry and create a strong state sector, the reliable lever in the struggle against the inroads of the foreign monopolies. Soviet people find inspiration in the words of Lenin whose behest to us was that we help the peoples who are struggling against colonial oppression.

Our economic co-operation is not confined to direct aid but also includes immense indirect help to the young national states. It strengthens their position in negotiations with the imperialist powers. The latter, having lost their monopoly in the granting of loans and credits, in the supply of equipment, in technical knowledge, cannot, as they formerly did, exercise an economic dictate in respect of the developing countries. The support of the socialist states helps those countries to counteract the blackmail of the international concerns and compels the imperialists—they have at times admitted this themselves—to make concessions. As the collapse of their plans for an economic blockade of Cuba, Egypt, Guinea and other countries shows, the imperialists are no longer in a position to strangle economically the liberated countries that are defending their independence and national liberty. The historic significance of this is obvious. The liberated countries, in their turn, support the Soviet Union and other socialist states by delivering needed goods, by joining us in a common front against imperialism and its policy of dictate and discrimination in international economic relations, etc.

I am firmly convinced that economic co-operation between the socialist states and the newly-free countries will steadily expand. The socialist economy is developing at a tremendous pace, which means that the possibilities for economic co-operation with those countries will steadily grow. The achievements in economic development in the liberated countries will, in their turn, strengthen the basis of that co-operation.

11. QUESTION. How do you appraise the role of the young national states in international politics today and in the struggle for peace?

ANSWER. I do not believe there can be two opinions here. The victory of the national-liberation revolutions has brought about radical changes in international relations. Some twenty or twenty-five years ago the colonialists actually kept the oppressed peoples out of world politics, and at international conferences the oppressors spoke in their name. Today the young national states have become a powerful force in world affairs. Even those who do not like this situation, the imperialist politicians, have to admit that today key world problems cannot be settled without the participation of these states.

In most cases the young national states play a progressive role in world affairs. They oppose colonialism and the imperialist policy of war preparations and the arms race, and speak out in favour of peace and collaboration between nations. Most of them reject the imperialists' blackmail and refuse to join their military blocs and to place their territory, materials and manpower at the disposal of the imperialists; they pursue a neutralist policy.

Consider, for example, the amazing changes that have taken place in the United Nations. Since its foundation, the number of member countries has more than doubled, mainly on account of the new Asian and African states.

I am sure that not only the number of young national states but their role in international affairs will continue to grow. Soviet people consider this a great achievement, not only for the peoples of the liberated countries themselves, but for all mankind, and they welcome this development of events. However, to whom much is given, of him is much required. The possibility of actively influencing the solution of the basic issues of international life gives the young national states a serious responsibility in protecting the fate of the peace and world security. Every young national state is able to make its contribution to the struggle for disarmament, for the creation of atom-free zones, for a healthier international atmosphere, and for the cessation of the cold war. By joining their efforts with those of other peaceful states, the liberated countries can play a tremendous role in settling the key problem of our times—the prevention of war. I have no doubt that the young national states will prove able to bear the responsibility that history has laid upon them, will mobilize their forces for the struggle against the war danger and will become bastions of peace.

The peoples of the newly-free countries are recognizing more and more that without a durable alliance with the peoples of the socialist countries and with the world proletariat, the national-liberation movement could not have scored its excellent victories. This alliance is also vitally necessary to strengthen the independence that has been won and to conduct a successful struggle for economic emancipation. The peoples of the socialist countries and the world working class are as much interested in making this alliance strong and indestructible as the peoples fighting for their national liberation. It is to play an historic role in preventing a new war, in the struggle for social progress and national liberty, for the happiness of all mankind.

Our people are implacable enemies of all bondage and exploitation; they are convinced internationalists. We never have "exported" revolution, and never shall, but we have always supported and shall continue to support in every way the peoples who rise up in the sacred struggle against imperialism. The alliance with the national-liberation forces was and remains one of the cornerstones of our policy. This is stated clearly and definitely in the new Programme of our Party. We shall continue to implement this policy unswervingly.

Our hearts are always with those who fight for freedom. We sincerely wish the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America full victory in their courageous struggle against imperialism, colonialism and neocolonialism, for national liberation and social progress. We shall give them all-round support in their struggle and shall, as always, support them morally, politically and materially. Soviet people consider fighters for national liberation and for social progress their brothers and wish them new successes.

For a New Advance and for the Unity of the International Communist Movement

Statement by the Central Committee, Italian Communist Party

For some years now an important discussion has been under way in the international working-class and Communist movement. Latterly, especially owing to the erroneous positions of the Communist Party of China and the serious attacks it has made against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and other Communist parties, the polemic and disagreements have grown sharper and acquired the nature of an acute political and ideological struggle. A threat has arisen to the unity of our movement.

In order correctly to assess the situation, it is essential to bear in mind that the present driscussion and differences have arisen at a moment in history characterized by rapid development throughout the world of the emancipation struggle waged by the working classes, the peoples, and the Communist movement. We are living at a time when one-third of mankind is embraced by a system of socialist states and when this system has become the decisive factor of world development. The Communist movement has extended to and is carrying on the struggle on all continents. The old colonial system is disintegrating; the national-liberation movement is developing in Asia, Africa and Latin America, giving birth to new independent states, many of which already play an important role in defending peace and combating imperialism.

The Communist movement has thus entered a new situation characterized by three basic features.

First, a new vast responsibility has been objectively reposed in our movement — a responsibility to the broad masses and to humanity as a whole for whom the forces of imperialism are still causing unbearable suffering and holding out the tragic prospect of nuclear catastrophe.

Second, the changes in the structure of the world have faced our movement with an increasingly imperative need to examine and solve new problems relating to the assessment of the situation, elaboration of strategy and the struggle generally.

Published in Unita, October 26, 1963.

Lastly, the new possibilities for advance and the differences between the objective conditions, aims and tasks of the struggle and the level of politico-ideological development of the various parties have given rise to a relative diversity and differentiation in our movement. It is in these features that the roots and objective sources lie of the discussion under way and the difficulties encountered today in the Communist movement.

For many years after the Second World War the Communist movement as a whole was slow in perceiving the changes in the world structure and the conditions of their own struggle and failed to draw all the necessary theoretical, strategic and tactical conclusions therefrom. A certain stagnation was evident in theoretical work, in scientific analysis of the changes in the world and in the separate countries, and in political work.

The positions in the sphere of ideology and practical struggle which the Communist movement won at the Seventh Congress of the International, in the crucible of anti-fascist struggle, in the war against Nazism and fascism, and in struggle for the unity of all working-class and popular forces were not consistently consolidated. These positions were partly relinquished and even contrary positions adopted.

The Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U., which generalized the most valuable experience gained by the Communist movement, marked the first important step towards overcoming the lag, the mistakes and regressive tendencies, the first step in combating erroneous or obsolete positions in the struggle to enable the movement to cope with the new responsibility devolving on it and to carry out the new tasks.

The Communist parties, consequently, welcomed the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. and the criticism to which it subjected the mistakes and dogmatic and sectarian distortions, all the practices which departed from the Marxist-Leninist line; the parties welcomed the new positions and theses which that Congress advanced (concerning the character and significance of the changes in the world structure and in the balance of forces between capitalism and socialism, the possibility of averting war, the policy of peaceful coexistence, the diversity of ways to socialism, socialist legality and Party democracy) as an important turning point in our entire movement, ushering in a period of renewal.

Therefore the position taken in recent years by the Communist Party of China is grossly erroneous primarily because it attacks and criticizes this turn initiated by the Twentieth Congress. The Chinese Communists' attacks against the line of the Twentieth Congress and the Soviet leadership must be combated. There can be no retreat from the line of the Twentieth Congress. We can and should move forward. If the international Communist movement has reason to be self-critical, it is not because it approved the line of the Twentieth Congress, but because it has not yet drawn all the necessary conclusions — in its practical activities as well as in the sphere of theory — from the new orientation delineated at the Twentieth Congress.

To the need creatively to advance Marxist thought and our practical activities, to the new positions elaborated by the Twentieth Congress and the Communist movement, the Chinese comrades counterpose a dogmatic concept, a narrow sectarian view of the line and tasks of the Communist movement on a world scale and in the various countries, attacking the C.P.S.U. and other Communist parties and aggravating relations to the point of a split.

It is not easy to understand all the concrete reasons that have impelled the leaders of the Communist Party of China to embark on this course. It is quite possible that the explanation lies partly in the difficulties of economic and political upbuilding in their own country, the consequences of the mistakes made in this area, the magnitude of the problems the Chinese leaders have to solve, and also in the international position in which the Chinese People's Republic has been unjustly placed as a result of the aggressive policy of the U.S. imperialist groups.

Underlying all this, however, is an erroneous assessment of the basic features of the present international situation, of the correlation and significance of the forces combating imperialism today, and of the level the fight for socialism throughout the world has reached. To agree with this erroneous assessment and the line to which the Chinese comrades adhere as a result of this assessment would cause serious harm to the international Communist movement and above all hinder it from fulfilling its new tasks and living up to the new responsibility resting on us today; to do so would tend to cut the Communist parties off from the broad masses at a time when new perspectives of success and victory are opening before us.

Our Party has not forgotten, and never shall forget, the vast importance for all peoples of the Chinese revolution, which was carried out under the leadership of the Communist Party, and its accomplishments. But it resolutely rejects the present positions of the Chinese comrades and the line they propose. Our contribution to the discussion under way in our movement is aimed solely at upholding and elaborating the correct revolutionary strategy.

This necessary political struggle must be accompanied by full awareness that the Communist movement it faced with new tasks in the spheres of both theory and practical activity. The ability of the movement energetically and courageously to solve these problems and to forge ahead is a factor of decisive importance also in combating the opportunist and reformist trends existing in the international working-class movement.

Moreover, we consider it essential to find a way enabling the Communist parties to carry on the struggle for the correct political line without the danger of division and to work for the necessary unity by ways and means according with the present situation.

In the present document our Party proposes to set forth its stand and suggestions as regards the essence of the main issues debated today in the Communist movement, and also as regards the unity of the movement.

I. The Struggle for Peace and Coexistence

1. The Moscow test-ban treaty freed humanity from the deadly peril of contamination of the atmosphere and seas of our planet.

Herein lies the prime and direct significance of the treaty. The fact that the three nuclear powers renounced acts which presented a serious threat to the health and the future of humanity and which have already demonstrated the destructive nature of modern world war, is, besides being a blessing for all peoples, a success for the peace forces generally and the working-class and Communist movement in particular which have fought for years to achieve this aim. The termination of nuclear tests in itself was an admission of the fact that the stockpiles and destructive power of the latest weaponry have reached a point when the arms drive can no longer be justified by considerations of either defence or retaliation. Under these circumstances nuclear war holds out the perspective not only of mutual destruction of the belligerents but also the annihilation of a great part of all humanity.

We hold that it is a grave mistake to underestimate the catastrophic perspectives of nuclear war, and unhesitatingly condemn any tendency to do so in the working-class and popular movement. Even those who, like the Chinese comrades, are wary of overestimating the consequences, are compelled to admit that if imperialism were to start a war more than half of mankind would perish in a nuclear holocaust. This being the case, the Chinese comrades' argument that the survivors would be able to rebuild rapidly and create a higher civilization, the civilization of socialism, is an absurd and dangerous illusion. In reality the atomic conflagration would reduce to ruins the main centres of civilization and might well endanger the very sources of living nature and human life.

To recognize this qualitative change in the instruments of war and, consequently, in the nature of war does not mean, as the Chinese comrades claim, concluding that it is no longer in the power of the popular masses to determine the march of history. The issue is not of recognizing or denying that technology can suppress and condition man's activity, but of recognizing or denying, as a fact of life, the destructive power of the new types of weapons. Man fulfils his mission as the maker of history not by denying or arbitrarily underestimating the reality, but by working to abolish, restrict and destroy that which threatens his life and his future.

Needless to say, to preserve and ensure peace it is not enough merely to visualize the disastrous nature of war. But the Chinese comrades are mistaken if they fear that clarity as to what is at stake dooms the peoples to passivity and abject cowardice. On the contrary, the growth of this awareness throughout the world is one of the root causes of the crisis of the policy of the ruling classes and conservative forces generally; it engenders differences and contradictions in their ranks and at the same time acts as a stimulus — and one that is already yielding substantial fruit — to harnessing the energies essential to protect peace.

The safeguarding of peace, the supreme boon, acquires universal, absolute significance. Hence the importance and impact of the choice made by the Communist movement — and by our Party as one of the first — when it posed as its basic task the defence of peace, the freeing of the peoples from the burden of international tension and the arms drive, the defence of humanity against the threat of a nuclear catastrophe.

The working class has always fought to prevent imperialism from unleashing war, and today its class interests have fully coincided with the most human and universal need to guarantee the peace. The alternative, "either peaceful coexistence or destructive war", which the Communist and Workers' parties clearly envisaged in the Moscow Statement of December 1960 underscores the fact that in the nuclear age peace and coexistence are a vital necessity for all — for the states which have nuclear weapons and the states which do not have them, for the socialist countries and the capitalist countries, for the proletariat and for all mankind.

Excluding world war from the life of humanity has become at once essential and possible as a result of two cardinal changes which the processes of history have introduced in the objective reality.

On the one hand, imperialism can no longer impose its will as it did in the past, it is no longer the dominant system. On the other hand, the invention, perfection and dissemination of nuclear weapons have changed the very nature of war. From this proceeds a political line which makes effort towards peaceful coexistence a pivotal element of the fight for socialism. It guarantees the supreme boon — peace — and provides the most favourable ground for the struggle for the emancipation of the working people, for the liberation of the oppressed peoples, and for the achievement and development of socialist society.

Through the struggle for peace imperialism can be trapped in the impasse of acute contradictions into which it has been brought by the march of history.

Indeed, the imperialist leaders are forced to admit that under all circumstances nuclear war would be a disaster for their own countries. This admission, facilitating as it does the exposure and condemnation of all policies of aggression and war provocation, gives rise to new contradictions within the very same ruling groups and, what is most important, opens new opportunities for movements for unity. It is becoming increasingly obvious that peaceful competition of the two systems and, consequently, the policy of coexistence are vitally important. On the other hand, this corresponds to the very nature of the socialist countries, just as it accords with the principles of defence of peace which inspire the entire working-class movement. Peaceful competition is a challenge to capitalism, an arena of struggle against capitalism and victory over it.

2. Peaceful coexistence is shaped and won in struggle. To achieve even such a limited result as a nuclear truce persistent and multiform effort was required, from the diplomatic and political initiatives of the U.S.S.R. and other socialist countries to mass struggles and the peace movement, from the rousing of public opinion by the more conscious scientists to the intervention of religious forces. The resistance encountered and the contradictions and polemics engendered by this halt in the cold war foreshadows the intensity and the scale which the struggle is bound to acquire as more and more important aims are posed.

The Chinese comrades err in underestimating the universal significance of civilization and the anti-imperialist and revolutionary content of the struggle for peace and peaceful coexistence.

The fight for peace and coexistence does not, nor can it, run counter to the struggle for the emancipation of the working class, of the exploited masses and the oppressed peoples; on the contrary, it opens new perspectives for them while itself deriving inspiration and impetus from that struggle and its successes. The tendency to minimize the universal and revolutionary significance of the struggle for peace, to counterpose the policy of coexistence to the liberation struggle, is all the more erroneous since it undermines unity and tends to retard the movement at the very moment when steps towards relaxation of tension show that the most aggressive and extremist groups in the imperialist bloc can be isolated and defeated.

Fear of detente today compels Western Germany, Gaullist France, Franco Spain and the diehards among the U.S. and European militarists and big capitalists to take an open stand against every tendency and every effort to find some alternative to the nuclear race and the cold war, regardless of the fact that such tendencies are making themselves felt even among the present rulers of the United States.

This shows that by working for relaxation of international tension and by forcing steps to be taken towards disarmament, the contradictions of capitalist policy and economy can be aggravated to the extreme, differences intensified within the political union of the bourgeoisie itself, and new conditions and opportunities created for the working-class movement to build up broad social and political accords and alliances constituting a powerful force not only in the fight for peace but in the fight against the monopoly capitalists, against oppression and colonial exploitation.

Peaceful coexistence implies competition.

Coexistence provides conditions in which the class struggle, the struggle for the liberation of the peoples and for socialism, acquires full independence and is afforded new opportunities for development unencumbered by nuclear blackmail and cold-war barriers. We reject and condemn that diehard narrow "diplomatic" definition of coexistence advanced in the imperialist camp which reduces it to a mere matter of agreement between the great powers on preserving the status quo and the division of zones of influence between the two camps so as to create a static equilibrium and, eventually, a system protecting and guaranteeing the present sphere of imperialist domination.

In advocating coexistence, we advocate neither a truce nor a compromise between socialism and capitalism. In advocating coexistence we in no way advocate rejection of the social, political and ideological struggle of the working class and its revolutionary vanguard or any relaxation of this struggle. More, in order to dispel any confusion as to the significance of the fight for peaceful coexistence on both the world and national levels and its direct link with the struggle of the working class, the working masses generally and the national-liberation forces, we declare that it is a mistake to reduce the concept of coexistence to a mere absence of a universal state of war, as the Chinese comrades do.

Needless to say, peaceful coexistence means above all renunciation by both camps — the capitalist and the socialist — of recourse to war as a means of imposing their respective systems one upon the other.

This can be achieved, however, only by gradually attaining progressively higher aims: solution of disputed issues by negotiation, abolition of the legacy of world war, elimination of seedbeds of the cold war, ensuring the peoples the right to full political and economic independence and to order their destinies themselves.

It is essential to combat discrimination against the socialist countries in the political and economic spheres, to put an end to the absurd non-recognition of and bans against the great Chinese People's Republic and the German Democratic Republic. What is needed is activity which will lead, through a series of partial gains—conclusion of a non-agression pact between the two military blocs, the establishment of nuclear-free zones, abolition of foreign military bases, prohibition of the manufacture of nuclear weapons and destruction of the existing stockpiles of these weapons — to the abolition of opposing blocs and to general controlled disarmament.

In a word, the aim is to arrive at such a system of international relations under which, with the working-class movement continuing to reject on principle the export of revolution, the imperialist forces would not be able either to unleash world war or to export counter-revolution.

Such should be the programme of coexistence, and it is the task of the working-class and Communist movement today to work resolutely to carry out this programme. The important thing is not to mark time but to press forward along the path opened by the nuclear truce.

It is a mistake to claim that an international detente would act as a brake on the popular and revolutionary struggle. The facts have shown that it is the cold war which creates obstacles to the peoples' struggle. In the capitalist countries the cold war has strengthened the hand of the more reactionary and aggressive groups; it has been a basic factor uniting all the conservative forces under their leadership in defence of the capitalist system with the support or open interference of the leading imperialists powers. The cold war has helped to aggravate and deepen the disunity and discord among the masses. This is clearly evident even in a country like Italy, where the working-class and popular movement has succeeded, by waging a persistent struggle and pursuing a policy of unity and broad alliances, in withstanding the test and moving on from success to success in the fight for peace and democracy.

The cold war has laid a heavy burden on the colonial and dependent peoples. Many countries in Asia, Africa and America have won their independence thanks to the revolutionary struggle of the oppressed peoples, to which the victories and the solidarity of the socialist countries and the working-class movement have made a decisive contribution.

The liberation and upbuilding of the new states, however, have come up against the policy of cold war which the imperialist powers have been pursuing in order to extend their armed intervention in the countries fighting for independence; this policy has complicated and retarded the struggle of many of these countries against oppression, poverty and backwardness.

The Chinese comrades say that peaceful coexistence cannot take the place of the revolutionary struggle of the peoples. The fact is, however, that peaceful coexistence does not presuppose such an alternative. The need and the right of the peoples to win independence, through national-liberation war among other means, has not been nor can it be questioned. On the contrary, peaceful coexistence implies relieving historical progress of the impediment of atomic blackmail, ensuring the working class and the oppressed peoples every opportunity to fight for their independence and freedom without risking the destruction of humanity. The fact is that if we do not wish to limit ourselves to merely proclaiming the need for class struggle and the liberation movement, if we really want to promote revolutionary struggle, it is essential today to remove such obstacles as the cold war and nuclear blackmail.

3. The consequences of the erroneous positions of the Chinese comrades could be seen in their violent and absurd condemnation of the partial test-ban treaty and their inexcusable attacks against the U.S.S.R. The Chinese Communists have gone so far as to deny, in defiance of the obvious facts, the immediate benefits deriving from the cessation of tests, attaching no importance whatever to the struggle waged by the working-class movement towards this end.

They did not even hesitate to contradict themselves by counterposing to this partial but concrete and positive achievement the ultimate aim of nuclear and general disarmament which they themselves had earlier called a "sheer illusion". They even deny that the treaty has any political significance as the starting point of and a stimulus towards detente in the international arena.

While turning down the treaty, China lays claim to the right to possess its own nuclear weapons and accuses the U.S.S.R. of having prevented or not assisted in the achievement of this aim. Such a position must be repudiated. It fell to the lot of the U.S.S.R. to create a nuclear force (which it built up at the cost of enormous effort and sacrifice) in order to ensure its own defence and the defence of the socialist community. But in view of the risks involved in the spread of nuclear weapons, the U.S.S.R. had to — and still has to — avoid decisions which might be used as a pretext or justification for continuing the arms drive and spreading atomic weapons in the imperialist camp. This is not only a highly responsible and consistent policy, it is the only policy which can ensure success in the fight for disarmament and peace. When the Chinese Communists lay claim to the right to possess their own nuclear power we cannot but conclude — unless we were to assune that they place no faith in the commitment given by the U.S.S.R. to defend China and the entire family of socialist countries, or that they are seeking to secure for themselves some special prestige and power — that in the final analysis they consider disarmament to be utterly senseless and impossible.

True, they say that proposals for general disarmament should be advanced — and indeed advance such proposals themselves — and claim that the imperialists can be forced to agree to "some sort of treaty" in this area.

Actually, however, the Chinese Communists do not go beyond political agitation and condemnation, for they hold that so long as imperialism has not been completely destroyed it would be a delusion to believe that disarmament can really be achieved and a stable world peace established. In this way they question and to all intents and purposes reject the strategy of a revolutionary struggle based on peaceful co-existence and envisaging the advance to socialism as a movement embracing all areas of class contradictions and competition between nations and states, a movement which is forging ahead from success to success. In their abstract striving not to subordinate the development of the revolutionary movement to any other demands the Chinese comrades are caught between the horns of a false dilemma: peace or revolution. They deprive themselves of every possibility of undertaking concrete actions aimed at isolating the forces of war and broadening the front of the anti-imperialist democratic peace-loving forces. And in the end they place their stake on a policy which objectively leads only to an intensification of international tension and, in the final analysis, may result in a catastrophic collision.

The Communist movement and our Party must unequivocally reject this senseless and adventuristic perspective.

II. New Ways of Advancing to Socialism

1. The Italian Communists consider the position adopted by the Chinese comrades in denying the possibility of new roads opening to socialism to be erroneous and harmful.

By taking this position, the Chinese Communists have revealed their failure to grasp the full significance of the changes that have taken place in the world structure. They have revealed their inability to see the new forms of struggle which the international victories of socialism have made available for the working-class and popular movement in the fight for peace and democracy, and still less the changes in the capitalist world which require renewal and development of working-class strategy and tactics.

The forms of capitalist domination have partly changed. On the one hand — owing to pressure from the workers and the people generally who are fighting for their demands, to technological progress, the stimuli provided by the economic competition between the two systems, and other factors — the productive forces in the capitalist world have developed in recent years and the leading groups of the bourgeoisie have embarked on economic policies (diverse forms of capitalist "programming", development of state capitalism, establishment of supranational organizations, etc.) which have influenced the operation of the economic cycle and economic crises as well as employment, expanded the sphere of state economic activity and intensified the process of internationalization of the economy. On the other hand, determined and attended by growing concentration and spread of monopoly as it was, this economic development increased discrepancies between living standards in the different countries as well as within countries, gave rise to new contradictions and new requirements, and led to new serious social consequences. Capitalist exploitation and capitalist oppression have been extended to broader sections of society and are effected through more complex ways and means which constantly and in a variety of ways dovetail with political and state activity.

Throughout the capitalist world there is now greater differentiation and multiformity both in the social sphere and in the sphere of state measures and policies.

In these circumstances it is imperative for the working class to extend its system of alliances and to improve its methods of struggle. It becomes necessary, and at the same time possible, for the working class to advance towards socialism along a path based on alliance not only with the agricultural proletariat and the poor peasants, but also with the masses of small peasant proprietors, the broad urban and rural middle sections and the intelligentsia. With the establishment of such an alliance the struggle for partial and momentary economic and political demands acquires decisive importance as a means of isolating the big capitalists and breaking up the bourgeois bloc, of winning new positions in the fight against the monopolies, achieving a democratic transformation of the state and carrying out economic and social reforms capable of opening to the working class new roads to power. History has shown that the transition from capitalism to socialism on world scale should be understood not as a general cataclysmic collapse of capitalism but as an interweaving of revolutionary struggles and gains which develop from stage to stage, influence one another and lead to a common goal.

Hence it is necessary to pay more attention to the national and other specific features of revolutionary struggle in the various countries and areas of the world.

A strategy of revolutionary struggle patterned solely after the October Revolution in Russia, or after any other single pattern, can hardly correspond to the real situation and limits the activities, initiative and political weight of the Communist parties. It can only impel them towards pure propaganda activity and passive waiting for developments. The search for national ways to socialism in no way implies breaking up the revolutionary struggle into a multitude of separate and self-contained forms of struggle. On the contrary, this search makes it possible effectively to intervene in all the contradictions of the modern world instead of relying only on the victory of the socialist world or on the national-liberation movement; it makes it possible to work out a truly integral and at the same time differentiated strategy of the international Communist movement.

2. Proceeding from the above, we hold that the possibility of a democratic and peaceful advance to socialism is opening at the present time in a number of capitalist countries, for instance in Italy. The Chinese comrades deliberately distort and falsify our stand, claiming that the way of democratic and peaceful advance to socialism boils down to electioneering and parliamentary activity alone. When we speak of the democratic and peaceful way, we have in mind a way which will enable the working class and its allies to win political power without armed uprising or civil war but which nevertheless consists of a broad, far-reaching, unceasing progression of mass struggle. We have in mind the sum-total of forms of struggle capable of defeating the class enemy in diverse fields and forming a united movement which, under the leadership of the working class, can make its voice heard in production and civil organization, in elected political bodies and in the state apparatus.

In conducting such a struggle we are working not only to change the balance of forces in the interests of the working class and to rally under its leadership the broad masses of the people, but also to carry out such reforms of the economic structure and the political system as would improve the people's living standard and at the same time influence property relations (agrarian reform, nationalization, democratic economic programming, etc.) and state organization. This strategy is diametrically opposed to the policy of renunciation of struggle which the Chinese comrades ascribe to us. Indeed, it is a strategy of struggle for political power, for the participation of the working classes in the administration of the state already now.

Moreover, the facts themselves give the lie to the absurd falsification concocted by the Chinese comrades. The activities of the working class, the Italian popular movement and our Party in recent years are a long succession of dramatic and heroic mass struggles — from the armed struggle against the fascist tyranny during the Resistance to the sweeping popular movement for land, freedom and peace, the powerful economic and political strikes and the bloody demonstrations of July 1960 which led to the fall of the Tambroni government, an election struggle which gave the Italian workers' parties the biggest representation and the greatest strength ever witnessed in the capitalist countries in both the Parliament and the municipalities, and the creation of a powerful revolutionary mass party.

Consequently, parliamentary activity and the fight to defend and extend democratic rights are only one of the aspects of the struggle waged by the Italian working-class vanguard to forge on to leadership in the country and to reconstruct society.

Full clarity is essential on this question. We reject the position of the Chinese comrades, who underestimate struggle to develop and transform the democratic institutions with a view to giving them a new content and new forms and to link them with the struggle for the emancipation of the working people. The Chinese comrades arbitrarily confuse situations in which parliamentary institutions, elected bodies and definite political rights either never existed or existed only in the most rudimentary forms, and situations in which gains and institutions of this order have an established place in the public consciousness and in the struggles and experience of the broad masses. In putting forward their position the Chinese comrades forget that sectarian underestimation of democratic gains in the past greatly weakened working-class struggle against fascism; they forget that today too there are in the capitalist West, i. e., in the citadel of capitalism, fascist and authoritarian regimes which it will never be possible to overthrow unless the working-class movement and its vanguard devote all their energies to the fight for democracy and the unity of the democratic forces.

We hold that, in a number of developed capitalist countries, the institutions of representative democracy, elected political bodies and the freedoms connected with them can and should be used to promote the struggle against the rule of big monopoly capital, to advance the movement to win the majority of the people and to build a new society. The sum-total of objective and subjective changes in these countries has already led to important changes in the structure of the state.

There has been a considerable expansion of the activity of the state in the economic sphere, direct state intervention in the economy and in production, state capitalism. The interconnection between economics and politics has become close. Many economic demands are beginning to affect the political sphere. And many political gains are influencing the economy and will no doubt continue to influence it in the future.

At the same time the working-class and popular movement has been building up its organization, though the progress made in this respect varies by countries.

Many countries now have a large number of trade unions. There are unitarian organizations embracing the masses of the peasants, youth and women, and organizations uniting producers and consumers whom objective social processes increasingly compel to renounce an insular mode of economic thinking and to fight for a comon policy and common social aims. In some countries Communist parties have become firmly established and are able not only to steer a correct class and revolutionary course but also to organize the unceasing struggle of the masses with a view to abolishing the gulf between elected bodies and the people and ensuring a constant link between the growing class struggle generally and the struggle conducted in the elected political bodies. So far all this is limited in scale and applies only to a few countries. Nevertheless it points to new methods and areas of struggle through which the working class and its allies can deal blows at monopoly rule, at the bureaucratic machinery and the military and conservative castes.

We believe that in connection with these changes the working class must not hesitate to experiment and search for new ways of reconstructing the state, of winning and organizing political power. We know full well that the mere will to do so is not enough for the working class to ensure a more or less peaceful advance to socialism. This is the aim we set for ourselves. But it is still to be realized. We lived through the tragedy of the fascist tyranny and know how strong is the tendency on the part of the reactionaries to resort to force of arms and suppression of democratic freedoms in order to halt the popular movement. But we also know that the more vigorously the fight for democracy is waged the greater will be the peoples' striving for democratic rights and freedoms; the broader the system of alliances and the stronger the network of united organizations built by the working class in the democratic struggle, the better it will be able, using all the means necessary, to counter the violence employed by the reactionary forces.

The search for new ways of winning power and of giving effect to that power is now of vast importance for conducting a positive dialogue with those social and political forces whose participation is essential for the creation of a new ruling bloc in the developed capitalist countries. In Western Europe the socialist solution which would destroy the fundations of the economic and political power of the big capitalists must, besides providing the people bread and work, guarantee a high rate of growth of production, introduce economic planning providing an outlet for the initiative of each citizen and stimuli to this initiative, give direction to the life of society, ensuring broad autonomy and political freedoms, and promote free questing in the sphere of culture and a constant exchange of ideas. Only by working in this direction already now and being guided by this perspective will it be possible fully to meet the demands of the masses and to win over and unite the majority of the working class and the nation.

Sectarian positions which ignore these requirements caused no little harm in the past. It is high time to learn from these lessons. It is time to give thought to the objective reasons and the subjective limitations which caused serious setbacks for the working-class movement in the developed capitalist countries.

We believe that to ensure the victory of socialism in our country our Party must solve these problems; it is our conviction that posing these problems and closely linking the struggle for democracy with the struggle for socialism are a necessary condition for progress towards the political unity of the working class and the unity of the democratic forces. We cannot ignore, without falling prey to the infantile disease of extremism which Leninism subjected to severe criticism on the basis of post-First World War experience, the strength of the socialist and Catholic movements and the deap roots they have struck in Western Europe, even in the working class. It is all the more impermissible to ignore these problems now when bitter experience has led to a ferment and new steps forward in the British labour movement and in other sectors of Social Democracy as well as in the Italian Catholic movement, and when the further advancement of the working-class, democratic and the entire West-European Left movement acquires greater urgency than ever.

The dogmatic positions of the Chinese comrades seem to us all the more pernicious now when the entire Communist movement stands in need of more vigorous critical questing, of a deeper analysis of modern capitalism and the latest changes and contradictions in the capitalist world, when it is imperative for the Communist parties of the capitalist world to take fuller account of the concrete conditions in their countries, to extend their contacts with the masses which have not yet been won over to socialism and with other democratic forces, and also to increase their own numerical strength and heighten the initiative and activity of their members in the united democratic and class organizations.

It is not fortuitous that the position of the Chinese comrades leads to a profoundly erroneous line in such vital questions for the working-class movement as the question of unity and the nature and aims of the international mass organizations. Indeed, it is essential to reject any tendency to regard the united international mass organizations merely as products and instruments of Party policy. The Chinese comrades not only adhere to this view but in recent years they have taken steps to turn these organizations into an instrument of their own particular political line which they are pressing on all Communists at the risk of endangering unity.

The Italian Communists will fight for the independence of these organizations. Recognition and respect by all of the independence of the international mass organizations are essential in order to enable these organizations successfully to work each for its particular aims and also for the common aims of peace and progress towards which the broad masses are striving. Only in this way will it be possible to extend the forms of united action with other international mass organizations as well as with united national movements, to remove all artificial barriers and discrimination.

3. The need for new questing arises also in the sphere of the liberation movement of the colonial countries and former colonies. Complete independence and the freeing of hundreds of millions of people and entire continents from the hunger, backwardness and exploitation to which they were doomed by imperialist rule is the basic problem of our time. The worldwide significance of the socialist revolution is demonstrated also by the fact that it has become possible to pose and solve this titanic problem. Without an alliance with the oppressed peoples the socialist world and the working class of the capitalist countries can not even think of overthrowing imperialism, just as the complete liberation of the oppressed peoples requires unity between them and the forces fighting for socialism. This is a great lesson of Leninism.

In recent years the liberation movement of the colonial peoples has grown in scope and accumulated experience of exceptional importance, experience compounded of great victories and also of setbacks. Some peoples are still waging a heroic and tragic struggle for independence, against the most barbarous and bloody forms of colonial and racist rule. Other peoples, having barely won independence, are grappling with formidable problems in the building of their economy, in creating the most elementary civic institutions and a state organization. And there are countries where the anti-colonial movement has been in power for many years and where reconstruction and economic programming have reached the crucial point when the decisive political, class choice has to be made. In Cuba socialism is already being built.

The young Algerian Republic born of a heroic liberation war is also guided by the ideals of socialism. Everywhere the question of the methods, rates and aims of economic development with a view to abolishing the appalling backwardness caused by imperialist oppression is acquiring truly dramatic proportions.

We have before us, then, a picture composed of the most diverse situations. The Communist movement is faced with the serious and difficult task of elaborating and implementing a strategy capable of coping with these diverse situations and counteracting the entire panoply of means and tactics employed by the imperialist groups in an effort to maintain their rule and seize new positions.

In view of this it is imperative to examine the methods by which the imperialist groups today are combining in the various countries and situations the traditional forms of oppression and violence with the new methods of neo-colonialist penetration. For the fact is that besides attempts to retard, limit and distort the state independence already won, such forms of imperialist infiltration as investment in industry, penetration of capital and a striving towards compromise with sections of the bureaucratic bourgeoisie as well as the agrarian and industrial bourgeoisie are springing up even in the newly independent countries, forms which differ from the open economic plunder of the past and are aimed at indirectly but definitively influencing the choice of the economic and political course, at implementing new forms of subordination to imperialist domination. The search for these new forms of bondage was engendered also by the objective changes now taking place in the economy of the developed capitalist countries and the consequent new demands on the structure of the world imperialist market.

In view of this multiform policy pursued by the imperialists (a policy ranging from colonial terror in Angola to the association of a number of African countries with the Common Market, and from the Alliance for Progress in Latin America to the support given to the new groups of monopoly capitalists in India), as well as in view of the growth of the liberation movement, it is essential to make an analysis of the present class alignments in the various countries, the aims and forms of the struggle and the organizations implementing these aims and forms. The liberation movement today embraces areas of the world as well as social and historical situations extending far beyond the limits of the experience of the Third International and the situations in which it functioned. Above all we are witness to sharp differences between the weight, nature and political orientation of the various groups of the bourgeoisie, depending on whether India or Egypt, Algeria or Guinea, Brazil or the Congo is in question. In some countries there are groups of the bourgeoisie who are closely linked with imperialism; in others, the national bourgeoisie resists imperialist penetration but at the same time is resolutely opposed to any programme of social reform; and in still others large segments of the national bourgeoisie and the progressive intelligentsia, impelled by the needs of current development and the anti-imperialist struggle and also by the example of socialism, are inclined to support economic programming in one form or another as well as progressive social reform. Finally, there are countries where, in view of the fact that the level of their productive forces corresponds to a largely tribal social system, one can hardly speak of the existence of a national bourgeoisie. The weight, place in society and degree of independence and political influence of the working class vary too, depending on the conditions obtaining in each country. In some countries there is practically no working class.

The peasant masses, which in some cases, for example in Cuba and Algeria, were the decisive force in the national-liberation movement and the element making for the militancy of this movement, are playing an increasing part in the anti-imperialist struggle. Consequently, new problems arise relating to the connection between the struggle for complete independence, the anti-feudal struggle and the advance towards socialism, as well as the question of transition from one stage to another. The entire process of the growth of the anti-imperialist movement and the shaping of its vanguard has acquired specific features and become extremely complex.

Therefore the Chinese comrades make a mistake when here too they try to pattern the revolutionary line after a single model, be it even the great example of the Chinese revolution. They disregard the new situation and the new tasks. Hence the call to revolution so often sounded by the Chinese comrades remains an abstraction so long as it is not linked with the building of a bloc of forces conforming to the concrete situation in each country. Unless this is done, calls to revolution may lead to dangerous extremist adventures. Because of this the dogmatic refusal of the Chinese comrades to search for the new is in the long run bound to present a serious obstacle to the movement they profess to promote.

We do not wish to lecture anyone. We stress the need for critical questing because we are aware of the grave responsibility resting on the working class in the capitalist world, because we are aware of the inadequacy of the support rendered by the Western working-class movement to the colonial revolution, of the limits of this support and also the mistakes that have been made.

But the opportunist wait-and-see attitudes in the ranks of the Western working-class movement cannot be combated merely by displaying political solidarity, essential though it is, with the peoples fighting for independence. The task here is far greater. The Western working class must organize a struggle against both the old and the new methods of interference employed by the imperialist groups and in this way establish a concrete link between the struggle of the Western working class and the colonial revolution, against their common enemy — the big international monopolies.

4. Proceeding from these demands, we consider one-sided and erroneous the general strategy which the Chinese comrades are advocating on the plea that the various areas of Asia, Africa and Latin America constitute the "storm centre of the world revolution" on which the entire cause of the proletarian revolution depends in the final analysis. The Chinese comrades thus assign the primary and leading role to the colonial revolution, the liberation movement of the colonial peoples. This strategic postulate seriously underestimates the significance of the existence and the scale of the system of socialist states, and completely ignores the role which the achievements of the socialist countries in economic competition play in the struggle to spread socialist ideas and to change the world balance of forces, as well as in rendering aid to the national-liberation movement to enable it to give a rebuff to imperialist economic blackmail and counteract the old and the new forms of imperialist penetration.

For example, the strategic line of the Chinese comrades completely ignores the decisive role which objectively devolves on the U.S.S.R. and the C.P.S.U., it ignores the strength their accomplishments impart to the socialist camp and the entire working-class movement, and the significance which the difficult and complex work of building a communist society in the U.S.S.R. has for the overall progress of our movement. The Chinese comrades' strategic line likewise underestimates the struggle of the working class in the developed capitalist countries, the significance of this struggle for the defeat of imperialism in its own citadel, at the source of its economic and political domination, and the assistance which this struggle can and should render in destroying the most insidious and up-to-date instruments of neo-colonialist policy.

But the most serious mistake of the Chinese comrades is that their position minimizes the importance of the links and cohesion which should unite the activities of the socialist camp and the working-class and popular movement in the capitalist countries with the revolutionary movement of the peoples oppressed by imperialism.

This is a political issue. The course steered by the Chinese comrades threatens to lead the liberation movement to setbacks and crises. The facts have proved the fallacy of all conceptions which would entrust the defeat of imperialism to the struggle waged by only one of the motive forces of world revolution. In our opinion the view advanced by some sections of the Western working-class movement that the future and the development of the colonial revolution should be regarded as subordinate to the victory of the working class in the metropolitan countries, is erroneous. We likewise consider it a mistake to claim that the world-wide victory of socialism depends only on the economic achievements of the socialist camp.

But we also consider it a mistake to regard the national-liberation movement as the pivot of the world revolution and the decisive force in the struggle to abolish imperialism. A strategy designed to do away with imperialism merely by gradually undermining and destroying its colonial positions is a distorted strategy which does not call for an offensive against the basic pillars of capitalism or the mobilization of all those forces without which the national-liberation movement alone cannot solve the grand problems confronting it, unless it is assumed that the outcome of the struggle will in the final analysis be decided in a world-wide armed conflict. But we reject the perspective of the victory of socialism and the liberation of the peoples through a nuclear catastrophe. Socialism can and must win in conditions of peace.

III. Problems of Socialist Construction

The level of development attained by the socialist countries renders it necessary — as a condition for their continued political and economic advance and the establishment of a reliable system of mutual cooperation — to explore new areas and search for new solutions which cannot be found by the dogmatic reiteration of general formulas.

The grandiose, heroic and profoundly dramatic path traversed by the Soviet peoples in building the socialist society, the experience of other socialist countries, which also encountered difficulties but often of a different nature, and the difficulties and contrasts manifested in the socialist world system at the present time testify primarily to the need to overcome a mystic and primitive approach to the problems of socialist construction. Never losing sight of the decisive historical victories won in the building of a new society free from exploitation and class opression, never losing sight of the clear-cut demarcation line that separates the capitalist system from the superior socialist system, we must bear in mind that the problems associated with the building of socialism, too, must today be examined in all their complexity and approached critically and without prejudice.

The advent to power of the working class and the establishment of the socialist system have created the objective basis for the solution of the great problems of freedom and justice, prosperity and culture, friendship and brotherhood among peoples which no previous society in human history, including capitalist society, was able to solve. The facts point to the tremendous progress already made by the socialist countries, and primarily the Soviet Union, toward the solution of these problems; moreover, they embarked on this path handicapped by extreme backwardness, forced to contend with enormous obstacles in a world rent by the tragic convulsions caused by imperialism.

But experience has shown also that this path was by no means straight and smooth, that it was and still remains a difficult, contradictory and dramatic path. The destruction of capitalism, the elimination of the old exploiting classes implies overcoming the contradictions inherent in class societies which can only be resolved by changing the social system. In socialist society, too, however, certain contradictions of a profound and acute nature remain and make themselves felt. These contradictions are determined by diverse factors: the preservation over a prolonged period of different social classes; the difference in initial levels of economic development between the various parts of each socialist country, and subsequently, when the socialist system arises, between the different socialist countries; traditional and more recent differences of a national character, and lastly, the influence exerted by the heritage and traditions of the past on the political and cultural development of the socialist countries and the relations between them.

To this should be added the subjective factors and limitations determined by the different nature of the revolutionary process in each individual country, the difference in the character and level of development of class consciousness and the cultural, ideological and political level of the various parties, the particular experience of struggle gained by each party and the diverse methods by which this experience is combined with that of other parties. In this way a picture may be obtained of the problems of the socialist revolution on a truly world-wide scale.

It is precisely in the totality of all these factors that one must seek the origin of the difficulties, the problems, the causes of friction in the socialist camp today, and — in a more general sense — the origin of that profound differentiation which characterizes the development of the socialist countries. Failure to understand that this differentiation is an objective factor of the present situation, that a good many countries are today taking their own particular road to socialism, is the source of serious errors. For this reason, too, it is necessary to opose the campaign which the Chinese comrades are conducting against socialist Yugoslavia, depicting is as a country where capitalism is being restored, thereby repeating and emphasizing appraisals and judgements that have been repudiated by the Communist parties.

The way to overcome the difficulties and remove the causes of the present friction is not by anathemas or — still worse — by launching a struggle for the domination of the Communist movement by any one party or state — which is evidently what the Chinese comrades want. Such a course can only lead to serious clashes, to disastrous dissension, to splits. The correct way, on the contrary, is to take full account of the sum-total of the problems arising in the socialist camp, their roots and interrelations, and to strive, with due foresight and realism, to remove the causes of the trouble.

It seems to us that it is particularly important today to examine, both theoretically and on a practical, political plane, the role played in the socialist camp , and indeed in the entire modern world, by national factors and motives. Lenin foresaw that the historical heritage of nations would for a long time exert a tremendous influence on the building of the socialist society. But, besides this, it is necessary to ascertain whether new obstacles and of what nature may appear as a result of the particular way in which one or another socialist country came into being, its organization and leadership, and of errors committed in the past (and also more recently) in the relations between these states. We have here a whole province as yet inadequately investigated by Marxist thought, a province of paramount importance for the full application in principle and in practice of internationalism in the relations between the socialist states. This question, incidentally, has a direct bearing on other questions of vital importance for the unity and progress of the entire socialist camp, viz., the search for more advanced forms of international division of labour, and the building of relations between the socialist states consistently founded on mutual solidarity and full equality.

The socialist countries can hardly expect to attain the great objectives they have set themselves today unless their economy and development plans are properly dovetailed. Through international division of labour this coordination would enable the entire socialist camp and each country separately to increase their production capacity, achieve a higher rate of growth of productivity, a new level of technological development, and a steady improvement in the living standards of the population.

Eliminating the serious lag that exists in this respect is evidently the primary condition for raising the living standards of the peoples building socialism, for mutual assistance between the socialist countries, as well as for the help they must render the peoples fighting for economic independence, and in a more general sense, for victory in the economic contest with capitalism. On the other hand, if the international division of labour in the socialist camp is to be fruitful and effective, it must be based solely on mutual understanding and on consultations and democratic decisions adopted by all the socialist countries on an equal footing.

This type of cooperation between nations and states, which has no precedent in the history of mankind, cannot be built up overnight. It becomes all the more complicated and difficult when it is a matter of passing over from simple forms of economic solidarity to measures involving organic coordination, and when established routine, backwardness and even past mistakes have to be overcome in the process. But the new problems and circumstances arising from the very victories of the socialist camp cannot be ignored without serious consequences. When, for example, the Soviet Union embarks on the difficult task of transition to a higher stage of socialism this is an objective necessity conditioned by the same forces which were set in motion by the building of socialism, by the higher degree of maturity of the socialist society as a whole and also by the necessity to compete with capitalism. The very striving of the Soviet peoples for a better life is engendered by the new requirements, by the fact that the masses have become aware of these requirements, and by a will to progress that cannot be stifled. It would be absurd, indeed impossible, to demand that the Soviet people should halt their progress. On the contrary, it is necessary to urge them to continue to forge ahead boldly and unswervingly in order that their new gains might give fresh impetus to the socialist camp as a whole, to all the peoples fighting against imperialism. It is necessary, on the contrary, to strive for a system of democratic cooperation in the socialist camp as would make it possible consistently to maintain a just balance between the development needs of the various countries in the interests of the struggle and the common cause.

It is of primary significance not only for economic development but also for the continued success of the socialist countries, for the entire working-class and Communist movement, to overcome and finally eliminate the unlawful restrictions, violations of democratic principles and socialist legality which too long cast a shadow on the ideals of socialism and impeded the economic upbuilding and the democratic development both of the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries. These grievous violations created serious obstacles to the spread of socialist influence in the world, and, moreover, armed our enemies with a weapon which they are still using against us. The dissemination of our ideas to the countries still under capitalism will be all the more successful if the economic accomplishments in the socialist countries are accompanied by the development of democracy in all aspects of the life of society.

Hence the defence by the Chinese comrades of the methods based on the personality cult is both erroneous and dangerous. The extension of socialist democracy and the participation of the masses in the adoption of all cardinal decisions affecting the socialist society are vitally necessary for the full development of the creative forces of the socialist system in the economic and political spheres, for building the new culture and art and in order to win more millions of people all over the world for our just cause.

IV. On the Unity of the International Communist Movement

1. In view of the serious problems confronting our movement and the existing differences, discussion between the Communist parties is both inevitable and essential. Unity on the basis of correct revolutionary orientation should be achieved as a result of political and theoretical quests, through the interchange of experience and opinions among all the parties. It is, however, of the utmost importance that the debate, the political and ideological struggle, should be conducted in such a way as to avoid exasperation and rupture. It would be a grave mistake to allow the difficulties, the divergencies and the differentiation existing today to induce us to abandon the struggle for the ideological and political unity of the Communist movement on an international scale. On the other hand, the disruptive and factional activity carried on latterly by the Chinese comrades is damaging this unity and should be rebuffed.

Unity and international solidarity are for us Communists an integral and inalienable part of our ideology, one of the basic reasons for the existence of every Communist Party. It is the foundation of the whole strategy of our struggle against imperialism, for peace and peaceful coexistence, for the liberation of peoples, for socialism, a condition of the successful approach to those new ideological and political tasks which now confront us. Any weakening of this unity can only benefit the forces of imperialism.

The unity of the Communist movement is founded on identity of class interests, community of socialist objectives, on proletarian internationalism and the doctrine by which the Communist parties are guided. It is necessitated by the strength and aggressiveness of the class enemy.

The problems, the forms, the nature of this unity, however, cannot be assessed by yesterday's criteria; the many new factors, objective and subjective, in the present situation must be taken into account. Hence we affirm that any return to the organizational forms which existed in the past is out of the question. The only conceivable, realistic and necessary course in the present situation is unity through difference and autonomy.

There is no contradiction between the demand for unity in our movement and the demand for autonomy and independence for every Party. What does autonomy for each Party signify? It signifies full respect for the principle of non-interference by any one Party in the internal life of other parties, while allowing for necessary debate and confrontation of opinions. Autonomy means that each Party is responsible to its own people for its own policy only and for its own contribution to the general orientation and the progress of the movement as a whole, but cannot bear direct responsibility for the policy or actions of other parties in whose decisions it has not participated, particularly when such decisions conflict with the general principles guiding our movement. And what is most important, autonomy implies a search in each country for that revolutionary strategy and tactics, those ways forward and forms of struggle that could enable each Party to take full account of the concrete conditions and specific features of the given country and thus become the leading force in the working-class and popular movement.

Implicit in this intensive search, and in the revolutionary path charted by each Party, is the thesis concerning the need for a common struggle against imperialism, fidelity to the principles of Marxism and proletarian internationalism, militant solidarity with the socialist states, with the working people of all countries, with the oppressed peoples fighting for their emancipation. That is how we understand our autonomy and how we propose to continue to carry it into life. But there is nothing in this autonomy that could lead to narrow national exclusiveness. On the contrary, it is becoming the most effective means of enabling each Party to make the most tangible contribution to the elaboration of a common strategy, to the development of theory, to the progress of our entire movement and to consolidating the unity of this movement on a higher plane.

2. It is precisely on the basis of this principle of "unity through difference and autonomy" that the forms of contact and cooperation between the Communist parties and the method and tone of discussion within our movement should, in our opinion, be examined.

Our Party is of the opinion that bilateral contacts should be the principal form of communication, debate and cooperation between the parties.

These should not be formal contacts; they should be established in such a way as to lead to genuine debate and confrontation of positions, to frank and fraternal discussion of points at issue, to an objective and profound examination of one another's position and experience. Our Party has done much work in recent years in the sphere of bilateral contacts and exchange of delegations.

We intend to continue and expand this activity, sending delegations to the socialist countries and the countries of Western Europe and as often as possible receiving delegations of other parties in our own country, endeavouring in this way to extend contacts also with parties and revolutionary movements in other continents (especially Latin America and Africa). We believe that a deeper study of their problems and needs is essential at the present time, and that they, in turn, may possibly find some of our own experience of interest to them.

Highly useful too, in our opinion — as the initial efforts in this direction made in Western Europe (the conference of 17 parties in 1959) have demonstrated — are contacts, meetings and cooperation between parties in various areas of the world which have major problems and tasks in common. Here, too, it might be advisable to establish more regular forms of consultation and coordination of action. Inasmuch as this concerns us in particular, we shall work as before to establish such forms of contact in the Common Market area and throughout capitalist Europe.

We realize that there are times when it is of particular importance to hold international conferences of the entire Communist movement for the purpose of jointly enriching and deepening the assessment of the world situation, clarifying the basic lines of our world strategy or examining some particular issues. The basic consideration in convening such conferences, however, should be the real possibilities they offer for deepening the analysis of the situation and elaborating a joint orientation, defining clear-cut conclusions and consolidating the unity of the movement as a whole. The usefulness and effectiveness of such conferences depend to a large extent on proper timing, adequate preparation, a clear and realistic approach to the questions to be discussed and the objectives which can and should be achieved.

As regards the timeliness of convening another international conference of the Communist and Workers' parties in the near future in view of the situation now obtaining in the Communist movement, our Party considers it its duty to make some reservations on this score. Such a conference might well find itself confronted today with the choice of two alternative solutions, both of which would be prejudicial to the Communist movement: either the further aggravation of the present contradictions to the point, perhaps, of a split, or else a completely formal and unsatisfactory compromise. It is unlikely that the conference would be able to approach the analysis and elaboration of the new problems in an objective spirit and thus to take an effective if only partial step towards consolidating the political and ideological unity of our movement. And this is precisely the direction in which we must work at the present time. But for this, certain conditions and possibilities are essential which evidently do not yet exist at the present time and which require a great deal of complex preparatory work.

For progress to be made in this direction and also for the fruitful development of the discussion between the Communist parties generally, it is important that the method and tone of the debate should not exacerbate the disagreement, should not lead to a rupture and split, but should contribute to an objective and realistic confrontation of positions.

Of course it would be utopian blindness not to see that in the present conditions the discussion of the differences and the struggle for the correct political line are bound in many respects to develop into a passionate controversy.

However, quite another thing — and something which must be resolutely condemned — are the insults, anathemas and charges of betrayal which the Chinese comrades were the first to hurl at other Communist parties including the Communist Party of the Soviet Union which has made and is still making the greatest contribution to the cause of the socialist revolution, peace, and the emancipation of the peoples. Quite another matter are also the appeals, the disruptive activity, the impermissible factional activity in which the Chinese comrades are engaging. Quite another thing, equally reprehensible, is the arbitrary distortion of the theses and policies of other parties, a method which has evidently become the stock-in-trade of the Chinese comrades in their slanderous attacks on our Party. And lastly, a cause for grave concern is the fact that the aggravation of the polemic has gone so far as to have invaded and adversely affected the sphere of state relations between the socialist countries.

Our Party which has participated in the discussion in the international Communist movement, and intends to continue to do so even more actively in the future, has sought and always will seek to avoid any form of discussion that might exacerbate the polemic. Firmly upholding, as we have always done and always will do, our positions, our ideological and political orientation, our heritage won through the struggle and experience of all our comrades, rejecting and exposing the attacks and erroneous stand taken by the Chinese comrades, we shall continue to do everything in our power to ensure that the discussion is conducted on the basis of the fraternal relations, the understanding and mutual respect which should always exist between Communist parties.

3. All these years, even at the time of the dramatic events in the international Communist movement and the socialist countries, and today too in connection with the debate with the Chinese comrades, we have carried on an animated, serious and democratic discussion within the Party and have succeeded in rebuffing the attacks of our opponents and foiling the efforts of all those who have sought in vain to force our Party to abandon its correct political line for sectarian or opportunist positions, and of all who have tried to sow distrust and corruption in our ranks.

More and more of our comrades have been giving deeper thought to the political line of the Party, acquiring a more profound understanding of its substance, not only through theoretical study but through practical ideological and political struggle as well. In this way the Party has acquired a more mature critical revolutionary consciousness.

Under these circumstances the new and complex problems confronting our Party, particularly in connection with the present situation in the international Communist movement, should help us to overcome any reluctance to break with habitual positions, should foster the full development of initiative, revolutionary spirit and revolutionary steadfastness in all fields — theoretical, cultural, political and practical.

As regards the independent contribution we want to make to the discussion and the present struggle, we shall continue our efforts to deepen our ideological and political line of advance to socialism. Our participation in the discussion between the Communist parties, all our initiative on the international plane, will centre around the major problem of the role which the working class of Western Europe can and should play within the framework of the world-wide strategy of the struggle for peace, for democracy, for socialism.

It is quite clear, however, that the contribution which a large revolutionary, democratic and popular force such as our Party is destined to make in the major issues of elaborating and carrying out world revolutionary strategy is not only a contribution to the discussion; it is at the same time, and above all, a contribution compounded of struggle, successes and victories testifying to the validity of the road to socialism which we are offering our country. Hence it is of the utmost importance to link as closely as possible the discussion under way in our ranks with our activities in the country, our struggle for peace and for a new course in Italian policy, both foreign and domestic, with our dialogue and search for broader contacts with the popular masses and with all working-class and democratic forces. At the present time when preparations are under way for our national conference, we must draw from the present discussion fresh stimulus for the political and ideological consolidation of the Party, for the expansion and improvement of its organizational activity, for developing inner-Party democracy and, at the same time, for strengthening political unity, cohesion and discipline in our ranks.

Defend General Line of World Communist Movement against Dogmatist Onslaught

Resolution Adopted by National Council of Communist Party of India

The National Council of the Communist Party of India notes with deep concern and anxiety the serious turn which the ideological differences in the international Communist movement have lately taken.

The world Communist movement is today not only armed with a common ideology — Marxism-Leninism. It has common goals and is also equipped with a common programme, brilliantly set forth in the November 1957 Moscow Declaration and the November 1960 Moscow Statement. Moreover, the international Communist movement, which has registered stupendous success and victories is enriched by the living experience of the international working class and all other world revolutionary forces.

Under these circumstances, there is no reason why the differences in the ranks of the Communist movement should have at all reached the present critical stage, threatening a split in the movement.

The National Council of the C.P.I. considers it necessary to state here that this present disturbing situation has arisen primarily because the leadership of the Communist Party of China has now moved far away from the collective, general line of the international Communist movement, launched an all-out offensive against this unanimously agreed line and confronted the entire movement with its own so-called general line, particularly elaborated in the 14th June Letter of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union

This alternative line, unilaterally decided by one single party, runs counter to the Moscow Declaration and Moscow Statement, Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.

Further, the leadership of the Communist Party of China has chosen to push its own line through methods which defy the norms laid down in the Moscow Statement and violate the international discipline of the revolutionary working class.

For a long time now the international Communist movement and its general line have not been faced with such a challenge from within its ranks. Beginning with the divergent views on some separate questions, the leadership of the Communist Party of China has extended its differences to a wide range of principles, raised new questions and elaborated a dogmatic, sectarian and adventurist platform which is being pressed forward as the only correct line for the world Communist movement.

The National Council of the C.P.I. is of the opinion that when the collective view of the world Communist movement is so challenged and assailed, it becomes the internationalist duty of all Marxist-Leninist Parties to defend the common line and unwaveringly uphold it. Without this the fraternal parties cannot discharge their responsibilities towards the working people of their own countries and to the international working class movement.

For, adherence to the general and the collective decision of the world Communist movement is inseparable from the tasks of determination by the fraternal parties of their concrete policies and tactics — in short the political line — for their respective countries. In view of these considerations, the National Council deems it necessary to briefly examine the so-called general line of the C.P.C. leadership and state the views of the Communist Party of India on it.

Chinese Leadership's Stand Analyzed

The National Council of the C.P.I. is fully conscious that a correct, Marxist-Leninist analysis of the character of our present epoch is essential for working out the strategy and tactics of the international working class and world revolutionary movement. This task has been magnificently discharged by the November 1957 and November 1960 Moscow meetings of the Communist and Workers' parties and the conclusions are set forth in the Declaration and the Statement.

The main content of our epoch is that it is an epoch of transition from capitalism to socialism. The most distinctive feature is that the world socialist system is becoming the decisive factor in the development of human society. These factors eminently signify the great change in the balance of world forces, giving rise to real opportunities for solving the cardinal problems of our time in a new way.

The C.P.C. leadership discounts, if it does not virtually ignore, these two highly important aspects of the present epoch. It appears that the C.P.C. leadership still understands the epoch as one of only imperialism and proletarian revolution.

Naturally it almost passes over the real opportunities which are the offspring of the epoch and this incorrect appraisal would seem particularly pronounced when it comes to the questions of concrete policies and practice. This departure of the Chinese leaders would perhaps explain the root of their dogmatic and sectarian position on many other important questions of both theory and practice.

The National Council of the C.P.I. notes that the C.P.C. leadership has radically revised the collective, Marxist-Leninist standpoint about the main contradiction in modern society. According to the C.P.C. leaders, the principal contradiction is not between capitalism and socialism but between imperialism and national liberation.

This departure on the question of the main contradiction leads to another erroneous conclusion. The Chinese leaders contend that the focal points of the contradiction in the world are concentrated in the vast areas of Asia, Africa and Latin America, where the national-liberation struggles are being conducted. The Chinese leaders have gone to the length of saying that the whole cause of the international proletarian revolution hinges on the outcome of the revolutionary struggles in these areas.

All this is a complete misinterpretation of the contradictions in the modern world and is contrary to the propositions of the Moscow Declaration and the Moscow Statement.

Even before the world socialist system came into existence, the contradiction between capitalism and socialism was regarded by Marxists-Leninists as the main contradiction. With the emergence of the world socialist system and the tremendous manner in which it is influencing the world developments, as well as the advance of the international working-class movement, this contradiction has immensely sharpened. It is astonishing that the C.P.C. leadership should have abandoned the correct Marxist-Leninist understanding now of all times.

The National Council of the C.P.I. fully acknowledges the great revolutionary role of the national-liberation movements in Asia, Africa and Latin America and the shattering blows they are delivering to imperialism. There must be no underestimation of this great revolutionary force. But with all these, the decisive role in the development of human society and the world revolutionary process is not played by the national-liberation struggles but by the international working class and its chief creation — the world socialist system.

It is not difficult to see that the national-liberation struggles by themselves do not end the socio-economic basis of imperialism — state-monopoly capital — in the imperialist countries. This is a task for the revolutionary working class of these countries to accomplish. Further, it is the international working-class movement and the socialist camp which ensure the success of national liberation.

The Chinese view of the focal points of contradictions is again wrong and contrary to Marxism-Leninism. The National Council is of the opinion that the focal points are precisely those where the main contradictions of our epoch are being resolved — that is, the contradictions between capitalism and socialism. These are being resolved, first and foremost, where the most organized and powerful forces of socialism stand face to face with the forces of imperialism.

This means that the contradictions between the world socialist system and the world capitalist system are focal points, if one would prefer this description. The line of the C.P.C. seeks to replace the social class standpoint by a geopolitical approach. The National Council naturally rejects this view of the Chinese leaders.

The National Council notes the new proposition of the so-called "intermediate zone" which the Chinese leaders have advanced. At the very outset, the Council considers it necessary to point out that such a concept does not find even a mention in the Moscow Declaration and the Moscow Statement.

The Chinese leaders put the U.S.A. in one bracket and all the other imperialist powers, advanced capitalist countries and the newly liberated nations in another bracket to describe them as constituting the so-called "intermediate zone". This is a perverse and politically misleading picture of the present-day world.

No one will deny the inter-imperialist contradictions between the U.S.A. and other imperialist powers, nor the U.S. designs of world domination. But it is highly misleading to present the other imperialist powers as if they were mere objects of such designs of the U.S. imperialists.

The Moscow Statement, which the C.P.C. leaders have revised even on this point, however, lays stress on the imperialist military blocs such as NATO, CENTO and SEATO, which are first and foremost spearheaded against the socialist camp, as also against other countries, especially those in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

The Chinese concept of an "intermediate zone" is liable to lead to an underestimation of dangers posed by the imperialist blocs and to the blunting of vigilance against them. This thesis of the C.P.C. underplays the neo-colonialism of Britain, France, West Germany, Japan and so on.

It underplays the grave threat arising from the revenge-seeking West German imperialism to which the Moscow Statement draws particular attention. The National Council cannot accept this wholly wrong and harmful thesis of "intermediate zone".

In this connection, the National Council cannot but point out that, while inventing an unrealistic and harmful thesis about the so-called "intermediate zone", the Chinese leaders and the June 14 Letter do not have a word to say about the vast peace zone, comprised of the socialist countries and the non-aligned, newly liberated nations pursuing the broad policy of anti-imperialism and anti-colonialism in the world arena. Their contributions are highly appraised by the Moscow Declaration and the Moscow Statement but the C.P.C. leaders seem to have written them off.

Prime Task

The Moscow Statement regards the fight for peace as the prime task of all Communists. The Communists and Workers' parties, in their Declaration and Statement, firmly hold the view that the real possibility has arisen for averting a world war by the combined efforts of all peace forces. To fight for preventing world war demands, above all, active struggles and efforts in all directions for peaceful coexistence. General and complete disarmament is a principal way of ensuring peaceful coexistence.

From their various theses and pronouncements, as well as from their concrete policies and actions, it is apparent that the Chinese leaders, while verbally recognizing the possibility of preventing war, do not look upon the struggle for peace and for peaceful coexistence in the confident spirit of the Declaration and the Statement or from the standpoint of these programmatic documents of the world Communist movement. In the first place, they put more or less equal emphasis on the possibility of averting war and on the possibility of its breaking out, whereas the clear position of the world Communist movement is that the possibility for the prevention of war is already greater and is growing day by day.

The Chinese view is that war cannot be eliminated from the life of society so long as imperialism exists. This is in flat contradiction with the line of the Statement which recognizes the possibility of eliminating war even before socialism achieves complete victory on earth, with capitalism still existing in a part of the world. The position of the C.P.C. in effect amounts to the acceptance of inevitability of war so long as imperialism remains.

The Moscow Statement says that the only alternative to a destructive war is peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems and calls upon all Communists, especially the Communists in socialist countries, to conduct resolute struggles for the victory of the policy of peaceful coexistence, for compelling the imperialists by such struggles to accept peaceful coexistence.

In their view of the burning problem of war and peace facing mankind, the November 1960 Appeal and the Statement regard peaceful coexistence as the "cornerstone" and the "foundation" of the foreign policy of the socialist countries. The Chinese leaders repudiate this approach and declare that it "is wrong to make peaceful coexistence the general line of the foreign policy of the socialist countries". The National Council of the C.P.I. considers that this departure from the common line not only greatly weakens the role of the socialist countries in the world affairs but complicates the struggle for peace.

General and complete disarmament is regarded by the international Communist movement as a principal way of ensuring peaceful coexistence. There exists the real possibility for the realization of this objective, although the task is by no means easy.

The Moscow Statement presents this as a "fighting slogan of the masses" but the Chinese leaders say that it is an "illusion" to expect general and complete disarmament so long as the system of imperialism and of exploitation of man by man exists. Even while conceding that there may be "some kind of agreement on disarmament", the C.P.C. leaders understand the struggle for disarmament not as a question of principle but only as a means to expose imperialism. The line of the C.P.C. leaders on such a vital issue is thus clearly a repudiation of the Moscow Statement.

The National Council of the C.P.I. is of the view that the Chinese position can only weaken the struggle for disarmament and minimize the importance of concrete steps in this direction.

In this connection, the National Council of the C.P.I. cannot but take serious note of the line of the Chinese leaders on the Moscow Nuclear Test-Ban Treaty. Although the June 14 C.C. C.P.C. Letter ostensibly recognizes the possibility of banning nuclear weapons, they have nonetheless chosen to attack this important constructive step which, in addition to restricting nuclear tests and hindering the nuclear arms race, brightens the prospects for a total ban on all tests and for the complete elimination of nuclear weapons.

Although the rocket-nuclear shield created by the Soviet Union ensures the security of all socialist countries, including the People's Republic of China, the C.P.C. leaders would like the People's Republic of China and other socialist countries equipped with nuclear weapons. But this can only help the acceleration of the nuclear arms race on the part of the imperialists.

Slander Denounced

For taking the initiative and signing the Treaty, the Soviet Union is equated with the imperialist powers — U.S.A. and Britain — and all this is indiscriminately described as a "nuclear monopoly". Further, the leadership of the C.P.S.U. is accused of "allying with the forces of war to oppose the forces of peace, allying with the United States to oppose China, and allying with the reactionaries of all countries to oppose the peoples of the world". These slanderous and absurd statements would lay bare the real attitude of the Chinese leaders towards the struggle for resisting the nuclear arms race, the banning of such weapons of mass destruction, for disarmament.

The National Council of the C.P.I. repudiates the stand of the C.P.C. leaders and acclaims the Test-Ban Treaty as one of the most significant constructive steps in the direction of nuclear disarmament. This step has already contributed to some palpable relaxation of international tension and strengthened the forces of peace. The Test-Ban Treaty eminently conforms to the interests of all peace-loving people.

The National Council would like to recall here the attitude of the C.P.C. leaders in the critical days of the Caribbean crisis. When the Soviet Union first took all practical steps for the defence of the Cuban Republic against an impending invasion and then, after foiling it, took wise measures to prevent a thermonuclear flare-up, the Chinese leaders assumed the role of critics. They called the delivery of missiles to Cuba, which was an important factor in thwarting the imperialist invasion plan, an "adventurism" and they decried the withdrawal of the missiles which averted the nuclear war as "capitulationism".

The international Communist movement rightly criticized the behaviour of the C.P.C. leaders in relation to the Caribbean crisis, for from the beginning to the end it was highly irresponsible and contrary to the line of the world Communist movement.

The National Council of the C.P.I. has already stated its view on the policy of the C.P.C. leaders in regard to the India—China border question and has always considered the Chinese line as contrary to the spirit and letter of the Declaration and the Statement, as contrary to the guiding principles of peaceful coexistence.

The National Council has also pointed out the great damage the Chinese leaders have done by their nationalistic and adventurist policy to the cause of Afro-Asian solidarity, to the common front against imperialism and to the democratic movement within India. The only beneficiaries of this policy have been imperialism and reaction; democratic and progressive forces suffered all along the line.

Negative Example

The National Council would only like here to add that in the case of India, the Chinese leaders have demonstrated how not to work for Afro-Asian solidarity or for the success of the policy of peaceful coexistence. The attitude of the Chinese leaders on the India—China question had given a foretaste of some of their theses now elaborated in their so-called general line.

The policy of peaceful coexistence calls for purposeful and painstaking efforts in all directions for mobilizing all peace forces in a common struggle against imperialism and war. In this context, the Moscow Declaration and the Moscow Statement evaluate highly the positive role of the newly liberated, non-aligned nations.

It is in particular the task of the socialist countries to draw these nations closer to the socialist camp. But the so-called general line of the C.P.C. leadership discounts the role of these non-aligned countries in the struggle for world peace, against imperialism and colonialism.

It is no wonder that the C.P.C. leadership should have adopted such a negative and harmful attitude towards India in clear violation of the world Communist movement.

Further, an active policy of peaceful coexistence is inconceivable without negotiations and even, on occasion, without certain concessions and compromises. But the C.P.C. leadership more often than not, denounces the moves for the relaxation of international tension and against cold war, for improving the East-West relations, etc., as "embellishing imperialism", "cowardice", "surrender to nuclear blackmail", "betrayal of revolution" and so on.

These groundless accusations not only underline the special, divergent line of the C.P.C. leaders but are apparently aimed at discrediting the policy of peaceful coexistence.

The National Council further notes that in putting themselves against the line of the Declaration and the Statement, the C.P.C. leaders often ascribe views to the leaderships of the C.P.S.U. and of other fraternal parties which they, in fact, have never held at all. For example, the C.P.S.U. leadership and others are accused of renouncing class struggle in pursuance of the policy of peaceful coexistence between countries with different social systems. But they have always maintained that, far from renouncing class struggle, peaceful coexistence presupposes intensified ideological, political and economic struggles between socialism and capitalism in the world arena.

Further, peaceful coexistence also implies sharp class struggles within the capitalist countries, which indeed are also facilitated by the struggle for peace. It is a pure invention on the part of the Chinese leaders that some people in the international Communist movement have proposed peaceful coexistence between the oppressed peoples fighting for national liberation and the oppressors, the imperialists.

On the contrary, the C.P.S.U. and other fraternal Communist parties have always held that the national-liberation struggles should be intensified and that they help the struggle for peace just as the latter creates favourable conditions for the success of national-liberation movements. Policy of peaceful coexistence only means that the debate between socialism and capitalism in the world arena must not be settled through war. As far as the world Communist movement is concerned, it regards peace as an ally of socialism — a conclusion which one altogether misses in the Chinese statements.

On the question of "local wars", the C.P.C. leadership confuses the issues by mixing up the local wars started by the imperialists and the just national-liberation wars which are not only necessary but inevitable so long as imperialism and colonialism remain. The Communists have always supported such just wars of national liberation and will continue to do so. But it is the confirmed view of the international Communist movement that the possibilities have arisen today for bridling the imperialists and preventing them even from starting local wars.

The National Council is with the rest of the world Communist movement in taking a very serious view of such aggressive local wars, for a local war in the present thermonuclear age may easily touch off a nuclear conflagration. It is evident from the Chinese statements that they do not take the same view about the possibility of preventing local wars but, on the contrary, are at pains to explain how some local wars in the recent years have not led to a world war. This is a dangerous approach and is contrary to the standpoint of the Moscow Declaration and Statement.

Nuclear Weapons

The National Council also disagrees with the attitude of the C.P.C. in regard to the assessment of the nuclear weapons and the character of a thermonuclear war. The Council is of the definite opinion that in order to rouse and activize the masses against nuclear weapons and a thermonuclear war, it is absolutely essential to inform them of the destructive powers of these weapons. Hence the Council is of the view that the declarations such as "atom bomb is a paper tiger" or "atom bomb is not terrible at all" can only mislead the people and disorientate the active struggle for nuclear disarmament and against nuclear war.

Equally does the National Council disagree with the statement that a civilization thousand times superior will be built on the ruins of imperialism destroyed by a nuclear war. The Communists want to build a better civilization not on ruins brought by nuclear war but without having to go through a nuclear destruction.

The National Council is of the opinion that such statements do not help to rouse the masses with the boundless confidence that war can be prevented and imperialism wiped off the face of the earth without a world war. Such observations are liable to create wrong impressions about Communists and are not in conformity with their historic mission to save mankind from a nuclear catastrophe.

Liberation Struggle

The National Council of the C.P.I. finds that on the question of national-liberation struggles, the C.P.C. leadership has advanced a number of formulations and theses contrary to the Declaration and the Statement. They manifestly contradict the revolutionary principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. In their latest theses, the Chinese leaders do not recognize that it is the international working class and world socialist system which ensure rapid and decisive victories for national-liberation struggles and the consolidation of the newly won independence.

The Chinese leaders also ignore the Marxist-Leninist appraisal of the Moscow Statement which highlights the fact that the struggles of the working people building socialism and communism in the socialist countries, the revolutionary movement of the working people in the capitalist countries, the national-liberation struggle of the oppressed nations and the general democratic movement merge into the powerful current that undermines and destroys world capitalism. The C.P.C. leaders view the national-liberation struggle not as a component of this integrated world revolutionary process but in isolation from the socialist camp and the international working-class movement.

They counterpose the national-liberation struggles to the struggle for peaceful coexistence, to the democratic struggles of the working people in the capitalist countries as well as to the policies pursued by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries in defence of world peace. The Chinese leaders minimize the great role of the socialist camp and of the working class in the imperialist countries in supporting and quickening the process of national liberation.

This line of the C.P.C. leaders can only lead to the isolation of the national-liberation struggles and weaken them. From the theses of the Chinese leaders the most urgent task of strengthening the bonds of the national-liberation movement with the socialist camp and the working-class and democratic movements in the capitalist countries does not at all emerge. The National Council of the C.P.I. cannot but feel deeply concerned at such an erroneous approach and such theses.

National liberation is not completed with the attainment of political independence. It is continued in the newly liberated countries in the manifold anti-imperialist, anti-feudal and democratic tasks for winning economic independence and generally for national rebirth. All these tasks are a part of the world-wide national emancipation process, undermining the very foundations of imperialism and colonialism. In fulfilling these tasks, the friendship and cooperation between the socialist countries and the newly liberated nations, especially the disinterested economic assistance by the socialist countries to the latter, are of decisive importance. Such assistance, as has been seen, plays a great anti-imperialist role.

The international Communist movement attaches great importance to this aspect of national-liberation struggles. But the June 14 C.C. C.P.C. Letter simply ignores all this. The National Council of the C.P.I. takes it as a serious deviation from the common line of the world Communist movement.

In this connection, the Council repudiates the irresponsible criticism by the Chinese leaders of the Soviet assistance to India. The Council wouid like to emphatically state that economic assistance from the Soviet Union and other socialist countries has played a singularly useful part in consolidating India's independence and in resisting imperialism and domestic reaction on the part of the Indian people. It is surprising the C.P.C. leaders should have guided themselves by some exclusive, narrow considerations, which have nothing in common with proletarian internationalism.

The December 1960 Moscow Statement outlines the prospects of non-capitalist development as the best way to abolish age-long backwardness and improve the living standards of the people in the countries which have newly won their political independence. The Statement, however, elaborates the concept of the state of national democracy which, given the correct political line and militant struggles of the people, my serve as a form of transition to the road of socialist development. But the June 14 C.C. C.P.C. Letter and the so-called general line it adumbrates brush aside this concept and prescribe the slogan of "people's democracy or all newly liberated countries, irrespective of their stage of development."

The Chinese leaders do not explain as to how people's democracy, which is a form of dictatorship of the proletariat, can be established in those newly liberated underdeveloped countries where there is no working class or a Communist Party. The slogan of people's democracy for these countries cannot but lead to the weakening of the national-democratic front.

Forms of Transition

The National Council of the C.P.I. thoroughly disagrees with the one-sided, dogmatic approach of the Chinese leaders in regard to the question of form of transition to socialism. While fully taking into account the possibility of both peaceful and non-peaceful transition, the Declaration and the Statement explain what is particularly new in the situation. They explain that in the present epoch, with its great change in the relation of world forces in favour of socialism, possibilities have arisen in a number of countries to win state power by the working people through peaceful means and without a civil war.

No one has, of course, suggested that the ruling classes are going to relinquish power voluntarily or capitalism will "automatically disappear". The Marxist-Leninist view is that, whatever the form of transition, peaceful or non-peaceful, the socialist revolution and the dictatorship of the proletariat are essential for transition to socialism.

And it goes without saying that a socialist revolution cannot be accomplished without sharp class struggles and without a militant mass revolutionary movement. It is, therefore, entirely wrong for the C.P.C. leaders to suggest that the leaderships of the C.P.S.U. and of some other parties have given up the concept of class struggle or socialist revolution.

The departure of the Chinese leaders from the Declaration and the Statement lies in the fact that they do not recognize the possibility of the peaceful way and all their arguments are precisely aimed at justifying their own view that nonpeaceful means is the only way, and negating the line of the Moscow documents. According to them, the thesis about peaceful transition is based on "historical idealism" and they argue that there are no historical precedents for peaceful transition.

It should be stated here that Marxists-Leninists never guide themselves by mere historical precedents. Nor can an advanced theory be developed only on the basis of what happened yesterday.

In this connection, the National Council would like to state that what form the transition will take in this or that country depends on a whole complex of objective and subjective factors, both external and internal — mainly internal. It is for the Communist parties of the countries concerned to decide the question of form and not for other fraternal parties to dictate. The Chinese polemics against the fraternal Communist parties like the Italian and the French Communist parties on the question amount to interference in their internal affairs.

Twentieth Congress

The National Council of the C. P. I. notes with amazement the denunciation by the C. P. C. leadership of the conclusions of the 20th and 22nd Congresses of the C. P. S. U., including the great C. P. S. U. Programme adopted by the latter. The Communist Party of India had welcomed and acclaimed these two historic C. P. S. U. Congresses and once again records its highest appreciation of them.

The 20th Congress of the C. P. S. U. was highly appraised as a historic event by the Communist and Workers' Parties, including the Communists of China, not only severally but also collectively. This unanimous appraisal is embodied in the Moscow Declaration and the Moscow Statement. These two Moscow documents fully appreciate the historic significance of the decisions of the 20th Congress as well as their contribution to the cause of Communist construction and in initiating a new stage in the world Communist movement.

It is further put on record in these documents of the world Communist movement that the decisions of the 20th Congress have promoted development of the entire movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism. The C. P. C. leadership has now come out against all the major conclusions of the 20th Congress of the C. P. S. U. and characterized them as "the first step along the road to revisionism".

Against the Cult

The C. P. C. leadership is particularly up in arms against the struggle against Stalin's personality cult, which the 20th Congress initiated and which has been crowned with great success not only for the C. P. S. U. and the Soviet people but for the entire international Communist movement. Despite certain reservations, the C. P. C. leadership had earlier publicly supported, in the main, the struggle against the personality cult. Now it has made a complete volte face and is decrying the struggle for combating the harmful consequences of the personality cult as something which is "in effect directed against Marxism-Leninism".

The National Council stands solidly in support of the struggle against the personality cult. This is another crying evidence of the Chinese leaders' break from the collective positions of the world Communist movement — from the Declaration and the Statement. Any concessions to the ideology and practice of the personality cult would be extremely harmful and indeed dangerous for the international Communist movement. There is no need to revive this question which has already been settled.

The polemics and attacks of the C. P. C. leaders against the historic 22nd Congress, which summed up the great experience of building socialism and charted the course for full-scale Communist construction would again seem incomprehensible. The Council considers it necessary once again to state here that the Programme of the C. P. S. U. faithfully embodies the conclusions of the Moscow Declaration and the Moscow Statement and upholds the principles of Marxism-Leninism.

The National Council of the C. P. I. is in full agreement with the fraternal parties that what unites the Communist movement is far greater than what divides it. The Council also shares the view that if there is a firm adherence to the general line and the guiding principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, the differences that may occasionally arise for a variety of reasons in the ranks of the Communist movement can be overcome.

But the Council is at the same time conscious that if the general line is repudiated side by side with efforts to push an alternative line by one or other major party which is in power, the task of overcoming the differences becomes extremely complicated and difficult. The National Council has, therefore, no illusion that the present differences are going to be resolved either easily or at an early date.

However, the National Council of the C. P. I. still hopes that the fundamental loyalty to the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism will ultimately prevail over the departures from them. With this hope, the National Council expresses its full agreement with the C. P. S. U. and other fraternal parties which have repeatedly proposed to the C. P. C. leadership ending of the open polemics.

Here the National Council wishes to put on record its high appreciation of the constructive proposal for ending polemics, which the C. P. S. U. leadership made at the bilateral talks last July and which has been since repeated. The Council, at the same time, expresses its regret that the C. P. C. leadership should have turned down the proposal. It is, however, hoped the leadership of the C. P. C. will see reason and agree to ending open polemics in the interests of the entire world Communist movement and of its unity. This step is both urgent and essential for further constructive efforts with a view to solving the internal problems of the international Communist movement through resumptions of bilateral talks between the C. P. S. U. and the C. P. C. and, if necessary, by holding another Conference of the fraternal Communist and Workers' parties.

Resolution

of the Central Committee, Communist Party of Germany, on the differences between the leadership of the Communist Party of China and the world Communist movement

The Central Committee endorses the assessment of the differences between the international Communist movement and the leadership of the Communist Party of China given in the report of Max Reimann. Approving the standpoint of the Political Bureau on these issues, it reaffirms that the Communist Party of Germany remains loyal to the general line of the Communist and Workers' parties laid down at the Moscow meetings of 1957 and 1960. The Central Committee emphatically denounces the attempts made by the Chinese leaders to impose on the world Communist movement a "general line" directed against the jointly agreed decisions and running counter to Marxism-Leninism; in essence this line can only be characterized as dogmatic, adventurist and nationalist.

In all its policies our Party is guided by the ideas of the Moscow Statement of 1960 that the Communist parties regard the struggle for peace as their paramount task and that world war can be averted as a result of the changed balance of forces. The persistent policy of peace pursued by the socialist countries and the world Communist movement has proved its worth, having immeasurably enhanced the prestige and influence of the Communist parties. Relying on the jointly agreed decisions of the Moscow meetings, the Congress of our Party held in 1963 showed the working class and all peace-loving forces of the Federal Republic the path of struggle for peace, for a policy of peaceful coexistence, disarmament and mutual understanding with the German Democratic Republic.

In view of the unprecedented destructive power of nuclear weapons any struggle for social progress is now inseparably linked with the struggle to avert nuclear war. Neither the socialist and communist construction in the socialist countries nor the spread of the national-liberation struggle and the struggle of the working class of the capitalist countries for democracy and socialism can be regarded in isolation from this most pressing task, that of preventing nuclear war which would take a toll of millions of lives, exterminate whole nations and throw far back the development of mankind.

That is why our Party considers the Chinese leaders' underestimation of nuclear weapons and the consequences of nuclear war to be both adventurist and reckless, and their speculations about building a "higher civilization" on the ruins left over from an atomic war to be a mockery of the humane spirit of our world outlook. It is the Bonn militarists who seek to minimize the danger of atomic weapons and atomic war in order to conceal from the West German population the criminal and dangerous character of their policy of atomic armament and revenge. Our Party considers it its duty perseveringly to explain to the people the danger arising from this policy and rally them for resolute action against atomic armament.

Although they have affixed their signatures to the decisions of the 1957 and 1960 meetings which speak of the real possibility of averting world war, the Chinese leaders still stubbornly cling to the idea that war is inevitable as long as imperialism exists. They take the line of military solution of the contradiction between the two world systems and juggle with the concept of "prodding" the revolution through "revolutionary war", a concept, it should be said, refuted by Lenin himself. This adventurist line derives from overestimation of the forces of imperialism and from disbelief in the forces of socialism and peace. It only serves to disarm the masses and undermine their faith in the success of the struggle against the imperialist instigators of war.

These facts and the experience of recent years show that the Soviet Union and the other socialist states in alliance with the peace forces of the whole world are capable of curbing the warmongers and frustrating imperialist aggression. This was confirmed by developments during the Suez conflict and the Caribbean crisis. On August 13, 1961, this was reaffirmed on German soil when the German Democratic Republic supported by other Warsaw Treaty members fortified its state frontier in Berlin, thereby putting a halt to the military adventure of the West-German imperialists and saving peace.

The Chinese leaders have renounced the struggle for peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems which is the sole way to safeguarding and consolidating peace. Their practical steps are in sharp contrast with the agreed decisions of the world Communist movement and lead to the intensification of international tension and the cold war, to the policy of brinkmanship. The Chinese leaders attack and slander the Soviet government and the governments of other socialist countries which are doing their utmost to lessen tension and reach concrete agreements in the spirit of peaceful coexistence.

The attitude which the Chinese leaders adopted on the question of the border conflict with India, the compromise over the Caribbean crisis and the conclusion of the Moscow partial test-ban treaty is typical of their position. Today it is clear to everyone that thanks to the wise and resolute policy of the Soviet government headed by N. S. Khrushchov, the independence of revolutionary Cuba has been strengthened and world peace saved.

The foreign policy of the Soviet Union, the G.D.R. and other socialist countries, aimed at achieving détente, peaceful coexistence and disarmament, aids those forces in the capitalist countries, especially in the Federal Republic, which are opposed to militarism and imperialism. The policy of peace pursued by the G. D. R. and its proposals for a treaty of accord and good will between the two German states correspond to the sentiment of peace supporters in Federal Germany and meet with increasingly wider response. Our Party and all peace-loving people in the Federal Republic consider it one of their most essential tasks to fight for concrete steps towards détente and disarmament, for the establishment of businesslike relations between the two German states, for the triumph of the policy of peaceful coexistence in the F. R. G.

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of Germany emphatically denounces the slander against the Soviet Union spread by the leadership of the Communist Party of China in connection with the Moscow partial test-ban treaty. We regret that the Chinese leaders have embarked on a course which, to all intents and purposes, aids such militarists as Strauss, Adenauer, de Gaulle and the Pentagon "wildmen". One cannot but be surprised by the desire of the Chinese leaders to have their own atomic weapons, their insistence on increasing the number of atomic powers, which can only bring grist to the mill of the German imperialists who are stretching their hands to lay hold on atomic weapons.

Our Party regards the Moscow treaty as a success for the forces of peace, as one of the first steps towards lessening international tension which should be followed by other steps such as the prohibition of the proliferation of nuclear weapons, the cessation of underground testing, the conclusion of a non-aggression pact between NATO and the Warsaw Treaty countries, the establishment of inspection stations against surprise attack, and the creation of atom-free zones. We call on the working class and all the peace-loving people of the Federal Republic to redouble their efforts in order to make Federal Germany abandon its claims to atomic weapons and negotiate with the G. D. R. government on renouncing the use of violence and armament.

The Chinese leaders are trying to counterpose the peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems to the class struggle and socialist revolution. But it is precisely peaceful coexistence that is the most concentrated expression of the class struggle between the two systems, between the socialist and capitalist states. The struggle for the policy of peaceful coexistence in the Federal Republic is the most relentless form of class struggle and the struggle of the people against aggressive monopoly capitalism, against imperialism. The facts of life, the experience of the international working-class movement have shown that peaceful coexistence, far from weakening the class struggle, creates more favourable conditions for the development of the democratic, anti-monopoly struggle of the masses in the capitalist countries, for the movement for national independence, and for building socialism and communism in the socialist countries. Developments confirm the idea of the Moscow Statement that peace is a true ally of socialism.

In their statements the Chinese leaders revise the basic principles of the 81-Party meeting concerning the character of our epoch and the determining role of the working class and of the socialist world system which is becoming the decisive factor of social development. They represent the national-liberation movement as the main force, regarding Asia, Africa and Latin America as the "storm-centres of the world revolution". The fundamental contradiction of our time, according to them, is not the contradiction between the two world systems — socialism and capitalism — but the contradiction between imperialism and the national-liberation movement.

All this amounts to naked revision of the fundamental thesis of Marxism-Leninism — the teaching on the hegemony of the proletariat in the world revolutionary process, the leading role of the working class in the struggle against imperialism and for socialist change. Without the victory of the working class, the Great October Socialist Revolution and the rise and consolidation of the socialist world system, the great victories of the national-liberation movement would have been impossible. The power and influence of the socialist world system have given a tremendous impetus to the anti-imperialist struggle in all its forms and on all continents. Hence the need to rebuff the attempt made by the Chinese leaders to counterpose the national-liberation movement to the socialist states and the revolutionary working-class movement, and to separate them. This attempt is explained by their striving to gain nationalist prestige and power, and can but weaken the general anti-imperialist front of struggle. The closer the ties of the national-liberation movement with the Soviet Union, the socialist world system and the entire revolutionary working-class movement, the greater will be its successes.

The Chinese leaders also question Lenin's thesis that the socialist countries exert their main influence on the world revolutionary process by their economic achievements. But it is indisputable that the force of example, the practical proof of the superiority of socialism over capitalism in economics, science and culture, in meeting the material and cultural needs of the people, is exerting and will continue to exert an ever-growing influence on the minds of the workers in the capitalist countries.

The existence of the first worker-peasant state on German soil, its signal success in building socialism all along the line, in raising labour productivity as well as scientific and technological advance, its notable social and cultural achievements, already today render important aid to the working class and all people in the Federal Republic. These successes have a beneficial effect on the struggle waged by the West German working class, helping the trade unions to wrest concessions from the capitalists. The example of the G. D. R. will make the ideas of socialism still more attractive in Federal Germany.

The Central Committee rejects this adventurist viewpoint of the Chinese leaders prompted by their disbelief in the possibility of socialism's economic victory over capitalism. We reaffirm the following thesis of the Policy Statement endorsed at the Congress of our Party in 1963: socialism does not want war nor does it need war, it will prove its superiority over capitalism in peaceful competition.

At our Congress we outlined the steps to be taken in the struggle for peace and democracy, for united action of the working class, for a broad alliance in defence of the constitutional and democratic rights of the people, for social rights and against monopoly rule. For it is only by stepping up the struggle for these immediate aims that a political change can be effected in the Federal Republic and conditions created in which the popular movement would be able to set more profound and far-reaching democratic and social aims and oust militarism and monopoly.

This path has been confirmed by the entire experience of the German working-class movement since the time of the Brussels Conference of the Communist Party in 1935. It has been reaffirmed by the truly historic victories scored on this path by the working people of the Democratic Republic under the leadership of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany.

Therefore, our Party resolutely condemns the attempt of the Chinese leaders to impose a sectarian, adventurist line on the working-class movement in the developed capitalist countries, the conditions of which they completely fail to understand. This policy runs counter to the decisions jointly adopted at the Moscow meetings of 1957 and 1960. The Communist and Workers' parties of these countries have won major victories in the struggle for peace, for the social and democratic demands of the working people, for profound social and democratic changes, for an all-embracing anti-monopoly movement of the people. The Leninist road leading the masses to the struggle for socialism is not the line of "revolutionary" phrasemongering, sectarianism and isolation from the masses, which has been proclaimed by the Chinese leaders, but the path of united action with the Social Democrats and all the democratic forces, the path of a broad alliance of all the anti-monopoly sections of the people in the struggle for peace and democracy, for ousting and defeating militarism and imperialism.

All facts show that the Communist parties have increased their influence by following this road, that by implementing this policy the militancy of the revolutionary working-class movement in the developed capitalist countries has been enhanced, despite the Chinese leaders' attempts to prove the opposite, and that this movement has become more mature both organizationally and ideologically.

Our Party steadfastly abides by the thesis of the Moscow meetings concerning the possibility of a peaceful road of the socialist revolution under specific historical conditions, and rejects the Chinese leaders' attacks on this thesis. We are guided by Lenin's idea that the revolutionary party of the working class should master all forms of the class struggle. At our Congress in 1963 we declared that our Party favours the peaceful road of the socialist revolution in the Federal Republic, and that the possibilities of taking this road are growing as the balance of forces is changing in favour of socialism, both in the world arena and in Germany. At the same time we said that the intensity and forms of class struggle will depend not so much on the working class as on the degree of resistance and use of violence by the reactionary forces.

Our Party indignantly rejects the slander levelled by the C.P.C. leadership at the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, its Central Committee and Comrade Khrushchov. This has nothing whatsoever in common with businesslike discussions customary among comrades, among Communists.

The Communist Party of Germany has long and glorious traditions of fraternal and militant alliance with the C.P.S.U., and it will not keep silence when the Party of Lenin is insulted and reviled. As the 1960 Statement points out, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union has been and remains the universally recognized vanguard of the world Communist movement. This movement regards its decisions and its Programme as the guiding documents of creative Marxism-Leninism.

Although in the past the Chinese leaders themselves recognized the historic importance of the decisions of the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. and of overcoming the personality cult and its consequences, today they claim that it was "erroneous and harmful" to raise this question. Developments after the Twentieth Congress and the experience of our own Party have demonstrated that overcoming the personality cult has yielded very fruitful results, that the restoration of the Leninist spirit and style in both theory and practice, the re-establishment of the Leninist standards of Party life, have freed the great cause of communism from mistakes and distortions caused by the Stalin cult, and have led to an unprecedented advance of the Soviet Union, the other socialist countries and the international working-class movement as a whole. The creative decisions of the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. ushered in a new stage in the development of the international Communist movement.

It is with great surprise that the Central Committee of the C.P.G. notes that the leadership of the C.P.C. grossly violates the principles guiding relations among fraternal parties, interferes in the internal affairs of other parties, including our own Party, and sets up factional groups, using the Trotskyites and other renegades to split the Communist parties. The Chinese leaders have launched similar splitting activities in the international democratic organizations. It is not fortuitous that the Bonn militarists use the materials issued by the Chinese leaders in order to discredit the policy of peace pursued by the Soviet Union and the G.D.R., to propagate their policy of armament and revenge, and also to sow confusion in the West German working-class movement. Thus the imperialist reactionaries derive direct benefit from the anti-Soviet slander and disruptive activity of the leadership of the Communist Party of China.

The Communist Party of Germany consistently works for the unity of the world Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and the agreed decisions of 1957 and 1960. We hope that the Chinese leaders will return to this path, and we will welcome this. The Central Committee of the C.P.G. believes that it would be expedient to accept the proposal of the C.P.S.U. and other fraternal parties on ending open polemics in order to discuss the differences in a businesslike and comradely atmosphere. Our Party also believes it essential to convene, as soon as possible, an international conference of the Communist and Workers' parties in order to make secure the unity of the world Communist movement on the fundamental positions of Marxism-Leninism.

The C.P.G. persistently fights against both revisionism which, in our conditions, seeks to disrupt our close and militant alliance with the S.U.P.G. and the G.D.R., and against Left opportunism, dogmatism and sectarianism which hinder the broad development of mass work.

The Central Committee calls on all Party organizations and all members to implement the decisions of the 1963 Congress of the Party and redouble their efforts so as to enable the working class and all peace-loving forces in the Federal Republic to make a worthy contribution to the world-wide struggle to safeguard and consolidate peace, for democracy and socialism.

For the Unity of the World Communist movement

Resolution adopted by the Fifth Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee, Communist Party of Greece (October 1963)

1. The Communists of all countries are deeply distressed by the situation created in the world Communist movement by the stand taken by the leaders of the Communist Party of China. Propounding anti-Marxist views and conducting disruptive activities, the C.P.C. leaders have embarked on a dangerous course threatening to split the world Communist movement. While hypocritically professing to agree with the line jointly elaborated by this movement the Chinese leaders are actually revising it and counterposing to it their own anti-Marxist dogmatic line. In conducting their subversive and disruptive activity they especially viciously attack and slander the C.P.S.U., the recognized and tested vanguard of the world Communist movement; they openly come out against the decisions of the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. which mark an important stage in the movement and have been unanimously endorsed by all the Communist and Workers' parties.

2. The Chinese leaders fail to see that the radical change in the balance of forces in favour of socialism makes it possible already in our time to avert a new world war. Not only do they not concede that the defence of peace is a basic issue of the day and the prime duty of all Communist and Workers' parties, but they are more and more openly opposing the policy of peaceful coexistence and international détente. This is evident from the attitude they have taken in recent years towards the efforts of the U.S.S.R. and other socialist countries to reduce international tension, from the deterioration of their relations with India, a great neutral country, and their adventuristic and wholly irresponsible position during the Caribbean crisis. This can also be seen from the hostility of the Chinese leaders to the Moscow Treaty, which is a victory for the peace forces and an important step towards détente. The Chinese leaders have gone so far as to describe the policy of peaceful coexistence consistently pursued by the U.S.S.R. and other socialist countries and even the heroic selfless struggle waged by the Communist and Workers' parties in the forefront of their peoples as betrayal and surrender to imperialism.

In our epoch, the epoch of nuclear weapons, the policy of peace and peaceful coexistence which the great Lenin advanced is the only way to rid humanity of the threat of thermonuclear catastrophe; the alternative facing mankind is either peaceful coexistence or thermonuclear annihilation. The Chinese leaders' claim that the policy of peace and peaceful coexistence is a brake on the development of the class struggle and revolutionary mass struggles has nothing in common with reality. It is precisely in the conditions of peaceful coexistence that a grand class struggle has been developing in the capitalist countries; in these conditions more than 50 countries have freed themselves from the fetters of colonialism and their peoples have embarked on building their independent nationhood. Thanks to the struggle waged by the socialist camp and the peoples of all countries, peaceful coexistence makes it more difficult for the imperialists to export counter-revolution and for the reactionaries generally to implant anti-communism and chauvinism, to foster militarism and to divert the people from struggle to resolve pressing national problems. The more durable the peace the more favourable the conditions for repelling the forces of fascism and defending and developing democracy.

To this profoundly humane Marxist-Leninist policy of peace consistently pursued by the Communist and Workers' parties the Chinese leaders counterpose the non-Marxist theory of impelling the peoples towards insurrection through war and the theory of export of revolution.

The viewpoint of the Chinese leaders, who declare that the peoples should not fear a thermonuclear catastrophe even if it means the destruction of half of humanity, and that a new, and a thousand times finer, civilization will thrive on the ruins left by thermonuclear war, is an outrageous distortion of the essence of socialism, which is permeated with the spirit of peace and humanism; it is defamation of Marxism.

The entire political line and activities of the Chinese leaders show that they have departed from the Leninist principles in the basic issue of our time, the issue of war and peace, that they have departed from the jointly elaborated line of the world Communist movement, that they are sinking deeper and deeper into the bog of dogmatism and sectarianism, that they have taken the road of political adventurism.

If the erroneous line of the Chinese leaders were to prevail in the question of war and peace, this would weaken the positions of socialism on a world scale, isolate the Communist and Workers' parties from the masses, and aggravate international relations; it would make it easier for the imperialists to plunge humanity in a thermonuclear disaster.

3. The leaders of the C.P.C. are revising the Leninist principle of the leading role of the international working class in the world revolutionary movement and the thesis of the Declaration and Statement of the Moscow meetings that the basic contradiction of our time is the contradiction between imperialism and socialism; they counterpose to this thesis the theory that the basic contradiction is now the contradiction between imperialism, on the one hand, and the colonial and dependent countries, on the other. Nobody questions the vast importance of the contradiction between imperialism and the colonial and dependent countries, but the fact remains that the development, outcome and the very fate of the national-liberation movement are inseparably linked with the existence and strengthening of the socialist camp, with the struggle waged by the international working class, and are determined by these factors.

The Chinese leaders use their utterly erroneous theory concerning the basic contradiction of our time to justify their thesis that the centre of the international revolutionary movement is not in the countries of the socialist camp but in countries waging the national-liberation struggle. On these grounds they seek to isolate the national-liberation struggle of the Asian, African and Latin American peoples and to set it against the international working class and the socialist camp. They cultivate nationalism, chauvinism and race discrimination. They seek to impose their hegemony and their anti-Marxist and adventurist policy on the world revolutionary movement. In pursuance of these ends, they are striving to make their country a nuclear power, completely ignoring the fact that this would leave the door open for the imperialists to disseminate nuclear weapons, for the nuclear arming of the West-German revenge-seekers and the Japanese militarists. The references to national defence with which the Chinese leaders seek to justify their aspirations do not hold water since it is common knowledge that the nuclear strength of the Soviet Union covers the defence needs of the entire socialist camp.

4. Failing to understand the new problems arising at the present stage of the anti-monopoly struggle, to comprehend the possibility of broad anti-monopoly alliances being formed and to appreciate the role and significance of the fight for democracy, the leaders of the C.P.C. accuse the Communist and Workers' parties of the capitalist countries which are pursuing a policy of anti-monopoly and democratic unity of having renounced the revolution. The Chinese leaders do not see the close connection between the struggle for democracy and the struggle to implement — on the basis of revolutionary mass activity — radical changes in the economic and political life of society, to curb the monopolies more and more and to remove them from power, and to win new positions in the fight for national independence and social progress. In a word, they fail to see that the struggle for democracy is an inseparable component of the struggle for socialism. Blind to the historical changes taking place in our time in favour of the forces of democracy and socialism, they refuse to concede the possibility of the socialist revolution being carried out, under certain circumstances, by peaceful means.

5. The personality cult, which is alien to Marxism and which caused so much damage to the world Communist movement and was condemned by all the Communist and Workers' parties, the C.P.C. included, today finds zealous defenders in the Chinese leaders. They represent the impermissible violations of socialist legality, arbitrary actions and crimes committed in the period of the Stalin cult as secondary, incidental and even inevitable mistakes attending the conquest of power by the working class. By means of this thesis they seek to justify the personality cult regime they maintain in their own country, to cover up their mistakes and the failure of their policy. The theoretical justification and practice of the personality cult by the Chinese leaders discredits socialism and brings grist to the mill of international reaction and Social Democracy, which represent the personality cult as something inherent in the socialist state.

6. The Chinese leaders distort the meaning of the correct thesis that in building socialism each socialist country should draw on its own forces and means, and propound the theory that these countries should build autonomous national economies and limit their relations with one another only to trade. By advocating such a policy they weaken the unity and the economic and political strength of the socialist camp.

7. The above theses, as well as a number of other erroneous anti-Marxist postulates advanced by the leaders of the C.P.C. in their letter of June 14, 1963, and other documents, stem from a lack of faith in the ability of the working class of China to build socialism in alliance with the peasantry, from a lack of faith in the possibility of the victory of the socialist system in peaceful competition with capitalism, from a lack of faith in the ability of the international working class to win in the conditions of peaceful coexistence. The views of the Chinese leaders coincide in many respects with the views of the Trotskyites, who did not believe that the working class was able, by its own forces, in alliance with the peasantry, to overcome the internal contradictions and difficulties encountered in the building of socialism, and searched for a way out in war, in "permanent" revolution. It is not fortuitous that international Trotskyism welcomes and supports these views of the Chinese leaders.

8. As their ideological differences with the international Communist movement deepen, the Chinese leaders are intensifying their subversive and disruptive activity. The fact that they have carried the ideological differences into democratic non-party organizations, their inexcusable attacks and subversive activity against the C.P.S.U. and other fraternal parties, the slander, misrepresentation and invective they have resorted to in their hostile sallies against fraternal parties, interference in the affairs of Communist parties, the encouragement they give to renegades and factionalists and their efforts to recruit turncoats in various countries — all this shows that the leaders of the C.P.C. have gone beyond the bounds of Party ethics and violated the standards accepted in the world Communist movement. The fact that they are carrying the differences into the sphere of relations between states is particularly harmful and dangerous, as is their hostile attitude to the Moscow Treaty. All this shows that dogmatism and sectarianism have become the main danger in the world Communist movement today.

9. The erroneous sectarian and dogmatic positions of the C.P.C. are refuted also by the experience of the Communist Party of Greece. The dogmatic, sectarian policy of the former leaders of the Greek Communist Party had a harmful effect on the working-class and democratic movement. This policy was the main reason for the defeat of the popular democratic movement which remained strong even after intervention by the British imperialists, and for many years it was a serious impediment to the reorganization and regrouping of the democratic forces as well as the forces of the Communist Party. It was the predominance of dogmatism and sectarianism in the Communist Party of Greece that explained the rise of the personality cult which acquired dangerous forms and led to an abnormal situation in the Party — a situation marked by gross violation of the Leninist standards of Party life, diminution of the role of the Central Committee, and persecution and elimination of rank-and-file members and functionaries.

The historic decisions of the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. had a salutary effect on the democratic and working-class movement in our country. In the light of these decisions, the Sixth Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee (1956) rectified the sectarian and adventurist line taken previously, and outlined the correct policy. The meeting corrected the previous erroneous orientation on the socialist revolution as the immediate objective and established that the immediate revolutionary changes in Greece were bound to be of an anti-imperialist, democratic nature. Proceeding from this correct orientation, the Communist Party of Greece made it the central aim of its political activity to build a broad patriotic and democratic front of struggle for national independence, for the restoration of democracy and for peace. With the conditions generally more favourable owing to the consistent policy of peace pursued by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, this line enabled our Party to win important positions and to play a decisive part in promoting the democratic movement. The advance of the movement could be seen, in particular, in the growth of the popular mass struggle, which acquired after the 1961 electoral coup a scale unprecedented in the postwar period, leading to the fall of the Karamanlis government and ushering in an open crisis of the regime of national betrayal.

10. From the very beginning the Communist Party of Greece condemned the erroneous dogmatic positions and disruptive activities of the Chinese leaders. It unreservedly supports the C.P.S.U. and the other fraternal parties in the struggle for the unity of the world Communist movement on the basis of the Leninist principles and decisions of the Moscow meetings. The Communist Party of Greece most resolutely condemns the outrageous campaign of lies and provocations conducted by the Chinese leaders against the C.P.S.U. and the Soviet Union. These attacks against the glorious Party of Lenin and the first socialist country, which have always displayed true and unwavering devotion to the principles of proletarian internationalism, and which, selflessly and in the spirit of fraternal solidarity, have helped the peoples in their struggle to free themselves from imperialist slavery and to build a new life, show how low the Chinese leaders have fallen in their anti-internationalism.

The Fifth Plenary Meeting stresses that while there should be no let-up in the struggle against revisionism, which remains the main danger in our country, it is imperative to strengthen and systematize ideological work and the struggle against dogmatism, the danger of which is increasing in our country too as a result of the subversive activities of the Chinese leaders. The Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee believes that in the interests of the unity of the world Communist movement which the leaders of the C.P.C. are undermining it is necessary to put an end to the open polemic in this movement in order to prepare the ground for an international conference. However, so long as the Chinese leaders continue their attacks against the line jointly elaborated by the international Communist movement and keep up their subversive and disruptive activity, the Communist Party of Greece, like the other Marxist-Leninist parties, will consider it its duty to intensify the struggle to isolate all those who would revise the jointly elaborated line of the world Communist movement and persist in their efforts to split this movement. This is the precondition for effective struggle against imperialism, for the victory of the forces of peace, democracy and socialism.

On the Differences Within the World Communist Movement

(Resolution of Central Committee, East Pakistan Communist Party, March 5, 1963)

Certain differences have become apparent within the world Communist movement — such as the differences between the Communist parties of the Soviet Union, China and some other parties. It has not happened today. It has been going on for the last few years.

In 1956, at the Twentieth Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (C.P.S.U.) four new and important decisions were taken. They are: (a) due to the emergence of socialism as a world system, the birth of many newly independent peace-loving states, the mighty advance of the peace-loving forces of the world and their joint efforts, a time has come when the attempts of the imperialists to start war can be curbed and war can be prevented; (b) the real possibility of peaceful coexistence between capitalist and socialist states has arisen; (c) in some of the capitalist countries the possibility of peaceful transition from capitalism to socialism exists; and (d) to fight against some of the mistakes of Comrade Stalin, especially against the personality cult.

These decisions of the Twentieth Congress of C.P.S.U. initiated a great deal of discussion in the international Communist movement and on certain questions differences arose in some of the Communist parties.

Under these circumstances, in November 1957 a conference of the representatives of the Twelve Communist and Workers' parties of the countries where the working class is in power, including the representatives of the Communist parties of the Soviet Union and China, was held in Moscow. The conference unanimously adopted and issued a Declaration relating to the analysis of the international situation and the tasks confronting the world Communist movement.

The Declaration of 1957 stated that today it is possible to prevent war and that the possibility exists for some of the capitalist countries of peaceful (without civil war) transition to socialism. It also stated that the decisions of the Twentieth Congress of C.P.S.U. had further developed and brought up-to-date the Leninist principle of peaceful coexistence between the capitalist and socialist countries. The foreign policy of the socialist countries rests on the firm foundation of the Leninist principle of peaceful coexistence between the two social systems.

But later differences again arose among some of the Communist parties, especially between the parties of the Soviet Union and China, regarding the interpretation of the basic propositions of the Declaration. These differences were openly put forward.

Faced with this situation, in November 1960 a conference of the representatives of 81 Communist and Workers' parties was held in Moscow to settle the differences through collective discussions, consultation and exchange of mutual experiences. After three weeks of prolonged discussion, the conference unanimously issued an explanatory Statement. The Statement expressed its allegiance to the Declaration of 1957 adopted by twelve parties and declared that the historic decisions of the Twentieth Congress of C.P.S.U. had initiated a new stage in the world Communist movement and had promoted its development on the basis of Marxism-Leninism. All the Communist and Workers' parties resolved to abide by the evaluations and decisions regarding the general programme of the struggle against imperialism and for peace, socialism and democracy put forward by the Statement of the 81-Party conference.

Regarding Our Acceptance of the Moscow Statement

Our Central Committee unanimously accepted the 81-Party Statement. On October 24th, 1961, our Central Committee adopted a resolution in this respect. Our understanding of the formulations of the Statement, viz., concerning war and peace, peaceful coexistence and peaceful competition between socialism and capitalism, peaceful (without civil war) transition to socialism, the tasks facing the newly independent countries at the present stage, the role of the national bourgeoisie of those countries, etc., was stated in the resolution. The resolution has been circulated within the Party. (Discussion regarding the 81-Party Statement, 24. 10. 61.)

But at present acute differences have again openly arisen among different Communist parties, especially between the Communist parties of the Soviet Union and China, regarding the interpretation and significance of the propositions of the 81 parties' Statement. This has naturally given rise to various questions and confusion within our party. Moreover, after the unanimous acceptance of the twelve parties' Declaration of 1957 and the 81 parties' Statement of 1960, differences are again arising between the two great Communist parties of the world — the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Communist Party of China. It is apparent from this that there are fundamental differences between the two parties. It is therefore all the more necessary to express our opinion clearly on the questions on which the differences have arisen.

Of course, however deep the differences may be, there is no disagreement as regards the basic objective of establishing socialism and communism throughout the whole world. We think that the differences concern some important theoretical questions relating to the attainment of that objective. There is no reason for any apprehension and anxiety that due to these differences the international Communist movement will fall apart. On the contrary, Marxism-Leninism will emerge out of this controversy all the more developed.

Questions on Which There Are Differences

The Communist parties of both the Soviet Union and China are great parties. Both have great experience. It is not possible for us to collect all the arguments and points that they have put forward in support of their respective views and to review and analyze them thoroughly. Hence, we are stating our own opinion regarding those basic questions which we believe have given rise to the differences. In this connection it is necessary to state that our Party is a small party. Experience of the revolutionary struggle, understanding of Marxism-Leninism and resources — in all these respects our strength is limited. We bear this fully in mind as we state our opinion.

We have received some articles published by the Communist parties of the Soviet Union and China. We have deeply thought over those articles before stating our opinion, and have drawn on the decisions of the Twentieth Congress of C.P.S.U., the Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960 to arrive at our decision.

As we understand it, the issues on which there now are differences between the Communist parties of the Soviet Union and China are: (1) The possibility of preventing war and establishing peace and how to realize it; (2) peaceful coexistence and peaceful economic competition between the two social systems; (3) peaceful (without civil war) transition to socialism; (4) the attitude of the socialist countries towards the national-liberation movement of the dependent countries and the newly independent countries; (5) Soviet policy and activities at the time of the Cuban crisis; (6) the Sino-Indian border conflict; (7) the policy of the socialist countries towards Yugoslavia and its leadership and (8) the role of the Albanian leadership and their relation with other parties and socialist countries.

Firstly, it is necessary to state that the Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960 are two documents relating to the strategy and tactics of the world communist movement. All the Communist parties of the world — at whatever stage they may be — have accepted the propositions of these two documents as the guiding principles for all their activities. Every Party must abide by the decisions of these documents.

Secondly, the propositions put foward in the Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960 regarding the prevention of war, the possibility of establishing peace, peaceful coexistence and peaceful economic competition, the possibility of peaceful transition to socialism and other matters, we Communists cannot regard as mere temporary tactics or methods for achieving temporary gain. They are the basic policies of the present-day international Communist movement. The Communists cannot renounce these policies for any temporary gain, any temporary reasons or on any provocation. Only honest and correct pursuance of these policies can lead to the abolition of capitalism and imperialism, to the well-being of the people, to the advancement of socialism and the establishment of communism under the leadership of the working class.

Thirdly, we also think that the 81 parties' Statement leaves no doubt as to the possibilities of peaceful coexistence and of preventing war. Though the danger of war exists, at present war can be averted. This is a real possibility which was positively and unequivocally put forward. It was categorically stated that the concrete and positive tasks confronting the Communists are to work for the materialization of these possibilities into actual realities. In the Statement there is no scope for any kind of negative or uncertain attitude.

War and Peace

War is a constant companion of capitalism and imperialism. Communists are always against war. At the time of the First World War, the Communists under the leadership of Lenin, in order to resist and put an end to the war, raised the slogan of "turning the imperialist war into civil war". At the end of the first world war, with the emergence of the first socialist country in the world a new situation arose. Lenin in that situation advanced a new policy for determining the relations between different states — the policy of peaceful coexistence in place of the policy of violence and application of force. The Soviet Union from the very day of its birth worked tirelessly to ensure the success of this policy and to prevent a Second World War. But due to the then prevailing circumstances, these efforts of the Soviet Union were not fruitful.

After Second World War, socialism expanded, many new countries became free and the crisis of imperialism deepened. On the other hand, the imperialist clique under the leadership of American imperialism, the arch enemy of the people of the world, has been carrying on preparations for a third world war. Moreover, the discovery and development of nuclear weapons have greatly increased the devastating character of the war. If war were to break out today, human civilization would be in danger. This is not a halluciation of a panic-stricken mind. This is the actual reality.

On this background the Statement of 1960 declares that "the problem of war and peace is the most burning problem of our time"... Imperialism has already inflicted two devastating world wars on mankind and is now threatening to plunge it into an even more terrible catastrophe by starting a third world war. More than once in the past years the imperialists, by starting local wars, have brought mankind to the brink of world disaster. It is the policy of the imperialists, especially the American imperialists, to keep the world always "on the brink of war".

If war breaks out today it will be a thermo-nuclear war which will cause unheard-of destruction to entire countries. It will reduce the key centres of world industry and culture to ruins. It will bring death and boundless suffering to hundreds of millions of people. Countries not directly involved in it will also not be spared the cataclysm. Imperialism spells grave danger to the whole of mankind. Today any war between states may develop into such a devastating world war. The peoples must now be more vigilant than ever about this menace of war.

History has placed a great responsibility for warding off imperialist war provocations and averting a new world war, first and foremost, on the international working class. The Communists have always fought for peace and under the present circumstances they regard the fight for peace, as their prime and main task. "The Communists regard it as their historical mission not only to abolish exploitation and poverty on a world scale and rule out for all time the possibility of any kind of war in the life of human society but also to deliver mankind from the nightmare of a new world war already in our time..."

"The democratic and peace forces today have no task more pressing than that of safeguarding humanity against a global thermo-nuclear disaster."

Today there is also a real possibility of preventing war. It was absent before. It is true that as long as imperialism exists there will be the soil for war, and that the nature of imperialism does not change. But today war is not inevitable as it was before. Those days are gone when the imperialists could decide at will whether there should be war or not. In the world today real forces have appeared, such as the strength and unity of the socialist camp, the rise in the intensity of the national-liberation movement, the many victories won in the struggle for national independence and the breakdown of the colonial system, the increase in the strength of the peace forces, etc., which are capable of foiling the imperialists' plans of war. Moreover, some sections of the bourgeoisie in the advanced capitalist countries as well do not want war and seek peace. Some incidents of the past few years have proved that war can be prevented by the joint efforts of the socialist world camp, the international working class, the national-liberation movement, all the countries opposing war and all peace-loving forces.

of 1957 and the Statement of 1960 specifically put forward before the international Communist and working-class movement this new possibility of preventing war and called upon them to wage a struggle for the materialization of this possibility. Some people interpret the Declaration and the Statement as placing equal emphasis on "both possibilities", of war and of peace, and hence hold that a "policy of action" must be adopted to meet both of them.

In our understanding such an interpretation of the Declaration and the Statement is erroneous. It is true that the danger of war exists and this danger has grown. We must always be alert and vigilant against this danger. The might and the defence arrangements of the socialist countries must be strengthened. And should the imperialist maniacs start war, the people will sweep capitalism out of existence and bury it. But the Declaration and the Statement nowhere stress the "equal" possibility of both war and peace. On the other hand, these documents pose the possibility of establishing peace realistically, unequivocally stating that it is the positive task of the Communists to fight to avert war, to work for the materialization of the possibility of preventing war into an actual reality.

Today the Communists must realize the positive responsibilities of preventing war and of establishing peace that rest upon them. If instead, the Communists think that there are equal possibilities of both war and peace "and pursue a policy of action to meet both possibilities", this will actually lead to an arms race and the intensification of the cold war. The Communists cannot adopt such a policy. Only the imperialists pursue the policies of "cold war" and "keep the world at the brink of war". Pursuing this policy the imperialists increase international tension, mislead the people by taking advantage of this, and, increasing arms production, pave the way for the big monopoly capitalists to pocket enormous profits. Following this policy the imperialists are impelling the world towards the path of war. The Communists have always rejected this dangerous policy of cold war. They regard it as their responsibility to work for the lessening of international tension as an integral part of their duty of preserving world peace. Hence the Communists cannot adopt any "policy of action" that might lead to the intensification of the "cold war" and international tension.

Today there is the real possibility of preventing war and establishing peace. It is not for the Communists to create any confusion on this score. On the contrary, they must create confidence amongst the masses in this real possibility and arouse them to the struggle for peace.

The Communists do not want war; they fight against war, for peace. But this does not imply the renunciation of the national-liberation struggle of the dependent countries against imperialism, of the revolutionary class struggle against the reactionary ruling clique in any country, or of civil war if it is imposed by that ruling clique. By the word "war" alone, the Communists mean war between states. The word "war" has been used in this sense in the report of the Twentieth Congress of C.P.S.U., in the Declaration of 1957 and in the Statement of 1960. We must bear in mind the difference between war waged between states and liberation struggle, revolutionary class struggle and civil war. The Communists oppose war. But they justify and support the liberation struggle of the oppressed peoples, the class struggle of the working class and the masses against reaction inside a country, and civil war. If by preventing war peace can be maintained, favourable conditions are provided for the development of the national--liberation struggle of the oppressed people and the class struggle or civil war of the people in the varous capitalist countries. On the other hand, the liberation struggle and the class struggle or civil war weaken the position of imperialism and capitalism and immensely contribute to the prevention of war and establishment of peace. So, as an integral part of their struggle for foiling the imperialist war efforts and for establishing world peace, the Communists must always support the liberation struggle of the oppressed peoples and the revolutionary class struggle or civil war in the capitalist countries. The Twentieth Congress of C.P.S.U., the Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960 have placed this lesson before us.

The U.S. imperialists are the main instigators of war and the main enemy of the people of the world. To resist all the war efforts of the imperialists and indefatigably to expose their policy of aggression against other countries, their policy of war, to keep a watchful eye on the intrigues and manoeuvres of the imperialists, to rouse the hatred of the people against the warmongers, to organize the peace forces still better, continuously to intensify the mass actions for peace, to intensify the liberation struggle of the oppressed nations, to promote co-operation between the socialist countries and those countries which have no interest in war and to struggle for the removal of war bases from those countries where the imperialists have established such bases — these are struggles for preventing war and establishing peace.

To achieve peace, the Soviet Union has put forward the demands for complete and general disarmament, abolition of the nuclear war bases, dismantling of military blocs, conclusion of a peace treaty with both Germanies, etc. It is the duty of the Communists of all countries to mobilize public opinion in support of these demands and thereby force the imperialists to accept them.

We must bear in mind that peace will not come by itself. Peace will not be achieved due to a "change of heart" on the part of the imperialists. Peace can only be achieved by waging a relentless battle against the imperialist warmongers at every step.

Peaceul Co-existence And Economic Competition

It is one of the basic policies of the socialist countries to work for the prevention of war and for the preservation of peace. Thus, "the foreign policy of the socialist countries rests on the firm foundation of the Leninist principle of peaceful coexistence and economic competition between the socialist and capitalist countries". This principle implies the settlement of the international disputes through negotiation, respect for the equality of states, respect for the territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty of states, non-interference in each other's internal affairs, extensive development of trade and cultural and scientific ties between nations and peaceful competition to decide which of the two social systems — socialism or capitalism — is superior.

After the birth of the Soviet Union, Lenin advanced the principle of peaceful coexistence. Lenin then uttered the prophetic words that the socialist countries would influence the development of the world revolution chiefly by their economic construction. Today Lenin's prediction has been fully borne out. The economic construction of the socialist countries and their development are causing revolutionary transformation in the world. It is positively and directly proving the superiority of socialism over capitalism day in and day out and turning the socialist camp into an invincible fortress.

The development of socialism is influencing the people of the world more and more. The disinterested help rendered by the socialist camp is encouraging the newly independent countries to free themselves from the influence of the imperialists and to take to the path of independent development; it is influencing the democratic sections of the people of every country. We can see this process going on in our country too.

It is said in the Statement of 1960 that "in a world divided into two systems (socialism and capitalism) the only correct and reasonable principle of international relations is the principle of peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems advanced by Lenin ... Peaceful coexistence of countries with different systems or destructive war — this is the alternative today. There is no other choice."

It is also said in the Statement that "in conditions of peace (as a result of peaceful coexistence) the socialist system increasingly reveals its advantages over the capitalist system in all fields of economy, culture, science and technology. The near future will bring the forces of peace and socialism new successes. The U.S.S.R. will become the leading industrial power of the world. China will become a mighty industrial state. The socialist system will be turning out more than half the world industrial product. The peace zone will expand. The working-class movement in the capitalist countries and the national-liberation movement in the colonies and dependencies will achieve new victories. The disintegration of the colonial system will be completed. The superiority of the forces of socialism and peace will be absolute. In these conditions a real possibility will have arisen to exclude world war from the life of society even before socialism achieves complete victory on the Earth, with capitalism still existing in a part of the world." Though war is a constant companion of capitalism, capitalism will then become so weak in relation to the forces of socialism and peace that it will not be possible for capitalism to wage a war. "The victory of socialism all over the world will completely remove the social and national causes of wars."

The Statement of 1960 also stated that throughout the world today a struggle is going on between two social systems — a struggle in which the superiority of the socialist system is becoming increasingly obvious.

The significance of these formulations of the Statement of 1960 should be thoroughly realised. It should be borne in mind that the present time is the time of the triumph of socialism and communism on a world-wide scale. Today time is working for socialism against capitalism.

Socialism does not need any war to expand. Never has war given birth to socialism. Though socialism emerged and expanded during the first and second world wars, it would be wrong to think that socialism was established and expanded through war. Socialism has emerged and expanded due to the internal socio-economic conditions of the capitalist countries. Nevertheless, the overwhelming crisis that the imperialists faced at the time of the first and second world wars facilitated the victory of the socialist revolution. But today the imperialists are facing an unprecedented crisis without any war. The existence of the socialist system in the world and its great might, the rise in the intensity of the national-liberation struggle, the disintegration of the colonial system — these are the factors which have resulted in this crisis of the imperialists.

On the other hand, today people in every country are being drawn towards socialism through their own experience.

The working class on its own initiative will establish socialism in each country. This is the objective law of revolution. In this respect, the existence of the socialist system in the world, the economic prosperity of the socialist countries, the actual proof of the superiority of socialism over capitalism and the deep crisis of the imperialists are encouraging and inspiring the oppressed peoples in all countries more and more to fight for socialism. In conditions of peace the socialist countries will achieve undreamed of prosperity and under its influence the people's fight will be intensified in every country and their victory will be hastened. The experience of our country too confirms that the maintenance of peace in the international arena creates favourable conditions for our struggle for the consolidation of independence and the establishment of democracy.

Peace and peaceful coexistence, then, pave the way for victory in the struggle for socialism and democracy. This policy strengthens the positions of socialism, enhances the prestige and the international influence of the socialist countries and promotes the prestige and influence of the Communist parties in the capitalist countries. On the other hand, war brings immense destruction to mankind. Hence the policy of peaceful coexistence accords with the interests of mankind as a whole.

The question may arise: if a policy of peaceful coexistence between socialist and capitalist countries is pursued, what will be the position of the class struggle in the capitalist countries and the liberation struggle of the oppressed peoples against the imperialists? Will the Communists not continue these struggles or support them? Moreover, what will be the form of the fundamental contradiction that exists between the socialist countries and the capitalist countries in the international arena?

The Statement of 1960 answers all these questions. The Statement says: "The policy of peaceful coexistence is a policy of mobilizing the masses and launching vigorous action against the enemies of peace. Peaceful coexistence of states does not imply renunciation of the class struggle as the revisionists claim. The coexistence of states with different social systems is a form of class struggle between socialism and capitalism. In conditions of peaceful coexistence favourable opportunities are provided for the development of the class struggle in the capitalist countries and the national-liberation movement of the peoples of the colonial and dependent countries. In their turn, the successes of the revolutionary class and national-liberation struggle promote peaceful coexistence."

Thus, the policy of peaceful coexistence does not mean renouncing the class struggle in the capitalist countries or the liberation struggle of the dependent countries. These struggles should be intensified to consolidate peaceful coexistence.

The Statement also points out that "peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems does not mean conciliation of the socialist and bourgeois ideologies. On the contrary, it implies intensification of the struggle of the working class, of all the Communist Parties, for the triumph of socialist ideas."

Moreover, economic competition also will continue between the socialist and capitalist countries. Thus, peaceful coexistence implies the continuation of the ideological and economic competition between the socialist and capitalist systems. It is a form of class struggle between the two social systems in the international arena. But this class struggle will not assume the form of war. "Ideological and political disputes between states must not be settled through war."

The Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960 have firmly stated the Leninist policy of peaceful coexistence in the sphere of the foreign policy of the Socialist countries. The Communists uphold the principle of coexistence resolutely. For this reason the Communists tirelessly fight "for the complete cessation of the cold war, disbanding of military blocs and dismantling of military bases, for general and complete disarmament under international control, the settlement of international disputes through negotiation, respect for the equality of states and their territorial integrity, independence and sovereignty, non-interference in each other's internal affairs, extensive development of trade, cultural and scientific ties between nations."

We believe that the Soviet Union and other Socialist countries are faithfully pursuing this policy of the Declaration and the Statement in relation to foreign affairs.

The Cuban Question

In this connection the question of the justification of the Soviet action in sending missiles to Cuba and withdrawing them afterwards arises.

To ward off the imminent attack of the U.S. imperialists the Socialist Cuban Government requested the Soviet Government to send missiles there. The Soviet Government, by despatching missiles to Cuba for Cuban self-defence, fulfilled its internationalist responsibility. It can not be regarded as an adventurist action. The Cuban Government was apprehensive that if the Soviet Government did not directly come forward to the aid of Cuba in this way, the U.S. imperialists might attack at any time. In such a situation the Soviet Union did the right thing by sending missiles there. There was no other way open to defend Cuba.

When in became known that the Soviet missiles had been stationed in Cuba for her defence, President Kennedy ordered U.S. warship to blockade Cuba and made preparations for war. At the same time he, in a letter to the Soviet Premier, put forward the suggestion that if the Soviet Government withdrew missiles from Cuba, the U.S.A. would not attack that country. The Soviet Union accepted the compromise proposal.

This compromise of the Soviet Government with the Government of Kennedy can under no circumstances be termed a "display of weakness" or "capitulation" in the face of imperialist threats. Such a compromise accords with the policy of peaceful coexistence. The solution of all differences by peaceful means through compromise and negotiation — this is precisely one of the basic elements of the policy of peaceful coexistence. When the necessity arises, one has to enter into compromises with the imperialists. But the compromises must be in conformity with the interests of the people.

In the case of the compromise on Cuba, the people's interests were safeguarded. Firstly, the independence of Cuba was preserved and safeguarded. The danger of imminent attack on Cuba by the U.S. imperialists was removed. No doubt, it has not been removed forever. But today the imperialists have had positive proof that if they attack Cuba, they too will have to risk paying a heavy price. In the circumstances the hotheaded imperialists will have to think twice before considering another attack on Cuba. This action of the Soviet government saved the people of Cuba from a devastating war. Moreover, the existence of Cuba and her progress in socialist construction with the help of the socialist camp will continue to influence the whole of the Western hemisphere. The Soviet Union has positively demonstrated that the socialist system is a guarantee of the existence of Cuba.

Secondly, the acceptance of this compromise proposal by the Soviet government removed the danger of war created around the Cuban situation. The actions of the Soviet government at the time of the Cuban crisis, the heroic struggles of the socialist government of Cuba and her people on the basis of their fivepoint demand, and the strong protest by the whole socialist camp and the peace-loving people of the world against the aggressive designs of the U.S. imperialists once again foiled the U.S.A. conspiracy to attack Cuba and provoke a war. Mankind welcomed the avoidance of a world war with a sigh of relief. The faith of people throughout the world in the peace policy of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries was strengthened. This is a great achievement.

To keep missiles in Cuba after Kennedy's assurance that the U.S.A. would not attack Cuba would have been tantamount to pursuing a policy of "brinkmanship". Such a policy would not have benefited the people of Cuba. On the contrary, it would have increased the danger of war. It would have been an act of adventurism.

Hence the compromise of the Soviet government with the government of Kennedy in regard to the Cuban crisis was justified. However, in this connection there is a question in the mind of some friends: did the Soviet government consult the Cuban government in all these matters or did it take unilateral decisions? Some friends also believe that the Cuban government too has expressed disagreement with the Soviet method of work. These questions can be settled through mutual discussion between the governments of the two socialist countries — the Soviet Union and Cuba.

On the whole, we think that in regard to the Cuban question the basic policy followed by the Soviet government was correct.

Various Forms of Transition to Socialism

Before the Twentieth Congress of C.P.S.U. we held the view that the working class can seize power only by non-peaceful means (civil war). We held that any struggle for the seizure of power was bound to be non-peaceful. It was also by non-peaceful means that the working class actually seized power in different countries.

But at the present age a new possibility has been created. After the Second World War a radical transformation has taken place in the world. Now the imperialists can no longer dictate the events of the world. In one-third of the world, the people are building socialism. Against this background, the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U., the Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960 put forward before the international working-class movement a new possibility — that of peaceful transition to socialism in our time.

These documents stress the fact that "the working class and its vanguard — the Marxist-Leninist Party — seek to achieve the socialist revolution by peaceful means. This would accord with the interests of the working class and the people as a whole, with the national interests of the country."

It is pointed out in these documents that today opportunities have been created in a number of capitalist countries for the working class to seize power by peaceful means. The unity of the working class, a united mass front, the broad unity of the people etc., are essential to seize power by peaceful means without civil war and to ensure the transfer of the basic means of production into the hands of the people. Under these circumstances the working class by defeating the reactionary anti-popular forces can secure a firm majority in Parliament, launch an extra-parliamentary mass struggle, transform Parliament from an instrument serving the class interests of the bourgeoisie into an instrument serving the working people, smash the resistance of the reactionary forces and create necessary conditions for the realization of socialism by peaceful means. "All this will be possible only by broad and ceaseless development of the class struggle of the workers, peasant masses and the urban middle strata against big monopoly capital, against reaction, for profound social reforms, for peace and socialism."

This aspect of the possibility of peaceful transition to socialism in the present epoch should be correctly understood. It does not imply that seizure of power and transition to socialism will be possible by a sheer majority of votes in Parliament, without the class struggle of the workers and peasants against the exploiters and the united struggle of the people against the reactionary ruling clique. To understand it in this light would be a grave error. On the contrary, these documents declare that in the context of ceaseless and broad development of the class struggle of the workers, peasants and urban middle strata, the working class can gain a majority in the Parliament and, by transforming the bourgeois Parliament into an instrument serving the interests of the working people, create conditions for the transition to socialism by peaceful means, avoiding a civil war.

Today the forces of socialism and democracy have gained unprecedented strength throughout the whole world. Today socialism has become a world system and capitalism is weaker than before. The achievements of socialism are drawing the workers, peasants and intelligentsia of the capitalist world towards socialism. The ideas of socialism are conquering the minds of the working people and exerting an influence on broad sections of the people. The ideal of socialism is also influencing the bureaucracy, the police and the army of the capitalist countries.

In these conditions, in the context of a broad and ceaseless struggle of the people, a situation may arise in a number of capitalist countries when the reactionary ruling clique will be unable to use fully even the bureaucracy and the army against the people; in such a situation the possibility of the working class seizing power and transition to socialism without civil war will arise.

Some friends question this possibility and argue that until now nowhere in the world has the working class been able to seize power peacefully. Moreover, the more the reactionary ruling clique will be isolated the more desperate they will be. Because of this it is unlikely that seizure of power by peaceful means will be possible in any country.

In reply, it can be said that it is wrong to argue that what has not happened in the past will not happen in the future. Human society changes and it has already witnessed many changes. Even in the first decade of the Twentieth Century there was no socialism in the world. Today socialism has become a world system. More than one hundred years ago, when socialist society did not exist anywhere, Marx, perceiving the basic laws of socio-economic development, predicted its victory. In the same way today, after observing the political, social and economic changes that have taken and are taking place, the possibility of transition to socialism by peaceful means in a number of capitalist countries is being put forward. In this connection it can be mentioned that at one stage of the Russian revolution, Lenin also spoke about the possibility of the seizure of power by peaceful means. Consequently, today when the socialist forces have made great advance and capitalism is becoming weaker every day, the possibility of the "seizure of power by peaceful means in a number of capitalist countries can not be ruled out".

But this does not imply that it will be possible to seize power in all the countries by peaceful means alone. It was categorically stated at the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. and in the Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960 that in the event of the exploiting classes resorting to violence against the people, the possibility of non-peaceful transition to socialism must be borne in mind. "Leninism teaches and experience confirms that the ruling classes never relinquish power voluntarily. In this case the degree of bitterness and the forms of the class struggle will depend not so much on the proletariat as on the resistance put up by the reactionary circles to the will of the overwhelming majority of the people, on these circles using force at one or other stage of the struggle for socialism.

"The actual possibility of the one or the other way of transition to socialism in each individual country depends on the concrete historical conditions."

Whatever the way of transition to socialism, it is certain that without the firm unity of the workers and the toiling peasantry and their ceaseless class struggle under the leadership of the working class and its Party, there is no possibility of seizure of power and transition to socialism. Moreover, Marxism-Leninism teaches us that in order successfully to carry out the socialist revolution, the working-class party must acquire the skill of waging all forms of struggle, peaceful and non-peaceful, parliamentary and extra-parliamentary, and must be prepared to pass over very quickly from one form to another.

Attitude Towards the National-Liberation Struggle and the Newly Independent States

The socialist countries are the true and sincere friends of the peoples fighting for liberation and the countries which have thrown off the imperialist yoke.

It is the duty of the socialist countries to help in all respects the countries still suffering from colonial enslavement to attain their national independence. The abolition of colonialism will be of great importance in easing international tension, abolishing imperialism, and consolidating universal peace.

Some friends have some doubts as to whether the Soviet Union is giving proper help to the liberation struggles of the different oppressed nations. But we find no reason for any such doubt. We note with pleasure and pride that the Soviet Union, China and other socialist countries are giving all possible support — political, diplomatic, economic and even military — to the struggles for independence of the nations enslaved by imperialism. We have witnessed this role of the Soviet Union, China and other socialist countries in the liberation struggle of Algeria, in Laos, on the question of the liberation of Goa and West Irian, and other cases.

The socialist countries recognise the sovereignty of the newly independent young states. On principle they reject any kind of interference in the internal affairs of these countries. Moreover, the Communists consider it their international duty to help these peoples consolidate their independence. They help and support these countries wholeheartedly in achieving progress, creating a national industry, developing and consolidating the national economy and training national personnel.

These countries are opposed to war and imperialism and seek to ensure their independent national development. The Communists cooperate with these countries in the struggle for world peace and against imperialist aggression.

All the socialist countries, the international working class and the international Communist movement consider it their responsibility to render moral and material assistance to those peoples who are fighting to free themselves from the imperialist and colonial tyranny. But the Communists do not believe in the export of revolution. At the same time they fight resolutely against the imperialist export of counter-revolution. The choice of social system is the inalienable right of the people in each country. The Communists are opposed to the export of both revolution and counter-revolution from the outside.

The Communists consider it their internationalist duty to call on the peoples of all countries to unite, to rally all their internal forces, to act vigorously to prevent or firmly resist imperialist interference in the affairs of any people who have risen in revolution. These peoples can fully depend on the mighty socialist camp for all kinds of help in resisting such interferences.

We found the Soviet Union and other socialist countries performing this role in helping revolutions and in resisting imperialist interference in countries like Egypt, Syria, Iraq, Laos, Cuba and Yemen.

To help the young states in their national development, to help them to free themselves from the bondage of imperialist economy, means creating mighty opposition to imperialist colonial exploitation. Though these countries do not belong to the socialist social system, the socialist countries render them aid with no strings attached whenever such assistance is needed to develop their independent national economy and raise the standard of living of the people. The independent development of these countries does not strengthen world imperialism but weakens it. The fight of these countries against joining the imperialist war blocs helps to preserve their independence as well as to resist world war.

We think that the Soviet Union and other socialist countries in rendering assistance to India, Egypt, Iraq and other countries are clearly pursuing this policy, we think that the efforts of the socialist countries to render help to our country, even though it is closely connected with the imperialists and also belongs to various imperialist military blocs, are quite justified. The assistance of the socialist countries will strengthen our economy, weaken the domination of imperialist economy, help raise the standard of living of the people and increase the appeal of socialism for our people. This will weaken the positions of the imperialists in our country and thus also help the work of resisting world war.

This policy of the socialist states towards the young states is a form of international class struggle against imperialism. It leads to the defeat of imperialism and ensures the advance and victory of socialism.

Sino-Indian Border Conflict

Now let us discuss the questions that have been raised regarding the Sino-Indian border conflict.

The armed conflict that recently took place between China and India was nothing but a border conflict. China is a socialist country. The fundamental basis of the foreign policy of China is peace, peaceful coexistence and friendship with young independent states. She neither did nor can follow a policy or plan of action to conquer Indian territory by invading her. By unilateral declaration of a cease fire in the border conflict, withdrawal of her forces from the occupied areas and return of the wounded Indian prisoners of war and arms and ammunition, China has given positive proof of her peaceful intentions. We praise these actions of China.

Nehru Government is spreading slander against China by depicting her as an "aggressor" and "expansionist". No progressive force can be deceived by this slander of the Nehru Government and regard China as an "aggressor". Terming the border conflict a "war", the Nehru Government on this plea is accepting arms aid from the imperialists, trying to create and maintain warphobia inside the country and declaring a state of "emergency", arresting Communists on a wide scale and depriving the people of their democratic rights. No progressive force can support these reactionary steps of the Nehru government.

The Chinese government has repeatedly sought peaceful settlement of the border conflict. The Nehru government has created obstructions in this matter. To occupy advantageous positions in the disputed border area, the Nehru government penetrated in some places into territory under Chinese occupation and provoked armed clashes. The rabid Right reactionaries of India supported and instigated these actions. The imperialists are also engaging in provocation here. The Nehru government tried to keep the border conflict alive in its own political interests. What the reactionary forces of India want by keeping this conflict alive is to draw the Indian people away from the political ideology and influence of socialist China, to isolate the progressive forces of India and to obtain economic aid from the imperialists.

But these facts do not lead to the conclusion that the government of India is a government of finance capital and bureaucratic monopoly capital, and that in the interests of those elements and to avoid an economic crisis, the government of India is keeping this conflict alive and on this pretext making arrangements for investing more capital in military production and for militarization of the economy and has tied India to the U.S. war chariot.

As we understand it, the government of India is basically a government of the national bourgeoisie. A section of this bourgeoisie belongs to the Right. Moreover, the monopoly capitalists too have immense influence on this government. It is due to their influence that in internal affairs the Indian government pursues a policy that is reactionary in many respects, that it receives economic aid from the imperialists and also collaborates with the imperialists in many respects.

However, prompted by the interests of the national bourgeoisie, the Indian government does not want war and in external affairs it is basically in favour of peace. In spite of the various reactionary policies and actions of the government, India is a young peace-loving state. The Nehru government has also made valuable contributions against the imperialist aggressive policy and in favour of world peace. India is working towards independent economic development and the socialist countries are also helping it in this respect. Neither do we believe that India wants to occupy Chinese lands by invading China.

We believe that, considering India's position as a newly independent country, the policy of non-alignment and peace followed by her government in external affairs, the character of the Indian government as a whole and the basic tasks of isolating the American imperialists in the international arena, preventing war and securing peace, all our efforts should be directed at keeping India in the camp of peace. With a view to this, every effort must be made for a peaceful solution of the border dispute. With the opening of the door for a peaceful settlement of the border dispute, the progressive forces of India also will be able to activize themselves properly and to strengthen India's policy of non-alignment and peace by mobilizing public opinion against the rabid Right reactionary forces.

Much harm has been caused by the Sino-Indian border dispute developing into a large-scale armed conflict. Taking advantage of this, the rabid Right reactionaries of India have raised their heads and are actively seeking to involve India in a closer "friendship" with the U.S. imperialists. The Nehru government and the Right reactionaries have acquired an opportunity to sow suspicion and confusion about China in the minds of the people of India. As a result of this, it is the progressive forces of India who are suffering damage and those who are gaining advantage are the imperialists.

We consider it important that in the interests of world peace and the democratic movement of India there should be a peaceful settlement of the Sino-Indian border conflict immediately. This conflict is a mere border dispute which can be settled through negotiations on the basis of peaceful coexistence. We hope that the governments of China and India will peacefully settle the border dispute on the basis of the Colombo proposals.

The Question of Yugoslavia and Albania

Controversies have developed regarding Yugoslavia and Albania. It is necessary to say a few words about these controversies.

The Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960 severely criticized the "revisionist" theories of the Yugoslav leadership. There is no doubt that the Yugoslav leadership is committing "revisionist" mistakes. The world Communist movement is unanimous on this point. But some parties are of the opinion that, in spite of the mistakes of the Yugoslav leadership, it cannot be denied that the peoples of Yugoslavia have waged many struggles for socialism and are building socialism. Moreover, the Yugoslav leadership has rectified some of their mistakes in the meanwhile. Hence Yugoslavia should be considered to be a socialist country and efforts should be made to bring her back into the socialist camp and to rectify the mistakes of the Yugoslav leadership through fraternal criticism and help.

Some other parties have protested against this. They are of the opinion that the Yugoslav leadership is arch-revisionist and has discarded Marxism-Leninism. In fact, that Yugoslavia has abandoned the path of socialism and taken to the path of capitalism. Hence, Yugoslavia cannot be considered to be a socialist country.

Our opinion regarding this controversy is that all the parties should get together and reconsider the question of Yugoslavia and take new decisions, if such are found necessary, after discussing all the aspects of the question. The basic question of whether a socialist economy is being built up in Yugoslavia should be given very serious consideration.

Some parties are of the opinion that the leadership of the Albanian Party is committing serious Left sectarian and dogmatic mistakes. A number of other parties fully support the Albanian leadership. However, all agree that Albania is a socialist country.

Our opinion on this question is that there should be a discussion on this point among all the parties, especially among the leaderships of China, the Soviet Union and Albania. The deviations of the Albanian Party to which reference has been made should also be rectified. It is also necessary, in the interests of the unity of the socialist camp, to re-establish normal and fraternal relations between Albania and the other socialist states.

Our Appeal

In conclusion, we are of the opinion that today some of the differences within the world Communist movement, especially the differences between the Communist parties of the Soviet Union and China, are being expressed in such aggressive language as to create confusion in the international Communist and democratic movement. Taking advantage of this, the imperialists are spreading slander against the ideology of communism. There is nothing wrong in the Communist parties having differences on one or another issue and openly discussing those issues. But when discussion turns into mutual recriminations, dogmatism, impatience and ill behaviour towards the opponent, the result is definitely harmful. The differences between the parties of different socialist countries have gone so deep that even cooperation among socialist countries is being hampered in some cases. To us this is very distressing. This situation must be ended.

The ideal and the aim of the different socialist states and Communist parties are the same. Among them there is no clash of class interests whatsoever. The differences among them have no objective social basis. They are purely subjective. It is possible to settle these differences through mutual discussions and consultations. Hence, without regarding its own opinion as absolutely infallible and beyond revision, it is necessary for a party to enter into mutual discussion and consultation with other parties, displaying a readiness to abide by the collective decisions of all on the differences.

We appeal to the Communist parties of China and the Soviet Union and all the Communist parties of the world to end the public polemic now. The Communist parties of the Soviet Union and China should start mutual discussions and all the differences should be settled in another world Communist conference held after proper preparations.

Differences in the Communist Movement

The following statement was issued by the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Australia, on August 23, 1963

Differences in the world Communist movement have aroused much public interest. They are being discussed, not only by Communists, but in many other circles.

The international differences have been reflected in the Communist Party of Australia through the activities of a splinter group headed by E. F. Hill, a former leading member of the Party, now expelled.

Because of the importance of the issues, and the wide public interest, the Communist Party of Australia has decided to publish its views on the main problems.

These views have been reached after discussions within the Party over a long period and especially since January 1961, following the meeting of 81 Communist Parties in Moscow in November, 1960.

The Communist Party of Australia actively participated in that meeting, raising its opinions on the issues debated at the time.

Our delegates to that meeting worked for unity and were fully satisfied with the discussions, in which differing viewpoints were frankly thrashed out.

Our Party welcomed the Statement unanimously adopted by the meeting as resolving the questions in dispute and opening a new chapter of unity in the world Communist movement.

The 19th Congress of the Party held in June, 1961, unanimously endorsed the Statement as being a correct analysis of the situation in the world today, and fully in line with our own Party Programme.

The Communist Party of Australia rejects the criticisms made by the leaders of the Communist Party of China of the policy and work of the majority of Communist Parties, including our own.

We consider that the Chinese Party has seriously departed from the 81 Parties' Statement, and that the Hill group is advocating in Australia a policy which likewise departs from it.

Such a policy, if put into practice, would inflict great losses on the Australian working-class movement.

In rejecting these views, we by no means forget the great achievements of the Communist Party of China, which has led the Chinese people to victory over imperialism and feudal oppression and in building socialism. Nor do we subscribe to the imperialist anti-China campaign.

However, the leaders of the Communist Party of China not only advocate an incorrect line for the international movement. They try to impose this line upon other Parties, spreading their views in many publications in Australia and other countries.

We reject the Hill group's assertion that our Party should not have "taken sides", as this could only mean that we are not entitled to decide for ourselves but must follow others.

The Communist Party of Australia decides its own policy. It carefully considers all views, but does not blindly support the policy of any other Party.

Of course, what the Hill group really wanted was to force upon our Party the incorrect line of the Communist Party of China.

After failing dismally in this, the Hill group engineered a series of "resignations" which were hailed by the press as a "great crisis" and "a big split" in the Communist Party of Australia.

No such great crisis appeared, although the D.L.P. and other reactionary forces are trying to use the actions of those who split away to disrupt unity in the labour movement.

The issues being debated in the world Communist movement are indeed momentous ones, dealing with questions of concern to all humanity.

The Communist Party of Australia therefore restates its policy for peace, defence of the immediate economic and political interests of the Australian working people, and for achieving a Socialist Australia.

Can War Be Prevented?

The differences in the world Communist movement are not differences as to whether imperialism is the cause of war, nor are there any differences on the need to expose and fight the policies of U.S. imperialism, the chief instigator of war.

They are differences as to whether it is possible to prevent the imperialists from launching a new world war, and how to achieve this great aim.

For many years the Communist Party of Australia has held the view that in today's conditions it is possible to avert such a war, even though imperialism exists and is still powerful.

When the Party was discussing the draft of its programme "Australia's Path to Socialism", which it adopted in 1951, L. L. Sharkey wrote:

> "The Draft Programme declares that war can be finally outlawed when the rule of monopoly capital and its servants has been ended and the rule of the people substituted in its stead.

"This does not mean that the people cannot impose their will to peace while capitalism still exists. Quite the contrary. The people can foil the plans of the capitalist warmongers and establish a durable peace."

(Communist Review, August 1951)

The Party took this view because of the historic changes which had taken place after World War II. These changes greatly weakened imperialism, limited its capacity to dictate to the world and strengthened the hand of the peace-loving peoples everywhere.

Three Great Changes in the World

The first great change is that whereas the Soviet Union was the only socialist country in 1939, today there are 14 socialist countries, with 30 per cent of the world's population and 35 per cent of world production, a percentage rising with every year that passes.

The second great change in the world is the breaking-up of the colonial system. Since 1945, dozens of nations have won political independence, and most now take up a neutralist position which in the main aids the cause of peace. They continue their struggle to end all forms of colonialism, old and new. The national liberation struggle undermines imperialism by taking from the imperialist powers great sources of wealth, manpower and bases. It is a powerful part of the great new forces for peace.

The third great change is the much increased strength of the peace movement in the capitalist countries themselves. Headed by the working class, progressive people and peace fighters of different classes and views are uniting to oppose war and fight for disarmament.

Twelve years ago the Australian campaign to "Ban the Bomb" was called a "Communist plot to undermine the free world". Today, the vast majority agree that this is a very necessary step and welcome the nuclear test ban treaty.

The 81 Parties' Statement says:

"War is not fatally inevitable.

"The time has come when the attempts of the imperialist aggressors to start a world war can be curbed. World war can be prevented by the joint efforts of the world socialist camp, the international working class, the national liberation movement, all the countries opposing war and all peace-loving forces...

"Experience shows that it is possible to combat effectively the local wars started by the imperialists, and to stamp out successfully the hotbeds of such wars."

The Communist Party of China signed this statement. E. F. Hill and his followers agreed with it then. Yet today the Communist Party of China and the Hill group say that this is "an illusion".

To cast doubts on the possibility of preventing war, whatever the motive for doing so, is to belittle the peace forces and thus, in reality, to assist the imperialists.

The "leftist" group which has deserted the Communist Party of Australia says that the Party's policy of uniting with all who want peace is weakness. They say we are "soft on the imperialists" and demand that the "peace movement must be anti-imperialist".

Their demand for a narrow, "pure" peace movement, limited to people who fully understand that imperialism is the source of war, arises from impatience in the long and difficult task of uniting all who want peace, and lack of understanding that the masses of the people, not small groups, determine history.

It shows lack of faith in the ability of people to learn from their own experience in working for peace that imperialism is the source of war.

The Communist Party of Australia has never sought to dominate the peace movement, and will continue to co-operate with all genuine peace forces, while also putting forward its own independent views and policy for peace.

Is Disarmament an Illusion?

The Communist Party of Australia stands by the 81 Parties' Statement, which declared:

"Through an active, determined struggle by the socialist and other peaceloving countries, by the international working class and broad masses in all countries, it is possible to isolate the aggressive circles, foil the arms race and war preparations, and force the imperialists into an agreement on general disarmament."

This view is now rejected by the Communist Party of China. Their letter of June 14, 1963, says:

"Certain persons now actually hold that it is possible to bring about 'a world without weapons, without armed forces and without wars' through 'general and complete disarmament' while the system of the exploitation of man by man still exists. This is sheer illusion".

No Communist Party doubts that the struggle for general and complete disarmament will be long, difficult and complicated. It will be opposed by the powerful monopolists who profit from armaments and by the rabid militarists, just as even the limited ban on nuclear tests is opposed by the extreme war wing of the U.S. monopolies and by de Gaulle.

But the combination of forces described by the 81 Parties can eventually force disarmament on the warmongers. The struggle for disarmament expresses the dearest wishes of the peoples and helps to mobilise them to act for peace.

Should we abandon it because it is hard and complicated, or should we rely upon the masses and work to bring their decisive force into action?

The Communist Party of Australia declares unreservedly for the struggle, and will do its part to carry it to success in Australia.

In speaking of the struggle for disarmament, the 81 Parties' Statement says:

"It is necessary to wage this struggle on an increasing scale and to strive perseveringly to achieve tangible results", including the banning of atomic testing.

That is why the treaty halting most kinds of nuclear weapons tests by the three main nuclear powers has been hailed by widely representative voices from most parts of the world as a very important though limited advance in the direction of peace.

Yet this treaty has been denounced by the Chinese Communist Party and Government as "a dirty fraud" "which harms the interests of the people of the whole world and the cause of world peace."

Such statements are a grave dis-service to the struggle for peace, and a blow against the attraction which socialism and the Communist Parties have increasingly exerted on the peoples because of their championing of the cause of peace.

The Communist Party of Australia, like the great majority of Communist Parties, welcomes the test ban treaty. This achievement helps the struggle to prevent the French tests, to remove U.S. bases from Australia, secure nuclear free zones, ban nuclear weapons, and win disarmament.

Peaceful Coexistence is the Basis for World Peace

Socialism is increasingly demonstrating its superiority over capitalism. The great advances already made by socialist countries in production, living conditions, science, education, freedom for individual development and high moral standards stand in sharp contrast to the stagnation and slow rates of growth, crisis in education and science, denial of freedom, stunted development of human personality and moral decay evident in monopoly capitalism.

The Soviet Union will overtake the United States in total production, and production per head of the population. The other socialist countries will advance similarly. The appeal of socialism to the people of countries dominated by monopolies will become still greater.

Struggle Essential

This does not mean that socialism will be achieved by "force of example", or that peaceful coexistence will miraculously do away with monopoly capitalism. Only the struggle of the working class, leading the majority of the exploited people, can end capitalism.

Peaceful coexistence does not mean ending class struggle. On the contrary, it provides favourable conditions for its development in capitalist countries. Cold war conditions favour the forces opposing progress.

Thus, in supporting the 81 Parties' view that the socialist countries make "peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems the cornerstone of their foreign policies", the Communist Party of Australia leads the fight against the pro-monopoly policies of the Menzies Government and its support for U.S. aggressive plans.

The Communist Party of China, which, together with India, earlier enunciated the Principles of peaceful coexistence, now says it is wrong to confine "the general line of the foreign policy of the socialist countries... to peaceful coexistence."

The "left" group in Australia, crudely reflecting the Communist Party of China's view, alleges that our Party wants peaceful coexistence with the capitalists. All the experience of the working class proves this laughably false. The capitalists certainly do not agree!

In fact, the fight for peaceful coexistence in Australia is precisely a sharp class struggle for peace, living standards and democratic rights, directed against the pro-war, profiteering, anti-democratic policies of monopoly and the Menzies Government.

This is the real content of the struggle for peaceful coexistence in Australia and every capitalist country.

Internationally, the struggle for peaceful coexistence between states with different social systems is a "form of class struggle between socialism and capitalism." (81 Parties' Statement).

The Cuban Example

Peaceful coexistence implies both struggle and negotiation, standing firm and compromising. The Communist Party of China rejects in practice negotiation and compromise. This is shown in its opposition to the nuclear test ban, and to the Soviet Union's actions in the Caribbean crisis last October.

The U.S.A. was building up for an invasion of Cuba. Kennedy had pledged full support for the Cuban exiles and was arming and training them.

The Soviet Union took additional steps to help the Cubans. Kennedy blockaded Cuba and threatened war. Cuba prepared to defend itself, the Soviet Union negotiated and peace was saved; peace which left Cuba sovereign and independent, stronger than ever, with Kennedy pledged before the world not to invade Cuba. And that promise has been carried out in the many months since, despite predictions that it would be violated.

This concrete example of peaceful coexistence, of struggle and compromise, was attacked as a "Munich", as the bartering away of Cuban independence. No Chinese proposal as to an alternative line of action was forthcoming, except absurd statements about "Cuba beating the U.S.A. on its own."

In the article "More on the Differences Between Comrade Togliatti and Us", it is stated:

"..during the Cuban events certain people first committed the error of adventurism and then committed the error of capitulationism, wanting the Cuban people to accept humiliating terms which would have meant the sacrifice of the sovereignty of their country." (p. 189)

Leaders of the "left" group in Australia echoed these views.

The reality is quite different, as Fidel Castro stated:

"The action of the U.S.S.R. which, to protect a small country thousands and thousands of miles away, put into the balance of a big war the wellbeing forged in 45 years of heroic labour and tremendous sacrifice is now evident in all its greatness.

"History has never known of such solidarity. That is internationalism. That is Communism.

"The imperialists have failed all along the line to strangle the Cuban revolution because in all cases, economically, militarily and morally, Cuba had the U.S.S.R. on its side."

The Communist Party of China, which claims that it "prints both sides", has never mentioned this statement by Castro, nor has the Hill group!

Communists Support National Independence Struggle

Since its formation 43 years ago, the Communist Party of Australia has done its utmost to rally the Australian people to support the aspirations and struggle of the oppressed colonial peoples for national independence.

To mention but some instances: support for China's struggle against imperialism since 1925, including the campaign against sending materials for Japan's war industry, and to boycott Japanese goods in 1937 and 1938; support for the Indonesian revolution in 1945 and 1946 and for the return of West Irian to Indonesia; support for India's struggle for freedom from British rule; support for the peoples of Indo-China in their struggle against the French and now against U.S. intervention.

The Communist Party of Australia has always campaigned for the rights of the Aboriginal people, opposed the "White Australia" policy, and fought for the right of the people of Papua-New Guinea to self--determination and against colonial exploitation of them by Australian monopoly.

The Communist Party consistently campaigns for Australian foreign policy to be based upon friendship towards and support of the struggle for national independence of the nations of South East Asia, South Africa and elsewhere.

The Communist Party of Australia campaigns against Australian support for U.S. intervention in Vietnam, for withdrawal of U.S. forces and observance of the Geneva Agreement. It demands the withdrawal of Australian troops from Malaya, opposes Malaysia as a scheme to maintain colonial rule over the peoples of the region, and calls for a pact of peace and friendship with Indonesia.

Our stand correctly merges patriotism with internationalism. Our stand for peace and friendship with South East Asia and in support of national liberation movements is part of the working-class struggle against Australian monopoly capitalism, which is hostile to the newly--emerging nations of South East Asia and supports imperialist military pacts and aggressive plans in this area.

Yet the Communist Party of China and the Hill group say that our Party, and other Parties, do not support the national liberation movement and even oppose national revolutions!

The Communist Party of China says that peaceful coexistence is being interpreted by the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in particular to mean peaceful coexistence between oppressor and oppressed nations.

This is in complete contradiction with well-known facts. Extensive aid in many forms has been given to Indonesia, Egypt, India, Cuba, and many other countries newly independent or fighting for independence.

The struggle for peace, for general and complete disarmament assists the struggle for national liberation. In turn, the national liberation movement greatly helps the struggle for peace and disarmament.

To pose the fight for peaceful coexistence against the national liberation movement, or vice versa, is to split and weaken the anti--imperialist forces.

Defeat the Menzies Government

Our present work is directed to defeat of the Menzies Government. We reject as completely false Mr. Calwell's assertion that the Communists "don't give a rap whether the Menzies Government goes or stays." We advocate election of a Labor Government, while calling for support of Communist candidates and the truly working-class policy they will advance.

We believe that defeat of Menzies and election of a Labor Government can be the first step along the road of struggle for a new direction of Australian home and foreign policy in the interests of the working-class and its allies.

A Labor Government is already pledged to implement a number of reforms. It is also pledged to changes in foreign policy, including a nuclear-free southern hemisphere, recognition of the People's Republic of China, pacts of friendship with Indonesia and other South East Asian countries.

But the policy of the A.L.P. leaders (reformism or so-called "Democratic Socialism") is not the answer to the basic problems before the Australian working class and nation. Only a real socialist policy, founded upon the scientific working-class theory of Marxism-Leninism, can solve these problems.

Our aim is the formation of a single united working-class party, guided by scientific socialism.

This can be achieved only through the experience of the working class in the class struggle, including experience of reformism in office.

This support for election of a Labour Gouvernment is determined by both the immediate and long range interests of the working-class.

Immediate interests can be served by reforms, gained mainly by working-class unity in action. The long range interests of the working-class demand the building of a united movement for socialism. This will be helped by experience of the inadequacy of a Labor Government.

These views are based on detailed analysis of the situation in Australia, and application of Marxism-Leninism to it, extending over many years.

However, this line is now "not revolutionary enough" for the Hill group, which condemns it as "soft on imperialism, soft on reformism, creating illusions."

They demand "more revolutionary" policies and tactics, because they say, the struggle of the Australian working-class will "very soon be crowned by the all-embracing liberating success of socialism."

This wishful thinking makes them impatient with the line of our Party. In place of the slow, hard work of uniting with the workers who support the A.L.P., they advocate "stepping up the attack on reformism."

They say the leaders of the A.L.P. leftwing are the most dangerous of the reformists because they prevent the workers coming over to the path of revolution.

Lenin long ago advised Communists everywhere against such impatience, in "'Left-Wing' Communism: An Infantile Disorder." "...we in Russia have been concerned by a long, painful and bloody experience of the truth that revolutionary tactics cannot be built up on revolutionary moods alone. Tactics must be based on a sober and strictly objective estimation of all the class forces in a given state (in neighbouring states and in all states, i.e. on a world scale), as well as an evaluation of the experience of revolutionary movements. To express one's 'revolutionism' solely by hurling abuse at Parliamentary opportunism, solely by refusing to participate in parliaments, is very easy; but just because it is too easy, it is not the solution of a... very difficult problem."

One of the main differences between the Communist Party of Australia and the Hill group is whether to do the necessary hard, patient work or to take the easy road of hurling abuse. It is the difference between the working-class, revolutionary and the "petty-bourgeois in a frenzy."

The Hill group finds support for its impatience in some extraordinary views of the Communist Party of China about the contemporary world.

For instance, the People's Daily editorials on the anniversary of the Moscow Declaration and Moscow Statement (Peking Review No 47 and 48, 1962) said:

"The workers, peasants, petty bourgeoisie, patriotic and revolutionary national intellectuals, and patriotic and revolutionary national bourgeoisie of various countries who constitute more than 90 per cent of the world's population, are always for revolution." (Our emphasis.)

Can we accept the proposition that 90 per cent of the world's population always favor revolution? Or is this an example of tailoring the facts to support attacks on most of the Communist Parties of the world?

How Can Socialist Australia Be Achieved?

The Communist Party's programme, first adopted in 1951, answers the question in this way:

"Socialism can only be achieved through working class struggle... Socialism will be achieved only by carrying on the class struggle to the establishment of People's Power in Australia.

"Socialism involves the abolition of monopoly capitalism, socialisation of the giant monopolies and their use for the benefit of society."

The question then arises: can this social revolution be achieved without civil war?

The Programme says: "The Communist Party at all times stands for a peaceful solution of the political, economic and social issues of our time."

Peaceful transition does not mean that the capitalists are expected to hand over without a struggle. The Programme states:

"The active people's movement, which unites the majority of our people under the leadership of the working class, is essential for winning a genuine People's Government. It will develop as a result of many struggles — large and small — which our working people will wage in defence of their interests.

"This mighty organised movement of the people led by a united working class will win real people's political power and a People's Government. The machinery of state will be transformed and the agents of the monopolies in positions of authority in the civil service, police, judiciary and the armed forces will be replaced by determined and loyal supporters of the people's power.

"Our parliaments will be filled by true representatives of the people's movement...

"The People's Government... will immediately proceed to... break the power of the small clique of industrial, banking and land monopolies, as the essential condition for opening the way to the building of socialism."

"...in carrying through these decisive measures to implement the democratic will of the people, every effort of the capitalist class to defy the People's Government and Parliament will be resisted and defeated.

"The Government will rely on the strength of the organised workers to ensure that the programme decided upon by the people's representatives in Parliament is operated in practice, and that all attempts to resist or sabotage it are defeated and the enemies of the people brought to justice."

This Programme has been substantially the same since 1951, and none of the Hill group ever opposed it, until recently. Now they accuse the Party of having "lost its revolutionary spirit," of believing that the capitalists will peacefully hand over their privileges, and so forth.

These accusations are inspired by the propaganda of the Communist Party of China which has launched an all-out assault against the concepts that socialism can be achieved without civil war and that parliament can be "transformed from an instrument serving the class interests of the capitalists into an instrument serving the working people." (Statement of the 81 Parties.)

The Chinese Party, which signed the 81 Parties' Statement, now describes these views as "social democracy" and "Parliamentary cretinism," and accuses those parties which uphold the 81 Parties' Statement and seek to apply its principles to their own class struggle of "paralysing the revolutionary will of the proletariat," and "forsaking the dictatorship of the proletariat."

The Communist Party of Australia will continue its work of preparing the revolutionary forces of the working class with the aim of ending monopoly capitalism through class struggle.

We will continue to strive to create a people's movement strong enough to prevent the ruling class unleashing a bloody civil war.

We will continue to work for establishment of a People's Government which will smash monopoly power and the old state apparatus, putting in its place a truly democratic people's power led by the organised working class, and capable of successfully resisting all efforts of monopoly capitalism to regain its lost power.

In so doing, we are heeding Lenin's injuction to seek the forms of transition to socialism which accord with the conditions of our country.

As R. Dixon said in the discussion of the Programme unanimously adopted in 1951: "... the Draft Programme opens up new broad perspectives. It calls for the building of a people's movement, based upon an alliance of workers and farmers, which would create the conditions for the establishment of a genuine government of the people expressing the will and power of the people.

"A people's movement, capable of such tasks, could be built only through the development of a vast, all-sided activity in defence of peace and the needs and interests of the people, in which full account is taken of traditional democratic organisations and institutions in this country, including parliament."

Was it Right or Wrong to Combat the Cult of the Individual?

The Communist Party of China and the Hill group now strongly criticise the Communist Party of the Soviet Union for its exposure of the weaknesses and serious mistakes of the latter years of Stalin's leadership.

The Communist Party of China's letter of June 14, 1963, says:

"To raise the question of combating the cult of the individual is actually to counterpose the leaders to the masses, undermine the Party's unified leadership which is based on democratic centralism, dissipate its fighting strength and disintegrate its ranks."

The Communist Party of Australia's view is that it was the cult of the individual which had those bad effects. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union, by boldly exposing the cult at its 20th Congress and combating it, restored correct relationships, strengthened the Soviet Party and helped the whole world Communist movement.

The Communist Party of China, at that time, praised the C.P.S.U. for its action. In 1960, it signed the 81 Parties' Statement which welcomed "the victories of the Communist Parties in a number of countries in the struggle against deviations, elimination of the harmful consequences of the personality cult. ..."

In that period, the People's Daily published two articles.

One of those articles, "Historical Experience of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat," said:

"The Chinese Communist Party congratulates the Communist Party of the Soviet Union on its great achievements in this historic struggle against the cult of the individual."

"During the latter part of his life, Stalin took more and more pleasure in this cult of the individual, and violated the Party's system of democratic centralism and the principle of combining collective leadership with individual responsibility. As a result he made serious mistakes such as the following: he broadened the scope of the suppression of counterrevolution; he lacked the necessary vigilance on the eve of the anti-fascist war; he failed to pay proper attention to the further development of agriculture and the material welfare of the peasantry, he gave certain wrong advice on the international Communist movement, and, in particular made a wrong decision on the question of Yugoslavia."

In Australia, the denunciation of the cult of the individual has not undermined the Party's unified leadership. On the contrary, it has strengthened it.

It is the Hill group, which supports the cult, that wants to weaken the authority of elected leading committees.

It is indeed strange that the Communist Party of China has now departed from its previous balanced stand and taken such a one-sided position. Especially when it is recalled that in 1945 the effects of Stalin's errors, as they showed themselves in China, were criticised by the Chinese Party's "Resolution on Some Questions in the History of our Party": —

"In many places, where sectarianism in cadres policy was further complicated by an erroneous anti-espionage policy, large numbers of good comrades were wrongly indicted and unjustly punished; this led to the most lamentable losses inside the Party. Such sectarian errors weakened the Party to an immense extent. . . ."

History has confirmed the Communist Party of China's view of seven years ago:

"We Chinese Communists are firmly convinced that as a result of the sharp criticisms made at the 20th Congress of the C.P.S.U. all of those positive factors which were previously suppressed as a result of certain mistaken policies will inevitably spring to life, and the Party and the people will become still more firmly united in the struggle to build a communist society such as mankind has not yet seen, and win a lasting world peace." (Historical Experience of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat.)

Absurdities Instead of Argument

In its attacks on fraternal parties in socialist and capitalist countries alike, the Communist Party of China has made far-reaching and fantastic assertions, in disregard of the facts.

Not satisfied with accusations of "revisionism" and "treachery" and "supporting, prettifying and collaborating with imperialism," the Communist Party of China tries to dig up a social, class basis for such charges.

It says that in socialist countries (especially the Soviet Union) there is a move to restore capitalism by social groups or classes which still exist in all socialist countries, while in capitalist countries "certain persons" in the leadership of the Communist parties are corrupted representatives of the labour aristocracy.

Is this not fantasy? The Communist Party of the Soviet Union has adopted the great Programme for Building Communism, but the Communist Party of China sees in this programme steps "tantamount to helping restore capitalism." What is the "theoretical" basis for this? The Communist Party of China's letter of June 14, 1963, says:

"Certain persons may say that their society is already one without classes. We answer: No, there are classes and class struggles in all socialist countries without exception.

"Since remnants of the old exploiting classes who are trying to stage a comeback still exist there, since new capitalist elements are constantly being generated there, and since there are still parasites, speculators, idlers, hooligans, embezzlers of state funds, etc., how can it be said that the dictatorship of the proletariat is no longer necessary?"

What "new capitalist elements are constantly being generated there"

— i.e. in the Soviet Union? The only answer apparently is "... parasites, speculators, idlers, hooligans, embezzlers. ..."

Truly a new contribution to Marxist thought! It is implied that there is a "class of hooligans, idlers ... etc." Back in 1848 Marx described these, in the Communist Manifesto, not as a class but as a "passively rotting mass."

Not many years ago, the Communist Party of China was able to make a more balanced judgment on individuals under socialism and even communism.

"Therefore, not everybody will be perfect, even when a communist society is established. But then there will still be contradictions among people, and there will still be good people and bad." (Historical Experiences of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat — emphasis added.)

Correctly, nothing was said then of a "class of bad people!"

Something more is meant, of course. It is hinted at in talk of "Political degeneration and new bourgeois elements (which) may emerge in the ranks of the working class and among government functionaries. ..."

Hill and others say that the Communist Party of China believes that the leaders and functionaries of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and Soviet state are a new class, which has become corrupted and comfortable, afraid of war and revolutions.

This is what the Trotskyites said in the 1930's. In our times, it is said by the extreme "Yugoslav revisionist" Djilas. It is strange indeed to find the Chinese comrades, who are always loudly opposing Yugoslav revisionism, propagating the Djilas "New Class" theory!

To back up the "theory" that capitalism is being restored "in a certain form," it is necessary to assert that communism is not in the process of being built in the U.S.S.R. The Communist Party of China's letter of June 14, 1963 says:

"In their present level of economic development all socialist countries are still far, far removed from the higher stage of communism in which 'from each according to his ability, to each according to his needs' is put into practice." (Emphasis added.)

This was not always the Communist Party of China's view about either the U.S.S.R. or China. In Peking Review, No. 44 of 1958, an article hailed the "Great Soviet Plan to Build Communism."

In Peking Review, No. 43, 1958, a resolution of the Chinese Party's Central Committee corrected views which hailed the communes in China as heralding immediate transition to communism, but then set out the following perspective:

"... the transition from collective ownership to ownership by the whole people is a proces which may take ... five or six years or even longer. Even with the completion of this transition, people's communes, like state-owned factories, are still socialist in character. Some years after that the social product will increase greatly, the communist consciousness and morality of the entire people will be raised to a much higher degree, ... differences between worker and peasant, town and country ... mental and manual labour — the legacies of the old society ... — and the remnants of unequal bourgeois rights — will gradually vanish; and the function of the state will be limited to protecting the country from external aggression. ... At that time Chinese society will enter the era of communism." (Emphasis added.)

It therefore could scarcely be said that five years ago the Communist Party of China believed that China was "far, far removed from communism."

Their estimate for China may have been over-optimistic, but that is no argument against the plan for building communism in the U.S.S.R. Still less does it indicate that there is danger of the restoration of capitalism there.

In fact, the successes already achieved in communist construction prove that the aim set by the C.P.S.U. Programme for building the base of communism by 1980 is well within reach.

In arguing against the Soviet statement that the State in the U.S.S.R. has now become a "State of the whole people" the Chinese comrades use the same method of dogmatic assertions, quoting the book without really examining the facts. They say that there are class differences between worker and peasant and that this invalidates the concept of the "State of the whole people." They ignore the fact that there are no longer antagonisms between worker and peasant in the U.S.S.R.

Their slanderous suggestion that "leaders of certain Communist Parties represent the interests of the labour aristocracy" has no more foundation in fact than their charges that the C.P.S.U. is "restoring capitalism."

Both these arguments are put forward, it appears, not because their authors are convinced they are true, but as Part of a frantic search to find something to build up a case and buttress up other assertions.

The Communist Party of China uses the question of relations with Yugoslavia as a means to bolster its case that the majority of Communist Parties are "revisionists" and "traitors to the working class."

Yugoslavia

The Communist Party of Australia has waged the necessary struggle against the ideas of Yugoslav revisionism as called for in the 81 Parties' Statement.

There is now no sympathy or support anywhere in our Party for these ideas. Should the need arise, the necessary steps will be taken.

In line with the 81 Parties' Statement and in accordance with the facts of the Yugoslav economy, the Communist Party of Australia regards Yugoslavia as a socialist country, taking as welcome and sensible the efforts to strengthen relations between Yugoslavia and other socialist countries.

Taken as a whole, the arguments advanced by the leaders of the Communist Party of China are couched in language which is uncomradely in the extreme.

The manner of reasoning, and quoting from Marx and Lenin as from a catechism and in the most abstract fashion, departs from their previous practice and violates what Lenin described as "the most essential thing in Marxism . . . the concrete analysis of concrete conditions."

Lenin also said:

"We do not regard Marxist theory as something completed and inviolable; on the contrary, we are convinced that in has only laid the cornerstone of the science which socialists must further advance in all directions if they wish to keep pace with life."

The Communist Party of Australia tries to follow this advice in its theoretical work.

How Not to Work for Unity

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of China issued a statement on July 13 entitled "We Want Unity, Not a Split" (Peking Review, No. 29. 1963.) Is this true?

The C.P.C. attitude towards other Communist Parties and to the 1960 Statement of the 81 Parties does not help to create conditions for unity. Nor does its deliberate disruption of non-party world organisations such as the peace movement, the trade unions, and organisations of women and youth by trying to force its own views on them and abusing all who disagree. Indeed, the question arises: Is there a real desire for unity, or is it a split that is wanted?

The Communist Party of China publishes and circulates widely many articles and pamphlets attacking the stand of many other Parties, including our own. It says that the majority of Communist Parties are: "revisionist" — that is, revising Marxism-Leninism in the interests of the capitalist class; "betraying the interests of the entire international proletariat and the people of the world", "departing from Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism," "catering to the needs of imperialism"; "protecting the interests of monopoly capital, betraying those of the proletariat, and degenerating into social democrats"; "deliberately deceiving the peoples of the world and helping the imperialists in their policies of aggression and war"; "running hither and thither in response to the baton of certain persons abroad," and many similar insulting phrases.

These accusations are made in a general form, without any proof.

If the Chinese comrades believe their own charges, how could they desire unity with "collaborators with imperialism," "revisionists," "traitors," "social democrats"?

By putting the argument on such a basis, they prevent proper discussion. This indicates that they are working for a split, in which those calling themselves "true Marxist-Leninists" will cut themselves off from those they label "revisionists."

The Hill group has in fact foreshadowed the appearance of a "new" Party in Australia, following the Chinese Party lead:

"If the leading group in any Party adopt a non-revolutionary line and convert it into a reformist party, then Marxist-Leninists inside and outside the Party will replace them and lead the people in making revolution." (Letter, June 14, 1963.)

In practice, the Communist Party of China leaders and their allies, the Albanian Party leaders, are now more or less openly working to split other Communist Parties.

E. F. Hill was removed from the leadership of the Communist Party of Australia and then expelled for continued factional activity, contempt of Party democracy, violation of the Party Constitution and refusal to obey decisions of Party conferences and leading bodies.

The Chinese comrades were informed of Hill's removal from the leadership, yet Hill was invited to China for discussions and feted by Mao Tse-tung.

On July 23, Hsinhua News Agency reported that "representatives of the Belgian Communist Party were invited to Albania." It turns out that these "representatives" were expelled from the Belgian Communist Party at its last Congress!

This is a strange new contribution to Marxist-Leninist teachings on the Party and on relations between Communist Parties!

A new category of Marxist-Leninists is discovered — those who place themselves outside the Party. Relations betwen Communist Parties are now relations with splinter groups, which have no support among the Party or the masses.

This, from the Communist Party of China, which has so often correctly said it is wrong "to interfere in internal affairs" of other Parties!

This, from the Chinese comrades, who have so often asserted the right of all Parties to decide their own policies, and who have sharply criticised what they considered attempts to impose "the programme, resolutions and line of one's own Party on other fraternal Parties" as the "common programme" of the international Communist movement.

The appearance from time to time of differences within a Communist Party and in the world movement is inevitable. This can serve to strengthen rather than weaken the movement if they are treated as differences between Communists with the same aims, the same basic class standpoint and ideological outlook. They can then be discussed and resolved by concrete analysis and investigation, in which all learn; if there are some issues which cannot be settled immediately, experience in practice will resolve them.

On the Ideological Position of the Communist Party of China

(Reprinted from Political Affairs of October, 1963. No. 10)

The ideological dispute within the world Communist movement has now erupted into open conflict. The Communist Party of China has unreservedly placed itself in direct, basic opposition to the ideological line adhered to by the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and by virtually every other Marxist-Leninist party throughout the world.

With the appearance of the June 14 letter of the Central Committee of the C.P.C. and the subsequent reply of the Central Committee of the C.P.S.U., the debate was brought into full public view. Prior to this, the Chinese party had directed sharp public attacks against a number of other parties, among them the Communist Party of the United States. But since the publication of the two letters and the breakdown of the Moscow discussions, the C.P.C. has brought increasingly into the open its thorough-going hostility to the ideological position of the rest of the world Communist movement. Its attacks have become progressively harsher and more undisguised, their language increasingly abusive and acrimonious, and their scope ever wider. And with the publication of the Jenminjihpao article of September 6, launching a venomous assault on the theses of the 20th Congress of the C.P.S.U., the full import of the Chinese position has come to light. The conflict, it is clear, has now gone far beyond ideological

On January 9 of this year the Communist Party of the United States issued a statement on the Caribbean crisis of last October ("The Cuban Crisis and the Struggle for World Peace", The Worker, January 13, 1963), in which sharp criticism was directed at the position taken by the Communist Party of China on the crisis. To this, the C.P.C. responded with an editorial entitled "A Comment on the Statement of the Communist Party of the U.S.A.", appearing in Jenminjihpao of March 8. In a brief public statement, the C.P.U.S.A. branded the editorial as a complete misrepresentation and distortion of its views, but added that in the light of the pending Moscow meetings between the Chinese and Soviet parties and its feeling that public polemics should meawhile be discontinued, no reply would be made at that time.

In view of the drastic changes in the picture since then, however, it is felt that a detailed reply is imperative. This editorial deals with the main ideological questions raised in the Chinese editorial and with a number of related questions.

dispute between Communist parties, and has taken on the character of all-out warfare by the Communist Party of China against the fundamental views and policies of the rest of the international Communist movement.

The Test-Ban Treaty

How far the Chinese party has gone in its opposition is most glaringly manifested in its violent, vituperative attack on the recently-concluded partial nuclear test-ban treaty. The signing of this pact, whatever its limitations, has been enthusiastically greeted by hundreds of millions of people in all parts of the world as a most welcome initial step in the direction of peaceful coexistence. Everywhere there is profound relief that the poisoning of the atmosphere by radio-active fallout will be ended. And everywhere there is eager anticipation of the next steps toward world peace for which it has paved the way. More than one hundred states have signed the treaty, including even reactionary regimes which simply did not dare to go counter to these sentiments of the people.

But not so the Chinese leaders. In their eyes the treaty is nothing but a "fraud" designed to "lull and deceive ... the peoples of the world". They label it a "betrayal" and a "fake peace". They slanderously accuse the Soviet government of having "sold out the interests of the Soviet people, the interests of the socialist camp including the Chinese people and the interests of the peace-loving people throughout the world", and of engaging in "diplomacy of capitulation". And so on; the stream of invective is endless.

There are, of course, others who oppose the pact. In this country its most vociferous enemies are the Goldwaters, the Birchites and their ilk. It is Goldwater who leads the fight against its ratification, attacking it as a "political ambush" and as offering only an "illusion of peace". And it is Goldwater who condemns the very idea of peaceful coexistence. Abroad the pact is opposed by such people as de Gaulle and the extremist elements surrounding him. It is in this unsavory company that the Communist Party of China finds itself in its shameful attack on the treaty — the company of the most rabid warmongering elements in the capitalist world.

How is this to be explained? How is it that the Communist Party of a great socialist country finds itself so completely at odds with the rest of the socialist countries and with the masses of peace-loving people throughout the world, and at the side of the worst enemies of peace?

The roots of this shocking state of affairs go deep. They lie ultimately, for one thing, in the rejection of the basic line of the world Communist movement as expressed in the Twelve-Party Declaration of 1957 and the 81-Party Statement of 1960. To be sure, the Chinese leaders ceaselessly protest their complete adherence to the line of these documents and just as ceaselessly accuse other parties of abandoning them. But in truth it is they who have rejected in fact, though professing to accept in words, the assessment these documents present of the new relationship of world forces and the conclusions flowing from it, and in particular the possibility of achieving peaceful coexistence.

The 81-Party Statement declares:

"Today it is the world socialist system and the forces fighting against imperialism, for a socialist transformation of society, that determine the main content, main trend and main features of the historical development of society."

On this basis it concludes:

And further, given the continued advance of the forces of peace and socialism, and the achievement of their absolute superiority:

"In these conditions a real possibility will have arisen to exclude world war from the life of society even before socialism achieves complete victory on earth, with capitalism still existing in a part of the world."

It is the recognition of this new balance of world forces which forms the basis of the policies of Communist parties in the present period. It is this which motivates the policies of our Party. The main resolution of our Seventeenth National Convention, held in December, 1959, opens with these words:

"As we approach the decade of the sixties, mankind stands at the threshold of a new era. For the first time in human history the possibility now exists for the elimination of the scourge of war and the release of the full productive potential of the human race for the solution of the age-old problems of poverty, disease and ignorance. These new possibilities have been created by the profound and irreversible changes in favor of the camp of peace, freedom and social progress."

This is the theme also of our resolution on peaceful coexistence of August, 1960:

"Peaceful coexistence is the only policy which is in accordance with the state of the world today. The basic shift in world relations, which has proceeded since the end of World War II, cannot be reversed. The main historic trend continues: in favor of socialism, of independence from imperialism, of the forces of democracy and progress. Ours is the epoch of the disintegration of imperialism. It is the epoch of the rise, consolidation and final victory of world socialism. In such an epoch, the strength of the world forces arrayed against imperialism must continue to grow, and with it the realistic possibility of averting war between capitalist and socialist states and of establishing peaceful coexistence as a long-range policy. In such an epoch, war is not inevitable, and world peace and disarmament can be fought for as realizable goals."

The Chinese party, however, thinks otherwise. In its article of September 6 it states that in setting forth such a policy, at the 20th Congress of the C.P.S.U. "under the ... pretext that 'radical changes' had taken place in the world situation, Khrushchov ... questioned the continued validity of Lenin's teachings on imperialism and on war and peace, and in fact tampered with Lenin's teachings." In short, therefore, the Chinese leaders do not accept the position of the 81-Party Declaration on war and peace, however profusely they may proclaim their adherence to it.

Those who regard world peace and disarmament as realizable goals can only welcome every restriction on the proliferation of nuclear weapons, however limited. It is because the Chinese leaders repudiate this approach, because they in fact consider war as inevitable, that they see salvation only in the spread of nuclear arms to other countries, and especially in their own acquisition of a nuclear arsenal, and decry all efforts to prevent such proliferation as a monstrous plot designed to perpetuate a nuclear monopoly. And this is why they find themselves in the company of those who, like Goldwater, regard peaceful coexistence as a myth and therefore oppose every move toward disarmament and the banning of nuclear weapons. But such an approach can hardly be called fighting for peace. On the contrary, it serves to sharpen the danger of war.

To be sure, the Chinese leaders offer an alternative. They call melodramatically for a world agreement for the complete outlawing and destruction of all nuclear weapons. This proposal is not at all new. It has been made repeatedly by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, and has been supported by advocates of peace everywhere. We consider it a realistic goal.

The Chinese leaders, however, offer it at this moment as something to be achieved at one fell swoop, and in opposition to the very kind of partial steps essential to its realization. Indeed, the merit of the partial test-ban lies largely in its paving of the way for further steps. In this context, and in the face of their persistent ridicule of disarmament as an illusion and as having no merit beyond that of a mere propaganda slogan, the Chinese Party's advocacy of the total outlawing of nuclear weapons can be viewed only as a device to cover up the real nature of their opposition to the test-ban treaty.

Marxism-Leninism versus Nationalism

The roots of the Chinese leaders' position lie also in their departure from the Marxist-Leninist ideology of proletarian internationalism in the direction of nationalism. In the words of Gus Hall (The Only Choice: Peaceful Coexistence, New Century Publishers, 1963): "It seems that after certain Marxist parties became leaders of nations, the influences of narrow nationalism tended to weaken proletarian internationalism.

These parties tended to see the rest of the world, including the socialist world, through the eyes of narrow nationalism." In the writings and utterances of the C.P.C., this finds frequent and varied expression.

In the view of the Chinese Party, it is not the socialist world which is today decisive in the struggle against imperialism but the peoples of the colonial and dependent countries. It is not the contradiction between socialism and capitalism which is central, but that between these peoples and imperialism. It is Asia, Africa and Latin America which are the "focus of world contradictions". The June 14 letter states:

"The various types of contradictions in the contemporary world are concentrated in the vast areas of Asia, Africa and Latin America; these are the most vulnerable areas under imperialist rule and the storm centers of world revolution dealing direct blows at imperialism."

And further:

"In a sense, therefore, the whole cause of the international proletarian revolution hinges on the outcome of the revolutionary struggles of the peoples of these areas, who constitute the overwhelming majority of the world's population."

Of course, no one can deny the tremendous upsurge which has taken place in the national-liberation movement in recent years and the great significance which this possesses for the whole struggle against imperialism. But to fail to see the dependence of this on the growth and consolidation of the socialist world, to fail to recognize the international class struggle as basic and decisive for these developments, is to fall prey to nationalism.

"The East wind," say the Chinese leaders, "prevails over the West wind." And with this they move toward the position that the basic conflict in the world today is one between the colored peoples and the white peoples, with all the racist overtones implicit in it.

It is such an outlook which leads the Chinese Party to construe the Soviet efforts to limit the development and spread of nuclear weapons as "big-power chauvinism", and as designed primarily to prevent China from obtaining such weapons. Thus, the Chinese leaders think solely in terms of their own possession of nuclear arms — in terms of their own narrow national interests and not in terms of the interests of the whole socialist world, the international working class, the oppressed peoples and the forces of peace generally. Clearly, such an approach tends only to isolate the national-liberation movement from the fight for socialism, and to split the unity of the socialist countries and the world forces of peace and progress on national and racial lines.

But the Chinese leaders go further. They view the entire world conflict essentially as one in which all the rest of the world is arrayed against U.S. imperialism. They state (More on the Differences Between Comrade Togliatti and Us, Foreign Languages Press, Peking, 1963):

"... U.S. imperialism is trying to build a huge empire in the capitalist world, such as has never been known before. This huge empire which U.S. imperialism is seeking to build would involve the direct enslavement not only of such vanquished nations as West Germany, Italy and Japan, and of their former colonies and spheres of influence, but also of its own wartime allies, Britain, France, Belgium, etc., and their existing and former colonies and spheres of influence.

"That is to say, in its quest for this unprecedentedly large empire, U.S. imperialism concentrated its efforts primarily on the seizure of the immense intermediate zone between the United States and the socialist countries. At the same time, it is using every means to conduct subversion, sabotage and aggression against the socialist countries."

It is correct, of course, to recognize U.S. imperialism as the citadel of world reaction and the drive for world domination as the cornerstone of Wall Street's cold-war program. But the concept of an "immense intermediate zone" embracing all the remaining imperialist powers is a nationalistic distortion of the picture, for it regards the essence of the world conflict today as a struggle of the rest of the world for national independence from U.S. imperialism. It leads to directing the attack not against imperialism as a whole but solely against U.S. imperialism (and it is significant that this tendency is prominent in all the Chinese documents). It overlooks the role of British imperialism, the threat of aggression and war emanating from West German and French imperialism, and the imperialist, anti-socialist character of the Common Market. Rather, it leads to the development of opportunist ties with other imperialist powers in the name of fighting U.S. imperialism. For the world anti-imperialist forces, and above all for these forces in the United States, this struggle is central. But the position of the C.P.C. will weaken not strengthen it. And it must be said that the opposition to the test-ban treaty, as well as the growing anti-Sovietism displayed by the Chinese leaders is consistent with such a pattern.

Such is the end result of the nationalism of the Chinese Communist Party. It gives rise to opportunistic capitulation to imperialism, covered over by revolutionary phrasemongering and a dogmatic, sectarian line. Thus are nationalism on the one hand and dogmatism and sectarianism on the other interrelated — they are the two sides of one coin.

The Chinese Party's false estimate of present-day world relationships and its consequent dogmatic insistence on conclusions supposedly arising out of the relationships of a past period, as well as its corroding nationalism, color its position on all questions. They have led the C.P.C., moreover, not only to present a grossly distorted picture of conditions in other countries but also to falsify and misrepresent the positions of other parties. This, in fact, is the central feature of the editorial "A Comment on the Statement of the Communist Party of the U.S.A.", to whose contents we now turn.

The editorial devotes itself in considerable part to a defense of the Chinese stand on the Caribbean crisis, which we had opposed in our statement of January 9. It states:

"We support the five just demands of the Cuban Revolutionary Government, we were against putting any faith in Kennedy's sham 'guarantee', and we were against imposing 'international inspection' on Cuba. From the outset we directed the spearhead of our struggle against U.S. imperialism, which was committing aggression against Cuba. We neither advocated the sending of missiles to Cuba, nor obstructed the withdrawal of so-called offensive weapons. We opposed adventurism, and we also opposed capitulationism. We would like to ask: What was wrong with this correct position of ours? How can it be described as 'a policy leading to nuclear war?' What was there about it that 'dovetails' with the line of U.S. imperialism? (Emphasis added.)"

And further:

"Since you describe the Chinese comrades, who resolutely oppose U.S. imperialism, as being 'pseudo-Left', we would like to ask: What do you consider to be the genuine Left? Can it be that those using the sovereignty of another country as a counter for political bargaining with U.S. imperialism are to be considered the genuine Left? To act in that way is indeed to be through-and-through pseudo-Left, or rather, genuinely Right. (Emphasis added.)"

The position of the C.P.U.S.A. is amply set forth in the January 9 statement, in the pamphlet The Only Choice: Peaceful Coexistence by Gus Hall, and more recently in the editorial articles "The Ideological Struggle in the American Left" in Political Affairs of August, 1963, as well as in numerous other writings. It is not necessary to repeat all this; here we wish only to emphasize certain points:

The above quotations are no more than a reiteration of the original Chinese position, including the portions emphasized, which are an essential part of the basis of our criticism. And this position is simply reasserted, without proof, as one which is self-evidently "correct". But is it?

For what is being reasserted here is that the Soviet Union was guilty of adventurism in placing the missiles and of capitulationism in removing them, and in the course of this, of abusing the sovereignty of Cuba in order to compromise with imperialism. In the light of recent developments, however, these contentions stand up today even less than when they were first made.

Is it not indeed a strange "capitulation" which results not in the destruction of Cuba's sovereignty but in the prevention of threatened invasion and the protection of her continued existence as a sovereign state? And is it not a strange "capitulation" which is not regarded as such by its supposed victims, who on the contrary hail the Soviet actions as a shining example of selfless assistance, of true international solidarity? Is it not strange that Fidel Castro should respond to "using the sovereignty" of his country "as a counter for political bargaining" by saying, as he did in his television broadcast of June 4, 1963: "This solidarity was displayed in its entire scope due to which the Soviet Union was running a great risk. The Soviet people agreed to make a great sacrifice. Without wavering, they subjected themselves to this risk for the sake of our country"?

It has become unquestionably clear that the freedom of Cuba was effectively defended and that the Kennedy Administration was compelled to retreat from its invasion plans. But the Chinese have persisted in picturing this outcome as having been somehow achieved by the Cuban people despite the Soviet Union. An article by Shoa Tieh-Chen, "Revolutionary Dialectics and How to Appraise Imperialism", appearing in the Peking Review, January 11, 1963, presents it as follows: "Two months ago, U.S. imperialism stirred up tension in the Caribbean in an attempt to strangle the Cuban revolution. But with support from the people all over the world the heroic Cuban people waged a resolute struggle, hit back hard at the war provocations of U.S. imperialism and thus defended their sovereignty and their revolution."

But this is not a true picture, for it omits the decisive element. The people of Guatemala, when U.S. imperialism launched its intrigues to overthrow their democratic government, also had the support of people all over the world, but this did not stop imperialism from carrying out its plot. What did stop them in the case of Cuba was the shocking realization, thanks to the Soviet actions taken in agreement with the Cuban government, that if they persisted in their course they would have to contend not only with Cuba but also with the Soviet Union, and that they would subject themselves to the threat of retaliatory blows on their own territory. It was this realization which exercised a sobering effect on a section of the Kennedy Administration and impelled Kennedy to retreat and compromise. And it is this realization which makes the promise not to invade Cuba something more than a "sham".

To fail to recognize this, and to continue to attack the role of the Soviet Union, does dovetail with the line of U.S. imperialism. To charge the Soviet Union with "capitulationism" does give encouragement to the most reactionary sections of monopoly capital in its contention that the outcome was a vindication of the "get tough" policy of brinkmanship and that this policy should therefore be further pursued and stepped up.

Further, if the placing of the missiles was "adventurism" and their removal "capitulationism", what alternative course should have been followed? Either the missiles should never have been put there and preparations to meet the threatened invasion should have been confined to arming the Cuban people to carry on the fight themselves with only the moral support of the rest of the world, and as we have already indicated, it is obvious what the outcome of such an uneven contest would be. Or, once having been put there, they should not have been removed and the aggressive acts of U.S. imperialism should have been met head-on. The outcome of this course of action is equally obvious, as our January 9, statement quite correctly points out, saying: "The editorials of the Peking Review, which emphasize that the alternative policy that should have been followed is one of 'blow-for-blow', and which charge 'surrender' and 'Munich', have only one meaning in the actual circumstances of the time: that the quarantine and threat of bombing should have been met head-on — in short a policy leading to nuclear war." And no amount of mere verbal insistence that one's line is "correct" can alter this. Furthermore, the effect of placing the onus for the crisis on the Soviet Union is to absolve its actual fomenter — U.S. imperialism — of its responsibility.

The C.P.U.S.A. and the Kennedy Administration

The main body of the editorial is devoted to an all-out attack on what it purports to be the position of the C.P.U.S.A. with regard to the Kennedy Administration. It states: "For a considerable period. certain leaders of the C.P.U.S.A., in their reports and statements, have been doing their utmost to prettify U.S. imperialism, to prettify Kennedy, the U.S. imperialist chieftain, and to affirm their loyalty to the U.S. ruling class."

What is actually presented, however, is a complete misrepresentation of that position. The misrepresentation, moreover, can only be deliberate, since it is accomplished by stringing together isolated sentences, fragments of sentences and even single words, torn entirely out of context, in such a way as to present a meaning quite different from that of the original. And in many instances the source of these fragmented quotations is not given. The following examples demonstrate the nature and significance of this deliberate distortion.

1. The editorial states:

"They spoke highly of Kennedy's idea of the 'New Frontier', which extends U.S. spheres of inluence over all six continents, saying that 'to speak of a New Frontier, as Kennedy does, is good'."

This fragment is extracted from the following paragraph in a report by Gus Hall ("The United States in Today's World", Political Affairs, February, 1961):

"To speak of a New Frontier, as Kennedy does, is good. But there can be no new frontiers along the cold-war path. If the new Administration is to find them, it will have to chart a new course. On the basis of our own study and knowledge of world developments, we are firmly convinced that new frontiers for the United States do exist, but they can be successfully sought only if the direction of our course is towards the ending of the cold war policies and the initiation of policies looking toward peacefull coexistence, the ending of colonialism, disarmament and peace."

Clearly, this is a far cry from "speaking highly" of Kennedy's idea. On the contrary, it is an obvious rejection of it.

2. The editorial states:

"They praised Kennedy's Inaugural Speech, which called on the people of the United States to make sacrifices to promote the cause of U.S. imperialism, saying that it was 'a possible opening on the road to peace'."

The quoted phrase is part of the following paragraph in an article by Daniel Mason in The Worker of January 29, 1961:

"Kennedy's inaugural address was welcomed by most of the nations of the world as a possible opening on the road to peace. In the Soviet Union, the address received the widest radio and press coverage."

This is plainly not the same as the editorial's version, for it simply reports a positive world reaction. But the question at issue goes beyond this: Was such a reaction warranted?

Further examination discloses that the positive response was not to the address as a whole, but centered on one particular point in it, summarized in the following words: "So let us begin anew — remembering on both sides that civility is not a sign of weakness, sincerity is always subject to proof. Let us never negotiate out of fear. But let us never fear to negotiate."

The question is how should one respond to such a statement, particularly in addressing oneself to the American people. One might simply dismiss it out of hand as nothing more than a demagogic utterance, contradicted by other utterances and actions and designed only to conceal the aggressive designs of American imperialism. Or one might take into consideration the mass pressures and other factors which impelled Kennedy to make it and produced the favorable reaction noted above, and on this basis join in the fight to step up these pressures and to demand implementation of the expressed position.

The first approach would lead only to sectarian isolation from the peace movement; the second would associate the Communists with the peace movement of the masses of people and with the utilization of every opening, however small, to advance the cause of peace. The Chinese party, apparently, prefers the former approach. We, on the other hand, have no hesitation in choosing the latter path and in associating ourselves with those who welcome every opening for peace.

3. The editorial states:

"They held that the Kennedy Administration's 'main mass support' is 'the working class, the Negro people and the peace forces', and they wished for 'a shift in policy . . . in the direction of peace and democracy' on the part of the Kennedy government."

The first part is not a statement of policy but a statement of fact, easily verifiable from the results of the 1960 elections and from numerous developments since then. But the policy statement from which it is taken ("The Ultra-Right, Kennedy, and the Role of the Progressives", The Worker, July 16, 1961) places it in the following context:

"The Kennedy Administration pursues a contradictory course which flows from the instability of the U.S. imperialist position, from the new relationship of world forces (the growing strength of the socialist, anti-imperialist, and peace forces) which it recognizes but does not fully and properly assess. Its wavering course results also from pressures of the masses of people in our own country, particularly from the working class, the Negro people, the peace forces which have been its main mass support and which elected it."

This is simply an assessment of the position of the Administration, based on an examination of its statements and actions, and of the reasons for them. It is on such assessments that our own policies and tactics must be based, not on mere abstract generalities about the nature and role of U.S. imperialism.

The second part of the editorial's characterization falsifies what the policy statement actually says, as the full context plainly shows:

"The Kennedy Administration pursues this course (i. e., 'a cold-war, interventionist, and generally anti-democratic course') because it is dominated by the big monopolies and financiers whose interests it serves. This must be kept firmly in mind. Yet, while recognizing that it has taken measures which further curtail democratic rights, it would be a serious mistake to consider the Kennedy Administration as embarked at present on the fascist road.

"To make the proper differentiation between Kennedy and the ultra-Right is the central tactical problem faced by the entire Left and all progressives. It is not simple. Kennedy is not a Roosevelt. Since his election, he has been moving in a reactionary direction. But it is not inevitable that he will continue along this path, giving ever wider openings to the ultra-Right.

"If the tactical problem is solved correctly, it will be possible to slam the door on the ultra-Right, defeat it, and force a shift in policy upon the Administration itself in the direction of peace and democracy."

This is a far cry from "wishing for" such a change; it is a call for mass action to force a change. It is based on the estimate (as of mid-1962) that 1. there exists a fascist ultra-Right, supported by sections of monopoly capital and Right-wing elements in Congress, which must be taken seriously as a threat to peace and democracy; 2. the Kennedy Administration is not a part of this, and while it is presently veering to the right, its position contains elements of ambivalence and vacillation growing out of the factors enumerated above; and 3. mass pressure on the Administration, coupled with an attack centered on the ultra-Right, can be effective in compelling the Administration to change its course.

To differentiate thus between sections of monopoly capital as a basis for determining the proper tactics for mass struggle is not new; the utilization of such differences is an integral part of the very concept of the united front. To do so is not in itself to "prettify" anyone. The only proper basis of estimate is whether the assessment is right or wrong, and this the editorial does not even trouble to discuss.

The events of the past year, moreover, prove that our assessment was correct. The Kennedy Administration has been compelled to alter its course in certain important respects. It has had to abandon, at least for the present, any plans for a Cuban invasion. And this change of course has been followed by other steps in the direction of peaceful coexistence. Chief among these are the new attitudes expressed in Kennedy's June 10 speech, and above all the recently-concluded test-ban treaty. Likewise, there has been a change of course with respect to the Negro rights struggle, with the Administration compelled to retreat somewhat from its original attitude and, in the form of the proposed civil rights legislation, to commit the federal government to a greater degree of responsibility in defending the Constitutional rights of the Negro people. These are developments whose objective consequences are of no small importance to the American people.

4. The editorial states:

"From Kennedy's 1962 State of the Union message, in which he announced the stepping up of armaments to realize the U.S. goal of world domination, they drew the conclusion that the Kennedy Administration 'can be compelled to yield to the pressures from the people'."

This is extracted from an article which is throughout strongly critical of the message (Arnold Johnson, "The Kennedy Program", Political Affairs, February, 1962). The immediate context reads as follows:

"Naturally, the President seeks to cover American imperialist designs with fine-sounding phrases such as 'alliance for progress' and 'the challenge of freedom' or 'the new frontier'. The demagogy is clear. Still, this Administration can be compelled to yield to the pressures from the people. Only the building up of such mass pressure and a struggle against any illusions of simply 'leaving it to the President' can effect a real change in U.S. policy."

Again, by the selection of an isolated phrase, a call for mass action to compel the Administration to retreat from its cold-war policies is distorted into an implied policy of reliance on the Administration.

5. The editorial states:

"Commenting on Kennedy's 1963 State of the Union message in which he expressed the intention of using nuclear blackmail to establish 'a world of order' led by the United States, they played up his statement that 'we seek not the world-wide victory of one nation or system but a world-wide victory of man' and described this deceitful rubbish as Kennedy's 'recognition of world realities', which 'most people were happy to hear' and which inspired 'hopefulness'."

Here again, an entirely false picture is painted. The source, an article by Daniel Mason in The Worker of January 20, 1963, headlined "JFK Hikes War Budget, Shuns Social Aims", criticizes the message at length, characterizing it in such terms as these:

"The President made a sideswiping threat against the AFL-CIO for seeking a 35-hour week to ameliorate unemployment. For the vast majority of the people, he proposed cuts in the budget that will of necessity reduce Federal social services.

"But for the armaments tycoons, he proposed billions of dollars more in arms expenditures. He tipped his hat politely to peace, but offered no proposals that would ease the way to it."

It is in this context that the article states:

"Most people were happy to hear the President declare:

" 'For we seek not the world-wide victory of one nation or system, but a world-wide victory of man. The modern globe is too small, its weapons too destructive, and its disorders too contagious to permit any other kind of victory.' "

"But the hopefulness inspired by such a recognition of world realities was shattered by the qualifying remarks about the need of building up U.S. armaments to achieve it."

Once more, the difference is painfully evident. Added comment is hardly necessary.

Why the Distortions?

We have dwelt at some length on these misrepresentations of our position (and there are many more) in order to show that they are not occasional and unintentional but consistent and deliberate, designed to create a picture of the leaders of the C.P.U.S.A. as "willing apologists for U.S. imperialism". Why has the Chinese Party labored so hard to twist the facts in order to portray us in this false light? We believe it arises from their own erroneous estimate of postwar developments in the United States.

The editorial calls attention to the characterization of U.S. imperialism in the Twelve-Party Declaration and the 81-Party Statement, and in line with these describes it as "the greatest international exploiter, the center of world reaction, the chief bulwark of modern colonialism, the international gendarme, the main force of aggression and war, and the enemy of the people of the world." All this is unquestionably true. But what is one to conclude from it, particularly in waging the struggle against U.S. imperialism within its own citadel in which, moreover, the vast majority of the people do not yet see this and do not accept such an assessment?

One could, as the Chinese leaders evidently propose, apply this characterization mechanically and dogmatically, and conclude that since these things are true of U.S. imperialism as a whole, then every section of monopoly capital and every spokesman for it must be branded as equally reactionary. Hence one cannot differentiate among them in any significant way but must direct one's attack at all equally. More, one must conclude that the most dangerous sections of monopoly capital are those which are at the time in control of the federal government, and hence the attack must be centered on these.

Such sectarian approach grows out of a gross overestimation of the power and extent of imperialist reaction in the United States, and this is evident in the assessment made by the Chinese Party. Thus, the article by Shao Tieh-Chien cited above states: "After the war, U.S. imperialism became more and more reactionary and rotten politically. It began to institute a fascist rule at home and gradually discarded even the shadow of democracy and freedom, arousing more and more opposition from the American people." (Emphasis added.) This is simply not so. Not even when McCarthyism was at its worst could it be said that democracy and freedom had been obliterated. Indeed, anti-McCarthy sentiment proved powerful enough, and among other things was sufficiently prevalent within the ruling class itself, to relegate McCarthy to obscurity and end his witch-hunting career.

The article similarly exaggerates the extent and intensity of the opposition to U.S. imperialism. It says: "The irreconcilable contradictions facing U.S. imperialism at home and abroad were like volcanoes which threatened it every minute and could erupt into revolutions at any moment." This is a totally fanciful picture. Neither now nor at any other time since World War II could it be said with the remotest justification that within the United States there existed a volcano ready to erupt into outright revolution against U.S. imperialism at any moment.

The Chinese leaders' failure to grasp correctly the relationship of forces in this country is but part of their failure to assess properly the shift in the balance of forces which has taken place on a world scale and their insistence on appraising the present picture in terms of the past. They do not give sufficient consideration to the fact that the very process of the decline of capitalism and the growth of socialism, inherent features of the era of imperialism, must give rise to changes in the relationship of forces with profound consequences, in this country as well as elsewhere.

If one were to proceed from the dogmatic approach outlined above, one would have to reject, as being based on illusions, those mass movements of the people which do not come forward in the name of anti-imperialism, lest one sink into reformism and abandon the revolutionary content of Marxism-Leninism. And this is precisely the position which the Chinese party has taken, carrying it to the point of demanding that the world peace movement explicitly express itself as anti-imperialist as a condition for participating in it.

Such an approach we must resolutely reject. To pursue such a course would be to isolate oneself from the struggles of the masses for peace, for jobs, for democratic rights, which they pursue in terms of their present understanding of these problems. It would be to refuse to participate in their struggles and instead to form narrow, sectarian organizations and movements attracting only the small minority already in the Left. It would be to sit on the sidelines and engage in sterile exhortation — in attempts to convince people that they are wasting their time. It would be to remove the conscious element from within these mass struggles and to abandon these masses to the influence of imperialist ideology. In the end it would be to do nothing — to "sit it out" and wait for the "backward" masses to awaken.

On the other hand, one could take the path of becoming part of these mass movements and projecting within them a course of action which leads in the desired direction and which, step by step, leads to the growth of the anti-monopoly, anti-imperialist consciousness of the masses. One could strive, in the course of participating in their struggles for peace, to help people see the role of U.S. imperialism in Cuba, in Vietnam and elsewhere. One could work for the successful accomplishment of every action which, regardless of the degree of awareness of those involved, is objectively a blow against U.S. imperialism and its cold-war policies.

It is this which imperialist reaction fears, not the mouthing of abstract generalities and revolutionary phrases. The winning of the right to vote by the Negro people in the South poses a far greater threat to the power of the Dixiecrats and their reactionary cohorts in the North than does any amount of radical language and pious exhortation to the Negro people that "they must be anti-imperialist". It is in the building of ties with such movements and not in the mere hurling of curses at imperialism that the development of revolutionary content in the work of a Marxist-Leninist Party is to be sought.

To work in such a manner requires the concrete assessment and utilization at all times of differences and conflicts within the camp of monopoly capital itself. Such differences and conflicts are not peripheral or of minor consequence in relation to mass movements and struggles. On the contrary, they are a vital factor in all united front struggles.

This was evident during the thirties in the differences between those sections of monopoly, for whom Roosevelt spoke, who looked to concessions to the workers as the best means of saving capitalism, and those, centered in the Liberty League, who looked to fascism. It war evident during World War II in the differences between those who looked to alliance with the Soviet Union as best serving to preserve American imperialism, and those who opposed it, maintaining that we were fighting "the wrong war".

It is evident today in the differences between those who oppose blockade or immediate invasion of Cuba and those who advocate these measures, between those who support the nuclear test-ban and those who are against it, or between the position of a President Kennedy on civil rights and that of a Governor Wallace.

The source of these differences lies in divergent interests and tactical differences of special sections of monopoly capital. They are accentuated by the growing difficulties of the ruling class — by the mounting strength of the world anti-imperialist forces and the ever greater gap between the aims of imperialism and its ability to attain them. And they are accentuated all the more by the rising tide of mass struggles — of the peace movement, the Negro freedom movement, and the economic struggles of the working class.

It is such considerations that underlie the contradictions in the Administration's statements and actions. However demagogic the President's utterances in behalf of peace, disarmament or other progressive aims may be on a given occasion, they are a response to both the difficulties of monopoly capital and growing mass pressures. The task of the mass movement is to seize on the openings they afford and utilize them to advance the struggle.

It is on this approach that the policies and tactics of the C.P.U.S.A. are founded. It is this approach which the Chinese leaders evidently repudiate. This is why, apparently, the editorial strives to picture it as "prettifying Kennedy" and as "serving as willing apologists for U.S. imperialism". And this is why, to make our position fit the Procrustean bed of its preconceived, dogmatic concepts, the editorial falsifies it.

The Negro Freedom Struggles

The distorted picture of the American scene which the Chinese Party presents is especially glaring in relation to the Negro freedom struggles. The perpetrators of the terror against the Negro people in the South are in the first place the Wallaces, the Barnetts, the Eastlands and the rest of the Dixiecrat racist elements, supported chiefly by the extreme Right in other parts of the country. In its failure to move against these elements and to take resolute action to crush the terror, the Kennedy Administration shares in the guilt, and the Negro people are fully aware of this. But the Chinese Party makes every effort to place the main responsibility for the oppression of the Negro people on the Kennedy Administration.

At a mass meeting held in Peking on August 12, the Chinese trade union leader Liu Ning-I spoke of "fascist atrocities committed by the Kennedy Administration in suppressing the struggle of the Negroes". (Peking Review, August 16, 1963.) A cablegram sent from the meeting to the N.A.A.C.P. and other organizations in this country, ostensibly in support of the August 28 demonstration in Washington, refers to the Kennedy Administration as the "chief culprit for the ruthless persecution of Negroes, champion of racial discrimination and main source of policy of national oppression and aggression throughout the world". It says further: "Since inauguration of Kennedy Administration shocking crimes of brutal suppression against American Negroes have been constantly increasing." (New York Times, August 23, 1963.) And the statement issued by Mao Tse-tung on August 8 (Peking Review, August 16, 1963) asserts that the Kennedy Administration "is proposing to Congress the so-called 'civil rights legislation' " as part of "an attempt to lull the fighting will of the Negro people and deceive the masses troughout the country".

Without question, the Kennedy Administration is subject to severe criticism and has much to answer for with respect to its failures on this score. It has sought to placate the Negro people with token concessions in order to maintain the support of the racist Dixiecrats. It has persitently and stubbornly refused to use the full weight of the federal authority and military power in the South, even in the face of the shocking murder of innocent children in Birmingham. And its civil rights legislation leaves much to be desired, as does its readiness to wage the kind of fight which is needed for its passage.

Nevertheless, to make of the Administration the "chief culprit" and the main perpetrator of "fascist atrocities" is sheer perversion of the facts. The August 28 demonstration, a moving, awe-inspiring outpouring of humanity such as has never before been witnessed in Washington or any other American city, was not directed primarily against the Administration, but was called in support of what Mao terms the "so-called civil rights legislation". Moreover, it will be followed by an all-out fight to smash the anticipated Dixiecrat filibuster against it.

To offer support to the Washington demonstration or to the Negro freedom struggle generally in terms of a fight centered against the Kennedy Administration as a fascist regime is not a help but a disservice to the cause of the Negro people. To do so would lead only to sectarian isolation, to splitting the Negro people's movement from its natural allies among the white masses instead of striving to strengthen these bonds, and to condemning it to impotence. By its position the Chinese Communist Party aligns itself with those ultra-Leftist elements in this country who belittle the Washington demonstration, who accuse its leaders of "selling out" to the Administration, and who come forward with provocative demands for resolving the struggle for Negro freedom through armed conflict.

At the Side of Reaction

In the course of the debate, the Chinese Party has repeatedly hurled at other parties the false slander that they are "following the baton" of the C.P.S.U., that is, that they speak and act as it directs. Such a manner of argument is in general unworthy of any Communist Party. But when it is directed against a Party such as ours, which is defending its very existence against the McCarran Act with its false accusation of "foreign agent", and whose leaders and members are threatened with astronomical prison terms and fines, it is doubly so. The Chinese leaders loudly protest their support of our Party in this struggle; indeed, their editorial complains that their statement of support was not given proper publicity here. However, in the face of the repeated canard that we are guilty of "following the baton" of a foreign party, such protestations become meaningless, for with it they give aid to the enemies of our Party and stab us in the back. For what can such a slander mean other than that we are in fact "foreign agents" who slavishly carry out the behest of the C.P.S.U. in this country — precisely what the McCarran Act asserts?

Nor is the Chinese leaders' assault on our Party confined to this. The editorial states that "there are not a small number of genuine Communists, both inside and outside the Communist Party of the United States, who firmly adhere to Marxism-Leninism and oppose revisionism and dogmatism". It expresses the highest hopes for these "revolutionary Marxists-Leninists of the United States". And who are these "genuine Communists"? Obviously, those individuals who oppose the ideological position and policies of our Party and support those of the C.P.C. And what is this prononuncement if not encouragement to such elements "both inside and outside" the Party to work to undermine and destroy it? In fact, it is no secret that the Chinese party gives support and encouragement to anti-Party splinter groups, led mainly by individuals who have been expelled from the Communist Party, to carry on such activities. Thus, to the deliberate falsification of our position, and to slanders about following the Soviet baton, the C.P.C. adds its direct support of anti-Party elements working to disrupt and wreck the Party.

We have noted above that the opposition of the Chinese leaders to the test-ban treaty has landed them in strange company. But this outcome is by no means confined to their position on this particular question. On the contrary, it is characteristic that on one question after another, while they start out with a highly "revolutionary" position and freely accuse other parties of "revisionism" and "betrayal", they emerge with a policy which places them side by side with reaction.

This is true of their rejection of peaceful coexistence. It is true of their stand on Cuba, which plays into the hands of those in this country who call for its invasion. It is true of their policy of centering the attack on the Kennedy Administration, which serves to strengthen the hand of the most reactionary, ultra-Right elements. It is true of their "follow the baton" slanders, which aid reaction in its efforts to destroy the Communist Party. And it is true of their growing attacks on the Soviet Union and the anti-Sovietism which has already grown to alarming proportions within China. Their abusive accusations of chauvinism, alliance with imperialism and similar crimes are grist to the mill of all enemies of the Soviet Union. In short, the Chinese Party has ended with a virtual vendetta against the first land of socialism and the leading force in the fight against imperialism, for peace and socialism, in the world today.

Again the question arises: how is this to be explained? We ask the Chinese leaders themselves, how do they explain the fact that on one issue after another they find themselves in a position which aids the enemies of peace, of national liberation, of socialism, of the Soviet Union? It is a question well worth pondering.

Increasingly, the line and tactics of the C.P.C. bear a disturbing resemblance to those of world Trotskyism, which carries to an extreme the support of imperialist reaction under the cloak of revolutionary phrasemongering. It is also characteristic of Trotskyism that it advances totally unrealistic, radical-sounding proposals as a basis for opposing immediate practical steps. To this, too, the Chinese leadership's proposal for an immediate total ban on nuclear weapons in opposition to the partial test-ban treaty is disturbingly similar. It is small wonder that the Chinese Party's line has been enthusiastically embraced by Trotskyites everywhere. Certainly, this should give the Chinese leaders pause.

For a Policy of Peaceful Coexistence

Our Party, the Communist Party of the United States, has at all times placed the struggle for peace as its foremost task. And it has at all times based itself firmly on a policy of peaceful coexistence.

In The Only Choice: Peaceful Coexistence, Gus Hall writes: "The world Marxists, including ourselves, hold that the policy of peaceful coexistence is compatible with and facilitates the class struggle, the end of colonialism and the emergence of world socialism. We firmly believe that this is not only correct, but that any other policy in the context of the realities of this epoch can lead only to defeats and setbacks."

Life has borne out the correctness of this policy, and not least in the form of the test-ban treaty. We are certain that life will continue to bear it out, and we can justifiably take pride that this policy has been ours and that we have unswervingly fought for it.

This policy has now been challenged by the Communist Party of China. Through its action the Chinese Party has precipitated a serious split in the socialist camp and the international Marxist movement, and has created disunity among the anti-imperialist forces on a world scale. The situation is a grave one, and it is not possible to foretell its exact outcome. It is to be hoped that ultimately the common desire for the world victory of socialism and communism will prevail and unity will be restored.

We have always admired and applauded the glorious achievements of the Communist Party of China in past years. We have greeted as an example for all to follow its great tactical flexibility and wisdom under the most difficult conditions. At the same time, we have always been deeply appreciative of our own obligation to fight unyieldingly every attack of U.S. imperialism against the People's Republic of China. We have consistently demanded that U.S. imperialism get out of Taiwan, and we have fought for the admission of People's China into the United Nations. And these things we shall at all times continue to do. We earnestly hope that the Chinese leaders will on their part seek the path of united struggle against a common enemy.

At present, the situation calls for a firm defense of the ideological position of the world Communist movement and our own Party. Above all, the fight for peaceful coexistence must be carried on with redoubled energy. On this, there must be no compromise, no wavering. It is the one correct path to a world of peace and socialism.

Strive for World Communist Unity

A Statement by the Central Committee of the South African Communist Party

1. Unity is Our Direct Concern

For some time our Party has been gravely perturbed at the differences within the world Communist movement. The points in dispute have been multiplied and sharpened, and the methods of discussion have become intolerably acrimonious and uncomradely. In some fraternal parties factions and breakaway groupings have resulted from differences in the world movement. Differences about Marxist theory have not been confined to the Communist parties, but have spread into international organizations and gatherings of peace, labour, national liberation and other progressive movements embracing both Communists and non-Communists. Even state relations between socialist countries were affected, with serious effects on their economic development and endangering the solidarity of the socialist camp.

We cannot take a detached view of this problem. Our Party is taking part in a grim struggle against the fascist apartheid regime, known, hated and despised by the whole world. Our people have embarked on the path of armed resistance rather than submit to the tyranny and degradation of continued White minority domination; foremost leaders of the South African people are being arbitrarily arrested, tortured and murdered by the Verwoerd-Vorster dictatorship.

Our struggle against apartheid is not only of local, but also of crucial international importance. The fight against the special form of colonialism existing in South Africa is an integral part of the struggle for the liberation of the whole African continent from colonialism in all its forms: the continuing African Revolution for freedom, unity and rapid social progress. The fascist South African regime with its powerful military machine, built up with the aid of the imperialists, poses an urgent threat to African independence and security and to world peace. Solidarity with the struggle against apartheid, the international isolation of the Verwoerd regime, and the severing of its links with imperialism which sustain it and enable it to continue its rule of oppression—these questions have become a focus of international attention, discussion and activity: a rallying point of the forces of peace, national liberation and socialism everywhere. Unity of the progressive forces of the world will hasten the liberation of our people. Disunity prolongs the agony of South Africa.

Reprinted from International Bulletin, No. 5, December 1963.

The heart and soul of the unity of the anti-imperialist forces, both on an international scale and within each country, is the Communist movement. Fruitless and protracted disputes among ourselves both distract us from our great common aims and retard the achievement of unity of all anti-imperialist forces. For that reason in particular we South African Communists are vitally concerned with the world unity of our movement. International Communist unity is a correct slogan, an essential for the security and progress of the socialist camp, the defence of peace and the advance of national liberation everywhere. For us South African Communists it is also an urgent practical necessity affecting our work in many different ways.

2. Some of the Problems under Discussion

In considering some of the specific problems under discussion, we are guided by our own independent judgement; by our understanding of Marxism-Leninism and our experience of forty-two years of struggle of our Party in extremely complicated and difficult conditions. Throughout the history of our Party we have been accused by the capitalists and others of being blind followers or agents of "Moscow". These were baseless and unworthy slanders. Communists in all countries have faced prison and death because they have the ability to think for themselves and the courage to say what they think. We supported the main lines of policy of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union because we considered they were correct, in the interests of the Soviet people, of the workers and oppressed people of our own country and of the whole world. We did not allow slander or persecution to deter us from expressing our views. In the same spirit we defended anti-imperialist struggles in all parts of the world, including the heroic Chinese revolution. History has vindicated the correctness of our understanding and judgement, on which we continue to rely today in considering various matters of international debate.

It is being suggested today that the leadership of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union has abandoned revolutionary Marxism-Leninism in favour of revisionism, and that the policy of peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems involves capitulation to imperialism and the abandonment of wars of national liberation. We do not believe these suggestions are in any way justified.

We considered, and still do, that the Twenty-Second Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, and the Programme it adopted for the building of Communism, were outstanding contributions to the development of Marxist-Leninist theory. These conclusions are embodied in our own Programme, The Road to South African Freedom, which was adopted at our Fifth National Conference in 1962 after the fullest discussion among all of our members.

The policy of peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems, as the basic line of foreign policy of the socialist countries is not something new, that has been advanced in the past two or three years. It was put forward by Lenin, and it has been elaborated since the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. in present day conditions. This concept was approved in the clearest terms by the meetings of fraternal parties in 1957 and 1960. Our own Party participated in, approved and endorsed these decisions, and carried them out in its practical work. In our view the peaceful resolution of the Cuban crisis and the conclusion of the Moscow Treaty on atomic tests are positive results of this concept and proof of its validity; they were events which lowered international tension and helped to prevent the imperialists from plunging the world into the ultimate horror and disaster of a general thermonuclear war.

We regard the Moscow Treaty as a positive achievement of the progressive forces all over the world, including South Africa, which have long been campaigning for the ending of nuclear tests. The treaty puts a stop to the dangerous contamination of the air and the oceans. It helps, and is a step forward in our continuing struggle for the abandonment and destruction of all nuclear weapons, and for eventual general, complete and controlled disarmament. We vigorously condemn the French government which intends to go on with nuclear tests on the soil of our continent and elsewhere, poisoning the air we breathe. And we regret very much that the Chinese comrades, by belittling and attacking the Moscow Treaty, weaken the international exposure and isolation of French imperialism on this matter.

We South Africans, like all fighters for African freedom, are keenly conscious of the solidarity, the support both moral and practical, rendered to our struggle by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. We remember Suez; we remember Algeria; we remember the innumerable occasions when our cause has been championed by the socialist countries; we know of their unqualified backing for African freedom today. No sincere African patriot will ever forget these things. The plain facts of present-day history disprove any suggestion that the Soviet Union, or the policy of peaceful coexistence, or the demand for disarmement hamper or retard the national liberation of colonial or formerly colonial peoples.

As stated in our Programme, universal disarmament would not only free our generation from the nightmare of a catastrophic nuclear war; it would also "greatly assist the cause of national liberation by striking the arms from the hands of the imperialists". It is not the African patriots, fighting an armed struggle with inferior weapons, who are adversely affected by our campaign for disarmament; it is the powerfully-armed enemies against whom they fight. It is the imperialists and the armament-manufacturers, in particular it is the Verwoerds, the Salazars, the Chiang Kai-sheks and their like, who profit from international tension and the cold war. International tension and the cold war facilitate the continuing support of these condemned regimes by imperialism, on the grounds that they are "bastions of the West, of anti-communism". Already a certain lessening of tension has brought about a situation where an international arms embargo on South Africa could be passed by the United Nations, and a further relaxation of cold war pressures could enable this embargo to be enforced. Ending the cold war would help towards the liquidation of the remaining islands of colonialism and fascism both through mass political struggle and armed revolution.

The national-liberation movements of countries which are fighting colonialism and neo-colonialism and the heritage of colonialism in Africa, Asia and Latin America are not alone in their struggles. They share common aims and aspirations with the working people of the socialist countries and the developed capitalist countries. They have a common enemy: international imperialism. There is a profoundly necessary and healthy trend for all the progressive movements of all countries to merge in a mighty stream for peace and the liberation of all mankind. Our Party is vigorously opposed to any tendency to isolate our national-liberation movement from their allies and brothers in the socialist countries, and from the militant labour and progressive anti-imperialist movements in the capitalist countries. Such tendencies are fraught with the gravest dangers.

We in South Africa have striven ceaselessly to preserve and uphold the character of our people's struggle for freedom as a united movement both of the oppressed non-whites and the progressive whites. It is not the Communists, not the national-liberation leaders, but Verwoerd and his kind, enemies of mankind, who try to divide people on lines of "colour". They try to present a picture of an inevitable conflict, in South Africa and all over the world: not a conflict between workers and capitalists, between oppressor and oppressed, but solely one between the so-called "white" and "non-white" races. It is the duty of all Communists and other anti-fascists, everywhere, to fight uncompromisingly against any such utterly false, dangerous and anti-human ideas.

3. Divisions Can and Must Be Healed

We believe strongly that the principles and interests which the world Communist movement and the socialist countries have in common are far more fundamental, permanent and binding than any temporary differences on day-to-day policy which have arisen or may again arise. We are sure that time will prove this view to be correct, and that these long-term and fundamental factors will reassert themselves. We are vigorously opposed to any "theory" that a split, an organizational cleavage in our movement is inevitable, necessary or "healthy". The only ones who would welcome such a theory are the imperialists, and those confused elements, unprincipled careerists and adventurers, Trotskyists and others who are always ready to profit by differences between serious revolutionaries in order to establish a platform for themselves.

Honest anti-imperialist fighters outside the ranks of the Communist movement, trade unionists, peace workers and others are dismayed by the sharp differences that have arisen in our movement and by the unseemly methods used to express them. They do not wish to be drawn into our dispute, and they demand urgently that we settle our problems among ourselves and get on with the innumerable practical tasks they and we have in common.

In the past, our great Communist movement has known many attempts to split it and to divert it from the path of Marxism-Leninism. Such attempts, for example, were made by elements like the anarchists and the Trotskyites. For some time they gained a certain amount of support among sections of the "ultra-Left" middle-class intellectuals who always attach themselves to the revolutionary movement, and whose character was so brilliantly analyzed by Lenin in his masterly essay: "Left-Wing" Communism: An Infantile Disorder. Again, on many occasions, oportunist, Right-wing tendencies developed in the working class movement, especially in the imperialist countries, based on the sharing of a portion of the imperialists' superprofits with the "aristocracy of labour" as the price for their support. But all these erroneous concepts and theories have been tested and proved false by the unfolding of history, they have been rejected by the revolutionary working class and the anti-imperialist masses. Marxism-Leninism has been proved by history to be the only correct revolutionary theory, and communism the only alternative to capitalism with its poverty, exploitation and oppression; its crises, chaos and wars.

Moreover, we Communists, coming from all over the world, and with widely differing conditions of life and work, have reached, on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, an extraordinary degree of unanimity. We have agreed on the new problems with which life has faced us, on the characterization of our new epoch and on the most pressing and urgent problems of the world we live in today. The only differences which remain among us are those relating to the detailed interpretation of agreements we have already reached.

There is thus no basis, in theory or in fact, in differences of class or national interest or outlook, for any split within our ranks. It would be idle to pretend that sericus divergencies have not already taken place, and serious damage caused, by disagreements among us Communists, and by uncomradely methods of debate. But the damage is not irreparable. Our pressing need for unity must override all our differences. The immediate problem is: what is the way out of this situation? How can we Communists heal the breaches and restore unity, comradeship and confidence among all of us?

We think the first step is to bring to an end the unseemly type of unrestrained "all-in" controversy we have been witnessing in which all methods have been regarded as permissible for "victory". In reality such controversy can lead to no "victory"; all the Communists stand to lose by it. There can be no possibility of calm and rational debate. Issues are multiplied out of reason; the air is filled with recriminations and angry insults; state relations between socialist countries deteriorate to the point where economic development and even security are adversely affected; our friends are repelled; destructive factional struggles spread inside every Party; only the enemy rejoices.

We do not think any useful purpose will be served by discussing who was to blame for this deplorable state of affairs, or who started it. What is important is to make a new start, a new drive for unity. And we are sure that the first essential step is to bring to an immediate end the period of debate of our differences outside the ranks of the Communist movement itself.

By this we do not mean, of course, that we should not discuss our differences; without discussion and interchange of views there can be no agreement. But we do mean that the discussion should be brought under control; that before further discussions we should have agreement on exactly what subjects are to be discussed, and by whom, and in what manner.

We are of the opinion, in general, that detailed discussions should be limited to those directly concerned. In particular we think that the detailed interpretation of questions of Marxist-Leninist theory should never be submitted for debate or arbitration to non-Communists.

We think that all of us should scrupulously observe certain rules of comradely discussion. It is impermissible to ascribe views to others which they have not expressed, or which are derived by inferences and out-of-context quotations. Nor is it permissible to ascribe improper and un-Communists motives to comrades with whom one disagrees.

We think that questions regarding the internal policy of any Party should not as a rule be generally debated by fraternal parties. If one Party has criticism to make of the internal policy of another it should be made in a private and comradely manner.

We would urge, with all due modesty, that on the basis of some such preliminary understanding, and on the basis of ending the public controversy, discussions should be held between the leaderships of the socialist countries as a means of preparing the way for a general discussion of the whole Communist movement. Without an understanding and discussions of this kind we do not think any useful purpose would be served by a big meeting of all the parties at the present time.

For our part, we shall do all we can to strive for unity in the world Communist movement. We shall discuss every issue on its merits, regardles of who puts forward any viewpoint. And we shall contest vigorously any viewpoint which disunites, diverts or confuses the Communist and working-class movement, the anti-Colonialist African Revolution and the great struggle for South African freedom.

We call upon all South African Communists to defend the unity of our Party, based on our Marxist-Leninist Programme, and to fight ruthlessly against any sort of factionalism, which in present-day conditions of illegality and repression endanger the very existence of our Party and the lives of all our members.

In the name of our great world movement, as well as of our noble fight for South African freedom, the cause of all progressive humanity, we appeal to all the leaders and members of our fraternal parties to strive for a new beginning, an overwhelming campaign for unity.

Long live communism! Long live the unity of the world Communist movement!

Resolution of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Martinique on the Situation in the International Communist Movement

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of Martinique has thoroughly examined the ideological differences in the international Communist movement.

It notes that there are serious differences of opinion between the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the overwhelming majority of Communist parties, on the one hand, and the Chinese Communist Party and some other parties, on the other hand, on a number of basic issues.

The Central Committee dwelt mainly on the principal issues with a direct bearing on the tasks of our Party and the struggle of the people of Martinique, namely:

— the problem of peace and peaceful coexistence;

— the question of the personality cult;

— the problem of transition from capitalism to socialism;

— the connection between the struggle of the international working class and the national-liberation movement.

Peaceful Coexistence Is the Correct Way

The Communist Party of Martinique reaffirms its full agreement with the general line of the world revolutionary movement as outlined in the Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960.

On the question of war and peace, which is the most pressing problem of our time, the Communist Party reaffirms its agreement with the thesis of the 81-Party Statement that "world war can be prevented" and that "a real possibility will have arisen to exclude world war from the life of society even before socialism achieves complete victory on earth, with capitalism still existing in a part of the world."

This assessment is based on an objective analysis of the content of our time which is characterized by the decisive strength of the combined forces of the socialist camp, the international working class, the national-liberation movement and the other democratic and peace-loving forces. A new world balance favouring the forces of peace and progress has come into being, and with it the possibility of compelling imperialism to accept peaceful coexistence.

In a situation when the world is divided into two systems the only correct and rational principle of international relations is peaceful coexistence of states with differing social systems.

The choice is between peaceful coexistence and thermonuclear war.

The Central Committee notes that recent international events, such as the Caribbean crisis and the limited test-ban treaty, have demonstrated the correctness of the policy of peaceful coexistence pursued by the U.S.S.R. and the erroneousness of the stand taken by the Chinese comrades.

During the Caribbean crisis it was the Soviet Union's levelheadedness and high sense of responsibility that preserved world peace and at the same time made it possible to save the Cuban socialist revolution and safeguard the very existence of the Cuban people.

As for the limited test-ban treaty, it is a solemn commitment to end nuclear explosions causing the greatest damage to people's health, and to prevent the dangerous proliferation of nuclear weapons which would make it increasingly difficult to avert a new war; it is a step forward which all peoples should support with a view to winning a complete ban on the testing, manufacture and use of nuclear weapons and to achieiving general controlled disarmament. The opposition of the Chinese Communist Party to peaceful coexistence being recognized as the general line of the foreign policy of the socialist countries runs counter to the 81-Party Statement.

The Communist Party of Martinique condemns the attacks made by the Chinese comrades against the Soviet government, which they accuse of "betrayal of the peoples and socialism" during the Caribbean crisis and in connection with the signing of the Moscow treaty. The Communist Party of Martinique holds that the Soviet Union served well the cause of the peoples and of socialism.

The assertions of the Chinese comrades that the peaceful coexistence advocated by the C.P.S.U. and other Communist parties means "class collaboration between the exploiters and the exploited", or "collaboration between the oppressed nations and the oppressor countries", are completely groundless. The facts show that peaceful coexistence creates the most favourable conditions for the victory of the national-liberation movement and the disintegration of the colonial system, that it favours the class struggle in the countries under imperialist rule. Peaceful coexistence is a form of class struggle between capitalism and socialism on a world scale.

For us socialism means peace. There is no doubt that world war would signify the complete annihilation of many peoples, including the numerically small people of Martinique, which a single nuclear bomb could wipe off the face of the earth.

The policy of peaceful coexistence pursued by the socialist camp, exerting an influence on the French, British and U.S. imperialists, ensured the victory of the Cuban revolution and facilitated the achievement of independence or autonomy by most of the Caribbean countries as well as the anti-imperialist struggle in Latin America. It greatly facilitates the liberation struggle of the people of Martinique while impeding the intrigues of U.S. imperialism against our country.

Against the Personality Cult

In the matter of the personality cult, the Chinese comrades, while posing as "opponents of exaggerating the role of individuals", now come out against the decisions of the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. and criticize those who raised the question of "combating the personality cult", especially the comrades from the C.P.S.U. who exposed the Stalin cult.

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of Martinique is convinced that there was a personality cult in Stalin's time and that it was necessary to expose this cult, which paralyzed the creative initiative of the masses and could only act as a brake on the development of the socialist society.

The Communist Party of Martinique knows from its own experience, and especially from the events of 1956, that the personality cult presents a threat also to the Communist parties of countries which have not freed themselves from capitalism, that it can cause serious harm to the working class, and that it must be energetically combated.

Forms of Transition to Socialism

As regards the ways in which the socialist world system develops, the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Martinique agrees, as hitherto, with the thesis of the 81-Party Statement concerning the possibility of peaceful ways to socialism becoming available to the peoples under certain conditions.

Peaceful transition to socialism, the possibility of which Lenin conceded in theory, appeared to be a very remote likelihood in his time. But for all that Lenin foresaw that the international role of the great commonwealth of socialist nations and its influence on the march of world events would rapidly grow.

Today, when the world balance has changed in favour of the forces of progress, when the socialist world system has become the decisive factor of social development, transition to socialism by peaceful means is becoming increasingly possible, a fact which the Communist parties naturally cannot ignore. By redoubling its efforts in order to leave the United States behind in peaceful competition, the Soviet Union is setting an example for the peoples and thereby facilitating their struggle for socialism.

This, however, has never been understood to mean that the working class should renounce the non-peaceful way. "... The degree of bitterness and the forms of the class struggle will depend not so much on the proletariat as on the resistance put up by the reactionary circles to the will of the overwhelming majority of the people, on these circles using force at one or other stage of the struggle for socialism. The actual possibility of the one or the other way of transition to socialism in each individual country depends on the concrete historical conditions." The working class should be prepared for the "most rapid and sudden shifts from one form of struggle to the other".

The International Working-Class Movement Is the Mainstay of the National-Liberation Movement

Serious differences have arisen also as regards the role of the national-liberation movement in the world revolutionary process.

On this question the Communist Party of Martinique reaffirms its support of the theses contained in the 81-Party Statement, namely, that the socialist world system is the decisive factor in the evolution of human society and that, even if the national-liberation movement in Africa, Asia and Latin America represents a very substantial force in the world revolutionary movement, the basic contradiction of our time is, nevertheless, the contradiction between capitalism and socialism.

The Communist Party of Martinique condemns the accusations levelled by the Communist Party of China against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union that the C.P.S.U. allegedly "scorns the liberation struggle of the oppressed nations". Proceeding from this false premise, the Chinese comrades have sought to exclude the U.S.S.R. and other socialist countries from some international conferences dealing with the problems of Asia and Africa. Such a concept can only lead to isolating the national-liberation movement from the international working-class movement, depriving it of its main support. In reality the Soviet Union is rendering the most effective aid in many forms both to peoples fighting for their liberation (including those waging an armed struggle) and to newly-emerged states working to consolidate their political and economic independence, as can be seen from the example of Cuba, the United Arab Republic, Algeria, Angola, Guinea and many other countries.

In reality, the revolutionary cause of the peoples depends wholly on the merging of all the revolutionary forces of our time in a single stream. In this alliance the decisive role belongs to the international working class and its creation — the socialist world system.

The international Communist movement must devote the utmost attention and render maximum support to the national-liberation struggle.

Unity Must Be Preserved

The Communist Party of Martinique considers the unity of the international Communist movement to be a prime factor making for the rapid advance of the world revolutionary movement.

It is deeply distressed by the present differences which are fraught with the danger of a split and impede the progress of the cause of the proletariat and the peoples' liberation struggle. In its opinion, those who are seeking to provoke a split are taking a grave responsibility upon themselves. To overcome the differences, all parties must respect the agreed decisions jointly adopted at international conferences of the Communist parties.

The Communist Party of Martinique therefore declares for the convocation of a conference of all Communist parties to confirm once again the general line of the international Communist movement.

The Communists of Martinique are convinced that the international Communist movement will be able to overcome the differences and to preserve its unity.

The Central Committee calls upon all Communists of Martinique to rally in solid unity under the banner of proletarian internationalism and, guided by Marxism Leninism, to adhere to the line charted by the international Communist movement in order sucessfully to carry the liberation struggle to completion.

Adopted unanimously, November 3, 1963.

On the International Movement

Statement of the National Executive Committee, Communist Party of Canada

This National Committee meeting re-affirms once again its support for the general line of the international Communist movement as expressed in the Declaration and Statement of the 1957 and 1960 Moscow Conferences of Communist and Worker's parties with which our Party Program fully corresponds.

Events since then have fully demonstrated their validity and power.

Our Party has at various occasions (National Convention, National Committee meetings and through a Party delegation to the C.P.S.U. and C.P. of China) expressed its views on the ideological differences in the world Communist movement which in the recent period have become much more acute.

The general line of the world movement has been attacked by the leadership of the C.P. of China under cover of pseudo revolutionary phrases with the aim of imposing its own line, its own policy on the world Communist movement, in the course of which it has undertaken a slanderous campaign directed to discrediting the Soviet Union, the C.P.S.U. and other Communist and Workers parties.

By its actions the C.P. of China has done serious harm to the unity of the world Communist movement. Under the guise of combating revisionism the C.P. of China has undertaken to split the world Communist movement, assumed the right to interfere in the internal affairs of fraternal parties, striven to separate and isolate the national liberation movement from the socialist system of states and from the working class in the capitalist countries, separated itself from the socialist system of states with respect to the fight for peace, peaceful coexistence and disarmament and with regard to those policies of economic cooperation between socialist states which would enable them to compete most sucessfully with capitalism in the economic field and thereby most effectively to demonstrate to the working class of the capitalist countries the superiority of the socialist economy.

By labelling U.S. imperialism and its A- and H-Bombs as "paper tigers" and declaring that the struggle for life and against nuclear war is cowardly the C.P. of China shows that it fails to understand the nature of world nuclear war and minimizes the possibility of rallying the majority of mankind to fight against nuclear war in order to preserve life.

Reprinted from Discussion, December 1963.

By incorrectly posing the issue as being world revolution as against peaceful coexistence, on the pretext that peaceful coexistence bans revolutionary struggle and impedes it, the C.P. of China in effect denies the decisive character of the struggle for peace, for disarmament and for peaceful coexistence in the present epoch. It plays down the struggles of the people for that aim and its revolutionary potential. It mechanically separates two aspects of one process in the sense that the struggle for peace in today's conditions offers the most favorable opportunities to curb imperialism and advance the cause of socialism, facilitating the struggle for national liberation as well as stimulating the struggles of the working-class and democratic forces against monopoly in the capitalist world, thereby widening the social base of struggle for the advance to socialism. In today's conditions with thermonuclear weapons now available which can inflict wholesale destruction on mankind, the struggle for peace becomes the main world force against imperialism and for socialism. It is this new possibility which the C.P. of China rejects.

By the statement that a world without wars is only possible after the destruction of imperialism everywhere and that the chiefs of staff of the imperialist countries decide the issue of peace or war, the C.P. of China comes out in opposition to the 1957 and 1960 World Conferences on the non-inevitability of war and denies in effect that a world war can be averted arising from the new anti-war, anti-imperialist forces which have emerged on the world arena and which, if united are able to impose peace on the warmakers.

On the one hand the C.P. of China declares that the main areas of revolutionary storms have shifted to Asia, Africa and Latin America from where imperialism will be destroyed and emancipation will come to the working people in the capitalist world, in effect denying the historic role of the working class and the socialist system of states in the defeat of imperialism. On the other hand the C.P. of China accuses our Party and other Communist and Workers parties in the capitalist countries of being reformist and cowardly and looks on the struggle for democratic aims, for the immediate economic needs of the working people, and above all, the struggle for peace, as unimportant matters, or at best tactical slogans. The C.P. of China counterposes the struggle for socialism to the struggle for peace, declaring that the struggle for peace diverts the masses from socialist revolution. Such an approach closes the door to a truly effective struggle against imperialism, which as Lenin said "is nothing except monopoly capitalism", isolates the working class from its allies and our Party from the working class. It is another example of sheer pseudo-revolutionary phrasemongering which our Party completely rejects.

On all questions of peace and war and the struggle for peaceful coexistence as well as with respect to the possibility of peaceful transition to socialism, which the C.P. of China proposes to replace by policies of advocacy of export of revolution, the C.P. of China takes positions opposed to that of our Party and its Program.

What is involved here is not only a matter of interpretation of the 1957 and 1960 world documents but the advancement of another line based on entirely different estimates and different conclusions from present-day phenomena. These differences have already found their concrete expression with respect to the Caribbean crisis, the solution of border conflicts, and the partial test-ban treaty and follow logically from the erroneous policies pursued by the C.P. of China. They constitute a form of sabotage of efforts at the settlement of differences through negotiations and mutual compromise as they constitute a form of sabotage of the concrete forms of the struggle for peace and disarmament. They weaken the world front of peace and thereby aid imperialism.

In sum total the policies advanced by the C.P. of China represents a nationalist line, a dogmatic line, an adventurist line and were it to become the basis of the policies of the world Communist movement, could do incalculable harm to the cause of peace, the national-liberation movement, the working-class struggle in the capitalist world and the cause of world socialism. At the bottom it is a line of defeatism and retreat covered up by pseudo-revolutionary phrases which ignore the new possibilities appearing in our epoch due to the decisive shifts in the relationship of forces on a world scale.

For our Party as for all Communist and Workers parties in the capitalist world the policies advanced by the C.P. of China would close the door to the masses of working people without whom there can be no effective struggle for peace, democracy, independence or for socialism.

This National Committee meeting affirms again its principled and unalterable opposition to the erroneous non-Marxist and anti-Leninist positions of the leadership of the C.P. of China. It endorses the N.E.C. statement of October 3, 1963 which called upon the Party as a whole to strengthen and extend our work to enlighten and clarify all democratic people concerning the confusion and the encouragement to disruption inherent in the propaganda of the C.P. of China and which called for a world conference of Communist and Workers parties to rally behind the principles of Marxism-Leninism as embodied in the documents of 1957 and 1960 so as to defeat the dogmatic trend which has appeared in the world movement. We urge that agreement be reached to end public polemices so that a proper atmosphere can be created for the convening of such a World Conference.

The enemies of communism, of peace and socialism rejoice too soon and consider that the differences in the world Communist movement are irreconcilable, cannot be resolved and that a split is inevitable. This is furthest from the truth. The differences which have arisen in the world movement are not rooted in the socialist system but arise from subjectivist, one-sided and therefore erroneous views on the part of the C.P. of China with regard to world phenomena. Precisely because they are subjective in character, they can and will be resolved on the basis of the solid foundations of Marxism-Leninism as embodied in the 1957 and 1960 documents of the world Communist movement.

The National Committee declares that our Party, like the majority of Communist and Workers parties, will patiently persevere in all efforts at restoring and consolidating unity on a firm principled basis.

Joint Statement of the Communist Parties of France and Spain

The following statement issued jointly by the French Communist Party and the Communist Party of Spain was published in l'Humanité on January 7, 1964:

Delegations of the French Communist Party and the Communist Party of Spain met in December 1963 for an extensive exchange of information and views which took place in an atmosphere of fraternity. The discussion revealed complete identity of views on both the international situation and the political atmosphere and perspectives in France and Spain.

The two delegations reaffirm their allegiance to the thesis contained in the Statement of the 81-Parthy meeting that "the democratic and peace forces today have no task more pressing than that of safeguarding humanity against a global thermonuclear disaster".

They also stress the significance of the Moscow partial test-ban treaty signed by over a hundred states and hail it as an important step towards averting this disaster. The Moscow treaty opens to the peoples new perspectives of progress, the road to fresh success for the peace-loving forces. It is the result of the peace-loving policy of the U.S.S.R. and the socialist camp as a whole, the outcome of the struggle waged by the peoples for peace.

Further efforts in the struggle for peace will make it possible to secure the ending of all nuclear tests—including underground tests—general and controlled disarmament, and negotiated settlement of all outstanding issues, in particular those of Germany and West Berlin. Nuclear war must be made impossible by waging a vigorous and incessant struggle for the prohibition and destruction of atomic weapons, for disarmament, for a world without arms and without armies.

The struggle for world peace, for general and controlled disarmament is in the best interests of humanity as a whole; this struggle fully corresponds to the interests and traditions of our two peoples and our parties. The two delegations energetically reject the idea that victorious socialism can be achieved through a nuclear world war. The advance of democracy, the ultimate victory of socialism in the capitalist countries, the consolidation of socialism and the transition to communism in countries where the working class has already come to power—all this is intimately linked up with the defence of world peace and the policy of peaceful coexistence. The two delegations reaffirm that the struggle for peace, coexistence and general and controlled disarmament remains the major task for all Communist and Workers' parties.

The delegations of the French Communist Party and the Communist Party of Spain believe that in order to ensure the security of their peoples and of the whole world it is necessary to intensify the struggle for dismantling U.S. military bases, against the installation of West-German military bases in France and in Europe as a whole, against de Gaulle's atomic "striking force" and against giving atomic weapons to the Bonn government either through the Bonn-Paris axis or by way of building "multilateral forces". The two delegations denounce the collaboration and joint military manoeuvres conducted by the governments of de Gaulle and Franco as a menace to peace and democracy, as a form of support extended by the Gaullist regime to the rotten tyranny which oppresses the people of Spain.

The two delegations have reaffirmed their solidarity with the Communists and other democrats persecuted and imprisoned in Portugal, West Germany, Greece, Iraq, Morocco and Martinique.

The two parties reaffirm their complete solidarity with the movement for national and social liberation and voice their support for the peoples still oppressed by colonialism—the peoples of Angola, Portuguese and Spanish Guinea and South Rhodesia. They salute the peoples fighting against neo-colonialism and imperialism, in particular the peoples of Venezuela, South Vietnam and Laos.

The two parties proclaim their solidarity with heroic Cuba and its struggle against the provocations of U.S. imperialism, to safeguard its independence and consolidate its socialist system. They also declare their solidarity with the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria and express their sympathy for the socialist changes being carried out in that country.

The Communist Party of Spain and the French Communist Party reaffirm their conviction that the cooperation of the newly-free countries with the countries of the socialist camp and with the working-class movement in the capitalist countries is an earnest of new successes in the struggle against imperialism, for human progress and for peace.

The changes taking place in the world and the major successes scored by the two parties go to show the correctness of the line jointly elaborated and unanimously approved by the meetings of the Communist and Workers' parties in 1957 and 1960.

In the European capitalist countries, as is shown, among other things, by the experience of France and Spain, large-scale mass actions of the working class and other anti-monopoly sections have taken place in recent times, which opens the perspective of a new advance for the democratic forces, the perspective of a still more vigorous struggle to curb and, ultimately, abolish the power of the monopolies. With each passing day the ideas of socialism are striking deeper and deeper roots among the mass of the working people, intellectuals and the youth. The forces and influence of the Communist and Workers' parties are growing.

In this evolution the success of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, the power of attraction exerted by their policy of peace and their disinterested aid to other peoples play an enormous role. This evolution received particularly great impetus after the Twentieth and Twenty-Second congresses of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union which, overcoming the consequences of the personality cult and boldly developing the creative spirit of Marxism-Leninism, have rendered an inestimable service to the cause of communism. Each day more and more people realize the absurdity of the situation when the great scientific and technological achievements of our time are utilized, in large measure, for the manufacture of terrible and ruinous weapons of mass dectruction, while their peaceful use would make it possible to put an end to the hunger and poverty still plaguing the people in many parts of the world and to the disgraceful inequality which still exists.

The responsibility of the imperialist system for this state of affairs and the need to advance to a system of society which will place the achievement of science and technology at the service of man—and this system is socialism— are becoming increasingly obvious to all, including people who, ideologically, are still very remote from Marxism-Leninism.

In our time the people come to socialism following different roads. New perspectives of reaching mutual understanding and unity in the struggle for peace, democracy and socialism are now on hand. The possibility of achieving socialism along their own, peaceful ways in a number of coutries is based precisely on the might of the socialist world system, those profound changes which have occurred in the world and on the unprecedented growth of productive forces—factors which also determine the growth of people's consciousness.

The delegations of the French Communist Party and the Communist Party of Spain have agreed on the need to carry on the policy of building the unity of the working class and all other democratic forces both in the struggle for democracy and in the struggle for socialism.

In view of this perspective, the two parties consider it necessary to exert every effort in order to secure unity of action with the Socialist parties in both countries and with other organizations, including Catholic organizations which adopt advanced positions on the social and political plane.

The French Communist Party and the Communist Party of Spain maintain that in the present historical situation it is possible to achieve in both countries effective cooperation between the Communist parties and other democratic parties not only in the present-day struggle for democracy but in the struggle for socialism as well.

The two parties express satisfaction with their close fraternal co-operation under the banner of proletarian internationalism. They consider that communism is internationalist in its very essence. Deriving from the experience of the international Communist movement the vanguard of which is the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and upholding the fundamental principles of our teaching and its method of creative analysis of new phenomena, the common general line of the Communist and working-class movement, which also respects the specific features of each party and each country, is both possible and necessary.

Therefore, while voicing their agreement with practically the entire international Communist movement, the two parties are indignant at the splitting activities carried out by the leaders of the Communist Party of China both in inter-party relations and inside the fraternal parties of various countries. Both parties believe that a split can only play into the hands of the imperialists. They denounce the violent attacks launched by the Communist Party of China against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and its leaders and also against the other Communist parties which uphold the line approved by the international Communist movement. The two parties declare that the sectarian and dogmatic line advocated by the leaders of the Communist Party of China is only capable of isolating the Communists from the masses and leading to their defeat.

The French Communist Party and the Communist Party of Spain express their firm resolution to exert every necessary effort, working side by side with the C.P.S.U. and other parties of the international Communist and working-class movement and displaying the maximum of patience, to overcome the present differences with the Chinese comrades on the basis of Marxism-Leninism. The two parties express their desire to achieve this, without, however, losing sight of the considerable difficulties arising from the violent, uncomradely character which the Chinese Party imparts to the open polemics, and also from its refusal to maintain this polemic within the framework of the international Communist and working-class movement.

The two parties favour the convocation of a conference of the international Communist and working-class movement which could make an important contribution to healing the split and reinforcing unity.

Patiently conducting the discussion on a principled political and ideological foundation, the two parties will spare no effort and miss no opportunity to promote and reinforce unity which is the guarantee of the triumph of peace and socialism.

The Situation in the World Communist Movement

(From the Speech by Alvaro Cunhal at the Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Portugal, August 1963)

Comrade Cunhal noted that the position of the Portuguese Communist Party in the debate had been consistent throughout. In 1960, when the Communist Party of China published and circulated all over the world its pamphlet Long Live Leninism in which it attacked the general line adopted in 1957, the Political Committee of our Party published a document entitled "Three Problems of Today", refuting the basic theses of the Chinese comrades.

In this document, which examined the question of the different ways leading to the victory of socialism on a world scale, our Party strongly opposed the theory that war is inevitable and that this being the case, only through war can socialism defeat imperialism. To claim that capitalism can be defeated only through the medium of world war, stated the document, would be sheer Bonapartist adventurism unworthy of the followers of Marx, Engels and Lenin. Socialism will triumph throughout the world in peaceful competition between nations.

The document laid special emphasis on the fact that the roads to socialism are many and varied; it pointed out that in a number of countries the peaceful road is becoming more and more feasible and rejected the theses of the Chinese comrades on this score.

Peaceful Coexistence, a Product and a Factor of the World Revolutionary Process

The establishment by the international working class of the socialist world system embracing one-third of mankind, the collapse of the colonial system and the winning of independence by many peoples, and the successes of the working-class movement in the capitalist countries have radically changed the balance of forces in the world today. From this the international Communist movement has drawn the scientifically substantiated conclusion that imperialism can be curbed, world war averted and war ruled out of the life of the peoples even before the victory of socialism on a world scale.

Our Chinese comrades reject this thesis, maintaining that so long as imperialism exists war is inevitable. From the theory and the policy of the Chinese comrades it follows that world war is essential for the triumph of socialism. Hence their criticism of the policy of peaceful coexistence, their objection to negotiations and agreements aimed at easing international tension, and their disparagement of any effort toward disarmament.

The international Communist movement stands foursquare for peaceful coexistence of states with differing social systems. The Leninist principle of peaceful coexistence, which is the general line of foreign policy pursued by the U.S.S.R. and the other socialist countries, has the full support of the world Communist movement. It is the only policy that serves the interests of peace, democracy, national independence and socialism.

The general trend of world development today confirms the correctness of this policy. The Caribbean crisis perhaps more than anything else demonstrated the soundness and the effectiveness of the policy of peaceful coexistence unswervingly pursued by the Soviet Union. And since the Chinese comrades seized upon the Caribbean crisis as the most eloquent confirmation of the "correctness" of their own position in opposing the policy of peaceful coexistence, permit me, comrades, to say a few words on this question.

On October 28, 1962 the Central Committee of our Party published and widely circulated in our own country a manifesto exposing the plans to attack Cuba and supporting the firm and admirable policy of the Soviet Union and the heroic Cuban people as "an example of courage for all peoples", and appealing to all Portuguese to protest against the threatened invasion of Cuba and to step up the struggle against the policy of the Salazar government and in defence of peace. After the Caribbean crisis had been settled, our Party, in its leading underground organ Avante, and also in a number of documents, made a detailed analysis of the situation. The manifesto published in November by the Party leadership in the province of do Sul, for example, pointed out that "thanks to the courage and resolution of the Cuban people and the consistent peace policy pursued by the Soviet Union, Cuba's sovereignty had been preserved, the Cuban revolution defended and the peace safeguarded."

Like our Party, the majority of the fraternal parties took the right stand during those crucial days when the fate of world peace hung in the balance.

Not so the Chinese comrades. They accused the Soviet Union of having indulged in an "adventurist" policy by placing its rockets in Cuba, and charged that the withdrawal of the rockets was an act of political "surrender". They called the agreement with the United States a "new Munich". Yes, comrades, those were the very words they used. They maintained that the Soviet Union had exposed Cuba to imperialist intervention. "No compromises!" they shouted. "Imperialism is a paper tiger!"

The Chinese comrades have repeatedly asserted that the enemy must be taken seriously on a tactical plane and treated with contempt on a strategical plane. This means, they explain, that in the long run, prospectively, the enemy is bound to be defeated, i.e., he should be regarded as a "paper tiger", but at the given moment, in each concrete instance of conflict he is still capable of offering serious resistance to the revolutionary forces and should hence be regarded as a real tiger (see Liu Shao-tsi's speech at the Meeting of the 81 parties in 1960). More, our Chinese comrades emphasize that those who do not have the courage to scorn the enemy on the strategic plane are committing Right-wing opportunist mistakes; while those who scorn the enemy not only strategically but tactically are guilty of Leftist and adventurist blunders.

Let us for a moment accept these formulas and examine the behaviour of the Chinese comrades during the Caribbean crisis from this standpoint. At the very height of the crisis, when an immediate threat of nuclear war hung over the world, they loosed a barrage in the press, the radio and at public meetings, shouting "No compromise!" "No surrender!" "American imperialism is a paper tiger." It is quite clear that the Caribbean crisis was an instance of "a concrete conflict" with imperialism, and not a "prospective" one, of defining one's position on a tactical and not a strategic plane. In this particular "concrete clash", however, the Chinese comrades "scorned the enemy on a tactical plane", which in their own words is a Leftist, adventurist line. Hence they stand condemned by their own thesis. Their own formula leaves no room for doubt as to their Leftist, adventurist policy, which in practice gambles with the fate of humanity.

The opposition of the Communist Party of China to the policy of peaceful coexistence recently found its most outrageous expression in their reaction to the treaty banning nuclear tests in the atmosphere, space and under water signed on July 25, 1963.

The Chinese position with regard to this agreement is a clear expression of their line and policy on the question of war and peace, their attitude to the unity of the socialist camp, revealing the lengths to which they have gone in their anti-Soviet sentiments and their anti-Soviet propaganda.

The position adopted by the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party in this question is a striking demonstration not only of their narrow nationalist approach, but also of their lack of faith in the possibility of preserving peace, which is equivalent to the assertion that the road to victory over imperialism must inevitably pass through the nuclear war.

Peaceful coexistence is a factor of the entire world revolutionary process, inasmuch as in the conditions of peaceful coexistence the victorious advance to communism and socialism continues; each passing day witnesses the growing strength and influence of the socialist camp—product and bulwark of the world working-class movement; with each passing day the balance of forces in the world is changing increasingly in favour of socialism, and the struggle of the working class in the capitalist countries against reaction and against fascism, for democracy and socialism is gaining ground; with each passing day the struggle for independence waged by peoples still under colonial rule is spreading. Peaceful coexistence offers the shortest and easiest way to the triumph of communism throughout the world.

Alliance with the Socialist Camp and the Working-Class Movement, an Earnest of Victory for the National-Liberation Movement

The rapid development of the national-liberation movement cannot be seen in isolation from the situation in the modern world. That development has become possible thanks to the historic victories of the international working class, thanks to the October Revolution, the victory of the U.S.S.R. in the Second World War, the victory of the Chinese revolution and the revolutions in other countries of Europe and Asia, the establishment of the socialist world system, the strength and influence of the socialist camp headed by the Soviet Union, the direct and indirect assistance rendered by the U.S.S.R., the other socialist countries and the international working class. Some nations won their freedom by waging armed struggle, others without recourse to arms. In either case a decisive factor was the moral, material, political and diplomatic support rendered by the U.S.S.R., the socialist camp, the world proletariat.

Peaceful coexistence creates the most favourable conditions for the struggle for national liberation. On the one hand, because an important role in strengthening the independence of the emergent countries is played by the economic and technical assistance of the socialist camp, which in turn is closely linked with the achievements of the socialist camp in the economic contest with capitalism in conditions of peaceful coexistence. On the other hand, peaceful coexistence makes it harder for the imperialists to conduct hostilities and maintain armed forces in the newly-liberated or emergent countries. In some cases peaceful coexistence enables the peoples to win national independence without waging wars of liberation, and when such wars prove to be unavoidable, it facilitates their victory. The policy of peaceful coexistence and the fight for peace do not preclude national-liberation movements, but on the contrary, contribute to the success of such movements. Peaceful coexistence and the struggle for peace creates the soil for cooperation and alliance between the movements for national liberation, on the one hand, and the socialist camp and the world working class, on the other.

In the interests of the world revolutionary process, in the interests of the national-liberation movement it is essential to strengthen that alliance. Everything that tends to disrupt or weaken it benefits imperialism alone and hampers and delays the liberation of many nations and peoples in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

The leaders of the Chinese Communist Party, however, take a different view. Their policy and their propaganda are aimed at isolating the national-liberation movement from the socialist camp and the international working-class movement. They accuse the U.S.S.R. and the other socialist countries of allegedly abandoning to the mercy of fate the newly-liberated peoples and those still fighting for liberation, of adopting a scornful attitude toward them and of seeking to hold back their struggle; of being reluctant to fight against imperialism, of sacrificing the liberation revolutions to their fear of war, of, allegedly, advocating disarmament solely in order to disarm the peoples fighting for their independence. The Chinese comrades seek to debar the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries from participation in Afro-Asian conferences. They are attempting to set up international organizations without the participation of the U.S.S.R. and the other socialist countries. They are stirring up racist feeling against the working class of the economically advanced countries. At the same time they pose as the only true friends of the national-liberation movements.

Thus, they substitute for the Marxist class concept the concept of geographical and racial zones, in which they include states with different social systems undergoing different stages of social development and, moreover, belonging to different "zones" of the world revolutionary process. The Chinese comrades forget that liberation from colonialism does not in itself mean deliverance from exploitation, that if isolated from the socialist camp the newly-independent states are liable to fall victim to neo-colonialism or to take the capitalist path of development in alliance with imperialism. They reject or minimize the role of the proletarian revolution in history, and also the fact that world politics are pivoted on the international working class and the socialist camp.

If the policy of the Chinese comrades aimed at weakening the ties between the national-liberation movement and the socialist camp is harmful and erroneous, no less so is the policy which seeks to sow among the peoples battling for independence suspicion and distrust of the working class in the imperialist conutries, and especially those with colonial possessions.

This policy is wrong because the working class in these countries and its vanguard, the Communist parties, are honourably fulfilling their international duty despite the difficulties of carrying on the struggle within the very citadel of imperialism.

The Portuguese Communist Party has always supported and will continue to support the just struggle waged by the peoples of the Portuguese colonies for their national independence. Our Party is conducting a consistent campaign against the colonial policy of the government, and is leading our people in the struggle against that policy, organizing a resistance movement, group desertion from the army and mutinies against the war in Angola and Guinea, and rendering every possible assistance to the liberation movements in the Portuguese colonies. When Portuguese troops in Goa, Damao and Diu, in defiance of Salazar's orders to resist to the last bullet and the last soldier, refused to fight in defence of the colonialists, this was not only a striking manifestation of the sentiments of the Portuguese people toward the peoples of the colonies; it was also evidence of the political activity of our Party. The steadfast internationalism of members of our Party has earned them the hatred of the fascist government, the charge of "high treason", torture, humiliation and long years in prison. We Portuguese Communists are no less dedicated to the cause of the liberation of the peoples suffering under Portuguese colonial yoke than to the liberation of our own people. The hearts of the Portuguese Communists are with the African peoples, with the peoples of Angola, Mozambique, Guinea, Cape Verde, Sao Tomé and Principe, with the people of Timor, and with the Chinese peoples on Macao. We have no cause to be ashamed of being Europeans, of being "whites". We Portuguese Communists consider ourselves brothers of the peoples of all continents, all races; we shall always march side by side with them until the world is purged of exploitation and oppression, until it is no longer divided into oppressed classes or oppressor-classes, oppressed countries and oppressor-countries, until freedom, equality, abundance and peace is achieved by all nations, all countries.

While it is true that the liberation movement in the colonial countries facilitates the struggle of the working class in the metropolitan countries in no small measure, it is wrong to say, as the Chinese comrades do, that "the decisive blow at the ruling classes in the capitalist metropolitan countries" will be delivered by the national-liberation movement, and not by the working class of these countries. The working class and its product, the socialist camp, continues to be the principal force in the world revolutionary process. The basic contradiction in the modern world is that between the socialist camp and the imperialist camp, which in turn is an expression of the contradiction between labour and capital.

The Variety of Roads to Socialism

Marxism-Leninism teaches us that one cannot bypass the essential stages of the revolution, that when there is no revolutionary situation the conquest of power by the proletariat cannot be effected merely by order. The revolution is a complex process which does not fit into ready-made formulas and patterns. In every individual case the Communist parties must be able to determine the principal political objectives at the given stage, and to choose the forms of revolutionary action accordingly.

Our Chinese comrades accuse the world Communist movement of having abandoned the revolution, they accuse the fraternal parties of being "unwilling to raise the question of power", of "refusing to take over the power", of "rejecting the dictatorship of the proletariat", and of "being afraid of making the necessary sacrifices". These charges are made because some parties are of the opinion that a revolutionary situation has not ripened in their particular countries, that the basic tactic is to make use of constitutional and legal opportunities, in a word, parties which in the existing conditions are seeking to advance to socialism without recourse to armed uprising or civil war.

Marx, Engels and Lenin stressed that in certain social and political conditions the transition to socialism could be peaceful. In 1917, in the period between February and July, the Russian Bolsheviks under Lenin's leadership fought for the peaceful development of the revolution. And if at the beginning of the century possibilities for the peaceful way were few, today, with the balance of forces changing in favour of socialism, they are far greater.

It must also be noted that although the world Communist movement envisages such possibilities it considers that under certain conditions the non-peaceful path is essential. But to listen to the Chinese comrades it would appear that any Party which considers the non-peaceful way of achieving democracy and socialism most suited to the conditions in its particular country stands the risk of being condemned by the entire world Communist movement as "heretic" and of forfeiting the friendship of the C.P.S.U.

The Portuguese Communist Party is in a particularly favourable position to judge of these assertions of the Chinese comrades. A study of the situation in Portugal with its centralized and profoundly military fascist state, the total absence of all freedom, and the ruthless suppression of even the most modest demands of the people has led our Party to conclude that the only way left for us to establish a democratic system is the non-peaceful way, the way of popular uprising.

Does this course of action conflict with the general line of the world Communist movement? Does it contradict the theses adopted by the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U.? Certainly not. In the first place transition from a fascist dictatorship to a bourgeois democracy and transition from capitalism to socialism in the bourgeois democratic countries are two entirely different things. Our Party, while raising the question of the need to resort to violence to overthrow the fascist dictatorship, at the same time holds that after a democratic system is established and certain conditions created it may be possible to pass over peacefully to socialism.

Secondly, in speaking of the ways of transition to socialism the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. stressed that in countries where the bourgeois state is still strong a "sharp revolutionary struggle" will be essential, while the 1960 Statement also emphasizes that "in the event that the exploiting classes resort to violence against the people, the possibility of the non-peaceful transition to socialism should be borne in mind".

Why in that case do the Chinese comrades misrepresent the line of the international Communist movement by declaring that it recognizes the peaceful path only as "the general recipe".

Perhaps our Party is being pressured by the C.P.S.U. or some other party to induce it to depart from its own line and accept the "recipe of the peaceful way"? No, comrades, no one is exerting any pressure of any kind on our Party. Our Party, as a sovereign and independent party, has studied the situation in Portugal and defined its own political and tactical line. And this line in no way conflicts with the general line of the world Communist movement.

Has any Party tried to interfere in the affairs of our Party, has any Party tried to remove the leaders of our Party for maintaining that the non-peaceful road is the best way to overthrow fascism? Have we been "excommunicated"? Have our relations with the C.P.S.U. and the other members of the great family of Communists become less friendly? No, comrades, never have our relations with the C.P.S.U. and the world Communist movement been as warm and fraternal as they are today.

The case of our Party is an excellent example of how groundless are the charges made by the leaders of the Communist Party of China.

The Necessity for International Communist Discipline

We stand for the equality of the Communist and Workers' parties, for the independence of each Party, and we are opposed to interference by any Party in the internal life of fraternal parties. No Party receives "orders and instructions" from any other Party. Each Party enjoys the sovereign right to define its own line of activity.

How in these circumstances can the unity of the world Communist movement, which is the decisive factor for the victory of communism, be assured?

This unity can be assured by joint elaboration of the general line of the world Communist movement and by observance of this general line by all the parties. This signifies that the independence and sovereignty of the Communist parties does not preclude, but rather presupposes the need for discipline obligatory for all parties.

This is not a discipline imposed on all the parties by some leading centre, for since the dissolution of the Communist International in 1943 there has been no international centre of leadership for the Communist movement as a whole. Neither is it a discipline imposed on all the parties by any one leading party, for in the Communist movement there are no dominant and subordinate parties, all the parties are independent and equal. It is a discipline observed by all the parties with regard to the jointly elaborated and freely adopted general line.

The present general line of the Communist Party, as you know, was adopted by the 81 Communist and Workers' parties at the Meeting of their representatives held in Moscow in 1960. Our Party was represented at that Meeting. On that occasion we submitted our opinion and participated in the work of the Meeting. We signed the Statement issued by the Meeting and, like the other fraternal parties, we regard this Statement as the general line common to and binding upon all the parties.

Our Chinese comrades do not agree with the views held by the majority in the world working-class movement. And since the overwhelming majority of the fraternal parties do not agree with the concepts of the Chinese comrades, the latter accuse that majority of wishing to impose its will on the minority. By what right, one might ask, does the Communist Party of China seek to impose its will on the entire Communist movement? Our Chinese comrades have a most peculiar theory on this score. They say: the majority cannot in itself be right simply because it is a majority. And the minority is not necessarily in the wrong simply because it happens to be the minority. In their opinion, both these considerations prove their point. Hence in the present situation, they say, there exists only a "temporary majority" and a "temporary minority". On the basis of this "theory" the Chinese comrades demand (and in what terms!) that the entire international Communist movement accept their point of view, and they are helping the disruptive "minority" in the other parties to fight against their own parties.

We understand the unity and discipline of the international Communist movement differently. We cannot agree to any Party coming out in opposition to the overwhelming majority of the parties, not only holding different views but working against them in all its practical activity. We cannot agree to any one Party trying to impose its views on the others, and, when it does not succeed in doing so, crudely charging them with betrayal of the revolution and Marxism-Leninism, engaging in insidious factional and splitting activities within other parties, thereby disorganizing the great political army of the world proletariat whose historic victories depend in large measure on its unity, and discipline built up on the principles of Leninism. If one or another Party of the international Communist movement does not agree with the general line, that Party should not come out against the majority of the fraternal parties in its basic activities but, on the contrary, should march side by side with them.

Splitting Activity Must Cease Without Delay

Our Chinese comrades do not limit themselves to taking issue with the world Communist movement as a whole. They do not confine themselves to advancing proposals. They do not confine themselves to the propaganda on a world scale of their erroneous views which contradict the general line of the international Communist movement. They do not stop at causing a split in international democratic organizations. They go much farther than that. In fact they are going too far. Our Chinese comrades, regarding themselves to be the sole standardbearers of the truth, take the liberty of conducting a virulent campaign against the fraternal parties, beginning with the C.P.S.U., and engaging in disruptive and factional activities within the international Communist movement. They not only interfere in the activity of such international democratic organizations as the peace movement, the World Federation of Trade Unions, the International Democratic Youth Federation, the International Students' Union, the Women's International Democratic Federation and the movement for Afro-Asian solidarity, but are openly and directly interfering in the internal affairs of the fraternal parties, seeking to discredit their leaders by levelling outrageous charges against them and widely circulating this propaganda among the membership of these parties (France, Italy, the United States). They have gone so far as to establish contact with elements that have been expelled from the fraternal parties, aiding and abetting the factional and disruptive activities of these elements.

For a time this factional activity was carried on surreptitiously. Now, however, the Chinese comrades are doing this openly on the plea that they have the right to do so. "Who can prevent us from rendering assistance to genuine revolutionaries, true Marxists-Leninists"? they declare.

What could be a grosser violation of the standards of relations between the parties than reprinting of anti-Party materials put out by renegades and splitters; maintaining contacts with elements expelled from fraternal parties; instigating them to fight against these parties; holding official receptions for the leaders of these factions, negotiating with them and issuing communiques on these talks, as is done in the case of negotiations between parties. Take, for example, the official reception and the talks conducted in Tirana with Grippa and other factionists who were expelled from the Belgian Communist Party. Or the reception in Peking given for Hill who was expelled from the Communist Party of Australia. Or the "hospitality" which Comrade Prestes tells us the Chinese Communist Party press extends to materials issued by the Amazonas group of splitters in Brazil.

Our Chinese comrades not only have no respect for the discipline in the world Communist movement as a whole, they are doing their level best to undermine the discipline and unity in each individual Party.

Their activity has already done grave harm and is creating difficulties for some parties which are carrying on the struggle under exceptionally arduous conditions, and also for the Communist movement as a whole. How far do the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party intend to go?

Let us assume for a moment that members of the Chinese Communist Party would voice their disapproval of the dogmatic and sectarian line pursued by the leaders of the C.P.C. and give support to the general line of the international Communist movement. In our view these comrades would be fully justified in doing so, and if the principles of democratic centralism were observed, would have the right to defend their views in their own Party.

We say "would have the right", for we do not know whether in fact they enjoy that right. We have our doubts on this score, judging by the zeal with which the Chinese Communist Party leaders defend the Stalin cult and by their attacks on the historical decisions of the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. which restored socialist legality and the Leninist standards of Party life in the C.P.S.U. and opened the way to eradicating the disastrous consequences of the personality cult, and which were of inestimable value in ensuring the observance of the principles of democratic centralism throughout the international Communist movement. Is it not legitimate to assume that those who oppose criticism of the Stalin cult believe in the deification and infallibility of leaders, in blind acceptance of their opinions, their exemption from criticism, the authoritarian imposition of personal views in defiance of the collective view; countenance the absence of democracy in Party life, administrative and military methods in settling differences and in the cadre policy of the Party. How can observance of the principles of democratic centralism be ensured in a party whose leaders in practice seek to cover up and defend the tyranny and crimes committed in the guise of the Stalin cult? That is why we say that we do not know whether members of the Chinese Communist Party who disagree with the dogmatic and sectarian line of their leaders enjoy the right to defend their point of view in their own Party.

If, however, these comrades (who, in our opinion, would be in the right) were to be expelled from the Chinese Communist Party and if they were to attempt to establish contact with our party, if they were to send us articles attacking the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party, would we publish these materials in our press? Would we establish relations with them, receive them, help them to fight the Central Committee of their Party headed by Comrade Mao Tse-tung? Certainly not.

Unfortunately, our Chinese comrades do not observe this discipline. Instead they interfere in the internal affairs of the fraternal parties, demonstratively aiding and abetting the renegades and splitters who are fighting against these parties. We, for our part, severely condemn such splitting activities. Since each individual Communist Party is independent and sovereign, no other fraternal Party has the right to interfere in its internal affairs, no Party has the right to carry on propaganda against the policy of the Communist parties in the different countries and maintain ties with members of these parties over the heads of the leading bodies. We cannot accept any other rules of behaviour in the relations between Communist parties.

Dogmatism, the Chief Danger at the Present Time

At its meeting in January this year, the Central Committee of our Party, having studied the situation in the world Communist movement, came to the conclusion that "although in some parties Right opportunism may continue to be the main danger, in the world Communist movement as a whole the chief danger at the present time is dogmatism.

"...The 1960 Statement notes that "revisionism remains the main danger" and that "dogmatism and sectarianism... can also become the main danger at some stage in the development of individual parties."

In 1960, as at the present time, the struggle went on on two fronts: on the one hand, against Right opportunism and against revisionism, and, on the other, against dogmatism and sectarianism. But since 1960 the situation has changed. In 1960 the 81 Communist and Workers' parties were united, and the Chinese Communist Party, which already then represented a dogmatic, sectarian and Leftist trend in the world movement, signed the Statement of the Meeting which laid down the general line of the world Communist movement. If the leaders of the Communist Party of China followed the general line set forth in the Statement which bears their signature there would be no need to change anything with regard to the "main danger".

Consequently, how can we consider the situation unchanged if today the greatest difficulties experienced by the world Communist movement spring from the propaganda of the dogmatic and sectarian views and actions? Unless we blind ourselves to the truth we cannot fail to see that dogmatism and sectarianism represent the gravest danger to the world Communist movement at the present moment.

Such is the opinion of our Party.

The curious thing is that the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party talk a great deal about the need to combat dogmatism, declaring that they too are combating it. But what do they call dogmatism? Dogmatism, according to them, is the mechanical application of the experience of one Party to the activities of other parties. This indeed is one of the aspects of dogmatism, but only one of many. What is the purpose of the Chinese Communist Party leaders in posing the question thus? They are out to prove that the fact that the international Communist movement draws on the rich experience gained by the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, that it has endorsed the resolutions adopted by the Twentieth and Twenty-Second congresses of the C.P.S.U., and that the fraternal parties recognize the Programme of the C.P.S.U. as the most important document of our time is above all an instance of such application of experience. In their view, the unity of the Communist and Workers' parties around the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and recognition of the Party of Lenin as the vanguard of the international Communist movement is dogmatism.

According to them, the C.P.S.U. is guilty of both these sins, the sin of revisionism and the sin of dogmatism. The leaders of the Communist Party of China, on the other hand, are innocent of all sin. They represent Marxism-Leninism in its purest form.

The fact of the matter is, comrades, that basically the struggle against dogmatism, sectarianism and leftism is precisely a struggle against the concepts and concrete political activities of the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party, which we have mentioned above, and against their influence in the world Communist movement and the national-liberation movement. This is where the main danger lies today.

If dogmatism, sectarianism and Leftism are the main danger, does that mean that Right-wing opportunism no longer presents any danger? Of course not. Insofar as the line and activities of some parties are concerned, it may well constitute the main danger. More, the Right opportunistic mistakes of parties which take the correct stand with regard to the cardinal issues of our time, hinder the implementation of the general line of the Communist movement and are used by dogmatists to attack that line.

In our view, any weakening of the struggle on the one front (against Right-wing opportunism) hinders the struggle on the other front (against dogmatism and Leftism). The danger of revisionism is sometimes seen to emanate only from the Yugoslavs, while Right-wing opportunism in general, which today too is no less harmful, is forgotten. Therefore we believe that the battle against Right-wing opportunism should not only be continued but should be intensified.

If dogmatism, sectarianism and Leftism are the main danger does this imply that the struggle against the revisionist conceptions of the Yugoslav Communists should be abandoned? Of course not. Despite the fact that these concepts have ceased to have any palpable effect on the world movement, the struggle against them is continuing. At the same time we cannot but take into account the new factors that have arisen since 1960: Firstly the defeat of Yugoslav revisionism in the ideological sphere, and secondly, the positive evolution of some aspects of the policy of the Yugoslav League of Communists, e.g. the strengthening of the leading role of the Party, improvements in economic planning, the foreign policy orientation, the rapprochement and cooperation between Yugoslavia and the other socialist countries, and the rapprochement between the League of Yugoslav Communists and the fraternal parties. This favourable evolution should be encouraged, without relaxing the ideological debate against revisionism; but the Yugoslav Communists should not be treated as enemies, on the contrary, they should be given fraternal assistance.

We believe that a still closer rapprochement between Yugoslavia and the other socialist countries and between the Yugoslav Communists and the world Communist movement is both possible and desirable. Such an attitude on the part of the Communist parties, if accompanied by a firm ideological position toward revisionism, will not foster Yugoslav revisionism but will rather serve to rectify it. We would then be happy to welcome the return of the Yugoslav Communists to the ranks of the world Communist movement. Our Party has no relations at present with the League of Yugoslav Communists, but we have no objections to establishing friendly contacts with them in order to gain a better understanding of Yugoslav realities and the position of the Yugoslav comrades.

The struggle against Right-wing opportunism, against revisionism, should, therefore, be continued. But "the main danger" is so great that it is already undermining the unity of the socialist camp and the world Communist movement. That danger is the dogmatism, sectarianism and Leftism which emanates from the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party.

Shoulder to Shoulder with the Party of Lenin

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union is the Party of that great and glorious country which by virtue of its might and internationalism has become the shield protecting the entire socialist camp, a friend always ready to come to the assistance of the national-liberation movements, a guarantee of the victorious advance of the international working class to the ultimate triumph of communism on a world scale. Hence the world Communist movement rightly regards the Party, founded by Lenin, as its vanguard.

Does this mean, however, that the principles of independence, equality and sovereignty in the relations between the fraternal parties are not applied in relations between the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and other fraternal parties? No, comrades. Slanderous allegations about "the hand of Moscow" and "orders from Moscow" can emanate only from the cesspools of reactionary and fascist propaganda. In the international Communist movement all parties, the C.P.S.U. included, are independent, equal and sovereign. The fraternal parties consider the Communist Party of the Soviet Union to be their vanguard not because the C.P.S.U. enjoys any special rights, not because it occupies some leading position in the international Communist movement. There are no "leading" or "subordinate" parties in that movement, all the fraternal parties are equal. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union is considered the vanguard of the international Communist movement not by virtue of any special rights but by virtue of the contribution it has made and is still making to that movement

It goes without saying that in elaborating the present general line of the international Communist movement the C.P.S.U. played a prominent role. All the fraternal parties welcomed the decisions of the Twentieth and Twenty-Second congresses of the C.P.S.U. as a decisive contribution in defining the line of the Communist movement. The Programme of the C.P.S.U., adopted by the Twenty-Second Congress, has justly been called the Communist Manifesto of our time because it analyzes the international situation with remarkable clarity from the standpoint of the principles set forth in the Declaration and Statement of the fraternal parties of 1957 and 1960; because it generalizes the vast experience accumulated not only by the C.P.S.U. but by the entire world Communist movement and draws from this experience fundamental theoretical conclusions; because it enriches ideologically each and every Communist Party and helps them independently to define their own political and tactical line.

The leaders of the Communist Party of China do not agree with such recognition by the international Communist movement of the contribution made by the C.P.S.U., its authority and prestige. Their propaganda is levelled mainly against the Party of Lenin. And they do not only limit themselves to arguing and disagreeing. All the fraternal parties have the right to argue and disagree. No, comrades. The leaders of the C.P.C. do not stop at that. They brandish their fists, they distort the facts and engage in slander.

Yes, comrades, it is hard to believe that such accusations could be hurled at the Party of Lenin by Communists, accusations of "betrayal", "of rejection of the struggle against imperialism", "fear of imperialism and war", "capitulation to North American imperialism"; charges that the Party of Lenin "does not hate the class enemy and is opposed to class struggle", that it "is against just wars", "is trying to defend the domination of the imperialists", that it is "afraid of revolution", "is opposed to revolution" and "forbids others to carry out or give support to revolutions"; that it "is ready to act in such a way as to help to restore capitalism" in the U.S.S.R.! It is hard to believe that such words as these could emanate from the lips or the pen of Communists: "The policy pursued by the Soviet government is a policy of alliance with the forces of war for struggle against the forces of peace, a policy of alliance with imperialism for struggle against socialism, a policy of alliance with the United States for struggle against China, an alliance with reaction of various countries for struggle against the peoples of the whole world." These words are taken not from some newspaper article written by some irresponsible journalist. These words, irresponsible though they are, are contained in the Statement of the Government of the Chinese People's Republic of July 31, 1963.

This is what the leaders of the Communist Party of China write about a socialist country, about the Party which is the most powerful friend and champion of socialist China, of the whole socialist camp, of the working class, the peoples fighting for independence, the champion of peace throughout the world. It would be more fitting for these things, printed in the columns of their newspapers, to have been concocted by fascists!

The leaders of the Communist Party of China do not ask themselves: "Why is it that the imperialist and reactionary press of all countries, not to speak of the fascist press, reprints our accusations and statements and gives them such prominence? Does this not suggest that imperialism and reaction knows better than we do who their chief enemies are?" But they do not ask themselves such questions. On the contrary, they appear to be delighted at the publicity they are given by the anti-Communist press of all countries.

Neither do the leaders of the Communist Party of China ask themselves this question: "Why is it that the majority of the Communists of the world, leaders of the working class who have dedicated their lives to the cause of communism, tried and tested Marxists-Leninists in all corners of the globe, disagree with us? Does this not suggest that we ought to pay more heed to their arguments and give more thought to our views?" No, the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party do not ask themselves such questions. They prefer to explain the position of the international Communist movement by repeating the fabrications of reactionary propaganda that the leaders of fraternal parties are following the "hand of Moscow" and obeying "orders from Moscow", and by claiming that the leaders of the fraternal parties uphold the general line of the Communist movement not out of principle or conviction, but because they obey "the conductor's baton", because "they have a gift for parrot-like repetition", because between the C.P.S.U. and the other parties "there exist abnormal patriarchal relations typical of feudal times". Incredibly enough, this is said by Communists, by leaders of a great fraternal Party.

We, for our part, want to say this: precisely because we are waging an indefatigable struggle against imperialism and fascism for democracy, national independence and socialism, just because we stand for the independence, equality and sovereignty of the fraternal parties, we are marching side by side with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in the great family of Communist and Workers' parties. If, as the leaders of the C.P.C. claim, to date three great battles were fought in the working-class movement (the battle fought by Lenin against the II International and reformism, by Stalin against the Trotskyites, Bukharinites, etc., and today, by themselves against revisionism), then it is clear that they believe that the Communist Party of China stands in the van of the world Communist movement and that they no longer regard the other Communist parties as fraternal parties. Clearly, they are not lacking in arrogance and ambition.

We have great respect for Comrade Mao Tse-tung, as an outstanding revolutionary, the leader of the great Communist Party of China. But if the President of the Academy of Science of the Chinese People's Republic says that "the ideas of Mao Tse-tung constitute today the highest stage of Marxism-Leninism" (speech published in Jenminjihpao on March 26, 1963), if the Chinese newspapers claim that the "ideas of Mao Tse-tung represent Marxism-Leninism of the epoch of the socialist revolution and the building of socialism", and if this thought is repeated in every key by the press and other propaganda media, then our Chinese comrades should not take offence if the fraternal parties do not quite see eye to eye with them. With the leaders of the Communist Party of China advancing such concepts (which we define as dogmatic and sectarian and which we consider to be a departure from the principles of Marxism-Leninism) it is quite obvious that we cannot possibly agree with our Chinese comrades on this score either.

Unity Must Be Preserved at All Costs

In the foregoing we have set forth our position. We wish to make it clear that we do not close our ears to everything the Chinese comrades are saying simply because it emanates from them.

Without discounting the difficulties confronting us or ignoring the seriousness of the disagreements and the complexity of the situation, we believe that everything should be done to restore the unity of the international Communist movement.

All the bridges have not yet been burned. We must do all in our power to prevent them from being burned.

As before, however, we consider wholly undesirable and harmful the public debate which the Chinese comrades have been conducting in an hysterical, acrimonious and disrespectful manner, expressing themselves not in fraternal but more often in unfriendly and hostile terms.

The differences are so profound that it will take much time before ideological unity can be restored in the Communist movement. Until then, if we wish to avoid a split which would do incalculable damage to the international Communist movement, we must find a way of preventing the relations between the fraternal parties from deteriorating still further.

The differences in the international Communist movement are serious indeed. They cannot be overcome in a short time, but overcome they will be. Unity will be restored on the basis of Marxism-Leninism. In the socialist camp, as well as in the capitalist countries, the Communist parties will score new successes and win new victories. Nothing can prevent the victory of communism throughout the world.

Communique of the Central Committee of the Portuguese Communist Party

Concerning the Situation in the World Communist Movement

"1. At its August 1963 plenary meeting, the Central Committee of the Portuguese Communist Party heard and approved the report of Comrade Alvaro Cunhal, General Secretary of the Party, on the situation in the world Communist movement.

"2. The situation in the world Communist movement has taken an unfavourable turn. Unity is not complete and there is a real danger of a split. The crux of the matter is that the Communist Party of China is not in agreement with the general line of the world Communist movement, which was unanimously adopted by the 1957 and 1960 Moscow meetings . . .

"8. The Chinese leaders not only indulge in discussions and actions that are a breach of discipline in the world Communist movement. They go so far as to contact renegades and other elements who have been expelled from the fraternal parties, support and instigate them against the respective parties. The Portuguese Communist Party emphatically condemns all splitting and factional activity for it undermines unity and discipline in the Communist and Workers' parties, weakens or depreciates their prestige and influence.

"9. The Portuguese Communist Party considers dogmatism to be the main danger in the world Communist movement today. The fight against dogmatism, sectarianism and leftism is, essentially, a fight against the concepts and policy of the C.P.C. leaders and against their influence in the Communist and national-liberation movements.

"The fight against dogmatism, the main danger, does not mean that the fight against revisionism and Right opportunism should be discontinued."

The communique then goes on to speak of the vanguard role of the C.P.S.U. in the world Communist movement, how its experience and example help the Marxist parties in their activities. It notes the great significance for the world Communist movement of the decisions of the Twentieth and Twenty-Second Congresses of the C.P.S.U. and of the C.P.S.U. Programme rightly called the "Communist Manifesto" of our era, and censures the hostile propaganda conducted by the Communist Party of China against the party of Lenin, and the slanderous nature of this propaganda. Party stresses the services rendered by the C.P.S.U. and the U.S.S.R. in the fight against imperialism and for peace, and refers to the C.P.S.U. as the most faithful guardian of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.

The Portuguese Party also recognizes the services rendered by the glorious Communist Party of China and states that everything must be done to prevent the split which the C.P.C. leaders seem to want, and which would only benefit the common enemy of communism.

The Central Committee of the Portuguese Communist Party therefore proposes in its communique:

"Since the situation continues to grow dangerously worse, the P.C.P. thinks that it would be advisable to hold as soon as possible a meeting of all the Communist and Workers' parties at which, besides discussion of ideological issues, procedures regulating relations between the fraternal parties would be duly established.

"The P.C.P. believes that even if the meeting should fail to settle ideological differences, it will have achieved fruitful results if common agreement is reached to cease all open polemics, to prohibit the parties from engaging in unilateral criticism of one another, from interfering in each other's internal affairs, and from establishing political contact with Communists of another country other than through the leadership of the Party, or with its consent.

"The P.C.P. also thinks that it would be advisable to set up a commission of representatives of several Communist and Workers' parties to study the practical questions relevant to the holding of such a meeting."

Perspectives of the West-European Working-Class Movement

BY FRANZ MAREK

Can we speak of any specific perspectives of the West-European working-class movement as a whole? After all, the conditions in the various countries differ greatly. On the other hand, can the struggles of the West-European working class be examined apart from the struggle for peace and socialism waged in the socialist and newly-emerged countries? Would not the separate examination of problems facing the working-class movement in this part of Europe tend to weaken international solidarity?

Needless to say, the conditions in which the working-class movement finds itself in the various West European countries vary greatly, if only due to the differences between the alignments of forces within this movement. The situation in the Scandinavian countries differs from that in Italy and France, and the conditions in Spain are quite unlike those in Britain. Working-class struggle in Western Europe is of course inseparably connected with the development of the socialist world and the powerful national-liberation movement in Asia, Africa and Latin America. But for all that the problems arising in this part of Europe require a specific approach and the perspectives are of a specific nature, all of which justifies independent examination.

Basically we are concerned here with the developed capitalist countries where the working-class movement has deep-seated traditions, though, owing to the existence of both Communist and Socialist parties, the internal alignments differ by countries. In some democratic unity is impossible without the support of Catholic groupings; however, anti-fascist traditions and sentiment are a big factor in these countries. Solidarity with the Spanish anti-fascists, for example, has time and again brought diverse groups and people adhering to different views together.

The role and place of the West-European working-class movement has also been discussed in the course of the debate under way in the international Communist movement. The opinion that the national-liberation struggle in Asia, Africa and Latin America has made these continents the storm centre of world revolution not only stems from an underestimation of the part played by the countries where capitalism has already been overthrown and an oversimplified idealization of the highly contradictory and complex colonial revolutions; it also echoes the feeling encountered even in the West-European working-class movement that no progress is being made in the countries of Western Europe, that their workers live too well and hence have lost all sense of the future. Many newspaper writers follow in the wake of those embittered and frustrated elements who feel that not much hope can be placed in the "well-fed" worker and that the colonial revolutions alone are projected into the future. In desperation they wait for this liberation struggle to inundate the world and hope to find an ark which will land them on some Ararat. But is this solidarity with the colonial peoples?

And how can these theorists ignore the fact that even if the colonial revolutions unquestionably weaken imperialism there is no force in the world that can assume the task of the working-class movement in the capitalist countries to abolish capitalism? If a higher living standard leads, as is alleged, to the loss of perspective, would this not imply that some decades from now, when the newly-emerged countries will have reached a certain level of development, there will no longer be any striving for progress anywhere in the world?

It would be wrong to claim that Western Europe has shown no progress in recent years. Not to speak of the powerful sweep of trade union struggles, we cannot forget such facts as the rebuff which the Italian workers gave in 1960 to the attempts to set up a reactionary regime with fascist support; the splendid struggle for democratic freedoms conducted in Spain; the struggle waged by the French Communists against the dirty war in Vietnam, and, above all, the efforts of the West-European workers to safeguard peace which played no small part in preventing the use of nuclear bombs in Korea and Vietnam. During the Suez adventure the invaders were unquestionably halted primarily thanks to the resolute stand taken by the Soviet government, with the position of the British trade union membership also playing its role. Only those who counterpose the fight for peace to the fight for socialism can minimize the contribution of the European working-class movement to the cause of peace.

True, the cold war deepened the split in the working-class and democratic movement, helped to isolate the Communists and gave the leaders of many Socialist parties an opportunity to abandon class principles and the socialist perspective. It is true, too, that under the influence of the cold war and what is called the personality cult, the Communist parties were slow in assessing the changed balance of forces in the spirit of creative Marxism, drawing on the ideological legacy of the Seventh Congress of the Communist International (1935). Major success in Western Europe is possible only if the Communists and Socialists agree on concrete tasks and the overall perspective.

Strategy and Tactics

One of the specific features of the West-European working-class movement is that all the Communist parties of Western Europe—most of them before the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U.—declared for the peaceful road to socialism, for the conquest of power by the workers without civil war. This line stemmed not from any illusions as to the possibility of morally metamorphosing big business, but from the specific conditions of Western Europe which differ fundamentally from the conditions in Asia, Africa and Latin America (though it is interesting to note that the big Brazilian and Indonesian parties likewise orient on peaceful transition to socialism). The basic premise for the West-European Communists is that they are working in developed capitalist countries with deep-seated parliamentary and democratic traditions, whereas hitherto in all cases except one capitalism was overthrown in backward countries ruled by reactionary or openly fascist dictatorships.

In discussing the possibility of peaceful transition to socialism Marx and Engels are usually cited, in particular what Marx said about the possibility of peaceful advance to socialism in the U.S.A., Britain and Holland, countries which in his time still had no highly developed state machinery. Marx harboured no illusions that the exploiting classes would calmly watch things take this course; as Engels said in his preface to Capital, Marx hardly expected the "English ruling classes to submit, without a 'pro-slavery rebellion', to this peaceful and legal revolution". It is noteworthy that in his critique of the Erfurt Programme (1891) Engels said that peaceful advance to socialism could be envisaged also in France even though the state machine in that country was the most highly developed.

In discussing the peaceful way to socialism it is also pointed out that Lenin called it an extremely rare though important possibility. He considered this possibility not only before the summer of 1917 but also a few weeks before the October Revolution. These opinions of our classics are valuable primarily because they bring it home to us that the socialist revolution need not necessarily take the form of armed insurrection. But they do not cover all the problems of our time.

The argument advanced in this discussion that peaceful development has never led to socialism is clearly incorrect. This did happen, in the specific conditions following the Second World War, in Czechoslovakia, for instance. The Cuban revolution began as an anti-imperialist national-democratic revolution and only later developed to a point when socialist aims were set and Marxist assessments made. This should be borne in mind in order to refute the vulgarized view that the October Revolution must be repeated in all countries launching out on the socialist road.

We must remember that in orientating the revolutionary mass movement in Western Europe on the peaceful road to socialism we are doing so in conditions which did not exist hitherto in the developed capitalist countries. The new opportunities and conditions necessitated the adoption of a new strategy which had not been tested in practice, just as the theory concerning the three stages of the Chinese revolution elaborated by the Chinese Communists in 1940 was not backed up by previous experience.

In connection with the Moscow Meeting of 1957 the Chinese Communists drew up a memorandum concerning the peaceful way to socialism which they published a few weeks ago as an appendix to the pamphlet The Origin and Development of Our Differences with the Leadership of the C.P.S.U. Here we read, among other things, the following:

"In the situation now prevailing in the international Communist movement, it is advantageous from the standpoint of tactical considerations to mention that we would prefer peaceful transition. But it would be incorrect to place too much emphasis on the possibility of such transition."

As we pose the problem, it is by no means a question of tactics but of a new strategy. Engels once said that Marxism undergoes change with each new scientific discovery. Should, then, Marxist strategy remain immutable? Lenin posed before the Communist parties the task of constantly working out new approaches to the socialist revolution in accordance with the changing conditions. The Communist parties in Western Europe are seeking to do this in accordance with the new possibilities and new conditions.

We should like to dwell here on why it is necessary to orientate on the peaceful road to socialism. The situation has changed and we are fighting an enemy who has changed his methods and forms of struggle, more, has had to change them, for the world itself has changed, primarily thanks to the Communists. Today, capitalism has to engage in competition with the socialist system.

In this situation it is imperative to combat the danger of Americanization threatening the working-class movement, the danger of concentrating on trade union struggle alone, renouncing independent working-class action and the socialist perspective. To convince the masses of the necessity of socialism is by no means an easy task in these conditions. The idea of a headlong attack with arms in hand does not fit in with the conditions or the consciousness of the masses of workers, and hence advocacy of this idea would turn the small Communist parties into ludicrous sects and the large parties into bands of adventurers.

The struggle for socialism in Western Europe also bears the imprint of the fact that it is waged in countries with deep-rooted parliamentary and democratic traditions and where the masses, especially after the lessons taught by fascism, attach much importance to democratic gains. Indeed, it is not fortuitous that the masses of workers in Western Europe were particularly sensitive to the violations of socialist legality in the socialist countries, violations which clashed with their democratic sentiments. The socialist revolution, which abolishes the pernicious and corrupting rule of capital, is unquestionably the most democratic revolution in all history; but to the broad masses in Western Europe it can prove attractive only if it extends democracy in all spheres, only if it adds new democratic freedoms to the existing ones.

The perspective, therefore, is this: posing, by stages, democratic aims which curtail the power of the big capitalists, give more weight to the working people and open for them the way to leadership of society; elaboration of constructive plans designed to deepen democracy, primarily through ensuring and extending the right of the working people to share in deciding all issues in all areas; isolation of the reactionaries and the pursuance, on the basis of the existing democratic institutions and the multi-party system, of a broad policy of working-class unity and federation which would exert an influence all the way up to the state apparatus—all this would offer the best conditions for overcoming the resistance of the exploiting classes in the event that these classes risk resorting to violence to prevent the socialist revolution.

Orientation on the peaceful path of socialism has thus become possible and necessary. In no way is it based on the assumption, as the Chinese Communists' "25 points" sarcastically put it, that "the imperialists and reactionaries are prepared to accept peaceful change". The imperialists will never do so. This is an orientation which implies a long and arduous struggle, including extra-parliamentary clashes, but for all that we believe that it is the only possible orientation in Western-Europe. The argument that this is too long-range a prospect does not hold water; the right way is always the shortest. Orientation on the immediate achievement of the goal is not an alternative, but merely an instance of shortsightedness, in effect, a way of evading the issue.

Structural Reforms

Orientation on the peaceful road to socialism, on the stage-by-stage deepening and regeneration of democracy, presupposes primarily two things: firstly, curtailing the power of big capital by limiting its sphere of operation, defending and extending the nationalized sector, planned coordination within this sector as envisaged to some extent in Pitterman's latest proposals, and extending nationalization to the economic commanding heights still held by big private capital, and, secondly, winning and extending the right of the working people to share in decidig issues at the enterprises, on the scale of the various industries and in the sphere of economic policy generally; moreover, the present-day level of technology opens specific ways for the realization of that alliance of the working class and the intellectuals which Marx envisaged already in his early writings—an alliance of sufferers who think and thinkers who suffer.

This sum-total of transitional political and economic aims which diminish the power of the big capitalists and the bureaucratic machinery, increase the weight of the working class and democratize social life and the political institutions through growing public control over the state and the economy are aptly described as structural reforms. Today it is quite clear that if these reforms are not to be reduced to nought the working people must have a say in deciding things and exercise effective control over investments, prices and planning of production at the enterprises, on the scale of the various industries and of the economy as a whole. What is needed is real participation in all these things and not mere lip-service to such participation.

When it comes to structural reforms we are often accused of adopting a reformist position. But it seems to us that the difference between the reformist position and ours is patent: the reformists advocate petty reforms instead of revolution, whereas we, though we do not disdain minor reforms, set our sights on major all-embracing reforms facilitating advance to the socialist revolution. The reformists declared through Bernstein that the movement was everything, the aim nothing; for us the touchstone of the movement is the extent to which it hastens the achievement of the goal. The reformists were satisfied with winning one or another concession through negotiation and sought to reconcile the working class to capitalism; we, on the contrary, see that the struggle for structural reforms will be futile unless the masses are rallied for extraparliamentary action as well in an unrelenting struggle against big capital. The peaceful road to socialism does not imply an absence of struggle, nor is it only a matter of gradual evolution but also of political crises and leaps in political development.

In this connection another objection has been raised: is it possible to carry out such far reaching reforms in the conditions of the present class state? Are we not forgetting the class nature of the state?

All the gains the working-class movement has won have been wrested by force from the state, its class nature notwithstanding. In the Inaugural Address of the First International, the centenary of which we shall mark in September, Marx, leading up to his definition of the conquest of political power as a great duty of the working class, assessed the winning of the 10-hour working day in England as a great success inasmuch as "it told indeed upon the great contest between the blind rule of the supply and demand laws which form the political economy of the middle class, and social production controlled by social foresight, which forms the political economy of the working class".

If it were not convinced of the possibility of wresting concessions and reforms from the capitalist state, the working-class movement would have remained a mere propaganda sect. In the conditions of developed capitalism this possibility has acquired a new quality. The role of state intervention and state investment has greatly increased and with it also the need to influence investment plans, production and other structures, coordination and planning in the nationalized sector, to win progressive measures at the expense of the big capitalists and in spite of their opposition even before big capital has been completely abolished.

Lenin in his The State and Revolution criticized the nihilistic viewpoint that such major and far-reaching reforms as the granting of the right to self-determination to the peoples cannot be achieved before the final victory of the proletariat. In this connection he gave a generalized definition of the relation between democracy and socialism which can be recommended as a guide when discussing structural reforms.

"To develop democracy to the utmost, to seek out the forms for this development, to test it by practice, and so forth—all this is one of the constituent tasks of the struggle for the social revolution," he said. "Taken separately, no kind of democracy will bring socialism. But in actual life democracy will never be 'taken separately'; it will be 'taken together' with other things, it will exert its influence on economic life, will simulate its transformation; and in its turn it will be influenced by economic development, and so on. Such are the dialectics of living history."

Working-Class and Democratic Unity

The new strategy raises the policy of united action and democratic unity to a new plane not only because orientation on the peaceful way to socialism eliminates a controversial issue of long standing in the working-class movement but also because clear-cut recognition by the Communists of the multi-party system (even during the transition to socialism) removes a barrier of distrust.

A decisive role here is played by the relations between the Communist and Socialist parties. The Chinese Communists advocate a general line which would make it incumbent on the Communist parties to draw a "sharp demarcation line" between themselves and the Socialist parties. The same view is held by the anti-communists in the Socialist parties. If we were to accept this thesis we would be repudiating ourselves and denying that the working-class movement has any future.

The correct thing to do is to ascertain points of contact between the two parties and, without glossing over the differences or abstaining from criticism, to foster a sense of responsibility to the working-class movement as a whole. This sense of responsibility is displayed by the Italian Communists when they show concern for unity in the Italian Socialist Party and are doing their utmost to prevent a split in it; by the Belgian Communists when they try again and again to dissuade the Left trade union functionaries from setting up a new Left Socialist Party; by the French Communists, who at the last elections helped elect Socialist candidates; by all of us who are looking forward to a Labour victory in the next general election in Britain; by those Socialist comrades who dissociate themselves from the malicious, petty gloating over the difficulties encountered by the socialist countries and who now, as a result of experience gained in struggle, are coming to realize that the Communist parties, even the smaller ones, are an indispensable force in combating efforts to rob the labour movement of its working-class ideology in the struggle for the socialist perspective.

Some specific problems are encountered in the struggle for working-class unity as a result of the participation of Socialist parties in coalition governments and the fact that some governments are headed by Socialist Prime Ministers. The Communists' attitude towards the Socialist Party depends not on whether Socialists hold ministerial portfolios or not, but on the policy pursued by these Socialist Ministers, on what the Socialist Party does or fails to do in the government—whether its participation or leadership in the government remains a mere Social Democratic interlude, as happened so often before and after the Second World War, or whether it makes social progress possible, strengthens the peace forces and makes for democratic unity. Generally speaking, Socialist governments or the participation of Socialist Ministers in coalition governments can promote the shaping of a democratic alternative only when their policy does not jeopardize independent working-class action and does not run counter to the socialist perspective.

Agreement between the Socialists and the Communists is a prerequisite for the creation of that front against reaction and fascism, and for the regeneration of democracy which in some West-European countries is impossible of realization without the participation of certain Catholic forces, without taking into account the significant processes under way in the Catholic camp which have found reflection even in the Ecumenical Council in Rome. It is noteworthy that the Left Catholics, some of whom actually come out in support of socialism, are taking an increasingly courageous stand.

These circles have also advanced the idea that in view of the difficulties encountered within, and also between, some working-class parties, the trade unions should not limit themselves to the defence of the economic and socio-political interests of the workers alone but should be the champions of democratic concepts. This attitude may play a significant role in the West-European working class movement, especially since the trade unions have in recent years more and more frequently shown themselves to be a factor making for unity within their own countries and, on the international plane, in relations between the socialist and capitalist countries.

Peaceful Coexistence

After the assassination of Kennedy a greater responsibility than ever for the preservation of peace devolved on the working-class movement and all peace-loving forces in Western Europe. More than ever before they must be on guard against attempts to utilize the new situation to subvert peace. Indeed, the general reaction to the murder of the U.S. President once again showed now deep the idea of peaceful coexistence has struck root: the most diverse groups, publications and press writers on both sides of the Atlantic this time acted in unison to nip in the bud the dangerous lie, reminiscent of the Reichstag fire, which was in the making.

The perspectives of the West-European working-class movement are closely linked with the struggle for peaceful coexistence.

1. Successful implementation of the policy of peaceful coexistence facilitates independent working-class struggle in the capitalist countries by hindering direct intervention by foreign reaction. Periods of rising tension on the world political scene tend to unite the leaders of the imperialist states in spite of their contradictions; periods of détente, on the contrary, accentuate these contradictions, make it more difficult to build up imperialist fronts, and increase the chances of autonomous peaceful advance towards socialism in Western Europe.

2. Successful implementation of the policy of peaceful coexistence moderates the climate within democratic groups, deters the anti-communist witch-hunters, and facilitates contact and agreement among Socialists, Communists and other democratic groups. And this in turn promotes peaceful coexistence. We have seen often enough in recent years that mounting tensions make for disunity, worsen relations between the Socialists and the Communists and lead to the break-up of existing democratic fronts. In periods of diminishing tension the contradictions within reactionary groupings grow sharper, whereas periods of tension aggravate differences within the democratic groups and play into the hands of those who would isolate the Communists. Orientation on the peaceful way to socialism implies maximum understanding among the Socialists, Communists and other progressives, and therefore it is indissolubly linked with the policy of peaceful coexistence.

3. The view that nuclear war cannot be justified by any controversial issues of world policy logically leads to a striving towards peaceful competition between the two systems; the peoples should be given an opportunity to choose the system they want on the basis of their own experience. The Chinese Communists' "25 points" warn against exaggerating the significance of peaceful competition; but as far as the working-class movement in Western Europe is concerned, the importance of peaceful competition can hardly be overestimated. Needless to say, peaceful competition is not a substitute for the struggle for socialism, but the fact remains that the outcome of this struggle depends on socialism proving its superiority in all spheres.

All parties, groups and individuals who advocate socialist aims recognize this. And this recognition offers a wide range of opportunities for all shades of criticism and restraint; solidarity with the socialist countries under no circumstances implies obligatory identification with every measure they implement and every statement they make. Peaceful competition is an essential component of the peaceful way to socialism, and therefore violent anti-communism which admits of nothing but condemnation of the socialist states is incompatible with genuine struggle for peace and socialism.

That the fight for peace is closely linked with the fight for socialism was pointed out by Marx in the Inaugural Address of the First International, which declares that the task is "to vindicate the simple laws of morals and justice, which ought to govern the relations of private individuals, as the rule paramount to the intercourse of nations. The fight for such a foreign policy forms part of the general struggle for the emancipation of the working classes".

This was written a hundred years ago, but there is nothing we need add to it.

It is imperative for Western Europe to steer a course towards socialism. As for the West-European working-class movement, it cannot accept any verdict that it is incapable of achieving this aim or unworthy of it.

A great responsibility rests on this movement. Western Europe is the cradle of the modern working-class movement, the cradle of scientific socialism; the concepts "socialism" and "communism" were born here. It is one of the centres of modern technology and civilization inhabited by millions of workers. What a vast force they would represent if close unity were established between the Socialists and the Communists and the working people fully appreciated their responsibility for the destinies of their own country, their responsibility for world peace, and their responsibility to their class comrades who have already abolished capitalism and to the peoples who have broken their colonial fetters and are fighting to break the grip of neo-colonialism. Solidarity in the interests of peace and socialism is that great idea which we should bring home above all to the youth. In this connection too the warning sounded in the Inaugural Address remains as timely as ever: "Past experience has shown how disregard of that bond of brotherhood which ought to exist between the workmen of different countries, and incite them to stand firmly by each other in all their struggles for emancipation, will be chastised by the common discomfiture of their incoherent efforts."

The Struggle of the Communist and Workers' Parties for the Unity of Their Ranks, against Factionists and Splitters

(From documents of the Communist and Workers' Parties)

The experience of the international Communist movement shows that resolute defence by the Communist and Workers' parties of the Marxist-Leninist unity of their ranks and the banning of factions and groups sapping unity guarantee the successful solution of the tasks of the socialist revolution, the establishment of socialism and communism. (Declaration of the Moscow Meeting of 1957.)

Marxist-Leninist parties regard it as a law of their activity strictly to observe the Leninist standards of Party life in keeping with the principle of democratic centralism, and to cherish Party unity like the apple of their eye. They strictly adhere to the principle of Party democracy and collective leadership, for they attach, in keeping with the organizational principles of Leninism, great importance to the role of the leading party bodies in the life of the Party. They work indefatigably for the strengthening of their bonds with the Party membership and with the broad masses of the working people... (Statement of the Moscow Meeting of 1960.)

AUSTRALIA

In August 1963, E. Hill, a former member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Australia, and F. Russel were expelled from the Party for factional and splitting activities, violation of the Party rules and refusal to carry out Party decisions.

After his expulsion Hill began openly to recruit followers for struggle against the leadership of the Party. In September be sent a letter to the vice-chairman of the Party in which he accused the leadership of betrayal of the cause of Marxism-Leninism and tried to refute the charges on which he had been expelled from the Central Committee and membership of the Party. In September 1963 he called a meeting of his supporters in Melbourne.

On September 25, 1963, the Jenminjihpao published a detailed report of the Melbourne meeting under the title "Hold High the Banner of Marxism-Leninism in the Struggle against Revisionism".

At the end of November 1963, the Hill group published a "Declaration of Australian Marxists-Leninists" (reprinted in Jenminjihpao on November 28, 1963) directed mainly against the July 14, 1963 Open Letter of the Central Committee of the C.P.S.U. The declaration was filled with slanderous allegations against the leadership of the C.P.S.U. and the Communist Party of Australia and sought to justify the splitting activities of the leadership of the Communist Party of China and the Hill group. E. Hill is now busy trying to set up a new "Marxist-Leninist" party.

> This new "party" will be composed of Hill and a small group of renegades from the Communist Party who failed miserably to impose their sectarian and splitting line on the Party... The Communist Party of China has seriously blotted its great reputation by its open interference in the internal affairs of the Communist Party of Australia by giving encouragement and support to Hill and by publishing many of his concoctions in the journal Peking Review. Communist parties, whatever their differences, should have their dealings with other Communist parties, not with disruptive factions. (Statement by the Political Committee of the Communist Party of Australia, January 22, 1964.)

The group's mouthpiece is the Australian Communist.

AUSTRIA

A drive to split the Communist Party of Austria was initiated by two former members of the Party, F. Strobl and H. Parkas (the latter now works in the Albanian mission in Vienna).

Strobl and Parkas circulated among Party members leaflets addressed "To the Austrian Communists" extolling the political line of the C.P.C., in particular the 25 points set forth in the letter of the Central Committee of the C.P.C. to the Central Committee of the C.P.S.U. of June 14, 1963.

Subsequently they announced the establishment of a provisional leadership of the "Anti-Revisionist Communists of Austria" and began publishing the sheet Rote Fahne.

BELGIUM

The Fourteenth Congress of the Communist Party of Belgium held in Antwerp in April 1963 expelled Grippa, Delogne, Massoz and Raindorf for opposing, in particular the stand taken by the Central Committee on the Caribbean crisis.

> The Central Committee of the Communist Party of Belgium informs the Party organizations that M. Delogne, J. Grippa, M. Massoz and R. Raindorf, who were expelled from the Party by the Fourteenth Congress, have now openly embarked on splitting the Party . . . (Resolution of the C.C., C.P.B.)

In June 1963 the opposition group called its own extraordinary conference of the Brussels Federation of the Communist Party which elected a bureau headed by Grippa.

> The Grippa faction "succeeded in drawing attention to itself mainly thanks to the differences between the overwhelming majority of the Communist and Workers' parties, on the one hand, and the C.P.C., on the other". (Statement by G. Moulin, member of the Political Bureau, C.P.B.)

The factionists are now rallying around the Brussels office of the Hsinhua Agency which helps to finance their publishing activities.

"After the Antwerp Congress the men expelled from the Party gradually stepped up their activity to a point which at first glance seemed to exceed their resources, financial resources primarily. Grippa, Massoz, Raindorf and Delogne, the principal spokesmen of the group, met with full 'understanding' in the bourgeois parties and the capitalist press, which readily gives wide publicity to their slanderous attacks against the Communist Party of Belgium. The state broadcasting corporation likewise came to their assistance . . .

"All this is not too surprising. The sad thing is that the staff members of the Brussels office of Hsinhua hastened to the assistance of the factionists who are rallying around it and clearly receiving aid from it for carrying on extensive publishing activity.

(Report in Rudé Právo, organ of the Central Committee, Communist Party of Czechoslovakia, July 30, 1963.)

The group publishes the paper Voix du peuple.

The splitters' methods:

In the spate of printed matter put out by the "pro-Chinese" Brussels splinter group one can hardly find even a semblance of an analysis of the situation in Belgium since a serious examination of the social scene would inevitably reveal the growth of the working-class forces and the positive role played by our Party. The polemics conducted by the group of splitters are also of an artificial nature. When this group essays to elaborate a policy acceptable to the working class of our country, it succeeds only in crudely copying the conclusions arirved at by the Central Committee and the last Party Congress.

There is not a single new idea, not a single new slogan, not a single new proposal capable of serving as a stimulus to action. The political impotence of the group and the vapidity of its propaganda are the best proof of the artificiality of the Brussels split, which stems from sources alien to the Belgian working-class movement. The splinter group has no hope of being able to initiate any broad trend in the Belgian working class; its aim is merely to cause damage to the Belgian Communists, to create additional difficulties for them, and to smear the Soviet Union. Its activities are basically aimed against the Party and the Soviet Union.

One of the areas in which it is most anxious to cause damage is that of inner-Party democracy, a sphere to which we have devoted much attention. The working masses are becoming increasingly aware that ours is a party functioning on a democratic foundation, a party in which supreme authority rests with meetings, in which decisions obligatory for all are adopted by secret vote and in which the leading bodies scrupulously observe the decisions taken.

Our Party has made a point of explaining to the public how it functions and has sought to set an example of democratic activity for all workers' organizations.

The recent Party Congress decided to launch a campaign to elucidate and popularize our Rules. We wish to make our Rules known not only to our own members but also to large numbers of active trade unionists. The anti-Party slander of the splitters should not be allowed to divert us from the work we decided to undertake in this sphere, it should not be allowed to prevent us from taking the initiative in order to defend our organizational principles and make the methods of our work known to the public.

The difficulties which the splinter group is encountering in propounding its political line—an adventuristic line divorced from reality—compel it to resort to the most unconscionable devices ever encountered in the Belgian working-class movement. Its activities basically consist of publishing fabrications, sowing confusion, and ascribing to the Party positions which it has never held and which can only mislead the working people. We must always be vigilantly on guard against the methods and provocative actions of this group, but vigilance should not cause us to forget our basic activities. (Report by E. Burnelle, National Chairman of the Communist Party of Belgium, at a plenary meeting of the Central Committee on September 14, 1963.)

BRAZIL

Building the Party and implementing its policy require intensification of ideological work, which must always be aimed against dogmatic and revisionist tendencies alike. In particular it is necessary to work unremittingly to uproot sectarianism and dogmatism, which struck deep root long ago in the leadership and the ranks of the Communist Party of Brazil. To overcome dogmatism and revisionism it is necessary to conduct Marxist-Leninist ideological education in the Party, closely linking the principles of scientific socialism with Brazilian reality and the practical activities of the revolutionary movement in our country. (Political Resolution adopted by the Fifth Congress of the Brazilian Communist Party, September 1960.)

The Brazilian Communist Party, whose General Secretary is Comrade Luis Carlos Prestes, is the recognized vanguard of the working people of Brazil.

In February 1962, however, the Grabois—Amazonas—Pomar splinter group issued a manifesto in which it declared itself the "true Communist Party of Brazil" and began publishing the journal A Clase Operaria. Articles published in A Clase Operaria are regularly reprinted in the press of the Communist Party of China and the Albanian Party of Labour. Writing about the Brazilian splitters' publication, the Albanian Zeri i Popullit (November 17, 1963) declared that "the appearance of this militant paper was an important event in the political life of Brazil and Latin America, a signal success for the Communists and for revolutionary Marxism-Leninism in the struggle against the oligarchy, imperialism and modern revisionism".

COLOMBIA

At the same time a persistent struggle should be waged against extremist trends and "Left" opportunism which are particularly dangerous when the conditions are maturing for a revolutionary situation. "Left" opportunism or extremism is marked by disdain for mass actions and legal activity; it takes a negative attitude to any policy of alliances and underestimates the value of patient work among the masses and struggle for vital demands which do not at once result in spectacular success, it denies the prime importance of political work among the working class and, hence, advances adventuristic theses laying the stress on armed guerilla struggle as the only and immediate form of struggle. In the ideological respect "Left" opportunism is expressed in dogmatism and mechanical copying of the experience of other countries. (Political Resolution adopted by the Ninth Congress of the Communist Party of Colombia, June 1961.)

There is a splinter group in Colombia headed by P. Vásquez and P. Abella.

At the 29th plenary meeting of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Colombia in October 1963 this faction was fully exposed.

The Chinese leaders, pretending to adhere to Marxism-Leninism while actually distorting it and flouting its essence, are engaged in ideological, political and practical activities which have led them to establishing direct contact with diverse groups of Trotskyites, renegades and expellees from the Communist and Workers' parties. This activity, at variance with Marxism-Leninism, is aimed at splitting the world Communist and working-class movement; instead of championing and propagating the great slogan of Marx and Engels, "Workers of all lands, unite!" it is undermining this slogan.

It is essential to heighten the revolutionary vigilance of our Party in order to prevent the existing differences from providing a pretext for the growth of factionalism, which is completely at variance with the Leninist norms of organization. (Resolution adopted unanimously at the 29th plenary meeting of the Central Committee, Communist Party of Colombia, Bogota, October 22, 1963.)

Here is a characterization of this group of renegades given by J. Cordona Hoyos, member of the Central Committee of the Party:

The Chinese splitters find supporters only among elements which have nothing in common with the Communists . . . I should like to cite as an example a certain P. Abella, who was expelled from the Party a long time ago for gross violations of Party discipline and adventuristic sallies. For the last 14 years this individual incessantly attacked the line of our Party. Then this anarchist began getting moral support from Peking; the C.P.C. leaders picked him off the political garbage heap and are now using him for their disruptive purposes. (Pravda, September 17, 1963.)

PERU

> As regards the unity of the world Communist movement, the unity of every Communist and Workers' Party, we hold that this unity is the most important condition for struggle for a radiant future for all humanity, for the victory of the cause of peace and socialism. Therefore we are opposed to any attempt to undermine the unity of the international Communist movement, to revive factionalism in the Communist Party, to extend a hand to those who have been expelled from the Party and other opportunist elements, or to interfere in the internal affairs of the fraternal parties in violation of standards of proletarian internationalism clearly set forth in the Moscow Statement of 1960. (Statement of the Peruvian Communist Party on the differences in the international Communist movement, October 1963.)

A group of splitters headed by Romualdo Valle convened what they called a "national Communist conference" on January 18-19, 1964.

On December 24, 1963, Unidad, organ of the Peruvian Communist Party, carried an editorial entitled "The Peruvian Communist Party—Vanguard of the Working Class". The article points out that in the recent period enemies have endeavoured "to split it from within, to prevent it from becoming a mass organization, to divert the Party's forces and make it incapable of consistently upholding the interests of the working class and the entire people. Factionalism, which confuses some honest Party members and impels them towards anti-Party positions, has emerged in embryonic form ... In our own ranks there are elements who support these positions—the factionists who call themselves the Lima regional committee and publish the anti-Party and anti-Soviet paper Bandera Roja."

Raul Acosta Salas, General Secretary of the Communist Party, declared that the group of defectors provokes the government to begin persecuting the Communists and all other democratic forces.

A conference of the Party organization in the capital held on January 29, 1964, condemned the disruptive activities and the leading factionists were expelled. A resolution was adopted pointing out that at the present time the most dangerous deviation is the Left deviation upheld in the dogmatic theses of the leaders of the Communist Party of China.

U. S. A.

Dear Comrades,

A publication called Hammer and Steel has been sent around the world from the U.S. This sheet is edited by one Homer Chase, who was expelled from the C.P.U.S.A. two years ago.

He is a renegade with Trots-kyist views and now openly fighting the C.P.U.S.A., through the bourgeois press. He is receiving support from the Albanian Party of Labour, which he extols in his publication.

He also reflects the views of the C.P.C. as regards the "inevitability of war"... There is another such publication called Progressive Labour edited by Milt. Rosen, expelled from the C.P.U.S.A,. that is being circulated internationally. This renegade too receives support from the Albanians... (Communication from C.P.U.S.A., to all Communist and Workers' parties.)

..."The Party must wage a persistent struggle against deeply ingrained dogmatic-sectarian opportunist tendencies, seen in rejection and underestimation of the united front, and in narrow, limited actions running ahead of the masses and causing isolation from them, leading to frustration and apathy. Above all, the Party must conduct an uncompromising struggle to eradicate from its ranks every vestige of the destructive evil of factionalism." (Resolution adopted by Seventeenth Convention, C.P.U.S.A., December 10-13, 1959.)

The anti-Party splinter groups in the U.S.A. have banded together in the so-called Progressive Labour party. These groups are headed by Trotskyite adventurers like Homer Chase and Milton Rosen, both of whom were expelled from the Communist Party of the U.S.A. for disruptive factional activities.

In Progressive Labour and other publications the splitters advocate the establishment of a "new Marxist party" in the U.S.A. With this end in view, they have actually set up a 14-man "national coordinating committee" headed by Rosen.

Like similar factions in other countries, the leaders of the Progressive Labour party seek to cover up their departure from Marxism-Leninism by ultra-revolutionary phrasemongering and by falsely accusing the C.P.U.S.A. of echoing the policy of class collaboration pursued by the trade union leaders.

FEDERAL GERMANY

Freies Volk, organ of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Germany, published in September 1963 (No. 9/249) the following item under the heading "We Expose. The Office for Protecting the Constitution finances and circulates Chinese materials":

Here are the facts:

1. A new special body set up at the Office for Protecting the Constitution has decided to allow the entry of materials put out by the Communist Party of China and directed against the Soviet Union, against the general line of the Communist and Workers' parties, and hence also against the policy of the Communist Party of Germany, and to place at the disposal of Chinese agencies lists of addresses, primarily addresses of members and functionaries of the Communist Party of Germany.

2. The Office has issued forgeries attributed to the C.P.G., including a faked issue of the theoretical journal Wissen und Tat as well as leaflets, in a vain attempt to use the Albanian and Chinese "theses" to penetrate into the C.P.G. and to paralyze its militancy.

3. Röder, the Prime Minister of Saarbrücken, has placed the sum of DM 25,000 at the disposal of the anti-Communist People's League for Peace and Freedom to finance the immediate publication and circulation of the "25 theses of the C.C., C.P.C." among Communists, Social Democrats and trade unionists . . . Negotiations on this filthy deal were conducted on behalf of the League by the notorious anti-Communist provocateur and enemy of the trade unions Friedrich Fritsch.

4. The Office for Protecting the Constitution has banned the printing and publication of the Open Letter of the C.C., C.P.S.U. and the circulation of the Statement on this question by the Political Bureau of the C.P.G. (Freies Volk, September 1963.)

The Chinese leaders are trying to split the Communist parties and the world Communist movement, to muster all sorts of renegades and splinter groups of factionists in order to counterpose them to the Marxist-Leninist parties. They rely on all kinds of anti-Party groupings and elements in the various countries, including our country, Federal Germany.

Materials put out by the Communist Party of China are circulated among Communists, Social Democrats and other progressives in the Federal Republic in the most diverse ways. In particular this is done through a certain Jean Kantor (Basle). These materials are accompanied by a letter offering all materials of the C.P.C. in German and announcing that they may also be obtained from Sepp Frey (Freiburg in Breisgau). Frey was once expelled from our Party and is a member of the Trotskyite centre in West Germany. Chinese publications are sent out also by Brumer Information, which is run by people expelled in the late twenties from the C.P.G. for adhering to Right opportunist positions.

In Munich Theo Pirker is recruiting a delegation to go to China with a view, as he puts it, to "learning more" about that country. Pirker is a Trotskyite who has gained notoriety through his anti-Communist pamphlets and a book with an anti-trade union slant.

Herbert Klinger (Munich) is likewise trying to build up an anti-Party group, conducting in the process a provocative discussion directed against the Soviet Union as well as the G.D.R. and the leadership of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany. Although he never was a member of our Party, Klinger had close connections with our comrades. About a year ago we had to warn the Party against him since there was good reason to suspect him of being a stool-pigeon for the espionage service.

We resolutely denounce these methods used to undermine the unity of our Party. (From a report by M. Reimann, First Secretary of the C.P.G., at a plenary meeting of the C.C., C.P.G., November 1963, published in W i s s e n u n d T a t, January—February 1964, p. 30.)

CEYLON

The struggle against the Communist Party of Ceylon is headed by Sanmuhathasan and Kumarasiri, former members of the Political Bureau of the Party who were removed from the leadership and expelled from the Party for factional, splitting activity in the Party and also in the trade unions and women's and youth organizations of Ceylon.

On November 17, 1963 the Sanmuhathasan—Kumarasiri group held a meeting (attended by 85 persons) of so-called Marxists-Leninists of the Communist Party of Ceylon at which a declaration addressed "To All Marxists-Leninists in the Communist Party of Ceylon" was adopted and signed, and an organizational committee set up to convene the Seventh Congress of the Party for the purpose, as they say, of "renewing the leadership, saving the Party and ridding it of the heavy burden of revisionism."

In January 1964 the Kumarasiri—Sanmuhathasan group held another meeting which they unlawfully called the "Seventh Congress of the Party" and which was attended mainly by those formerly expelled from the ranks of the Party for splitting activities. The "resolution" adopted by the meeting demagogically condemns the resolution of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Ceylon of September 26, 1963 "for attacking the correct Marxist-Leninist views of the Chinese Communist Party".

CHILE

A pro-Chinese factionist group calling itself the "Marxist People's Vanguard" is reported to have been set up in October 1963 in Santiago. This group, which receives assistance from Peking, opposes the line pursued by the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Chile.

At an affair sponsored by the Chile—China Society last October to mark the anniversary of the Chinese People's Republic, the trade representative of People's China in Chile made a speech in which he levelled crude sallies at the Communist Party of Chile.

SWITZERLAND

The Renegade J. Bulard and several other members of the Swiss Party of Labour have set up a so-called "Swiss Communist Party" in the town of Vevey ostensibly "to fight for the purity of Marxism-Leninism".

Early in 1964 this group began to publish a sheet entitled Etincelle.

The National Conference of the Swiss Party of Labour held on September 14-15, 1963, in Geneva exposed the splitters and those who are inspiring them in these words:

> In an interminable flood of speeches, statements, leaflets... they have been giving their own interpretation, reading their own meaning into the general line set forth in the Statements. They interpret it in their own way, which they consider to be correct, ignoring the actual situation in the different countries, and disregarding the opinions of the other Communist and Workers' parties. They even attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of other Communist and Workers' parties in order to impose the line of the Chinese Communist Party on them or to win supporters for that line. (Resolution of the National Conference of the Swiss Party of Labour, September 14-15, 1963.)

ECUADOR

The Executive Committee of the Communist Party of Ecuador exposed the factionist group in the country which has joined with persons expelled from the Communist Party. In their factional activities this group uses the younger members of the Party who stand by A. Román, the Hsinhua correspondent in Ecuador. The factionists support Franklin Pérez Castro, former member of the Communist Party of Ecuador, and circulate pamphlets and other publications attacking the leadership and the policy of the Communist Party of Ecuador.

> The Executive Committee of the Central Committee has resolved to expose before the primary Party organizations the above-mentioned group consisting of A. Román, Salazar Tamaris, Chum and Mora, who have repeatedly been called to order by various Party bodies and who are now openly and brazenly acting against the Party, seeking to fish in the muddy waters.
> The Executive Committee of the Central Committee of the C.P.E. calls upon all Party bodies to uphold our organizational principles and the monolithic unity of our ranks. (Statement of the Executive Committee of the C.C. of the C.P.E., February 1964.)

The emergence of factional and splinter groups in the international Communist movement has led to the resuscitation of the Trotskyites, those political corpses in the working-class movement.

Here is what the International Secretariat of the Fourth International wrote in an Open Letter to the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party as far back as September 1960:

> Comrades,
>
> Many leaders and official bodies of your party have recently started a discussion on some basic questions: peaceful co-existence, the illusion of the possibility of general disarmament, idealization of the potentialities of imperialism—such are the main points in this discussion . . .
> The Fourth International, which from its very inception has been waging a struggle in the Communist and working-class movement against the ideas which you are today opposing, is on your side . . . The International Secretariat of the Fourth International welcomes the debate you have initiated throughout the Communist movement. It urges you to develop that debate.

At a conference in Brussels in July 1963 the Bureau of the Fourth International adopted a decision to "give unconditional support to the struggle for the 25 programme points of the C.P.C.," stressing that "the Plenum approved an epoch-making line aimed at uniting with the Chinese and at fighting for the establishment of a united front between the Fourth International and the Chinese comrades".

SPLITTERS' INTERNATIONAL PUBLICATION

In the summer of 1963 an international journal Revolucion was founded in France with the direct participation of the C.P.C. The journal is headed by J. Verges, a renegade from the French Communist Party.

L'Humanité, organ of the Central Committee, French Communist Party, reported on September 25, 1963, that the editorial board of Revolucion consist in effect of the following:

A. Cabrera, expelled from the Communist Party of Venezuela;

R. Gibson, well known U.S. Trotskyite;

N. Kiên, a Vietnamese adventurer with nothing in common with the revolutionary forces in Vietnam.

Revolucion is a rallying centre for disruptive elements.

Third Meeting of the Communist and Workers' Parties of Mexico and Central America

(Resolutions)

OUT WITH THE YANKEES FROM PANAMA!

The Third Meeting of the Communist and Workers' Parties of Mexico and Central America closely examined the events in the Republic of Panama.

The struggle of the Panamanian people against imperialist domination over part of the territory of that country and over its economic and political life in general is steadily acquiring ever greater world-historic significance. This heroic struggle has stripped the mask off neo-colonialism and showed up U.S. imperialism in its true colours as the exploiter and oppressor of peoples. It has once again shown that the Organization of American States is nothing but the U.S. "Department of Colonies" and that the "Inter-American System" is a fraud designed to perpetuate the subjugation of the Latin American countries in the name of such spurious principles as "defence of the continent".

The Meeting declares its resolute support of the liberation demands of the Panamanian people.

The so-called Canal Zone has always been Panamanian territory. Only by force was U.S. imperialism able to occupy this part of the territory of the Republic of Panama, thereby violating its sovereignty. The treaty of 1903 is an act designed to "legalize" seizure by right of might and hence is invalid.

Our Meeting declares that, like all other nations, the people of Panama are not obliged to share their sovereignty with anyone. The problem of the canal can be solved only on the basis of the self-determination of the Panamanian people, who have already announced their decision, and we demand that this decision be respected.

The people's firm resolve to restore their rights was demonstrated by the toll of human life taken by the cowardly aggression of the U.S. Army.

The struggle waged by the people of Panama is important not only because it is a fight for liberation but also because it will inevitably lead to the evacuation of one of the biggest U.S. military bases in the Caribbean area. The liberation of the Panamanian people will be a major contribution to the efforts of all peoples to preserve and strengthen world peace.

As we know, the U.S. armed forces stationed in Panama are there for the ignominious purpose of suppressing the peoples' striving for freedom in this part of the American continent, as has been shown by the experience of several of our countries.

The Canal Zone military command is a go-between for the Pentagon and the armies of our countries, and the Zone itself has been turned into a military political school for personnel for the repressive machine working for the oligarchy and imperialism.

The people of Panama want their country to belong to the camp of peace and that the canal should serve all nations equally. This demand accords with the interests not only of the people of Panama but of all peoples of the world. Panama's cause is therefore the cause of all peoples fighting for their national liberation.

The Communist parties of Mexico and the countries of Central America, the true champions of the interests of their peoples, consider it their duty to voice their support and solidarity with this cause. The Meeting urges all peoples to render whatever aid is needed to the Panamanian people in their heroic struggle for national liberation.

Having committed military aggression, imperialism is now threatening with economic aggression. But we are confident that this aggression will be defeated by the unbending spirit of self-sacrifice and the struggle of the people of Panama, who will enjoy the active solidarity of all peoples.

The threat of military aggression is not over. But renewed aggression will not break the spirit of the sons of the Panamanian people, and it will once again be countered by the most active solidarity.

U.S. imperialist spokesmen have begun speaking about the "need" to build a canal through Nicaragua. The object is to blackmail the ruling classes of Panama and to prepare the ground in the countries which would be affected by the construction of a new canal.

The Meeting holds that the Bryan-Chamorro treaty which was imposed on the Central American peoples through the agency of the unlawful government of Nicaragua is invalid. The time is past when Central America was a "no-man's land" where the imperialists could do whatever they wished. Now a powerful national-liberation movement championing the interests of our peoples is at various stages of development in all our countries.

The Meeting firmly declares that in the present conditions neither this canal nor the Tehuantepec Canal will be built; the peoples of Mexico and Central America will not permit it. Our parties will stand together with other democratic forces in the forefront of the fight against the imperialist claims.

The Meeting expresses its deep sympathy with the Panamanian people over the loss of precious human lives caused by the aggressive actions of the U.S. Army. The self-sacrifice of the heroes who gave their lives in this struggle as well as of the other heroes of the anti-imperialist struggle lights the way to freedom and progress for the Latin American peoples.

DEFEND SOCIALIST CUBA

The Third Meeting of the Communist and Workers' parties of Mexico and Central America notes that since the victory of the Cuban revolution in 1959 imperialism and the ultra-reactionary circles of the Latin American ruling classes have joined forces against the heroic efforts of the Cuban people, who have put an end to imperialist domination and class exploitation.

The increasingly vicious threats of aggression with which the anti-imperialist steps taken by the Cuban revolution were met from the very outset were followed in April 1961 by direct imperialist aggression camouflaged as an invasion by Cuban counter-revolutionaries. The people of Cuba, who are dedicated to their revolution and have extended it to the material and cultural spheres, duly rebuffed the counter-revolutionary and imperialist invaders and routed them.

But the counter-revolutionaries and imperialism above all did not give up their criminal intention to drown in blood the Cuban revolution which, in the course of the struggle against the invaders, declared itself a socialist revolution. Scheming to crush Cuba's inspiring example by means of aggression, hostile sallies and blockade, the imperialists and the counter-revolutionaries aggravated international tensions and brought the world to the brink of war. The Soviet Union and the socialist camp, carrying out their internationalist duty, came to the assistance of the fraternal people of Cuba.

The Soviet Union, whose policy consistently upholds the interests of all humanity, prevented the nuclear disaster which the imperialists sought to provoke and secured guarantees against the invasion of Cuba. Thanks to this policy the forces of peace and socialism won in October 1962 a momentous victory over the forces of imperialism and war, and this created more favourable conditions for the development of the Cuban revolution.

But neither the imperialists nor the counter-revolutionaries have completely given up attempts to hinder the peaceful building of socialism in Cuba. They are continuing to hatch criminal plans to achieve their barbarous ends. The blockade, the treacherous attacks and the pressure exerted on other countries to stop them from trading with Cuba are all components of these schemes to put an end to the "bad example" of socialist Cuba, which is inspiring the peoples to fight for their liberation and the building of a new society, a society without exploiters and exploited.

The criminal aims of the imperialists and the counter-revolutionaries present a serious threat to socialist Cuba and the peaceful endeavours in which all the problems of the Cuban people are being gradually solved. Imperialism is spending millions of dollars to finance plans of aggression and the lightning raids in which the blood is spilt of working people engaged in building, with the fraternal aid of the socialist camp, a socialist society free from poverty and fear.

In view of the danger hanging over the people of Cuba, the Meeting urges all peoples, in particular the peoples of Latin America, to display unflagging vigilance, to prevent aggression and surprise raids, resolutely to expose the preparations made in the various countries to carry out criminal schemes.

The Cuban counter-revolutionaries, who, besides undertaking actions against their own people, are engaged in the various countries in sinister criminal activities, frequently hiring out as provocateurs, stool pigeons and executioners, thereby carrying out the role assigned to them by the reactionary governments and by imperialism, should be especially watched.

Defence of the Cuban revolution should include, besides exposure of the imperialist schemes, extensive popularization of Cuba's progress in the spheres of the economy, public welfare, health and culture in order to bring home to the fraternal peoples the achievements of the socialist system and its superiority over capitalism.

The Meeting sends fraternal greetings to the national leadership and members of the United Party of the Socialist Revolution of Cuba, who are loyally and resolutely serving their people; to the soldiers and milicianos who are defending the people arms in hand; to all manual and mental workers who by their selfless all-out labour are laying the groundwork for the full satisfaction of the material and cultural requirements of the fraternal people of Cuba.

Long live the Cuban socialist revolution!

Stay the hand of the imperialist and counter-revolutionary killers!

Statement of the Peruvian Communist Party

On the Ideological Differences in the International Communist Movement

The ideological differences that have recently arisen between the Communist Party of China, on the one hand, and the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and most of the Communist parties, on the other, threaten to cause a split in the international family of the Communist parties and socialist states of the whole world.

The Central Committee of the Peruvian Communist Party gathered at its eighteenth plenary meeting in order to determine its attitude to these differences which, it goes without saying, injure the activity, growth and unity of our Party. It thoroughly discussed and critically analyzed the concepts on which there are differences of views, basing itself on the inviolable scientific foundation of Marxism-Leninism. The unanimous adoption of the statement that follows is one of the most positive aspects of the meeting.

The unity of the Peruvian Communist Party, the unity of the international Communist movement, the invulnerability and reliability of the Marxist-Leninist principles on which the political line of our Party is founded were the main issues which determined the trend of the debate and the content of our statement.

The present statement on the ideological differences is based on the principles laid down by the Moscow meetings of 1957 and 1960 to which our Party also subscribes, and is also determined by the political line set forth by the Fourth National Congress in 1962.

1. The Fourth Congress fully subscribes to the definition of our time as "a time of socialist revolutions and national-liberation revolutions, a time of the breakdown of imperialism, of the abolition of the colonial system, a time of transition of more peoples to the socialist path, of the triumph of socialism and communism on a world-wide scale".

The Congress also subscribes to the view that it is the principal feature of our time that "the socialist world system is becoming the decisive factor in the development of society" and that "whatever efforts imperialism makes, it cannot stop the advance of history ... The complete triumph of socialism is inevitable". This historical truth has been borne out by the victory of the Cuban revolution—the first socialist revolution in Latin America.

2. On the question of war and peace our Fourth Congress declared that "socialism does not need the forcible conquest of other countries for its development and that although another war by imperialism would end in the complete destruction of this system, we Communists do not want victory at such a price: we are fighting for man's happiness, not his destruction. True to this idea, we absolutely reject the statement that 'on the debris of a dead imperialism, the victorious people would create very swiftly a civilization thousands of times higher than the capitalist system and a truly beautiful future'. A thermonuclear war would take a toll of over 800 million human lives, cause untold damage to the productive forces and socialism would thus have to be built on ruins, which would signify a return to primitive communism. Among the war victims there would be hundreds of dead workers for every dead capitalist, for the atom bomb does not differentiate between the classes."

This attitude is not humane. We must win and build socialism through class struggle, not through nuclear war. The atom danger is not merely blackmail by imperialism; it is a monstrous means which imperialism can resort to in desperation, when it realizes that it has lost all its positions in the political and ideological struggle and that before long it will be losing also the economic struggle.

We Communists regard as just the wars of liberation which will be waged as long as imperialism and colonialism exist. The socialist world and especially the Soviet Union have helped and are continuing to help all countries which are fighting for their liberation or in defence of their independence, such as Egypt, Algeria and Yemen. As regards Cuba, 90 per cent of its armaments are Soviet made.

3. As regards the question of peaceful coexistence we, in the light of the Moscow 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement, and also in the light of the decisions of the Fourth Congress of our Party, cannot agree with the assertion that "it is wrong to make peaceful coexistence the general line of the foreign policy of the socialist countries". We maintain that peaceful coexistence must indeed be the general line of relations between states with different socio-political systems. We impart to this line a revolutionary content for we see in it the most concentrated expression of struggle in present-day international conditions, a struggle which is waged in the most diverse forms in the economic, political and ideological spheres and which rules out nuclear war as a form of struggle.

Peaceful coexistence creates the conditions for positive change in society, and it should by no means be identified with conciliation, appeasement or weakening of the class struggle.

The action of the C.P.S.U. and the Soviet government at the time of the Caribbean crisis was of decisive significance. As Fidel Castro said in his speech at the Lenin Stadium in Moscow, it saved both mankind and socialist Cuba from a thermonuclear catastrophe. Today, a year after, we can see how correct, courageous and resolute was the stand taken by the Soviet Government at the time when the world was on the brink of a thermonuclear war. In solving the Caribbean crisis the Soviet Union had two aims in view: to save socialist Cuba and ensure its independence, and to safeguard universal peace. And the first aim—defence of Cuba—was considered even more important than the second, although had these two aims proved incompatible, a very grave danger would have arisen. Today we clearly see two objective factors: a) socialist Cuba continues to exist and has become even stronger and more powerful than it was before the Caribbean crisis. And the Soviet government has officially warned that should the U.S. imperialists in their frenzy again attempt to attack Cuba, it will protect her by launching guided missiles from its territory; b) universal peace was saved. With it Cuba was saved above all against the danger of being scorched by atom bombs for it would have been the first target in this war. All our peoples, humanity as a whole, were saved from a nuclear catastrophe.

As regards the Moscow treaty banning nuclear tests in outer space, in the atmosphere and under water, our enlarged Political Commission and members of the Central Committee residing in Lima warmly approved it as a milestone on the way to peace and general and complete disarmament. This outstanding event confirms the soundness of the policy of peaceful coexistence steadfastly pursued by the Communist Party and the government of the Soviet Union. It also confirms the effectiveness of the peace struggle of all the peoples of the world and shows that this struggle, closely linked with the growing might of the socialist system, with the liberation struggle of the oppressed peoples and the working class of the whole world, can avert the danger of thermonuclear war and ensure a just and lasting peace, conducive to the growth of the economic, political and military might of the socialist camp and the final abolition of all forms of oppression and exploitation.

4. The Moscow Statement of 1960 calls for mastering all forms of struggle, and according to the Marxist-Leninist theses on the different ways of revolution both the peaceful way, which allows for force and class struggle, and the armed struggle are equally revolutionary. It would be wrong to say that there is no historical precedent for the peaceful way of winning power by the working class. In 1917 the working class in Hungary came to power by peaceful means. Lenin attached much importance to this possibility, regarding it as a very special and valuable perspective. In April 1917 Lenin himself considered the peaceful way and abandoned the idea only when faced with the violence let loose by reaction. As socialism grows stronger and capitalism weaker, this possibility will undoubtedly occur more frequently. On the other hand, it should be remembered that the two ways are not separated by a Chinese wall, and at a certain time, as in the case of the Russian revolution, in view of the natural resistance put up by the class enemy which never relinquishes its positions voluntarily, it will be possible to pass over from the peaceful way to the armed struggle. That is why, our Fourth Congress, expressing its complete agreement with the relevant thesis of the 81-Party Statement, stated at the same time that the more likely perspective for our revolution is the non-peaceful way.

5. The Party has on more than one occasion criticized the personality cult as a gross violation of Marxism-Leninism. This, however, does not mean denying the role of leaders who are needed inasmuch as they express the aspirations of the working class and the people generally. The personality cult is harmful, since it belittles the role of the Party and the masses. In the latter period of his life Stalin, who before that had deservedly headed the Party and the Soviet government, estranged himself from the Party and the masses, violated the Leninist standards of Party life, abolished inner-Party democracy and renounced collective leadership. All this led to his abuse of power, to the shooting and long imprisonment of thousands of devoted members of the Party. We Peruvian Communists regard the decisions of the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. and its criticism of the pernicious personality cult as the restoration of the basic principle according to which a Communist Party is a truly democratic organization in which every member has the right freely to express his or her opinion without fear of repressions and in which every member must share actively in applying Marxism-Leninism to the specific conditions of his own country. That is why we oppose any artificial elevation or deification of any man, we oppose any attempt to revive the Stalin personality cult. Marx, Engels and Lenin ridiculed the personality cult, combating it as a survival of bourgeois ideology.

6. As regards the unity of the international Communist movement, the unity of each Communist and Workers' Party, we maintain that it is the most essential condition of the struggle for man's bright future, for the victory of the cause of peace and socialism. We therefore reject any attempt to undermine this unity, to encourage factionalism in the Communist parties, to extend a hand to the expellees from the parties and to the opportunists, to interfere in the internal affairs of the fraternal parties in violation of the principles of proletarian internationalism clearly formulated in the Moscow Statement of 1960.

Realizing that unity is essential to the existence and strength of the Party, to its ability to fulfil its role of a vanguard of the working class and the people, that it is only imperialism, the oligarchy and the rabid foes of the people who stand to benefit by the split, the overwhelming majority of the Communist parties have come out in defence of the principles of Marxism-Leninism, in defence of their unity, and the right of each party independently to manage its own affairs. The struggle against the above-mentioned deviations and the discussion now under way do not mean either a split in our Party or sowing the seeds of a split; on the contrary, this means preventing these seeds from striking roots, uniting the Party, warning it against a lurking danger. If we hide our heads in the sand like ostriches whilst the storm rages, this will mean allowing and encouraging the split and break-up of the Party. We are therefore duty bound to defend its unity, which is in fact being threatened, to clarify and defend its positions. Any delay in this respect is tantamount to suicide. We have already seen that this problem is beginning to paralyze the activity of the Party, to deprive it of perspective, to disunite its leadership and make it ineffective.

We Peruvian Communists will always fight for the unity of our own ranks and of the international Communist movement. All existing differences notwithstanding, we attach much more importance to that which unites us, than what divides us. We welcome all paths that lead to unity.

We are in favour of bilateral discussion between the parties and we are also for a World Conference of all the Communist and Workers' parties for which the Communist parties of the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia have called. We are prepared to attend this meeting, take part in its work, to approve and defend democratically adopted decisions.

The Peruvian Communist Party will steadfastly continue its fight for unity, and to fulfil its role of vanguard of the workers and the people generally. We believe that building a Party which is united ideologically, politically and organizationally and which is in close contact with the masses is the best contribution we can make to the cause of unity of the international Communist movement.

Lima, October 1963.

Statement of the Dominican People's Socialist Party

1. The guerilla action launched on November 29, in six mountain regions of the country ended on December 21 with the defeat of the main guerilla forces by the army in Las Manaclas.

Within the space of three weeks the guerilla units were wiped out one by one, with a loss of 32 dead and 98 captured.

How did this happen? Why were the guerilla detachments defeated so quickly?

Some attribute it to a lack of training, others, to inadequate organization and shortage of supplies.

It is also held that the guerillas were defeated because their operations in the mountains were not followed up by an uprising in the cities.

There is no doubt that some of these factors hastened the defeat of the guerillas in the mountains. Had the detachments been better trained they might have held out longer and inflicted greater damage on the army. But the main reason for the defeat of the guerilla detachments should be sought in the absence of conditions making for the development and the victory of an armed uprising.

2. The aim of the guerilla detachments was to destroy the military machine of repression and capture the political power for the forces of revolution. Although the guerillas did not proclaim this objective clearly and unequivocally it was quite obvious that had they succeeded in defeating the putschist regime by force of arms the power would have passed into the hands of the openly anti-imperialist and anti-feudal forces.

To determine the exact moment to start an uprising it is necessary to proceed from an analysis of the concrete situation in the given country, from the alignment of the various social forces. Let us examine the alignment of class forces in the Dominican society.

The biggest revolutionary force in a country like ours is the peasantry which is only beginning to organize and has not yet been drawn into active struggle for the land. Backwardness, subordination to the reactionary clergy, and fear of the army are characteristic features of the peasantry in our country at the present time. The peasantry has not yet shaken off the torpor induced by more than thirty years of Trujillo tyranny.

The working class is destined to lead the revolution. With all its tradition of struggle against the tyranny and its higher stage of organization it is split up into four centres. Its political consciousness is still none too high, and substantial sections of it are influenced by reactionary propaganda. The groups of workers who raise the banner of revolution are as yet few and far between. Working-class activity is centred mainly around the economic struggle.

The middle classes do not hold a homogeneous position. Some sections of the professionals, office workers, small businessmen and shopkeepers hold democratic views; others are under the influence of the Rights or moderates like the Christian Socialists. Large sections of the students in the capital and other cities take an active part in anti-imperialist struggle and cherish revolutionary sympathies.

The bourgeoisie who are dissatisfied with the present regime —nationalist elements as well as those who are ready to compromise with imperialists—are more afraid of revolution than of a despotic government. The spectre of "Castro communism" impels these elements to make political deals with circles associated with dictatorship.

The traitorous bourgeoisie and the latifundists who control the state machine and exert considerable influence in the village and on the more gullible sections of the urban population are violently opposed not only to revolution but even to the limited bourgeois freedoms which have been in operation since September 25, last year.

Thus, only a few small groups of workers and students (the vanguard) today stand for revolution. The majority of the people believe that the present crisis can be resolved by restoring political freedom and the Constitution of April 1963. The people are fighting for democracy but they do not yet regard revolution as the surest solution of their present plight.

The vanguard must not mistake their own emotions and desires for the emotions and desires of the masses. If the vanguard carries on the fight alone, there can only be one outcome—defeat.

3. No revolutionary situation existed in our country two months ago, nor does it exist today.

What are the symptoms of a revolutionary situation? Here is Lenin's classical definition:

"1) when it is impossible for the ruling classes to maintain their rule in an unchanged form; when there is a crisis, in one form or another, among the 'upper classes', a crisis in the policy of the ruling class which causes fissures, through which the discontent and indignation of the oppressed classes burst forth. Usually, for a revolution to break out it is not enough for the 'lower classes not to want' to live in the old way; it is necessary also that the 'upper classes should be unable' to live in the old way; 2) when the want and suffering of the oppressed classes have become more acute than usual; 3) when, as a consequence of the above causes, there is a considerable increase in the activity of the masses, who in time of 'peace' quietly allow themselves to be robbed, but who in turbulent times are drawn both by all the circumstances of the crisis and by the 'upper classes' themselves into independent historical action.

"Without these objective changes, which are independent not only of the will of separate groups and parties but even of separate classes, a revolution, as a general rule, is impossible. The sum-total of all these objective changes is called a revolutionary situation."

Clearly our country does not yet present such a picture. Notwithstanding the friction within the ruling camarilla, the reactionary classes have not yet exhausted all their possibilities for domination or their ability to manoeuvre; the "lower classes" have not yet rid themselves of the illusion that the solution of their problems lies within the framework of the present social and economic structure. The political crisis too has not yet reached the point where the masses would be impelled to "independent historical action". No, such a situation does not yet exist.

A revolutionary situation cannot be created artificially. Without it, neither one nor a dozen seats of rebellion will be able to cause revolutions. Revolutions are the result of a maximum aggravation of class contradictions and require the existence of objective and subjective conditions (degree of organization and consciousness of the popular masses) without which victory is impossible.

We believe that these are the reasons for the failure of the recent attempts to establish guerilla centres in the mountain areas of our country.

4. In the statements of the Central Committee of September 26, 1962 and November 23, 1963 and in other documents, our Party has insisted on the need to take all forms of struggle, peaceful and non-peaceful, into account. The development of the revolutionary movement itself, the concrete situation will determine what the predominant form of struggle should be.

It is too early to predict exactly what road will lead to the victory of the revolution in our country.

The situation at the present time and the existence of a powerful military machine of repression in the service of the ultra-reactionary ruling bloc of the bourgeoisie and latifundists seems to indicate that the principal—but not the only—form of struggle for the victory of the revolution of national liberation should be the armed struggle, a popular uprising.

In the present conditions this is the most probable form.

At the same time the other possibility cannot be entirely excluded.

We are living in a time marked by the disintegration of the colonial system, the upsurge of the national-liberation movement, the consolidation of peace forces and the steady decline of imperialism. We are living in the glorious age of transition from capitalism to socialism, when the socialist camp is emerging more and more as the decisive force of world development.

The struggle of our people is an integral part of the general struggle of all peoples against imperialism. Our struggle contributes to the world struggle against imperialism while the latter exerts a decisive influence on the struggle of our people. That is why the new victories scored by the forces of peace and socialism, the new and crushing defeats inflicted on imperialism (which have a direct bearing on the situation in our country) and the growth and consolidation of our democratic movement can create the conditions for far-reaching changes in the socio-economic structure of our country without recourse to civil war.

Today, we repeat, the most likely path appears to be that of armed uprising. But revolutionaries must take all possibilities into account, for events may develop in such a way that some form of struggle previously regarded as of secondary importance, may come to the fore.

5. Some rather curious notions, posing as legitimate theories on the question of revolution are being circulated among us.

It is held by some that revolution is possible today, because the people have the right to take to arms in response to reactionary repressions against them.

We believe that in the conditions of capitalism the people always have the right to take revolutionary action inasmuch as they are bound to be oppressed and exploited in one way or another. The problem, however, does not consist in whether one has or has not the right to violence, but of whether the conditions for the use of violence exist or not.

Others maintain that the problem of revolution consists simply in "having the courage to carry it out", that there are peoples who are more courageous and resolute than others and hence they take the path of revolutionary struggle.

Arguments of this kind have nothing in common with Marxism-Leninism. The problem of revolution is first and foremost a problem of class struggle, and not "courage". All peoples possess courage and resolution, but not all have achieved the same degree of organization and consciousness. The conditions for starting a revolution do not yet exist in all countries, and the revolution will not take an identical course in all countries.

We vehemently reject these theories, just as we reject the theory that guerilla warfare is necessarily the only road to revolution in Latin America.

Every country will choose its own road in accordance with the concrete situation. In some countries this will be the road of guerilla struggle, in others, a different form of popular revolt; in still others the possibility of effecting revolutionary changes without civil war may present itself. In any event it is for the revolutionary forces in each country to decide what road to take and when to take it.

6. When will it be possible to carry out the revolution? In one, two, five or ten years' time? No one can set the exact date. Unforeseen circumstances may postpone or hasten the victory of the revolution.

We have been fighting for political power ever since our Party, the political vanguard of the working class, was founded. Nevertheless our wishes, our efforts still fall short of our objective.

It is quite obvious that the conquest of power by the revolutionaries is not yet an immediate issue in our country.

The actions which were fought yesterday and which are being fought today are part and parcel of the revolutionary process which is a dialectical process subordinated to certain laws and not dependent on the will of one or another social group, one or another political party.

To those who are becoming impatient, we say: the more vigorous the present actions for political freedom and against the tyranny, the higher the level of organization and political consciousness of the working class, and the more social forces join in the common mass movement—the more the cause of progress will be advanced and the nearer the day of the national liberation revolution.

The immediate issue in our country, that which unites the majority of the people, is the struggle for political freedom, for the restoration of democracy. Premature calls to armed uprising, sectarianism and ultra-"leftism" which continue to exert their influence in some revolutionary quarters, hinder this struggle, play into the hands of the local reactionaries, split the democratic forces and postpone rather than hasten the day of revolution.

For this reason our principal task in the sphere of ideological work consists in combating the pernicious sectarianism and "leftist" ideas. Unless this is done, the democratic and revolutionary movement in our country will be unable to make any appreciable headway.

7. The ruling triumvirate continues to encounter difficulties caused by its putschist origins and the absence of popular support. It is a despotic government composed of the reactionary minority, of forces harmful to our country.

The lack of any appreciable degree of united action on the part of the democratic forces has enabled the triumvirate to entrench itself in power. But the efforts of the triumvirate to suppress the popular protest and to cow the masses into submission have failed. Notwithstanding the repressions, the people are fighting and demanding their rights.

The working class, which frequently declares strikes in defence of economic demands despite all threats and "legal" bans and turns a deaf ear to official palaver about "peace between the worker and the employer"; the students who stage demonstrations against the dictatorship and imperialism, the professionals and intellectuals who are fighting for human rights—all these diverse actions in support of the general mass struggle against the dictatorship represent a formidable obstacle to despotism, one which causes the government to think twice before enforcing some of its more reactionary measures. The development of this movement, the joint actions of all anti-dictatorship forces is a guarantee that the putschists will be defeated and democracy restored.

The People's Socialist Party declares once again that so long as the triumvirate remains in power there can be no democratic solution. The anti-popular and anti-national government, the product and tool of the Trujillo "gorillas", must go.

8. Our Party has repeatedly stated its opinion that guerilla warfare at the present stage is unfeasible. We set forth this view once again in our statement of November 23 last year. However, when the seats of guerilla resistance appeared, and as an expression of our solidarity with all those who are fighting in one or another way against the dictatorship, we called upon the people to rally to the assistance of the guerillas.

The speed with which the guerilla detachments were smashed prevented this assistance from taking concrete shape. However, we made it clear that we place solidarity among revolutionaries above all tactical differences.

The men of the Revolutionary Movement of June 14 who fell in battle are heroes belonging to the same historic pleiad as those who fought in June 1959. They were actuated by patriotic sentiment, by the desire to give an impetus to the revolution. Their death is a grievous loss not only for the RM-14 but for the whole Dominican revolutionary movement.

The People's Socialist Party dips its fighting banners in reverence before these gallant revolutionaries and anti-imperialist fighters.

But respect and reverence for the heroes who gave their lives in the mountains need not prevent us from making a thorough, clearheaded and objective analysis of the recent events. The struggle waged by our people for the revolution we are all striving for makes such an analysis imperative. Not in order to dim the glory of the fallen, but in order to promote the cause for which they died.

The Revolutionary Movement of June 14 is the biggest movement of the Left. It came into being during the underground struggle against the Trujillo tyranny and enjoys deserved prestige and influence among the masses. It plays an important role in our people's struggle for an anti-feudal and anti-imperialist revolution of national liberation.

We are the first to recognize this role of the comrades from the RM-June 14. While we may differ on certain tactical questions, we fully agree on the strategic objectives of the revolution. That which unites us far outweighs whatever might divide us.

On the basis of this identity of goals we should like to maintain relations of close friendship and cooperation with the RM-June 14 and with all other revolutionary forces as well. Such relations are a necessity in the Dominican revolutionary movement.

We appeal to the comrades from the RM-June 14, to the democratic political parties and to all who oppose the dictatorship to intensify the joint struggle for the restoration of democracy.

Let us heighten the mass activity against the police tyranny, against persecution, against deportations, for political freedom and against the despotic government of the triumvirate!

Let us launch a nation-wide campaign for a general amnesty for political prisoners, deportees and all those who are persecuted for their political beliefs.

Let us demand the repeal of Law No. 99 and the whole repressive legislation adopted by the triumvirate.

Let us demand again and again full observance of the Constitution of April 1963.

All forces to the defence of the economic demands of the working class!

Fight with every means against the rising cost of living!

Organize the peasants' fight for the land!

Let us close our ranks in the fight for these objectives. The people will be able to accomplish very little without our unity. Unity in the struggle is an earnest of victory.

To all supporters of democracy, to all enemies of despotism we say:

Let us strike blows in unison even though we march in different columns!

In Defence of the Unity of the International Communist Movement

Resolution of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Honduras

The Communist Party of Honduras, like all Communist and Workers' parties of the world, cannot but voice its concern over the differences between the Chinese comrades and the international Communist movement.

The delegates to the meeting of representatives of the Communist and Workers' parties held in Moscow in 1960, while aware that by signing the 81-Party Statement we did not achieve absolute unity as such, regarded this joint document as a basic programme of unity which, if carried out in full, would result in that cohesion which, as the Statement declares, is the "supreme internationalist duty of every Marxist-Leninist Party".

All the delegates to the meeting realized that the roots of the dissenting views could be traced to the leadership of the Communist Party of China, although at the outset they were voiced not by the latter but by the representatives of the Albanian Party of Labour. A few days later, in the course of the Meeting, the Chinese comrades, who until then had proceeded very cautiously, could no longer conceal their disagreement in principle with a number of theses pertaining to the struggle of the Communist parties and the characterization of our time.

In other words, the differences arose not after the jointly elaborated Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960 but long before the Moscow meetings. The meetings revealed these differences as well as some of the initial methods used by the Chinese comrades to vindicate their stand.

The Chinese comrades signed the 81-Party Statement and the revolutionary press in the Chinese People's Republic declared at the time that the imperialists were deceiving themselves if they thought that the international Communist movement would present them with the spectacle of a split in its ranks.

But the restraint of the Chinese comrades did not last long. A few days later they came out with new statements on various problems expounding their old positions which had already been discussed at the meetings. These statements were circulated by the U.S. imperialist news agencies and published the world over to the satisfaction of the worst enemies of the peoples.

For some time our Party, like the C.P.S.U., believed that the moment was not yet ripe for a new meeting to clear up the differences. But we welcomed the proposal to end the open polemic so as to allow events and the struggle of the peoples to show with the passage of time who was right and who was wrong, irrespective of the arguments advanced in support of the different positions.

In spite of the fact that the materials published by the Communist Party of China attacking the C.P.S.U. and other parties left no doubt as to the position of the C.P.C., the agreement reached on the initiative of the C.P.S.U. for a meeting in Moscow between representatives of the two parties instilled new hope in the international Communist movement. But this hope was short-lived, for even before the talks opened they were virtually broken off by the publication by the Chinese comrades on June 14 of a letter entitled "A Proposal Concerning the General Line of the International Communist Movement". This letter introduced new points of disagreement in gross violation of the documents elaborated by the parties in 1957 and 1960. The Chinese comrades offered the Communist and Workers' parties a new programme.

The polemic continued in a tone offensive and disrespectful towards all other parties.

Although the C.P.S.U. insisted on the talks being held, the fact remains that they had been terminated before they were begun. Later we learned that the Communist Party of China had broken off negotiations. The C.P.S.U. published an open letter to all Party organizations and Communists of the Soviet Union dealing with the "new line" advanced by the Chinese Communists but in no way proposing a third line for the international Communist movement or rejecting the agreed documents signed in Moscow.

In the 25 points revising the Declaration and Statement which they advanced in their June 14 letter, the Chinese comrades set forth their fundamental differences with the international Communist movement. Pretending to base themselves on the 1960 Statement, they put forward in the first of these points a "new line", just as if the Communist movement had no jointly discussed and accepted programme—witness the polemical tone struck from the outset in points 1, 2, 3 and 4. This tone of criticism and revision of the general line already adopted by the parties, a tone of intolerant denunciation, is basic to the whole June 14 letter of the Chinese comrades. At the end of Point 7, for instance, they say: "Conversely, to make no distinction between enemies, friends and ourselves and to entrust the fate of the people and of mankind to collaboration with U.S. imperialism is to lead people astray." But who has led "people" astray to the extent that they no longer distinguish enemies from friends? Who has entrusted the fate of mankind to U.S. imperialism? Not the Communist and Workers' parties of the world; and as regards people who take an erroneous attitude to friends and enemies and do not see the anti-popular essence of imperialism, it can be safely said that they have nothing to do with revolutionary parties. The Marxists-Leninists have never gone astray as the Chinese comrades claim.

We know of no document adopted by any Communist Party which would bear out the Chinese position on this score. There are no grounds for accusing the C.P.S.U. and the Communist movement of adhering to a view which "blots out the class content of the contradiction between the socialist and imperialist camps", "recognizes only the contradiction between the socialist and imperialist camps, while neglecting or underestimating the contradictions between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie in the capitalist world, between the oppressed nations and imperialism, among the imperialist countries and among the monopoly capitalist groups, and the struggles to which these contradictions give rise", and maintains "that the contradiction between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie can be resolved without a proletarian revolution in each country and that the contradiction between the oppressed nations and imperialism can be resolved without revolution by the oppressed nations". These and similar accusations contained in the Chinese comrades' letter are sheer invention; no such errors have been committed by the Communist parties, and least of all by the C.P.S.U., the Party of Lenin, the Party of the first socialist revolution, of the Great October Revolution, as the letter insinuates.

In other points of the letter the Chinese comrades set forth a wide range of differences with the Communist movement and give their assessment of the Declaration and Statement. They advance a "distinct line" in regard to the struggle waged by the peoples of the semi-colonial and dependent countries, the transition from capitalism to socialism, the parties and their programmes of action, the questions of war and peace, disarmament and prohibition and destruction of thermonuclear weapons, the policy of peaceful coexistence between states with different social systems, criticism of the personality cult, the principles governing relations between the Communist and Workers' parties, problems of Marxist-Leninist ideology and its practical realization by the revolutionary parties of the proletariat.

In Point 12, dealing with the parties, the Chinese comrades recommend highly questionable methods. Interpreting reformism and revisionism in their own way, they pose before the Communists the following proposition: "If the leading group in any party adopt a non-revolutionary line and convert it into a reformist party, then Marxists-Leninists inside and outside the party will replace them and lead the people in making revolution". We ask the Chinese comrades: who is to decide whether the leadership of a given party is pursuing a revolutionary or a reformist line? Who else but its members in the various Party organizations and at its congresses? The Chinese comrades sow confusion and anarchy when they claim that Marxists-Leninists outside the Party can "replace" its leadership if a situation of this kind arises. On the one hand, one can hardly visualize a Marxist-Leninist who is not a member of the Communist Party. On the other hand, the authorization given by the Chinese comrades, evidently in the name of their own revolution which we admire, is the sort of assistance which the Communist movement never expected from the leadership of any Communist Party.

The Chinese comrades thus set out either unwittingly or deliberately to disrupt the Communist movement. They went over to direct interference in the affairs of other parties in order to split them, and where they failed in this, began setting up new Communist parties consisting of elements they call "Marxists-Leninists outside the Party". This happened in Latin America and elsewhere. The Statement issued by the Australian Communists shows that the Chinese comrades interfered in the affairs of the Australian Communist Party, and the case of the 87 Marxists-Leninists in the Chinese sense in Ceylon is highly indicative of the anti-Leninist methods which the leaders of the C.P.C. began employing already before June 14.

In their June 14 letter and in the commentaries on the Open Letter of the C.C., C.P.S.U., published in Jenminjihpao and Hungchi, the Chinese comrades solemnly undertake the defense of Stalin and the cult of his personality, completely repudiating their previous statements on this score; in December 1956 they still declared that "the Twentieth Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union offered an example of great determination and courage in overcoming the personality cult, in exposing the serious mistakes made by Stalin and in eradicating the consequences of these mistakes. Throughout the world Marxists-Leninists and people sympathizing with the cause of Communism have supported the efforts of the Communist Party to rectify the mistakes and wish the Soviet comrades success in these efforts".

Is there not a contradiction between what is happening today and the statements formerly made by the Chinese comrades?

The Caribbean crisis, which was caused by the blockade of Cuba by U.S. imperialism, brought us to the brink of thermonuclear war. Thanks to the restraint and wisdom of the Soviet government the danger of an atomic disaster was averted. The Cuban revolution was safeguarded and the heroic people of the Island of Freedom came to know their worst enemy still better and united to a man in defence of their great movement which gave the Cubans the blessings of freedom, sovereignty and national independence. During this crisis caused by imperialism the Cuban revolution was safeguarded by the united people resolved to make any sacrifice for its sake. The powerful support of the Soviet Union prevented the imperialists from destroying the Cuban revolution, this unfading example to the peoples of America.

The Chinese comrades characterized the position of the Soviet government and its leaders as one of "adventurism" and "surrender". Soon after, the Cuban and Soviet comrades gave a detailed explanation of the situation that had arisen and the need to station missiles in order to ensure adequate defence against the U.S. aggressors. This was essential in order to prevent an invasion. Otherwise the imperialists would have tried to carry out their aggressive plans. After this negotiations took place as a result of which the blockade was lifted. Concessions were made by both sides. The revolution suffered no damage, and this was the principal aim of the military defence measures as well as of the talks. The Cuban government was in no way compelled to change its popular and revolutionary essence. Nothing was lost, and besides this the masses, who had built up their country anew, united as never before around their Party and their revolutionary government.

Besides the charges of "adventurism" and "surrender", the Chinese comrades gave an incorrect appraisal of the solution of the Caribbean crisis. We who live in close proximity to the socialist island clearly understood, together with all our people, the need to avoid war, which would have destroyed not only the socialist system but the island itself and sparked off a world war with disastrous consequences from which nothing could have saved mankind. No sane person can welcome a war which would in no way benefit the peoples but, on the contrary, would throw them back to a primitive state; moreover, among the survivors there would be millions of cripples, insane, idiots and others too maimed to be able to build the "wonderful future on the ruins of destroyed imperialism" of which the Chinese comrades so irresponsibly speak.

Recently, in connection with the signing of the limited test-ban treaty in Moscow, the Chinese comrades have launched a campaign against the Soviet Union and its leaders such as we hitherto have encountered only in the reactionary U.S. monopoly press.

The Chinese comrades attach no significance to this treaty even though the peoples of the world welcomed its conclusion and most governments adhered to it. This treaty does not abolish the danger of war, it does not even put an end to the arms drive and the manufacture of thermonuclear bombs. But no one can deny its international significance. Apart from serving to stop the pollution of the atmosphere, it paves the way to the negotiations which are bound to be conducted in the future.

The Chinese comrades describe this treaty as a "conspiracy between the Soviet Union and the U.S.A. to monopolize nuclear weapons and to deny China the right to possess these weapons in order to counteract the U.S. nuclear threat".

As we can see, the stand of the Chinese comrades as regards the limited test-ban treaty is completely unjustified.

The Chinese comrades constantly criticize, or, to be more exact, repudiate the Twentieth, Twenty-First and Twenty-Second congresses of the C.P.S.U. In particular, they claim that the "Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. was the first step taken by the leadership of the C.P.S.U. on the road of revisionism". They completely deny the significance of this congress notwithstanding the fact that in the past they themselves pointed to its importance and that the Communist parties of the whole world recognized it in the 1960 Statement: "The historic decisions of the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.S.U. are not only of great importance for the C.P.S.U. and communist construction in the U.S.S.R. but have initiated a new stage in the world Communist movement, and have promoted its development on the basis of Marxism-Leninism".

The Communist Party of Honduras enthusiastically welcomed the Twentieth, Twenty-First and Twenty-Second congresses of the C.P.S.U. and their decisions, which are of vast importance for all the Communist parties. That the C.P.S.U. is guided by proletarian internationalism in its relations with all working-class parties can in no way be questioned; the vast contribution of the C.P.S.U. to the defence and development of the Cuban revolution, which addresses the peoples of America in Spanish, was duly noted by Comrade Fidel Castro, the Prime Minister of Cuba, when he said: "The Soviet land, which lost more human lives in the Great Patriotic War against the fascists than there are in all of Cuba in order to defend its right to existence and to the development of its tremendous wealth, did not hesitate to take the risk of a grim war in defence of our small country: History knows no example of solidarity to match it.

"This is internationalism!

"This is communism!"

The press of the Communist Party of Honduras welcomed the conclusion of the Moscow treaty limiting nuclear tests and banning them beyond the boundaries of the great nuclear powers.

We published excerpts from the speech of Comrade N. S. Khrushchov at the Congress for General Disarmament and Peace inasmuch as we are in full agreement with the contents of that speech.

As we see it, the Communist parties, while conducting the polemic with the Chinese comrades in spite of all the complex implications of such a debate both today and for the future, do not close their eyes to the achievements of the Chinese comrades, do not seek to discredit China's great socialist revolution. It was the Chinese comrades' differences with and attacks against the international Communist movement that led to the open discussion. Their mistakes cannot be passed over in silence, for as we know these mistakes have not remained on paper but have found the worst possible expression—interference in the activities of some parties.

Sooner or later the unity of the international Communist movement will be restored owing to the historical need to stand united against the common enemy of the peoples—world imperialism.

Aware of its responsibility to history in the face of this serious problem, the Communist Party of Honduras has arrived at the following conclusion:

1. It confirms its support of all the theses of the Declaration and Statement signed at the Moscow meetings of 1957 and 1960 by the representatives of the Communist and Workers' parties of the whole world.

2. It rejects the "Proposal Concerning the General Line of the International Communist Movement" contained in the letter of June 14, 1963, sent by the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China to the C.P.S.U. as a reply to the latter's letter of March 30, 1963. The proposals of the Chinese comrades revise the entire content of the Declaration and Statement of the international Communist movement and thereby damage the strategy and tactics of our Party.

3. The Communist Party of Honduras supports without reservations the correct position of the C.P.S.U. and the other Communist and Workers' parties which the Chinese comrades are slandering in an effort to win support for their inacceptable revisionist, dogmatic and sectarian interpretations of Marxism-Leninism and of the entire policy of the international Communist movement.

4. In spite of the extremes to which the leaders of the C.P.C. have gone in their controversy with the international Communist movement, the Communist Party of Honduras considers it necessary to convene a new meeting of the Communist and Workers' parties which would facilitate the discussion and clarification of issues and the restoration of the unity and cohesion of the Marxist-Leninist parties of the world.

For a Broad National Democratic Front

(Outline of basic reforms, submitted by the Nicaraguan Socialist Party, on the occasion of its 19th anniversary, as the only way out of the economic, social and political crisis experienced by Nicaragua)

The Nicaraguan Socialist Party, the legitimate political expression of the will of the working class in our country, deems its urgently necessary to bring to the attention of the people and the democratic movement of Nicaragua its views with regard to the serious problems facing our country at the present time.

The relative "change" of government, which was effected in accordance with the old discredited procedure, saddled the nation with a new officaldom predisposed to preserve unchanged a situation that has prevailed in Nicaragua for more than half a century.

The existing state of affairs which in former times might have signified order and social tranquillity, has today become an anachronism; it has outlived its time and can no longer satisfy the needs of modern society.

Hunger, disease and unemployment cause much suffering to the working masses, real wages are steadily declining and from day to day more and more members of the middle sections are swelling the ranks of the have-nots.

Production for the home market is in permanent state of stagnation, although the population has grown by more than 30 per cent in the past ten years. Everything the country produces goes for export, and the needs of the domestic market are completely ignored. Moreover, the sharp discrepancy between the level of agricultural development and the hopelessly backward manufacturing and handicraft industries is making itself increasingly felt.

The national debt is beginning to assume perilous dimensions. Between 1960 and 1963 it rose by 160 million cordobas.

Agriculture, manufacturing and handicrafts, transport and trade are run on the basis of incredible exploitation inspired by a blind egoism that is incapable of foreseeing the consequences. Little wonder that popular resentment is mounting all over the country.

The big feudal landowners are trying to gain possession of the small plots still owned by the peasants. Tens of thousands of peasants all over the country are resisting the attempts of the big landlords to deprive them of their meagre possessions. And inasmuch as the government has given the landlords a free hand in this matter, our countryside is liable to become the scene of bloody strife at any moment.

A mounting wave of strikes has swept the Pacific coast of Nicaragua.

Thousands of workers are downing tools in an effort to win some improvement of their wretched lot. Despite numerous government bans, the strike movement is becoming a serious political problem both by virtue of the character of the strikes and the growing numbers of workers involved. The army, which was ostensibly created to protect the national soveregnty, is being trained to protect the right to exploit, i.e., to suppress the legitimate protests of the workers.

"From bad to worse" is how the situation with regard to Nicaragua's foreign relations might be described. Living as we do in the dollar zone the prices of our exports are disastrously declining. In the course of 1962 alone the coffee revenue fell by 14 million cordobas, and since 1955 it has dropped from 400 to 238 cordobas a quintal (a quintal = 101 lbs.) which means a loss of nearly 162 cordobas on every quintal. Cotton prices too are dropping. Since 1955 they have declined by about 50 cordobas per quintal. Moreover, the present price of 25 dollars per quintal is constantly threatened by U.S. dumping which at any moment is liable to ruin this branch of our national production.

Foreign and especially North American businessmen charge Nicaragua increasingly higher prices for the goods our country buys. This applies especially to machines and spare parts, fuel and medicines. All this adds to the hardships suffered by our people and retards the development of our national economy.

The country's finances and basic natural resources are still monopolized by big U.S. capital. Over 100 million cordobas are taken out of the country annually in the shape of gold and copper extracted by the labour of Nicaraguan workers in ore mines belonging to foreign companies. The country gets nothing for this exploitation of its mineral wealth. The mining companies ignore our national laws and lord it over the country.

The main purpose of our people's labour is the payment of interest to the Wall Street bankers so that the ruling oligarchy might be able to solicit new loans, while the people continue working to pay the bankers new and still higher interest rates. This is the vicious circle in which Nicaragua has been caught for more than half a century.

Our country's foreign policy is subordinated to the U.S. State Department. The Liberal-Conservative groups of the oligarchy which have succeeded one another in government for the past fifty-four years have never risen to the defence of the nation's freedom. They have shackled the country with debts and have given away her territory bit by bit, violating all laws and making a mockery of the national dignity and sovereignty. The oligarchy and its spokesmen submissively accept the domination of the State Department as something eternal and unchangeable, a fatal inevitability which must be borne with resignation.

Such in general outline is the picture presented by Nicaragua today. Against this background two irreconcilable social trends stand out—on the one hand, those who defend and uphold the status quo since it serves them as a screen for their own enrichment; on the other, those who strive for change, seeking not to replace the present rulers and officials, but to change the system itself on the basis of plans which provide for decent conditions for all Nicaraguans who desire their country's progress.

An objective appraisal of the national problem and an examination of the immediate perspectives, brings us to the conclusion that our country is heading for disaster. Until now the combined anti-national and reactionary forces have presented a more powerful front than the progressive and patriotic forces. The new anti-oligarchic movements are dissipating their forces owing to their disunity and the lack of a common programme of demands inspired by the national interest. The danger of our national progress being retarded by violence from above, by the further penetration of foreign capital or a traditionalist-type coup is increasing from day to day. The organization of a progressive and patriotic front which would unite all the forces of our national democracy has become the most urgent task for all Nicaraguans who oppose the traitorous oligarchy.

The Essence of the Problem

The problems facing us are basically economic: problems of production and distribution, credits and foreign trade. The evils of the present system of economy engender an unhealthy political situation, social conflicts, a cultural crisis, a sense of frustration, etc.

The character of the economic relations between the propertied classes and the working masses, aggravation of class antagonisms owing to the unbridled exploitation of the workers and peasants—this is the canker that is eating away at the foundations of social and economic life in Nicaragua. Financial and trade relations with the powerful United States which has placed Nicaragua in the position of an exploited nation is another reason why our country is lagging behind in all spheres, and especially in the sphere of political institutions.

The Nicaraguan Socialist Party considers itself in duty bound once again to draw the attention of political and economic groups striving for progressive changes to our proposal for a programme of basic reforms which could help to bring about substantial changes in Nicaragua's present system of socio-economic relations, both domestic and foreign.

Permanent Action Essential

We feel that the serious nature of the problems confronting the nation calls for permanent action on the part of the groups standing for progressive and patriotic changes. After elections have taken place it is necessary to retain our fighting positions, and without deviating from our immediate goal, to rally the people for the battles of today and tomorrow. We believe that the traditional parties which function at present only during election campaigns must alter the character of their activities if they do not want to be left behind by other parties or coalitions of permanently functioning parties. The old electoral system, under which the parties function only at the time of elections, has completely discredited itself in our country. The politician who appears on the scene only when the so-called "free elections" give him the opportunity of occupying a political post, is now being condemned by our people as a careerist pure and simple. Groups which on the eve of elections suddenly declare themselves parties and raise a loud commotion around some individual or another do our country more harm than good.

Nicaragua cannot wait for four years (and perhaps longer) to seek a way out of the chaos reigning in the country. Progressive opposition parties and other kindred organizations must take steps to establish a broad progressive and patriotic front without delay.

Today Nicaragua stands in danger of losing one of the principal sources of her income. As we noted above, the price of coffee on the U.S. market has dropped 162 cordobas a quintal and there is no indication that this decline will cease. Coffee brings Nicaragua an income of 130 million cordobas annually; the drop in the production of this crop would be an economic disaster for Nicaragua. Another vital branch of our country's economy is cotton. The steady decline in the price of cotton on the capitalist market has resulted in a loss of about 500 million cordobas since 1955, and the instability of cotton prices creates a constant threat to this branch of our national production.

Foreign credits, the mines, timber exports, indeed all our economic relations with other countries, are different aspects of one and the same problem, a problem of vital importance for Nicaragua.

Inside the country the relations between the working class, on the one hand, and the capitalists and feudal landowners, on the other, are near breaking point. Hunger and disease kill off large numbers of working people in town and village while the millionaires and the demagogues who seized the political power 30 years ago look on unmoved.

We believe that the new or revived parties can neither ignore nor reconcile themselves to these grave national problems. If the rule of the feudal gentry with their blind egoism was feasible in the conditions of the past, today when mankind has made such great advances in all spheres of life, the out-dated system of one-man leadership must give way to a system of political organization which would operate permanently, with the object of leading the people toward the satisfaction of their vital needs.

On the other hand, we believe that no political party in Nicaragua today can cope on its own with the problems confronting the nation.

Still less can this be done by any one individual, whatever a genius he might be. Hence the urgent need to overcome the pernicious cult of the leader or group and to put an end to dissension between the parties, the need to let all our thinking and actions be guided exclusively by the welfare of our native land.

The movement for national progress should lose no time in taking up the question of basic reforms. The main idea is to submit to the nation a plan for the maximum utilization of the natural and human resources of the country for the benefit primarily of the Nicaraguans themselves. Nicaragua will not be able to make any substantial progress unless her best sons proceed at once to tackle the vexing problem of unemployment and the parasitism which is encouraged by the suicidal policy of the present regime.

The Nicaraguan Socialist Party urges all opposition groups to come out at once in defence of the prices of our agricultural exports, above all coffee and cotton, and at the same time to voice their protest against the rising cost of the commodities which we buy abroad. We urge the Conservatives and their leaders, the Left forces, the bourgeois-democrats and also persons of no party affiliation, to state their position publicly with regard to the vital problem of national trade which within the capitalist orbit is bound to develop unfavourably for our nation.

We alert all opposition forces to the necessity of utilizing all the uncultivated lands and giving work to the hundreds of thousands of peasants whom the present regime has doomed to hunger, poverty, disease and ignorance. We hold that building palaces and laying out public parks is not a sign of progress when one-half of the population of Nicaragua lives in appalling squalor.

We appeal to the patriotism of Nicaraguans. Nicaragua is not a free country. Have we the right to call ourselves Nicaraguans? For half a century our country has been under the political and economic domination of the United States. Ours is a rich country but, because it is exploited and plundered by foreigners, three-quarters of its inhabitants are forced to suffer all manner of privation. We Nicaraguans are a nation with our own history, our own language, our own national laws and customs, with political and geographical boundaries separating us from other countries. Yet the North Americans station their soldiers on our territory; they have shackled us with their credits, and for half a century have been trampling on our national sovereignty and independence. The traitors of Nicaragua have done a good service to the North American interventionists by cooperating with them, and this path is leading our country into ever greater decline. Can we call ourselves Nicaraguans if we give any support to politicians who collaborate with foreign interventionists? We, for our part, maintain that Nicaragua is faced with the great historic task of removing from political power the caste of traitors and winning our independence a second time, this time independence from U.S. tutelage.

The masks donned by the interventionists and their local lackeys cannot deceive anyone. The Monroe Doctrine, the "Big Stick" policy, "good neighbours", anti-communism, or the Alliance for Progress—all amount to one and the same thing. The Alliance for Progress has been in operation for three years but our country is still heading for economic bankruptcy and the loss of all its existing institutions. It was said, and it still is said, that the Alliance for Progress will bring us the credits we need to fight hunger. But it is already clear that the miserly credits granted with so many reservations by the Alliance will not change anything, and for one simple reason: imperialism, far from having ceased to sap our country's strength, has, on the contrary, been intensively flooding our small countries with its finance capital, ruining our industry, lowering prices for the raw materials we export and constantly inflating prices for the goods we have to buy. Thus, the dollars which we receive from the Alliance are paid for twice over and, under such conditions the Alliance, instead of "fighting hunger" as was promised, will aggravate our plight.

We draw the attention of all Nicaraguans opposed to the present regime to the question of the state administration. It is obvious to all that dishonesty and corruption in high places is the rule today. The typical government official is concerned mainly with lining his own pocket, through frauds, smuggling or abuse of privilege, and government decisions are marked by incompetence and stupidity. The principal occupation of the Nicaraguan government in the sphere of economy is the arbitrary drafting of the annual budget of state expenditure (which is mounting from year to year) and the collection of taxes, which are used to ensure a life of luxury for the top bureaucracy.

Moreover the present system of government constitutes a grave danger to personal liberty. President Schick is caught in a web of contradictions. The military, the reactionary oligarchy, the career politicians and, above all, the disastrous economic crisis which strikes at the working masses in town and village all add up to a picture that is anything but reassuring for the Schick government. And hanging over all is the constant threat of a coup d'etat engineered from the outside.

The President, evidently aware of his precarious position, is doing his utmost to cling to the power, but has taken a suicidal and anti-national course. President Schick defends his policy which, under the pretext of anti-communism, is directed against the popular masses, against the trade unions and the movement of the landless peasants. There is every indication that the President is mortally afraid of social progress and is closely linked with the forces at home and abroad which are placing obstacles on the way of the country's progress. The path chosen by the President bids fair to win him the title of "anti-communist No. 1" which is vied for by so many elements from the oligarchy notorious for their unpopularity in our country. We believe that the Senor President is making a big mistake: no president can remain in power in Nicaragua by following this path (the path followed in Guatemala by the deposed president General Ydigoras Fuentes). On the contrary, he who today demands from the working class of Nicaragua unconditional surrender is taking the road leading to political debacle.

All this makes it urgently necessary to reach mutual understanding between all the social forces of Nicaragua that are dissatisfied with the present regime. This will enable them to advance together toward the common goal. The present differences among the various groups only play into the hands of the enemy. The task of pulling the country out of the swamp into which it has been led by the corrupt rulers should take precedence over all sectarian claims.

The situation in our country points up the need to carry out a programme of reforms, but not the superficial reforms which the present government professes to stand for and which do not change the structure of the system and the nature of social and international relations one iota. The reforms our country needs must reach down to the very foundations of the economic, social and political life of Nicaragua. Basically they are the following:

1. Full employment for the peasants through a genuine agrarian reform based on the abolition of the latifundia whose lands lie uncultivated.

2. Establishment of definite standards of international, diplomatic, trade and financial relations with all countries on the basis of mutual advantage.

3. Elimination of the industrial lag by means of a protectionist policy with regard to the national industry, and especially by utilization of the financial and natural resources of the country.

4. Rational planning of the economy with a view to putting an end to the present anarchy.

5. In the sphere of politics, the programme of basic reforms provides for the following: a) removal of the moribund oligarchy from political power; b) reorganization of the army from top to bottom; c) participation in government of all political parties that are opposed to the oligarchy and which stand for national independence; d) on the international plane—to pursue a policy of peace as a means of putting an end to differences among nations; e) establishment of a genuine democratic government of the people and for the people.

6. Economic relations between labour and capital should be radically changed on pain of severe punishment for all who violate the accepted standards. The state must guarantee freedom of organization for all wage earners of town and village, and also respect for the independence of the trade unions, their right to issue directives and instructions at their own discretion. The function of the government in the event of conflicts between the workers and the employers should be limited to ensuring the observance of the new social laws and examining lawsuits without delay and within the time limits prescribed by law.

The Nicaraguan Socialist Party believes that the above outline of basic reforms offers a solution of the immediate problems confronting Nicaraguans today. We believe that only by carrying out these reforms without delay can the country be extricated from the morass into which it has been led by the oligarchy.

The Nicaraguan Socialist Party believes that while the moment is not yet ripe for socialism, the era of domination by the oligarchy, the liberals or the conservatives is gone. We maintain that now is the time when the Nicaraguan people must regroup their forces, not in the manner of the traditionalists, but exclusively with a view to social progress and national emancipation. We believe, and we repeat once again, that the future belongs to a democratic national front, a broad and powerful alliance supported by the popular masses of all political trends.

The Nicaraguan Socialist Party calls upon all political forces to work toward the establishment of such a front in order to achieve radical changes in all our national institutions. There is no time to lose.

LONG LIVE A FREE AND PROGRESSIVE NICARAGUA!

On behalf of the Nicaraguan Socialist Party,

General Secretary, Central Committee

New Ways to Unity, for Democracy and Progress

Theses for the Twenty-First Congress of the Communist Party of the Netherlands

Since the Twentieth Congress of the C.P.N., held in May 1961, profound changes have taken place in the world.

As a result of the successes in the struggle for peaceful coexistence and relaxation of tension, and the growing recognition of the peace-loving policy of the socialist system, the cold-war policy with its rabid anti-communism lost ground. The partial test-ban treaty was an initial achievement for the peace forces, creating favourable conditions for further agreements.

During the same period the anti-colonialist forces won a historic victory when the last remnants of Dutch colonial rule in Indonesia were abolished.

Workers' resistance to the exploitation by the monopolies and the Marijnen government assumed mass forms and workers' unity increased in this struggle. Our Party's policy in the trade unions bore its first fruits.

At the same time the capitalist forces are fighting tooth and nail to maintain and strengthen their positions. Continuous attacks are being made on world peace; in the U.S.A. the warmongers have become increasingly active since the murder of President Kennedy, trying to create new crises over Cuba, Berlin and other focal points; in Europe the Western-German revanchists and the French Gaullists have formed the Bonn—Paris axis, where the reactionaries of the different countries find support. The imperialists are trying to continue the exploitation of the newly-liberated countries by new, neo-colonialist methods. Democratic rights and parliamentary democracy are being undermined and emasculated.

These actions of the reactionary forces encounter increasing resistance on the part of all anti-imperialist groups.

The general course of world developments and the great perspectives thus opened, call for militant and courageous action in order to utilize fully the new possibilities and to lead the Dutch workers to further success.

In these circumstances the Twenty-First Congress will have to elaborate a new orientation for the Party. This applies to all spheres of our Party's activities—action for the unity of Communists and Socialists, for the daily interests of the workers and in the sphere of international relations.

The new orientation means that the Party will first of all concentrate its efforts on fulfilling its national task, proceeding from the concrete assessment of Dutch reality and the possibilities for political and social progress. This means that its activity must be attuned to the political developments and the level of the progressive movement in the Netherlands. To solve these problems demands must be advanced that can be directly realized through the greatest possible cooperation with other people, organizations and parties. At the same time the Party must increase the politically conscious kernel of the masses and organize it in the course of struggle and by means of intensive ideological Marxist-Leninist educational work.

This orientation also calls for strict observance of the Party's autonomy in its relation to the international Communist movement. The Party is linked to this movement in the world-wide struggle for coexistence and peace and for the development of Marxist-Leninist theory, but it must keep its hands absolutely free in the matter of its political actions in the Netherlands.

The international activity of the C.P.N. serves its national task. Its best contribution to the international struggle is to augment the progressive forces of Dutch society for peace, democracy and socialism, to build up the Party itself and work for the reunion of the whole Dutch labour movement.

The main task in the future will be to overcome and refute the prejudices against our Party which the reactionaries have fostered over the years among the masses, partly facilitated by our own actions in the past.

Our goal is: to convince ever greater numbers of people that the C.P.N., the party of the Dutch Communists, is not, as the reactionaries claim, an appendage of a foreign state, but that it is serving exclusively the Dutch people.

I

Influenced by developments of the past period the views of large numbers of Social-Democrats and of Communists have come closer together. This can be seen both in the sphere of foreign policy and in the new issues of home policy.

Since the P.v.d.A. (Labour Party) was removed from office in December 1958, the ultra-reactionary forces have done their utmost to exclude it more and more from participation in state power. When the latest government was being formed it was rudely ousted by the K.V.P. and V.V.D.* though its leadership, through Vondeling, had already accepted a Rightist government programme.

* K.V.P.—the ultra-reactionary Roman Catholic People's Party.
V.V.D.—liberal People's Party for Liberty and Democracy, also reactionary.

This led to a change in the policy of the P.v.d.A. towards the Marijnen Government and on other burning issues, (e.g., it indirectly dissociated itself from the war budget by voting against the War Secretary de Jong).

The P.v.d.A. Party Congress revealed the existence of a minority in its ranks opposed to NATO.

The growing domination of the ultra-Rights in the K.V.P. and other parties in office, their efforts to unite the Right-wing coalition into one party following the example of the Western-German C.D.U., and the playing up of artificially formed splinter parties against democracy, all show how irrational it is to cherish any illusions, as the P.v.d.A. leadership did during the cabinet formation, about accepting the P.v.d.A. in government by capitulating to the reaction.

The P.v.d.A. and its socialist-thinking following are now faced with the choice of either continuing the policy that led to decline and a loss of votes and which benefited the reactionary parties mainly, or of forming, together with the Communists, a force to counteract reaction.

If unity in the struggle against reaction is to be achieved one must rise above narrow party egoism. The immediate future of the Netherlands is at stake.

The realization of a Dutch contribution to the prevention of war and for peaceful coexistence, the defence and renewal of democracy against the monopolies heading for fascism, and the promotion of the social and other interests of the population depend on the development of unity between Socialists and Communists.

Amongst the religious workers—in the trade unions, in the countryside, in the denominational parties themselves and amongst intellectuals—there exist trends opposing the present government policy and advocating a peaceful and democratic course (Prof. Delfgaauw, for example).

The efforts of the P.v.d.A. to bring these trends into its party organization by means of denominational communities came to nothing.

The building up of a force through the unity of Socialists and Communists will encourage these elements to break away from the Right-wing parties and will stimulate their cooperation with the Left-wing parties.

The C.P.N. deems trade union unity within the N.V.V.* of the utmost importance for building this force. The Communists have been very active in this respect during the past years and will continue to devote themselves to strengthening the N.V.V. for the purpose of thus strengthening the opposition against the reactionary Marijnen Government.

At its conference in December 1962 the C.P.N. made the formation of a common parliamentary opposition and trade union unity within

* N.V.V.—Trade union federation affiliated with the Labour Party.

the N.V.V. the point of departure in working to build up this force in the labour movement. The purpose was to win a parliamentary majority for a labour government with a view to realizing the main planks common to the election programmes of C.P.N., P.v.d.A. and P.S.P.

Under the existing circumstances the C.P.N. deems it also possible and desirable to win Roman Catholic and Protestant circles for a coalition on which a labour government could lean.

The experiences gained in the course of common actions for a peaceful settlement of the New Guinea (West Irian) question, and in the mass struggle against the wage policy of the Marijnen government, have shown that important victories may be scored against reaction.

To achieve joint working-class action against the Marijnen government, as well as on the community and provincial level, the C.P.N. intends to conduct a broad exchange of views with the above-mentioned parties and circles, between individuals, local organizations and between party committees.

It deems it important, with a view to maximum mobilization of forces, to limit the exchange of views to questions on which the points of view approximate, viz., in the sphere of home policy: defence of parliamentary democracy against the attacks of the K.V.P. and other Right-wing parties, struggle for higher wages and price controls, for increasing the building of homes and against higher rents, for full employment, for drastically raising the old-age pensions as much as possible at the expense of public funds, and for shortening the term of military service. It is especially important for further development to place on the order of the day the common demand of the P.v.d.A. and C.P.N. for the nationalization of the natural gas and oil resources, and for measures to prevent the income from these riches from flowing into the coffers of foreign concerns; in the sphere of foreign policy: improvement of East-West relations, termination of all atomic tests, opposition to taking part in a multilateral nuclear force, combating the Bonn—Paris axis, rejection of fascist regimes, such as those in Spain and Portugal, and condemnation of racial discrimination.

An obstacle to joint action is the distrust of the Communists fostered by the Right-wing elements; to counteract the policy of unity advocated by the C.P.N., they allege that its purpose is to undermine and ultimately abolish the other Left-wing parties.

A great deal of this distrust may be overcome by correct action on the part of the Communists in the struggle for the interests of the working people. In this struggle the C.P.N. proceeds from the fact that under the circumstances of today it is possible to work fruitfully for the same demands and that, though still marching separately, to defeat the reaction by joint action.

This opens another prospect, that of the gradual lessening and eventual overcoming of the division in the labour movement. It is now 70 years since the first division in the labour movement took place at the Zwolle congress of the Social Democratic Association; later the gulf was widened by the breach between Social Democrats and Communists.

In the new conditions of our time the reunion of the Dutch labour movement is a historic task. It demands, besides common struggle, a deepgoing and creative discussion and elaboration of theoretical questions of socialism and democracy in our day on the asis of the experiences of the whole labour movement.

The vital question before humanity is the prevention of a nuclear world war.

It is now a matter of reaching agreement between Socialists and Communists on the theoretical assessment of this question and on the ways in which the Dutch people can contribute to coexistence and world peace.

If this agreement is reached, the main obstacle to the reunion of the Communists and Socialists will be removed.

Connected herewith are the questions of the peaceful road to socialism, the role of parliamentary democracy therein and the utilization of the possibilities the Constitution offers for further democratization, as well as for nationalization of the monopolies.

Difficult as the road to reunion may be, the C.P.N. wants to take it. This alone proves that the C.P.N. does not want to cause injury to other progressive forces. It is concerned with the advance of the whole labour movement and the victory of democracy and socialism as the cause of the whole Dutch people.

II

The C.P.N. has repeatedly set forth in the resolutions of its congresses its programme for the future development of our country. Our Party reaffirms this programme, which can be realized in the future in the course of the struggle against the monopolist reaction.

But it cannot limit itself to this.

It must work, cooperating to the maximum with other forces, for practical improvements which can be achieved already under the existing conditions. Under the Marijnen Government the problems of the workers and of all non-monopoly groups of the population are aggravated. The masses do not remain passive in the face of these problems, which play a big role in their lives. Their discontent is expressed in the many demands for improvements they and their organizations have advanced.

Our Party must maintain close contact with the masses and organize them to win their demands.

The issue, then, is not that of drawing up a schematic programme of demands, or a list of what the Communists want to attain in the future. The main thing is the movement of the masses for the purposes it considers to be within reach under the existing conditions.

In the wage struggle the Party has already gained much experience. The Communists have worked for unity of action for the immediate demands of the masses, and this unity has brought results.

It is necessary to draw on the experience gained in this field also in other spheres of daily life.

The Central Committee holds that it is necessary to decide at the Twenty-First Congress on a line of action in this respect.

The following proposals for a new approach to some topical questions afford an idea of the course which the Central Committee believes should be taken.

It should be pointed out, however, that it is impossible and even wrong to go into details on all questions, because in many cases the circumstances change continually and further consultations with the people concerned are necessary.

The struggle for wage increases is now on the order of the day. To win higher wages the fight must be carried on at every enterprise and in every branch of industry.

The C.P.N. is also working for improvement of the existing wage policy. It considers it necessary that the bodies chosen by workers and office personnel in the enterprises, such as industrial councils and other workers' representative bodies, should play a bigger part in wage negotiations. Besides, the industrial councils and other workers' representative bodies should be entitled to conclude wage agreements at each enterprise (in addition to general collective agreements) on terms fixed by the local trade union organizations, as was done, for example, at the A.D.M. (Amsterdam Dock Company) in Amsterdam.

Substantial wage increases raising the living standard must be won, if necessary through a still broader strike movement than last autumn

The decision of the Council of Opsterland* to abolish the municipal classification of salaries is an example of how the municipal councils can raise wages for their personnel.

The C.P.N. is working to achieve similar results in as many other municipalities as possible. The abolition of the municipal classification will be a stimulus for all-round improvement of the position of civil servants.

By initiative within and without the municipal councils the Party will give full support to the action started by Opsterland to break down the resistance of Minister Toxopeus.

To combat the price increases it is necessary, besides advancing new wage demands, for the trade unions and organizations of women and consumers to institute democratic price control.

The increase of the petrol tax and rents, which are indicative of the general price-raising tendency, must be sharply opposed.

* Opsterland—a rural community in the Province of Friesland.

Old-age pensions must be raised this year to the social minimum.

With every rise in the level of wages and prices the burden of taxation increases. It is possible to act together with large sections of the population, especially the farmers and the middle sections, for adapting taxes to the existing level of incomes and prices. For this purpose it is necessary to extend the category exempt from income tax and to reduce the tax rate for lower and middle incomes.

The taxation of the income of working married women must be lowered.

The general demand of the farmers is a fair price for their products.

Here the Party must disprove the claim that this would inevitably lead to higher prices for the consumer. If this were to happen, it could be counteracted in the same way as the rent increases were dealt with, that is, by compensation at the expense of the employers. The C.P.N. unconditionally supports fair prices for the farmers and will take part in actions to this end.

As pointed out in the previous section, the C.P.N. advocates nationalization of the natural gas and oil resources. But inasmuch as this demand has not been met, we must strive for a further skimming of the profits of the oil monopolies by the state. The revenue from this should be used to reduce the price of gas, to develop regions hitherto considered "unprofitable", as well as for housing construction and other purposes in the interest of the population.

In order to be able to combat the housing shortage more effectively, our Party advocates setting up enterprises for industrial building of houses. Factories for the production of building elements may be financed by the state, provinces and municipalities, and, if necessary, by trade unions and housing corporations. Another form would be financing by private capital with government participation. To make houses built in the private sector available for people with low incomes, our Party advocates long-term loans granted by the government. An end must be put to speculation in land and housing.

The C.P.N. will support any initiative from anybody that may lead to abolishing the housing shortage. Extension of the industrial building of houses, which now accounts for only 10 per cent of the total house building, would contribute to alleviation of the housing shortage.

In the sphere of education it is necessary to raise teachers' salaries and to extend the building of schools. More living space must be made available for students and subsidies must be provided for cheap Mensa-meals.

To democratize the educational system and adapt it to the existing needs, all possibilities existing in the Mammoth-bill* must be used, after thorough discussion with all concerned.

* Mammoth-bill—a school- reform act introduced last year by the government.

With regard to television the Central Committee holds the view that the second TV network should be inaugurated as soon as possible, without raising the TV taxes. To make this possible, it advocates a compromise solution making the network available to broadcasting corporations and TV advertisers, under parliamentary control.

The boycott of the C.P.N. in the radio and TV must cease.

There are many other big and small problems burdening the daily life of the working people. The C.P.N., while charting broad perspectives for the future, is doing everything possible to bring about improvements today as well.

III

In the period since the Twentieth Party Congress the C.P.N. has registered some major successes.

It has consolidated its position in three elections, in which, among other things, the Right-wing schismatic "Bridge" group was defeated.

The damage caused by this group has been gradually repaired. Membership has risen, as has interest in our Party, its literature and speakers, and the attention paid it by its adversaries. In the wage struggle the Communists take the lead, a fact which is recognized by everybody.

Nevertheless the number of readers of De Waarheid remains unchanged, sales have declined, the gains in membership are still too small, and organizational activity is unsatisfactory.

The question of strengthening the Party must be seen in relation to the striving for unity.

Experience of the past months has shown that wherever the C.P.N. acted strongly and resolutely, the advances in the sphere of unity are the greatest. This proves that the strengthening of the C.P.N. as the inspiring force of action and unity, is of the utmost importance for the future of the whole Dutch labour movement.

The growth of the Party membership makes it necessary to attach more importance to the ideological education of the Party. It is likewise important to combat erroneous Right-wing and sectarian tendencies. In this way the members of the Party and its followers will be able to overcome the obstacles and difficulties that will be raised on the new roads the Party wishes to take, and to pursue resolutely and daringly the policy of unity and the struggle against reaction.

This year our Party celebrates its 45th anniversary. We shall make it the occasion for reviewing the highlights of its history, showing how closely bound up the C.P.N. always has been with the interests of the workers and their struggle for a better life, for democracy and peace. During these 45 years of struggle many sacrifices have been made. In the war against German fascism many of our best cadres gave their lives.

It is essential for the work of our Party to uphold these glorious traditions. Members who have joined the Party since the war, and especially the young people, will draw energy and inspiration for their work from the knowledge and experience of the Party.

The new orientation being put before the Congress demands flexibility and resolution as well as a principled approach to the practical work of the Party. It demands a party leadership on the national and local level and representation in public bodies that enjoy great authority and trust both outside and inside the Party.

This makes the election of the new Central Committee one of the most important tasks of the Congress.

The present Party leadership was mainly formed in the struggle against the Right-wing splitters of the "Bridge" group.

Now it is a matter of forming a party leadership in the struggle for the new line, a leadership with the ability and the conviction to carry out that line without hesitation, and with cadres which enjoy an authority earned by their long record of Party activity and experience in the struggle.

These qualities are indispensable, on the one hand, in order to overcome the deep-rooted routine and prevent the new orientation from remaining on paper; and, on the other hand, to overcome all kinds of resistance concealed behind "Left-wing" phraseology or opportunist watering-down, and to steer the Party firmly and fruitfully along the new course demanded by the new conditions.

In choosing cadres we often find the tendency to proceed from the physical suitability of one or another comrade for the daily work or for the work in public bodies. There is a tendency to ignore old tried cadres, and continually to "advance new cadres to the fore", meaning the younger Party members mainly. This practice must be discontinued.

Naturally the Party always needs new forces, and it cannot function if the practical work is not being done by suitable people.

But political guidance which brings the Party policy to the masses is the main thing.

That is why Party leaders must first of all be endowed with ability and insight, and at the same time they must have the full confidence of the Party and its followers for the leadership to be able to steer the correct course in situations that are often quite complicated.

It is necessary to develop full democracy in inner Party life, to combat weaknesses where they occur.

The Central Committee proposes that the Congress adopt a decision to carry out a campaign for the further strengthening of the Party.

Emphasis should be on:

— the recruitment of new members, paying special attention to intellectuals, who are showing more and more sympathy and interest for our Party and its ideals;

— the formation of new Party organizations through which the influence of the Party can be extended, especially in the countryside;

— the winning of new readers for De Waarheid to be achieved, among other things, by large-scale canvassing and distribution of specimen copies; at the same time, the contents of our paper must be made more popular and militant;

— the raising of funds for propaganda.

IV

It is necessary clearly to define the relations between our Party and the Communist parties in other countries, especially the socialist countries. The form of relations should correspond to the tasks facing us today.

In the decisions of the Central Committee of July 18, 1963, it was pointed out that the C.P.N. can fulfil its task in the interest of the working population of our country only if its policy takes the concrete situations and possibilities in our country as its starting point. It is responsible for its activity solely to the Dutch workers.

The policy of peaceful coexistence advocated by the Communists is gaining more and more ground. During the past years our Party concretized this for our country in its actions for a politically neutral and atom-free Netherlands. Under the influence of the growing strength of socialism and the increasing contradictions of imperialism, broad circles are feeling the need for a new assessment of the position of the Netherlands in the world. The economic and political interests of our country make it increasingly imperative to maintain relations with all sides. A neutralist policy would create the best conditions for this.

The C.P.N. supports the peace policy of the socialist states as set forth in the Declaration and Statement of 1957 and 1960 adopted at the conferences of Communist parties.

This found expression in the statement of Comrade P. de Groot endorsed by the Central Committee at its session of July 18, 1963, and welcomed enthusiastically by the whole Party.

The Twenty-First Party Congress will have to concretize these ideas still more, especially those concerning the relation between the C.P.N. and the other Communist parties in the world.

Here must be underlined:

1) the autonomy of the Party as set forth in the introduction of these theses. This is essential in order effectively to lead the struggle of the workers and to achieve a solution of the specific problems of our country, which the Dutch party alone has the right and the ability to do.

2) Full respect on the part of other Communist parties for the political line elaborated by the Party bodies and the Party leadership elected by the Party. Any violation of this principle, any interference or guardianship, or even a semblance thereof, must be avoided. Any infringement of this rule by anybody, will have to be dealt with in the Central Committee. If a difference caused by interference on the part of another Communist Party cannot be resolved to the satisfaction of the C.P.N. through internal discussions, our Party will have to reserve itself the right to defend its views openly.

The C.P.N. wishes to cooperate with all Communist parties—without exception—on the above-mentioned conditions, in the struggle for peace and in the theoretical debate. It declares itself willing to enter, on this basis, into friendly contacts with the Yugoslav Communist League as well.

3) The C.P.N. does not hold itself responsible for any action taken elsewhere, or for views expressed by Communist parties in other countries without its foreknowledge or cooperation.

4) The international contacts of the C.P.N. should be exclusively maintained by the Party secretariat or delegations or persons nominated for this purpose by the Central Committee or Executive Committee.

In the matter of the differences in the world Communist movement, the C.P.N. maintains the standpoint it has already taken. It rejects the general line of the Chinese Communist Party and all attempts at forming factions or interfering in Communist parties from without or within.

The Twenty-First Congress will have to make it clear that although differences in development necessitate a fruitful and principled discussion—which of course takes time—unity of action of the Communist parties to curb imperialism must nevertheless come first. This applies in equal measure to the ideological and tactical controversy.

The forms of the discussion must be subordinated to this supreme demand, so as not to be an obstacle to united action.

Like many other Communist parties, the C.P.N. holds that on the international plane no one party can, either alone or together with another party, lay down the basic line of action for all Communist parties. Neither should there be parties that might lay claim to some sort of "infallibility". Nor, in elaborating the Marxist-Leninist theory, should parties with the biggest membership from countries with the largest populations necessarily have the final say.

In international theoretical discussion the only criterion should be the correctness of the arguments and the results of the policy founded on them.

A carefully prepared conference of all parties held at the right moment should make it its object to strengthen the unity of action of all Communists based on the Declaration and Statement of 1957 and 1960, and also to normalize the discussion and the conflict of opinions in such a way as to promote unity.

Delegations of the Italian and French Communist parties visited our Party and country in 1963 on the invitation of the C.P.N. The discussions with these delegations have been very fruitful and deepened the understanding of the problems of the parties.

The C.P.N. will continue its exchange of views with Communist parties of all countries in order to contribute to their unity of action and to defend the creative theory of Marxism-Leninism.

On Slanderous Attacks and Open Call for Disruption and Split by the Communist Party of Indonesia

(Resolution adopted by the Central Executive Committee of the Communist Party of India, January 14, 1964)

The Central Executive Committee of the Communist Party of India has read with pain and regret the official version of a speech delivered at Jakarta on September 29, 1963 by Comrade D. N. Aidit, Chairman of the Communist Party of Indonesia.

This speech was delivered at a welcome-home meeting for the delegation of the Indonesian Communist Party which had just returned after visiting the Soviet Union, Cuba, the German Democratic Republic, China and the Korean People's Democratic Republic. The text before us is an authorized version of the main points of Comrade Aidit's speech, issued by the Secretariat of the Central Committee of the Indonesian Party on October 5 and published in the Indonesian Party press.

Comrade Aidit in his speech asserts that there are four types of Communist parties:

"Firstly, the Communist parties that are Marxist-Leninist from the top-most leadership to the cadres and members, being the only Communist Party in the country in question.

"Secondly, the Communist parties whose leaderships are controlled by the revisionists or which are inclined towards revisionism, being the only Communist Party in the country in question, but within the Party there is a strong opposition or a rather strong opposition of genuine Marxists-Leninists.

"Thirdly, the Communist parties that are fully controlled by the revisionists, being the only Party in the country in question; the genuine Marxists-Leninists have been expelled and these expelled people, together with others, or on their own, have reached the stage of publishing a magazine, while there are also those that have not yet reached this stage but which actively propagate their own ideas orally in a variety of ways.

"Fourthly, the Communist parties that have already for a long time now had alongside them a new Communist Party, so that in the country in question there are two Communist parties—the new one has been set up as a correction to the old one which is considered as having deviated from Marxism-Leninism, of having taken the path of revisionism."

Reprinted from New Age of January 19, 1964.

Having made this assertion, Comrade Aidit proceeds straightaway to declare:

"The Communist Party of Indonesia is a Party of the first type, the Marxist-Leninist type, that is Marxist-Leninist from the topmost leadership to the cadres and members."

In the authorized version of the speech, only one other Party has the distinction of being characterized in detail by Comrade Aidit. This Party is the Communist Party of India. Comrade Aidit has these remarks to make about our Party:

"Take, for example, India. Can the Dange clique that already act as spies for Nehru so that the Marxists-Leninists can no longer talk freely in the Communist Party of India which, hand in hand with the reactionary Nehru government, is hunting down, arresting and imprisoning Indian Communists, still be called the general staff of the Indian proletariat? Indonesian Communists cannot but have sympathy with and support for the genuine Communists who are now in Nehru's prisons or who are compelled to work underground because they are being hunted down by Nehru—Dange. It depends entirely on the firm unanimity and unity of genuine Marxists-Leninists in India as to when the vacuum of leadership, the vacuum in the vanguard, the vacuum in the general staff of the Indian proletariat will come to an end. But Indonesian Communists are fully convinced that a time will come when the Indian proletariat will definitely obtain a correct vanguard or general staff; the ranks of the genuine Marxists-Leninists are sufficiently strong in India."

Further on in the same speech there is another reference to our Party:

"How terrible it would be for the international Communist movement today if there were no resistance to the revisionists, how dreadful it would be if all Communists were shouting the slogan, 'Long Live Dange and Nehru'. From one point of view it is not a good thing that many Communists have been imprisoned by Nehru, but from another point of view, it is a very good thing indeed because this proves that the ranks of the Marxists-Leninists are large in India and that there are many courageous genuine Communists. Of course, Marxists-Leninists throughout the world must do everything possible to get them released from the Nehru—Dange prisons."

The Communist Party of India has always had the greatest respect and fraternal affection for the Indonesian Communist Party, whose contribution to the national-liberation struggle of the Indonesian people has made it a powerful force and one of the biggest Communist parties of the world. The Communist Party of India has always maintained proper fraternal relations with the Communist Party of Indonesia and has never interfered in any way in its internal affairs or sought to question its policies.

It has therefore been a matter of deepest regret for the Central Executive Committee to note the abusive and totally unprincipled attack made by Comrade Aidit on the Communist Party of India. Aidit stoops to the worst forms of slander and vituperations and repeats the lies put forward by the Chinese leadership that a so-called "Dange clique" is acting as "spies of Nehru". He talks of "Nehru—Dange prisons", of genuine Communists being "hunted down by Nehru—Dange".

It is not necessary for us to point out how such attacks are a total violation of the spirit of the 81-Party Conference which the Indonesian Communist Party claims that it supports.

The Central Executive Committee, however, is more concerned at the open call which the Indonesian Communist Party leader gives for the splitting of Communist parties, and particularly the Communist Party of India, and for the formation of rival parties.

Aidit insists that: "The Communist Party of Indonesia does not want and may not intervene in the internal affairs of other parties".

But immediately afterwards he negates this entirely by saying:

"Marxists-Leninists, who have been expelled are naturally duly entitled to propagate their ideas outside the Party, or organize circles and issue magazines, and they are also entitled to establish a new party.

"It requires investigation to ascertain whether these circles, magazines, and new parties are genuinely Marxist-Leninist, whether they are really a correction to the old party that is considered to be revisionist. If these circles, magazines, and new parties are really a correction of the old revisionist party, if they really and truly hold high the banner of Marxism-Leninism that has been thrown aside by the old party, then they must be given a good reception by Marxists-Leninists in all countries. How dreadful it would be if the Marxists-Leninists did not put up resistance to the ladership of a party that has gone revisionist.

"Indonesian Communists must and will be as objective as possible regarding the differentiation and selection that is now taking place in the Communist parties in many countries. The yardstick is quite clear, namely Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, the 1957 Communist Declaration and the 1960 Communist Statement.

"Indonesian Communists cannot possibly adopt a passive attitude in face of all the facts mentioned above. If the differentiation and the process of selection in the Communist parties were to go on endlessly without beginning and without end, the proletariat in the country in question would be deprived of leadership, deprived of its vanguard, deprived of its general staff."

Here is an open call for disruption and the formation of rival parties, together with an assurance of "a good reception". If this is not interference in the affairs of other parties, what else is?

The call for splitting the Communist Party of India is clear and unmistakable. Aidit appeals for "firm unanimity and unity of genuine Marxists-Leninists in India" to end "the vacuum of leadership, the vacuum in the vanguard, the vacuum in the general staff of the Indian proletariat". In fact the assurance of "a good reception by Marxists-Leninists in all countries" for a new party is immediately followed by the slanderous attack on the Communist Party of India.

Seldom in the history of the international Communist movement has such an unashamed call to set up another Communist Party in opposition to an existing one been made by the Party of another country.

The Press Communique of the Second Plenary meeting of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Indonesia (issued on December 25 at Jakarta) indicates that the Central Committee has endorsed in full the position taken by Comrade Aidit in his speech. This Communique summarizing the report presented to the Central Committee, says:

"The Section 'International Communist Movement' says that at present the leadership of Communist parties in certain countries is in the hands of revisionists who expel from the Party ranks true Marxists-Leninists and the latter are compelled to organize Marxist circles or new Communist parties, and the Communist Party of Indonesia will establish contacts with them."

■ The Central Committee of the Communist Party of India appeals to the leadership of the Communist Party of Indonesia to put an immediate stop to its unprincipled splitting activities, which are in complete contradiction of all norms of relations between brother Communist parties. The Central Executive Committee believes that the unity of each Communist Party and of the international Communist movement demands that such splitting activities are halted without delay.

■ The Central Executive Committee draws the attention of all fraternal Communist parties in the world to the conduct of the Indonesian Communist leaders. The international Communist movement cannot permit such interference in the internal affairs of other parties, such slander and abuse against a brother party, such open and defiant calls for the formation of a rival party.

■ The C.E.C. appeals to all members and supporters of our Party to be vigilant against all disruptive steps taken by any individual or group of Communists to split our Party in response to the open directives of the Chinese or Indonesian Party leaderships.

Defend the Unity of Our Party

ROMESH CHANDRA,

Member of the Central Secretariat, the Communist Party of India,
Editor-in-Chief of New Age

The editorial departments of Jenminjihpao (People's Daily) and Hungchi (Red Flag) have come out a few days back with their seventh article in the series, which purports to be comments on the Open Letter of July 14, 1963 of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

The full text of this 30,000 word article is yet to be received in India, but enough has already been reported in the press to indicate that this article beats all previous records of the Chinese leadership itself in slander and disruption of the international Communist movement.

The Indian monopoly press has, of course, joyfully quoted in full the portions of this article which attack the Communist Party of India. What can give the press of the monopolists greater satisfaction than to headline the news in blazing types: "Dange Accused of Betrayal"! (Times of India, February 5).

The Chinese leadership writes of the Communist Party of India as follows:

"The renegade clique headed by Dange has betrayed Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, betrayed the revolutionary cause of the Indian proletariat and people and embarked on the road of national chauvinism.

"This clique has usurped the leadership of the Indian Communist Party and, conforming to the will of big Indian capitalists and landlords, has been transforming the Party into the lackey of the Nehru government, which represents these interests."

The article is not satisfied with these slanderous lies. It goes on:

"What has happened to the Indian Communist Party since then? Now everybody can see that the Dange clique is still travelling on the road of betrayal. It is still advocating class collaboration and realization of socialism in India through the Nehru government. It actively supported the Nehru government's huge budget providing for arms expansion and war preparation and its measures for fleecing the people.

"In August last year, it sabotaged the great strike of one million people in Bombay against the Nehru government's ruthless taxation policy. It tried to obstruct the holding of a mass rally in Calcutta, demanding the release of imprisoned Communists, in which 100,000 people participated.

"It is continuing its frenzied anti-Chinese activities and supporting the Nehru government's expansionist policy. It is following the Nehru government's policy of hiring out to U.S. imperialism."

This is not the first time that the Chinese Communist Party's leadership has thought fit to describe the leaders of the Communist Party of India as traitors. On March 3, 1963 the notorious "Mirror for Revisionists" was published. The Communist Party of India has already replied to the lies and falsehoods in the "Mirror".

Our only regret is that while the Indian Party press published the "Mirror" in full for all to read and have the benefit of the Chinese leadership's abusive attack on our Party, the Chinese Party press refused to publish our reply, thus leaving the Chinese Party membership ignorant of the truth.

It is not necessary to tell the Indian working people that every phrase in the Chinese leadership's attack is a blatant and deliberate lie. The millions who signed the Great Petition, the lakhs who marched on September 13 know the record of the Communist Party of India in regard to the budget and the anti-people taxes. The workers of Bombay know well the key role played by the Communist Party in making the memorable Bombay Bandh strike action a success.

And every Indian democrat knows of the tireless battle waged by the leadership of the Communist Party of India for the release of Communist detenus—a battle which has already succeeded in winning the release of the vast majority of the detenus, and which shall continue without pause till every Communist detenu is out of prison.

It is not necessary for the Indian Communists to reply again to these old accusations of "betrayal". It is only the timing of the repetition of this unprincipled attack that will horrify all who stand for the cause of the world working class. This is the time when Indian Communists in all parts of the country are preparing for the biggest working class action in the history of our country.

The Chinese leadership's attack has come at the same time when the National Campaign Committee was meeting in Hyderabad to give a new impetus to the great working-class struggle for dearness allowance and bonus. The Chinese leadership's attack has come as a mighty peasant struggle begins in Andhra Pradesh—the precursor of a new round of peasant battles which will sweep the country. The Chinese leadership's attack comes in the midst of a series of demonstrations, organized and led by the Party against the U.S. imperialists' decision to send its Seventh Fleet into the Indian Ocean.

The Chinese leadership's slanders against the leadership of the Communist Party of India will delight only the enemies of the working people. Only the imperialists and the monopolists can gain at this time from the foul abuse which the Chinese leadership hurls so glibly at us.

What, however, is of greater concern to every Indian Communist is that the Chinese leadership in this article gives openly a new call for disruption and split of the Communist Party of India. The Central Executive Committee of the Communist Party of India at its meeting last month had taken serious note of the directives for splitting the Communist Party of India given by the chairman of the Indonesian Communist Party.

The Chinese leadership's latest article is an even more unashamed directive to those termed as "the genuine representatives and hope of the Indian proletariat and Indian people" to oppose and resist the Party's leadership and "rehabilitate" the Party's traditions.

This is what the Chinese article says:

"As their renegade features are revealed, Dange and company meet increasing opposition and resistance from the broad rank and file of the Indian Communist Party. More and more Indian Communists have come to see clearly that Dange and company are the bane of the Indian Communist Party and Indian nation. They are now struggling to rehabilitate the Party's glorious and militant revolutionary tradition. They are the genuine representatives and the hope of the Indian proletariat and Indian people."

Here again the timing of this call for a split must be noted. The Communist Party of India has already launched its preparations for the Seventh Party Congress: the principal aim of the Congress and its preparations is the strengthening of the unity of the Party.

The Chinese leadership's call for a split becomes all the more reprehensible in the context of the efforts for Party unity, which are being made by all Party members at all levels, who are devoted to the sacred cause for which the international Communist movement stands.

The Central Executive Committee of our Party at its last meeting appealed to all fraternal Communist parties in the world to help prevent "such interference in the internal affairs of other parties, such slander and abuse against a brother party, such open and defiant calls for the formation of a rival party". The international Communist movement must act against the splitters and compel them to mend their ways.

One can be confident that all members and supporters of the Communist Party of India will respond positively to the appeal made by the Central Executive Committee "to be vigilant against all disruptive steps taken by any individual or group of Communists to split our Party in response to the open directives of the Chinese or Indonesian Party leaderships."

It is the broad rank and file of our Party, to which the Chinese leadership has the effrontery to refer, which is acting today to preserve and defend that which is most precious to every Communist: the unity of our Party, the unity of the international Communist movement.

Unity shall triumph. The splitters can never succeed.

The Manifesto of the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party of Nigeria

INTRODUCTION

Nigeria Today

After the achievement of independence in 1960, states the Introduction, "British and other foreign rule" continues to grow in Nigeria, while poverty, ignorance and sickness continue to be the lot of the common people. Throughout the country it is being said that "only a national-democratic revolution for complete independence, ultimately leading to socialism, can solve Nigeria's problems".

Our Time: An Epoch of Change and Revolution

We are living in a unique period of world history in which the common people everywhere are demanding change. The exploiters and oppressors of the people in order to maintain their positions against change spread despair among the people. They would have the common people believe that the feudal rule of chiefs or so-called natural rulers will and must never pass away.

Inspired by the Great Socialist Revolution in Russia in 1917, the people of China broke for ever with explaitation and carried out the great Chinese Revolution which defeated imperialism, feudalism and bureaucratic compradore capitalism, and brought the people to power throughout the vast land of China in 1949. The great socialist revolution has spread and is spreading to other lands.

The socialist revolutions have greatly inspired the exploited nations of the world in their struggles to free themselves from the domination of imperialism. Colonial revolutions are sweeping through the world as part and parcel of the great revolt of the poor, the proletarian revolution. The struggles of the African people, including the Nigerian people, form an important part of the proletarian revolution of our time.

The African Revolution

Imperialism imposed monopoly capitalist rule on Africa because of the technological and military weaknesses of the African people As a result, Africa was colonized and peculiar transformations took place in African society. Our cultures were partially destroyed. Our economies fell into the hands of foreign monopolists. We lost our political independence and human dignity. After long years of colonial domination and imperialist exploitation, Africa became a backward continent of semi-feudal, semi-capitalist, partly primitive, partly bourgeois communities. The task before the African people is to change this picture.

To achieve progress, to march away from the backward past, the African must wage a determined struggle against imperialism. To this end the unity of the African people is essential. Our party is out to build up the full and unflinching support of the Nigerian people for the African revolution. In waging a battle against imperialism, however, the African people cannot ignore those classes in Africa whose aim is to collaborate with imperialism for their own selfish ends. To picture Africa as a classless continent is to give a distorted picture. Our Party is committed to waging a relentless battle against the internal enemies of the African people who collaborate with imperialism.

In our country, Nigeria, such enemies of the people have been waxing strong. But our great people are rich in traditions of unity and struggle against oppression, local or foreign.

II

THE PEOPLE'S STRUGGLES

Mass Struggle in Nigeria

For long centuries the common people of our country have lived under constant fear under the oppressive rule of powerful and well-armed ruling groups of exploiters. Through these long centuries they have waged a great and heroic struggle against the exploitation, the cheating, the plunder, the oppression of the ruling classes and groups.

Nigeria achieved self-government, the Manifesto states, thanks to the valiant struggles waged by its people.

In this struggle the Nigerian people aimed at three things:

(a) complete independence,

(b) democracy,

(c) social and economic progress for everyone.

These were the aims of the Nigerian people generally, but it is now clear that a section of the Nigerian businessmen and professionals who took part in the revolt did so in order to push out the British colonialists, set up a government of businessmen and place seekers, and use the State to enrich themselves. As for the chiefs, the majority of them opposed self-government, whilst some businessmen and professionals sided with the British colonialists.

The People Betrayed

Thus the people of Nigeria were betrayed. The British handed over power, the Manifesto states, in such a way as to "ensure the rule of those who are opposed to change", and the Constitution was drawn up in such a manner as to "divide the country and give power to the conservative feudal nobility of Northern Nigeria; militarily Nigeria was tied hand and foot not only to Britain but virtually also to the NATO bloc", as may be gathered from the fact that the NATO countries are given priority rights in Nigeria's naval ports, aerodromes, etc. Finally, the British handed over power to the elements who ensured their economic penetration in the country. The Manifesto goes on to say:

These things happened because the common people were not organized in their own party, so that the handing over of power became a matter of round-table negotiations between the British colonialists and Nigerians some of whom were anxious to grow rich from the national wealth created by the toil of the common people.

III

THE RICH RICHER, THE POOR POORER

Imperialist Penetration

Nigeria today, irrespective of ethnic group or religion, is divided into two nations: the nation of the rich made up of the rich classes and the nation of the poor made up of the poor classes.

The most important fact about Nigeria today is that our country is dominated by foreign businessmen. These foreign businessmen are growing stronger at the expense of Nigerians. Our import trade, mining, banking and finance are still dominated by foreigners. The manufacturing industry now developing in Nigeria is dominated by foreign firms. Foreign firms own most of the extensive palm or rubber plantations in Nigeria. Our shipping and air transport is dominated by foreigners. Even in road transport foreign firms like Arab Transport or Armels Transport own the largest enterprises. Foreign firms like the United Africa Company (U.A.C.) and John Holt dominate retail distribution either by direct selling or through factors. The building and construction industry in Nigeria is dominated by large and expanding foreign firms, like Taylor Woodrow (U.A.C.), Richard Costain and Cappa & D'Alberto.

Foreign business in Nigeria is expanding by leaps and bounds. For instance, in the first three years after independence, the foreign banks opened forty new branches, whereas the indigenous Nigerian banks opened only five branches. In 1951, the larger foreign monopolies alone invested about £4.5 million in Nigeria; in 1955 they invested nearly £12 million; in 1962 £25 million, and the expansion continues. Such investment represents only a fraction of the profits made by foreign monopolies in the country. Whereas investment by the monopolies rose 300 per cent from 1951 to 1955, the real national income of Nigeria rose only 25 per cent for the same period—from about £590 million to £740 million.

Exploiting and Exploited Classes and Gropus

But imperialists would not be able to exploit Nigeria if they had not among Nigerians their agents, partners and middlemen. The upper class-parasites are:

(a) The Compradore Businessmen—the class of African businessmen who are in partnership with foreign businessmen. These men grow rich and expand their business by playing the role of business tycoons, contract brokers claiming ten to twenty per cent commission by acting as representatives, agents, sub-agents or factors of foreign companies.

(b) The Feudal Nobility—the Chiefs, the Emirs, Obas, Obis, Obongs and so forth. These rulers are installed in Houses of Chiefs, Local Councils, Customary Courts, and Boards, where, by virtue of their birth or position, they can enjoy power, allowances, bribes, and customary gifts; misappropriate extensive communal land and get money by various forms of influence.

(c) There is prominent in the country's ruling circles a group of corrupt and bureaucratic careerists out to make money or acquire position by all and every means, however ruthless. As such this group cannot be separated from the compradore. No matter to what class these elements belong, they form the second line of defence of imperialism; for they feed fat from the sharing of the spoils of office that arise from the financial manipulations of the neo-colonialist state. They will oppose any change in the state that aims at installing merit as against corrupt careerism encouraged by the influences of neo-colonialism.

(d) In order to entrench themselves more effectively, the imperialists, right from the first days of colonial rule, created a group of privileged trade union bureaucrats who are well financed from the imperialist countries. They use these hangers-on to split the Nigerian workers' movement and to pursue the policies of the imperialist-sponsored International Confederation of "Free" Trade Unions (I.C.F.T.U.).

As against the imperialists and their allies and agents who want to maintain the present regime of oppression over the people, we have the actual creaters of the wealth of the country, and those who desire a great change in our country for the benefit of all. These are:

(a) The Wage and Salaried Workers: in plantations, farms, factories, mines, transport establishments, civil service, offices and elsewhere;

(b) The Farmers or Peasants, especially the poor peasants who hardly have enough land from year to year to farm;

(c) The unemployed;

(d) The self-employed artisans—carpenters, blacksmiths, weavers, tailors, barbers and so forth;

(e) The students, the youth, patriotic intellectuals, teachers and other professionals, with a social conscience;

(f) Petty traders and small businessmen whose business is daily threatened with ruin for lack of capital or because of the competition, policies and robbery of imperialist monopolies and their hangers-on.

IV

THE PEOPLE'S ANSWER

A Party of a New Type

The people need first and foremost a party of a new type, a party of workers, farmers and patriotic and progressive citizens. Such a party is the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party of Nigeria—the Party of the oppressed.

Today in our country there are many parties canvassing for support. Day by day they pour out volumes of propaganda to deceive the people. Politicians make promises today only to back out of them tomorrow. Lying and corruption are the order of the day.

The Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party is different from the other existing parties in that:

Whereas the existing parties came into being in order to achieve three things: to fight for the status of a self-governing country for Nigeria; to have Nigerian chiefs, traders and professionals take the place of British administrators; to give expression to the ambitions of the educated, feudal and business elements amongst the three major ethnic groups, the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party on the other hand, has come into being because three years of self-gevernment have shown a marked divergence between the interests of the people and the interests of some chiefs, businessmen and professionals who are collaborators with imperialism. What is wanted today is a party of socialism, a party that will fight for power not for chiefs, businessmen and professionals but for our cheated and neglected people.

Secondly, our party is guided by a social science—the science of Marxism-Leninism. This is a science which brings together all the experiences of mankind in struggle and from there draws lessons for the guidance of the common people in their fight to overthrow capitalism and imperialism and build socialism. It is a science which enables the people to know the roots of their poverty andt weakness, to see through all the deceits, confusions, pretences and lies of the ruling classes. It reveals to the people the actual realities of a situation. It shows them how socialism can be built. It guides the people in their day-to-day struggles, explains to them why certain events occur to their detriment or advantage and exposes the workings of the capitalist-imperialist system of oppression so that the people can see what to do in their fight for socialism. It shows the people how the fight is to be conducted from stage to stage. It guides the workers, farmers and socialists in the building of the party. It shows how the party is to be organized, educated and led and what the party must or must not do, may or may not do in order to gather strength, in order to be a reliable instrument and vanguard of the people and win the revolution.

Socialism is the goal. There have been many recommendations in the past and there are still a few today on how the struggle for socialism should be waged to achieve success. But it is only in countries where the battle for socialism has been guided by the Marxist-Leninist science of socialist struggle that the battle has actually been won and socialism established. Every worker, every farmer, every artisan relies not on a tool that looks beautiful but cannot do the work he wants done but on one that has been proved by experience to be strong and equal to the appointed task. Such a tool is the science of Marxism-Leninsm, the reliable science of socialist revolution which can be applied in any country at any stage of development to guide and enlighten the people.

Thirdly, our party has its roots in the people. It is the fundamental principle of our party that it is built by the peoples and is out to serve the people. Any word, any deed from whatever quarters that runs contrary to the interests of the workers and peasants is a violation of the fundamental principle of the party. In the actual building of our party our constitution ensures that workers and farmers and persons absolutely loyal and devoted to the cause of the workers and farmers and other common people of our land play the leading role.

National Democratic United Front

Apart from the workers and farmers there are other groups that also wish to change the present state of things in Nigeria in the direction of true independence, democracy and progress.

Not all sections of the bourgeoisie are in collaboration with imperialism. There are progressive businessmen, professionals and intellectuals who oppose neo-colonialism and desire democratic rule of the people in a truly independent Nigeria. Other strata of the people—petty traders, artisans, progressive youth, women, students and ex-servicemen—are also opposed to imperialism and reaction, opposed to the oligarchic, corrupt rule of a few.

A national democratic united front becomes a revolutionary necessity. We call on all progressive and patriotic businessmen, professionals, intellectuals, youths, women, ethnic organizations, students, ex-servicemen, the anti-imperialist fighters in other parties and other democratic sections of our people to rally round our party and build a national democratic united front of the people against imperialism. We call on them to build and strengthen their organizations as a bastion against neo-colonialism. We call on them to forge a new bond of brotherhood against imperialism. With our Party deep in the struggle, under the leadership of the oppressed and fighting vanguard of workers and farmers, the democratic united front must achieve its purpose.

Immediate Task—National Democratic Revolution

The present stage of the Nigerian revolution is the second stage of the national revolution against imperialism. The first stage of our national revolution started in the 1920's-1930's with the formation of the Nigerian National Democratic Party and the Nigerian Youth Movement. This stage of our revolution aimed at giving Nigeria the status of a self-governing country. The main parties in the final struggle were: the National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons, representing mainly the Ibo bourgeoisie; the Action Group, representing mainly the Yoruba feudal and bourgeois alliance, the Northern People's Congress, representing the feudal nobility of Northern Nigeria; and the Northern Elements Progressive Union, representing the down-trodden mass of the petty bourgeoisie, including to a limited extent the peasantry, in Northern Nigeria.

The leadership of the first stage of our natpional revolt remained to the end in the hands of the national bourgeoisie that emerged in Nigeria in colonial days, mainly professionals and businessmen. Because of their weaknesses the bourgeoisie have been compelled to share power with the feudal nobility. The result is a post-colonial state structure that is pregnant with inherent contradiction and crisis. With the attainment of self-rule in 1960, the colonial phase of the Nigerian Revolution came to an end.

On the eve of the transfer of power, the working-class movement which had played a big role in the colonial revolution was without a party, and was further weakened by bad leadership, the machinations of the imperialist master, and the betrayal by the bourgeoisie. The peasants equally were without an adequate party.

A State of National Democracy

Having defeated imperialism and its feudal and compradore allies, the revolution will establish a state of independent national democracy. This state will:

(a) Achieve true as distinct from nominal independence;

(b) Establish true democracy in which the common people will have have real and not merely nominal power;

(c) Carry out progressive economic and social reforms.

To the emergent nations of the world two roads are possible: the capitalist road or the socalist road. When the people have overthrown imperialism and its allies and established the independent national democratic state, which way will that state move—the capitalist way or the socialist way: the way of private businessmen, of private wealth grabbing, of greed, of private profit, of corruption, treachery and selfishness; or the way of expanding democracy, of patriotism, of service and honour, of using the country's wealth and resources in the interest of all?

Nigeria is at the moment going the capitalist way and the evils of capitalism are already becoming clear. There is neither moral justification nor common sense in calling on the common people of Nigeria to rise and overthrow foreign exploiters so as to leave a free field for local exploiters and fortune seekers to take over completely.

Therefore the nation must go in the direction of socialism. By socialism we mean the ownership of the means of production and distribution (mines, factories, banks, etc.), by the community as a whole, so as to end the exploitation of one man by another, to end the division of the country into rich and poor, the powerful and the weak. The movement to socialism in Nigeria can only proceed by stages, but our advance must be in that direction.

SOCIALIST NIGERIA

Under socialism the larger businesses will become the people's businesses run by agencies set up by the people's government. They will be run strictly in the interest of the people and their profits will belong to the people. These profits from socialist people's industries will be used to educate everyone and everyone's child, to provide equal health facilities for everyone, cheap dwelling for everyone, cheap transport for everyone and increasing personal or domestic property for everyone. Further, since the industries will be the people's industries, the workers will play the leading part in determining how the production is to be organized and how the profits are to be shared. The farmers and self-employed artisans will be helped in every way. They will be encouraged to form cooperatives in order to increase their earnings. For once, they will enjoy political liberty.

It is in this way that the exploitation of man by man in Nigeria will begin to end right from the roots. In this way the regime of growing inequality which we have witnessed under colonialism and which we are witnessing now under capitalist self-rule will turn into a regime of growing equality. But in our country the enemies of the people are not asleep. They are busy inventing all sorts of "socialisms" to confuse the people. We hear of "Pragmatic Socialism", "Democratic Socialism", "Conventional Socialism", "Commonwealth Socialism", "Arab Socialism", "African Socialism", "Fabian Socialism", "Christian Socialism", "Agrarian Socialism", and what you will. Some who call themselves socialists have even come out to say that socialism means whatever anyone cares to mean by it.

The reason for this multiplication of "socialisms" is obvious. Everywhere in the world, everywhere in Africa, everywhere in Nigeria the people are dissatisfied with capitalism and find no alternative other than turning towards socialism as the answer to their problems, as the only system that can give them independence, food, clothing, shelter, education, health, justice and peace. Since the enemies of the people cannot turn the people away from the path of socialism, they have to pose as interpreters of socialism. Thus every corrupt nationalist, every opportunist politician, every barely progressive liberal finds the label of "socialism" useful to cover up actions, policies and programmes that are essentially capitalist.

Experience has shown that the struggle for socialism must take different roads in different countries depending on the specific historical, economic, political and social circumstances of each country. But both common sense and experience also indicate that everywhere the struggle for socialism must mean throwing off the yoke of capitalists, imperialists and other exploiters and winning power for the people. The form of struggle for the people's power will vary here and there. The form of organization of the peoples power will also vary here and there. In Britain, for instance, there is no peasant class; in Nigeria the peasantry forms three-quarters of the population. In the United States there is a powerful class of native monopoly capitalists; in Nigeria the native capitalists are not of that type. In France there is no class of feudal nobles; in Nigeria there is. In some African countries there is hardly a native compradore class; in Nigeria this class is powerful and growing.

Many differences exist between one country and another. Experience has shown that precisely because of these differences and for other reasons the struggle for socialism in every country has to be guided by a powerful science of society. Such a science is the science of Marxism-Leninism: the socialist science of struggle which everywhere points out what is real from what is unreal; what is possibile from what is not possible; what is imperative from what is not imperative; what is urgent from what is not urgent; what is in the peoples' interest from what is not; what will lead to socialism and freedom from what cannot lead to it.

What the Socialists and the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party are saying is that the ruling class should not be allowed to sit tight in power, to use political power to benefit themselves; they urge the people to help themselves. The people are willing to help themselves; they want to build everything they need, but first they must take political power into their own hands in order to help themselves most effectively. Socialism means no more than this.

It is necessary to warn the people that the struggle for socialism cannot be a walk-over anywhere. It cannot be so in Nigeria. The party of the people must be ready for a really rough road and rough weather. With Nigeria as one of the last strongholds of imperialism, the struggle may not even be short. We must be prepared for a long march. The reactionaries have installed themselves in power, and with the aid of their imperialist masters, they are preparing to remain there for ever.

Experience has shown that no ruling class has ever yielded power withhout throwing everything into the battle to remain in power. The ruling classes may make concessions here and there, but they will not surrender total power without a stiff fight. Our party must be steeled for a fight. Experience has shown that the struggle for complete independence and socialism may take any form ranging from parliamentary to armed struggle. Everything depends on the experiences of the people and the way in which the ruling classes choose to conduct their own side of the struggle. And in the African context the ruling classes include the class of absentee monopoly capitalists in Europe and America whose businesses and money dominate our economy. We must remember that the Western ruling circles are committed to a policy of militarism, that long before we launched our party the absentee imperialists of Western Europe and the United States had been building up a vast military pover all over Africa as a base of violent operation against any struggle for complete independence and socialism in Africa.

But we shall not be frightened by mere military power. Experience has shown that no power pitched against the people can defeat the people. Where the people have the will and are guided by the science of socialist struggle they must find a way to socialism.

VI

ONWARD TO VICTORY

Guarantee of Success

The people of Nigeria are at the moment poor and weak: they are not in power. They are weak because of ignorance, lack of organization, because of oppression. They are divided by tribalism, by the conflicting ambitions of feudalists and capitalists, by the organized propaganda and intrigues of imperialism. But the propaganda of the ruling classes and groups makes it appear that without them there is no salvation. Can the people unite? Can they create their own leaders? Can they carry forward the Nigerian revolution and take over power for themselves?

The answer of the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party is that the people have the strength and can accomplish the task of winning power from the exploiters and building themselves a new society free from exploitation and based on freedom and equality, a socialist society. The people can succeed for the following reasons:

Firstly, in the past when an Emir, Oba, or other ruler became too oppressive the people did unite to overthrow him and set up a new power. The people of Nigeria did unite to overthrow British colonialism. The workers of Nigeria are used to uniting in their trade unions under their own leaders to fight their oppressors. The general strike of Nigerian workers in 1945 is one of the greatest events in Nigerian history and in the history of the world working-class movement. These instances show that the people can unite for struggle and create their own leaders.

Secoundly, unity of the workers and farmers to throw off the yoke of imperialists and local capitalists and to establish a socialist state has been achieved in other countries. The socialist revolution and the building of socialism are no longer experiments but accomplished facts in the world today. The period in which we live, as we have noted, is the age of colonial and socialist revolution when everywhere the common people are rising like one man to throw off their oppressors and fight for freedom, food, education and good health. The Nigerian people cannot, will not tail behind world history. We were one of the very first to raise the banner against British colonialism in Africa. We shall, we must carry on the unfinished fight. We must be one of the very first, if not the first to abolish exploitation in Africa. Therein lies the assignment of the day.

Thirdly, everywhere in Nigeria today, at home or in the streets, in towns or in villages, on play-grounds or in work-places, in parliaments or in market places, there is growing discontent, insecurity and inequality. The common people are speaking the same language everywhere. Everywhere they want change. Everywhere they want a system that will serve the people and not a rich few. All experience shows that when people have a serious common problem they can unite to solve that problem.

Fourthly, a revolutionary situation is developing fast in Nigeria. Bourgeois parliamentary democracy has been discredited; the people are so disappointed that they are more and more becominig indifferent and hostile to the regime in power. Every election reveals less and less interest by the people in the affairs of the ruling class. As a result efforts have to be made by the ruling classes to bribe, deceive and intimidate the people. There is among the intellectuals and students of the country growing discontent against the ruling classes. Among the workers, farmers and the youth frustration is deep-seated. The workers through their trade unions are coming out more and more with political programmes that have revolutionary implications. What the people need to achieve unity is organization and clarity of thought. And this will be the principal task of the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party. Organized and guided, the people will unite and win their revolution. This is inevitable.

OUR GOAL: THE PEOPLE'S NEEDS

The supreme goal of the Socialist Working People's Party of Nigeria is to secure and guarantee for the people of Nigeria:

(a) All social rights—the right to work, education, rest and leisure, and to social security;

(b) Full unresticted suffrage—all Nigerian people to enjoy equal social status irrespective of birth, sex, religion or ethnic origin;

(c) The opportunity to take a direct part in the management of production and in the distribution of the fruits of their labour;

(d) The radical solution of the women's question—equal opportunity to both man and woman in our society; the elimination of the existing social, cultural and economic differences and prejudices between the Nigerian man and woman; the raising of the status of the Nigerian woman to that of the man in all spheres of activities;

(e) The conditions for genuinely solving the question of the different ethnic groupings and minorities in our society, and ensuring their rapid advancement (social, cultural and economic).

Towards this goal the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party, guided always and only by the true interests of the people, shall work earnestly to raise the political consciousness of the entire working people of Nigeria, guide and lead them to win political power from the exploiters and oppressors and use this power to transform Nigeria into a truly socialist democracy.

THE PARTY'S IMMEDIATE TASKS

In the present situation when neo-colonialism and its agents constitute the main enemy of the Nigerian people, the immediate objective of the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party is to defeat neo-colonialism, weaken and isolate its agents and attain complete independence for our country.

Realizing that this can be achieved only by the conscious endeavours and struggles of the entire Nigerian people, the immediate task of the Party is to secure and guarantee:

(a) A strong united conscious labour movement..

(b) A strong united conscious alliance among the people of our country.

(c) A strong united National Democratic Front of all anti-neo-colonialist and anti-feudalist forces in the country.

(d) The attainment of complete National Independence (social, cultural and economic) and the establishment of a popular National Democracy in which the entire masses of our people will play a fundamentally new role in the life of our society.

VII

PEOPLE OF NIGERIA, ARISE!

Imperialism must be defeated. Nigeria must belong to Nigerians. The rich natural resources of our country must be used for the development of all sons and daughters of the land. The workers and farmers, their children and children's children can no longer continue to live like lower beasts whilst others build up private fortunes with the wealth they create. All who work must eat; all who have the honour to be citizens of Nigeria must be equally free, no matter their occupation. There must be work for all; good food for all; cheap and comfortable dwellings for all; adequate education for all; sound health for all; a well-equipped, comfortable and happy home for all; equal social oppotrunities for all; respect for all; an end to all discriminations. This country belongs to all of us; the fruits of her resources and the sweat of her sons and daughters must benefit all equally.

The Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party is the revolutionary party of Nigerian workers, farmers, toilers, patriots, democrats, progressives, socialists and oppressed, with the workers in the vanguard, and guided by scientific socialism, the teaching that guides the common people's struggles everywhere against oppression. The workers and farmers are the only ones who are anxious and able to wage the struggle against exploitation and oppression to the very end. They have no wish like others to stop half-way. They cannot condemn some oppression and favour others.

People of Nigeria, arise. Build your organization. Close your ranks. Unite around the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party. Organize the Party, build it, guide it with your toil and experience, inspire it with your tradition of struggle against oppression. Unite with other toilers, with the youth, democrats, progressive intellectuals and professionals with the socialists. Organize and support a national democvratic united front. Together we can, we must, we will overthrow imperialism, and defeat its allies. A state of independent national democracy must be built in Nigeria, with the workers and farmers in the forefront, for the interests of the workers and farmers and other common citizens of our land.

We shall march along the path of struggle, the road of socialism, to victory.

Long Live the People's National Democratic Revolution against Imperialism and its Local Allies!

Long Live the People of Nigeria!
Long Live African Unity!
Long Live World Peace!
Long Live Friendship among the Peoples of the World!
Long Live Socialism!

The Road of Revolution

(Short Programme of the National Democratic Revolution)

(A) Building a Revolutionary Movement

The central task of the Party is to build socialism in Nigeria.

To accomplish this it has to:

(a) Organize and educate the workers and farmers of Nigeria.

(b) Organize and educate the artisans, petty traders and unemployed of Nigeria and educate other patriotic and progressive groups: the youth, students, intellectuals, professionals and national businessmen.

(c) Defend the interests of workers, farmers and other toilers against the interest of the exploiters and ruling groups.

(d) Help to form and develop the national democratic united front against imperialism and its feudal, compradore and other allies.

(e) Guide the people to take over political power and establish a fully independent state of national democracy as a basis for the building of a socialist society.

(B) Task before the Nation

In the present period of the national democratic revolution led by the common people against imperialism and its allies the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party will fight for the following:

Political Objectives:

1. A constituent assembly of workers, farmers and progressive citizens to change our Constitution and make it a real instrument of progress.

In this respect we shall fight for:

2. A Republican Constitution;
3. The creation of more States to give freedom to the ethnic minorities and strengthen national unity;
4. The re-allocation of power between the Federal and Regional (or State) governments; especially the transfer of economic planning, foreign borrowing, labour, secondary and higher education and the judiciary to the Federal Government;
5. Abolition of the Houses of Chiefs and their replacement by upper houses made up of equal representatives of provinces in a State or of the various States in the Federation;
6. Guarantee of basic human and political freedoms for all over the age of 18, irrespective of sex, tribe, religion, financial position or education;
7. Re-allocation of revenue on the basis of population and need;
8. The right of constituencies to recall their representatives in parliament;
9. The right of all workers to take part in politics;
10. The full representation of workers and peasants in parliament;
11. The full participation of workers and peasants in local councils;
12. Abolition of all oppressive councils, courts or other similar institutions;
13. Democratization of the statutory boards to permit full workers' and farmers' participation;
14. Removal of all foreign, exploitative and oppressive influence from our politics.

The Party will fight for the following economic objectives:

Economic Objectives:

15. The nationalization of all imperialist enterprises so as to remove once and for all the economic and political dependence of Nigeria on foreign powers;
16. Nationalization of all businesses owned by feudal nobles and compradore capitalists;
17. Redistribution or nationalization of all communal land usurped by feudal nobles or other landlords, or all excessive land held by feudal nobles or landlords;
18. Nationalization of all State businesses sold to private businessmen; all wealth and property accumulated through graft by the compradore;
19. Abolition of all feudal relations;
20. Development of uncultivated land; mechanization and modernization of farming;
21. State establishment of industries and promotion of rapid industrialization of Nigeria. We note the vast industrial potentials of Nigeria in water, coal, mineral oil and gas as sources of power; in varied mineral and agricultural raw materials; in man-power, in a potential internal market, in native intelligence. We note that the £45,000 used to build each of the houses of Federal Ministers, the £2½ million used to reclaim swamp land to enable the ruling groups to own land on the Lagos waterfront; the £1½ million wasted on the 1962 census which was cancelled because of the tribal rivalry of ruling groups, the £6 million squandered by the Western Nigeria Government on this kind of building and other useless projects as revealed by the Coker Inquiry, and many other such funds squandered by all the governments of the Federation are sufficient to establish scores of large factories every year;

22. Encouragement of national, that is, independent or non-compradore African businessmen;
23. Abolition of unemployment;
24. Drastic scaling down of the salaries of Ministers and Parliamentarians to what the workers and farmers want them to be;
25. Scaling down of all excessive salaries and allowances;
26. Establishment of a national minimum wage to guarantee a decent minimum standard of life for all wage-earners;
27. Formation and encouragement of farmers' cooperatives;
28. Encouragement of partnerships, cooperatives and general development and modernization of their enterprises among independent artisans, pettytraders and profesionals;
29. Control of prices of imported goods, of rents and of other excessive charges;
30. Scaling down of taxes on workers and farmers.

In the social sphere we will fight for the following:

Social Objectives:

31. Abolition of illiteracy;
32. Institution of free education up to University level;
33. Abolition of all private schools;
34. Expansion of medical, especially of maternity services;
35. Giving of maximum State encouragement to the development of folk culture, music, writing, sculpture, painting, sports, etc.;
36. Strengthening and expansion of trade union rights;
37. Formulation jointly by the State and trade unions of a new Trade Union Ordinance with a view to improving conditions of work;
38. Guaranteeing of living standards and proper conditions of work for all workers;
39. Protection of female workers;
40. Encouragement of organizations for the defence of farmers' rights;
41. Abolition of all debts owed by poor wage earners to capitalists and landlords;

42. Abolition of repayment of debts owned by poor farmers to richer people;
43. Allocation of sufficient land and granting of loans to poor farmers;
44. Abolition of all bribes, forced gifts, prostitution, nepotism and other forms of corruption;
45. Abolition of all discrimination based on race, tribe or religion;
46. Carrying out of all other social reforms in the interest of the workers, farmers and other toilers in our land.

Policy on Africa

47. In the realm of African affairs the Socialist Workers' and Farmers' Party will fight for the immediate independence of all African countries;
48. The unity of all African States and the peoples in the struggle against imperialism;
49. The abolition of all foreign bases on African soil.

We shall do the above because the democratic national independent state of the Nigerian people cannot be safe so long as imperialists can intrigue against it from other African states.

In addition, so as to ensure maximum progress of all Africa we will:

50. Fight for the political union of all African states on the basis of democracy and progress;
51. Conduct any other fight that shall be in the interest of the African revolution.

International Policy:

In the realm of world affairs, we will:

52. Fight actively for peace, for our revolution is endangered and retarded so long as the great powers arm for war;
53. Support the right of all nations to self-determination, for the denial of self-determination to any one country is a step towards its denial to other countries;
54. Support the cause of all countries fighting against imperialism;
55. Support the cause of progress—of the workers and farmers of all countries against cheating and backwardness.

These specific steps shall pave the way for the people to build a free socialist society where wealth shall begin to be distributed according to the principle, from each according to his ability, to each according to his needs.

Workers of Nigeria, unite!

Peasants of Nigeria, awake!

Socialists and Democrats of Nigeria, rally to the people's banner!

Working people of Nigeria, unite and smash imperialism and feudalism!

Splitting Activities of Chinese Repudiated

The following statement was issued last week by the National Executive Committee of the Communist Party of Canada:

We are greatly concerned with a recent editorial article published by the editorial departments of People's Daily and Red Flag, entitled "The Leaders of the C.P.S.U. Are the Greatest Splitters of Our Times".

The sole essential content of this article is a call for splits, for disuniting the world Communist movement, and for the establishment of an international centre headed by the Communist Party of China, whose purpose is to impose its own dangerous and non-Marxist line against the line of the world Communist movement.

The Communist Party of China is striving recklessly to split the countries of the world socialist system. By this action it is weakening the world front of peace, democracy, national liberation and socialism.

Our Party repudiates this splitting activity of the Communist Party of China. This most recent reckless attempt by the leaders of the Chinese Party to force splits, compels us to point out that it is necessary at every level of party organization to oppose this unscrupulous attempt to divide the world Communist movement. We stand firmly on the positions which we have repeatedly taken in rejecting the totally wrong and un-Marxist line of the Chinese leaders.

For some time now, our Party has called for a world conference of Communist and Workers' parties. We believe the developing situation makes such a conference more necessary than ever so as to unite all the forces of the world Communist movement in defence of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and the documents of the world movement.

Latest Chinese Statement Discussed by Gus Hall

The following statement by Gus Hall was issued to the press on Friday, Feb. 7.

The latest statement of the Communist Party of China, appearing as an editorial in its theoretical publication Hung chi is one which demands detailed study and reply. It contains one point, however, which requires immediate reaction.

The statement presents a political and philosophical thesis seeking to justify the splitting of the working class and its organizations as a necessary and even desirable thing. It is a thesis that glorifies irresponsible, disruptive factional activities aimed at splitting Communist parties—that sets disunity as a goal for which to strive.

There is no other way in which one can interpret such statements as these: "First it (the history of the international Communist movement) demonstrates that like everything else the international working-class movement tends to divide itself in two. The class struggle between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie is inevitably reflected in the Communist ranks." Or: "Unity, struggle, or even splits, and a new unity on a new basis—such is the dialectics of the development of the international working-class movement."

A thesis which justifies splitting ranks can at no time be in the interests of the working class. It is a disservice to the struggle for world peace, harmful to the struggle against imperialism and for colonial liberation, and detrimental to the struggles for democracy and for socialism.

To appeal to processes of growth through division in nature as an argument for splitting the working-class movement is a mechanistic, even fatalistic, approach which fails to take into account what is most important: the conscious human element and its influence in social development.

There is indeed a struggle within the ranks of the working class. It is a struggle against capitalist ideology, whose purpose is to divide the workers and set them against one another. The method of fighting against this influence is to fight for unity of the working class, for a common struggle against a common enemy. It cannot be fought by striving deliberately to split the working class. Such a thesis of disunity and splitting is neither new nor original. It has been the stock-in-trade of diverse anti-Communist splinter groups for generations, serving always as a cloak for disruptive activities.

It is important to note that the promotion of disunity is defended as a necessary means of struggle against "a line which consists of 'peaceful coexistence', 'peaceful competition', 'peaceful transition', 'a state of the whole people' and 'a party of the whole people'." That is, it is directed, among other things, against those who seek the establishment of the broadest possible unity in the struggle for world peace.

The thesis of the Chinese Party editorial is a counsel of defeatism—a lack of confidence in the working class, in socialism, in Marxism-Leninism. There can be no other meaning of their statement concerning the C.P.S.U.: "They have thus made a mess of the splendid socialist camp." For the truth is the very opposite. The outstanding feature of today's world is not the existence of such a "mess" but rather the growing power of the socialist sector, the liberated and colonial peoples and the working class in the capitalist countries, who now exert the dominant influence in world relations.

It is the recognition of this cardinal fact that gives the world Communist movement its confident outlook for victory over imperialism and capitalism. The "mess" is in the camp of imperialism which would be the only real beneficiary of any policy of splitting the world working class.

Statement of the Iraqi Communist Party

The following statement of the Iraqi Communist Party, which functions in illegal conditions, has been distributed in Baghdad:

"You have seen how right the Iraqi Communist Party has been in warning against the danger of reactionary conspiracies and the damage they can cause the interests of the people. The Communist Party's warnings came as a result of its objective study of the nature of the traitors and conspirators as groups and as individuals, as a result of its analysis of their base aims. The Communist Party warned that the conspirators represent a movement which is opposed to the aims of the July 1958 revolution in which the entire people united to carry it out; that they commit the most foul and brutal crimes against the people and their democratic forces, irrespective of their trends and convictions; that they are the most bitter enemies of the just national aspirations of the fraternal Kurd people; that they are the agents of imperialism and as such will greatly prejudice our national interests, the sovereignty and independence of our country and its peace policy directed against imperialism, the oil monopolies and aggressive military blocs. Our Party warned you of all this. The facts and the results to date of the policy pursued by the February 8 reactionary gang in all spheres of life show how right the Party was.

"It is common knowledge that the Iraqi Communist Party did not confine itself to warnings. It heroically led the democratic movement of the broadest sections of the working people, the resistance movement against the February coup.

"The bloody reign of terror led to the complete isolation of the conspirators, aggravated the differences among their leaders, intensified the rivalry among the ruling groups, which erupted in an armed conflict in the Baathist fascist clique and revealed the crisis in the regime of the fascist putchists in the political, economic and ideological spheres. This crisis could not be liquidated or localized; it was impossible to avoid new upheavals and inevitable defeat, even with the support of bayonets and the Syrian Aflaks, and even given the moral and material aid of imperialist circles.

"Some of the military leaders from among those who had taken part in the fascist reactionary coup, decided to stage the putchist movement of November 18 as quickly as possible because they realized, for one thing, that they were losing ground as a result of the frenzied attempts by the Saadi and Aflak Baathist groups to do away with the opposition and all who do not support them and, for another, because they took fright at the mounting anger of the people and their heroic struggle. They managed to strike a blow at the leading force of the February coup, that is, at the Iraqi Aflaks and, in the first place, at their criminal gangs in the National Guard, precisely because they took advantage of the people's bitter anger at the actions of these gangs.

"However, the November 18 coup is nothing but an attempt to find a way out of the acute crisis of power, a possibility of closing the gulf between the February putchists and the people. This coup in no ways guarantees an end to the abnormal situation existing in Iraq, to the consequences of the criminal policy of the Baathist gang and those who are responsible for all its crimes against our Iraqi people, Arabs and Kurds alike.

"Dear Citizens,

"All sincere forces, the heroes of the armed struggle in Kurdistan, all who want security and peace for the people, must understand that the struggle of the people is not finished. The latest events show that these forces are exposed to great danger because of the unceasing attempts to throttle the revolutionary movement, to create a sense of false security and thereby blunt vigilance. This enables the reactionary forces, the supportes of the dictatorship and imperialism to pursue their ends.

"Victory in the battle can be achieved only by continuing the struggle and by taking as one's criterion the establishment of a democratic national government that will put an end to the unworthy war against the Kurd people and meet their legitimate demands for autonomy, will punish those who shed the blood of our people, violated the flower of our womanhood, who betrayed the national interest and undermined the economy, those who sowed terror, particularly the Aflak clique; the democratic national government will release political prisoners, will pursue a firm policy of agrarian reform, of preserving the national economy and developing it along lines ensuring prosperity and work for all, will introduce democratic liberties, maintain the policy of Arab solidarity based on the development of democracy, the struggle against imperialism and its pacts, on support of the Arab movement for freedom and progress; it will pursue a foreign policy of peace and friendship with ali peoples and peace-loving countries and, first and foremost, with the great Soviet Union which is the guarantee and bulwark of the consolidation of our Iraqi Republic.

"These are the aims for which our people fought, and for which they are now waging a heroic struggle against the forces of fascism and reaction; our people cannot agree to anything less.

"We once again stress that no regime will be successful if it will pursue the policy of the Baathists, the policy of the February coup which is hostile to communism and the democratic forces, a policy that continues the line of the war advocates and imperialists—the official policy of the aggressive blocs" (Salam Adil). Vague statements and attempts to play on the sentiments of the people and their desire for stability and peace will not reinforce it and less so a policy of bloody terror. Experience has shown and continues to show that such a policy cannot be pursued for long, cannot be successful.

"Heighten revolutionary vigilance, unite still more closely in a broad national front and thus bar the road to the intrigues of the forces of fascism, reaction and imperialism!

"Forward to a bright future, to building a democratic and prosperous Iraq!

Iraqi Communist Party"

January 1964.

Struggle of the CPSU for the Unity of the world Communist Movement

Speech by Comrade M. A. Suslov at the Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, February 14, 1964

Comrades, this Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee of the CPSU has examined basic questions of agricultural development, questions that are of the utmost importance to our country, to the Soviet people. This Plenary Meeting is working in an atmosphere of complete unanimity of the Central Committee, the entire Party, the whole Soviet people. Its decision will open up broad vistas for the Soviet economy and vast opportunities for a steady rise of socialist agriculture, for the flourishing of our country's production forces, for the creation of the material and technical basis of communism and for the fullest satisfaction of the material and spiritual requirements of Soviet people.

In showing constant concern for the development of the country's economy, our Party is fulfilling its internationalist duty to the working people of the whole world. The greater our economic successes, the better the life of the Soviet people, the higher the prestige of the world's first socialist state and the greater the attractive force of the ideas of socialism and communism. By their tireless labour the Soviet people are making their contribution towards strengthening the world socialist system and rendering increasing aid and support to the struggle of the peoples of all countries for social and national liberation, against imperialism and colonialism.

The revolutionary process, which has embraced all the continents of the world, continues to develop in breadth and depth. New successes have been scored in the development of the world socialist system. The working-class movement in the capitalist countries is gaining strength. The national-liberation struggle of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America is broadening out. The superiority of the forces of socialism and peace over the forces of imperialism and war is becoming ever clearer. Through the joint efforts of the world socialist system and all other peace-loving forces it has become possible to achieve a certain relaxation of international tension and take further important steps towards consolidating peace and foiling the attempts of the most aggressive imperialist circles to start a thermonuclear war. The course of world development fully bears out the correctness of the general line worked out for the international Communist movement at the 1957 and 1960 meetings of the fraternal parties, and the vitality of the conclusions and propositions of the Twentieth and Twenty-Second congresses of our Party and of the Leninist Programme of the CPSU.

The achievements of the socialist countries, of the entire world Communist movement, are obvious. But our successes could have been much more far-reaching had it not been for the serious difficulties that arose in the socialist camp and the Communist movement as a result of the splitting activities of the leaders of the Communist Party of China.

The Central Committee members have been repeatedly informed of the differences between the CPC leadership and the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties. However, the Presidium of the CC considered it necessary to raise this question once again at this Plenary Meeting because the Chinese leaders have gone even further in their factional activities and created a direct threat of a split in the world Communist movement.

If we analyse the evolution of the views and actions of the CPC leadership, beginning with the 1960 Moscow Meeting, we shall see that during all these years, instead of trying to eliminate the differences, the Chinese leaders have been making them more acute. Starting out with a revision of certain tactical propositions of the world Communist movement, they have, step by step, widened their rift with the CPSU and other fraternal parties on cardinal problems of modern times and, in the end, have opposed to the general policy of the world Communist movement their own special line, in which the fundamental theses of the Declaration and Statement are revised from the standpoint of great-power chauvinism and petty-bourgeois adventurism.

The new assessments and conclusions made collectively by the fraternal parties on the basis of a creative application of the principles of Marxism-Leninism to the conditions obtaining in our epoch—on the role of the world socialist system, on the ways of building socialism and communism, on the possibility of averting a world war, on the peaceful co-existence of states with different social systems, on the need for combating the personality cult ideology and practices, and on the forms of transition to socialism in the developed capitalist countries and in newly-free countries—are distorted and, to all intents and purposes, thrown overboard by the Chinese leadership.

Having to all intents and purposes rejected the Declaration and Statement collectively drawn up by the Communist and Workers' Parties, the CPC leaders offer the fraternal parties their own notorious "25-point programme", which, essentially, boils down to the renunciation of the ever growing influence of the socialist system on the course of world development, a disparaging attitude to the struggle of the working class of the capitalist countries, the setting of the national liberation movement off against the world system of socialism and the international working-class movement, adventurism in foreign policy and the preservation of the state of cold war, sectarianism and putschism in questions of revolution, the defence and preservation of the personality cult methods and practices, which have been condemned by the Communist movement, and justification of the factional struggle in the Communist movement.

The Chinese leaders have thus brought their disagreements with the Communist movement to such a stage where they have virtually developed into differences on all basic questions.

The participants in this Plenary Meeting know that the CC, CPSU, has on many occasions shown initiative in an effort to create the conditions for surmounting these differences, for normalising the relations of the CPC with the CPSU and other parties.

Like other Marxist-Leninist parties, we have repeatedly proposed to the CPC leadership that the public polemics be stopped. Such a proposal, in particular, was made in N. S. Khrushchov's speeches on October 25 and November 7, 1963. At the close of November 1963 the Central Committee of the CPSU sent the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China a letter in which a number of concrete proposals were made for eliminating differences and strengthening economic, scientific, technical and cultural cooperation between the USSR and the CPR. In that letter the CC, CPSU, once again proposed stopping the open polemics. You know, comrades, that during the past few months, acting in conformity with that proposal, the Soviet press has refrained from publishing any polemical material.

How did the Chinese leaders react to these steps? Blinded by nationalist arrogance, they paid no heed to the opinion and appeal of the fraternal parties. They rejected our initiative and took the road of open political struggle against the collectively worked out line of the Marxist-Leninist parties.

The Chinese press continuously publishes material containing the most flagrant attacks against the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties. In only the period after October 25, 1963, the Jenminjihpao, organ of the CC CPC, carried more then 200 articles of this nature. Slanderous articles are circulated throughout the world by Chinese organisations and broadcast over the radio in foreign languages; moreover, many anti-Soviet articles are broadcast several score times on end. Strange as it may seem, the indoctrination of the Chinese people in a spirit of hostility towards the USSR and the CPSU has now become almost the main aspect of the activity of the CC, CPC. A huge propaganda machine is now fully in gear preparing material slurring the CPSU and the Soviet Union.

The general trend of Chinese propaganda and the brazenness of its attacks against the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties are increasingly bringing it in line with the anti-Soviet, anti-communist organs of the reactionary imperialist circles.

As an example, let us take the article of a series of so-called "answers" to the Open Letter of the CC, CPSU, of July 14, 1963, published on February 4 by the newspaper Jenminjihpao and the magazine Hung- chi. From first to last, this article, beginning with its heading. The CPSU Leaders Are the Greatest Splitters of Our Times, consists of foul anti-Soviet thrusts and slander against the CC CPSU and its leadership. It has nothing in common with the most elementary norms governing relations between Communists and is an insult to our entire Party, the whole Soviet people. This article contains such wild allegations as that our Party "in collusion with US imperialism, world reaction, the Tito clique of renegades and Right-wing Social-Democrats is waging a struggle against fraternal socialist countries, against fraternal parties, against all Marxists-Leninists and revolutionary peoples of the world".

Not very long ago Chinese propaganda aimed its attacks mainly at the CPSU's foreign policy, but now it openly attacks our home policy as well. The CPC leaders are doing their level best to discredit the line adopted at the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU on all questions, proclaim the struggle against the Stalin cult a mistake and cast aspersion on the Programme of the CPSU.

Reviving the practices and methods used by Trotskyites, the Chinese leaders are trying to drive a wedge between the Soviet people, the Soviet Communists, on the one hand, and the Party leaders, the leadership of the country, on the other. Matters have reached a stage where the Chinese press and radio are calling upon Soviet people to oppose the CC, CPSU, and the Soviet Government.

What is this? A struggle for the "purity" of Marxism-Leninism? No. It signifies a complete renunciation of elementary norms of relations between Communist parties, a renunciation of Marxist-Leninist principles of relations between socialist countries, a transition to positions of undisguised anti-Sovietism.

The leaders of the CPC no longer limit themselves to action in the sphere of ideology. They have transferred ideological differences to inter-state relations, to the sphere of the practical political line of the socialist countries and the Communist parties. Seeking to weaken the unity and solidarity of the socialist commonwealth, the CPC leaders are resorting to all sorts of manoeuvres and dodges in order to undermine the economic and political relations between the socialist countries and disorganise their actions in the international arena. Recently the Chinese leaders have sharply intensified their splitting, undermining activities in the world Communist movement. There is now no longer any doubt that Peking is steering a course towards splitting the Communist parties, towards setting up factions and groups hostile to Marxism-Leninism.

Such, comrades, is the actual situation that has taken shape in the Communist movement as a result of the splitting activities of the CPC leadership.

In an effort to screen their departure from Marxism-Leninism, the Chinese leaders have recently become more active in their manoeuvres, masking their objectives and designs and harping importunately on their "revolutionism", "courage", "determination" and so forth. But the farther events develop, the more hysterical is the tone of Chinese propaganda and the more evident it is becoming that the real plans of the Chinese leadership have nothing to do with Marxism-Leninism, with the interests of world socialism. It is becoming increasingly clear that under the mask of ultra-revolutionary phrases and slogans, the CPC leadership are now savagely attacking the gains of world socialism, concentrating their main fire not against the imperialists but primarily against the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties.

True, the Chinese leaders continue to talk a lot about their striving for unity and solidarity in the socialist commonwealth. But their deeds completely diverge from these words.

They harp on unity, but all their actions have a different purpose, that of disorganising and splitting the socialist camp, undermining the ideological foundations and organisational and political principles that rally and unite the peoples of the socialist commonwealth. They want to impose upon the socialist countries a "Sinified socialism", an adventurist line in foreign and domestic policy, and the personality cult ideology and practices.

The Chinese leaders keep harping on their desire to "strengthen" the international Communist movement, to "purge" it of "modern revisionism" and unite it on a "new foundation". But the real aim of the CPC leadership it to split the united Communist front, oppose the Communist movement with a bloc of pro-Chinese factions and groups, and subordinate the Communist parties to their influence, using all sorts of political apostates—renegades from communism, anarchists, Trotskyites and so on.

The Chinese leaders prattle about their being the most reliable and tested friends of the national-liberation movement. But whoever believes this will be sadly disillusioned. The aim of the CPC leadership is to impose their adventurist concepts and methods upon the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America, to counterpose the peoples on racial grounds, and disrupt the alliance between the national liberation and the working-class movement, which can only disorganise and weaken the national liberation movement.

Lately the Chinese leaders have been claiming that they are the true champions of peace and consistent advocates of peaceful coexistence between states with different social and economic systems. But who will believe them? Their provocatory stand during the Caribbean crisis, their refusal to sign the Moscow partial test ban treaty, and their ceaseless efforts to slander the peaceful foreign policy of the Soviet Union have shown the whole world their reluctance to work for relaxation of world tension and their desire to preserve the cold war as a suitable background for an adventurist policy.

All the arguments that the leaders of the CC, CPC, so eagerly put forward about the interests of the world revolution and about the liberation struggle of the peoples are, in effect, designed to screen from world opinion, from Communists, the principal strategic line of subordinating at all costs the Communist and national-liberation movement to their great-power, egoistical interests. For the sake of this the principles of proletarian internationalism are being flagrantly trampled. To this end the Marxist-Leninist teaching is reshaped and distorted and use is made of the worst traditions of petty-bourgeois nationalism and the most unscrupulous demagogy and slander.

In view of the splitting stand taken by the CPC leadership and their increasing attempts to disorganise the international Communist and working-class movement there is a pressing need for a deeper analysis of what led the Chinese theoreticians astray and what the splitting activity of the CPC leadership may result in.

I

Two Approaches to the Problem of the Role of the World Socialist System

The radical changes that took place in the world after the Second World War are linked up chiefly with the rise and development of a world system of socialism. The countries of the socialist commonwealth are the main bulwark of all the revolutionary forces of modern times, a reliable champion of world peace. The struggle between world socialism and world imperialism is the principal content of our epoch, the pivot of the class struggle on a world scale.

There was a time when the Chinese leaders subscribed to this major proposition of Marxism-Leninism. Lately, however, the CPC leadership have been setting the national liberation movement off against the socialist system and the working-class movement in the capitalist countries, proclaiming it as the main force in the struggle against imperialism and undermining the unity of the revolutionary forces of our time. In its letter of June 14, 1963, the CC, CPC, makes the claim that the "vast regions of Asia, Africa and Latin America" are the centre of the contradictions of the modern world, the "storm—centre of the world revolution".

This clearly revises the Marxist teaching on the historical role of the working class and belittles the working-class movement in the developed capitalist countries. As regards the world socialist system, the Chinese theoreticians apportion to it only the role of a "strong point" to support and develop the revolution of the oppressed nations and peoples of the whole world. It goes without saying that this stand can only harm both the socialist system and the national liberation movement, the great cause of the struggle of the international proletariat.

According to the views of the Chinese theoreticians, the world socialist system not only fails to exert an increasingly decisive influence on the entire course of world development but does not even play an independent role in the revolutionary struggle of the masses against imperialism.

This interpretation of the role and significance of the world socialist system does not conform with the actual balance of forces in the world and runs counter to the conclusions drawn by the fraternal parties in their Statement of 1960.

The idea that modern world development is based on the contradiction between socialism and capitalism belongs to Lenin. He wrote: "...the relations between peoples, the entire world system of states are determined by the struggle of a small group of imperialist nations against the Soviet movement and the Soviet states headed by Soviet Russia. If we lose sight of that we shall be unable correctly to formulate a single national or colonial question, even if it concerned the most remote corner of the world. Only by proceeding from this standpoint can the communist parties correctly formulate and resolve political problems both in the civilised and in the backward countries" (Collected Works, Vol. 31, p. 216, Russ. ed.).

This was written during the early years of Soviet power. In our day, when instead of only one socialist country there is a mighty socialist camp, its influence on "the relations between peoples", on "the entire world system of states" and, in the final analysis, on the world revolutionary process has grown tremendously.

Attaching the utmost significance to the national liberation movement, Marxists-Leninists at the same time hold that the main content, the main trend and the main features of the historical development of human society in the modern epoch are determined by the world socialist system, by the forces struggling against imperialism, for the socialist reorganisation of society. The most organised class forces, primarily the bulk of the working class, the most advanced class of modern society which, as our teachers—Marx, Engels and Lenin—pointed out, is the grave-digger of capitalism, are concentrated precisely in this bridgehead.

The prime role in the world revolutionary process is played by the socialist countries. This is seen firstly in the fact that the working class, the working people of these countries, are successfully resolving social problems and building a new society where oppression and exploitation are unknown and for which the peoples are taking the road of revolution. By creating the material and technical basis of socialism and communism, the socialist countries are inflicting one blow after another on imperialism in the decisive sphere of human activity, in the sphere of material production. When the workers and peasants in the capitalist countries see the achievements of the socialist states in economic development, in raising the standard of living, in promoting democracy and in drawing the masses into state administration they become convinced in practice that the basic requirements of working people can be satisfied only on the road of socialism. All this infuses the masses with a revolutionary spirit and helps to draw them into an active struggle against the capitalist system, for social and national liberation.

Secondly, the farther we progress the greater becomes the role of the socialist states as a force directly opposing the aggressive counter-revolutionary designs of imperialism. Under conditions where the might of the Soviet Union and the entire socialist commonwealth holds the main forces of international reaction and aggression in check, the working masses and peoples of the colonial countries have the most favourable opportunity for waging a struggle against imperialism and internal reaction. Anyone who followed the development of international events in the post-war years could not fail to see that there is an extremely close link between the successes of the revolutionary struggle in the capitalist countries, the victories of the national liberation movement and the growth of the might of the world socialist system.

Victory over capitalism on a world scale can be achieved solely through the joint efforts of the world socialist system, the working class movement and the national liberation struggle of the peoples. Each of these forces makes its own contribution to the anti-imperialist struggle. However, one cannot fail to see that the struggle of the world socialist system against imperialism is the focal point of world policy, of the whole of social development.

The Marxists-Leninists can have no doubt as to the primary, increasingly decisive role which the world socialist system plays, and has to play, in bringing about the triumph of the new social system all over the globe. The historical mission of the socialist countries is determined by the objective laws of social development, by the irrefutable fact that the countries in which socialism has triumphed are today in the van not only of the socialist forces, but of the progressive forces of the world. They are not only a beacon lighting up mankind's road to social progress but a powerful material force embodying Marxist-Leninist ideas, a force which is fighting capitalism and is bound to defeat it in the decisive sphere of human activity, the sphere of material production.

All the facts indicate that the socialist countries can within a historically short time surpass the capitalist countries economically as well. Let us recall that total industrial output in the socialist countries in 1962 was roughly eight times as great as it had been on their territory in 1937, whereas the capitalist countries registered only a 2.6-fold increase. The world socialist system has now attained a new stage in the economic competition with capitalism. In 1950 the socialist countries' share in world industrial production was about one-fifth; today it exceeds one-third.

It is the internationalist duty of the Communists of the socialist countries to continue effectively building the new society, promoting their economy and strengthening their defences, consolidating the socialist community, and to strive to ensure that socialist ideas exercise an increasing appeal to the working people as they are translated into reality. Nowadays the merits of socialism are judged not only by theoretical writings, but, above all, by what is done in practice, by the way in which Communists actually solve the problems of building the new society. If we accomplish this task properly, we shall greatly promote the struggle for socialism in other countries, and if we don't, it will be a blow to that struggle.

What is the attitude of the CPC leadership towards Lenin's conclusion that socialist countries influence the development of the world revolution mainly by their economic achievements? Do the CPC leaders stand for peaceful economic competition?

The CPC leadership, misrepresenting the issue, argues that economic competition means that "the oppressed peoples and nations have no need at all to fight and to rise in revolt" and that "they have merely to wait quietly until the Soviet Union outstrips the most developed capitalist country in level of production and standard of living . . .".

It would never occur to a Marxist-Leninist, however, to affirm that peaceful economic competition "can take the place of the struggle of the peoples of different coutries for their emancipation", or that the achievements of socialism in economic competition will lead to the "automatic" collapse of capitalism and release the peoples from the necessity of waging class and national liberation struggles. Peking is putting about these false ideas with the express aim of discrediting the idea of economic competition between the two systems. The fact is that the Marxists-Leninists see the revolutionising effect of the victories of socialism in economic competition precisely in the fact that these victories stimulate the class struggle of the working people and make them politically conscious fighters for socialism. Peaceful economic competition, far from dooming the people to waiting passively, arouse their revolutionary activity. This is fully realised by the imperialists, who dread progress in the socialist countries and try to hold up that progress.

You will observe, comrades, that the issue of peaceful economic competition is far from being merely an economic issue. It also has profound political significance, for to defeat capitalism economically means making it much easier for all revolutionary forces to fight against imperialism. And this is a political issue.

Our Party regards it as its chief task to build up the economic and defence potential of the Soviet Union and the world socialist commonwealth as a whole, and to increase its influence on the entire revolutionary process. We shall continue steadily and consistently to press forward our policy of carrying out the Programme of the CPSU for the construction of communism, the most just of social systems, in our country. Communist construction is a tremendous contribution to the fulfilment of the Soviet people's internationalist duty. This road was charted by the great Lenin. Nothing and no one can ever divert us from this Leninist road.

To win the economic competition with capitalism, the socialist countries must make proper use of the advantages of socialism, both in each country and throughout the world socialist system. In practice, this implies a considerable expansion of political as well as mutually beneficial economic relations between socialist countries, and the promotion of cultural, scientific and technical co-operation among them. It is in this direction that the activities of the CPSU and other fraternal parties have been developing.

By contrast, the Chinese leaders have in recent years shown that they have no interest in strengthening the unity of the world socialist system. The CPR has not only stopped co-ordinating its actions with other socialist countries, but is openly combating the agreed line of the socialist countries in the world arena. The Chinese leadership has openly set out to shake the foundations of the socialist community and to abolish economic relations with socialist countries, particularly with the countries affiliated with the Council for Mutual Economic Aid and above all the Soviet Union. In 1962 the CPR's trade with the Council countries decreased by 65 per cent compared with 1959, and in 1963 it dropped by almost another 20 per cent.

The Chinese leaders' propaganda shows that they are frankly bent on discrediting economic relations between the socialist countries belonging to CMEA; this evidently meets their disruptive aims. Trying to sow discord among the socialist countries, the Chinese leaders do not stop at using lies and slander dished up by imperialist propaganda. No sooner does the bourgeois press carry a falsehood about the Soviet Union or some other socialist country than Chinese propaganda seizes on the calumny.

The Communist parties of the socialist countries, in doing away with the consequences of the personality cult, have cleared the ground for closer relations between fraternal countries on the basis of the Leninist principles of proletarian internationalism. It is well known that a necessary condition for the development of the socialist system as a whole is to promote the independence and sovereignty of each socialist country. Failing this there can be no truly voluntary and solid union of nations. Fraternal parties reacted to the line adopted by the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU as the only correct, Leninist direction in which to develop relations between the socialist countries.

The Chinese leaders do not like that line, however. All indications are that they would like to be able to give orders in the socialist commonwealth as in their own estate, to impose their will on other countries, and to dictate the terms on which they would either admit whole parties and peoples into the socialist system or "excommunicate" them from it at will.

Take, for example, the CPC leaders' attitude towards Yugoslavia. As late as 1955—56 the Chinese leadership spoke highly of the progress of socialist construction in the FPRY. In the autumn of 1957, Jenminjihpao wrote, in an article devoted to Chinese—Yugoslav friendship: "The peoples of our countries are advancing along the socialist road." The same newspaper stated: "... Yugoslavia has made great progress in socialist construction." This was how people in China spoke of the nature of the socio-political system in Yugoslavia a mere five or six years ago. Today they say and write something entirely different about Yugoslavia. Jenminjihpao now alleges that in Yugoslavia "there exists a dictatorship of the bourgeoisie; indeed, it not only exists but is the most barbarous fascist dictatorship," and that Yugoslavia is a "counter-revolutionary special force of US imperialism ..."

The question arises: what has happened in Yugoslavia? What facts, what actual developments in the socio-economic and political life of that country, have entitled Chinese theoreticians to reverse their estimations so abruptly? There are no such facts or developments, and there haven't been any. Anyone who proceeds not from a subjective standpoint, but from objective laws, from the Marxist-Leninist doctrine, must admit that Yugoslavia is a socialist country and that, moreover, the positions of socialism are growing stronger in Yugoslavia. Indeed, while in 1958 the socialist sector comprised 100 per cent in industry, 6 per cent in agriculture and 97 per cent in trade, today, a few years after the Chinese press praised Yugoslavia's achievements in socialist construction, the socialist sector is still 100 per cent in the country's industry, as much as 15 per cent (instead of 6 per cent) in agriculture and 100 per cent (instead of 97 per cent) in trade. All these fact go to show that the Yugoslav economy is developing as a socialist economy.

Anyone who does not take white for black but looks at things objectively, is bound to see that Yugoslavia supports the socialist countries' fight for world peace and peaceful coexistence, general and complete disarmament, the prohibition of nuclear weapons, the restoration of the legitimate rights of the CPR in the UN, and so on.

Why, then, do the Chinese leaders shut their eyes to all these facts? Why do they now insult the heroic Yugoslav people by calling Yugoslavia a fascist country? We have put this question to the Chinese leaders on more than one occasion but have never heard from them anything like a coherent answer.

The Chinese leaders quote the 1960 Statement of fraternal parties, which said that the revolutionary gains in Yugoslavia were imperilled by the errors of the LCY. Let us note, however, that from what the Statement says, it did not deny even then but, on the contrary, confirmed the existence of definite revolutionary, socialist achievements in Yugoslavia and that, secondly, later years showed the positions of socialism to have become much stronger in Yugoslavia, a development which we certainly welcome.

While striving to improve relations with Yugoslavia, and being firmly convinced that this meets the interests of the socialist cause, we Soviet Communists do not at all conceal the ideological differences which exist between the Communist movement and the League of Communists of Yugoslavia. We have said as much to the Yugoslav comrades. But we maintain that the existence of differences is by no means a reason for "excommunicating" Yugoslavia from socialism. One cannot arbitrarily, acting on a subjective impulse and, furthermore, doctoring and distorting the facts, permit or forbid this or that people to build socialism. And yet this is precisely what the Chinese leaders are trying to do.

Or take the so-called Albanian question, of which the CC membership and our Party as a whole have been repeatedly informed. It is well known that from 1960 on, the leaders of the Albanian Party of Labour abruptly changed their political line, although we did not give them any cause to do so, and embarked on hostile actions against the CPSU and other fraternal parties. The government of the People's Republic of Albania has virtually broken off political, economic and military co-operation with the Soviet Union and most of the other socialist countries.

It was hard to see at first what had prompted Hoxha's and Shehu's anti-Soviet moves. But as time went on it became more and more obvious that the Albanian leaders were taking their cue from someone else, for they repeated word for word what was said or written in Peking.

The Sino-Albanian alliance is no accidental development. It arose on the basis of opposition to the Leninist line of the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU, on the basis of a hostile attitude towards the elimination of the consequences of the Stalin personality cult. Just as in the case of China, the Albanian leaders' defence of the personality cult is due to the fact that over many years they have themselves been implanting the personality cult and using pernicious methods of leadership in Party and country.

At the Third Congress of the APL, in 1956, the Albanian leaders, finding themselves under pressure from the Party membership, who after the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU had demanded that the suffocating atmosphere of the personality cult be removed and the Leninist standards of Party life re-established in the APL, had to admit publicly that the personality cult in the APL had become "sharply pronounced". But this "admission" and the promise to end the personality cult were no more than a stratagem. As a matter of fact, the Albanian leaders had no intention at all of renouncing their harmful practices. Just when Hoxha was doing "self-criticism" from the rostrum of the Third Congress, the Albanian police was busy putting in jail or sending into exile members of the Tirana Party organisation who at the city Party conference had criticised the Albanian leaders for violating the Leninist standards of Party life, for arbitrary practices and for the persecution of honest Communists.

Hoxha and Shehu combated the line of the Twentieth Congress because they were afraid of losing their posts, because the establishment of the Leninist standards of Party life in the APL would have ended their arbitrary rule. The Albanian leaders, in taking an anti-Soviet road, put their people in a trying position. They created in Albania difficulties that would have been out of the question given normal cooperation with the Soviet Union and other socialist countries.

Soviet people are confident that in spite of the present difficulties in Soviet-Albanian relations, caused by the policy of the Albanian top leaders, the peoples of our two countries will advance together to the common goal, the triumph of socialism and communism. As far as the CPSU is concerned, we are willing, as in the past, to take all necessary steps in this direction.

The CPSU regards it as one of its major tasks to work for the close unity of the world socialist system, for close fraternal relations with all the socialist countries on the basis of complete equality and voluntary cooperation, for the increased solidarity of the socialist countries with the aim of waging a joint struggle against the imperialist aggressors, for world peace, for the complete triumph of communism.

II

Questions of War, Peace and Revolution

Comrades, the fortunes of our great cause, and of the peoples, depend in decisive measure on the Communist movement employing the correct strategy and tactics on questions of war, peace and revolution. It is particularly important to take account of the interconnection and interdependence of these questions today, for never before have the revolutionary achievements of each particular country been so directly bound up with the development of the international situation as a whole, with the world revolutionary process.

The Marxist-Leninist parties see their consistent struggle for peace as fulfilment of their historical responsibility to mankind, which is to prevent the extermination of peoples in the flames of a thermonuclear war. Furthermore, they see it as a most important condition for the successful construction of socialism and communism and for the expansion of the revolutionary struggle of the proletariat of the capitalist countries and of the liberation movement of the peoples oppressed by imperialism.

An all-round analysis of the balance of world forces enabled the Communist and Workers' parties to draw the cardinal conclusion that world war can be averted even before socialism triumphs throughout the world, and to re-emphasise that the Leninist principle of the peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems is the unshakable basis for the foreign policy of the socialist countries.

As we know, these propositions were laid down in the 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement adopted in Moscow. The experience of recent years, far from shaking belief in the vital necessity of the policy of peaceful coexistence, has, in fact, fully borne it out. It is due to the socialist countries' consistent implementation of this policy, which is supported by hundreds of millions of people all over the world, that we have been able to foil the imperialist reactionaries' schemes against peace. The blessings of peace which mankind enjoys today do not come from the gods. They are a concrete result of the staunch resistance of the peace forces to attempts to unleash a thermonuclear war, a result of the growing power of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, as well as of the correct policy of the Communist parties, which have raised aloft the banner of the struggle for peace and rallied the whole of progressive mankind to this banner.

The Chinese leaders, who engaged first in a controversy with the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties, and then in a political fight against them, showed especial zeal in attacking the conclusions of the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU and the theses of the Moscow meeting of fraternal parties on questions of war, peace and revolution. They imagined that it was on these points that they would be able to make political capital, and with this aim in view they accused the entire Communist movement of "losing sight of the revolutionary perspective" and "surrendering to imperialism".

To impart at least a semblance of veracity to their infamous charges, the Chinese theoreticians resort to a device that is neither clever nor new. Artifically separating two aspects of a single social process from each other, they contrast the fight for peace to the revolutionary movement, and claim that these two highly important tasks are mutually exclusive. From what they allege it follows that those who fight to maintain peace and ward off world war are against revolution and hamper the revolutionary struggle.

One does not require a special Marxist education to see that the CPC leaders, who pose as grandmasters of dialectics, have in fact killed dialectics, which Lenin described as the "living soul" of Marxism. The Communist parties, which hold aloft the banner of the struggle for peace, are with increasing energy stepping up the class struggle of the proletariat and all working people, and the national liberation movement against imperialism.

In their fight against the Leninist policy of peaceful coexistence, which they counter with the idea of giving revolution a "push" by means of war, the CPC leaders have gone as far as to assert that war is an acceptable and, in fact, the only means of settling the contradictions between capitalism and socialism. They ignore the experience of the world Communist movement and exalt the road of the victorious revolution in China as something absolute, trying to make it an incontrovertible truth for all countries and peoples. On every occasion, whether suitable or not, Chinese propaganda quotes what Mao Tse-tung said about war and peace in the thirties, during the civil war in China.

Among the widely popularised statements of Mao Tse-tung are the following: "the war to be waged by the overwhelming majority of mankind . . . will become a bridge over which mankind will pass into a new era in history", "the world can only be reorganised by means of the rifle"; "we stand for abolishing war, we have no use for it, but war can only be abolished through war. If you want rifles to go out of existence, take to the rifle."

Almost three decades have passed since those statements were made. Radical changes have occurred in the world—the world socialist system has formed and has become a mighty force, the revolutionary movement of the working class has assumed a mass scale, and the national-liberation movement has scored historic victories. Today the alliance of the peace forces can, as the documents of Communist parties point out, overcome the forces of imperialism and prevent them from launching a new world war. The prevention of war has become a particularly pressing task because the most destructive weapon recorded in history has been created and has been stockpiled in quantities that can bring untold calamities to all nations.

The Chinese leaders refuse to take all that into consideration. Plainly showing off their irresponsible attitude, they affirm that the nuclear bomb is a "paper tiger" and in no way affects the issue of war and peace. In keeping with this logic, which runs counter to elementary common sense, Mao Tse-tung, speaking at the Moscow meeting in 1957, argued that the struggle for socialism even stood to gain from a world thermonuclear war. "Can one foresee," he said, "the number of human lives that the future war may take? It may be one-third of the 2,700 million inhabitants of the world, that is, a mere 900 million people . . . I had an argument over this matter with Nehru. He is more pessimistic in this respect than I. I told him that should half of mankind be destroyed, the other half would survive; in return, imperialism would be wiped out completely and there would be only socialism in the world. In half a century or a whole century the population would grow again—even by more than half."

This concept is even more lucidly expressed in the collection of articles Long Live Leninism!, which the CC, CPC, has approved and is circulating. "On the ruins of fallen imperialism," it says, "the victorious people will build a thousand times more wonderful future at an extremely rapid rate." That is the kind of ultra-revolutionary verbiage, complete political irresponsibility that is particularly dangerous because it is being demonstrated by people standing at the helm of a large socialist country.

It is common knowledge that Lenin pointed out as far back as 1918 that a world war in which the mighty achievements of technology are used with such great energy for the mass extermination of human life, apart from being a major crime, can also lead "to the undermining of the very foundations of human society" (Works, vol. 27, p. 386). In our days, with the production and the development of nuclear missile weapons, this danger has increased still more. How can people, particularly the adherents of the communist teaching, ignore this fact?

Neither the socialist countries nor the working people want a world war; it cannot serve the cause of the triumph of socialism. The conclusions drawn by specialists on the possible consequences of another world war are quite unambiguous. For example, the progressive American scientist Linus Pauling gives figures to show that within 60 days after the outbreak of a nuclear war out of 190 million Americans 170 million would perish, 15 million would suffer greatly and only five million would remain relatively unharmed. The situation in other regions drawn directly into the sphere of military operations would evidently be the same. Moreover, account must also be taken of such delayed consequences of a nuclear war as the disorganisation of society due to the destruction of key industrial centres and of the means of transport and communication, and increasing radioactive pollution. Without mincing words, one can say that if a world thermonuclear conflict breaks out it would be the greatest tragedy for humanity and would, of course, deal the cause of communism a heavy blow.

No party that really cherishes the interests of the people can fail to appreciate its responsibility in the struggle for averting another world war. Yet the Chinese leaders, as we have seen, even boast that, allegedly for "the sake of the revolution", they are prepared to agree to the destruction of half of mankind. It does not worry them in the least that the losses in densely-populated countries that would find themselves in the centre of military operations would be so great that for entire peoples there would no longer be any question of the triumph of socialism because they would have disappeared from the face of the earth.

Here it would be appropriate to recall certain facts. When in a conversation with Tao Chu, member of the CC, CPC, a Czechoslovak journalist mentioned that in the event of a thermonuclear war the whole of Czechoslovakia, where 14 million people live, might be destroyed, the answer he received was: "In the event of a war of annihilation the small countries in the socialist camp will have to subordinate their interests to the common interests of the camp as a whole." Another well-known CPR official told Soviet representatives that Comrade Togliatti, General Secretary of the Italian Communist Party, was wrong when, expressing anxiety for the fate of his people, he said that if a thermonuclear war broke out the whole of Italy would be destroyed. "Other people will remain," declared this official, "and imperialism will be wiped out . . .".

In an effort to disprove the conclusion of the international communist movement concerning the possibility of averting war, in Peking it is alleged that in pursuing a policy of peaceful coexistence the CPSU and other fraternal parties proceed from the assumption that the nature of imperialism has changed, base all their calculations on the "peace-loving and humane nature of the imperialists", and "appeal and beg for" peace from them. On the other hand, the CPC leaders, it is claimed, are waging a determined and relentless struggle against imperialism and exposing its aggressive nature.

But these crude falsifications and distortions can fool no one. The attempts to portray Marxists-Leninists as some kind of pacifists are simply ludicrous. In the 1957 Declaration it is recorded that as long as imperialism exists there will always be the soil for aggressive wars. From this, however, the Communist parties did not draw the conclusion that world war is fatally inevitable. They showed that while the nature of imperialism, its rapacious essence, remains unchanged, there has been a change in the balance of forces in the world, that the place and role of imperialism in the world economy and world politics are not what they were, and that its influence on the course of events is diminishing. All this forces the imperialists to accept peaceful co-existence.

Consequently, it is not that the imperialists have become "peace-loving" or more "tractable," but that they have no alternative but to take the growing strength of socialism into account. They are aware that the Soviet Union, the socialist countries, possess a formidable weapon and are able to deal any aggressor a crushing blow. They cannot help but take into account the strength of the mighty working-class and democratic movement in the capitalist countries, and the huge scale of the national liberation struggle of the peoples. The fact that capitalism will be wiped out and buried if the imperialist madmen unleash a world war is being more and more clearly apprehended in the camp of our class enemies.

The possibility of averting war, the threat of which remains as long as imperialism exists, does not arise of itself. It requires that the peace-loving forces display the greatest energy in the struggle for peace and show the greatest vigilance with regard to the intrigues of its enemies. It depends to a vast extent on the policy of the socialist countries, on their defensive might, on the unswerving implementation of the Leninist principles of peaceful coexistence. That is exactly the policy being pursued by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries that firmly adhere to the positions proclaimed in the Declaration and Statement of the fraternal parties.

However, it is precisely against this, the only sensible policy, that the Chinese leaders have declared war. Having their own special objectives in mind, they are trying to discredit the principles of peaceful coexistence, assuring the peoples that their efforts to preserve peace are futile. Strange as it may seem, the Chinese leaders have proclaimed this point of view optimistic.

In Long Live Leninism! it is asserted: "Wars of one kind or another may break out as long as an end is not put to the imperialist system and the exploiter classes." "Naturally, whether or not the imperialists in the end start a war does not depend upon us for we are not the chiefs of their general staffs." At the Peking session of the World Federation of Trade Unions in June 1960, Liu Ning-yi, member of the CC CPC, said: "The assertions about the possibility of peaceful coexistence only make the imperialists happy." At the World Peace Council session in Stockholm in December 1961, the same Liu Ning-yi made himself more plain: "Those who think agreement can be reached with the imperialists and peaceful coexistence ensured only delude themselves." It is not difficult to notice that one and the same importunate and gloomy refrain that "war cannot be averted" is repeated in all these statements.

The opposition of the Chinese leaders to the policy of peaceful coexistence is closely tied up with their stand on the question of disarmament, on international negotiations between the socialist countries and the Western powers. They regard disarmament as an "illusion, an unrealisable slogan" that can only mislead the peoples. For example, speaking at the Peking session of the General Council of the World Federation of Trade Unions in 1960 Liu Chang-sheng, member of the CC, CPC, declared: "Some people think that the disarmament proposal can be carried into effect while imperialism exists. That is an illusion that has nothing to do with reality . . . A world without wars and without arms is possible only in an epoch when socialism triumphs throughout the world."

It is not hard to see in these statements the desire of the Chinese leaders to distort the clear stand of the CPSU and of all the Marxist-Leninist parties and at the same time to undermine the policy of disarmament which is an important condition in the struggle for the prevention of a new world war and for a relaxation of international tensions.

It is absurd to assert that our Party entertains any illusions concerning the military policy of the imperialist powers and their readiness to agree to general and complete disarmament. As long as imperialism exists, the reactionary forces will clutch at armaments as a last resort to retain their domination, and will use these armaments in wars, if they manage to unleash them. All this is quite obvious.

Does this, however, mean that the Communists should drop the struggle for disarmament and admit the inevitability of the arms race and of a new world war? No, such a passive stand would be contradictory to the entire revolutionary spirit of our teaching and to the vital interests of the peoples.

We are convinced that the revolutionary struggle of the working people, the general democratic upsurge, the growing might of socialism and the resolute actions of all the peaceloving forces can and should force the imperialists to comply, contrary to their desire, with the peoples' demands for disarmament. We are not fatalists, we believe in the tremendous capacities of the popular masses. Already 70 years ago Frederick Engels called upon the Communists to fight for disarmament, and this at a time when capitalism held undivided sway in the world.

"It is 25 years already that all Europe has been arming on an unprecedented scale. Each great power endeavours to outstrip the other in military might and preparedness for war. Germany, France and Russia do their utmost to surpass one another," wrote Engels in a series of articles entitled "Can Europe Disarm?" "Is it not foolish to talk of disarmament under such circumstances?" he asked, and replied: "I maintain: disarmament, and hence a guarantee for peace, is possible" (Works, Ed. 2, Vol. 22, p. 387. Russ. Ed.).

That is how Engels put the question! Already in those days he saw the vast social forces rising against war. How, then, can one speak of disarmament as of an "unrealisable illusion" today when all progressive mankind is coming out for disarmament and when the forces of peace have the mighty support of the socialist countries?

The slogan "A World Without Arms, A World Without Wars" — is for the Communist parties a mighty means of uniting and mobilising the popular masses for an active struggle against the inveterate militarist imperialist circles. This slogan is clear to every man, regardless of his political convictions. Disarmament means ending the arms race and, consequently, reducing the tax burden. It conforms to the vital interests of the broadest sections of the population. Not only the Communists, but also many other social forces actively support and propagate this slogan. Then why should we, Communists, discard it? Is it not clear that rejecting this slogan could only weaken the influence of the Communists among the masses, and that this would play into the hands of the reactionary forces.

Are the Chinese leaders so naive as not to realise where their strange logic leads them and how grave a responsibility they are assuming before the peoples of the world by advancing such reckless theses fraught with the direst consequences?

The Chinese leaders not only take a negative stand on such vitally important questions of international policy as disarmament, termination of nuclear weapon tests and relaxation of international tension, but also try to paralyse the efforts of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries fighting against the threat of world war.

The facts show that time and again the CPR Government has acted in the world arena as a force opposing the peaceful foreign policy of the socialist countries and disorganising the common anti-war front, that time and again when the world was faced with an acute situation in which unity of action among the socialist countries and all peace-loving forces was particularly imperative, the Chinese leaders became active. But against whom? Against the Soviet Union and other socialist countries seeking a relaxation of tension. Moreover, it has been noted that Peking could not conceal its chagrin and annoyance every time the situation was normalised and a military conflict avoided. That was the case, for example, during the Caribbean crisis. The CPC leadership did nothing to help avert a world war and effectively support revolutionary Cuba. They did nothing to support the defensive measures of the Warsaw Treaty powers, adopted to meet possible imperialist aggression, and said nothing about China siding with the socialist countries in the event of a US attack against Cuba. It was quite evident that at a time when the Soviet Union was prepared to defend the Cuban revolution with all the means at its disposal, the Chinese leaders strove to benefit from the crisis in the Caribbean region.

It is a fact that when the Caribbean crisis was at its height the CPR Government extended the armed conflict on the Sino-Indian frontier. No matter how hard the Chinese leaders try belatedly to justify their behaviour at the time they cannot escape the responsibility for the fact that by their actions they essentially helped the extreme reactionary circles of imperialism, thereby aggravating an already complicated and dangerous situation in the world.

The Sino-Indian conflict arose over the possession of frontier territories in the Himalayas which had not been disputed either by China or India in the course of many centuries. However, inasmuch as this problem did arise, everything should have been done to settle it peacefully, by negotiation. The Government of the USSR has repeatedly advocated such a settlement of this frontier dispute. Hostilities broke out in the region of the Himalayas. The disastrous consequences of this conflict are now fully evident. It has rendered a great service to imperialism and caused great harm to the national-liberation movement, the progressive forces of India and the entire front of the anti-imperialist struggle. Utilising the Sino-Indian conflict for their own purposes, the imperialists and their supporters are seeking to undermine the trust of the peoples of the young national states in the socialist countries, to draw India into military blocs and strengthen the positions of the ultra-reactionary forces in that country.

While allowing relations with India, which as everybody knows is not a member of military blocs, to deteriorate sharply, the Chinese leadership at the same time actually leagued together with Pakistan, a member of Seato and Cento, which threaten the peace and security of the Asian peoples. It is a fact that having discarded their "revolutionary phrase-mongering", the Chinese leaders have in effect adopted a line that can hardly be dovetailed with the principled position of the countries of the socialist commonwealth with regard to imperialist blocs.

The approach of the Chinese leaders to the choice of friends and allies is strange, to say the least. How is it possible, it may be asked, to fling mud at the socialist countries, at the Communist parties and, at the same time, with the whole world watching, shower compliments on the reactionary regime in Pakistan? That is simply incomprehensible.

Can anyone believe that the rapprochement with Pakistan has been dictated by the interests of the development of the revolutionary struggle of the peoples of Asia against imperialism that the Chinese leaders talk so much about?

The dangerous, adventurist views and propositions on questions of war and peace that the CPC leaders seek to impose upon the fraternal parties have quite understandably been categorically rejected by the international Communist movement and broad circles of progressive world opinion.

Not only Marxists-Leninists but also all friends of socialism and peace noted with alarm that the "bellicose" outpourings from Peking practically border on direct justification and even lauding of war as a means of settling social conflicts.

Hysterically attacking the Moscow partial test ban treaty of July 31, 1963 and thereby finding themselves aligned with the most aggressive circles of imperialism, the Chinese leaders still further exposed themselves as opponents of the policy of peace and peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems. The enemies rejoiced over their actions and friends could not but condemn them.

The Chinese leaders realized that they had gone too far and in order to extricate themselves from this situation they made a complete volte-face in their propaganda. Lately a stream of "peace-loving" statements has suddenly gushed from Peking, while representatives of the Chinese government are hastening to sign documents concerning the struggle for peace and fidelity to the policy of peaceful coexistence. Such was the tenor of many of the statements made by Chou En-lai during his tour in Africa and Asia.

"World war cannot be averted," they were saying plainly in Peking only yesterday. Today they are trying to persuade people to believe that the thesis that war can be averted was put forward by none other than the leaders of the CPC. Yesterday they abused peaceful coexistence, today they are posing as practically its only and most zealous supporters. Yesterday they declared that disarmament was a deception of the peoples, today they sign statements in which they undertake to work for disarmament.

This volte-face could only be welcomed if there were signs that the CPC leadership really realizes its mistakes and is taking a correct stand. Unfortunately everything points to the fact that the aims and objectives of the Chinese leaders have not changed. Their "love of peace" is nothing but a screen masking their real intentions, which have received a rebuff and been censured by world public opinion. One cannot fail to see that the "love of peace" now emanating from Peking is in glaring contrast to the actual deeds, to the concrete policy of the Government of the CPR.

The obviously adventurist position of the CPC leaders makes itself felt in their attitude to the question of nuclear weapons.

It is well known that the CPC leaders insistently sought to obtain the atomic bomb from the Soviet Union. They expressed their deep mortification when our country did not give them samples of nuclear weapons.

The CC, CPSU and the Soviet Government have already explained why we consider it inexpedient to help China produce nuclear weapons. The inevitable reaction to this would be the nuclear arming of powers of the imperialist camp, in particular, West Germany and Japan. Having a higher level of economic, scientific and technological development they could undoubtedly produce more bombs than China and build up a nuclear potential much faster. It should be borne in mind that revanchist aspirations are particularly strong in these countries. These are the countries which in the past were the main hotbeds of military threats and militarism.

The Soviet Union's atomic weapon is a reliable guarantee of the defence not only of our country but also of the entire socialist camp, including China. The leaders of the CPC are well aware of this fact. Nonetheless, they want to acquire the nuclear weapon at all costs. Very indicative in this respect is the interview given to Japanese journalists in October 1963 by Chen Yi, member of the Politbureau of the CC, CPC, and Deputy Premier of the CPR. Saying that China would create her own nuclear weapon whatever the price, he declared, as was reported in the Japanese press, that possibly it would take China several years and perhaps even longer than that to begin the mass production of the bomb. But China, he said, would produce the most modern weapon even if it would cost them their last shirt. And several days later a statement by a Chinese government spokesman, published in Jenminjihpao, stated that China would adhere to this line "even if the Chinese people will not be able to create the atom bomb in a hundred years . . .".

It thus turns out that possession of the atom bomb, which the Chinese leaders call a "paper tiger", is their cherished goal.

In a fit of anger, the CPC leaders went so far as to say that the threat of a nuclear war comes not from imperialism but from the "modern revisionists", unambiguously hinting at the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. In a speech in Pjongyang on September 18, 1963, Liu Shao-chi, Chairman of the CPR, stated: "Imperialism did not use the nuclear weapon everywhere and at will and would not dare to do so." He followed this up with the wild assertion that "in agreement with the imperialists" the Soviet Union "has monopolised the nuclear weapon" and organises "nuclear blackmail with regard to the peoples of the socialist countries and the revolutionary peoples of the whole world". If the "modern revisionists," he pathetically exclaimed, "go so far as to use the nuclear weapon first and will thereby provoke a nuclear world war, they will earn the stern condemnation of the peoples of the whole world."

What touching concern Liu Shao-chi shows to lull suspicion that the imperialists have any intention of unleashing a nuclear war. After this, is it not hypocrisy on the part of the CPC leadership to call for an "adherence to the class approach", for "distinguishing friend from foe", for a struggle against US imperialism as the chief enemy of peace? In this connection one cannot help but recall the treacherous rule of bourgeois diplomacy, which Palmerston expounded as "We have neither eternal allies nor eternal friends. Only our interests are eternal." All this shows how little significance the Chinese leaders attach to their own statements concerning the aggressive nature of imperialism and their uncompromising attitude to class enemies.

The following example of the discrepancy between what the Chinese leaders say and do must also be pointed out. This concerns the relations between the socialist countries and the countries of the capitalist world. Here the Chinese leaders have two yardsticks—one for appraising the policy of the USSR and other socialist countries and the other for assessing China's foreign policy. Everyone knows the sharply negative reaction of the Chinese leaders to the efforts the Soviet Union and other socialist countries are making to normalise and improve economic and other relations with the capitalist countries, including the United States of America. Why, one involuntarily asks, does any normalisation of relations between the USSR and the USA, the two great nuclear powers on whose efforts a relaxation of international tension largely depends, evoke such opposition from the Chinese government? With a persistence worthy of better application, the Chinese leaders are doing their utmost to hinder an improvement of US-Soviet relations, portraying it as a "conspiracy with the imperialists". At the same time the CPR Government is making feverish efforts to establish better relations with Britain, France, Japan, West Germany and Italy. All the indications are that they would not be averse to an improvement in relations with the USA if the opportunity presented itself.

Never before has Peking received so many businessmen, political leaders and statesmen from the capitalist countries as now. CPR representatives have talks with them and sign agreements on trade, credits, scientific and technical aid and even on political issues.

existence. All socialist countries ultimately have to have contacts with people from the bourgeois states and not only with friends but also with representatives of the ruling imperialist circles. But the thing is that the Chinese leaders consider that when they themselves develop such activity it is an expression of the policy of real "revolutionaries", but when other socialist states do the same thing it is "revisionism" and "treachery".

But the attempts to slander our peace-loving foreign policy will inevitably collapse. Our Party shall continue to wage a struggle to avert a world thermonuclear war, secure lasting world peace and steadfastly pursue the Leninist policy of peaceful coexistence between countries with different social systems. Our peaceful policy, Lenin said, is approved by the overwhelming majority of the world's population. Peace helps to strengthen socialism. The working people of all countries, of all continents desire peace. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union has won deserved glory as the banner-bearer of peace and shall always remain faithful to this banner.

The course of events has shown that the programme of struggle for peace, democracy, national independence and socialism drawn up by the Moscow Meetings is the programme which closely links up the immediate and ultimate goals of the working class and ensures the advance of the world revolution.

At the same time, far from facilitating the development of the world revolutionary process, the theoretical platform and, chiefly, the practical activity of the CPC leadership create additional difficulties for the realisation of the age-old aspirations of the peoples, who are hungering for peace and social progress.

It is absurd to oppose the struggle for peace, for the peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems, to the revolutionary class struggle of the working class of the capitalist countries and the national liberation struggle of the peoples. For Marxists-Leninists there neither is nor can there be a dilemma of whether to wage a struggle for peace or a revolutionary struggle. The two are inter-related and are, in the final analysis, spearheaded against imperialism. The struggle for peace is one of the main forms of the struggle of the peoples against imperialism, against the new wars being prepared by it, against the aggressive acts of the imperialists in the colonial countries, against the military bases of the imperialists on the territory of other countries, against the arms race, and so on. Surely this struggle expresses the vital interests of the working class and all working people.

We know that peace is a true ally of socialism. The situation created by peaceful coexistence also favourably influences the development of the national liberation movement and the revolutionary struggle of the working class in the capitalist countries.

The working class movement has made particularly great headway in recent years. Experience shows that in many countries the struggle of the working class for democratic and social rights is closely intertwined with the struggle for peace and against the forces of militarism. In the struggle against militarism a political complexion is imparted even to the economic actions of the working class. The efforts of the working class and all working people to avert the threat of another world war help to educate the peoples in a spirit of international solidarity because under present-day conditions the struggle for peace is, as never before, essentially an international struggle.

What, for example, does it mean to work for peace in a country like the Federal Republic of Germany? It means, first and foremost, active opposition to the big monopolies, which are hatching ideas of revenge, opposition to their offensive against the vital rights and political freedoms of the working people. By participating in this struggle, the revolutionary working class, far from "dissolving" in the mass democratic movement, as the Chinese leaders maintain, gets a schooling in revolutionary organisation and discipline, unites its ranks and wins greater influence among the masses.

Naturally, being a general democratic movement the struggle for peace neither sets itself nor can set itself the task of effecting socialist changes. This, incidentally, is what the CPC leaders, who are trying to foist on the peace movement tasks alien to it, fail to understand. But the struggle for peace is furthering the cause of socialism inasmuch as it is waged against imperialism, the source of the war threat, inasmuch as it is helping the masses better to understand what are their vital interests.

The repudiation of this extremely close bond between the struggle for peace and the struggle for socialism reveals in effect the utter lack of confidence of the CPC leaders in the popular masses, in their ability to take organised action in the class struggle. The essence of the CPC leadership's present concepts regarding revolution lies in rejection of the Leninist precept that the socialist revolution is the result of the mass struggle, in relying solely on armed uprisings everywhere and in all cases, without taking into account the sentiments of the masses, their preparedness for revolution, without taking into account the internal and external situation.

The immense harm of this line lies in the fact that it rejects painstaking and patient work with the masses and reliance on the maturing of the objective and subjective conditions for a socialist revolution in favour of revolutionary phrase-mongering, or, what is still worse, in favour of adventurist actions by a handful of men who have no ties with the people. What has this kind of action in common with Marxism-Leninism? Is this not the propagation of Blanquist and Trotskyite ideas that have been rejected long ago?

No matter what the CPC leaders say to the contrary, one of the pivotal points of the polemics in the Communist movement is the problem of "the ways of carrying out the revolution" and not the dilemma of "whether to carry or not to carry on the revolution". If the Communist parties pin all their hopes solely on an armed struggle without taking into consideration whether the masses are prepared to support such a struggle this will inevitably lead only to bitter failures.

In other words, the Chinese leaders have forgotten one of the prime propositions of Marxist-Leninist theory, namely that the revolution cannot be accelerated or made to order, that it cannot be given a push from without. "Some people," Lenin said, "think that revolution in a foreign country can be made to order, by agreement. People who think so are either madmen or provocateurs" (Collected Works, Vol. 27, p. 441, Russ. ed.). Revolution is made by the masses headed by the proletariat and its revolutionary vanguard. Naturally, this does not in any way imply that Marxists-Leninists must passively wait for a favourable situation to arise. The experience of the CPSU shows that even a relatively small, steeled party that has the support of the proletariat and the advanced section of the peasantry can head the revolution and lead the people. But for this, as Lenin repeatedly emphasised, there must be a revolutionary situation in which the "upper strata" are no longer able to rule and the "lower strata" no longer want to live the old way.

Realistically assessing the present situation, the fraternal parties allow for the possibility of transition from capitalism to socialism either by peaceful or non-peaceful means.

However, no matter how the transition from capitalism to socialism is achieved, it is possible only through a socialist revolution, through a dictatorship of the proletariat in its various forms. In each given country the actual possibility for a peaceful or non-peaceful transition to socialism is determined by concrete historical conditions. The fraternal parties in the capitalist countries are invariably guided by Lenin's proposition that the working class must master all forms and means of revolutionary struggle without exception, that it must be ready to pass from one form of struggle to another in the quickest and most unexpected manner and to utilise it in conformity with the concrete situation. But the Chinese leaders oppose this creative approach to questions of tactics by the fraternal parties and attempt to instruct them from Peking on how and when to carry out a revolution in their countries. Quite understandably these "instructions" are meeting with a unanimous rebuff from Marxists-Leninists.

Our Party has always unswervingly adhered to positions of proletarian internationalism. No slander and no foul fabrications can smear the banner of proletarian internationalism which is sacred to us. Our Party will continue tirelessly to strengthen its solidarity with the working class, with the working masses of the capitalist countries who are struggling to destroy the capitalist system and to reshape society on socialist lines. This road was charted for us by Lenin and we shall steadfastly follow it.

III

The CPC Leaders' Policy of Isolating the National-Liberation Movement from the International Working Class

The Chinese leaders pin special hopes on using the national-liberation movement for their own ends.

The collapse of the colonial system of imperialism, and the tasks and prospects of the newly-free countries constitute one of the cardinal problems of the social progress of all mankind. Imperialism and internal reaction are trying to stop the development of national-liberation revolutions and to push the newly-free countries into the trap of neo-colonialism. The progressive democratic forces are fighting for complete national freedom, for the transition to the non-capitalist path of development. The historical destinies of hundreds upon hundreds of millions of people depend on the outcome of this struggle.

The Communist parties of the world, after generalising at their international conferences the vast experience of the anti-imperialist movement, put forward a clear-cut programme of action to promote the struggles of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America for complete national and social liberation.

The Chinese leaders countered this Marxist-Leninist programme with a policy of their own, and are trying to impose upon the national-liberation movement principles which may push it on to a perilous path and endanger the achievements of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

It is particularly typical of the Chinese leaders that they completely ignore the immense variety of conditions in the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

It is well known that these countries are at different levels of socio-economic and political development. One group of countries has already taken the socialist road. Another group has won political independence and set about effecting radical social reforms. A third group of countries, where the national bourgeoisie has come to power, adheres on the whole to an anti-imperialist position. Then there are the countries which, although they have formally won political indepedence, actually are not independent because of the puppet regimes set up in them or because of their participation in imperialist blocs. Lastly, there are countries where colonial regimes remain and whose peoples are waging a heroic struggle for their freedom.

It is obvious to the Marxists-Leninists that the peoples of each of those groups of countries are faced with different tasks. The Chinese leaders, however, are trying to impose the same stereotyped patterns and methods of struggle on the Communist parties and all progressive forces. This is particularly evident from what they contend to be the main tasks of the national-liberation movement at the present stage.

Marxists-Leninists consider that the main tasks of the former colonies where an end has been put to the political rule of the imperialists —and those countries constitute the overwhelming majority—are to strengthen the independence achieved, uproot colonial practices in their economy and develop it at a fast rate, achieve economic sovereignty, and to advance along the road of social and economic progress. Among the primary general national problems are the expulsion of foreign monopolies, the implementation of agrarian reforms in the interests of the peasants, the promotion of national industry, above all by setting up a state sector, and the democratisation of social and political life. In a number of countries, conditions are already being created, as these tasks are being accomplished, for development along non-capitalist lines, for taking the socialist road.

In their interviews with delegations from the Communist parties of newly-free countries, and in their statements at world conferences, Chinese representatives speak of nothing but the necessity of waging an armed struggle in those countries. At the Stockholm session of the World Peace Council, for example, Liu Ning-yi, member of the CC CPC, claimed that "the road of armed struggle is the road to the complete liberation of the oppressed nations".

The Marxists-Leninists have always supported armed risings against the colonialists, against tyrannical regimes; they have supported the liberation wars of oppressed peoples. But they have always opposed stereotyped tactics based on the dogmatic use of some one form of struggle, irrespective of the actual conditions. Such tactics are particularly harmful now that in many of the Asian, African and Latin American countries national governments have come to power that are pursuing an anti-imperialist policy. In these circumstances, to advance the slogan of armed struggle as a universal method means causing double harm, disorienting the forces of national liberation and diverting them from the struggle against imperialism.

After all, it is absurd to say that the working people of Algeria, Ghana, Mali and certain other countries are faced with the task of starting an armed revolt. Such an idea amounts to an appeal to back the reactionaries, who are intent on overthrowing the governments of those countries. And what else but harm can one expect from an attempt to put this idea into effect in such countries as, for example, Indonesia or Ceylon?

The "Leftist" recommendations of the Chinese leaders for an armed struggle everywhere are nothing but an attempt to push the Communist and all democratic forces in the newly-free countries on to a path of adventurism. Experience shows that those who blindly follow such recommendations, refusing to take account of the actual conditions, doom themselves to isolation, make useless sacrifices and, far from promoting social progress in their countries, handicap it.

In the question of the prospects of the historical development of the newly-free countries the Chinese leaders come out against such cardinal principles of the Communist movement as Lenin's thesis on the possibility of the non-capitalist way of development of the newly-free countries.

Speaking at the Moscow bilateral meeting in July 1963, Teng Hsiao-ping, General Secretary of the CC, CPC, said outright that the thesis of the non-capitalist path was "meaningless talk", although every Communist knows that this thesis was put forward by Lenin and has been borne out by the experience of a number of former colonial peoples.

The idea of the non-capitalist path is gaining ground among the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America, and for a number of the peoples it has become a call for practical action. This is a tremendous victory for socialism. Capitalism has discredited itself in the eyes of the peoples, and the appeal of socialist ideas in the newly-free countries is so strong that the advanced forces and national leaders of many countries advocate taking the socialist path, and are actually taking steps in this direction, counting with good reason on support from the socialist countries and the Marxist-Leninist parties.

Except for "Leftist" phrases about the armed struggle, the Chinese leaders have nothing to say to the peoples of the newly-free countries concerning the lines along which they should wage their struggle for a better future. They have, in fact, no positive ideas that would help the progressive forces in one-time colonies to fight for socialism.

The Chinese leaders pretend that the interests of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America are particularly near and dear to them and that they are concerned above all else with the further progress of the national liberation movement. The facts, however, give them the lie. It is becoming increasingly evident that they are prompted by other considerations. The CPC leadership is clearly trying to establish control over the national liberation struggle in order to make it an instrument for the implementation of its hegemonic plans. The arguments contained in the Jenminjihpao article of October 22, 1963, already mentioned, are typical in this respect. That newspaper tries hard to prove that "true" Marxists-Leninists are to be found in Peking only, and makes it perfectly clear that the national liberation movement should take its bearings from them. The Chinese leaders call on the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America to follow Peking's lead in everything. The article clearly expresses the CPC leadership's claim to hegemony in the national liberation movement, and their desire to subordinate it to their own special aims.

That perhaps more than anything else sheds light on the true object of the Chinese leaders' policy of dissociating the national-liberation movement from the world socialist system and from the international working class.

It is with that object in view that the CPC leaders have spread the outrageous falsehood that the CPSU "understimates" the historical role of the national liberation movement and that the Soviet Union "refuses to help" the national liberation movement on the pretext of fighting for peaceful coexistence. We need not refute this ill-intentioned slander. Whatever "strong language" the Chinese leaders may use against the CPSU, they cannot cite a single fact bearing out their lying contentions.

But the CPC leaders do not confine themselves to slander. In their official actions and also in their activities in various world democratic organisations, they concentrate not on furthering the unity of the anti-imperialist forces, but on the struggle against the USSR and other socialist countries. That was what they did, in particular, at the Afro-Asian Solidarity Conference in Moshi.

At that Conference Liu Ning-yi, head of the Chinese delegation, said in an interview with our delegates: "East European countries should not interfere in Asian and African affairs. We regret the fact that you have come here at all. Who wants you here? It is an insult to the solidarity movement of the Afro-Asian countries... You may do as you will, but we shall be against you." The Chinese delegates at that Conference suggested to Asian and African delegates that since the Russians, Czechs and Poles are whites, "they cannot be trusted", that they would "always be able to come to terms with the American whites", and that the peoples of Asia and Africa had interests of their own and should form their separate associations.

Lately, the Chinese leaders have actually begun to form separate organisations (trade union, journalistic, writers', student, sports, etc.) for Asian, African and Latin American countries, which they plan to set up against the World Federation of Trade Unions and other international associations.

In the light of the practical activities of the Chinese leaders in recent years, the true political meaning of their slogan—"The wind from the East is beginning to prevail over the wind from the West"—has become all the clearer. It will be recalled that at the Meeting of 1960 that slogan was sharply criticised as a nationalist slogan substituting the geographic, and even the racial, approach for the class approach. It is clearly an attempt to minimise the role of the world socialist system, the working class and the peoples of Western Europe and America.

The Chinese theoreticians would like to substitute the call for setting the Eastern peoples apart on a nationalist and even racial basis for the Leninist idea of uniting the anti-imperialist forces of all countries and continents, expressed in the slogan "Workers of all countries and oppressed peoples, unite!" Their slogan about the supposedly magic power of the wind from the East is plainly designed to foment nationalist and even racial sentiments among the peoples fighting against colonialism.

Long years of enslavement and exploitation by the imperialists, who mocked at the honour and national dignity of the oppressed peoples, have aroused distrust of people of the white race in a section of the population of the former colonies and semi-colonies, and still nourish that sentiment. It is this sentiment that the Chinese leaders are trying to fan in the hope of setting the peoples of the former colonies and semi-colonies against the socialist countries and the working people of the developed capitalist countries, and of representing themselves as the sole defenders of the interests of those peoples. For, if we are to lay bare what lies behind the Chinese slogan and reveal the long-range aim of the CPC leaders, we see the following: China, according to them, is the biggest country of the East, it embodies the interests of the East, and it is here that the "winds of history" spring up that are to "prevail over" the winds from the "West".

In other words, that slogan is nothing but an ideological and political expression of the hegemonic aspirations of the Chinese leadership.

It is natural that the Chinese leaders, who are hatching that sort of plans, regard close ties between the national liberation movement, on the one hand, and the world socialist system and the international working-class movement, on the other, as a most serious obstacle to the realisation of their schemes. Hence the CPC leaders' policy of dissociating the Asian, African and Latin American countries from the USSR and other socialist countries and from the working class of the capitalist countries. Needless to say that policy is in crying conflict with the vital interests of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America. As the facts show, it is meeting with growing resistance on their part.

And that is understandable, because the policy of the CPC leaders, which is aimed at undermining the alliance of the newly-free countries and the socialist countries, may cause great damage primarily to the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America. In effect, that policy dooms the peoples of those countries to insularity and isolation, tends to perpetuate national narrow-mindedness; it shuts them off from the international experience of the revolutionary movement and the construction of the new society, and thereby facilitates the imperialist struggle against the national-liberation movement.

The tremendous progress which the national-liberation movement has made in our day was made possible by its close links with the peoples of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries and with the revolutionary movement of the international working class. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the other Marxist-Leninist parties regard the national-liberation movement as a major revolutionary force of today, one which makes a historic contribution to the struggle against imperialism for peace and socialism.

The Great October Socialist Revolution for the first time in history showed all the enslaved people the real way to liberation from national oppression. It initiated the great revolutionary process which today has culminated in the collapse of the colonial system, an event of history-making significance.

The national-liberation revolutions triumphed in new historical conditions. First of all, there arose, and has been developing and gaining strength, the world socialist system, which is becoming the decisive factor in the progress of society. Secondly, the defeat in the Second World War of the spearhead forces of imperialism—Hitler Germany, fascist Italy and militarist Japan—resulted in a considerable weakening of world reaction. Thirdly, the working class and all working people of the colonial powers stepped up their fight against the colonial policies of the imperialists.

All these factors provided an exceptionally favourable situation for the victories of the national-liberation movement and enabled it to encompass the colonial and semi-colonial periphery of imperialism on three continents—Asia, Africa and Latin America. We greatly appreciate the assistance which the national-liberation struggle is rendering to the socialist countries and to all revolutionary forces.

Unity of all the revolutionary forces is an earnest of victory in the anti-imperialist struggle. The fundamental national interests of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America fully coincide with those of the socialist commonwealth, and of the working class and all working people in all countries. This is the objective basis of the growing solidarity of the revolutionary forces fighting against imperialism.

When our country was the only socialist state in the world, Lenin wrote that "the revolutionary movement of the peoples of the East can now develop successfully, and can come to a culmination, only in direct connection with the revolutionary struggle of our Soviet Republic against international imperialism" (Coll. Works, Vol. 30, p. 130, Russ. ed.). Lenin's words sound with particular force now that there exists the world socialist system.

What, specifically, does support for the national liberation movement on the part of the socialist countries mean today?

The internationalist duty of the socialist countries is to foil imperialist attempts to re-establish colonial regimes in the newly-free countries and prevent the realisation of the national aspirations of the peoples who have thrown off colonial tyranny. In all such cases, the duty of the socialist countries is to give those countries political and diplomatic support, and when necessary, to curb the imperialist aggressors by bringing the whole might of the world socialist system to bear.

Our policy, which is aimed at assisting the peoples fighting for their freedom, is based on the lofty principles of proletarian internationalism, on the behests of the great Lenin.

Our Party and Government have time and again stated, clearly and comprehensively their views on problems of the national-liberation movement. In the answers which Comrade Khrushchov gave to the questions of a number of African and Asian newspapers and which were published not long ago, it is clearly stated: "Every people fighting against the colonialists has been firmly supported by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. Today we declare once again, for all to hear, that the peoples fighting for their liberation can continue to count firmly on our support."

The peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America know well that the Soviet Union actively supports the just wars of national liberation, which the people wage against their enslavers. The Soviet Union, like other socialist countries, is doing everything to help the national liberation movement—economically, politically and, if necessary, militarily—and to prevent the imperialists from unleashing local wars and exporting counter-revolution by force of arms.

We have only to refer to such facts as the support given to Egypt during the Suez venture of the Anglo-Franco-Israeli aggressors, the assistance extended to Indonesia in its struggle to consolidate its independence and recover Western Irian, not to mention many other facts. No people who have asked our support have met with a refusal. The soldiers of the heroic national-liberation army of Algeria and the armed forces of Indonesia, Yemen and other countries know well whose arms helped them in the struggle against the colonialists for freedom and independence.

In the recent period the Soviet Government has repeatedly and resolutely come out in defence of peoples fighting for their national independence. It has supported the peoples of Panama and Cyprus in their anti-imperialist struggle, voiced its solidarity with the courageous resistance offered by the Vietnamese people to US aggression, warned the British and US imperialists against interference in the internal affairs of the People's Republic of Zanzibar, and exposed colonialist intrigue in East Africa.

Now that the achievement of economic sovereignty and social progress have become the chief direction in which the anti-imperialist struggle of the newly-free countries is developing, it is particularly important to expand economic cooperation between them and the socialist countries, and to render them fraternal economic assistance.

The Soviet Union unfailingly fulfils this duty. Soviet credits to newly-free countries on favourable terms add up to a total exceeding 3,000 million rubles. The Soviet Union is helping to build about 500 industrial and other establishments in many of the newly-free countries. It is rendering disinterested assistance to the newly-free countries in setting up a national industry, the backbone of economic independence. The Bhilai Iron and Steel Works and the Aswan High Dam will always be remembered by the peoples as symbols of fraternal cooperation between socialist countries and the countries that have freed themselves from colonial tyranny.

Thousands of students from newly-sovereign states are studying in our country. Growing economic relations between the USSR and other socialist countries, on the one hand, and Asian, African and Latin American countries, on the other, have ended the monopoly which the imperialist powers had on deliveries of plant and the granting of credits. These powers often have to make concessions to underdeveloped countries with regard to loan terms, in the field of trade, and so on. Economic blockade, an extremely effective weapon in the past, has been knocked out of the hands of the imperialists.

The peoples of the newly-free countries know that they can win the battle against the domination of international monopolies if they draw on the economic power of socialism. The growing economic potential of the socialist countries is in their best interest. Today the achievements of the socialist countries in the economic competition with capitalism, and their expanding economic relations with newly-sovereign states constitute one of the most important forms in which socialism gives the peoples of the newly-free countries effective support.

But the Chinese leaders try to persuade the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America that the socialist countries' policy of peaceful economic competition allegedly runs counter to their interests. They do all they can to smear the economic assistance which the USSR and other socialist countries render to the underdeveloped countries, and try to induce them to question the purpose of that assistance. But the peoples of the newly-free countries, who have gained considerable political experience, will see for themselves what the Chinese leaders are driving at and what they really want, and will reject a policy aimed at subordinating them to the selfish plans of the Chinese leaders.

Soviet people are confident that the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America, who are well familiar with the actual facts concerning Soviet assistance, will themselves draw the right conclusions as to the worth of the slanderous fabrications of the Chinese leaders. They can do this all the more easily because they can compare the deeds of the Soviet Union with the Chinese leaders' actions in recent years.

We are firmly convinced that the national liberation movement, which has become one of the greatest progressive factors of our time, will, despite all difficulties, and in close alliance with the world socialist system and all the anti-imperialist forces, march on along its own path towards final victory over the imperialist forces and will bring the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America deliverance from agelong backwardness, will lead them to national and social prosperity.

The Soviet Union has invariably advocated the abolition of every form of colonial oppression. It considers fraternal alliance with the peoples that have cast off colonial and semi-colonial tyranny as a corner-stone of its foreign policy.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union has always helped the peoples fighting against imperialism, for their freedom and national independence, and will continue to do so. No amount of slander and no falsehoods can hinder the growing friendship between the peoples of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries and the peoples of the countries which have freed thmselves from colonial dependence.

On Soviet-Chinese Relations

Comrades,

The CC, CPSU, and the Soviet Government have always attached great importance to the development of friendship and co-operation with the Chinese People's Republic. We have never sought any advantage or profit, and have always been internationalist in our attitude towards the CPC and the Chinese people.

For many years we have supported the working people of China, their Communist vanguard, in the struggle for independence, for the victory of the socialist revolution. We considered it our duty to help the Chinese people fraternally in the building of socialism, the strengthening of the international position of the CPR, and in the defence of its socialist gains.

Our Party, the Soviet people know the scale and the nature of the economic assistance rendered by the Soviet Union to China. In a short period of time the USSR helped the Chinese People's Republic to build over 200 large industrial enterprises, shops and other projects, equipped with modern machinery. The CPR has built with Soviet aid whole branches of industry which China did not have before: aircraft-, automobile- and tractor-building industries, power-producing, heavy machine-building and precision machine-building industries, instrument-making and radio-engineering and various branches of the chemical industry.

The factories built and reconstructed with Soviet assistance enable China to produce annually 8,700,000 tons of iron, 8,400,000 tons of steel, and 32,200,000 tons of coal and shale. Enterprises built with the help of our country account for 70 per cent of China's tin output, 100 per cent of its synthetic rubber output, 25 to 30 per cent of its electric power output, and 80 per cent of the lorries and tractors produced annually. The defence factories built with the technical assistance of the Soviet Union constituted the basis for China's defence industry.

More than 10,000 Soviet specialists were sent to the People's Republic of China for varying terms between 1950 and 1960. Some 10,000 Chinese engineers, technicians and skilled workers, and about 1,000 scientists, were taught and trained in the USSR between 1951 and 1962. More than 11,000 students and post-graduates graduated from Soviet higher educational establishments in this period.

Soviet-Chinese cooperation reached its peak after 1953, when the elements of inequality in the relations between our countries imposed during the Stalin personality cult were removed on the initiative of the CC, CPSU, and Comrade N. S. Khrushchov. "In the Chinese question," Mao Tse-tung said in 1957, "the credit for removing the disagreeable and the extraneous belongs to N. S. Khrushchov."

In 1959 the proportions of Soviet-Chinese economic contacts were nearly double those of 1953, while deliveries for the building projects increased in that period as much as eightfold. Between 1954 and 1963 the Soviet Union turned over to China more than 24,000 sets of scientific and technical documents, including 1,400 projects of large industrial enterprises. These documents embodied the vast experience accumulated by the Soviet people, by Soviet scientists and technicians. In effect, all these scientific and technical documents were turned over to China gratuitously.

The Soviet Union granted the Chinese People's Republic long-term credits totalling 1,816 million rubles on favourable terms.

The CC, CPSU, and the Soviet government spared no effort to enable China firmly to assume its place on the international scene as a great socialist power and worked perseveringly for the restoration of the rights of the CPR in the United Nations. We regularly informed the leadership of the CPR of all the key political actions of the Soviet Union and strove to co-ordinate the foreign policies of our two countries.

It should be said that, while assisting People's China, the CC, CPSU, for its part always highly appreciated the support of the CPR. We refer not only to the various valuable Chinese export items received by the USSR and the experience made available to us by the Chinese scientists, but also to the common struggle for the consolidation of peace, against imperialism and colonialism.

In 1950, the Soviet Union and the CPR concluded a Treaty of Friendship, Alliance and Mutual Assistance, which became an important factor not only in the all-round development of relations between our two countries, but also in the strengthening of peace in the Far East.

The Soviet Union has always faithfully abided by all the commitments under this Treaty. Every time a threat arose to the security of the CPR, the USSR demonstrated its readiness to perform its allied duty to the end. In the autumn of 1958, for example, Comrade N. S. Khrushchov, head of the Soviet Government, declared in a message to US President Eisenhower that "an attack on the People's Republic of China, the great friend, ally and neighbour of our country, would be tantamount to an attack on the Soviet Union." This declaration was emphatically re-affirmed in July 1962. The above shows how earnestly the Soviet Government approached the strengthening of Soviet-Chinese friendship.

However, to our regret, ever since 1958 the Government of the CPR has increasingly resorted to measures undermining Soviet-Chinese friendship and unilateral actions creating difficulties on the world scene not only for the Soviet Union, but also for other socialist countries.

Soviet-Chinese relations deteriorated most markedly after the CPC leaders went over from isolated unfriendly acts to a sharp curtailment of economic and cultural relations with the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. Already on the eve of the 1960 Moscow Meeting of Fraternal Parties, the Chinese Government insisted on the revision of all earlier agreements and protocols concluded with the Soviet Union on economic, scientific and technical cooperation; besides, the Chinese Government turned down a considerable part of the planned deliveries of Soviet equipment, reducing to a minimum the volume of of Soviet-Chinese trade.

Although the Soviet Government was aware that this course of the Chinese leaders would harm Soviet-Chinese friendship and cooperation, it had no choice but to consent to it. As a result, the total volume of economic cooperation between the Soviet Union and the CPR (including trade and technical assistance) dropped in 1962 to 36.5 per cent of what it was in 1959, while deliveries of sets of equipment and materials decreased 40-fold. In 1963 economic cooperation and trade continued to drop.

It stands to reason that we could not look on indifferently while Soviet-Chinese cooperation was sharply curtailed. Time and again the CC, CPSU called on the CC, CPC, to avert this process. We suggested a number of concrete measures, but the Chinese leaders did not respond to our suggestions. In pursuance of their special aims, they worsened China's relations with the Soviet Union step by step and began to spread the ideological differences to the sphere of inter-state relations.

Having set their course on curtailing economic contacts with the USSR and other socialist countries, the CPC leaders at first explained this as follows:

"Firstly, thanks to the assistance of the Soviet Union the primary foundations of modern industry and technology have been laid in China, and, therefore, the building and designing of most projects will in future be done with our own forces. We want to ease the efforts of the Soviet Union with respect to its assistance to China. However, in the future, too, we shall have to ask for Soviet assistance in relation to projects that we shall not be able to design, build and equip on our own.

"Secondly, the CC, CPC, and the Chinese Government consider it necessary to concentrate their efforts on the building of the most important projects, while reducing the total number of capital projects and non-urgent projects in order to put into practice the 'better, greater faster and more economical' principle of socialist construction in the CPR. The scale of building in the country will continue to be big and the rates high.

"Thirdly, due to the natural calamities in the last two years, certain difficulties have arisen in agriculture affecting the balance of payments, and, therefore, by reducing the number of projects built with the help of the Soviet Union we hope to create conditions for more favourable co-operation between our countries." (Quoted from the statement by Ku Cho-hsin, head of the CPR Government delegation at the Soviet-Chinese negotiations on February 10, 1961.)

Yet today, having evidently "forgotten" its previous explanations, the CPR Government maintains that Soviet-Chinese contacts were reduced on the initiative of the Soviet Union and that this is the cause for China's difficult economic situation in the last few years.

Today, Chinese propagandists go out of their way to prove that there has never been any Soviet assistance to China and that there have been no more than ordinary commercial operations. Bent on erasing the memory of Soviet assistance among the people, the Chinese have gone so far as to remove trade marks from Soviet lathes and other machinery, and to allege that the Soviet Union delivered obsolete equipment to China. This is said in spite of the fact that the Chinese themselves, and the foreign press as well, noted that enterprises built with Soviet assistance, such as the Changchun Automobile Works, the Harbin Electrical Engineering Works, the Loyang Tractor Works and many others, are splendid examples of modern industry.

Such actions have little in common with any concept of common decency. While leaving them to the conscience of the Chinese leadership, we cannot help noting the obvious discrepancies in their charges against the Soviet Union. On the one hand, they try to blame the USSR for reducing its assistance and creating serious difficulties for China's economy. On the other, they spread rumours that Soviet assistance was ineffective and insignificant. But if our assistance really was "ineffective and insignificant", how could its cessation harm China's economy?

To use the favourite expression of the Chinese leaders, where is the truth and where the untruth on this score? The facts show that it is nothing but untruth all round.

In spite of the candidly hostile actions of the CPC leadership, our country is living up faithfully to earlier commitments and continuing to assist China in the building of 80 industrial enterprises. Engineers, technicians, scientists and students from the CPR are being trained in the Soviet Union as before. The Soviet Union responded fraternally to the economic difficulties that arose in China in 1960 and 1961. At a time when particularly acute food shortages occurred in the CPR, the CC, CPSU, and the Soviet Government offered the CPC leadership a loan of 1,000,000 tons of grain and 500,000 tons of sugar. At the same time, the Soviet Union granted the CPR five years' deferment on payments due for commercial transactions to the amount of 288 million rubles.

If, as the Chinese leadership claims, the Soviet Union sought to curtail its economic relations with China, why did it have to take all these steps, why continue its assistance in building industrial enterprises, and why make repeated offers of greater mutually advantageous trade and economic co-operation? The CPC leadership gives no reply to this question. Nor can it do so, because it was none other than the Chinese leadership that sought the curtailment of co-operation between our countries.

Seeking to justify, to some extent at least, the economic failures of the CPR, brought about by the "big leap" policy, the CPC leaders lay a particular accent on the question of Soviet specialists. So, although this issue has been repeatedly dealt with in our Party's official documents, we are compelled to dwell upon it once more.

The Government of the USSR sent specialists to China in the belief that they were needed to assist in the development of China's national economy, which did not have qualified personnel in sufficient numbers. It was by no means a commercial transaction, but an act of genuine fraternal assistance to the Chinese people.

Seeing that the demand for foreign specialists is temporary in nature and that qualified personnel of their own was rapidly growing in the fraternal socialist countries, the Soviet Government broached the question of recalling our specialists first in 1956, and once again in 1958. Similar offers were also made at the time to the other People's Democracies where Soviet specialists were still working then. Since the specialists were not needed any longer these offers were accepted by all the countries, excluding the CPR, whose government requested that the Soviet specialists stay on for a certain time.

While insisting that the Soviet specialists remain, the Chinese authorities deliberately treated them worse than before, and created intolerable conditions for their work.

The last years of our specialists' stay in the CPR coincided with the "big leap" policy, which unbalanced the proportions of economic development and caused departures from accepted technical standards. The Soviet specialists could not help seeing the dangerous implications of this policy. They warned the Chinese authorities against violating the technical requirements. But their advice fell on deaf ears. Due to the fact that the recommendations of the Soviet specialists were ignored and that the Chinese officials grossly violated the technical standards, serious accidents occurred, some of them involving a loss of life. This happened on the building site of the Hsinantsiang Hydropower Station, where thousands of tons of rock crashed down because the technical requirements were not observed, and work on the project was considerably delayed. The dams burst and the pit was flooded at the Hsinfungtsiang Hydropower project for the same reason. In both cases there was a loss of life. It is only natural that the Soviet engineers and technicians could not treat all this with indifference. They protested, but being ignored, they began asking to be sent home.

Furthermore, beginning in the spring of 1960 the Chinese authorities began "indoctrinating" the Soviet specialists, trying to turn them against the Central Committee of the CPSU and the Government of the USSR. This aroused the legitimate indignation of our people.

The Government of the USSR has repeatedly called the attention of the Chinese authorities to all these outrageous facts, and requested insistently that normal conditions be provided for the work of the Soviet specialists. But the Chinese authorities responded by treating our people in a still more unfriendly and insulting fashion, by spurning them as "conservatives", and by reviling Soviet experience and technology in every way. Surveillance of Soviet people increased, searches of personal belongings became more frequent, and the like. In the circumstances, there was no choice but to recall our specialists.

Now, after many additional facts have come to light, there is every reason to believe that after 1959, when the Chinese leadership began aggravating its relations with the USSR, it did not need the specialists so much as the question of these specialists, which they could use as one of the pretexts for the struggle against the CPSU.

After recalling the Soviet specialists, the Soviet Government sought an adjustment of the matter in the interests of strengthening Soviet-Chinese friendship. In November 1960, on the instructions of the CC, CPSU, Comrade A. I. Mikoyan told the Chinese leaders at the Moscow Meeting of Fraternal Parties in an official conversation that if China really needed Soviet specialists and if they were provided normal conditions for work, we were prepared to send them to the CPR. Comrade N. S. Khrushchov said the same thing in his talk with Chou En-lai and the other members of the CPC delegation to the Twenty-Second Congress of the CPSU. At the bilateral meeting of the CPSU and CPC delegations (in July 1963) and in the Letter of the CC, CPSU, of November 29, 1963, the Chinese leadership was again officially informed that if it required the technical help of our specialists, the Soviet Government was prepared to examine the question of sending them to the CPR. The Chinese leaders did not reply to any of these proposals, while continuing to exploit the question of Soviet specialists for their unseemly ends. They even tried to blame the revision of their economic plans, the reduction of capital building and the difficulties which arose in the various branches of their economy on the withdrawal of our specialists.

But, firstly, everybody knows that the economic difficulties in the CPR arose before the Soviet specialists had been recalled, and that they arose due to the dangerous "big leap" experiment. Secondly, the greatest difficulties arose in those branches where there were very few or no Soviet specialists at all.

How, for example, could the recall of the Soviet specialists affect the coal, oil, timber, light and other industries, and agriculture as well, if, in 1960, there were two specialists working in the coal industry, three in the Ministry of State Farms and Virgin Lands, and one each in the departments of the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry? Yet it was these very branches, and especially agriculture, that suffered the greatest failures.

Is it not high time for the Chinese leaders to stop misleading their Party, their people and world opinion, and to speak the truth about the real reasons for the difficulties of the Chinese people?

These reasons stem from the fact that the CPC leaders ignore the objective laws in their economic policy.

How is the fact to be explained that lately, due to the exertions of the CPC leadership, Soviet-Chinese economic co-operation, cultural relations and exchanges between public organisations are dwindling from year to year, while insinuations and slander pour forth against the Soviet people? There is only one explanation: the Chinese leaders want to fence their people off from the Soviet Union. They are afraid that their people will learn the truth about the selfless fraternal Soviet proposals for the development of relations between the USSR and the CPR, and that then their vicious slander, whereby they seek to tarnish our Party and the Soviet people, will explode in their faces. The CPC leadership fears that co-operation with our country may carry as far as China the purifying breath of the Twentieth Congress ideas, which dissipated the intolerable situation created by the Stalin personality cult.

We also consider it necessary to tell the Plenum about the violations of the Soviet-Chinese border, occasioned through the fault of the Chinese side. This has already been mentioned in the documents of the CPSU and the Soviet Government. In 1962 and 1963 violations of the Soviet border kept occurring continuously, often assuming the form of crude provocations.

The Soviet Government has come forward with the initiative of holding consultations in order to specify the border line between the USSR and the CPR at certain of its points. We do so in the belief that no territorial issues exist between the USSR and the CPR, that the Soviet-Chinese border took shape historically, and that the issue can concern only some sections of the border, to make them more precise wherever necessary.

Undermining the foundations of Soviet-Chinese friendship, the CPC leaders have organised a malicious anti-Soviet propaganda campaign at home and abroad. The Chinese newspapers are full of slanderous articles which malign Soviet reality and cast foul aspersions on the Soviet people. In one CPR Government statement the foreign policy of the Soviet Union is described as "a policy of alignment with the forces of war for struggle against the forces of peace, alignment with imperialism for struggle against socialism".

All these contentions are, from beginning to end, nothing but ranting slander, absolutely obvious not only to our friends, but also to our enemies. The Soviet Communists, all Soviet people, reject these brazen lies with indignation. The slanderers may go about their foul business, but the Soviet Union will continue to advance along the Leninist course as before.

Attacks by the CPC Leaders on the Programme of the CPSU

Comrades, lately the CPC leaders have spread their polemics also to questions concerning the internal development of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries.

They have made the Programme of the CPSU the object of their attacks.

It is generally recognised that our Party Programme is one of the most outstanding documents of modern times and that it reflects with exceptional depth and force the practice of building the new society in the USSR and the fraternal countries on the basis of the theory of scientific communism. Defying common sense, Chinese propaganda has in its attacks on the Programme of the CPSU gone to the length of absurd and monstrous slander, alleging that it is "aimed against the revolutions of the peoples which are still dominated by imperialism and capitalism", that it is "aimed against the completion of the revolutions by the peoples which have already embarked on the path of socialism" and, of all things, that is it aimed at "preserving and restoring capitalism" (article in Jenminjihpao and the journal Hungchi, September 6, 1963).

In opposing the CPSU Programme, the Chinese leaders are trying to discredit the theory and practice of proletarian socialism, which has been victorious in the working class movement after a long struggle against petty-bourgeois socialism, anarchism and other anti-scientific trends. Whether they admit it or not, the leaders of the CPC are reviving the concepts of petty-bourgeois socialism and trying to criticise the international experience of the building of new society from these positions.

The Chinese leaders are attacking the CPSU because it is pursuing a policy of improving the people's standard of living. They say that the improvement of the living standard of the Soviet people is "embourgeoisement", and that the principle of material incentives "results in people seeking personal gain and enrichment, inducing the itch for profit and a growth of bourgeois individualism, and injuring socialist economics... and even corrupting it" (Jenminjihpao, December 26, 1963).

Is there not deep-seated contempt for the vital requirement of man, for the principles and ideals of socialist society, behind these strident contentions?

It may be recalled what great importance Lenin attached to the principle of socialist distribution according to labour, to material incentives for the development of social production. He taught us that new society should not be built by enthusiasm alone, but with the help of enthusiasm roused by the great revolution, by a personal interest, by incentives, on a cost-accounting basis.

The Chinese leaders ferociously attack the conclusions in the Programme of the CPSU concerning the political organisation of socialist society as it advances to Communism. They claim that the propositions of the Programme of the CPSU on the state of the whole people and the party of the whole people all but substitute bourgeois theories for the Marxist-Leninist teaching on the state, that they are tantamount to disarming the working class.

The Chinese leaders do not even try to analyse the actual processes operating in the socialist countries. Instead, they juggle with quotations snatched out of context from the works of the Marxist-Leninist classics, and interpret them incorrectly. They try to impose quasi-theoretical discussions on the world Communist movement concerning matters that have long since been settled by the classics of Marxism-Leninism.

One of these issues concerns their dogmatic contentions about the dictatorship of the proletariat. The Chinese leaders stubbornly reiterate that the dictatorship of the proletariat should be preserved "until the entry into the highest phase of communist society". In doing so they refer to a quotation from Marx which says that "between the capitalist and communist society lies a period of the revolutionary transformation of the first into the second. This period conforms also with the political transitional period, and the state of this period cannot be anything but a revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat" (K. Marx and F. Engels, Works, 2nd ed., Vol. 19, p. 27, Russ. ed.).

This quotation, snatched out of the context of Marx's exposition, is being exploited as the theoretical basis for the "criticism" of the Programme of the CPSU.

But the Chinese leaders have clipped Marx's exposition, and do not quote the next two lines from the same work by Marx, which says with respect to the Gotha Programme: "But the programme does not concern itself with either this last (that is, the dictatorship of the proletariat—M. S.) or the future statehood in communist society". To follow the logic of the Chinese theorists, Marx should be declared an anti-Marxist for saying this. Indeed, the Chinese theorists proceed from what they call Marxist ideas to say that "the withering away of the dictatorship of the proletariat is also the withering away of the state". Yet Marx speaks about the "statehood in communist society", which is no longer a dictatorship of the proletariat.

That is just the point. When speaking of the transitional period from capitalism to communism, Marx has in mind the first phase of communism, that is, socialism.

Surely, the Chinese leaders know that Marx and Engels have spoken more than once about the two phases of communism and about the dictatorship of the proletariat being a state of the transitional period, whose aim—the building of socialism—is the aim of the first phase of communism. Pointing to the inevitably long and persistent struggle for the socialist rearrangement of society, Lenin wrote about "a whole period of dictatorship by the proletariat as a period of transition from capitalism to socialism" (Works, Vol. 29, p. 358, Russ. ed.).

The Peking theorists go out of their way to hush up the proposition emphasised by Lenin. What he said was that the dictatorship of the proletariat was necessary "for the purpose of the final building and consolidation of socialism" (Vol. 29, p. 351, Russ. ed.), and that, once the danger that capitalist relations may be restored disappears, there comes "an end to the dictatorship of the proletariat" (Vol. 33, p. 75, Russ. Ed.).

That was how Lenin put it.

The facts have confirmed the correctness of Lenin's propositions. If the Chinese leaders had really been concerned about the truth, they could have turned to our every-day practice and seen how the economic basis and social structure of Soviet society have changed. Lenin considered that the suppression of the overthrown exploiting classes was a most important function of the dictatorship of the proletariat. Socialist society in the USSR, as we know, long since consists of friendly classes—the workers and peasants, and the social group of the people's intelligentsia. They are welded by common basic interests, by the Marxist-Leninist ideology and by their identical goal—the building of communism.

Against whom do the Chinese theorists suggest that we enforce dictatorship? What are they leading up to, and how to interpret their demand that the CPSU should carry through a "policy of class struggle" inside the country?

We know what the theory put forward by Stalin about the inevitable aggravation of the class struggle as the successes of socialist construction accumulate led to. It may be recalled that this theory served as a vindication for gross violations of socialist legality. The CPSU has put an end to it and will never allow anything like it to happen again. It has pursued and will continue to pursue a policy of strengthening the alliance between the working class and the peasants, of uniting all working people in a single collective of builders of communism.

The ideas of a state of the whole people and the party of the whole people are not the fruit of arm-chair rumination. They were generated by reality and reflect the high maturity which social relations have attained in the USSR. In view of the fact that the exploiting classes have long since been abolished in the USSR, the Soviet state, having lost the character of a body suppressing the overthrown exploiters, now expresses the interests and the will of the whole people, while the party of the working class has become a party of the whole people.

After the complete and final victory of socialism the working class no longer effects its leading role through the dictatorship of the proletariat. It remains the foremost class of society also in the period of full-scale communist construction. Its leading role stems from both its economic position, the fact that it is connected directly with the highest form of socialist property, and the fact that it possesses the greatest steeling acquired through decades of class struggle and revolutionary experience.

All these propositions of the CPSU Programme are not by any means only of theoretical importance. They define the practical policy of our Party, the policy of drawing the whole people into the administration of the affairs of society, of increasing the people's activity in the building of communism, of extending socialist democracy. Yet the Chinese leaders ignore Lenin's precept that "socialism is impossible without democracy" (Vol. 23, p. 62, Russ. ed.). It is indicative that there is not the slightest mention of socialist democracy and the need to develop it while advancing to communism, in the Letter of the CC, CPC, of June 14, 1963, and in the other statements of the Chinese leadership.

Does idealisation of methods of violence and suppression during the entire period of transition from capitalism to communism have anything in common with the Marxist-Leninist approach to the matter?

While noting that the proletariat could not have won without employing revolutionary violence against the landed proprietors and capitalists, Lenin wrote that "revolutionary violence was a necessary and lawful method of revolution only in certain periods of its development and only in certain and special circumstances, while organisation of the proletarian masses, organisation of the working people, was and remains a much more deep-rooted, permanent feature of this revolution and the requisite for its victories" (Vol. 29, p. 70, Russ. ed.).

The Chinese theorists maintain: "Anyone with an elementary knowledge of Marxism-Leninism can understand that the so-called state of the whole people is nothing new. Representative bourgeois figures have always called the bourgeois state a 'state of the whole people' or a 'state in which power belongs to all the people'."

A strong argument, indeed! To follow this train of thought, the Communists would also have to abandon the realisation of such slogans as freedom, equality, fraternity and democracy for the sole reason that they were put forward in the bourgeois revolution and subsequently perverted and debased by the bourgeoisie on coming to power. We, on the contrary, think that the true meaning of these slogans should be revived, that these slogans should be carried into practice, and that this is possible only under socialism and communism.

So much for the concept of the state of the whole people.

When Lassalle spoke of such a state, or when imperialist ideologists speak of it today, the Marxists say rightly that their theory is nothing but deception of the people. For what these people have in mind is a state of the whole people in a class society, while such a state cannot exist in a society split into hostile classes. A state that develops out of the dictatorship of the proletariat that has completed its historic mission of building socialism within the country is an entirely different matter. Such a state can be nothing but a body expressing the interests and the will of the whole people.

The Soviet state of the whole people, in which the working class retains its leading role, is continuing the cause begun by the state of the dictatorship of the proletariat. It performs faithfully its internationalist duty to the international working class and all the peoples of the world. The state of the whole people struggles consistently against imperialism. It ensures reliably the defences of its country and contributes to the defence of the whole socialist camp. It develops fraternal co-operation with the socialist countries.

It is typical of the methods of the Chinese leaders in the polemics falsely to depict the conclusion drawn in the Programme of the CPSU about the growing over of the dictatorship of the proletariat into a state of the whole people under certain historical conditions as a rejection of the dictatorship of the proletariat in the period of socialist construction. The Chinese theorists have even gone to the length of saying that the CPSU has "completely flung overboard the quintessence of Marxism-Leninism—the teaching of the dictatorship of the proletariat".

That is a dirty and shameless lie! The Programme of the CPSU clearly states that "Soviet experience has shown that the peoples can achieve socialism only as a result of the socialist revolution and the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat."

The Chinese leaders do not bother to examine the matter in substance and also attempt to malign the conclusion of the Programme of the CPSU on the transformation of the Communist Party of the working class in our country into a party of the whole people. They describe this conclusion as "organisational and moral disarmament of the proletariat", and even as "helping restore capitalism".

Have the Chinese leaders at all tried to substantiate their monstrous accusations against the Party that heads the building of communism? Nothing of the sort! They have merely, without reason and argument, hitched this question to the question of the state. If the state cannot be of the whole people until the complete victory of communism, they say, then the Party cannot be of the whole people either. That is the only argument they adduce.

The working-class party, without which the dictatorship of that class is impracticable, retains its proletarian class character, both formally and in substance, until the final victory of socialism. That is an indisputable fact.

But it is also indisputable that as a political organisation the Party also reflects the changes occurring in the class structure of society. The CPSU has stressed in its Programme that until the complete victory of communism the working class remains the leading force of Soviet society. In the period of full-scale communist construction, too, the Party is the spokesman of the communist ideals and goals of the working class, and of its basic interests .At the same time, it becomes a party of the whole people. This does not happen just because someone wishes it subjectively, but because the working-class goals and ideals become the goals and ideals of all the classes and strata of the people that has built socialism.

While attacking the propositions of the CPSU Programme concerning the historical destiny of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the nature of the state and the working-class party in the Soviet Union, the Chinese theorists ignore the new phenomena of social life and refuse stubbornly to see that the new conclusions and propositions of the CPSU Programme were not framed arbitrarily but express what has become part of life. As they attack the course charted by the Twentieth and Twenty-Second Congresses of the CPSU, they go to the length of questioning the very right of our Party and people to build communism.

The transition of a society that has built socialism to the full-scale building of communism is a historically inevitable and objectively necessary process. It is a vital task for the Soviet people, a task put forward by life. We have all the necessary economic, political and other prerequisites, created thanks to the victory of the socialist system, for its practical implementation. To obstruct this process is to try and stop social progress. The facts have confirmed over and over again that attempts to by-pass historically inevitable stages in social development and attempts to retard and slow down social development are equally wrong and harmful.

The men in Peking are evidently so badly blinded by the factional struggle that they have, in the heat of the fray, unconsciously come into conflict with themselves. Just a few years ago, while proclaiming the "big leap" and "people's communes" policy, the CC, CPC, maintained that "apparently the realisation of communism in our country is not something remote" (Decision of the CC, CPC, August 29, 1958). Consequently, at that time the Chinese leaders thought it quite possible to go over to communist construction in their own country, although the building of socialism was then only beginning in China. Yet today they question communist construction in the USSR, where the final and complete victory of socialism has been achieved.

How can one fail to see the fact that the building of communism in countries that have built socialism accords with the interests of the peoples of all the socialist countries, all the revolutionary forces of our time? Is it not clear that it adds immensely to socialism's force of attraction, that it adds to the economic and defence potential of the socialist camp, and that it creates increasingly more favourably opportunities for greater effective economic, technical, cultural and other assistance and support to all the peoples fighting for socialist construction, for national independence and peace, against imperialism.

How can it be denied that the country marching first to communism is making the advance to communism easier and faster for the world socialist system as a whole, since its peoples are blazing untrodden paths for all mankind, checking how correct they are by their own experience, revealing the difficulties, finding ways and means of combating them, and choosing the best forms and methods of communist construction. It is this course that we consider correct, because it is the only course along which the peoples of the socialist countries can render the most effective support to the working peoples' struggle against imperialism, while cementing the unity and might of the socialist community and carrying into practice the communist ideals.

The Chinese leaders are attacking our Party for having worked out a scientifically reasoned plan of communist construction, for laying the accent in the creative activities of the whole Soviet people on the building of the material and technical basis of communism, and for showing constant care for the improvement of the living and cultural standards of all working people in the country. That is truly monstrous and strange. It appears that the Chinese leaders' conception of socialism and communism, that their practice of building new society, are very far removed from the Marxist-Leninist theory of scientific communism. Neither Marx nor Lenin had anywhere even remotely hinted that the rockbottom tasks of socialist construction may be realised by the method of "leaps" and cavalry charges, overlooking the degree to which the socio-economic and spiritual premises of the advance have matured and ignoring the task of improving the living standard of the people.

If the Chinese leaders want to impose their practice on us as a "universal truth", if they want us to accept for a "model" a society in which violence is idealised and democracy restricted, in which the personality cult thrives and care for the working people is neglected, we will say bluntly: such a "universal truth" and such a "model" do not suit the Soviet people, and, we are sure, will not suit other peoples either.

Socialism, communism, which brings peace, labour, freedom, equality, fraternity and happiness for all the peoples has always been the goal of the communist movement, and will remain so. We follow the theory and practice of scientific communism. We are marching and will always march along the road shown us by Marx, Engels and Lenin.

The Chinese leaders have embarked on the dangerous course of undermining Soviet-Chinese friendship and, naturally, we denounce their wrong actions most strongly. The present attitude of the Chinese leaders is having an unfavourable effect on the whole socialist camp and on the communist movement. It does great harm to China as well.

As regards the CPSU and the Soviet Union, we remain true to the principles of Marxism-Leninism and will undeviatingly perform our internationalist duty. We have taken and will continue to take all the necessary measures aimed at normalising Soviet-Chinese relations and strengthening the friendship of our peoples.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union will continue to work for a normalisation of the situation and for a strengthening of friendship between the CPSU and the Communist Party of China. Our Party is deeply convinced that this friendship will exist, grow and flourish.

VI

The Splitting Activities of the Chinese Leaders within the World Communist Movement

The Chinese leaders have lately stepped up very noticeably their subversive activities aimed at splitting the world Communist movement as well as a number of Marxist-Leninist parties. These activities of theirs have acquired an open character; developing on a wide front, they have become particularly insidious and are unprecedented as to the methods used. The CPC leaders have turned the controversy started by them within the world Communist movement into a weapon of direct political struggle against fraternal parties.

The Chinese leaders have apparently decided to carry through to the end their subversive activity against the Leninist unity of the world Communist movement. In recent days they have openly alleged a split to have become "inevitable". In other words, they have now fully revealed their real aims, which they have had in view for a number of years with regard to the world Communist movement.

The Chinese leaders have pushed their factional struggle to a point where they are severing relations with certain Marxist-Leninist parties, which they arbitrarily describe as "non-existent", while giving the name of "parties" to the little groups of splitters they have formed. They have announced for all to hear that they support the factional groups of splitters which they themselves have set up in a number of countries to fight the Marxist-Leninist parties. In other words, the CPC leaders have openly assumed the responsibility for the infamous activities of all those groups and for their struggle against fraternal parties.

The CPC leadership is plainly out to form under its own aegis a sort of separate international bloc and to set it up against the world Communist movement as an instrument for intensifying the struggle against this movement.

The Chinese representatives on international democratic associations have greatly increased their splitting activity and have openly set out to create separate organisations and disrupt the links between the progressive, democratic forces of different countries and different areas of the globe.

The result is that although the Chinese leaders still utter once in a while hypocritical phrases about unity and solidarity, all their practical steps are in fact aimed at shaking and splitting the world Communist movement. Today the policy and activity of the Chinese leaders are the main danger to the unity of the world Communist movement.

It is in this light that we should appraise the publication in two organs of the CC, CPC, Jenminjihpao and Hungchi, on February 4th last, of a factional article directed against the CPSU and the world Communist movement as a whole, an article which is a kind of platform for splitting the revolutionary movement of the working class.

In that article the Chinese leaders allege that the development of the Communist movement proceeds according to the formula: "Unity —struggle, or even a split—a new unity on a new basis." In so doing, they refer to the laws of dialectics. But any Marxist-Leninist will see that these so-called dialectics are no more than a fresh attempt to mask a splitting policy with pseudo-theoretical talk.

Who can speak of an "inevitable" split today? Only those who are breaking with Marxism-Leninism, with the principles of proletarian internationalism. By contrast, those who have the interests of the great cause of the international working class at heart see no objective reasons for a split in the present-day Communist movement. That movement has a political line tested by the experience of struggle over a long period, a line which has brought the working class and the socialist cause outstanding victories and which enjoys tremendous prestige among the people.

What would a split in the world Communist movement mean in present-day conditions? In our day, such a split would inevitably lead to undermining the unity of the main forces of the world anti-imperialist front—the socialist community, the international working-class movement, the national-liberation movement, and the general democratic movements of the peoples. All that would only benefit the aggressive forces of imperialism and would make it easier for them to attack the positions of the world-wide liberation movement. Obviously, anyone who seeks a split is assuming a tremendous, a frightful historical responsibility.

Ever since the world Communist movement came into being the reactionaries all over the world have been making frantic efforts to split its ranks. Today the Chinese leaders are trying to achieve what imperialist reaction has failed to do.

In the light of the present splitting activities of the Chinese leaders, it is now clearer than ever why, at the Meeting of 1960, the CPC delegates insisted so vehemently on excluding from the Statement the passage regarding the impermissibility of factional activity within the world Communist movement. At that time the fraternal parties unanimously rejected that demand of the Chinese delegation. The Meeting of 1960 said in its Statement that one of the necessary conditions for the Communists achieving their goals is the prevention of all actions likely to undermine the unity of the world Communist movement.

Shortly after the Meeting the Chinese leaders violated that commitment, which they had made together with the other fraternal parties. They even tried—specifically in the article "Workers of All Countries, Unite! Fight Against Our Common Enemy!" (December 1962)—to put on a "theoretical" basis their refusal to carry out a common decision. They put forward the concept of "majority and minority", which claims that the minority has a right not to comply with collectively adopted decisions and to combat the common line approved. This is nothing but a revision of the fundamental organisational principle of Leninism, for Lenin taught that "only the submission of the minority to the majority can be a principle of the working-class movement" (Coll. Works, Vol. 20, p. 354, Russ. ed.).

The majority to which the Peking leaders are now opposed is a majority comprising Communist parties that have brought the working class of their countries to power and are achieving epoch-making victories for socialism. It is a majority which includes Communist parties of every single continent and is marching in the van of the revolutionary struggle.

The Chinese leaders are so blinded by their factionalism that they do not hesitate to describe the Marxist-Leninist parties as nothing more or less than a "fictitious" majority.

That device is by no means new. It was first used by splitters against Lenin; they declared boastfully that some day the majority would follow their lead and then they would recognise its will. Lenin wrote about such people that they "recognise the will of the majority of the class-conscious workers not at the present time but in the future, in that, and only in that, future when the workers will agree with them—the liquidators, Plekhanov and Trotsky" (Coll Works, Vol. 20, p. 451, Russ. ed.).

It follows that splitters at all times resort to the same kind of stratagems in opposing the will of the majority.

Lately, in fighting against the principle of submission of the minority to the majority, the CPC leaders have been the first among the opportunists and splitters whom the world Communist movement has ever encountered to put forward the thesis that the existence of several Communist parties in one and the same country is a "legitimate" thing. From what they say it follows that these parties should fight not so much against the enemies of the working class as among themselves. There is no need here to refute this thoroughly harmful concept at great length, for every politically-conscious worker realises that the unity of the class interests and will of the proletariat, and its ideology and class organisation are embodied in a single and solidly united Marxist-Leninist party. Still, it is worth pointing out once again the stratagems to which the present-day splitters have recourse to bring confusion into the working-class movement and undermine Communist unity.

For this they use a patently fraudulent device, deliberate misinterpretation of Lenin's statements. Here is a typical example.

In his well-known work "Violation of Unity Under Cover of Cries for Unity," Lenin condemns Trotsky's splitting activities, exposes his calumny against the Bolshevik Party and his attempts to disorganise the workers' movement with his propaganda of insubordination of the minority to the will of the majority of workers. Lenin wrote: "Where the majority of class conscious workers have rallied to precise and definite decisions, there is unity of opinion and action, there is Party spirit and a Party ... Now by trying to persuade the workers not to carry out the decisions of that 'whole' which is recognised by the Marxists-*Pravda*ists, Trotsky is trying to disrupt the movement and cause a split." Lenin regarded Trotsky's activities as "splitting activity, in the sense that it is a most impudent violation of the will of the majority of the workers." (Vol. 20, pp. 310, 312).

The authors of the article published in Jenminjihpao and Hungchi magazine on February 4, 1964, cite Lenin's article distorting the position of Lenin who always emphasized that the general proletarian discipline should be obligatory for all and demanded that the minority should submit to the will of the majority of workers. Trying to disorganize the Communist Parties, the Chinese splitters went as far as an outright forgery.

Furthermore, the Chinese leaders obscure so obvious a point as the necessity for a definite international discipline within the Communist movement. They contend that such a discipline is out of the question since we no longer have a centralised organisation of the Comintern type.

But that is a statement by which the CPC betray themselves, probably unwittingly. They do not realise that international Communist discipline in the present conditions does not imply the execution of orders given by someone on top, but the assumption by the Communist parties—of their own free will and from a keen awareness of their internationalist duty—of definite obligations towards the world Communist movement as a whole and towards one another, as well as the consistent fulfilment of these obligations. This is what prompted the fraternal parties to pledge themselves in their Statement of 1960 to adhere strictly to the following principles: to cherish party unity as the apple of their eye; to abide in a spirit of solidarity by the jointly formulated appraisals and conclusions regarding the common tasks to be carried out in the struggle against imperialism and for peace, democracy and socialism; to prevent all actions likely to undermine the unity of the world Communist movement; to support one another and respect the independence and equality of all the Marxist-Leninist parties.

Consistent adherence to the collectively expressed will of the world Communist movement is an indication of the Marxist maturity of the party concerned, of its internationalism, for Marxism-Leninism and internationalism are inseparable.

The Chinese leaders' statements on this point are apparently influenced by their general view on discipline, which they regard not as politically conscious fulfilment of its duty by every contingent of the great alliance of like-minded Communists, but merely as compulsory execution of orders. They are evidently influenced by a practice which is so characteristic of the CPC leaders.

But how foreign that is to the Marxist-Leninist spirit! Lenin, speaking of the Russian Bolsheviks, wrote: "We are proud of the fact that we decide the great questions of the workers' struggle for their emancipation submitting to the international discipline of the revolutionary proletariat, with due regard to the experience of the workers of different countries, to their knowledge and will, and in this way achieve—in deeds, and not in words as in the case of the Renners, Fritz Adlers and Otto Bauers—world-wide unity in the class struggle of the workers for communism" (Coll. Works, Vol. 31, p. 244, Russ. ed.).

What the Chinese leaders are particularly proud of today is their complete disregard for international Communist discipline, their truly anarchist behaviour both in polemics and in their relations with fraternal parties.

At present not only the underlying idea of the "theories" spread by the Chinese leaders with a view to justifying their splitting activities, but the main lines along which their activities are developing in practice, and their ways and methods, have become perfectly clear.

The CPC leaders aim their heaviest blows at the strongest and most authoritative contingents of the world communist movement, that is, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the Communist parties of other socialist countries, and the French, Italian and other parties. They are out to discredit at all costs all the genuinely Marxist-Leninist parties, which enjoy well-earned respect in the world Communist movement and among the masses.

The attitude of the CC, CPC to the Communist parties functioning in the capitalist countries is particularly outrageous. The Chinese leaders are creating many additional difficulties for those parties, which have to work in difficult conditions as it is. They are doing their best to defame the Marxist-Leninist leaderships of those parties and to undermine their prestige. They fling at tried and tested leaders of the working class such insulting epithets as "as faint-hearted as mice", "parrots", "double-dealers", and so on.

They say those things about leaders of the parties which have set an example of heroic struggle against fascism, which today march at the head of the struggle against the monopolies and constitute a major national force. They say those things about militant and esteemed comrades who are fighting against heavy odds and are persecuted. Surely one cannot but resent it when they say that the leaders of the US Communist Party "co-operate with the most reckless of the US imperialists", that the Chilean Communists' position "meets the objectives of US imperialism, which wants to maintain its rule in Latin America", that the leadership of the Communist Party of India is no more than a "clique", and so on.

An idea of what Peking means by proletarian solidarity can be gained from the reaction of the CC CPC to the execution of Salam Adil and other leaders of the Communist Party of Iraq by the Baath nationalists. In their interviews with foreign delegations, the Chinese leaders frankly gloated over the atrocious assassination of the Iraqi comrades. Immediately after the Baathist coup d'état they sought contact with the assassins. It is now clear that the Chinese representatives in Iraq wanted to take advantage of the fact that the Communist Party of Iraq found itself without a leadership and to form a splitter's group there.

The whole of the Chinese propaganda machine—the New China News Agency, information centres, various bulletins, and radio have now been turned against the Marxist-Leninist parties. The Chinese leaders have in effect opened a new ideological front against fraternal parties. Moreover, they do not mind directly borrowing any device, however base, from the anti-Communist arsenal. There is, for example, the falsehood, launched by Chinese propaganda, about the "baton of Moscow" at a wave of which Communist parties are supposed to "turn" one way or the other. This falsehood is an affront both to the fraternal parties which staunchly champion the national interests of their peoples and to the CPSU, to which all interference in the internal affairs of other parties is alien. It is nothing but a new version of that old fable of imperialist propaganda about the "hand of Moscow". In the past it was used against Lenin and the Comintern by Right Social-Democratic leaders. Today it has become a weapon of Peking.

A recent development which may be called the height of the splitting activity of the Chinese leaders is their recruitment of adherents in the ranks of fraternal parties, and the formation of factional groups composed of them. In its letter of June 14, 1963, the CPC leadership already threatened fraternal parties that should they reject the propositions of Peking, they would be replaced by new people who "are or are not members of that party". Facts of recent date show that the Chinese leaders are now carrying out that threat by trying to saddle the working-class movement in some countries with leaders from among all sorts of renegades, turncoats and adventurers. The CPC leaders are trying to make the splitters' groups they form out of those renegades their main weapon in the struggle against the Marxist-Leninist parties.

To date anti-party groups of renegades and splitters have been set up, with help and support from Peking, in Belgium, Brazil, Australia, Ceylon, Britain and some other countries. Some of those groups number less than ten members and some others comprise a few dozen of people. This does not, however, embarrass the Chinese leaders, for, on orders from Peking, those groups shout loudly and in unison, pouring lies and slander upon the world Communist movement and the Marxist-Leninist parties. The ringleaders of those groups unexpectedly come into possession of large sums of money. They found newspapers and magazines and begin to publish all manner of slanderous writings, and often open shops of their own to sell Chinese propaganda productions.

The political complexion of the members of those groupings bespeaks the Chinese leaders' complete lack of principle. These as a rule are opportunists, unstable elements expelled from Communists parties for advocating anti-Marxist views, for factional activity or for immoral behaviour, or ambitious men seeking a career, political "weathercocks" and the like. Members of anti-Party groupings in some countries have displayed rightist opportunist tendencies. There are people with a shady record and all kinds of adventurers acting in the splitters' groups in Austria, Chile and the United States.

It stands to reason that fraternal parties refuse to put up with factional groups and throw them out of their ranks. Whenever this happens, Peking "takes to task" the fraternal party concerned, which it accuses of nothing more or less than "using unlawful methods". The Chinese leaders declare expelled splitters to be "true revolutionaries" and "courageous fighters", although all that their "struggle" boils down to is the writing of high-sounding "manifestoes" against the Communist Party concerned. They make frequent trips to Peking, where they are received with great pomp and where their long articles peddling calumnies are published.

The meaning of the clamour raised in Peking over factional groups has become perfectly obvious in recent months. The Chinese leaders have revealed it themselves. A very short time ago they widely advertised a get-together of renegades in Belgium, which termed itself nothing more or less than a "national conference", and passed a ridiculous resolution to "re-establish (sic!) the Communist Party of Belgium" and "condemn the anti-Party behaviour of the former (sic!) Central Committee of the Communist Party of Belgium". As for the Chinese leaders, they base themselves on that fiction to describe the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Belgium elected by the Party Congress as the "former" CC, as if it were Peking and not the working class of the country concerned that founded a Communist party. In the same way the CPC leaders "abolished" the central committees of certain other Communist parties, such as that of Ceylon.

We must say plainly that there has never been anything like that in the history of the communist movement. It has never occurred to a Communist party to declare wretched groups of splitters expelled from another Communist party to be the real Party and to describe the real Communist Party as a "has-been". The Chinese leaders, who talk so loudly about equality and non-interference by parties in one another's internal affairs, today lay claim to the role of "supreme judges" in the Communist movement who shall decide for the Communist parties concerned matters bearing on their internal life.

The splitters' groups set up by Peking have no roots in the working-class movement and in the general democratic struggle of the masses, nor can they have any. They are outside the world Communist movement and no politically-conscious worker will ever agree to have anything to do with them. They have been brought into existence in an absolutely artificial manner, being a product of the splitting activities of Peking. It should be noted that their rise has been very well received by the ruling circles of the capitalist countries, which see them as a gratuitous "fifth column" in the working-class movement.

At present the leaders of the CC, CPC, are carrying things further, plainly intending to form, as a counterweight to the world Communist movement, a bloc of their supporters with its own platform and group discipline, and with headquarters in Peking. These plans were given away as early as the end of 1962 by Mehmet Shehu, who said that a bloc of parties loyal to Marxism-Leninism was being formed with the Chinese Party at the head.

Why is that bloc being set up? Anyone should realise that its aim is not to fight for the objectives of the working-class movement against world imperialism, for the very idea of the bloc contains the seeds of a split and, consequently, of a weakening of the working class. That bloc is being set up to fight against the Marxist-Leninist parties, against the world Communist movement, for the benefit of the special aims of the CC, CPC leadership.

The Chinese leaders have extended their policy of splitting the world Communist movement to the international front of the democratic forces. For several years now they have been using the congresses and conferences of peace fighters and of women's, youth and other international associations for disruptive sorties. This was the case at the conferences of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organisation, the Women's Congress in Moscow, the session of the World Peace Council in Warsaw, and at other international forums. Juggling with "revolutionary phrases", the Chinese leaders try to impose on all those organisations tasks and functions alien to them, to discredit and declare unnecessary the principal slogans and demands which gave rise to those democratic movements. Obviously, the Chinese representatives' sectarian position is directed towards alienating from those movements large sections of the population holding different views and towards narrowing the mass base of the general democratic struggle.

Comrades, the world Communist movement has become the most influential political force of today. In waging a grim struggle against imperialist reaction, for the interests of the working class and all working people, for peace, democracy, national independence and socialism, it has made great progress, considerably increased its membership and scored outstanding victories. The post-war period has seen the rise of dozens of new Communist parties and today there is not a corner on the globe where Communists are not carrying the great ideas of Marxism-Leninism to the people. The last decade has been particularly eventful for the world Communist movement. It is in this decade that the movement has, in eliminating the harmful effects of the personality cult, become much more active in its creative thought and practical work, which it has brought even closer to reality, to the needs and expectations of the mass of the people.

Against that historical background, the harm of the splitting activities of the Chinese leaders, as well as the utter hopelessness of their attempts to lead world communism astray from its Leninist path and to make it subservient to their own designs, are particularly obvious.

It would be wrong, however, to underrate the danger of the factional activities of the CC, CPC. The Chinese leaders pin their hopes on all sorts of immature and unstable elements, and also on those who are unaffected by the new spirit which has permeated the Communist movement during the last decade, and who cling to the practices of the personality cult and are still fettered by the dogmatic and doctrinaire patterns implanted by it.

The Chinese leadership's factional methods are also adopted by all manner of renegades and turncoats, who are willing to fight against communism under any flag.

Furthermore, the Chinese leaders clearly want to profit by the real discontent of the people at the anti-popular, reactionary policies of the ruling classes of the capitalist countries. In our day, when hundreds upon hundreds of millions of people, including people who are at sea in politics and lack experience, are joining in an active political struggle, the "ultra-Left" revolutionary phrases in which the Chinese leaders couch their adventuristic concepts are likely to bring a certain response. This applies, above all, to those countries where there is no industrial proletariat or where it is small, and where petty-bourgeois ideology exercises considerable influence, while the theoretical maturity of revolutionary leaders is not always up to the mark.

To disguise their anti-Leninist line and their splitting activities, the Chinese leaders profess to be fighting "modern revisionism". They label as "revisionist" the Marxist-Leninist parties and exalt themselves as the "true" revolutionaries. They expect that they can in this way mislead people who are unfamiliar with the true history of the struggle of the world Communist movement against Right and "Left" opportunism, and are inclined to assimilate superficial patterns of revolutionary struggle rather than to master the substance of our great doctrine.

We know well from the history of the communist movement that irresponsible accusations of revisionism have repeatedly been levelled at the proponents of creative Marxism by all kinds of dogmatists and petty-bourgeois revolutionaries. In the autumn of 1920, for example, G. Gorter, a Dutch "Left" Communist expelled from the Comintern, wrote in his Open Letter to Lenin, in reply to Lenin's book "Left-wing Communism", an Infantile Disorder: "You and the Third International are now doing what Social-Democrats did in the past... In accordance with the development of the working-class movement in Western Europe, there exist two trends: radical and opportunist. You, however, Comrade Lenin, support the opportunist trend... From a Marxist leader you are turning into an opportunist leader."

How many people recall today those wretched sallies against the greatest revolutionary in world history?

The methods used by the Chinese splitters cannot deceive the Marxists-Leninists of the world. The absolute majority of the Marxist-Leninist parties has openly condemned the anti-Leninist, adventuristic policy of the leaders of the CC, CPC. Numerous documents, statements by prominent leaders of the world Communist movement, and the Party press have strongly criticised the harmful propositions and factional, disruptive actions of the Chinese leaders. All this means that, taken as a whole, the world Communist movement today adheres to the only position that is correct, namely, the Marxist-Leninist position.

Our Party, which was reared by Lenin, will continue, together with the other fraternal parties, to fight unrelentingly against all opportunist actions both from the Right and from the "Left", for the unity of the fraternal parties and all the contingents of the world revolutionary movement, and for the purity of the all-conquering Marxist-Leninist doctrine.

VII

The Danger of the Petty-Bourgeois, Nationalist, Neo-Trotskyite Deviation

Soviet Communists, as all other Marxists-Leninists in the world, cannot limit themselves to a criticism and political assessment of the erroneous, anti-Leninist views of the CPC leadership. Each of us inevitably asks the question: How has it happened that the leaders of a party like the CPC, which has considerable experience of revolutionary struggle and of building a new society, have taken the road of struggle against the world Communist movement? Who are we dealing with in the person of the CPC leadership?

The experience of our Party and of the whole international working-class movement shows that on many occasions Leninism had come to grips with views and propositions such as are now being trumpeted by the Chinese leadership. Naturally, the present advocates of these views do not simply repeat what their predecessors said. They adapt old ideas to new conditions and to their own requirements.

Lenin, as we know, pointed out that Bolshevism grew, gained strength and became steeled chiefly in the struggle against Right-wing opportunism. "This was," he wrote, "naturally, the principal enemy of Bolshevism within the working-class movement". At the same time he emphasised the importance of another aspect of the experience of Bolshevism, about which, he noted, much too little was known abroad. "Bolshevism," he wrote in 'Left-Wing Communism', an Infantile Disorder, "grew up, took shape and became steeled in a drawn-out struggle against petty-bourgeois revolutionism, which smacks of anarchism or borrows something from it, which departs in all essentials from the conditions and requirements of a consistent proletarian class struggle" (Coll. Works, Vol. 31. pp. 15—16).

It is noteworthy that the Chinese leaders, who love to refer relevantly and irrelevantly, to examples of past ideological differences and draw historical parallels, pass over in complete silence this aspect of Bolshevik experience. That is not accidental, for each word that Lenin directed against representatives of petty-bourgeois revolutionism or, as he ironically called it, petty-bourgeois "revolutionarism", is directed at the present ideological and political concepts and propositions of the CPC leadership.

A comprehensive characteristation is given of petty-bourgeois revolutionism in Lenin's numerous works, in the decisions of our Party and in the documents of the Communist International. Lenin saw its sources in the special position of the petty proprietor, who easily goes over to "extreme revolutionism" but is unable to display self-control, organisation, discipline and staunchness and is inclined to swing from one extreme to another,

Everybody knows of the struggle Bolshevism waged against the Socialist-Revolutionaries, a party "which more than any other," as Lenin noted, "showed a tendency to go over to petty-bourgeois revolutionism" (Coll. Works, Vol. 31, p. 16). We cannot help but recall that the Socialist-Revolutionaries rejected the idea that the working class plays the leading role and tried to prove that only the peasant movement is the true socialist movement.

From time to time, particularly at sharp turns in history, petty-bourgeois vacillation made itself felt in the ranks of the proletarian parties as well. Lenin repeatedly pointed out that the proletariat was not insured against the penetration of petty-bourgeois ideology and prejudices into its ranks. Joining the proletarian parties the best of the petty-bourgeois revolutionaries re-educate themselves, seriously study Marxism and in the end become true revolutionaries. Others are either too slow or incapable of learning anything from the proletarian party "except a few words and 'striking' slogans learnt by rote..." (Coll. Works, Vol. 16, pp. 44—45).

Our Party had to combat "leftist" petty-bourgeois vacillation most of all after taking over power, during the early years of the development of the Soviet state. We know the relentless struggle that Lenin waged against "Left-wing Communists", the "workers' opposition", Trotskyism and the "ultra-leftist" trend in the then young Communist movement.

Allow me to remind you of the struggle against the "Left-wing Communists" in the period the Brest Peace was concluded, when they attempted to foist upon the Soviet Republic the disastrous adventurist tactics of a "revolutionary war". Lenin held that despite their clamorous revolutionary talk, the "Left-wing Communists" based their views on stark pessimism and utter despair (Coll. Works, Vol. 27, p. 51, Russ. ed.). As regards the objective role played by the "Left-wing Communists" at that time, Lenin, addressing them, said bluntly: "By your objective role you are the weapon of imperialist provocation. While your subjective 'psychology' is that of an infuriated petty bourgeois who swaggers and boasts and yet is fully aware that the proletariat is right..." (Coll. Works, Vol. 27, p. 297, Russ. ed.).

In the situation that has now arisen in the international Communist movement special mention must be made of the acute struggle that our Party waged against Trotskyism. Trotskyism was a clearly expressed petty-bourgeois deviation. It laid false claim to being a more "leftist", a more "revolutionary" trend than Bolshevism. While proclaiming themselves the "true" champions of the world revolution, Trotsky and his supporters in actual fact opposed Leninism. Moreover, Trotskyism was a negation of the Bolshevik Party, of the unity of its ranks. Factionalism comprised the "soul" of Trotskyism. The Trotskyites joined hands not only with the small factional groups within the Comintern but also with organisations, groups and individuals that had never belonged to Communist parties, and also with enemies and traitors expelled from their ranks.

Do we have to recall all these facts? Yes, comrades, we have to, in order to take into account the lessons of past struggles against Leninism.

Do the Chinese theoriticians' present concepts not remind us of many of the ideas of the petty-bourgeois trends that were defeated by Leninism long ago? Only a petty-bourgeois "ultra"-revolutionary can regard the policy of peaceful coexistence between states with different social systems as a "renunciation" of the struggle against imperialism, a "rejection" of the revolution. He alone welcomes the thesis of the "revolutionary war" being the "last, decisive means" of putting an end to the contradiction between the two social systems. Only a petty-bourgeois "arch"-revolutionary can demand that revolution be started "at once" and "everywhere" without taking into account concrete conditions and the balance of forces. He alone can oppose the utilisation of the peaceful road of revolution because his only criterion of "revolutionism" is the use of armed force regardless of whether circumstances require it or not.

It is quite understandable that having steered this course, the Chinese leaders have naturally come down to borrowing many of their ideas and concepts from the ideological arsenal of Trotskyism in the same way as they have inherited from it their factional, splitting methods of struggle against Marxist-Leninist parties.

Yes, comrades, it must be said openly that the entire range of the CPC leadership's theoretical and political views are in many ways a rehash of Trotskyism, which has long ago been thrown overboard by the international revolutionary movement.

What in actual fact are the views of the Chinese leaders on the questions of war and peace? Nothing but a repetition under new conditions of the Trotskyite slogan of "neither war nor peace".

Or take the CC, CPC leadership's active opposition to economic competition with capitalism. Is there anything new in it? No, it is merely a repetition of the old Trotskyite line of rejecting peaceful economic development and going over to the tactics of "revolutionry war", of giving the world revolution a "push" by armed force.

That, of course, was the real meaning behind the Trotskyite theory of "permanent revolution". The struggle against Trotskyism on this issue was of historic significance. The future of the world's first

Land of Socialism, the future of the entire world revolutionary movement depended on the outcome of this struggle. What would have happened had our Party adopted that line? It would have found itself helpless in the face of world imperialism and would have fallen easy prey to it in the event of an armed attack.

Properly speaking, the dispute the Chinese leaders have started concerns the same question of whether to take the road of "revolutionary" adventures or to adhere to the Leninist policy of strengthening the economic and political might of the world system of socialism and developing the revolutionary movement in the capitalist countries and the national liberation struggle of the peoples, taking full account of Lenin's theory of the revolution being the result of the aggravation of internal class contradictions in each country.

The kinship with Trotskyism is no less striking also in the Chinese theses on the danger of "bourgeois degeneration" in the socialist countries. In reply to these fabrications we can say that they are not new, that our Party has heard them before. They are a repetition under new conditions of the Trotskyite slander about the "degeneration" of the USSR into a "Thermidor" state.

Besides, do we not find features of Trotskyism in the Chinese concepts which exaggerate the role of force, of coercion in the revolution and in the building of socialism?

Furthermore, compare the views of the CPC leaders with the "ideas" of modern Trotskyism. Perhaps some people think that the Chinese theory about the regions of Asia, Africa and Latin America being the "storm-centres of the world revolution" is new? No, it is almost a word for word repetition of one of the basic theses of present-day Trotskyism. The decisions of the so-called IV (Trotskyite) International contain the words: "... As a result of the successive defeats of the two major revolutionary waves in 1919-23 and 1943-48 and the weaker wave of 1934-37, the focus of the world revolution has for the present shifted to the colonial world."

Here you have the source of the Chinese leadership's political wisdom.

In the writings of modern Trotskyites one can find other "ultra"-revolutionary phrases, which are reproduced almost word for word by the Chinese press and given out as so-called "revolutionary principles". Peaceful co-existence of countries with different social systems, the Trotskyites vociferate, "is not only impossible but also harmful to the working-class of all countries" because it helps "to strengthen the positions of capitalism and weakens the positions of socialism". They boastfully declare that "only the person who is fearlessly prepared to face the consequences of the nuclear war being hatched by capitalism" can be considered a true revolutionary, and so on and so forth.

After this is it surprising that in addressing the CPC leaders the ringleaders of modern Trotskyism say to them (as was said last July by Posadas, one of the heads of Trotskyism in Latin America): "Comrades Chinese, you have no right to maintain that all the questions you are putting forward as revolutionary conclusions are the result solely of your own theoretical and political works. They are the conclusions of the IV International."

Small wonder that the Trotskyites openly link up their hopes for a revival of their long-withered movement with the present political line of the Chinese leadership. "The political stand taken by the Communist Party of China," states the so-called "Manifesto" of the sixth congress of their "International", "indicates tremendous possibilities, which open a field of activity such as Trotskyism never had before."

The Chinese leaders pretend they do not notice all this. They have evidently reasoned along the following lines: "Present-day Trotskyism is a little-known trend and we can use its ideas by giving them a 'Sinified' form." But the truth will out. No matter how the Chinese leadership strive to conceal the real source of their ideas they cannot hide the coincidence of their views with those of the Trotskyites, past and present.

Like the Trotskyites, the Chinese leader are demanding freedom for factions and groupings in the Communist movement and using their methods for subversive activity in the movement, Does anyone think we cannot recognise in the malicious personal attacks of Chinese propaganda against leaders of the CPSU and the Communist parties of France, Italy, the USA, India and other countries the familiar "handwriting" of the Trotskyites, who dreamed of finding ways of casting still more vicious slander at popular leaders of the working class?

The modern Trotskyites do not hide their jubilation over these actions of the CPC leaders. In a statement published in Paris at the close of last year, the joint secretariat of the Trotskyite "International" assured the Chinese leaders that it "would support them" in the struggle against the CPSU and also against the Indian, US, French, Italian and other Communist parties. At a meeting in the summer of 1963 the Executive Committee of this "International" issued a special resolution approving the "historical mission of joining the Chinese and working for a united front between the IV International and the Chinese comrades".

These facts speak for themselves. The logic of their struggle with the CPSU and the world Communist movement is bringing the CPC leaders ever closer to Trotskyism, the bitterest enemy of Marxism-Leninism.

One must say that at one time the Chinese leaders themselves saw the danger of petty-bourgeois pressure on the Communist Party of China. "Our Party," Mao Tse-tung, for example, said, "is not only surrounded by this broad social stratum from without, but people with a petty-bourgeois background form a huge majority within it as well . . . Petty-bourgeois ideology of all shades frequently finds expression in our Party" (Mao Tse-tung, Vol. 4, pp. 386—387, Russ. ed.). In the CPC, he said elsewhere, petty-bourgeois ideology finds expression in "dashing now to the left, now to the right, in a weakness for leftist revolutionary verbiage and slogans, in sectarian exclusiveness and adventurism".

The Chinese leaders used to be right in what they wrote. But now they have ceased talking about the danger of petty-bourgeois degeneration. Is it because petty-bourgeois ideology has taken the upper hand in their own views, in their political line, in the methods of their activity?

Yet in a country like China, as in tsarist Russia, with its huge preponderance of non-proletarian strata among the population, Communists must be especially vigilant with regard to the penetration of petty-bourgeois views and traditions into the ranks of the working class. Under Lenin's leadership our Party successfully coped with this task. From its very inception it was a party of the militant working class, which was linked up with large-scale industry and had extensive training in the proletarian class struggle. The fact that Lenin and the Bolsheviks drew on the experience of the entire international working-class movement and firmly adhered to the principles and ideals of the scientific socialism of Marx and Engels was of fundamental importance.

The CPC leaders evidently lack sufficient Marxist-Leninist grounding to stand firm against the pressure of petty-bourgeois elements and uphold the line of proletarian socialism. This alone can explain the fact that petty-bourgeois ideology laid its imprint on both their internal and foreign policy.

We would not have liked to touch upon the question of the internal policy of the CPC leadership. But we are compelled to do so, because the adventurist line of the Chinese leaders in the international arena is linked up with their mistakes in domestic policy.

Marxists-Leninists of all countries now know the result of the so-called policy of the "big leap" and people's communes. One cannot fail to see in this policy "leftist" attemps to "leap" over necessary stages of social development.

Our Party has always given the Chinese Communists due credit for the democratic and socialist transformations effected after the triumph of the Revolution. In the period 1949—57, when it pursued a realistic line, utilized the experience of the other socialist countries and relied on their support, the Communist Party of China achieved considerable successes in promoting China's economic, social and political development. Soviet people sincerely rejoiced over these successes.

But in 1958 this line was suddenly revised and replaced with the so-called policy of three red banners—of the general line, the big leap and the people's communes. The Chinese leaders decided to accomplish in a few years the tasks for which back in 1956 it was felt three or more five-year plans were needed. It was decided to increase the gross industrial output 6.5 times (with an average annual increase rate of 45 per cent!) and the total agricultural output 2.5 times (with an average annual increase rate of 20 per cent!) in five years (1958-62).

These plans were drawn up without any economic substantiation whatsoever, without taking the country's real possibilities into account.

The people's communes that were set up in the countryside had the job of ensuring the "leap to communism" in 3—4 or 5—6 years.

Everybody knows what came of these experiments. The CPR's economy found itself hurled several years back. The line of the "three red banners" led to a serious disorganisation of the entire national economy, to a sharp retardation of the rate of industrialisation and affected the people's standard of living.

In saying this, we are, naturally, not gloating over the failures of the Chinese Communists. Like them, we are distressed by the difficulties that have fallen to the lot of the fraternal Chinese people. Our sole purpose in speaking of these facts is to show what a departure from tested Leninist principles of socialist construction leads to.

In analysing the present positions of the Chinese leadership one cannot fail to see that they also stem from the increasingly more open nationalistic, great-power aspirations that are particularly evident in the foreign policy of the CPC leaders. History knows of many cases when vociferous "revolutionarism" went hand in hand with the most blatant nationalism. Lenin pointed out time and again that the social and economic conditions giving rise to the petty proprietor impart especial stability to one of "the most deep-seated of petty-bourgeois prejudices, namely: prejudices of national egoism, of national narrow-mindedness" (Coll. Works, Vol. 31, p. 128, Russ. ed.).

Facts show that nationalism is gaining the upper hand more and more in the entire policy of the Chinese leaders, that it is becoming the mainspring of their actions. This manifested itself during the period of the "big leap", which was obviously planned as an attempt to overtake all the socialist countries and occupy a dominating position in the world socialist system.

Later these tendencies became more and more pronounced. This found expression in such actions of the Chinese Government as the artificial fanning of nationalistic passions around frontier issues, the behaviour of the CPC leaders during the Caribbean crisis and the stand of the Chinese Government in the nuclear problem.

These and other facts reveal the complete discrepancy between what the Chinese leaders say and what they do. It is becoming increasingly clear that the "leftist" talk and prescriptions are intended solely for "export", for the Communist parties of other countries. As for themselves, when matters concern practical steps in the international arena, the CPC leaders prefer to act from anything but positions of revolutionary struggle against imperialism. It is extremely surprising why at present Chinese propaganda reduces the entire struggle against imperialism solely to a struggle with the US, by-passing its allies—the Japanese, West German and French imperialists. Are they, perhaps, looking for partners among the monopolistic groups of these countries for the struggle against what they term as "modern revisionism"?

Great suspicion is evoked by the Chinese leaders' so-called theory of an "intermediate zone", which regards West Germany, Britain, France and Japan as countries held in thralldom by US imperialism, thereby embellishing the imperialists of Britain, France, Japan and, in particular, West Germany, glossing over their aggressive nature and the threat they constitute for the socialist countries, the national liberation movement and world peace. The 1960 Statement lays stress on the special threat to the cause of peace from West-German imperialism and sets the Communist parties the task of intensifying the struggle against its aggressive aspirations. From their own experience the Soviet people know how dangerous this imperialist vulture is. West-German imperialism is no longer a mere satellite of US imperialism. Relying on a huge economic potential, which considerably exceeds the potential possessed by the whole of nazi Germany, West-German imperialism has created a large war machine and is increasingly setting the tone in Nato.

British, French and Japanese imperialism are likewise exceedingly dangerous. This is seen from, say, the example of recent events in Cyprus, in East Africa, Gabon and South-east Asia, where the British and French imperialists are resorting to armed force to suppress the national-liberation movement.

The CPSU holds that side by side with a determined struggle against US imperialism, the major international exploiter and policeman, all anti-imperialist forces must also carry on a struggle against the aggressive, reactionary forces of British, French, West-German and Japanese imperialism. The Chinese theory of an "intermediate zone", on the other hand, objectively whitewashes the imperialists of Britain, France, West Germany and Japan, and is hence to their advantage.

It must be said that the ruling circles of the imperialist powers have "divined" the secret of Chinese policy. They have understood that the "revolutionary phrase-mongering" of the Chinese leaders is not at all directed against imperialism. In effect, the purpose of this phrase-mongering is to screen a savage struggle against the CPSU and the world Communist movement and in no way threatens the imperialists. That accounts for the change that has come about in the policy of the leading capitalist states with regard to China.

We shall not hide the fact that following all these manoeuvres of the Chinese leaders, we, like all other Marxists-Leninists in the world, are justifiably alarmed at the dangerous path onto which the Chinese leaders are dragging their great country. There is the danger that in pursuing their erroneous, anti-Leninist line, the Chinese leaders will virtually land themselves in the same boat with reactionary, bellicose elements of imperialism, as has already happened in connection with the CPR Government's refusal to sign the Moscow partial test-ban treaty.

The nationalist policy of the CPC leaders has nothing in common with the actual national interests of the fraternal Chinese nation. Most of all, it is the peoples of the socialist countries that can be sincere allies of the peoples of China. The peoples of China have a vested interest in the consolidation of the world socialist system, in an enduring alliance with all the anti-imperialist forces. In that lies the earnest of the rapid advance of People's China along the socialist road.

It is impossible to comprehend the present attitude of the CC, CPC, both in the country and internationally, unless it is viewed in the context of the situation within the Communist Party of China and in the country itself that has arisen due to the personality cult. It must not be overlooked that the Mao Tse-tung personality cult is having an increasingly negative effect on the activities of the Chinese Communist Party.

For many years Chinese propaganda has been drumming it into everybody's head that Mao Tse-tung's ideas are the "supreme embodiment of Marxism-Leninism" and that our epoch is the "epoch of Mao Tse-tung". By asserting that the brunt of generalising the historical tasks of our time has fallen completely upon the shoulders of Mao Tse-tung alone, Chinese propaganda claims that Mao Tse-tung's ideas are the Marxism-Leninism of our epoch, "the scientific theory of socialist revolution and the building of socialism and communism".

It is now perfectly clear that the CPC leadership is striving to spread the Mao Tse-tung personality cult to the whole world communist movement, so that the leader of the CPC should, like Stalin in his day, sit aloft, God-like, above all the Marxist-Leninist parties and settle arbitrarily all matters of their policy and work. The ideology and practice of the personality cult largely explain the appearance of hegemonic ambitions among the Chinese leaders.

But history does not repeat itself. What was once a tragedy will be no more than a farce if it occurs a second time. The CPC leaders ought to know that the Communist movement will never allow the personality cult, which is alien to Marxism-Leninism, to recur, for it has paid too dearly for it in the past. The Communist movement and the personality cult are incompatible.

The Twentieth Congress of the CPSU has put an end to this alien phenomenon in our Party once and for all, and has created conditions in which the things that occurred in the personality cult period can never be repeated.

The Party has completely restored the Leninist principles in Party and state affairs. It has restored and developed the principles of socialist democracy. The course charted by the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU was fully supported in the Declaration and Statement of the Moscow Meetings. It is clear, therefore, that denouncing the struggle against the personality cult ideology is tantamount to departing from the agreed line of the Communist movement, that it is tantamount to impelling the Communist movement deliberately towards an incorrect path, a path foreign to Marxism-Leninism and the nature of the socialist system.

Yet that is exactly what the Chinese leaders are doing. They have undertaken the defence of the Stalin personality cult and have declared that fighting against it means "overthrowing Marxism-Leninism" and "stigmatising the dictatorship of the proletariat".

However, it is the personality cult that leads to perversions of important aspects in the dictatorship of the proletariat, which is the highest form of democracy, a democracy for the working people. In Lenin's time the democratic principles of party and state life and socialist legality were always strictly observed. He fought against anti-party groups and trends with Party methods, drawing on the support of the Party rank and file. A different method predominated during the Stalin personality cult period—the method of physical elimination of all Party workers whom Stalin suspected of disagreeing with his views. What is more, the abuses and repressions against tested and faithful Party and government workers were particularly intensified at a time when the struggle against the opposition was over and socialism had won. Stalin turned the "avenging sword" of the dictatorship of the proletariat, intended to strike at the enemies, against the cadres of the Communist Party and the socialist state.

But it is evidently this very aspect of Stalin's activities that the Chinese leaders like most—since they identify this incorrect method of leadership with the dictatorship of the proletariat. In spite of the now widely known facts testifying to Stalin's abuse of power during the personality cult period, in spite of Stalin's departure from Lenin's precepts on certain important issues, the Chinese leaders place Stalin on a pedestal, depicting him as the "great continuer" of Lenin's cause. The Chinese leaders speak and write about the wholesale repressions during the personality cult period as though they were no more than slight "excesses".

This policy of the Chinese leaders augurs no good to the people. It smacks of the ideology and ethics not of Marxists, not of Leninists, but of people who bank on methods of violence and suppression. The Chinese leaders ought to ask the Soviet Communists, the workers, peasants and the intelligentsia who experienced the evil consequences of the personality cult what they think of the attempts to vindicate the perversions and mistakes made by Stalin and of restoring the personality cult. They would get only one answer: never again!

Our Party has routed the Molotov, Kaganovich and Malenkov anti-Party group. This group resisted the abolition of the personality cult, not the least consideration being that many of its members were also responsible for the wholesale persecution of guiltless people at a time when they themselves stood at the country's helm together with Stalin.

The crimes perpetrated by Stalin and the subsequently exposed members of the anti-Party group against prominent leaders of the Communist Party and the Soviet state, have now come to light. But that is not all. It has been learned that Molotov, together with Stalin, sanctioned the execution also of the wives of these leaders entered in the so-called "List No. 4 of the Wives of the Enemies of the People", listing the names of V. A. Dybenko-Sedyakina, E. S. Kosyor, A. I. Chubar, E. E. Eikhe-Rubtsova, and others. In many cases, Molotov tried, as the saying goes, to be "more papal than the Pope". In one of the documents endorsing long prison terms for a large group of wives of arrested functionaries, Molotov wrote "capital punishment" against one of the names in the list.

Do the Chinese leaders, perhaps, wish to restore these inhuman practices? Is that why they show such sympathy for people who have been expelled from our Party?

In the matter of the personality cult the Chinese leaders have departed not only from the conclusions and propositions of the world Communist movement, but also from their own previous declarations.

It may be recalled that in 1956 and 1957 Mao Tse-tung and Liu Shao-chi in their speeches and articles about the historical experience of the dictatorship of the proletariat approved by the Political Bureau of the CC, CPC, highly commended the efforts of the CPSU to eliminate the consequences of the personality cult. At the Meeting of Communist and Workers' Parties in 1957, Mao Tse-tung said: "In the past four or five years since Stalin's death the situation has improved considerably in the Soviet Union in the sphere of both domestic policy and foreign policy. This shows that the line represented by Comrade Khrushchov is more correct and that the opposition to this line is incorrect." At that time the Chinese leaders rightly said that none but "the reactionaries of the whole world" could oppose the line of the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU.

Yet now the Chinese leaders are defending the personality cult in pursuance of their own political designs. They are defending Stalin's distortions and mistakes largely because they are themselves implanting the Mao Tse-tung personality cult.

The present political line of the CPC leaders again shows the world Communist movement and the politically conscious workers of the whole world how pernicious are the practices of the personality cult, and what harm they inflict on the interests of the peoples, on the great struggle against imperialism, for socialism. Affirmation of the personality cult ideology in the Communist movement would lead it into a cul-de-sac and do grave harm to the socialist and communist cause.

Therefore, an examination of the sources of the present anti-Leninist disruptive policy of the CPC leadership leads to the conclusion that the world Communist movement faces the real danger of a petty-bourgeois nationalist deviation disguised by "Left" phraseology. The danger of this deviation is all the greater, since we are dealing with leaders of a party in power which has at its disposal a large state machine and the means of ideological indoctrination.

It is clear that the CPSU, like all the other Marxist-Leninist parties, cannot but take measures in order to attenuate as much as possible the harm that this petty-bourgeois deviation may inflict on the world Communist movement.

VIII

For Unity of the World Communist Movement on the Basis of Marxist-Leninist Principles

Comrades, our Party has every right to say that we have done, and are still doing everything in our power to overcome the differences and to resorte co-operation between the CPC and the CPSU, to strengthen the friendship between the CRP and the Soviet Union and to cement the unity of the world Communist movement. In spite of the inadmissible methods of debate used by the leaders of the CPC, in spite of their open struggle against the CPSU and other fraternal parties, our Party has shown the maximum of restraint, the maximum sense of responsibility, and the maximum concern for the cohesion of the communist ranks.

In the last few years, acting on the initiative of Comrade Khrushchov, the CC CPSU and the Soviet Government undertook many practical measures aimed at uniting our parties and at preserving and expanding cooperation with the CPR in the political, economic, scientific, technical and cultural spheres. If these measures have failed to yield results, the blame rests entirely with the Chinese leaders.

When the Chinese leaders began their unveiled attacks on our Party, the CC CPSU addressed several letters to the CC CPC, pointing out that the fundamental interests of the Socialist and Communist cause require that our Parties should, as before, in spite of the existing differences, pursue an agreed policy in all matters of principle. We suggested stopping the needless controversy over questions on which opinions differ, and to cease making any public statements, which only tend to deepen the differences. The letters put forward concrete proposals envisaging coordinated actions in world affairs, greater exchange of foreign policy information and agreed action in the international democratic organisations, etc.

In October 1962, Comrade Khrushchov asked the Chinese Ambassador to the USSR, who was returning home, to tell the Chinese leaders that we proposed to "abandon all arguments and differences, to stop discussing who is right and who is wrong, not to rake up the past, and to begin our relations over again with a clean slate".

Although the Chinese press had by then published a whole series of articles containing gross attacks on the CPSU and other fraternal parties, Comrade Khrushchov declared in a conversation with the new Chinese Ambassador in January 1963 that "we want to return to our previous fraternal relations and are ready to do everything for this purpose".

But the leaders of the CPC invariably responded to these acts of good will on the part of the Central Committee of our Party by deliberately doing everything possible to aggravate the differences, and mounted fresh attacks on the CPSU, the Soviet Government and the general line of the world Communist movement.

In the struggle against the CPSU and its Leninist policy, the Chinese leaders are concentrating their fire mainly against Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchov. To be sure, they cannot fail to see that it is Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchov who stands in the van of the remarkable developments that have taken place in our Party and country since the Twentieth Congress and which ensure the successful progress of the Soviet people to communism. That is why they would like to isolate Comrade Khrushchov from the Central Committee for their subversive ends and to oppose our Central Committee to the Party and the Soviet people.

But this foul plan is adventuristic and hopeless, and is doomed to complete and ignominious failure.

The Chinese leaders, and not they alone, should know once and for all that our Central Committee, headed by the loyal Leninist, Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchov, has never been so united and monolithic as now.

Comrade Khrushchov with his inexhaustible energy, his truly Bolshevik zeal and devotion to principle, is the recognised leader of our Party and our people. He expresses the most cherished thoughts and aspirations of the Soviet people. The Leninist line pursued by our Party cannot be separated from the Central Committee, from Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchov. This line has elevated our country's world prestige to unprecedented heights, it has elevated its prestige in the eyes of the working people of the whole world. This Leninist line is supported wholeheartedly by all the Communists and all the people of our land.

Our Party has never feared ideological struggle. But it believes that ideological differences should be settled on the basis of Leninist principles and that the polemics be subordinated to the interests of the working-class movement.

The CC, CPSU, clearly foresaw the danger that the Chinese leaders would seek to use the open polemics not as a means of ironing out disputed questions but as an excuse for piling up absurd, slanderous charges, an instrument of ideological and political struggle against the Communist movement.

Together with the other Marxist-Leninist parties, our Party has exerted considerable effort to terminate the open polemics forced upon us by the CPC leaders. The CC, CPSU, has repeatedly taken the initiative to that end—notably in January 1963, in the speech of Comrade Khrushchov, First Secretary of the CC, CPSU, at the Sixth Congress of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany. This initiative was backed by the overwhelming majority of Marxist-Leninist parties. But the Chinese leadership refused to discuss this proposal and saw fit to extend the range of questions in dispute, to aggravate and provoke the polemics.

Last spring an agreement was reached on a bilateral meeting of CPSU and CPC representatives. We hoped that at this meeting the Chinese comrades would be ready to concentrate efforts not on what divides us, but on what unites the CPC with the CPSU and with other fraternal parties. The CPSU delegation suggested that all questions in dispute be thoroughly thrashed out, in order to clear the path for a normalisation of relations, to cement the unity of our Parties and of the world Communist movement as a whole. We submitted a concrete programme for the development of relations between the USSR and the CPR.

But the CPC delegation took advantage of the meeting to exacerbate the differences and to level violent and groundless attacks at the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties. After reading prepared statements, which completely ignored our arguments and proposals, the Chinese delegates called for an adjournment of the bilateral talks.

All the measures taken by the CC CPSU were prompted by a sincere desire to strengthen the unity of the Marxist-Leninist parties and the cohesion of the socialist countries. Our task was to utilize every available opportunity to remove the differences and prevent a split, and not be carried away by the heat of the struggle.

The Chinese leadership, however, apparently understood these measures of ours differently. It became clear that they took our restraint, our striving towards unity, for a sign of weakness. Lately they have begun saying that they will not agree to any improvement of relations with the CPSU, except on the basis of our "unconditional surrender". What do the Chinese leaders want?

In substance, they want the Communist movement to retreat from its positions on all the basic problems of our times.

The world Communist movement considers it vitally necessary to utilize the present situation to unite all the revolutionary forces of our time ever more closely and to develop the world revolutionary process further.

In contrast to this the Chinese leaders have set their sights on dividing the main revolutionary forces of our time — the socialist world system, the international working class, and the national-liberation movement. This can only act as a break on the development of the world revolutionary process.

Marxists-Leninists believe that it is the cardinal task of the Communist parties to marshal all the peace-loving forces for the defence of peace and the deliverance of mankind from a nuclear disaster. They consider peaceful coexistence to be the general principle of relations between the socialist and the capitalist countries.

The Chinese leaders scorn this task. What they are doing, in effect, is whipping up the nuclear arms race and calling for new powers to join it. They are pursuing a line that is liable to cause an atomic war, and consider the struggle for peace a secondary task, opposing it to the struggle for socialism.

The Marxists-Leninists consider it their duty to strengthen in every possible way the unity and cohesion of the socialist community on the principles of Marxism-Leninism, and to concentrate the special attention of the socialist countries on economic development in order that socialism should win the peaceful economic competition with capitalism.

The actions of the Chinese leaders are subverting and undermining the unity of the socialist camp. They are isolating China more and more from the other socialist countries. The CC, CPC, underrates economic development and ignores the tasks confronting the socialist countries in their economic competition with the capitalist countries. This policy tends to weaken the might of the socialist countries and impedes their struggle against imperialism.

Marxists-Leninists, the working class of the capitalist countries see it as their task to step up the struggle against monopoly capital, in defence of the vital interests of the masses, to make maximum use of the now available opportunities to effect a peaceful socialist revolution not involving a civil war, and at the same time be ready to take the non-peaceful way, to suppress the resistance of the bourgeosie by armed force.

In contrast, the CPC leaders vilify in every way the struggle of the working class and its Communist vanguard for the vital interests of the working people, for peace and democracy, and reject the tactics of broad anti-monopoly alliances, the possibility of effecting social revolution peacefully. They call for reckless armed actions irrespective of the concrete situation.

Marxists-Leninists and the peoples fighting for national liberation consider it their duty to complete the anti-imperialist, democratic revolution, to create and consolidate the national front, and to work for the establishment of states of national democracy, for the non-capitalist way of development.

The Chinese leaders ignore the essence of the present stage of the national-liberation revolution. They are blind to the differences in the situation prevailing in the various countries and offer the peoples of all countries one and the same prescription—armed struggle and establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat. Such prescriptions may, if put into practice, undermine the national front and strengthen the positions of the colonialists and neo-colonialists.

Marxists-Leninists are eager to strengthen the unity and cohesion both of each individual Communist Party and the entire army of Communists in the world on the basis of the principles laid down in the Declaration and the Statement.

The Chinese leaders are disrupting the unity of the Communist movement and of the democratic organisations. They are founding factions and are striving to split our movement and its national contingents.

In brief, the CPC leaders are opposing the Communist movement in all the basic questions of strategy and tactics. Theirs is a course in which petty-bourgeois revolutionism and nationalistic, great-power aspirations merge.

In a malicious anti-Soviet article, slanderous from beginning to end, which appeared on February 4 in the CC CPC publications, the Chinese leaders declare for everybody to hear that they will step up their subversive activities against the world Communist movement. With nationalistic arrogance they boast that they will continue their attacks on the CPSU in order to disorganise the work of the Party founded by the great Lenin.

To the Soviet Communists, the sons and daughters of the October Revolution, the pioneers of the new, Communist world, who have withstood so many gruelling ordeals, such threats sound ridiculous.

The Soviet Communists will not keep silent while the Chinese leaders prosecute an unbridled offensive against our great cause of communist construction, against the Leninist course of our Party and the positions of the world Communist movement. We shall have to explain the substance of the anti-Marxist, neo-Trotskyite position of the Chinese leaders publicly.

The urgent task at present is to protect Marxism-Leninism from the distortions to which it is being subjected by the Chinese leaders. The interests of preserving the purity of the Marxist-Leninist teaching, the interests of the world Communist movement and, in the final analysis, the interests of the Chinese people itself, require that we come out openly and strongly against the incorrect views and dangerous actions of the CPC leadership.

We stand for strengthening friendship with the Chinese people and are ready to develop co-operation with the CPR in all fields. The Soviet Communists have a sincere regard for the great people of China and a deep respect for the revolutionary traditions of the Communist Party of China. We are sure that nobody will ever succeed in undermining the foundations of the friendship of the great Soviet and Chinese peoples and that the present attitude of the CPC leadership does not reflect the true national interests of the Chinese people. We shall do everything in our power to bring the relations between the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China back to a path that conforms with the fundamental interests of the working class and all the working people of our countries.

We are fully aware of the danger of the present attitude of the Chinese leaders. The facts show that a grim and, evidently, long struggle lies ahead for the strengthening of the unity of all the socialist forces, for friendship and cooperation between the Soviet and Chinese peoples. It is now perfectly clear that the CPC leaders intend to persist in their incorrect stand, that they intend to carry on with their factional activities in the world Communist movement. Together with the other fraternal parties, our Party will resolutely defend Marxism-Leninism; it will firmly defend the unity and cohesion of the Communist movement on the basis of the principles of the Declaration and Statement of the 1957 and 1960 Moscow Meetings of Communist and Workers' parties. It will firmly defend the unity and cohesion of all the forces working for peace, democracy, national independence and socialism.

Our Party favours convening another Meeting of fraternal parties to discuss the basic problems of our time and to hold the broadest possible exchange of opinions in the interest of overcoming the difficulties that have arisen in the Communist movement. These difficulties have been caused by the CPC leadership's differences with the world Communist movement. The joint efforts of all the fraternal parties are therefore perfectly justified in order to determine what must be done to preserve and strengthen the Marxist-Leninist unity of the Communist ranks. It is perfectly clear to the CPSU that the meeting should serve this very purpose.

The CC, CPSU, is certain that no matter how great the difficulties experienced by the world Communist movement, that movement will be strong enough to surmount them and to cement its ranks in the struggle for the great Communist cause.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union will continue to pursue the policy of promoting unity with all the fraternal parties on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism and on the basis of the Programme documents of the world Communist movement—the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement.

The road followed by our Party, by the world Communist movement is the Leninist road and, therefore, the only true road. We have adopted a new Programme, in which we have charted our development twenty years ahead. Our Party and the whole Soviet people regard fulfilment of this Programme, resolute and purposeful progress to the heights of communism, as their supreme internationalist duty to the international working-class and Communist movement. As always, our Party will perform its internationalist duty honourably!

Under the invincible banner of the great Lenin, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union will continue consistently and undeviatingly to pursue a line aimed at carrying out the CPSU Programme for the building in our country of the most just social system, communism.

Struggle of the CPSU for the Unity of the World Communist Movement

Decision of Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, Adopted on February 15, 1964

Having heard and discussed the report of Comrade M. A. Suslov, Presidium Member, Secretary of the Central Committee of the CPSU, "On the Struggle of the CPSU for the unity of the World Communist Movement", the Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, expresses its profound concern over the splitting activities of the leadership of the Communist Party of China which are causing great damage to the socialist community of nations, the whole of the world Communist and working-class movement.

Aware of the historical importance of the unity and solidarity of the Communist movement, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union has lately taken new steps towards overcoming or, to begin with, at least diminishing the differences between the leadership of the CPC and the CPSU and other fraternal parties, towards strengthening economic and political cooperation between the USSR and the CPR. Moves to prevent the deepening of these differences have also been made by other Marxist-Leninist Parties.

The Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU notes with regret that the leadership of the CPC has not responded to this initiative, has not answered the letter of the CPSU, nor stopped the open polemics, on the contrary, it has intensified the campaign against the general line of the Communist movement defined by the Meetings of 1957 and 1960.

Under the cover of verbal assurances of fidelity to Marxism-Leninism, under the banner of struggle against the imaginary revisionism of the Marxist-Leninist parties, the leaders of the CPC have assailed the basic theoretical and political principles by which the Communist movement is guided at the present stage.

The new appraisals and conclusions arrived at through collective efforts of the fraternal parties on the basis of the creative application of the Marxist-Leninist principles to the present-day conditions—on the role of the world socialist system, on the ways of building socialism and communism, on the possibility of averting a world war, on peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems, on the necessity of combating the ideology and practice of the personality cult, on the forms of transition to socialism in the developed capitalist states and in the countries which have liberated themselves from colonialism—are all being distorted by the Chinese leaders.

Having departed on all basic questions of strategy and tactics from the Leninist line of the world Communist movement, the Chinese leaders have put forward a course of their own which is compounded of petty-bourgeois adventurism and great-power chauvinism. On a number of questions they, in effect, descend to Trotskyite positions, adopt Trotskyite methods of struggle against the Marxist-Leninist parties, and set up factional groups of their supporters in various countries. The leadership of the CPC is seeking to impose its dissenting ideological platform on the whole of the socialist camp and the world Communist movement, and on the international democratic organisations.

The Chinese leaders have adopted a course aimed at worsening the Soviet-Chinese inter-state relations, undermining the friendship between the Soviet and Chinese peoples. Having rejected all the proposals of the CC, CPSU, on the normalisation of the Soviet-Chinese relations, they have intensified anti-Soviet propaganda inside the CPR and are grossly interfering in the internal affairs of the Soviet Union.

The Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, holds that the vital interests of the world socialist system, of the Communist movement and the defence of the purity of Marxism-Leninism call for an ideological exposure of the anti-Leninist position of the CPC leadership and for a resolute rebuff to their splitting activities.

Fully and unanimousiy approving the political and practical activities of the Presidium of the CC, CPSU, and of Comrade N. S. Khrushchov, First Secretary of the CC, CPSU, aimed at building Communist society in the USSR, ensuring the triumph of the cause of peace, democracy, national independence and socialism, and strengthening the solidarity of the Marxist-Leninist parties, the Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, instructs the CC Presidium to continue firmly to uphold the general line of the world Communist movement, to work to strengthen the unity of all revolutionary forces of today.

Our Party is following, and will continue to follow, the tested Leninist road and nobody will ever succeed in diverting the CPSU from this course—the course of the Twentieth and Twenty-second Congresses.

In spite of the fact that the Chinese leaders have gone far in their splitting activities, the Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, placing the interests of the unity of the world Communist movement above all else, expresses its readiness to exert further efforts toward the normalisation of relations between the CPSU and the CPC. If the CPC leaders have not lost all sense of their international responsibility, they must realise, at last, that by their actions they are diverting the forces and attention of the Communist and Workers' parties from the solution of the urgent tasks of socialist construction, impeding the struggle against imperialism, and damaging the entire anti-imperialist front.

The Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, is firmly confident that the world Communist movement will overcome the existing difficulties, rally still closer around the banner of Marx Engels-Lenin and achieve new successes in the struggle for the great cause of the working class, for the cause of peace and the peoples' security, for the victory of communism.

The Political Resolution of the Fifth Conference of the I. C. P.

In conclusion of its proceedings the Fifth Conference of the I.C.P. adopted the following political resolution:

1) The Fifth National Conference on Organization of the Italian Communists, which met in Naples at a grave moment of our national life, draws the attention of all Italians, with the authority of a great political, democratic and national force, to the serious deterioration of the economic, social and political situation of the country during the three months that have elapsed since the setting up of the Moro government. The big monopoly groups, after having exercised growing pressure in order to condition the action of the Centre-Left government, are today developing a great offensive in order to have their will and their interests prevail in full. Such an offensive, made possible by the agreement on the platform of the present government, has been more and more encouraged by the docility of the Centre-Left group. Thus, serious threats arise to the living conditions of the working masses and to the initiatives of the middle strata, as is clearly shown by the attack on wages and the demand for shorter working hours, wide-scale dismissals, the restriction of credit to the small and medium-size enterprises, the curtailment of public expenditure. At the same time, scandalous concessions have been made in favour of the tax evasions and an inadmissible tolerance has favoured the escape of capital abroad. The gaps, the contradictions, the traditional injustice of Italian society, above all the South Italian question—already sharper due to monopoly expansion during the years of the "economic miracle"—are now sharpening more and more. The striving for renewal on the part of the more advanced section of the Centre-Left group has been paralyzed by the prevalence of the conservative orientation, outside and inside the government. The confusion that has characterized the government actions in these months has worsened the economic situation, humiliated the Socialist Party and the most advanced forces of the Catholic world, struck a blow at the prestige of the democratic institutions and may create the conditions for reactionary chaos.

A resolute renovating action by the government can offset the pressure, the economic and political blackmail on the part of the big monopoly groups and the anxiety and demagogical campaign by means of which the Rights are trying to influence the middle strata. A revival of Italian economic development on a different basis, opposed to that indicated by the big employers, is possible if one has the will and the force to defeat the sabotage, manoeuvres and speculation of the big capitalists and make them pay the cost of that rebirth which is now weighing down on the shoulders of the working class and the middle strata. First of all it is necessary:

a) to stop the inflation process;

b) to prevent the consequences of the present difficulties being shifted to the shoulders of the popular masses.

For this, it is necessary to adopt immediate measures of public interference and public control capable of stopping the increase in the cost of living and of stimulating investments to meet the most urgent needs of the national economy and the working people.

Such measures should immediately start democratic economic planning, based on the essential structural reforms, subordinate the action of big capital to the interests of the collective and give the working masses a new role in society and in the state. These basic orientations should underlie all government action and also the utilization of the loan now given to Italy by the United States, rejecting all political conditions.

The policy and the solutions of the Centre-Left government have revealed their deep limitations due both to the composition of the majority and the programme and orientation that have been chosen. Today the P.S.I. is faced again with a dramatic dilemma between defence and development of its essential features or assumption of the role of a mere supporter of the capitalist system. More and more critical is also the position of those forces inside the Catholic movement that refuse to accept unconditionally the present capitalist set-up and the monopoly leadership of society.

It is essential and urgent that all the secular and Catholic forces understand the necessity not to remain subjected to the pressure of the monopoly groups and feel the urgency and the actual possibility of imposing today a decisive orientation of renewal of the national society and of drastically limiting big capital's power. The experience of the past two years shows that even the most timid and contradictory reforms come up against the harsh resistance of the ruling classes, resistance which cannot be faced and defeated without mobilizing the widest and most militant political forces expressing the interests and the will for progress of the working people and the middle strata. The confidence and support of these great social and political forces are decisive in order to emerge from the economic and political crisis, to give new impulse to the democratic institutions, to defeat the plans of the Right inside and outside the government, to create the conditions and the premises for a Left-wing shift.

But appealing to these forces means creating a new majority characterized by an anti-monopolistic platform of economic planning and by a line of development towards a real democracy. The Communists are conscious that in this situation the possibility of and the conditions for closer ties between the Socialist and more advanced Catholic forces and the I.C.P. arise. Relying on the elaboration made in these years of major problems of unity of the international Communist movement with due regard for diversity and autonomy of the experience of every party, around the important problems of search for one's own perspective of democratic advance towards socialism and of new forms of participation by the working class in government, the Communists propose a discussion, open to all the Left forces, on the ways of democratic renewal of the nation.

2) Recent developments have again demonstrated how futile are the attempts to pursue a policy of democratic development in Italy against and without the Communist Party, and how absurd is the perspective of embarrassing our Party. In face of the stubbornness of the monopoly groups and the grave political weakness shown by the other sectors of the Left movement, the growing strength of the I.C.P.—so clearly evidenced in the organizational field by the successess gained in the re-registration campaign of 1964—represents a beacon for all the social strata aspiring to a deep-going transformation of national society.

It is the task of the Communists to make the most of this strength in the present, dramatic phase of the national economic and political situation.

The Fifth National Conference on Organization calls upon the Party to start immediately a campaign of orientation, propaganda and agitation aimed at defeating the insidious activities through which the monopoly groups try to repress the advancement of demands, deprive the working-class movement of autonomy, and isolate the middle strata from the working-class. At the same time the Conference calls upon all the party organizations to develop, on the basis of unity, the widest initiatives of struggle for peace, for disarmament and for an autonomous and independent development of the underdeveloped countries, for the immediate establishment of regional institutions, for land reform and for the rebirth of the South, against the rising cost of living and against every attack on the employment levels, for new town-planning legislation, for school reform and for a higher level of scientific research.

It is in the spirit of these renewed militant tasks of struggle that the organizations of the Party and of the Young Communist Federation are called upon to carry on the campaign of re-registration and registration towards new successes which—in the year since the big victory of April 28th—indicate the constant and increasing popular support given to the I.C.P. and its policy.

The Fifth National Conference on Organization, the impulse coming from it as a result of the renewal of the organizational structure and further extension of democracy in the party, indicates that the I.C.P. is a virile and essential force of the Italian democracy, capable of making a new, decisive contribution to the common struggle of the Italian people for peace and socialism.

On the Situation in the International Communist Movement

Excerpts from a report on the sitution in the international Communist and working-class movement made by Raymond Guyot, member of the Political Bureau of the French Communist Party, at a meeting of the Central Committee held on March 25—26 and published in l'Humanité.

Since the Central Committee meeting of October 6, Guyot said, a number of developments have taken place which make it necessary to inform the Central Committee of the situation which has arisen in the international Communist and working-class movement.

In the past few years the peoples have registered important successes in their struggle for peace and disarmament, for national independence and socialism. But it is also in this period that the leaders of the Communist Party of China—in opposition to the majority of the Communist parties and trampling underfoot the jointly agreed decisions — have made an attempt to divert the international Communist movement on the path of sectarianism and adventurism. They show complete lack of faith in the ability of the working class and the peoples to avert war and achieve disarmament in our epoch. Their attitude has already done grave harm to the cause of communism; it impedes the struggle for peace today when there exist great possibilities to deliver new blows at the aggressive forces of imperialism, when whole continents, as well as countries like Cuba and Algeria are actively fighting together with all the peace-loving forces of the world for peace and peaceful coexistence.

It is precisely in this period that the leaders of the Communist Party of China have been intensifying their campaign against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Soviet government, against the Communist parties which adhere to the positions of the 1957 and 1960 meetings. Their attacks against our Party and its leadership have become more numerous and more vicious.

They engage in large-scale splitting activity, the more recent manifestation of which was the behaviour of the Chinese delegate who tried to break up the united anti-imperialist and anti-colonial front at the meeting of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Council in Algiers.

The article which appeared in the Chinese press on February 4, openly calling for a split, revealed the true intentions of the Chinese leaders: to create a factionalist bloc under their hegemony with a programme of its own; to lay increasing claim to being the sole heirs of the founders of Marxism-Leninism, the supreme judges in the sphere of the theory and practice of communism; to dictate to all the parties—in the capitalist as well as in the socialist and newly-emergent countries--what they must or must not do, while they, the Chinese leaders, would decide who are the leading Marxists and who, the modern revisionists.

They have their own interpretation of history and philosophy: the centre of the revolution (meaning China) is shifting, and this is normal; everything is destined to split in two, for such is the law of nature, and this also holds true for the international Communist movement, etc.

In many countries factional groups are being formed inside the parties or parallel with the parties, with the participation of renegades and Trotskyites. Such, in particular, is the case in Switzerland, Australia and some of the Latin American countries; for example, such pseudo-parties have been formed recently in Belgium, and attempts have been made to replace Central Committees (Ceylon, Peru) with splinter groups.

Particularly unseemly practices are being used against the parties which are fighting fascist dictatorship. At the Central Committee meeting last October Waldeck Rochet branded the practice of Chinese documents being widely circulated in Spain while the Communists and anti-fascists of that country were subjected to persecution. We have recently received the following letter from our Spanish comrades:

"...The Franco political police have already utilized the differences in the international Communist movement to publish a fake issue of Mundo Obrero (organ of the Communist Party of Spain—Ed.) in an attempt to give the impression that our Party has been split.

"Our activists have established that this issue, a copy of which we are sending you, was distributed by police agents, and have vigorously rebuffed this fabrication. But this very fact demonstrates how dangerous for the whole Communist movement, and particularly for the parties working in illegal conditions, is the turn which the Communist Party of China has given to the polemics, and the splitting activity which it supports in the various countries."

Guyot also pointed to the use of government radio by the Chinese leaders for propaganda against the Soviet Union. Peking Radio systematically broadcasts materials violently attacking the Soviet Union, its Communist Party and its government. The calumny published in Jenminjihpao and Hungchi on February 4 was transmitted in Russian 125 times for 80 hours during the first two weeks.

In our Party, Guyot went on, the position adopted by the Chinese leaders has evoked indignation and unanimous condemnation. The few attempts to foster anti-Party groups made with the support of renegades and Trotskyites have failed. It is, nevertheless, necessary to draw the attention of the Central Committee to certain aspects of the situation which has arisen in the French-Chinese Friendship Association, whose aim is to promote friendly relations between the two peoples. Certain elements, notably in the Marseilles Committee of the Association, instead of working to foster the broadest unity in the interests of true friendship with the Chinese People's Republic, are doing their utmost to distribute Chinese materials directed against the international Communist movement and the French Communist Party, i. e., are engaging in activity which has nothing in common with the noble aims of this Association. These attempts will be thwarted by the vigilance of all Frenchmen who stand at once for both French-Chinese friendship and for peaceful coexistence, disarmament and peace.

It is also necessary to step up the ideological and political struggle against the attitude of the Chinese leaders vis-a-vis the de Gaulle government. De Gaulle, they assert, is the standard-bearer of national struggle against U.S. imperialism.

This anti-Marxist position of the Chinese leaders in regard to the Gaullist power has become even more strongly pronounced in connection with the recognition of People's China and the establishment of diplomatic relations with France (we have always fought for this recognition, just as we are now carrying on the fight for the admission of the Chineses People's Republic to U.N.O.).

In Peking they pretend to be unaware of the true aims of de Gaulle's foreign policy (the search for new markets for the capitalist monopolies, possession of atomic armaments, a bigger say in NATO and alliance with German militarism, the attempts of French imperialism to regain some of its positions in Asisa and Latin America, etc.). The recent statements made by Pompidou in the American Club and the interview given by Couve de Murville to the U.S. News and World Report throw light on the character of de Gaulle's policy. On its part, La Nation declares unashamedly that "France, which has long been active in Oceania, is preparing new installations there" (meaning nuclear bases, of course), and it asks: "Perhaps from this standpoint, too, it is believed desirable to maintain official relations with the principal power in this part of the globe?"

What Mao-Tse-tung said about the atom bomb during a meeting with the Gaullist M. P.s visiting China echo de Gaulle's own claims: "I know, you are ahead of us, but we shall have our own bomb. This is the way to be strong."

It should be noted that not a single word appeared in the Chinese press denouncing the Gaullist repressions in Gabon, the persecution of the youth on Martinique or of Comrade Paul Vergès on Réunion. Not a single voice of protest was raised against the establishment of a nuclear experimental centre in Polynesia at the time when protests are resounding in France, Australia, New Zealand, Chile and Peru.

In the meantime a "new theory" is being elaborated in Peking, the theory of the so-called "second intermediate zone" which should embrace Britain, West Germany, de Gaulle's France and Japan. "Ceasing to be agents of the United States" these countries, along with China, will constitute a kind of "third world". For France and the other above-mentioned countries this anti-Leninist and grossly opportunist policy would mean the liquidation of the working-class struggle against imperialism and neo-colonialism.

Our Party is fighting against U.S. imperialism and its aggressive policy, against our own imperialism which is no different from that of the United States, and, as Comrade Maurice Thorez has stressed, we oppose everything in de Gaulle's policy which runs counter to the national interests, the independence of the peoples and the cause of peace.

The situation in the international Communist movement confirms the soundness of the attitude taken by our Party on a whole range of problems.

Limiting ourselves to the more recent decisions of our Party, we would like to stress the significance of the October meeting of the Central Committee, the documents of which were published (in the form of a pamphlet subsquently translated into German, Spanish and English and sent to the fraternal parties); Léon Feix's reply in l'Humanité to a Chinese article which slandered our Party and its leadership; the more lengthy reply given editorially in the February issue of Cahiers du Communisme, which also appeared in pamphlet form. Lastly, we would like to recall the section on these questions in the draft resolution for the Seventeenth Congress, which is now being widely discussed in the Party.

One cannot remain "neutral" in this struggle which is of exceptional significance for the unity of the Communist movement. For this is not a matter of differences between the C.P.S.U. and the C.P.C., but of differences between the latter and the vast majority of the Communist and Workers' parties of the whole world. To avoid qualifying and denouncing the policy and the disruptive activity of the Chinese leaders, as is sometimes the case, means to refuse to ensure the future of our struggle for socialism and communism.

The grave threat which menaces the international Communist and working-class movement, and which cannot but alarm us, is a result of the attempts made by the C.P.C. leaders to impose their views on the world movement, a result of the campaign they are waging against the C.P.S.U. and other parties, a result of their subversive activity. These are the causes of the situation that has arisen in the international Communist and working-class movement. The C.P.C. leaders are wholly to blame for this situation which, in fact, plays into the hands of the imperialists.

At the October meeting of the Central Committee we came out for the convocation of a meeting of all the Communist and Workers' parties at the earliest possible date. Today we feel that this need has become even more urgent.

We reaffirm at this meeting of the Central Committee the unequivocal positions of our Party clearly set forth in many documents, and notably the more recent ones (resolution of the C.C. meeting in October, draft resolution for the Seventeeth Congress).

The Central Committee maintains that the line elaborated by the Chinese leaders in opposition to the general line of the international Communist movement, their splitting activities in the various countries, the material and moral support they render to the splinter groups in the various parties, their slander of the leaders of the fraternal parties, cause grave harm to the movement as a whole, to the cause of peace and socialism. It holds that reconciliation with the Leftist and nationalist line of the Chinese leaders and their splitting activity would spell danger for the international movement, for the Chinese people themselves, for our Party and its broad policy of unity needed for the struggle against one-man rule.

The Central Committee would welcome the convocation at the earliest date of a meeting of all the Communist and Workers' parties which would reaffirm, in the light of the changes that have occurred, the general line of the international Communist movement and adopt all the decisions which would be necessary to safeguard its unity. It is our earnest desire that the differences which oppose the C.P.C. to the other Communist parties will be overcome and that the Communist Party of China will again make its contribution to the unity of the international Communist movement, to our common struggle for peace and national independence, for democracy and socialism.

In the course of preparations for the Seventeenth Congress and during the discussion we must pay close attention to the ideological struggle on the fundamental points of the 1957 and 1960 meetings and our own earlier congresses. And we must be prepared to make another contribution to the ideological struggle in its various aspects on all the problems affecting the international Communist movement.

At the same time it is necessary to wage a struggle on two fronts in our own ranks, primarily against the main danger—dogmatism and sectarianism. Any conciliation with splitting activity is inadmissible.

Our struggle to put an end to the one-man rule and bring nearer the hour of the democratic alternative, for the unity of the working class and the alliance of all democrats in the fight for social progress, freedom, national independence, peace, disarmament and socialism, Guyot concluded, cannot be separated from our efforts to achieve the unity of the international Communist and working-class movement.

Against the Subversive Activities of the Chinese Splitters

Resolution of the Central Committee of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party

The open attacks by the Chinese leaders against many aspects of the joint policy of the international Communist movement are known to the members of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party and the Hungarian people. Thus, the Chinese leaders oppose the policy of peaceful co-existence, set at nought economic competition between the two social systems, deny the possibility of socialist revolution triumphing peacefully, without civil war. The Chinese leaders take the stand that there is no need to rectify the gross mistakes committed at the time of the cult of the individual, which caused incalculable harm to the international working-class movement. As we know the parties which uphold the purity of the Marxist-Leninist principles, including the H.S.W.P., most patiently discussed with the Chinese leaders their incorrect views. In this discussion the parties, adhering to a joint line, did not adopt the virulent tone of Chinese propaganda, its methods of abuse, but pointed out to the incorrect views and their harmful political consequences, rejecting fabrications.

After the overwhelming majority of fraternal parties came out against their wrong views, the Chinese leaders took the path of splitting activities. They have organized factional groups made up of Trotskyites and renegades who are prepared to go to all lengths, and they have the effrontery to call some of these groups Communist parties. They are doing this at a time when the forces of socialism and peace are multiplying throughout the world, when the national independence of the peoples of former colonies is growing stronger, when the internal contradictions in the capitalist world are intensifying, when imperialism is at a stage of profound crisis and the process of its disintegration is accelerating. The combined might, united action by the socialist world could accelerate this process still more, could render still greater assistance to the peoples battling against colonialism and neo-colonialism; the fight in defence of world peace would become still more effective were it not for the fact that the splitting activities of the Chinese leaders are dividing the international Communist movement, are hampering its common struggle.

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of China formulated the essence of its policy in a 25-point document published in June 1963, which was printed also by the Hungarian press. This document and the entire activity of the Chinese leaders show that their tactics are aimed at splitting the international Communist movement, that the C.P.C. leaders want hegemony, want to impose their views on the international Communist movement. Actuated by this desire they oppose the Statements of the Communist and Workers' parties of 1957 and 1960.

In the autumn of 1963 the Central Committee of the H.S.W.P. supporting the initiative of the fraternal parties, including the C.P.S.U., ceased to publish materials concerning the differences in the international Communist movement. The purpose of this step was to create favourable conditions for a new internationl meeting of the fraternal parties to discuss the differences. The Chinese leaders, however, replied by continuing their open attacks, by becoming even more abusive and absolutely ignoring the position of the overwhelming majority of the fraternal parties which insisted on ceasing the public debate.

In the February 4 issue of Jenminjihpao, the official organ of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China, the Chinese leaders published a long article in which they openly declared that they support and will help to organize factions against the Central Committees of the fraternal parties which oppose the views of the Chinese leaders, condemn their desire for hegemony and which are in solidarity with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. They call this undermining of unity "an internationalist obligation". They ignore the propositions of the Moscow Statement of 1960 regulating the relations between the fraternal parties, and by impermissible methods interfere in their internal affairs. They attack the Central Committee of the C.P.S.U. and Comrade Khrushchov personally with blind rancour, calling him "anti-Soviet", "the greatest of all revisionists", "the greatest splitter of our time". With the help of an extensive propaganda network they create big difficulties for the Communist parties, and first of all, for the fraternal parties battling in the capitalist countries.

It is characteristic of the Chinese leaders that instead of engaging in a theoretical discussion of fundamental ideological issues they are waging a political struggle against the C.P.S.U. and the other fraternal parties. The fabrications, distortions and abuse contained in the Jenminjihpao article of February 4 divert attention from the fundamental differences. This clearly is the purpose of the assertions that "the leaders of the C.P.S.U. are bent on seeking Soviet-U.S. cooperation for the domination of the world", that "the revisionism and splittism of the leaders of the C.P.S.U. are the product both of the lush growth of the bourgeois elements inside the Soviet Union and ... of the U.S. imperialist policies ..."

This policy of the Chinese leaders which they try to justify with assertions that are absolutely lacking in a sober assessment, is nothing but an adventurist policy which has as its purpose to mislead people; it is a policy which is doomed to failure.

The Central Committee of the H.S.W.P. has from the very outset condemned the sectarian, dogmatic views of the Chinese leaders and their splitting activity. The Central Committee emphatically rejects and denounces their new attack of February 4, which is even more vicious than all previous attacks and which is directed against the entire international Communist movement and consequently against the H.S.W.P. By their splitting activities the Chinese leaders are assailing the unity of the socialist countries and the international Communist movement, are making things easier for imperialism in the face of the progress of the socialist world, are hampering the struggle of the Communist parties in individual countries and on the international arena.

Together with the other fraternal parties the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party, firmly adhering to the Moscow Statements of 1957 and 1960, resolutely opposes the undermining activity of the Chinese leaders.

The Central Committee of the H.S.W.P. is in full solidarity with the C.P.S.U. and its Leninist Central Committee, and personally with Comrade Khrushchov. It is absolutely clear that the attacks of the Chinese leaders are directed first and foremost against the C.P.S.U. The steadfast Marxist-Leninist policy of the C.P.S.U., its great international prestige make impossible the Chinese policy of adventurism. Neither the old nor the new anti-Soviet attacks can alter this fact.

The Central Committee of the H.S.W.P. has decided that if the Chinese leaders do not stop their open attacks and splitting activities, they will have to be answered in public. We are not deceived by the tactics of the Chinese leaders in accordance with which they attack first one and then another fraternal party and its leaders. We shall oppose all attacks, and uphold the common cause and policy of our Party.

The Chinese leaders are trying to set off some countries of the socialist world system against each other. The Central Committee of the H.S.W.P. rejects and condemns these attempts and also interference in the affairs of the member countries of the Council for Mutual Economic Aid.

The class enemies are trying to make the most of the differences caused by the leaders of the C.P.C. in the international Communist movement. With the help of diplomacy and other methods the imperialists are seeking to weaken the unity of the socialist world system. The imperialist press picks up and spreads the anti-Soviet slander circulated by the Chinese leaders in order to provoke differences and a split in the revolutionary working-class movement in the capitalist countries. Upholding the ideas of Marxism-Leninism the Communist parties are steadfastly combating the attempts to cause a split.

The Central Committee of the H.S.W.P. and the Hungarian people who have from the very outset unanimously rejected the harmful views of the Chinese leaders now more than ever before strongly condemn the intensified splitting activities of the Chinese leaders and their unbridled anti-Soviet slander.

In our fight against pseudo-Left views and against the splitting, undermining activities of the Chinese leaders we do not lose sight of the fact that there are still Right reactionary elements in Hungary who will try to exploit the attacks made by the Chinese leaders to whip up dissatisfaction with the policy of our Party and the government.

The Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party forged its ideological, political and organizational unity in a difficult period, in hard-fought battle, at the price of big sacrifices in the struggle against counter-revolutionaries, revisionists and dogmatists, and it has the necessary experience to repulse the attacks of both the Rights and the "Lefts". Those who will attempt undermining activities will learn to their cost that the Party is able to combat these attempts with vigour and determination.

At the same time it is necessary through patient explanatory work and persuasion to clear up the ideological confusion of those who have been misled on certain issues by the pseudo-revolutionary phrases of the Chinese leaders and those Right elements who are seeking to use the discussion with the Chinese leaders to bolster their revisionist position. One of the important tasks of our Party organizations is to raise still higher the ideological and political level of the members of the Party, to strengthen still further the unity of our ranks by exposing the anti-Marxist line and splitting activities of the Chinese leaders.

The political line of the H.S.W.P., which practice has shown to be a correct line, is based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism; it faithfully adheres to the Moscow Statements of 1957 and 1960, to the jointly elaborated general line of the international Communist movement, it draws on the experience of the working-class struggle and of our people. We consistently adhere to the political line of our Party, and will in the future, as heretofore, defend it against all Right and pseudo-Left attempts to distort it. The paramount task facing our Party and our working people today is to carry out the decisions of the Eighth Congress and to complete the building of a socialist society. Every new success along this road, every new achievement in our economic and cultural work is the best answer to all attacks against the policy of our Party, including the attacks of the Chinese leaders.

Statement of the Communist Party of Salvador on Differences in the International Communist Movement

INTRODUCTION

The Communist Party of Salvador has viewed with deep concern the differences that have appeared in the international Communist movement . . .

Unfortunately, the differences concern vitally important aspects of the strategic and tactical line of the international Communist movement. They affect all the basic issues of the struggle for peace, against imperialism and capitalism, the national-liberation struggle, the struggle for socialism and communism. They embrace also internal questions of the international Communist movement and the principles on which this movement rests, as well as the relations between the parties and questions of proletarian internationalism. Consequently, these are not superficial differences of opinion, but profound disagreements affecting the future of mankind . . .

Our Party, which cherishes the greatest respect and friendship for the Communist Party of China and the heroic Chinese people, hoped that the revolutionary maturity of the Chinese comrades would enable them to find the right way to settle their differences with the rest of the international Communist movement. Unfortunately, our hopes were disappointed. Indeed, the intransigence of the Chinese comrades increased and their relations with the rest of the international Communist movement steadily deteriorated to the point where they began rapidly to break away from the countries comprising the world socialist camp, and from the international Communist movement as a whole . . .

In this situation it is the duty of our Party, as of all other revolutionary detachments of the proletariat, clearly and unequivocally to define its own position in conformity with the principles of Marxism-Leninism in order to preserve the internal unity of our Party, to give our members the proper orientation, and to conduct the ideological struggle against incorrect, erroneous positions prejudicial to the unity and the development of the international Communist movement . . .

Abridged translation. This Statement, published in full in pamphlet form under the above title by the Ediciones Farabundo (organ of the Communist Party of Salvador), was adopted by an enlarged meeting of the C.C. of the Communist Party of Salvador held in December 1963 to discuss the differences in the international Communist movement. This question had been discussed previously in the Party branches.

I. The Problem of World Peace and War

The first and cardinal issue of the ideological dispute between the Communist Party of China and the international Communist movement is that of peace or world war . . .

For us who live under imperialist rule in conditions of brutal exploitation and repression, who suffer from the effects of militarization, and who see our oppressed peoples living in hunger and want, the phraseology of the Chinese comrades might have a certain appeal when they say that the sacrifices, whatever they may be, are unimportant, so long as the peoples are delivered from imperialism; when they declare that on the debris of nuclear war mankind will build their socialist future even sooner; or when, by way of argument, they cite the fact that the result of the two past world wars has favoured socialism notwithstanding the suffering caused by these wars, then they are indeed striking a most responsive chord in our people's hearts—their earning for speedy liberation. Thus the way is cleared for counterposing the interests of the peoples fighting for their liberation to the policy of peaceful coexistence pursued by the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries in their relations with the capitalist countries . . .

Faced with arguments of this kind, we Communists of the whole world must study this problem in detail and ask ourselves the question: does the policy of peaceful coexistence between states with different social systems help or hinder the movement of the peoples for their liberation? This question cannot be answered by emotional or bombastic phrases. For us Communists, who are guided by the Marxist-Leninist teaching, there exists but one correct way, namely: to compare theory with practice; to analyze the problem concretely without resorting to polemical evasions. The truth is always concrete, and it must be sought in the concrete facts.

Let us ask ourselves these questions: is modern history reduced to the development and the results of the two world wars? Is it not true that there was a period of several decades between the two world wars and after the last war when there was no world war, and that the cause of world revolution was furthered and many nations liberated in the period of peaceful coexistence? Why then is this experience not examined, why are all the arguments concerned solely with the history of the two world wars?

There is no doubt that in the epoch of transition from capitalism to socialism (just as in past centuries in the transition from lower to higher social formations) wars, political conflicts between classes, ideological struggles, etc. lead to the defeat of the old social order and to the victory of the new through a complex process in which temporary and partial retreats are by no means excluded.

Marxism-Leninism, drawing on the sum of historical experience, has proved that the replacement of the moribund social system by the new is bound to be effected through class struggle and through a process which develops not only in the period of wars, but at all times and in all spheres (ideological, political, economic, military, etc.); this is a cumulative process of change; when the accumulation of changes reaches a certain point a revolutionary leap takes place. The experience of our time shows that the world revolution is developing at an increasing pace from day to day in the conditions of peace between states with different social systems. Capitalism's tragedy lies in the fact that, having no prospect of winning a world war, it also has no possibility of avoiding its own destruction in conditions of peace; capitalism is doomed to disappear, and it will disappear.

Had the Chinese comrades continued to adhere to the positions of dialectical materialism they would have had no difficulty in recognizing the dialectics of development. But they abandoned these positions and, in order to arrive at their conclusion concerning the present revolutionary process, they lay undue emphasis on the experience of the two past world wars, ignoring the historical experience of the other period, the period without wars and the tremendous difference between the destructive capacity of past wars and the destructive capacity of a nuclear war . . .

Every revolution has two principal stages: first the struggle to remove the ruling classes from power and hand over the power to the revolutionary class, and second, the building of the new socio-economic system after the power has been won. The working class fights against the bourgeoisie not out of a desire for revenge; it fights the bourgeoisie in order to destroy the capitalist system which is founded on the exploitation of man by man, and to build a socialist system in its place, a system without exploitation and in which man's dreams will be fully realized. The peoples of the colonies and dependent countries too are not fighting imperialism out of a thirst for vengeance; they are fighting imperialism in order to put an end to the imperialist regime of exploitation and colonial oppression, to open the way to an independent economy and cultural progress and to carry on in more favourable conditions the struggle against all forms of exploitation. The proletariat of the colonial and semi-colonial countries, like the proletariat of the developed capitalist countries, is carrying on the struggle with its gaze fixed on the socialist and Communist future.

Hatred for the exploiters and a desire for revenge are transient emotions, and they can in no way be the cause and the objective of revolutionary struggle. But to listen to the Chinese comrades it would appear that the first stage of the revolution is the most important and that the entire problem of revolution consists in destroying the power of the enemy. We refer to the argument by means of which they seek to convince people that the destruction caused by nuclear war is not important inasmuch as imperialism would be destroyed.

Our science teaches us that every social system corresponds to the level of development of its productive forces, to the level of its material base. The complete victory of socialism and communism as societies superior to capitalism will come only when the level of their productive forces is higher than that under capitalism. Hence, when speaking of the second stage of the revolution, Communists should always bear in mind that the building of the new society will proceed the faster the more resources we have at our disposal and the better the conditions for the development of the productive forces and for expanding the material base of society. Yet the Chinese comrades wish to convince people that on the debris of nuclear destruction mankind would be able to build a "truly beautiful future"...

Today, when the world revolutionary process has made the victory of revolution possible without allowing the capitalist states to unleash war against the socialist states; when the advent of the atomic weapon has turned the prospect of world war into a prospect of colosal devastation of the most advanced material base in the world; when, thanks to the increased weight of the socialist system in the world balance of forces and the tremendous power accumulated by the world revolutionary movement, war has ceased to be inevitable and the victory of revolution can be achieved without necessary recourse to war — today, despite all, the Chinese comrades are trying to convince people that the path of nuclear war is not so bad and that, consequently, there is no particular need to warn the people about the catastrophe that would engulf the world in the event of a nuclear war.

When man created means of destruction capable of extinguishing all life on this planet, there emerged also the social forces capable of preventing war and putting an end to the exploitation of man by man. This is a dialectical contradiction of our time which makes it incumbent on the Communists, the vanguard of all mankind, to ensure the triumph of life over death, revolution over nuclear war.

Of course, nuclar war would bring about the destruction of the power of the bourgeoisie throughout the world. But in the event of nuclear war, vast masses of working people in the capitalist countries, entire cities, factories, means of transport, agriculture, etc., would be wiped out; the destruction would be well-nigh total. In the countries of victorious socialism the destruction would also be very great. In that case it is in place to ask: would socialism, as a social system already built, be brought nearer after a nuclear war? Can socialism and communism be rapidly built on the ruins and on the corpses of hundreds of millions of workers, i. e., on the corpses of those who are destined by history to build the new society? And finally, assuming that a nuclear war would affect only the big nuclear powers and no one else, where would the peoples of the backward countries find the material support for the rapid building of the radiant future, the socialist future? This is not to speak of the difficulties of life and progress in an atmosphere contaminated by radio-active fallout. Undoubtedly socialism, despite all these obstacles, would eventually be built, but how long this would take and how much suffering and hardship this would entail it is impossible to predict.

Thus, if we as Marxists do not forget that the decisive stage of any revolution is the stage in which the new social system is being built, the conclusion is obvious, having in mind the present situation in the world: the path of nuclear war postpones the victory of revolution for all peoples; socialism is nearer today than it would be after a nuclear war.

Let us examine the given problem from a simpler and more direct point of view. If a nuclear war breaks out what would become of the revolution in each of our countries? Would a nuclear war accelerate or retard the revolution in each of these countries? What role in the event of war would each of our peoples play in the struggle for the victory of their revolutionary cause? It is enough to picture the conditions that would be created in the world in the event of a third world war to reply at once to these questions. The clash would occur without any preliminary warning being given the peoples and without their consent. Within the space of a few minutes vast areas would be swept by a destructive holocaust that would make no distinction between revolutionaries and reactionaries. Revolutionary plans, the gains and the successes won by the revolutionary forces would be wiped out and those who worked out these plans and who fought in the ranks of the revolution would perish. And even if by some miracle we should be saved from the immediate and subsequent destructive effects of a nuclear war, even so the revolutionary plans would be essentially frustrated by the consequences of the clash. The prospect of building socialism in a brief historical period, a prospect at present made tangible by the possibility of obtaining material assistance from the socialist camp, would be dealt a serious blow, inasmuch as the socialist camp itself would be subjected to frightful destruction.

Let us now examine another pespective, that of the development of the world revolution in conditions of peaceful coexistence between the socialist and capitalist countries. In the conditions of peaceful coexistence the class struggle is maturing in that part of the world still dominated by imperialism. The peoples, led by their advanced parties, have outlined their plans, worked out their revolutionary programmes, set up their revolutionary organizations and are waging a struggle against their enemies. This struggle (peaceful or non-peaceful depending on what path one or another people is compelled to choose) is being crowned with victory now in one now in another country.

Hence it is the duty of the Soviet Union as a nuclear power and as the mightiest and most reliable bulwark of the world proletariat, to mobilize all its resources and efforts to prevent war from breaking out. By following this course the Soviet Union is fulfilling its duty not only to its own people but to the world revolution as well. This is also the duty of all other socialist states, of all Communist parties and progressive forces the world over. By virtue of our principles and our objectives, we Communists have a greater obligation than anyone else to fight for the preservation of world peace.

And finally, let us examine the given problem in the light of Marxist humanism. The Chinese comrades scoff at arguments in favour of peaceful coexistence based in the lofty postulates of Marxist humanism, seeking to depict them as nothing more than false sentimentality. It is a well-known fact that whenever our enemies wish to discredit the Communists in the eyes of the masses and undermine our prestige they accuse us of subscribing to the anti-humane and reactionary maxim which holds that "the end justifies the means". On the contrary, this infamous slogan was and remains the slogan of those classes which are unwilling to leave the stage of history. We Communists have always rejected this slogan. We are humanists. The whole of our theory, all our aims and all our practical activity is permeated with the loftiest striving for the perfection of all humanity in every field of endeavour. Violence is not our principle, although we do not hesitate to employ violence for the sake of the victory of the revolution should the enemy compel us to take such a course. Humanism and revolution are not contradictory. The end does not justify the means. On the contrary, the end and the means constitute an integral whole. Such is our Marxist-Leninist position, and we have no cause to revise it now when the world revolution has matured and is rapidly developing everywhere.

We Salvador Communists resolutely declare our firm adherence to the policy of peaceful coexistence, inasmuch as we regard the preservation of peace among states with different social systems, the prevention of nuclear war as the most important condition in the present-day world for the ripening and speedy consummation of the world revolution. Therefore we condemn the position of the Chinese comrades in this question as a position at variance with the interests of the world revolution. Notwithstanding our respect for the Communist Party of China, notwithstanding its great services and its victories which we acknowledge, and notwithstanding the fact that we are a small party, we nevertheless declare this without hesitation. This is a problem affecting all peoples, big and small, all of mankind, and we Communists must all state our point of view.

II. The National-Liberation Movement

Another major problem involved in the ideological conflict between the Communist Party of China and some other parties, on the one hand, and the overwhelming majority of the international Communist movement, on the other, concerns the national-liberation struggle of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America and the link between this struggle and the struggle of the international working class . . .

It is obvious and incontestible that in our time the main contradiction is that between socialism and capitalism. This contradiction will be resolved with the world-wide victory of the working class, with the establishment of socialism and communism in all countries. At the same time our epoch is marked also by other important contradictions, outstanding among which is the contradiction between the colonial and the semi-colonial countries, on the one hand, and imperialism and colonial rule, on the other. This is a very sharp contradiction, and the prime role here is played by the oppressed countries and peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America. The big victories won by the national-liberation movement since the Second World War have increased the number of independent countries and at the same time caused the ground on which imperialism stands, i. e., colonial and semi-colonial domination, to slip from under its feet. We are convinced that the struggle of the oppressed peoples could not have led from victory to victory and acquired its present gigantic scope had there not existed, alongside the indomitable resolve of the peoples to win national liberation, the steadily growing might of the socialist camp. Among all the forces constituting the irresistible revolutionary torrent of our day the peoples belonging to the camp of socialism and communism play the leading, vanguard role . . .

All the movements for democracy and peace, against capitalism and imperialism, and for national liberation and socialism should be closely and inseparably linked with one another as indivisible components of the world revolutionary process. Therefore we qualify as pernicious the efforts of the Chinese comrades to counterpose, by diverse means, crude and subtle, overt and covert, the national-liberation movement to the socialist world camp and the world peace movement. We likewise disagree with the Chinese comrades' claim that the international Communist movement ignores the struggle for national liberation. To claim this is to resort to fabrications. And this is dangerous indeed . . .

Marxism teaches us to analyze the struggles waged in class society from the standpoint of class interests, proceeding from the thesis that the history of class society is shaped in class struggle. Yet in this as in other questions the Chinese comrades prefer to depart from Marxism and to speak of nations as of united entities without making any distinction between the classes within these nations or between the interests of these classes. For the Chinese comrades there exist only oppressor nations and countries and oppressed nations and countries. They seem to have forgotten that the proletariat of both types of nations and countries have common interests and are fighting against a common enemy and for common goals. True, in conducting the polemic the Chinese comrades point to these common interests and goals of the world proletariat, but only to the extent that this bolsters up their arguments on other points. When they speak of the connection between the struggle for national liberation, the struggle for socialism and the vanguard role of the socialist camp, they prefer to speak only about countries and not about classes. In other words, they incline towards the positions of bourgeois nationalism, departing from Marxist-Leninist positions.

III. The Paths of Revolution

On the question of the means the peoples should use to win power—both at the stage of national liberation and at the stage of transition to socialism—there is full clarity in the international Communist movement. This question was theoretically elucidated in the statements of the Communist and Workers' parties in a way which seemed to leave no loophole for sowing confusion . . .

The Chinese comrades, after categorically asserting in their June 14 Letter that they are for faithful and consistent pursuance of the line set forth in the documents of the Communist and Workers' parties, ridicule the opportunities for peaceful struggle against the oligarchy in the various countries and against imperialism which are opening before a number of peoples. Clearly the Chinese comrades' position is that of conservatives and dogmatists. Many peoples today have access to means of struggle which could hardly be envisaged when socialism was taking its first steps. The more the forces of socialism and progress become the decisive factor of social change, the more possibilities open up for the peoples for waging a successful struggle for power.

The Communist Party of Salvador, repudiating the position of the Chinese comrades and their attacks against other Communist and Workers' parties, once again reaffirms the Communique issued by its Central Committee in April 1963 which declares that our Party ". . . maintains that national independence may be won either by peaceful means or through armed struggle, depending on the specific conditions in the country concerned, and that in each case it is up to the Marxist-Leninist party of the given country to determine the revolutionary tactics and the forms and means of struggle". The Communique states further: "Consequently, we maintain that it is dogmatic to claim that there is only one way to be followed and only one form of struggle to be used in all cases. Underestimation of the possibilities opening up in the course of the struggle would only lead to defeat and unnecessary suffering for the peoples."

As regards our country, the Communist Party of Salvador holds that at present and in the foreseeable future the only possible form of struggle by which the people of Salvador can win power is the non-peaceful form. In other words, in order to win, the people must be prepared to take up arms against their enemies—imperialism and the oligarchy.

The people have worked hard to win democracy by peaceful means; but the broad masses have come to realize that the peaceful path of the revolution has been blocked by imperialism and the oligarchy. Long years of mass murders, terror, denial of democratic rights, refusal to allow the agricultural labourers to organize, constant trampling on the freedom of speech, and military coups against governments which sought to foster some democratic tendencies have shown that the ruling classes have placed their stakes on force, and this has convinced the people that they must prepare to counter force with force.

The foregoing does not mean that the Communist Party of Salvador excludes the possibility of changes taking place in the internal and the international balance of forces favouring the peaceful path of struggle for power. We would not be Marxists-Leninists if we associated the popular revolutionary process in Salvador with only one particular form of struggle, if we denied the possibility of new conditions and circumstances emering in the course of the development of the mass struggles giving rise to new methods of defence and attack, if we closed all but one door to a better life and insisted on using forms of struggle no longer according with the historically evolved conditions. We would have to be completely blind and certainly not Marxists-Leninists to fail to see that the balance of strength between the imperialist camp and the socialist camp in the international arena is steadily becoming more and more favourable to the camp of socialism.

Consequently, as regards the internal situation in our country, we do not rule out the possibility of a time coming when the organized forces of the people of Salvador, united in struggle against the tyranny and the interests it represents, will achieve such a preponderance of strength as to make the peaceful path to power possible. We do not underestimate the possibility of a government of national democracy coming into power—a government consistent with our political process which would launch out on the path of non-capitalist development. Nor do we rule out the possibility of a situation arising in which a transitional government respecting democratic freedoms, guaranteeing the free development of the political forces and enjoying the firm support of the people might be formed.

IV. Principles Governing Relations Between Parties

The differences between the Communist Party of China and the international Communist movement extend to the highly important question of relations between parties within the international Communist movement. All the fraternal parties which signed the 81-Party Statement solemnly undertook to observe the basic Marxist-Leninist principles governing relations between the various revolutionary detachments of the proletariat. These principles are: the equality and independence of the Communist and Workers' parties; non-interference in the internal affairs of other parties; mutual aid based on international working-class solidarity; fraternal relations between parties. These principles make for the maximum solidarity of the socialist camp and the international Communist movement in the struggle for the final victory of the working class and the peoples, in the struggle for peace, democracy, national liberation, socialism and communism...

If the Communist parties did not cherish their independence, they would not be able correctly to elaborate their own political line according with the specific conditions prevailing in the country at the given moment; they could not effectively lead the struggles of their peoples.

The equality of the parties, the fact that there are no "superior" and "inferior" parties, is a guarantee of the observance of the principles of proletarian internationalism. Whenever there have been deviations in this respect, as, for instance, in the twenties (owing to Trotskyite influences) or in the period of the Stalin cult, they have had an adverse effect on the international Communist movement.

As regards the Communists Party of Salvador, it has strictly adhered to these principles in its relations with fraternal parties.

. Further, recognition of these principles and their correct implementation can in no way detract from the important relevant thesis that the vanguard role, the role of the bulwark in the fight against imperialism, is played and will continue to be played by the U.S.S.R and the C.P.S.U. ...

Recognition of this fact, far from harming, strengthens the international Communist movement. Recognition of this fact is an important element in the strategy and a vital factor of unity of the entire progressive world, while refusal to recognize it weakens the solidarity and the impact of the struggle waged by the Communist movement and the peoples of the world. This is an elementary truth recognized by the international Communist movement, a truth which even the Chinese comrades, with due modesty, always used to acknowledge ...

As regards the Communist Party of Salvador, we realize the importance of the equality and independance of the Communist parties; we also realize that these do not conflict with the positive fact that the C.P.S.U. plays a vanguard role in the international Communist movement. Therefore our Party has clearly defined its stand on this question in its decisions . . .

Nothing would please the imperialist camp more than the weakening of the solidarity of the socialist world camp and the international Communist movement with the U.S.S.R., for the diffusion of their forces would enable the imperialists to deal with the various socialist countries, detachments of the working class, popular movements and national-liberation movements one by one. But these dreams of the imperialists will never come true, for nothing will ever make the international Communist movement forsake its main bulwark of strength.

We categorically declare that we shall always stand together with the parties which strictly and faithfully observe the principles adopted by the international Communist movement. We do not consider any fraternal Party infallible. Any Party may make one or another mistake in applying the general line of the international Communist movement, but this is not a valid reason for disrupting the unity of the movement.

In view of the situation that has developed, our Party urges that a conference of the parties be called to discuss concrete instances of mistakes which one or another fraternal Party has committed, or is presumed to have committed, in carrying out the general line.

V. Unity of the International Communist Movement

The unity of the international Communist movement is the basic condition for the final victory of the working class and the peoples over capitalism and imperialism.

The immortal slogan "Workers of all lands, unite!" is more timely than ever at the present stage when socialism is becoming the decisive factor of social development and the victory of the proletariat is on the order of the day. Yet it is precisely at this moment when all the forces of the proletariat and the peoples should be concentrated on ensuring maximum cohesion in the common struggle against imperialism, exploitation and war that the differences examined in the present document have arisen.

Differences as such, even on cardinal questions of strategy and tactics, are no cause for alarm or surprise in the international Communist movement. But using such differences to undermine or destroy the unity of the socialist world camp and the international Communist movement is alien to Marxism and extremely damaging to the international Communist movement and all humanity. And this is one of the gravest errors committed by the leadership of the Communist Party of China.

Resorting to systematic actions which af first seemed inexplicable and caused surprise in other parties but which, as developments have shown, were part of a far-reaching plan elaborated in advance (and designated as the plan of "three great world-wide ideological campaigns"), the Chinese comrades set to work to deepen the differences and to worsen relations with the entire international Communist movement to the extreme, and then launched a vigorous drive to split the socialist world camp and the international Communist movement as well as individual parties. This divisive struggle was launched on a scale and by means without precedent in the history of the international Communist movement.

No Communist Party can remain indifferent to this state of affairs. It is a matter of deep concern to every Communist, to every progressive throughout the world.

The Chinese leaders, departing from the general line of the international Communist movement, unleashed a campaign of slander and invective against the leadership of many Communist and Workers' parties. They sling mud at the leaders of the Communist parties of France, Italy, U.S.A., Brazil, Spain, Australia, Belgium, etc., calling them "modern revisionists" who are "in the service of imperialism", and accusing them of "betrayal", "cowardice", etc. It is symptomatic that all the scum thrown out of the various Communist parties are raising their heads and, holding up the basic theses of the Chinese comrades, waging a struggle against these parties. No wonder, then, that the leaders of the C.P.C. have been congratulated and warmly greeted even by the Trotskyite so-called Fourth International.

The international Communist movement has regarded with anxiety the disruptive activies of the Chinese comrades, but at the same time it has displayed great patience and forebearance in the hope that the Chinese comrades would ponder over the serious damage they have caused to the international Communist movement and would return to the correct positions. But the Chinese comrades gave a wrong interpretation to this fraternal attitude which was prompted by a sense of proletarian unity, and hardened their erroneous stand still more.

Ever since the differences came to light the Communist Party of Salvador has fervently hoped that they would be overcome in conformity with the standards of proletarian internationalism and that no actions damaging the unity of the international Communist movement would be taken. Regrettably, however, the disruptive actions of the C.P.C. have assumed such proportions that our Party cannot but condemn them; our Party once again confirms its resolve to uphold the unity of the international Communist movement based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism.

VI. Struggle Against Deviations from Marxism-Leninism

... Rarely has anyone pursued a sectarian line on the fundamental questions of the strategy and tactics of the international Communist movement in so glaring a form as the leaders of the C.P.C. today. If the international Communist movement were to take an attitude similar to that of the leaders of the C.P.C. towards the peace movement and the international democratic organizations, we Communists would find ourselves isolated, both at home and on the international arena, from the broad progressive masses adhering to diverse religious faiths and political views. Such a loss of contact with the interests of the masses would inevitably postpone the final victory of the peoples in the struggle against imperialism, for peace and socialism.

The Chinese comrades refused to admit that they had committed an error in creating a cult of the personality of Mao Tse-tung, and proceeded to misrepresent the efforts that were being made to combat the personality cult, which did so much harm to the international Communist movement.

A petty-bourgeois nationalist deviation is becoming ever more clearly evident in the position of the Chinese comrades on a number of questions; and this confirms the correctness of the recommendations contained in the 81-Party Statement that the Communist movement should regard struggle against "all manifestations of nationalism and chauvinism" as one of its prime duties. It would be tragic if these deviations were to lead to manifestations of racism, which is utterly alien to the class outlook of Marxists; yet indications of this are already apparent in some of the statements issued by the Chinese comrades . . .

. . . In view of the foregoing, the Communist Party of Salvador declares:

that it firmly adheres to the principled positions of the international Communist movement; that it is guided by the principles laid down in the statements of the meetings of the Communist and Workers' parties of 1957 and 1960; it considers that these statements have fully demonstrated their historical correctness;

the Party considers that the practical realization of the principles of the international Communist movement by the Communist and Workers' parties has created better conditions and prospects for the struggle of the peoples;

it cannot regard as correct the line and ideological position adopted at the present time by the Chinese comrades; this position and line do not accord with the general line endorsed by the whole international Communist movement;

the Party recognizes the great Soviet Union and its Party, founded by the leader of the world proletariat Vladimir Ilyich Lenin, as the indomitable and invincible vanguard of the international Communist movement;

the Party believes that in the struggle for Marxist-Leninist principles these principles will inevitably prevail over revisionism, dogmatism and sectarianism; the Party holds that the public debate could even be continued provided the hostile tone is abandoned;

the Party is in favour of calling a conference of the Communist and Workers' parties to discuss concrete instances of mistakes which one or another fraternal Party has committed, or is presumed to have committed, in carrying out the general line; and lastly, the Communist Party of Salvador addresses to the Communist Party of China and to all the Communist and Workers' parties a fervent appeal for unity on the basis of the principles by which the international Communist movement is guided.

The cause of peace, democracy, national liberation, socialism and communism will emerge from these grave trials stronger than ever before.

Under the banner of Lenin, forward to the final victory of the working class and the peoples of the whole world!

"Proletarians and oppressed peoples the world over, unite!"

Should the National-Liberation Movement Fear International Détente

LARBI BOUHALI

The underlying factor of the foreign policy of the Algerian People's Republic is the struggle against colonialism and imperialism, the friendship and solidarity with the peoples, particularly the peoples of the Arab, African and socialist countries, the fight for peace and peaceful coexistence. At the Addis Ababa conference of the heads of state and government of African countries held in May 1963 Algeria played a paramount role in intensifying the anti-colonialist struggle with a view to achieving the complete liberation of Africa from colonial oppression, building African unity and transforming the continent into a nuclear and missile free zone.

The people of Algeria like all the peoples of the world passionately strive for peace. And the foreign policy of the Ben Bella government is deeply coloured with this striving for peace on the part of our people.

Immediately after the announcement of the Moscow test-ban treaty presidents Ben Bella and Julius Nyerere welcomed it in a joint statement which said: "It is with great satisfaction that we learnt about the conclusion of a treaty banning nuclear-weapon tests. We are convinced that this treaty expresses the legitimate aspirations of all peoples and that it will largely contribute to the strengthening of world peace and security."

In an interview with the newspaper Izvestia Hadj Ben Alla, President of the National Assembly of the Algerian Republic, declared: "I maintain that the Moscow test-ban treaty is the outstanding event of the year for all countries and, notably, for Algeria."

The Algerians rejoice over the fact that the overwhelming majority of the states in the world have adopted the same attitude to the Moscow Treaty as our own government inasmuch as the treaty expresses the profound will of all the peoples, and notably the peoples who have won their freedom or are still fighting against the colonial yoke.

Moscow treaty. But it is difficult for us to understand a similar attitude on the part of the Chinese leadres, who claim that the treaty is directed against their country. While they have feelings of admiration for the great Chinese people, the Algerians categorically reject the standpoint of the Chinese leaders according to which the Moscow treaty is a "betrayal" of the interests of the peoples. This is not only gross calumny against the Soviet Union and the glorious Party of Lenin but also an insolent challenge to all the peoples who support the actions of their governments in this direction and, consequently, a challenge to the Algerian people. The betrayal of the interests of the peoples consists in the fact that a struggle is being waged against the cause dear to all the peoples under the pretext that the imperialists were compelled to support it. In fact, however, the opposition of the Chinese leaders to the Moscow test-ban treaty derives from their erroneous attitude to the general line of the international Communist and working-class movement and, in particular, to the struggle against war, for the strengthening of world peace.

The Chinese leaders maintain that the policy of peaceful coexistence, which they themselves earlier supported, is demobilizing the peoples and retarding their struggle for national and social emancipation. In order to push through their adventurist standpoint they are trying to counterpose the national-liberation movement to the international working class and its principal gain, the socialist world system. But, in effect, what right do they have to speak on behalf of the national-liberation movement after they have refused to honour their commitments in the international democratic organizations and launched a violent campaign against one of the deepest aspirations of the peoples which compose this national-liberation movement? Why did they ignore the Addis Ababa conference which gave a clear expression to the opinion of the African peoples on the question of war and peace? Or perhaps they consider all the heads of state and government who attended that conference to be traitors to their peoples?

Is it necessary to remind that peaceful coexistence has never meant, nor will it ever mean, renouncing the struggle of the oppressed countries against the oppressors, of the exploited against the exploiters, the struggle between the two diametrically opposed ideologies, as the Chinese leaders would like us to believe? When it is a question of peaceful coexistence between states with different socio-economic systems, the revolutionaries have in mind the peaceful coexistence of the socialist and the capitalist countries. The peaceful coexistence imposed by the peoples on the imperialists creates a real possibility for humanity as a whole to avoid a terrible nuclear catastrophe. No nation, no forward-looking person, can remain indifferent to this perspective. But if it is true that peaceful coexistence rids the people of a nuclear holocaust, it is equally true that it cannot either arrest or retard the national-liberation movement and the class struggle. On the contrary, it presupposes their continued development. Moreover, it creates even more favourable conditions for this development as can be seen from the experience of the postwar years.

Before the Second World War imperialism dominated the majority of the population and reigned on most of the territory of the world. And after the end of the war, i. e., in the conditions of peaceful co-existence, over 50 countries with a population of 1,500 million won political independence.

Why did not these countries win their national independence before or during the Second World War? Did not they want it or did not they fight for it? To think so would mean to abuse them. It is common knowledge that each people subjected to colonial oppression has not for a moment ceased to fight against it. On the other hand, it is not of their free will that the imperialists granted independence to the peoples. This means that the peoples won their independence in struggle and that this struggle proceeded in far more favourable conditions.

No Adventurism!

The liberation from colonialism requires above all that the peoples concerned fight against it, and this is the principal condition of success. But the peoples are not waging this struggle in one and the same form. Some of them had to have recourse to armed struggle, to partisan warfare combined with various forms of mass political action—and all this over a span of many years. This, for example, was the case with the peoples of Vietnam and Algeria. For others it was enough to take political action to obtain independence. An example of this is Guinea and many other territories of former French Africa south of the Sahara. This means that an insurrection which can be indispensable for one people is not absolutely necessary in all cases, as claimed by the Chinese leaders who brand as counter-revolutionaries all those who do not favour armed insurrection in all cases. Had the Algerian people had a chance to achieve independence in a peaceful way, it would never have agreed to sacrifice more than a million of its sons and daughters whom it needs alive for national construction. But when imperialism confronted it with violence, it did not hesitate to use the same means and stopped at no sacrifices.

For true Marxists-Leninists an armed insurrection is not a game of chance. It is imperative that it should have the maximum of chances of success, and for this it is necessary to take cognizance of the sum-total of objective and subjective conditions. To fail to do so and seek to impose on the people an armed uprising as the sole means of their liberation means to plunge them into an adventure.

As a matter of fact, the Algerians have already seen for themselves the workings of this adventurist policy of the Chinese leaders. During a meeting with a delegation of the Algerian Communist Party in October 1959 in Peking the latter criticized the decision of the Algerian Party to disband its armed groups and merge them with the National-Liberation Army. They suggested that the A.C.P. should do everything to re-establish these armed units as soon as possible, saying that a Party without its own armed forces was nothing. Our delegation rejected this "suggestion" as harmful both for the Communist Party and the Algerian people as a whole.

In order to shake off the chains of colonialism our people made enormous sacrifices and engaged in glorious struggle, which was undoubtedly the decisive factor of our victory. But every Algerian realizes that, no matter how heroic this struggle was, alone it could not have defeated the most powerful colonial army ever known to history. If the people of Algeria won, this was because their struggle developed in a favourable international situation.

The imperialist countries, with the exception of the U.S.A., were weakened by the Second World War. This circumstance encouraged the struggle of the colonial peoples which began to shatter the colonial system of imperialism. Every nation that won its freedom made new breaches in the flanks of imperialism and rendered active support to the struggle of other peoples. That was how the national-liberation movement grew. At the same time a movement and struggle for democracy and peace got under way in the capitalist countries and began to render political and moral support to the national-liberation movement.

But these two movements could not have reached their scope without the emergence and strengthening of the socialist countries which formed a world system of socialism. It is the joint efforts of these three mutually complimentary world forces that are steadily sapping the foundations of imperialism and will ultimately vanquish it.

To try to isolate the national-liberation movement and counterpose it to other progressive forces, as the Chinese leaders are doing, means to harm the interests of all peoples and objectively play into the hands of the imperialists.

All peoples know full well that without the socialist countries, without the Soviet Union and its great economic, scientific and technological achievements, the image of the world would be different today. The stronger the socialist system the greater the political, moral and material aid it is rendering to all peoples, both those which are fighting for their liberation and those building their independent states.

All peoples know that it was thanks to the vigorous actions of the Soviet Union that the imperialist aggressors had to retreat in many countries such as Cuba, Egypt, Syria and Iraq.

In defiance of the indisputable historical facts, the Chinese leaders accuse the Soviet Union of not supporting the struggle of the peoples against colonialism. They claim that it did not want to support Algeria in the liberation war against French colonialism. As for the Algerian people, they know and highly appreciate the aid rendered them by the U.S.S.R. in the political and diplomatic fields as well as the material aid, including arms and munitions. The Algerian leaders, be it said, often recall this aid, as did President Ben Bella in an interview with the Soviet journalists during the Third World Meeting of Journalists in Algiers: "We," he said, "are much obliged to the peoples of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries for the aid they have given us and for the great material aid we are receiving at present, at the time when we are launching out on the building of a highly developed and independent socialist economy."

In the future we shall be able to receive the ever-growing aid of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries as these countries develop their economy and go from success to success. And for this there must be peaceful coexistence and further international détente. The aggression unleashed by the Moroccan monarchy against our borders has shown that had our people been forced to wage a prolonged war to protect our territorial integrity, this would have caused grave damage to the building of our national economy and to the development of our revolution.

Such are the additional reasons explaining why the Algerian Communists resolutely support the consistent policy of peace pursued by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries as well as the struggle for peaceful coexistence, for general and controlled disarmament.

STRUGGLE OF THE CPSU FOR THE UNITY OF THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

REPORT AT THE PLENARY MEETING OF THE FEBRUARY 14, 1964, CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE SOVIET UNION.

M. A. Suslov

Comrades, this Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union has examined basic questions of agricultural development, questions that are of the utmost importance to our country, to the Soviet people. This Plenary Meeting is working in an atmosphere of complete unanimity of the Central Committee, the entire Party, the whole Soviet people. Its decisions will open up broad vistas for the Soviet economy and vast opportunities for a steady rise of socialist agriculture, for the flourishing of our country's production forces, for the creation of the material and technical basis of communism and for the fullest satisfaction of the material and spiritual requirements of the Soviet people.

In showing constant concern for the development of the country's economy, our Party is fulfilling its internationalist duty to the working people of the whole world. The greater our economic successes, the better the life of the Soviet people, the higher the prestige of the world's first socialist state and the greater the attractive force of the ideas of socialism and communism. By their tireless labor the Soviet people are making their contribution towards strengthening the world socialist system and rendering increasing aid and support to the struggle of the peoples of all countries for social and national liberation, against imperialism and colonialism.

The revolutionary process, which has embraced all the continents of the world, continues to develop in breadth and depth. New successes have been scored in the development of the world socialist system. The working-class movement in the capitalist countries is gaining strength. The national liberation struggle of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America is broadening out. The superiority of the forces of socialism and peace over the forces of imperialism and war is becoming ever clearer. Through the joint efforts of the world socialist system and all other peace-loving forces it has become possible to achieve a certain relaxation of international tension and to take further important steps towards consolidating peace and foiling the attempts of the most aggressive imperialist circles to start a thermonuclear war. The course of world development fully bears out the correctness of the general line worked out for the international Communist movement at the 1957 and 1960 meetings of the fraternal parties, and the vitality of the conclusion and propositions of the 20th and 22nd congresses of our Party and of the Leninist Program of the CPSU.

The achievements of the socialist countries, of the entire world Communist movement, are obvious. But our success could have been much more far-reaching had it not been for the serious difficulties that arose in the socialist camp and the Communist movement as a result of the splitting activities of the leaders of the Communist Party of China.

The Central Committee members have been repeatedly informed of the differences between the CPS leadership and the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties. However, the Presidium of the CC considered it necessary to raise this question once again at this Plenary Meeting because the Chinese leaders have gone even further in their factional activities and created a direct threat of a split in the world Communist movement.

If we analyze the evolution of the views and actions of the CPC leadership, beginning with the 1960 Moscow meeting, we shall see that during all these years, instead of trying to eliminate the differences, the Chinese leaders have been making them more acute. Starting out with a revision of certain tactical propositions of the world Communist movement, they have, step by step, widened their rift with the CPSU and other fraternal Parties on cardinal problems of modern times and, in the end, have opposed to the general policy of the world Communist movement their own special line, in which the fundamental theses of the Declaration and Statement are revised from the standpoint of great-power chauvinism and petty-bourgeois adventurism.

The new assessments and conclusions made collectively by the fraternal parties on the basis of a creative application of the principles of Marxism-Leninism to the conditions obtaining in our epoch —on the role of the world socialist system, on the ways of building socialism and communism, on the possibility of averting a world war, on the peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems, on the need for combating the personality cult ideology and practices, and on the forms of transition to socialism in the developed capitalist countries and in the newly-free countries — are distorted and to all intents and purposes thrown overboard by the Chinese leadership.

Having to all intents and purposes rejected the Declaration and Statement collectively drawn up by the Communist and Workers' Parties, the CPC leaders offer the fraternal parties their own notorious "25-point program". Essentially, this program boils down to the renunciation of the ever-growing influence of the socialist system on the course of world development, a disparaging attitude to the struggles of the working class of the capitalist countries, the setting of the national liberation movement against the world system of socialism and the international working-class movement, adventurism in foreign policy and the preservation of the state of cold war. It involves sectarianism and putschism in questions of revolution, the defense and preservation of the personality cult methods and practices, which have been condemned by the Communist movement, and justification of the factional struggle in the Communist movement.

The Chinese leaders have thus brought their disagreements with the Communist movement to such a stage where they have virtually developed into differences on all basic questions.

The participants in this Plenary Meeting know that the CC, CPSU, has on many occasions shown initiative in an effort to create the conditions for surmounting these differences, for normalizing the relations of the CPC with the CPSU and other parties.

Like other Marxist-Leninist parties, we have repeatedly proposed to the CPC leadership that public polemics be stopped. Such a proposal, in particular, was made in N. S. Khrushchov's speeches on October 25 and November 7, 1963. At the end of November 1963 the Central Committee of the CPSU sent the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China a letter in which a number of concrete proposals were made for eliminating differences and strengthening economic, scientific, technical and cultural co-operation between the USSR and the CPR. In that letter the CC, CPSU, once again proposed stopping the open polemics. You know, comrades that during the past few months, acting in conformity with that proposal, the Soviet press has refrained from publishing any polemical material.

How did the Chinese leaders react to these steps? Blinded by nationalist arrogance, they paid no heed to the opinions and appeals of the fraternal parties. They rejected our initiative and took the road of open political struggle against the collectively worked out line of the Marxist-Leninist parties.

The Chinese press continuously publishes material containing the most flagrant attacks against the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties. Just in the period after October 25, 1963, the Jenminjihpao, organ of the CC, CPC, carried more than 200 articles of this nature. Slanderous articles are circulated throughout the world by Chinese organizations and broadcast over the radio in foreign languages; moreover, many anti-Soviet articles are broadcast several scores of times. Strange as it may seem, the indoctrination of the Chinese people in a spirit of hostility towards the USSR and the CPSU has now become almost the main aspect of the activity of the CC, CPC. A huge propaganda machine is now actively engaged in preparing material slurring the CPSU and the Soviet Union.

The general trend of Chinese propaganda and the brazenness of its attacks against the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties are increasingly bringing it in line with the anti-Soviet, anti-communist organs of the reactionary imperialist circles.

As an example, let us take the articles of a series of so-called "answers" to the Open Letter of the CC, CPSU, of July 14, 1963, published on February 4 by the newspaper Jenminjihpao and the magazine Hungchi. From first to last, this article, beginning with the heading, The CPSU Leaders Are the Greatest Splitters of Our Times, consists of foul anti-Soviet thrusts and slanders against the CC CPSU and its leadership. It has nothing in common with the most elementary norms governing relations between Communists and is an insult to our entire Party and whole Soviet people. This article contains such wild allegations as that our Party "in collusion with U.S. imperialism, world reaction, the Tito clique of renegades and Right-wing Social-Democrats is waging a struggle against fraternal socialist countries, against fraternal parties, against all Marxist-Leninists and revolutionary peoples of the world."

Not very long ago Chinese propaganda aimed its attacks mainly at the CPSU's foreign policy, but now it openly attacks our home policy as well. The CPC leaders are doing their level best to discredit the line adopted at the 20th Congress of the CPSU on all questions, proclaim the struggle against the Stalin cult a mistake and cast aspersions on the Program of the CPSU.

Reviving the practices and methods used by Trotskyites, the Chinese leaders are trying to drive a wedge between the Soviet people, the Soviet Communists, on the one hand, and the Party leaders, the leadership of the country, on the other. Matters have reached a stage where the Chinese press and radio are calling upon Soviet people to oppose the CC, CPSU, and the Soviet government.

What is this? A struggle for the "purity" of Marxism-Leninism? No. It signifies a complete renunciation of elementary norms of relations between Communist parties, a renunciation of Marxist-Leninist principles of relations between socialist countries, a transition to positions of undisguised anti-Sovietism.

The leaders of the CPC no longer limit themselves to action in the sphere of ideology. They have transferred ideological differences to inter-state relations, to the sphere of the practical political line of the socialist countries and the Communist parties. Seeking to weaken the unity and solidarity of the socialist commonwealth, the CPC leaders are resorting to all sorts of manoeuvres and dodges in order to undermine the economic and political relations between the socialist countries and disorganize their actions in the international arena. Recently the Chinese leaders have sharply intensified their splitting, undermining activities in the world Communist movement. There is now no longer any doubt that Peking is steering a course towards splitting the Communist parties, towards setting up factions and groups hostile to Marxism-Leninism.

Such, comrades, is the actual situation that has taken shape in the Communist movement as a result of the splitting activities of the CPC leadership.

In an effort to screen their departure from Marxism-Leninism, the Chinese leaders have recently become more active in their manoeuvres, masking their objectives and designs and harping importunately on their "revolutionism", "courage", "determination" and so forth. But the further events develop, the more hysterical is the tone of Chinese propaganda and the more evident it becomes that the real plans of the Chinese leadership have nothing to do with Marxism-Leninism, with the interests of world socialism. It is becoming increasingly clear that behind the mask of ultra-revolutionary phrases and slogans, the CPC leadership are now savagely attacking the gains of world socialism, concentrating their main fire not against the imperialists but primarily against the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties.

True, the Chinese leaders continue to talk a lot about their striving for unity and solidarity in the socialist commonwealth. But their deeds completely diverge from these words.

They harp on unity, but all their actions have a different purpose, that of disorganizing and splitting the socialist camp, undermining the ideological foundations and organizational and political principles that rally and unite the peoples of the socialist commonwealth. They want to impose upon the socialist countries a "Sinified socialism", an adventurist line in foreign and domestic policy, and the personality cult ideology and practices.

The Chinese leaders keep harping on their desire to "strengthen" the international Communist movement, to "purge" it of "modern revisionism" and unite it on a "new foundation". But the real aim of the CPC leadership is to split the united Communist front, oppose the Communist movement with a bloc of pro-Chinese factions and groups, and subordinate the Communist parties to their influence, using all sorts of political apostates — renegades of communism, anarchists, Trotskyites and so on.

The Chinese leaders prattle about their being the most reliable and tested friends of the national liberation movement. But whoever believes this will be sadly disillusioned. The aim of the CPC leadership is to impose their adventurist concepts and methods upon the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America, to counterpose the peoples on racial grounds, and disrupt the alliance between the national liberation and the working-class movement, which can only disorganize and weaken the national liberation movement.

Lately the Chinese leaders have been claiming that they are the true champions of peace and consistent advocates of peaceful coexistence between states with different social and economic systems. But who will believe them? Their provocatory stand during the Caribbean crisis, their refusal to sign the Moscow partial test-ban treaty, and their ceaseless efforts to slander the peaceful foreign policy of the Soviet Union have shown the whole world their reluctance to work for relaxation of world tensions and their desire to preserve the cold war as a suitable background for an adventurist policy.

All the arguments that the leaders of the CC, CPC, so eagerly put forward about the interests of the world revolution and about the liberation struggle of the peoples are, in effect, designed to screen from world public opinion, from Communists, the principal strategic line of subordinating at all costs the Communist and national-liberation movement to their great-power, egoistical interests. For the sake of this the principles of proletarian internationalism are being flagrantly trampled. To this end the Marxist-Leninist teaching is reshaped and distorted and use is made of the worst traditions of petty-bourgeois nationalism and the most unscrupulous demagogy and slander.

I

TWO APPROACHES TO THE PROBLEM OF THE ROLE OF THE WORLD SOCIALIST SYSTEM

The radical changes that took place in the world after the Second World War are linked up chiefly with the rise and development of a world system of socialism. The countries of the socialist commonwealth are the main bulwark of all the revolutionary forces of modern times, a reliable champion of world peace. The struggle between world socialism and world imperialism is the principal content of our epoch, the pivot of the class struggle on a world scale.

There was a time when the Chinese leaders subscribed to this major proposition of Marxism-Leninism. Lately, however, the CPC leadership have been setting the national-liberation movement off against the socialist system and the working-class movement in the capitalist countries, proclaiming it as the main force in the struggle against imperialism and undermining the unity of the revolutionary forces of our time. In its letter of June 14, 1963, the CC, CPC, makes the claim that the"vast regions of Asia, Africa and Latin America" are the centre of the contradictions of the modern world, the "storm-centre of the world revolution".

An editorial carried by Jenminjihpao and Hungchi on October 22, 1963, states: "The national-liberation revolution in Asia, Africa and Latin America is now becoming the most important force that is dealing a direct blow at imperialism."

This clearly revises the Marxist teaching on the historical role of the working class and belittles the working-class movement in the developed capitalist countries. As regards the world socialist system, the Chinese theoreticians apportion to it only the role of a "strong point" to support and develop the revolution of the oppressed nations and peoples of the whole world. It goes without saying that this stand can only harm both the socialist system and the national liberation movement, the great cause of the struggle of the international proletariat.

According to the views of the Chinese theoreticians, the world socialist system not only fails to exert an increasingly decisive influence on the entire course of world development but does not even play an independent role in the revolutionary struggle of the masses against imperialism.

This interpretation of the role and significance of the world socialist system does not conform with the actual balance of forces in the world and runs counter to the conclusions drawn by the fraternal parties in their Statement of 1960.

The idea that modern world development is based on the contradiction between socialism and capitalism belongs to Lenin. He wrote: ". . . the relations between peoples, the entire world system of states are determined by the struggle of a small group of imperialist nations against the Soviet movement and the Soviet states headed by Soviet Russia. If we lose sight of that we shall be unable correctly to formulate a single national or colonial question, even if it concerned the most remote corner of the world. Only by proceeding from this standpoint can the Communist parties correctly formulate and resolve political problems both in the civilized and in the backward countries." (Collected Works, Vol. 31, p. 216, Russ. ed.)

This was written during the early years of Soviet power. In our day, when instead of only one socialist country there is a mighty socialist camp, its influence on "the relations between peoples," on "the entire world system of states" and, in the final analysis, on the world revolutionary process has grown tremendously.

Attaching the utmost significance to the national liberation movement, Marxist-Leninists at the same time hold that the main content, the main trend and the main features of the historical development of human society in the modern epoch are determined by the world socialist system, by the forces struggling against imperialism, and for the socialist reorganization of society. The most organized class forces, primarily the bulk of the working class, the most advanced class of modern society which, as our teachers Marx, Engels and Lenin pointed out, is the grave-digger of capitalism, are concentrated precisely this bridgehead.

The prime role in the world revolutionary process is played by the socialist countries. This is seen firstly in the fact that the working class, the working people of these countries, are successfully resolving social problems and building a new society where oppression and exploitation are unknown and for which the peoples are taking the road of revolution. By creating the material and technical basis of socialism and communism, the socialist countries are inflicting one blow after another on imperialism in the decisive sphere of human activity, in the sphere of material production. When the workers and peasants in the capitalist countries see the achievements of the socialist states in economic development, in raising the standard of living, in promoting democracy and in drawing the masses into state administration they become convinced in practice that the basic requirements of working people can be satisfied only on the road of socialism. All this infuses the masses with a revolutionary spirit and helps to draw them into an active struggle against the capitalist system, for social and national liberation.

Secondly, the farther we progress the greater becomes the role of the socialist states as a force directly opposing the aggressive counter-revolutionary designs of imperialism. Under conditions where the might of the Soviet Union and the entire socialist commonwealth holds the main forces of international reaction and aggression in check the working masses and peoples of the colonial countries have the most favorable opportunity for waging a struggle against imperialism and internal reaction. Anyone who followed the development of international events in the post-war years could not fail to see that there is an extremely close link between the successes of the revolutionary struggle in the capitalist countries, the victories of the national liberation movement and the growth of the might of the world socialist system.

Victory over capitalism on a world scale can be achieved solely through the joint efforts of the world socialist system the working-class movement and the national liberation struggle. Each of these forces makes its own contribution to the anti-imperialist struggle. However, one cannot fail to see that the struggle of the world socialist system against imperialism is the focal point of world policy, of the whole of social development.

The Marxist-Leninists can have no doubt as to the primary, increasingly decisive role which the world socialist system plays, and has to play, in bringing about the triumph of the new social system all over the globe. The historical mission of the socialist countries is determined by the objective laws of social development, by the irrefutable fact that the countries in which socialism has triumphed are today in the vanguard not only of the socialist forces, but of the progressive forces of the world. They are not only a beacon lighting up mankind's road to social progress but a powerful material force embodying Marxist-Leninist ideas, a force which is fighting capitalism and is bound to defeat it in the decisive sphere of human activity, the sphere of material production.

All the facts indicate that the socialist countries can within a historically short time surpass the capitalist countries economically. Let us recall that total industrial output in the socialist countries in 1962 was roughly eight times as great as it had been on their territory in 1937, whereas the capitalist countries registered only a 2.6-fold increase. The world socialist system has now attained a new stage in economic competition with capitalism. In 1950 the socialist countries' share in world industrial production was about one-fifth; today it exceeds one-third.

It is the internationalist duty of the Communists of the socialist countries to continue effectively building the new society, promoting their economy and strengthening their defenses, consolidating the socialist community, and striving to ensure that socialist ideas exercise an increasing appeal to the working people as they are translated into reality. Nowadays the merits of socialism are judged not only by theoretical writings, but, above all, by what is done in practice, by the way in which Communists actually solve the problems of building the new society. If we accomplish this task properly, we shall greatly promote the struggle for socialism in other countries, and if we don't, it will be a blow to that struggle.

What is the attitude of the CPC leadership towards Lenin's conclusion that socialist countries influence the development of the world revolution mainly by their economic achievements? Do the CPC leaders stand for peaceful economic competition?

The CPC leadership, misrepresenting the issue, argues that economic competition means that "the oppressed peoples and nations have no need at all to fight and to rise in revolt" and that "they have merely to wait quietly until the Soviet Union outstrips the most developed capitalist country in level of production and standard of living . . ."

gle of the peoples of different countries for their emancipation," or that the achievements of socialism in economic competition will lead to the "automatic" collapse of capitalism and release the peoples from the necessity of waging class and national liberation struggles. Peking is putting forward these false ideas with the express aim of discrediting the idea of economic competition between the two systems. The fact is that the Marxist-Leninists see the revolutionizing effect of the victories of socialism in economic competition precisely in the fact that these victories stimulate the class struggle of the working people and make them politically conscious fighters for socialism. Peaceful economic competition, far from dooming the people to waiting passively, arouses their revolutionary activity. This is fully realized by the imperialists, who dread progress in the socialist countries and try to hinder that progress.

You will observe, comrades, that the issue of peaceful economic competition is far from being merely an economic issue. It also has profound political significance, for to defeat capitalism economically means making it much easier for all revolutionary forces to fight against imperialism. And this is a political issue.

Our Party regards it as its chief task to build up the economic and defense potential of the Soviet Union and the world socialist commonwealth as a whole, and to increase its influence on the entire revolutionary process. We shall continue steadily and consistently to press forward our policy of carrying out the Program of the CPSU for the construction of communism, the most just of social systems, in our country. Communist construction is a tremendous contribution to the fulfilment of the Soviet people's internationalist duty. This road was charted by the great Lenin. Nothing and no one can ever divert us from this Leninist road.

To win out in economic competition with capitalism, the socialist countries must make proper use of the advantages of socialism, both in each country and throughout the world socialist system. In practice, this implies a considerable expansion of political as well as mutually beneficial economic relations between socialist countries, and the promotion of cultural, scientific and technical cooperation among them. It is in this direction that the activities of the CPSU and other fraternal parties have been developing.

By contrast, the Chinese leaders have in recent years shown that they have no interest in strengthening the unity of the world socialist system. The CPR has not only stopped co-ordinating its actions with other socialist countries, but is openly combating the agreed line of the socialist countries in the world arena. The Chinese leadership has openly set out to shake the foundations of the socialist community and to abolish economic relations with socialist countries, particularly with the countries affiliated with the Council for Mutual Economic Aid and above all the Soviet Union. In 1962 the CPR's trade with the Council countries decreased by 65 per cent compared with 1959, and in 1963 it dropped by almost another 20 per cent.

The Chinese leaders' propaganda shows that they are frankly bent on discrediting economic relations between the socialist countries

belonging to CMEA; this evidently meets their disruptive aims. Trying to sow discord among the socialist countries, the Chinese leaders do not stop at using lies and slander spread by imperialist propaganda. No sooner does the bourgeois press carry a falsehood about the Soviet Union or some other socialist country than Chinese propaganda seizes on the calumny.

The Communist parties of the socialist countries, in doing away with the consequences of the personality cult, have cleared the ground for closer relations between fraternal countries on the basis of the Leninist principles of proletarian internationalism. It is well known that a necessary condition for the development of the socialist system as a whole is to promote the independence and sovereignty of each socialist country. Failing this there can be no truly voluntary and solid union of nations. Fraternal parties reacted to the line adopted by the 20th Congress of the CPSU as the only correct, Leninist direction in which to develop relations between the socialist countries.

The Chinese leaders do not like that line, however. All indications as that they would like to be able to give orders in the socialist commonwealth as in their own estate, to impose their will on other countries, and to dictate the terms on which they would either admit whole parties and peoples into the socialist system or "excommunicate" them from it at will.

Take, for example, the CPC leaders' attitude towards Yugoslavia. As late as 1955-56 the Chinese leadership spoke highly of the progress of socialist construction there. In the autumn of 1957, Jenminjihpao wrote in an article devoted to Chinese-Yugoslav friendship: "The peoples of our countries are advancing along the socialist road." The same newspaper stated: ". . . Yugoslavia has made great progress in socialist construction." This was how people in China spoke of the nature of the socio-political system in Yugoslavia a mere five or six years ago. Today they say and write something entirely different about Yugoslavia. Jenminjihpao now alleges that in Yugoslavia "there exists a dictatorship of the bourgeoisie; indeed, it not only exists but is the most barbarous fascist dictatorship" and that Yugoslavia is a "counter-revolutionary special force of U.S. imperialism . . ."

The question arises what has happened in Yugoslavia? What facts, what actual developments in the socio-economic and political life of that country, have entitled Chinese theoreticians to reverse their estimations so abruptly? There are no such facts or developments, and there haven't been any. Anyone who proceeds not from a subjective standpoint, but from objective laws, from the Marxist-Leninist doctrine, must admit that Yugoslavia is a socialist country and that, moreover, the positions of socialism are growing stronger in Yugoslavia. Indeed, while in 1958 the socialist sector comprised 100 per cent in industry, 6 per cent in agriculture and 97 per cent in trade, today, a few years after the Chinese press praised Yugoslavia's achievements in socialist construction, the socialist sector is still 100 per cent in the country's industry, as much as 15 per cent (instead of 6 per cent in agriculture and 100 per cent (instead of 97 per cent in trade. All these facts go to show that the Yugoslav economy is developing as a socialist economy.

Anyone who does not take white for black but looks at things objectively, is bound to see that Yugoslavia supports the socialist countries' fight for world peace and peaceful coexistence, general and complete disarmament, the prohibition of nuclear weapons, the restoration of the legitimate rights of the CPR in the UN, and so on.

Why, then, do the Chinese leaders shut their eyes to all these facts? Why do they now insult the heroic Yugoslav people by calling Yugoslavia a fascist country? We have put this question to the Chinese leaders on more than one occasion but have never received from them anything like a coherent answer.

The Chinese leaders quote the 1960 Statement of fraternal parties, which said that the revolutionary gains in Yugoslavia were imperilled by the errors of the LCY. Let us note, however, that from what the Statement says, it did not deny even then but, on the contrary, confirmed the existence of definite revolutionary, socialist achievements in Yugoslavia and that, secondly, later years have shown the positions of socialism to have become much stronger in Yugoslavia, a development which we certainly welcome.

While striving to improve relations with Yugoslavia, and being firmly convinced that this meets the interests of the socialist cause, we Soviet Communists do not at all conceal the ideological differences which persist between the Communist movement and the League of Communists of Yugoslavia. We have said as much to the Yugoslav comrades. But we maintain that the existence of differences is by no means a reason for "excommunicating" Yugoslavia from socialism. One cannot arbitrarily, acting on a subjective impulse and, furthermore, doctoring and distorting the facts, permit or forbid this or that people to build socialism. And yet this is precisely what the Chinese leaders are trying to do.

The Yugoslav example brings out with particular clarity the Chinese leaders' claim to the role of "supreme arbiters" of relations between the socialist countries who should judge which country is socialist and which isn't. Today they have, in defiance of the facts, "excommunicated" Yugoslavia from socialism. Tomorrow it may occur to the CPC leadership to do the same with regard to other socialist countries. But what has this subjectivist and arbitrary approach to do with Marxism-Leninism? This is a method fit only for those who set at nothing the interests of the unity and solidarity of the socialist countries.

Or take the so-called Albanian question, about which the CC membership and our Party as a whole have been repeatedly informed. It is well known that from 1960 on, the leaders of the Albanian Party of Labor abruptly changed their political line, although we did not give them any cause to do so, and embarked on hostile actions against the CPSU and other fraternal parties. The government of the People's Republic of Albania has virtually broken off political, economic and military co-operation wtih the Soviet Union and most of the other socialist countries.

It was hard to see at first what had prompted Hoxha's and Shehu's anti-Soviet moves. But as time went on it became more and more obvious that the Albanian leaders were taking their cue from someone else, for they repeated word for word what was said or written in Peking.

The Sino-Albanian alliance is no accidental development. It arose on the basis of opposition to the Leninist line of the 20th Congress of the CPSU, on the basis of a hostile attitude towards the elimination of the consequences of the Stalin personality cult. Just as in the case of China, the Albanian leaders' defense of the personality cult is due to the fact that over many years they have themselves been implanting the personality cult and using pernicious methods of leadership in Party and country.

At the Third Congress of the APL, in 1956, the Albanian leaders, finding themselves under pressure from the Party membership, who after the 20th Congress of the CPSU had demanded that the suffocating atmosphere of the personality cult be removed and the Leninist standards of Party life re-established in the APL, had to admit publicly that the personality cult in the APL had become "sharply pronounced." But this "admission" and the promise to end the personality cult were no more than a stratagem. As a matter of fact, the Albanian leaders had no intention at all of renouncing their harmful practices. Just when Hoxha was participating in "self-criticism" from the rostrum of the Third Congress, the Albanian police was busy putting in jail or sending into exile members of the Tirana Party organization who at the city Party conference had criticized the Albanian leaders for violating the Leninist standards of Party life, for arbitrary practices and for the persecution of honest Communists.

Hoxha and Shehu combated the line of the 20th Congress because they were afraid of losing their posts, because the establishment of the Leninist standards of Party life in the APL would have ended their arbitrary rule. The Albanian leaders, in taking an anti-Soviet road, put their people in a trying position. They created in Albania difficulties that would not have been present if given normal co-operation with the Soviet Union and other socialist countries.

Soviet people are confident that in spite of the present difficulties in Soviet-Albanian relations, caused by the policy of the Albanian top leaders, the peoples of our two countries will advance together to the common goal, the triumph of socialism and communism. As far as the CPSU is concerned, we are willing, as in the past, to take all necessary steps in this direction.

The CPSU regards it as one of its major tasks to work for the close unity of the world socialist system, for close fraternal relations with all the socialist countries on the basis of complete equality and voluntary co-operation, for the increased solidarity of the socialist countries with the aim of waging a joint struggle against the imperialist aggressors, for world peace, for the complete triumph of communism.

II

QUESTIONS OF WAR, PEACE AND REVOLUTION

Comrades, the fortunes of our great cause, and of the peoples, depend in decisive measure on the Communist movement employing the correct strategy and tactics on questions of war, peace and revolution. It is particularly important to take account of the interconnection and interdependence of these questions today, for never before have the revolutionary achievements of each particular country been so directly bound up with the development of the international situation as a whole, with the world revolutionary process.

The Marxist-Leninist parties see their consistent struggle for peace as fulfilment of their historical responsibility to mankind, which is to prevent the extermination of peoples in the flames of a thermonuclear war. Furthermore, they see it as a most important condition for the successful construction of socialism and communism and for the expansion of the revolutionary struggle of the proletariat of the capitalist countries and of the liberation movement of the peoples oppressed by imperialism.

An all-round analysis of the balance of world forces enabled the Communist and Workers' Parties to draw the cardinal conclusion that world war can be averted even before socialism triumphs throughout the world, and to re-emphasize that the Leninist principle of the peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems is the unshakable basis for the foreign policy of the socialist countries.

As we know, these propositions were laid down in the 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement adopted in Moscow. The experience of recent years, far from shaking belief in the vital necessity of the policy of peaceful coexistence, has, in fact, fully borne it out. It is due to the socialist countries' consistent implementation of this policy, which is supported by hundreds of millions of people all over the world, that we have been able to foil the imperialist reactionaries' schemes against peace. The blessings of peace which mankind enjoys today do not come from the gods. They are a concrete result of the staunch resistance of the peace force, to attempts to unleash a thermonuclear war, a result of the growing power of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, as well as of the correct policy of the Communist parties, which have raised aloft the banner of the struggle for peace and rallied the whole of progressive mankind to this banner.

The Chinese leaders, who engaged first in a controversy with the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties, and then in a political fight against them, showed especial zeal in attacking the conclusions of the 20th Congress of the CPSU and the theses of the Moscow meetings of fraternal parties on questions of war, peace and revolution. They imagined that it was on these points that they would be able to make political capital, and with this aim in view they accused the entire Communist movement of "losing sight of revolutionary perspective" and "surrendering to imperialism."

To impart at least a semblance of veracity to their infamous charges, the Chinese theoreticians resort to a device that is neither clever nor new. Artificially separating two aspects of a single social process from each other, they contrast the fight for peace to the revolutionary movement, and claim that these two highly important tasks are mutually exclusive. From that they allege it follows that those who fight to maintain peace and ward off world war are against revolution and hamper the revolutionary struggle.

One does not require a special Marxist education to see that the CPC leaders, who pose as grandmasters of dialectics, have in fact killed dialectics, which Lenin described as the "living soul" of Marxism. The Communist parties, which hold aloft the banner of the struggle for peace, are with increasing energy stepping up the class struggle of the proletariat and all working people, and the national liberation movement against imperialism.

In their fight against the Leninist policy of peaceful coexistence, which they counter with the idea of giving revolution a "push" by means of war, the CPC leaders have gone as far as to assert that war is an acceptable and, in fact, the only means of settling the contradictions between capitalism and socialism. They ignore the experience of the world Communist movement and exalt the road of the victorious revolution in China as something absolute, trying to make it an incontrovertible truth for all countries and peoples. On every occasion, whether suitable or not, Chinese propaganda quotes what Mao Tse-tung said about war and peace in the thirties, during the civil war in China.

Among the widely popularized statements of Mao Tse-tung are the following: "the war to be waged by the overwhelming majority of mankind . . . will become a bridge over which mankind will pass into a new era in history," "the world can only be reorganized by means of the rifle;" "we stand for abolishing war, we have no use for it, but war can only be abolished through war. If you want rifles to go out of existence, take to the rifle."

Almost three decades have passed since those statements were made. Radical changes have occurred in the world. The world socialist system has been formed and has become a mighty force, the revolutionary movement of the working class has assumed a mass scale, and the national liberation movement has scored historic victories. Today the alliance of the peace forces can, as the documents of the Communist parties point out, overcome the forces of imperialism and prevent them from launching a new war. The prevention of war has become a particularly pressing task because the most destructive weapon recorded in history has been created and has been stockpiled in quantities that can bring untold calamities to all nations.

The Chinese leaders refuse to take all that into consideration. Plainly showing off their irresponsible attitude, they affirm that the nuclear bomb is a "paper tiger" and in no way affects the issue of war and peace. In keeping with this logic, which runs counter to elementary commonsense, Mao Tse-tung, speaking at the Moscow meeting in 1957, argued that the struggle for socialism even stood to gain from a world thermonuclear war. "Can one foresee," he said, "the number of human lives that the future war may take? It may be one-third of the 2,700 million inhabitants of the world, that is, a mere 900 million people. . . I had an argument over this matter with Nehru. He is more pessimistic in this respect than I. I told him that should half of mankind be destroyed, the other half would survive; in return, imperialism would be wiped out completely and there would be only socialism in the world. In half a century or a whole century the population would grow again, even by more than half."

This concept is even more lucidly expressed in the collection of articles Long Live Leninism!, which the CC, CPC, has approved and is circulating. "On the ruins of fallen imperialism," it says, "the victorious people will build a thousand times more wonderful future at an extremely rapid rate." That is the kind of ultra-revolutionary verbiage, complete political irresponsibility that is particularly dangerous because it is being demonstrated by people standing at the helm of a large socialist country.

It is common knowledge that Lenin pointed out as far back as 1918 that a world war in which mighty achievements of technology are used with such great energy for the mass extermination of human life, apart from being a major crime can also lead "to the undermining of the very foundations of human society" (Works, vol. 27, p. 386). In our days, with the production and the development of nuclear missile weapons, this danger has increased still more. How can people, particularly the adherents of Communist teachings, ignore this fact?

Neither the socialist countries nor the working people want a world war, it cannot serve the cause of the triumph of socialism. The conclusions drawn by specialists on the possible consequences of another world war are quite unambiguous. For example, the progressive American scientist Linus Pauling gives figures to show that within 60 days after the outbreak of a nuclear war out of 190 million Americans 170 million would perish, 15 million would suffer greatly and only five million would remain relatively unharmed. The situation in other regions drawn directly into the sphere of military operations would evidently be the same. Moreover, account must also be taken of such delayed consequences of a nuclear war as the disorganization of society due to the destruction of key industrial centres and of the means of transport and communication, and increasing radioactive pollution. Without mincing words, one can say that if a world thermonuclear conflict breaks out it would be the greatest tragedy for humanity and would, of course, deal the cause of communism a heavy blow.

No party that really cherishes the interests of the people can fail to appreciate its responsibility in the struggle for averting another world war. Yet the Chinese leaders, as we have seen, even boast that, allegedly for "the sake of the revolution", they are prepared to agree to the destruction of half of mankind. It does not worry them in the least that the losses in densely-populated countries that would find themselves in the centre of military operations would be so great that for entire peoples there would no longer be any question of the triumph of socialism because they would have disappeared from the face of the earth.

Here it would be appropriate to recall certain facts. When in a conversation with Tao Chu, member of the CC CPC, a Czechoslovak journalist mentioned that in the event of a thermonuclear war the whole of Czechoslovakia, where 14 million people live, might be destroyed, the answer he received was: "In the event of a war of annihilation the small countries in the socialist camp will have to subordinate their interests to the common interests of the camp as a whole." Another well-known CPR official told Soviet representatives that Comrade Togliatti, General Secretary of the Italian Communist Party, was wrong when, expressing anxiety for the fate of his people, he said that if a thermonuclear war broke out the whole of Italy would be destroyed. "Other people will remain," declared this official, "and imperialism will be wiped out . . ."

In an effort to disprove the conclusions of the international Communist movement concerning the possibility of averting war, Peking alleges that in pursuing a policy of peaceful coexistence the CPSU and other fraternal parties proceed from the assumption that the nature of imperialism has changed, base all their calculations on the "peace-loving and humane nature of the imperialists," and "appeal and beg for" peace for them. On the other hand, the CPC leaders, it is claimed, are waging a determined and relentless struggle against imperialism and exposing its aggressive nature.

But these crude falsifications and distortions can fool no one. The attempts to portray Marxist-Leninists as some kind of pacifists are simply ludicrous. In the 1957 Declaration it is recorded that as long as imperialism exists there will be always be the soil for aggressive wars. From this, however, the Communist parties did not draw the conclusion that world war is fatally inevitable. They showed that while the nature of imperialism, its rapacious essence, remains unchanged, there has been a change in the balance of forces in the world, that the place and role of imperialism in world economy policies are not what they were, and that its influence on the course of events is diminishing. All this forces the imperialists to accept peaceful coexistence.

Consequently, it is not that the imperialists have become "peace-loving" or more "tractable" but that they have no alternative but to take the growing strength of socialism into account. They are aware that the Soviet Union, the socialist countries, possess a formidable weapon and are able to deal any aggressor a crushing blow. They cannot help but take into account the strength of the mighty working-class and democratic movement in the capitalist countries, and the huge scale of the national liberation struggle of the peoples. The fact that capitalism will be wiped out and buried if the imperialist madmen unleash a world war is being more and more clearly apprehended in the camp of our class enemies.

gues of its enemies. It depends to a vast extent on the policy of the socialist countries, on their defensive might, on the unswerving implementation of the Leninist principles of peaceful coexistence. This is exactly the policy being pursued by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries that firmly adhere to the positions proclaimed in the Declaration and Statement of the fraternal parties.

However, it is precisely against this, the only sensible policy that the Chinese leaders have declared war. Having their own special objectives in mind, they are trying to discredit the principles of peaceful coexistence, assuring the peoples that their efforts to preserve peace are futile. Strange as it may seem, the Chinese leaders have proclaimed this point of view optimistic.

In Long Live Leninism! it is asserted: "Wars of one kind or another may break out as long as an end is not put to the imperialist system and the exploiter classes." "Naturally, whether or not the imperialists in the end start a war does not depend upon us for we are not the chiefs of their general staffs." At the Peking session of the World Federation of Trade Unions in June 1960, Liu Ning-yi, member of the CC, CPC, said: "The assertions about the possibility of peaceful coexistence only make the imperialists happy." At the World Peace Council session in Stockholm in December 1961, the same Liu Ning-yi made himself more plain: "Those who think agreement can be reached with the imperialists and peaceful coexistence ensured, only delude themselves." It is not difficult to notice that one and the same importunate and gloomy refrain that "war cannot be averted" is repeated in all these statements.

The opposition of the Chinese leaders to the policy of peaceful coexistence is closely tied up with their stand on the question of disarmament, on international negotiations between the socialist countries and the Western powers. They regard disarmament as an illusion, an unrealizable slogan" that can only mislead the people. For example, speaking at the Peking session of the General Council of the World Federation of Trade Unions in 1960 Liu Chang-sheng, member of the CC, CPC, declared: "Some people think that the disarmament proposals can be carried into effect while imperialism exists. That is an illusion that has nothing to do with reality . . . A world without wars and without arms is possible only in an epoch when socialism triumphs throughout the world."

It is not hard to see in these statements the desire of the Chinese leaders to distort the clear stand of the CPSU and of all the Marxist-Leninist Parties and at the same time to undermine the policy of disarmament which is an important condition in the struggle for the prevention of a new world war and for a relaxation of international tensions.

It is absurd to assert that our Party entertains any illusions concerning the military policy of the imperialist powers and their readiness to agree to general and complete disarmament. As long as imperialism exists, the reactionary forces will clutch at armaments as a last resort to retain their domination, and will use these armaments in wars, if they manage to unleash them. All this is quite obvious.

Does this, however, mean that the Communists should drop the struggle for disarmament and admit the inevitability of the arms race and of a new world war? No, such a passive stand would be contradictory to the entire revolutionary spirit of our teaching and to the vital interests of the people.

We are convinced that the revolutionary struggle of the working people, the general democratic upsurge, the growing might of socialism and the resolute actions of all the peace-loving forces can and should force the imperialists to comply, contrary to their desire, with the peoples' demands for disarmament. We are not fatalists. We believe in the tremendous capacities of the popular masses. Already 70 years ago Frederick Engels called upon the Communists to fight for disarmament, and this at a time when capitalism held undivided sway in the world.

"It is 25 years already that Europe has been arming on an unprecedented scale. Each great power endeavours to outstrip the other in military might and preparedness for war. Germany, France and Russia are doing their utmost to surpass one another," wrote Engels in a series of articles entitled "Can Europe Disarm?" "Is it not foolish to talk of disarmament under such circumstances?" he asked, and replied " I maintain: disarmament, and hence a guarantee for peace, is possible." (Works, Ed. 2, Vol. 22, p. 387. Russ Ed.)

That is how Engels put the question! Already in those days he saw the vast social forces rising against war. How, then, can one speak of disarmament as of an "unrealizable illusion" today when all progressive mankind is coming out for disarmament and when the forces of peace have the mighty support of the socialist countries?

The slogan "A World Without Arms, A World Without Wars", is for the Communist parties a mighty means of uniting and mobilizing the popular masses for an active struggle against the inveterate militarist imperialist circles. This slogan is clear to everyone, regardless of political convictions. Disarmament means ending the arms race and, consequently, reducing the tax burden. It conforms to the vital interests of the broadest sections of the population. Not only the Communists, but many other social forces actively support and propagate this slogan. Then why should we, Communists, discard it? Is it not clear that rejecting this slogan could only weaken the influence of the Communists among the masses, and that this would play into the hands of the reactionary forces?

Are the Chinese leaders so naive as not to realize where their strange logic leads them and how grave a responsibility they are assuming before the peoples of the world by advancing such reckless theses fraught with the direst consequences?

The Chinese leaders not only take a negative stand on such vitally important questions of international policy as disarmament, termination of nuclear weapon tests and relaxation of international tension, but also try to paralyze the efforts of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries fighting against the threat of world war.

The facts show that time and again the CPR Government has acted in the world arena as a force opposing the peaceful foreign policy of the socialist countries and disorganizing the common anti-war front. Time and again when the world was faced with an acute situation in which unity of action among the socialist countries and all peace-loving forces was particularly imperative, the Chinese leaders became active. But against whom? Against the Soviet Union and other socialist countries seeking a relaxation of tension. Moreover, it has been noted that Peking could not conceal its chagrin and annoyance every time the situation was normalized and a military conflict avoided. That was the case, for example, during the Caribbean crisis. The CPR leadership did nothing to help avert a world war and effectively support revolutionary Cuba. They did nothing to support the defensive measures of the Warsaw Treaty powers, adopted to meet possible imperialist aggression, and said nothing about China siding with the socialist countries in the event of a U.S. attack against Cuba. It was quite evident that at a time when the Soviet Union was prepared to defend the Cuban revolution with all the means at its disposal, the Chinese leaders strove to benefit from the crisis on the Caribbean region.

It is a fact that when the Caribbean crisis was at its height the CPR Government extended the armed conflict on the Sino-Indian frontier. No matter how hard the Chinese leaders try belatedly to justify their behaviour at the time they cannot escape the responsibility for the fact that by their actions they essentially helped the extreme reactionary circles of imperialism, thereby aggravating an already complicated and dangerous situation in the world.

The Sino-Indian conflict arose over the possession of frontier territories in the Himalayas which had not been disputed either by China or India in the course of many centuries. However, inasmuch as this problem did arise everything should have been done to settle it peacefully, by negotiation. The Government of the USSR repeatedly advocated such a settlement of this frontier dispute. Hostilities broke out in the region of the Himalayas. The disastrous consequences of this conflict are now fully evident. It has rendered a great service to imperialism and inflicted grave harm to the national liberation movement, the progressive forces of India and the entire front of the anti-imperialist struggle. Utilizing the Sino-Indian conflict for their own purposes, the imperialists and their supporters are seeking to undermine the trust of the peoples of the young national states in the socialist countries, to draw India into military blocs and strengthen the positions of the ultra-reactionary forces in that country.

While allowing relations with India, which as everybody knows is not a member of military blocs, to deteriorate sharply, the Chinese leadership at the same time actually acted in league with Pakistan, a member of SEATO and CENTO, which threaten the peace and security of the Asian peoples. It is a fact that having discarded their "revolutionary phrase-mongering", the Chinese leaders have in effect adopted a line that can hardly be dove-tailed with the principled position of the countries of the socialist commonwealth with regard to imperialist blocs.

The approach of the Chinese leaders to the choice of friends and allies is strange, to say the least. How is it possible, it may be asked, to fling mud at the socialist countries, at the Communist partie and, at the same time, with the whole world watching, shower compliments on the reactionary regime in Pakistan? It is simply incomprehensible.

Can anyone believe that the rapprochement with Pakistan has been dictated by the interests of the development of the revolutionary struggle of the peoples of Asia against imperialism that the Chinese leaders talk so much about?

The dangerous, adventurist views and propositions on questions of war and peace that the CPC leaders seek to impose upon the fraternal parties have quite understandably been categorically rejected by the international Communist movement and broad circles of progressive world opinion.

Not only Marxist-Leninists but also all friends of socialism and peace noted with alarm that the "bellicose' outpourings from Peking practically border on direct justification and even lauding of war as a means of settling social conflicts.

Hysterically attacking the Moscow partial test-ban treaty of July 31, 1963 and thereby finding themselves aligned with the most aggressive circles of imperialism, the Chinese leaders still further exposed themselves as opponents of the policy of peace and peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems. Enemies rejoiced over their actions and friends could not but condemn them.

The Chinese leaders realized that they had gone too far and in order to extricate themselves from this situation they made a complete turn in their propaganda. Lately a stream of "peace-loving" statements have suddenly gushed from Peking, while representatives of the Chinese government are hastening to sign documents concerning the struggle for peace and fidelity to the policy of peaceful coexistence. Such was the tenor of many of the statements made by Chou En-lai during his tour in Africa and Asia.

"World war cannot be averted,' they were saying plainly in Peking only yesterday. Today they are trying to persuade people to believe that the thesis that war can be averted was put forward by none other than the leaders of the CPC. Yesterday they abused peaceful coexistence, today they are posing as practically its only and most zealous supporters. Yesterday they declared that disarmament was a deception of the peoples, today they sign statements in which they undertake to work for disarmament.

This about-turn could only be welcomed if there were signs that the CPC leadership really realizes its mistakes and is taking a correct stand. Unfortunately everything points to the fact that the aims and objectives of the Chinese leaders have not changed. Their "love of peace" is nothing but a screen to mask their real intentions, which have received a rebuff and been censured by world public opinion. One cannot fail to see that the "love of peace" now emanating from Peking is in glaring contrast to their actual deeds, to the concrete policy of the Government of the CPR.

The obviously adventurist position of the CPC leaders makes itself felt in their attitude to the question of nuclear weapons.

The CC, CPSU, and the Soviet Government have already explained why we consider it inexpedient to help China produce nuclear weapons. The inevitable reaction to this would be the nuclear arming of powers of the imperialist camp, in particular, West Germany and Japan. Having a higher level of economic, scientific and technological development they could undoubtedly produce more bombs than China and build up a nuclear potential much faster. It should be borne in mind that revanchist aspirations are particularly strong in these countries. These are the countries which in the past were the main hotbeds of military threats and militarism.

The Soviet Union's atomic weapon is a reliable guarantee of the defense not only of our country but also of the entire socialist camp, including China. The leaders of the CPR are well aware of this fact. Nonetheless, they want to acquire the nuclear weapon at all costs. Very indicative in this respect is the interview given to Japanese journalists in October 1963 by Chen Yi, member of the Politbureau of the CC, CPC, and Deputy Premier of the CPR. Saying that China would create her own nuclear weapon whatever the price, he declared, as was reported in the Japanese press, that possibly it would take China several years and perhaps even longer than that to begin the mass production of the bombs. But China, he said, would produce the most modern weapon even if it would cost them their last shirt. And several days later a statement by a Chinese government spokesman, published in Jemninjihpao stated that China woud adhere to this line "even if the Chinese people will not be able to create the atom bomb in a hundred years. . . ." .

It thus turns out that possession of the atom bomb, which the Chinese leaders call a "paper tiger", is their cherished goal.

In a fit of anger, the CPC leaders went so far as to say that the threat of a nuclear war comes not from imperialism but from the "modern revisionists", unambiguously hinting at the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. In a speech in Pyongyang on September 18, 1963, Liu Shao-chi, Chairman of the CPR, stated: "Imperialism did not use the nuclear weapon everywhere and at will and would not dare to do so." He followed this up with the wild assertion that "in agreement with the imperialists" the Soviet Union "has monopolized the nuclear weapon" and organizes "nuclear blackmail with regard to the peoples of the socialist countries and the revolutionary peoples of the whole world." If the "modern revisionists," he pathetically exclaimed, "go so far as to use the nuclear weapon first and will thereby provoke a nuclear world war they will earn the stern condemnation of the peoples of the whole world."

What touching concern Liu Shoa-chi shows to lull suspicion that the imperialists have any intention of unleashing a nuclear war. After this, is it not hypocrisy on the part of the CPC leadership to call for an "adherence to the class approach", for "distinguishing friend from foe", for a struggle against U.S. imperialism as the chief enemy of peace? In this connection one cannot help but recall the treacherous rule of bourgeois diplomacy, which Palmerston expounded as "we have neither eternal allies nor eternal friends. Only our interests are eternal." All this shows how little significance the Chinese leaders attach to their own statements concerning the aggressive nature of imperialism and their uncompromising attitude to class enemies.

The following example of the discrepancy between what the Chinese leaders say and do must also be pointed out. This concerns the relations between the socialist countries and the countries of the capitalist world. Here the Chinese leaders have two yardsticks, one for appraising the policy of the USSR and other socialist countries and the other for assessing China's foreign policy. Everyone knows the sharply negative reaction of the Chinese leaders to the efforts the Soviet Union and other socialist countries are making to normalize and improve economic and other relations with the capitalist countries, including the United States of America. Why, one involuntarily asks, does any normalization of relations between the USSR and USA, the two great nuclear powers on whose efforts a relaxation of international tension largely depends, evoke such opposition from the Chinese government? With a persistence worthy of better application, the Chinese leaders are doing their utmost to hinder an improvement of U.S.-Soviet relations, portraying it as a "conspiracy with the imperialists." At the same time the CPR Government is making feverish efforts to establish relations with Britain, France, Japan, West Germany and Italy. All the indications are that they would not be averse to an improvement in relations with the USA if the opportunity presented itself.

Never before has Peking received so many businessmen, political leaders and statesmen from the capitalist countries as now. CPR representatives have talks with them and sign agreements on trade, credits, scientific and technical aid and even on political issues.

Do we want to reproach the CPC leaders for this activity? Of course not. It is a normal and intrinsic element of the policy of peaceful coexistence. All socialist countries ultimately have to have contacts with people from the bourgeois states and not only with friends but also with representatives of the ruling imperialist circles. But the thing is that the Chinese leaders consider that when they themselves develop such activity it is an expression of the policy of real "revolutionaries", but when other socialist states do the same thing it is "revisionism" and "treachery."

But the attempts to slander our peace-loving foreign policy will inevitably collapse. Our Party shall continue to wage a struggle to avert a world thermonuclear war, secure lasting world peace and steadfastly pursue the Leninist policy of peaceful coexistence between countries with different social systems. Our peaceful policy, Lenin said, is approved by the overwhelming majority of the world's population. Peace helps to strengthen socialism. The working people of all countries, of all continents desire peace. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union has won deserved glory as the banner-bearer of peace and shall always remain faithful to this banner.

The course of events has shown that the program of struggle for peace, democracy, national independence and socialism drawn up by the Moscow Meetings is the program which closely links up the immediate and ultimate goals of the working class and ensures the advance of the world revolution.

At the same time, far from facilitating the development of the world revolutionary process, the theoretical platform and, chiefly, the practical activity of the CPC leadership create additional difficulties for the realization of the age-old aspirations of the people, who are hungering for peace and social progress.

It is absurd to oppose the struggle for peace, for the peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems, to the revolutionary class struggle of the working class of the capitalist countries and the national liberation struggle of the people. For Marxist-Leninists there neither is nor can there be a dilemma of whether to wage a struggle for peace or a revolutionary struggle. The two are inter-related and are, in the final analysis, spearheaded against imperialism. The struggle for peace is one of the main forms of the struggle of the people against imperialism, against the new wars being prepared by it, against the aggressive acts of the imperialists in the colonial countries, against the military bases of the imperialists on the territory of other countries, against the arms race, and so on. Surely this struggle expresses the vital interests of the working class and all working people.

We know that peace is a true ally of socialism. The situation created by peaceful coexistence also favourably influences the development of the national liberation movement and the revolutionary struggle of the working class in the capitalist countries.

The scale of the working-class movement made particularly great headway in recent years. Experience shows that in many countries the struggle of the working class for democratic and social rights is closely interwined with the struggle for peace and against the forces of militarism. In the struggle against militarism a political complexion is imparted even to the economic actions of the working class. The efforts of the working class and all working people to avert the threat of another world war help to educate the peoples in a spirit of international solidarity because under present-day conditions the struggle for peace as never before is essentially an international struggle.

What, for example, does it mean to work for peace in a country like the Federal Republic of Germany? It means, first and foremost, active opposition to the big monopolies, which are hatching ideas of revenge, opposition to their offensive against the vital rights and political freedoms of the working people. By participating in this struggle, the working class, far from "dissolving" in the mass democratic movement, as the Chinese leaders maintain, gets a schooling in revolutionary organization and discipline, unites its ranks and wins greater influence among the masses.

Naturally, being a general democratic movement the struggle for peace neither sets itself nor can set itself the task of effecting socialist changes. This incidentally, is what the CPC leaders, who are trying to foist on the peace movement tasks alien to it, fail to understand. But the struggle for peace is furthering the cause of socialism inasmuch as it is waged against imperialism, the source of the war threat, inasmuch as it is helping the masses secure a better understanding of what their vital interests are.

The repudiation of this extremely close bond between the struggle for peace and the struggle for socialism reveals in effect the utter lack of confidence of the CPC leaders in the popular masses, in their ability to take organized action in the class struggle. The essence of the CPC leadership's present concepts regarding revolution lies in rejection of the Leninist precept that the socialist revolution is the result of the mass struggle, and in relying solely on armed uprising everywhere and in all cases without taking into account the sentiments of the masses, their preparedness for revolution, without taking into account the internal and external situation.

The immense harm of this line lies in the fact that it rejects painstaking and patient work with the masses and reliance on the maturing of the objective and subjective conditions for a socialist revolution, in favor of revolutionary phrase-mongering, or, what is still worse, in favor of adventurist actions by a handful of men who have no ties with the people. What has this kind of action in common with Marxism-Leninism? Is this not propagation of Blanquist and Trotskyite ideas that have been rejected long ago?

No matter what the CPC leaders say to the contrary, one of the pivotal points in the polemics in the Communist movement is the problem of "the ways of carrying out the revolution" and not the dilemma of "whether to carry or not to carry on the revolution." If the Communist parties pin all their hopes solely on an armed struggle without taking into consideration whether the masses are prepared to support that struggle, it will inevitably lead only to bitter failures.

In other words, the Chinese leaders have forgotten one of the prime propositions of Marxist-Leninist theory, namely that the revolution cannot be accelerated or made to order, that it cannot be given a push from without. "Some people," Lenin said, "think that the revolution in a foreign country can be made to order. People who think so are either madmen or provocateurs." (Collected Work, Vol. 27, p. 441, Russ. ed.). Revolution is made by the masses headed by the proletariat and its revolutionary vanguard. Naturally, this does not in any way imply that Marxist-Leninists must passively wait for a favourable situation to arise. The experience of the CPSU shows that even a relatively small, steeled party that has the support of the proletariat and the advanced section of the peasantry can head the revolution and lead the people. But for this, as Lenin repeatedly emphasizes, there must be a revolutionary situation in which the "upper strata are no longer able to rule and the "lower strata" no longer willing to live in the old way.

Realistically assessing the present situation, the fraternal parties allow for the possibility of transition from capitalism to socialism either by peaceful or non-peaceful means.

However, no matter how the transition from capitalism to socialism is achieved, it is possible only through a socialist revolution, through a dictatorship of the proletariat in its varous forms. In each given country the actual possibility for peaceful or non-peaceful transition to socialism is determined by concrete historical conditions. The fraternal parties in the capitalist countries are invariably guided by Lenin's proposition that the working class must be able to master all forms and means of revolutionary struggle without exception, that it must be ready to pass from one form of struggle to another in the quickest and most unexpected manner and to utilize it in conformity with the concrete situation. But the Chinese leaders oppose this creative approach to questions of tactics by the fraternal parties and attempt to instruct them from Peking on how and when to carry out a revolution in their countries. Quite understandably these "instructions" are meeting with unanimous rebuff from Marxist-Leninists.

Our Party has always unswervingly adhered to positions of proletarian internationalism. No slander and no foul fabrications can smear the banner of proletarian internationalism which is sacred to us. Our Party will continue tirelessly to strengthen its solidarity with the working class, with the working masses of the capitalist countries who are fighting to destroy the capitalist system and to reshape society on socialist lines. This road was charted for us by Lenin and we shall steadfastly follow it.

III

THE CPC LEADERS' POLICY OF ISOLATING THE NATIONAL LIBERATION MOVEMENT FROM THE INTERNATIONAL WORKING CLASS

The Chinese leaders pin special hopes on using the national liberation movement for their own ends.

The collapse of the colonial system of imperialism, and the tasks and prospects of the newly-free countries constitute one of the cardinal problems of the social progress of all mankind. Imperialism and internal reaction are trying to stop the development of national liberation revolutions and to push the newly-free countries into the trap of neo-colonialism. The progressive democratic force are fighting for complete national freedom, for the transition to the non-capitalist path of development. The historical destinies of hundreds upon hundreds of millions of people depend on the outcome of this struggle.

The Communist parties of the world, after generalizing at their international conferences the vast experiences of the anti-imperialist movement, put forward a clear-cut program of action to promote the struggles of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America for complete national and social liberation.

The Chinese leaders countered this Marxist-Leninist program with a policy of their own, and are trying to impose upon the national liberation movement principles which may push it on to a perilous path and endanger the achievements of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

It is particularly typical of the Chinese leaders that they completely ignore the immense variety of conditions in the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America.

It is well known that these countries are at different levels of socio-economic and political development. One group of countries has already taken the socialist road. Another group has won political independence and set about effecting radical social reforms. A third group of countries, where the national bourgeoisie has come to power, adheres on the whole to an anti-imperialist position. Then there are the countries which, although they have formally won political independence, actually are not independent because of the puppet regimes set up in them or because of their participation in imperialist blocs. Lastly, there are countries where colonial regimes remain and whose peoples are waging a heroic struggle for their freedom.

It is obvious to Marxist-Leninists that the peoples of each of these groups of countries are faced with different tasks. The Chinese leaders, however, are trying to impose the same stereotyped patterns and methods of struggle on the Communist parties and all progressive forces. This is particularly evident from what they contend to be the main tasks of the national liberation movement at the present stage.

Marxist-Leninists consider that the main tasks of the former colonies where an end has been put to the political rule of the imperialists, and those countries constitute the overwhelming majority, are to strengthen the independence achieved, uproot colonial practices in their economy and develop it at a fast rate, achieve economic sovereignty, and to advance along the road of social and economic progress. Among the primary general national problems are the expulsion of foreign monopolies, the implementation of agrarian reforms in the interests of the peasants, the promotion of national industry, above all by setting up a state sector, and the democratization of social and political life. In a number of countries, conditions are already being created, as these tasks are being accomplished, for development along non-capitalist lines, for taking the socialist road.

In their interviews with delegations from the Communist parties of newly-free countries, and in their statements at world conferences, Chinese representatives speak of nothing but the necessity of waging an armed struggle in those countries. At the Stockholm session of the World Peace Council, for example, Liu Ning-yi, member of the CC CPC, claimed that "the road of armed struggle is the road to the complete liberation of the oppressed nations."

Marxist-Leninists have always supported armed risings against the colonialists, against tyrannical regimes; they have supported the liberation wars of oppressed peoples. But they have always opposed stereotyped tactics based on the dogmatic use of some one form of struggle, irrespective of the actual conditions. Such tactics are particularly harmful now that in most of the Asian, African and Latin American countries national governments have come to power that are pursuing an anti-imperialist policy. In these circumstances, to advance the slogan of armed struggle as a universal method means causing double harm, disorienting the forces of national liberation and diverting them from the struggle against imperialism.

After all, it is absurd to say that the working people of Algeria, Ghana, Mali and certain other countries are faced with the task of starting an armed revolt. Such an idea amounts to an appeal to back the reactionaries, who are intent on overthrowing the governments of those countries. And what else but harm can one expect from an attempt to put this idea into effect in such countries as, for example, Indonesia or Ceylon?

The "Leftist" recommendations of the Chinese leaders for an armed struggle everywhere are nothing but an attempt to push the Communist and all democratic forces in the newly-free countries on to a path of adventurism. Experience shows that those who blindly follow such recommendations, refusing to take account of the actual conditions, doom themselves to isolation, to making useless sacrifices and, far from promoting social progress in their countries, handicap it.

On the question of the prospects of the historical development of the newly-free countries the Chinese leaders come out against such cardinal principles of the Communist movement as Lenin's thesis on the possibility of the non-capitalist way of development of the newly-free countries.

Speaking at the Moscow bilateral meeting in July 1963, Teng Hsiao-ping, General Secretary of the CC, CPC, said outright that the thesis of the non-capitalist path was "meaningless talk," although every Communist knows that this thesis was put forward by Lenin and has been borne out by the experience of a number of former colonial peoples.

The idea of the non-capitalist path is gaining ground among the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America, and for a number of the peoples it has become a call for practical action. This is a tremendous victory for socialism. Capitalism has discredited itself in the eyes of these peoples, and the appeal of socialist ideas in the newly-free countries is so strong that the advanced forces and national leaders of many countries advocate taking the socialist path, and are actually taking steps in this direction, counting with good reason on support from the socialist countries and the Marxist-Leninist parties.

Except for "Leftist" phrases about the armed struggle, the Chinese leaders have nothing to say to the peoples of the newly-free countries concerning the lines along which they should wage their struggle for a better future. They have, in fact, no positive ideas that would help the progressive forces in the one-time colonies to fight for socialism.

The Chinese leaders pretend that the interests of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin Amrica are particularly near and dear to them and that they are concerned above all else with the further progress of the national liberation movement. The facts, however, give them the lie. It is becoming increasingly evident that they are prompted by other considerations. The CPC leadership is clearly trying to establish control over the national liberation struggle in order to make it an instrument for the implementation of its hegemonic plans. The arguments contained in the Jenminjihpao article of October 22, 1963, already mentioned, are typical in this respect. This newspaper tries hard to prove that "true" Marxist-Leninists are to be found in Peking only, and makes it perfectly clear that the national liberation movement should take its leadership from them. The Chinese leaders call on the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America to follow Peking's lead in everything. The article clearly expresses the CPC leadership's claim to hegemony in the national liberation movement, and their desire to subordinate it to their own special aims.

That perhaps more than anything else sheds light on the true object of the Chinese leaders' policy of dissociating the national liberation movement from the world socialist system and from the international working class.

It is with that object in view that the CPC leaders have spread the outrageous falsehood that the CPSU "underestimates" the historical role of the national liberation movement and that the Soviet Union "refuses to help" the national liberation movement on the pretext of fighting for peaceful coexistence. We need not refute this ill-intentioned slander. Whatever "strong language" the Chinese leaders may use against the CPSU, they cannot cite a single fact bearing out their lying contentions.

But the CPC leaders do not confine themselves to slander. In their official actions and also in their activities in various world democratic organizations, they concentrate not on furthering the unity of the anti-imperialist forces, but on the struggle against the USSR and other socialist countries. That was what they did, in particular, at the Afro-Asian Solidarity Conference in Moshi.

At that Conference Liu Ning-yi, head of the Chinese delegation, said in an interview with our delegates: "East European countries should not interfere in Asian and African affairs. We regret the fact that you have come here at all. Who wants you here? It is an insult to the solidarity movement of the Afro-Asian countries. . . . You may do as you will, but we shall be against you." The Chinese delegates at that Conference suggested to Asian and African delegates that since the Russians, Czechs and Poles are whites, "they cannot be trusted," that they would "always be able to come to terms with the American whites," and that the peoples of Asia and Africa had interests of their own and should form their separate associations.

Lately, the Chinese leaders have actually begun to form separate organizations (trade union, journalistic, writers, student, sports, etc.) for Asian, African and Latin American countries, which they plan to set up against the World Federation of Trade Unions and other international associations.

In the light of the practical activities of the Chinese leaders in recent years, the true political meaning of their slogan, "The wind from the East is beginning to prevail over the wind from the West," has become all the clearer. It will be recalled that at the Meeting of 1960 that slogan was sharply criticized as a nationalist slogan substituting the geographic, and even the racial, approach for the class approach. It is clearly an attempt to minimize the role of the world socialist system, the working class and the peoples of Western Europe and America.

The Chinese theoreticians would like to substitute the call for setting the Eastern peoples apart on a nationalist and even racial basis for the Leninist idea of uniting the anti-imperialist forces of all countries and continents, expressed in the slogan "Workers of all countries and oppressed peoples, unite!" Their slogan about the supposedly magic power of the wind from the East is plainly designed to foment nationalist and even racial sentiments among the peoples fighting against colonialism.

Long years of enslavement and exploitation by the imperialists, who mocked at the honor and national dignity of the oppressed peoples, have aroused distrust of people of the white race in a section of the population of the former colonies and semi-colonies, and still nourish that sentiment. It is this sentiment that the Chinese leaders are trying to fan in the hope of setting the peoples of the former colonies and semi-colonies against the socialist countries and the working people of the developed capitalist countries, and of representing themselves as the sole defenders of the interests of those peoples. For, if we are to lay bare what lies behind the Chinese slogan and reveal the long-range aim of the CPC leaders, we see the following: China, according to them, is the biggest country of the East, it embodies the interests of the East, and it is here that the "winds of history" spring up that are to "prevail over" the winds from the "West."

In other words, that slogan is nothing but an ideological and political expression of the hegemonic aspirations of the Chinese leadership.

It is natural that the Chinese leaders, who are hatching these sorts of plans, regard close ties between the national liberation movement, on the one hand, and the world socialist system and the international working-class movement, on the other, as a most serious obstacle to the realization of their schemes. Hence the CPC leaders' policy of separating the Asian, African and Latin American countries from the USSR and other socialist countries and from the working class of the capitalist countries. Needless to say that policy is in crying conflict with the vital interests of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America. As the facts show, it is meeting with growing resistance on their part.

And that is understandable, because the policy of the CPC leaders, which is aimed at undermining the alliance of the newly-free countries and the socialist countries, may cause great damage primarily to the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America. In effect, that policy dooms the peoples of those countries to insularity and isolation, tends to perpetuate national narrow-mindedness, shuts them off from the international experience of the revolutionary movement and the construction of the new society, and thereby facilitates the imperialist struggle against the national liberation movement.

The tremendous progress which the national liberation movement has made in our day was made possible by its close links with the peoples of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries and with the revolutionary movement of the international working class. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the other Marxist-Leninist parties regard the national liberation movement as a major revolutionary force of today, one which makes a historic contribution to the struggle against imperialism for peace and socialism.

The Great October Socialist Revolution for the first time in history showed all the enslaved people the real way to liberation from national oppression. It initiated the great revolutionary process which today has culminated in the collapse of the colonial system, an event of history-making significance.

The national liberation revolutions triumphed in new historical conditions. First of all, there arose, and has been developing and gaining strength, the world socialist system, which is becoming the decisive factor in the progress of society. Secondly, the defeat in the Second World War of the spearhead forces of imperialism, Hitler Germany, fascist Italy and militarist Japan, resulted in a considerable weakening of world reaction. Thirdly, the working class and all working people of the colonial powers stepped up their fight against the colonial policies of the imperialists.

All these factors provided an exceptionally favorable situation for the victories of the national liberation movement and enabled it to encompass the colonial and semi-colonial periphery of imperialism on three continents: Asia, Africa and Latin America. We greatly appreciate the assistance which the national liberation struggle is rendering to the socialist countries and to all revolutionary forces.

Unity of all the revolutionary forces is an earnest of victory in the anti-imperialist struggle. The fundamental national interests of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America fully coincide with those of the socialist commonwealth, and of the working class and all working people in all countries. This is the objective basis of the growing solidarity of the revolutionary forces fighting against imperialism.

When our country was the only socialist state in the world Lenin wrote that "the revolutionary movement of the peoples of the East can now develop successfully, and can come to a culmination, only in direct connection with the revolutionary struggle of our Soviet Republic against international imperialism." (Coll. Works, Vol. 30, p. 130, Russ. ed.) Lenin's words sound with particular force now that there exists the world socialist system.

What, specifically, does support for the national liberation movement on the part of the socialist countries mean today?

The internationalist duty of the socialist countries is to foil imperialist attempts to re-establish colonial regimes in the newly-free countries and prevent the realization of the national aspirations of the peoples who have thrown off colonial tyranny. In all such cases, the duty of the socialist countries is to give those countries political and diplomatic support, and when necessary, to curb the imperialist aggressors by bringing to bear the whole might of the world socialist system.

Our policy, which is aimed at assisting the peoples fighting for their freedom, is based on the lofty principles of proletarian internationalism, on the behests of the great Lenin.

Our Party and Government have time and again stated, clearly and comprehensively, their views on the question of the national liberation movement. The answers which Comrade Khrushchov gave to the questions of a number of African and Asian newspapers and which were published not long ago, say in no uncertain terms: "Every people fighting against the colonialists has been firmly supported by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. Today we declare once again, for all to hear, that the peoples fighting for their liberation can continue to count firmly on our support."

The peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America know full well that the Soviet Union actively supports the just wars of national liberation which the people wage against their enslavers. The Soviet Union, like other socialist countries, is doing everything to help the national liberation movement, economically, politically and, if necessary, militarily, and prevent the imperialists from unleashing local wars and exporting counter-revolution by force of arms.

We have only to refer to such facts as the support given to Egypt during the Suez venture of the Anglo-Franco-Israeli aggressors, the assistance extended to Indonesia in its struggle to consolidate its independence and recover West Irian, not to mention many other examples. No people who have asked our support have ever met with a refusal. The soldiers of the heroic national liberation army of Algeria and the armed forces of Indonesia, Yemen and other countries know well whose arms helped them in the struggle against the colonialists for freedom and independence.

In the recent period the Soviet Government has repeatedly and resolutely come out in defense of peoples fighting for their national independence. It has supported the peoples of Panama and Cyprus in their anti-imperialist struggle, voiced its solidarity with the courageous resistance offered by the Vietnamese people to U.S. aggression, warned the British and U.S. imperialists against interference in the internal affairs of the People's Republic of Zanzibar, and exposed colonialist intrigue in East Africa.

Now that the achievement of economic sovereignty and social progress have become the chief direction in which the anti-imperialist struggle of the newly-free countries is developing, it is particularly important to expand economic co-operation between them and the socialist countries, and to render them fraternal economic assistance.

The Soviet Union unfailingly fulfils its duty. Soviet credits to newly-free countries on favorable terms add up to a total exceeding 3,000 million rubles. The Soviet Union is helping to build about 500 industrial and other establishments in many of the newly-free countries. It is rendering disinterested assistance to the newly-free countries in setting up a national industry, the backbone of economic independence. The Bhilai Iron and Steel Works and the Aswan High Dam will always be remembered by the peoples as symbols of fraternal co-operation between socialist countries and the countries that have freed themselves from colonial tyranny.

Thousands of students from newly-sovereign states are studying in our country. Growing economic relations between the USSR and other socialist countries, on the one hand, and Asian, African and Latin American countries, on the other, have ended the monopoly which the imperialist powers had on deliveries of plant and the granting of credits. These powers are forced to make concessions to under-developed countries with regard to loan terms, in the field of trade, and so on. Economic blockade, a weapon which in the past never failed, has been knocked out of the hands of the imperialists.

The peoples of the newly-free countries know that they can win the battle against the domination of international monopolies if they draw on the economic power of socialism. The growing economic potential of the socialist countries is in their best interest. Today the achievements of the socialist countries in the economic competition with capitalism, and their expanding economic relations with newly-sovereign states constitute one of the most important forms in which socialism gives the peoples of the newly-free countries effective support.

The Chinese leaders, however, suggest to the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America that the socialist countries' policy of peaceful economic competition allegedly runs counter to their interests. They do all they can to smear the economic assistance which the USSR and other socialist countries render to the under-developed countries, and try to induce them to question the purpose of that assistance. But the peoples of the newly-free countries, who have gained considerable political experience, see for themselves what the Chinese leaders are driving at and what they really want, and will reject a policy aimed at subordinating them to the selfish plans of the Chinese leaders.

Soviet people are confident that the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America, who are well familiar with the actual facts concerning Soviet assistance, will themselves draw the right conclusions as to the worth of the slanderous fabrications of the Chinese leaders. They can do this all the more easily because they can compare the deeds of the Soviet Union with the Chinese leaders' actions in recent years.

We are firmly convinced that the national liberation movement, which has become one of the greatest progressive factors of our time will, despite all difficulties, and in close alliance with the world socialist system and all the anti-imperialist forces, march on along its own path towards final victory over the imperialist forces, and will bring the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America deliverance from age-long backwardness, will lead them to national and social prosperity.

The Soviet Union has invariably advocated the abolition of every form of colonial oppression. It considers fraternal alliance with the peoples that have cast off colonial and semi-colonial tyranny as a corner-stone of its foreign policy.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union has always helped the peoples fighting against imperialism, for their freedom and national independence, and will continue to do so. No amount of slander and no falsehoods can hinder the growing friendship between the peoples of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries and the peoples of the countries which have freed themselves from colonial dependence.

IV

ON SOVIET-CHINESE RELATIONS

Comrades:

The CC, CPSU, and the Soviet government have always attached great importance to the development of friendship and co-operation with the Chinese People's Republic. We have never sought any advantage or profit, and have always been internationalist in our attitude towards the CPC and the Chinese people.

For many years we have supported the working people of China, their Communist vanguard, in the struggle for independence, for the victory of the socialist revolution .We considered it our duty to help the Chinese people fraternally in the building of socialism, the strengthening of the international position of the CPR and in the defense of its socialist gains.

Our Party, the Soviet people know the scale and the nature of the economic assistance rendered by the Soviet Union to China. In a short period of time the USSR helped the Chinese People's Republic build over 200 large industrial enterprises, shops and other projects, equipped with modern machinery. The CPR has built with Soviet aid whole branches of industry which China did not have before: aircraft, automobile and tractor-building industries, power-producing, heavy machine-building and precision machine-building industries, instrument-making and radio-engineering and various branches of the chemical industry.

The factories built and reconstructed with Soviet assistance enabled China to produce annually 8,700,000 tons of iron, 8,400,000 tons of steel, and 32,200,000 tons of coal and shale. Enterprises built with the help of our country account for 70 per cent of China's tin output, 100 per cent of its synthetic rubber output, 25 to 30 per cent of its electric power output, and 80 per cent of the lorries and tractors produced annually. The defense factories built with the technical assistance of the Soviet Union constituted the basis for the building of China's defense industry.

More than 10,000 Soviet specialists were sent to the People's Republic of China for varying terms between 1950 and 1960. Some 10,000 Chinese enginers, technicians and skilled workers, and about 1,000 scientists, were taught and trained in the USSR between 1951 and 1962. More than 11,000 students and post-graduates graduated from Soviet higher educational establishments in this period.

Soviet-Chinese co-operation reached its peak after 1953, when the elements of inequality in the relations between our countries imposed during the Stalin personality cult were removed on the initiative of the CC, CPSU, and Comrade N. S. Khrushchov. "In the Chinese question," Mao Tse-tung said in 1957, "the credit for removing the disagreeable and the extraneous belongs to N.S. Khrushchov."

In 1959 the proportions of Soviet-Chinese economic contacts were nearly double those of 1953, while deliveries for the building projects increased in that period as much as eight-fold. Between 1954 and 1963 the Soviet Union turned over to China more than 24,000 sets of scientific and technical documents, including 1,400 projects of large industrial enterprises. These documents embodied the vast experience accumulated by the Soviet people, by Soviet scientists and technicians. In effect, all these scientific and technical documents were turned over to China gratuitously.

The Soviet Union granted the Chinese People's Republic long-term credits totalling 1,816 million rubles on favorable terms.

The CC, CPSU, and the Soviet government spared no effort to enable China firmly to assume its place on the international scene as a great socialist power, and worked perseveringly for the restoration of the rights of the CPR in the United Nations. We regularly informed the leadership of the CPR of all the key political actions of the Soviet Union and strove to co-ordinate the foreign policies of our two countries.

It should be said that, while assisting People's China, the CC, CPSU, for its part always highly appreciated the support of the CPR. We refer not only to the various valuable Chinese export items received by the USSR and the experience made available to us by the Chinese scientists, but also to the common struggle for the consolidation of peace, against imperialism and colonialism.

In 1950, the Soviet Union and the CPR concluded a Treaty of Friendship, Alliance and Mutual Assistance, which became an important factor not only in the all-round development of versatile relations between our two countries, but also in the strengthening of peace in the Far East.

The Soviet Union has always faithfully abided by all the commitments under this Treaty. Every time a threat arose to the security of the CPR, the USSR demonstrated its readiness to perform its allied duty to the end. In the autumn of 1958, for example, Comrade N. S. Khrushchov, head of the Soviet government, declared in a message to U.S. President Eisenhower that "an attack on the People's Republic of China, the great friend, ally and neighbor of our country, would be tantamount to an attack on the Soviet Union." This declaration was re-affirmed in all earnest in July 1962. The above shows how earnestly the Soviet government approached the strengthening of Soviet-Chinese friendship.

However, to our regret, ever since 1958 the government of the CPR increasingly resorted to measures undermining Soviet-Chinese friendship and unilateral actions creating difficulties on the world scene not only for the Soviet Union, but also for other socialist countries.

Soviet-Chinese relations deteriorated most markedly after the CPC leaders went over from isolated unfriendly acts to a sharp curtailment of economic and cultural relations with the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. Already on the eve of the 1960 Moscow Meeting of Fraternal Parties, the Chinese government insisted on the revision of all earlier agreements and protocols concluded with the Soviet Union on economic, scientific and technical co-operation. Besides, the Chinese government turned down a considerable part of the planned deliveries of Soviet equipment, reducing to a minimum the volume of Soviet-Chinese trade.

Although the Soviet government was aware that this course of the Chinese leaders would harm Soviet-Chinese friendship and co-operation, it had no choice but to consent to it. As a result, the total volume of economic co-operation between the Soviet Union and the CPR (including trade and technical assistance) dropped in 1962 to 36.5 per cent of what it was in 1959, while deliveries of sets of equipment and materials decreased 40-fold. In 1963 economic co-operation and trade continued to drop.

It stands to reason that we could not look on indifferently while Soviet-Chinese co-operation was sharply curtailed. Time and again the CC, CPSU, called on the CC, CPC, to avert this process. We suggested a number of concrete measures, but the Chinese leaders did not respond to our suggestions. In pursuance of their special aims, they worsened China's relations with the Soviet Union step by step and began to spread the ideological differences to the sphere of inter-state relations.

Having set their course on curtailing economic contacts with the USSR and other socialist countries, the CPC leaders at first explained this as follows:

"Firstly, thanks to the assistance of the Soviet Union the primary foundations of modern industry and technology have been laid in China and, therefore, the building and designing of most projects will in future be done with our own forces. We want to ease the efforts of the Soviet Union with respect to its assistance to China. However, in the future, too, we shall have to ask for Soviet assistance in relation to projects that we shall not be able to design, build and equip on our own.

"Secondly, the CC, CPC, and the Chinese government consider it necessary to concentrate their efforts on the building of the most important projects, while reducing the total number of capital projects and non-urgent projects in order to put into practice the 'better, greater, faster and more economical' principle of socialist construction in the CPR. The scale of building in the country will continue to be big and the rates high.

"Thirdly, due to the natural calamities in the last two years, certain difficulties have arisen in agriculture affecting the balance of payments and, therefore, by reducing the number of projects built with the help of the Soviet Union we hope to create conditions for more favorable co-operation between our countries." (Quoted from the statement by Ku Cho-hsin, head of the CPR government delegation at the Soviet-Chinese negotiations on February 10, 1961.)

Yet today, having evidently "forgotten" its previous explanations, the CPR government maintains that Soviet-Chinese contacts were reduced on the initiative of the Soviet Union and that this is the cause for China's difficult economic situation in the last few years.

Today, Chinese propagandists go out of their way to prove that there has never been any Soviet assistance to China and that there have been no more than ordinary commercial operations. Bent on erasing the memory of Soviet assistance among the people, the Chinese have gone so far as to remove trade marks from Soviet lathes and other machinery, and to allege that the Soviet Union delivered obsolete equipment to China. This is said in spite of the fact that the Chinese themselves, and the foreign press as well, noted that enterprises built with Soviet assistance, such as the Changchun Automobile Works, the Harbin Electrical Engineering Works, the Loyang Tractor Works and many others, are splendid examples of modern industry.

Such actions have little in common with any concept of common decency. While leaving them to the conscience of the Chinese leadership, we cannot help noting the obvious discrepancies in their charges against the Soviet Union. On the one hand, they try to blame the USSR for reducing its assistance and creating serious difficulties for China's economy. On the other, they spread rumors that Soviet assistance was ineffective and insignificant. But if our assistance really was "ineffective and insignificant," how could its cessation harm China's economy?

To use the favorite expression of the Chinese leaders, where is the truth and where the untruth on this score? The facts show that it is nothing but untruth all round.

In spite of the candidly hostile actions of the CPC leadership, our country is faithfully living up to earlier commitments and continuing to assist China in the building of 80 industrial enterprises. Engineers, technicians, scientists and students from the CPR are being trained in the Soviet Union as before. The Soviet Union responded fraternally to the economic difficulties that arose in China in 1960 and 1961. At a time when particularly acute food shortages occurred in the CPR, the CC, CPSU, and the Soviet government offered the CPC leadership a loan of 1,000,000 tons of grain and 500,000 tons of sugar. At the same time, the Soviet Union granted the CPR five years' deferment on payments due for commercial transactions to the amount of 288 million rubles.

If, as the Chinese leadership claims, the Soviet Union sought to curtail its economic relations with China, why did it have to take all these steps, why continue its assistance in building industrial enterprises, and why make repeated offers for greater mutually advantageous trade and economic co-operation? The CPC leadership gives no reply to this question. Nor can it do so, because it was none other than the Chinese leadership that sought the curtailment of co-operation between our countries.

Seeking to justify, to some extent at least, the economic failures of the CPR, brought about by the "big leap" policy, the CPC leaders lay a particular accent on the question of Soviet specialists. So, although this has been repeatedly dealt with in our party's official documents, we are compelled to dwell upon it once more.

The government of the USSR sent specialists to China in the belief that they were needed to assist in the development of China's national economy, which did not have qualified personnel in sufficient numbers. It was by no means a commercial transaction, but an act of genuine fraternal assistance to the Chinese people.

Seeing that the demand for foreign specialists is temporary in nature and that qualified personnel of their own was rapidly growing in the fraternal socialist countries, the Soviet government broached the question of recalling our specialists first in 1956, and once again in 1958. Similar offers were also made at the time to the other People's Democracies where Soviet specialists were still working then. Since the specialists were not needed any longer these offers were accepted by all the countries, excluding the CPR, whose government requested that the Soviet specialists stay on for a certain time.

While insisting that the Soviet specialists remain, the Chinese authorities deliberately treated them worse than before, and created intolerable conditions for their work.

The last years of our specialists' stay in the CPR coincided with the "big leap" policy, which unbalanced the proportions of economic development and caused departures from accepted technical standards. The Soviet specialists could not help seeing the dangerous implications of this policy. They warned the Chinese authorities against violating the technical requirements. But their advice fell on deaf ears. Due to the fact that the recommendations of the Soviet specialists were ignored and that the Chinese officials grossly violated technical standards, serious accidents occurred, some of them involving loss of life. This happened on the building site of the Hsinan-tsiang Hydropower Station, where hundreds of thousands of tons of rock crashed down because the technical requirements were scorned, and work on the project was considerably delayed. The dams burst and the pit was flooded at the Hsinfungtsiang Hydropower project for the same reason. In both cases there was a loss of life. It is only natural that the Soviet engineers and technicians could not treat all this with indifference. They protested, but being ignored, they began asking to be sent home.

Furthermore, beginning in the spring of 1960 the Chinese authorities began "indoctrinating" the Soviet specialists, trying to turn them against the Central Committee of the CPSU and the government of the USSR. This roused the legitimate indignation of our people.

The government of the USSR has repeatedly called the attention of the Chinese authorities to all these outrageous facts, and requested insistently that normal conditions be provided for the work of the Soviet specialists. But the Chinese authorities responded by treating our people in a still more unfriendly and insulting fashion, by spurning them as "conservatives," and by reviling Soviet experience and technology in every way. Surveillance of Soviet people increased, searches of personal belongings became more frequent, and the like. In the circumstances, there was no choice but to recall our specialists.

Now, after many additional facts have come to light, there is every reason to believe that after 1959, when the Chinese leadership began aggravating its relations with the USSR, it did not need the specialists so much but the question of these specialists could be used as one of the pretexts for the struggle against the CPSU.

After recalling the Soviet specialists, the Soviet government sought an adjustment of the matter in the interests of strengthening Soviet-Chinese friendship. In November 1960, on the instructions of the CC, CPSU, Comrade A. I. Mikoyan told the Chinese leaders at the Moscow Meeting of Fraternal Parties in an official conversation that if China really needed Soviet specialists and if they were provided with normal conditions for work, we were prepared to send them to the CPR. Comrade N. S. Khrushchov said the same thing in his talk with Chou En-lai and the other members of the CPC delegation to the 22nd Congress of the CPSU. At the bilateral meeting of the CPSU and CPC delegations (in July 1963) and in the Letter of the CC, CPSU, of November 29, 1963,the Chinese leadership was again officially informed that if it required the technical help of our specialists, the Soviet government was prepared to examine the question of sending them to the CPR. The Chinese leaders did not reply to any of these proposals, while continuing to exploit the question of Soviet specialists for their unseemly ends. They even tried to blame the revision of their economic plans, the reduction of capital building and the difficulties which arose in the various branches of their economy on the withdrawal of our specialists.

But, firstly, everybody knows that the economic difficulties in the CPR arose before the Soviet specialists had been recalled, and that they arose due to the dangerous "big leap"experiment. Secondly, the greatest difficulties arose in those branches where there were very few or no Soviet specialists at all.

How, for example, could the recall of the Soviet specialists affect the coal, oil, timber, light and other industries, and agriculture as well if, in 1960, there were two specialists working in the coal industry, three in the Ministry of State Farms and Virgin Lands, and one each in the departments of the Ministry of Agriculture and Forestry? Yet it was these very branches, and especially agriculture, that suffered the greatest failures.

Is it not high time for the Chinese leaders to stop misleading their Party, their people and world opinion, and to speak the truth about the real reasons for the difficulties of the Chinese people?

These reasons stem from the fact that the CPC leaders ignore objective laws in their economic policy.

How is the fact to be explained that lately, due to the exertions of the CPC leadership, Soviet-Chinese economic co-operation, cultural relations and exchanges between public organization are dwindling from year to year, while insinuations and slander pour forth against the Soviet people? There is only one explanation: the Chinese leaders want to fence their people off from the Ioviet Union. They are afraid that their people will learn the truth about the selfless fraternal Soviet proposals for the development of relations between the USSR and the CPR, and that then their vicious slander, whereby they seek to tarnish our Party and the Soviet people, will explode in their faces. The CPC leadership fears that co-operation with our country may carry as far as China the purifying breath of the 20th Congress ideas, which dissipated the intolerable situation created by the Stalin personality cult.

We also consider it necessary to tell the Plenum about the violations of the Soviet-Chinese border, occasioned through the fault of the Chinese side. This has already been mentioned in the documents of the CPSU and the Soviet government. In 1962 and 1963 violations of the Soviet border kept occurring continuously, often assuming the form of crude provocations.

The Soviet government has come forward with the initiative of holding consultations in order to specify the border line between the USSR and the CPR at certain of its points. We do so in the belief that no territorial issues exist between the USSR and the CPR, that the Soviet-Chinese border took shape historically, and that the issue can concern only some sections of the border, to make them more precise wherever necessary.

Undermining the foundations of Soviet-Chinese friendship, the CPC leaders have organized a malicious anti-Soviet propaganda campaign at home and abroad. The Chinese newspapers are full of slanderous articles which malign Soviet reality and cast foul aspersions on the Soviet people. In one CPR government statement the foreign policy of the Soviet Union is described as "a policy of alignment with the forces of war for struggle against the forces of peace, alignment with imperialism for struggle against socialism."

All these contentions are, from beginning to end, nothing but ranting slander, absolutely obvious not only to our friends, but also to our enemies. The Soviet Communists, all Soviet people, reject these brazen lies with indignation. The slanderers may go about their foul business, but the Soviet Union will continue to advance along the Leninist course as before.

ATTACKS BY THE CPC LEADERS ON THE PROGRAM OF THE CPSU

Comrades, lately the CPC leaders have spread their polemics also to questions concerning the internal development of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries.

They have made the Program of the CPSU the object of their attacks.

It is generally recognized that our Party Program is one of the most outstanding documents of modern times and that it reflects with exceptional depth and force the practice of building the new society in the USSR and the fraternal countries on the basis of the theory of scientific communism. Defying common sense, Chinese propaganda has in its attacks on the Program of the CPSU gone to the length of absurd and monstrous slander, alleging that it is "aimed against the revolutions of the peoples which are still dominated by imperialism and capitalism", that it is "aimed against the completion of the revolutions by the peoples which have already embarked on the path of socialism" and, of all things, that it is aimed at "preserving and restoring capitalism" (article in Jenminjihpao and the journal Hungchi, September 6, 1963).

In opposing the CPSU Program, the Chinese leaders are trying to discredit the theory and practice of proletarian socialism, which has been victorious in the working-class movement after a long struggle against petty-bourgeois socialism, anarchism and other anti-scientific trends. Whether they admit it or not, the leaders of the CPC are reviving the concepts of petty-bourgeois socialism and trying to criticize the international experience of the building of a new society from these positions.

The Chinese leaders are attacking the CPSU because it is pursuing a policy of improving the people's standard of living. They say that the improvement of the living standard of the Soviet people is "bourgeoisification", and that the principle of material incentives "results in people seeking personal gain and enrichment. inducing the itch for profit and a growth of bourgeois individualism, and injuring socialist economics . . . and even corrupting it" (Jenminjihpao, December 26, 1963).

Is there not deep-seated contempt for the vital requirements of man, for the principles and ideals of socialist society, behind these strident contentions?

It may be recalled what great importance Lenin attached to the principle of socialist distribution according to labor, to material incentives for the development of social production. He taught us that a new society could not be built by enthusiasm alone, but with the help of enthusiasm roused by the great revolution, by personal interest, by incentives, on a cost-accounting basis.

The Chinese leaders ferociously attack the conclusions in the Program of the CPSU concerning the political organization of socialist society as it advances to Communism. They claim that the propositions of the Program of the CPSU on the state of the whole people and the party of the whole people all but substitute bourgeois theories for the Marxist-Leninist teaching on the state, that they are tantamount to disarming the working class.

The Chinese leaders do not even try to analyze the actual processes operating in the socialist countries. Instead, they juggle with quotations snatched out of context from the works of the Marxist-Leninist classics, and interpret them incorrectly. They try to impose quasi-theoretical discussions on the world Communist movement concerning matters that have long since been settled by the classics of Marxism-Leninism.

One of these issues concerns their dogmatic contentions about the dictatorship of the proletariat. The Chinese leaders stubbornly reiterate that the dictatorship of the proletariat should be preserved "until the entry into the highest phase of communist society." In doing so they refer to a quotation from Marx, which says that "between the capitalist and communist society lies a period of the revolutionary transformation of the first into the second. This period conforms also with the political transitional period, and the state of this period cannot be anything but a revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat". (K. Marx and F. Engels, Works, 2nd ed., Vol. 19, p. 27, Russ. ed.)

This quotation, snatched out of the context of Marx's exposition, is being exploited as the theoretical basis for the "criticism" of the Program of the CPSU.

But the Chinese leaders have clipped Marx's exposition, and do not quote the next two lines from the same work by Marx, which says with respect to the Gotha Program: "But the program does not concern itself with either this last (that is, the dictatorship of the proletariat—M.S.) or the future statehood in communist society." To follow the logic of the Chinese theorists, Marx should be declared an anti-Marxist for saying this. Indeed, the Chinese theorists proceed from what they call Marxist ideas to say that "the withering away of the dictatorship of the proletariat is also the withering away of the state." Yet Marx speaks about the "statehood in communist society", which is no longer a dictatorship of the proletariat.

That is just the point. When speaking of the transitional period from capitalism to communism, Marx has in mind the first phase of communism, that is, socialism.

Surely, the Chinese leaders know that Marx and Engels have spoken more than once about the two phases of communism and about the dictatorship of the proletariat being a state of the transitional period, whose aim, the building of socialism, is the aim of the first phase of communism. Pointing to the inevitably long and persistent struggle for the socialist rearrangement of society, Lenin wrote about "a whole period of dictatorship by the proletariat as a period of transition from capitalism to socialism" (Works, Vol. 29, p. 358, Russ. ed.) .

The Peking theorists go out of their way to hush up the proposition emphasized by Lenin. What he said was that the dictatorship of the proletariat was necessary "for the purpose of the final building and consolidation of socialism" (Vol. 29, p. 351, Russ. ed), and that, once the danger that capitalist relations may be restored disappears, there comes "an end to the dictatorship of the proletariat" (Vol. 33, p. 75, Russ. ed.).

That was how Lenin put it.

The facts have confirmed the correctness of Lenin's propositions. If the Chinese leaders had really been concerned about the truth, they could have turned to our everyday practice and seen how the economic basis and social structure of Soviet society have changed. Lenin considered that the suppression of the overthrown exploiting classes was a most important function of the dictatorship of the proletariat. Socialist society in the USSR, as we know, long since consists of friendly classes, the workers and peasants, and the social group of the people's intelligentsia. They are welded by common basic interests, by the Marxist-Leninist ideology and by their identical goal, the building of communism.

Against whom do the Chinese theorists suggest that we enforce dictatorship? What are they leading up to, and how to interpret their demand that the CPSU should carry through a "policy of class struggle" inside the country?

We know where the theory put forward by Stalin about the inevitable aggravation of the class struggle as the successes of socialist construction accumulate led to. It may be recalled that this theory served as a vindication for gross violations of socialist legality. The CPSU has put an end to it and will never allow anything like it to happen again. It has pursued and will continue to pursue a policy of strengthening the alliance between the working class and the peasants, of uniting all working people in a single collective of builders of communism.

The ideas of a state of the whole people and the party of the whole people are not the fruit of arm-chair rumination. They were generated by reality and reflect the high maturity which social relations have attained in the USSR. In view of the fact that the exploitingclasses have long since been abolished in the USSR, the Soviet state, having lost the character of a body suppressing the overthrown exploiters, now expresses the interests and the will of the people, while the party of the working class has become a party of the whole people.

After the complete and final victory of socialism the working class no longer carries out its leading role througn the dictatorship of the proletariat. It remains the foremost class of society also in the period of full-scale communist construction. Its leading role stems from both its economic position, the fact that it is connected directly with the highest form of socialist property, and the fact that it possesses the greatest steeling acquired through decades of class struggle and revolutionary experience.

All these propositions of the CPSU Program are not by any means of just theoretical importance. They define the practical policy of our Party, the policy of drawing the whole people into the administration of the affairs of society, of increasing the people's activity in the building of communism, of extending socialist democracy. Yet the Chinese leaders ignore Lenin's precept that "socialism is impossible without democracy" (Vol. 23, p. 62, Russ. ed.). It is indicative that there is not the slightest mention of socialist democracy and the need to develop it while advancing to communism, in the Letter of the CC of the CPC of June 14, 1963, and in the other statements of the Chinese leadership.

Does idealization of methods of violence and suppression during the entire period of transition from capitalism to communism have anything in common with the Marxist-Leninist approach to the matter?

While noting that the proletariat could not have won without employing revolutionary violence against the landed proprietors and capitalists, Lenin wrote that "revolutionary violence was a necessary and lawful method of revolution only in certain periods of its development and only in certain and special circumstances, while organization of the proletarian masses, organization of the working people, was and remains a much more deep-rooted, permanent feature of this revolution and the requisite for its victories." (Vol. 29, p. 70, Russ. ed.)

The Chinese theorists maintain: "Anyone with an elementary knowledge of Marxism-Leninism can understand that the so-called state of the whole people is nothing new. Representative bourgeois figures have always called the bourgeois state a 'state of the whole people' or a 'state in which power belongs to all the people'."

A strong argument, indeed! To follow this train of thought, the Communists would also have to abandon the realization of such slogans as freedom, equality, fraternity and democracy for the sole reason that they were put forward in the bourgeois revolution and subsequently perverted and debased by the bourgeoisie on coming to power. We, on the contrary, think that the true meaning of these slogans should be revived, that these slogans should be carried into practice, and that this is possible only under socialism and communism.

So much for the concept of the state of the whole people.

When Lassalle spoke of such a state, or when imperialist ideologists speak of it today, the Marxists say rightly that their theory is nothing but deception of the people. For what these people have in mind is a state of the whole people in a class society. Such a state cannot exist in a society split into hostile classes. A state that develops out of the dictatorship of the proletariat that has completed its historic mission of building socialism within the country is an entirely different matter. Such a state can be nothing but a body expressing the interests and will of the whole people.

The Soviet state of the whole people, in which the working class retains its leading role, is continuing the cause begun by the state of the dictatorship of the proletariat. It performs faithfully its internationalist duty to the international working class and all the peoples of the world. The state of the whole people struggles consistently against imperialism. It ensures reliably the defenses of its country and contributes to the defense of the whole socialist camp. It develops fraternal co-operation with the socialist countries.

It is typical of the methods of the Chinese leaders in polemics to falsely depict the conclusion drawn in the Program of the CPSU about the growing over of the dictatorship of the proletariat into a state of the whole people under certain historical conditions as a rejection of the dictatorship of the proletariat in the period of socialist construction. The Chinese theorists have even gone to the length of saying that the CPSU has "completely flung overboard the quintessence of Marxism-Leninism, the teaching of the dictatorship of the proletariat."

That is a dirty and shameless lie! It is inscribed in the Program of the CPSU in so many words that "Soviet experience has shown that the peoples can achieve socialism only as a result of the socialist revolution and the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat."

The Chinese leaders do not bother to examine the matter in substance and also attempt to malign the conclusion of the Program of the CPSU on the transformation of the Communist Party of the working class in our country into a party of the whole people. They describe this conclusion as "organizational and moral disarmament of the proletariat," and even as "helping to restore capitalism."

Have the Chinese leaders at all tried to substantiate their monstrous accusations against the Party that heads the building of communism? Nothing of the sort! They have merely, without reason and argument, hitched this question to the question of the state. If the state cannot be of the whole people until the complete victory of communism, they say, then the Party cannot be of the whole people either. That is the only argument they adduce.

The working-class party, without which the dictatorship of that class is impossible, retains its proletarian class character, both formally and in substance, until the final victory of socialism. That is an indisputable fact.

But it is also indisputable that as a political organization the Party also reflects the changes occurring in the class structure of society. The CPSU has stressed in its Program that until the complete victory of communism the working class remains the leading force of Soviet society. In the period of full-scale communist construction, too, the Party is the spokesman of the communist ideals and goals of the working class, and of its basic interests. At the same time, it becomes a party of the whole people. This does not happen just because someone wishes it subjectively, but because the working-class goals and ideals become the goals and ideals of all the classes and strata of the people that have built socialism.

While attacking the propositions of the CPSU Program concerning the historic fate of the dictatorship of the proletariat and the nature of the state and working-class party in the Soviet Union, the Chinese theorists ignore the new phenomena of social life and refuse stubbornly to see that the new conclusions and propostions of the CPSU Program were not framed arbitrarily but express what has become part of life. As they attack the course charted by the 20th and 22nd Congresses of the CPSU, they go to the length of questioning the very right of our Party and people to build communism.

The transition of a society that has built socialism to the full-scale building of communism is a historically inevitable and objectively necessary process. It is a vital task for the Soviet people, a task put forward by life. We have all the necessary economic, political and other prerequisites, created thanks to the victory of the socialist system, for its practical implementation. To obstruct this process is to try to stop social progress. The facts have confirmed over and over again that attempts to by-pass historically inevitable stages in social development and attempts to retard and slow down social development are equally wrong and harmful.

The men in Peking are evidently so badly blinded by the factional struggle that they have, in the heat of the fray, unconsciously come into conflict with themselves. Just a few years ago, while proclaiming the "big leap" and "people's communes" policy, the CC, CPC, maintained that "apparently the realization of communism in our country is not something remote." (Decision of the CC, CPC, August 29, 1958.) Consequently, at that time the Chinese leaders thought it quite possible to go over to communist construction in their own country, although the building of socialism was then only beginning in China. Yet today they question communist construction in the USSR, where the final and complete victory of socialism has been achieved.

How can one fail to see the fact that the building of communism in countries that have built socialism accords with the interests of the peoples of all the socialist countries, all the revolutionary forces of our time? Is it not clear that it adds immensely to socialism's force of attraction, that it adds to the economic and defense potential of the socialist camp, and that it creates increasingly more favorable opportunities for greater effective economic, technical, cultural and other assistance and support to all the peoples fighting for socialist construction, for national independence and peace, against imperialism?

How can it be denied that the country marching first to communism is making the advance to communism easier and faster for the world socialist system as a whole, since its peoples are blazing untrodden paths for all mankind, checking how correct they are by their own experience, revealing the difficulties, finding ways and means of combating them, and choosing the best forms and methods of communist construction? It is this course that we consider correct, because it is the only course along which the peoples of the socialist countries can render the most effective support to the working peoples' struggle against imperialism, while cementing the unity and might of the socialist community and carrying into practice the communist ideals.

The Chinese leaders are attacking our Party for having worked out a scientifically reasoned plan of communist construction, for laying the accent on the creative activities of the whole Soviet people, on the building of the material and technical basis of communism, and for showing constant care for the improvement of the living and cultural standards of all working people in the country. That is truly monstrous and strange. It appears that the Chinese leaders' conception of socialism and communism, that their practice of building a new society, are very far removed from the Marxist-Leninist theory of scientific communism. Neither Marx nor Lenin had anywhere even remotely hinted that the tasks of socialist construction may be realized by the method of "leaps" and cavalry charges, overlooking the degree to which the socio-economic and spiritual premises of the advance have matured and ignoring the task of improving the living standard of the people.

If the Chinese leaders want to impose their practice on us as a "universal truth," if they want us to accept for a "model" a society in which violence is idealized and democracy restricted, in which the personality cult thrives and care for the working people is neglected, we will say bluntly: such a "universal truth" and such a "model" do not suit the Soviet people, and, we are sure, will not suit other peoples either.

Socialism, communism, which brings peace, labor, freedom, equality, fraternity and happiness for all the peoples has always been the goal of the Communist movement, and will remain so. We follow the theory and practice of scientific communism. We are marching and will always march along the road shown us by Marx, Engels and Lenin.

The Chinese leaders have embarked on the dangerous course of undermining Soviet-Chinese friendship and, naturally, we denounce their wrong actions most strongly. The present attitude of the Chinese leaders is having an unfavorable effect on the whole socialist camp and on the Communist movement. It is doing great harm to China as well.

As concerns the CPSU and the Soviet Union, we remain true to the principles of Marxism-Leninism and will undeviatingly perform our internationalist duty. We have taken and will continue to take all the necessary measures aimed at normalizing Soviet-Chinese relations and strengthening the friendship of our peoples.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union will continue to work for a normalization of the situation and for a strengthening of friendship between the CPSU and the Communist Party of China. Our Party is deeply convinced that this friendship will exist, grow and flourish.

VI

THE SPLITTING ACTIVITIES OF THE CHINESE LEADERS WITHIN THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

The Chinese leaders have lately stepped up very noticeably their subversive activities aimed at splitting the world Communist movement as well as a number of Marxist-Leninist parties. These activities of theirs have acquired an open character; developing on a wide front, they have become particularly insidious and are unprecedented as to the methods used. The CPC leaders have turned the controversy into a weapon of direct political struggle against fraternal parties.

The Chinese leaders have apparently decided to carry through to the end their subversive activity against the Leninist unity of the world Communist movement. In recent days they have openly alleged a split to have become "inevitable." In other words, they have now fully revealed their real aims, which they have had in view for a number of years with regard to the world Communist movement.

The Chinese leaders have pushed their factional struggle to a point where they are severing relations with certain Marxist-Leninist parties, which they arbitrarily describe as "non-existent," while giving the name of "parties" to the little groups of splitters they have formed. They have announced for all to hear that they support the factional groups of splitters which they themselves have set up in a number of countries to fight the Marxist-Leninist parties. In other words, the CPC leaders have openly assumed the responsibility for the infamous activities of all those groups and for their struggle against fraternal parties.

The CPC leadership is plainly out to form under its own aegis a sort of separate international bloc and to set it up against the world Communist movement as an instrument for intensifying the struggle against this movement.

The Chinese representatives on international democratic associations have greatly increased their splitting activity and have openly set out to create separate organizations and disrupt the links between the progressive, democratic forces of different countries and different areas of the globe.

The result is that although the Chinese leaders still utter once in a while hypocritical phrases about unity and solidarity, all their practical steps are in fact aimed at shaking and splitting the world Communist movement. Today the policy and activity of the Chinese leaders are the main danger to the unity of the world Communist movement.

It is in this light that we should appraise the publication in two organs of the CC, CPC, Jenminjihpao and Hungchi, on February 4th last, of a factional article directed against the CPSU and the world Communist movement as a whole, an article which is a kind of platform for splitting the revolutionary movement of the working class.

In that article the Chinese leaders allege that the development of the Communist movement proceeds according to the formula: "Unity —struggle, or even a split—a new unity on a new basis." In so doing, they refer to the law of dialectics. But any Marxist-Leninist will see that these so-called dialectics are no more than a fresh attempt to mask a splitting policy with pseudo-theoretical talk.

Who can speak of an "inevitable" split today? Only those who are breaking with Marxism-Leninism, with the principles of proletarian internationalsm. By contrast, those who have the interests of the great cause of the international working class at heart see no objective reasons for a split in the present-day Communist movement. That movement has a political line tested by the experience of struggle over a long period, a line which has brought the working class and the socialist cause outstanding victories and which enjoys tremendous prestige among the people.

What would a split in the world Communist movement mean in present-day conditions? In our day, such a split would inevitably lead to undermining the unity of the main forces of the world anti-imperialist front, the socialist community, the international working-class movement, the national liberation movement, and the general democratic movements of the peoples. It would only benefit the aggressive forces of imperialism and would make it easier for them to attack the positions of the world-wide liberation movement.

Obviously, anyone who seeks a split is assuming a tremendous, a frightful historical responsibility.

Ever since the world Communist movement came into being the reactionaries all over the world have been making frantic efforts to split its ranks. Today the Chinese leaders are trying to achieve what imperialist reaction has failed to do.

In the light of the present splitting activities of the Chinese leaders, it is now clearer than ever why, at the Meeting of 1960, the CPC delegates insisted so vehemently on excluding from the Statement the passage regarding the impermissibility of factional activity within the world Communist movement. At that time the fraternal parties unanimously rejected that demand of the Chinese delegation. The Meeting of 1960 said in its Statement that one of the necessary conditions for the Communists to achieve their goals is the prevention of all actions likely to undermine the unity of the world Communist movement.

Shortly after the Meeting the Chinese leaders violated that commitment, which they had made together with the other fraternal parties. They even tried, specifically in the article "Workers of All Countries, Unite! Fight Against Our Common Enemy!" (December 1962), to put on a "theoretical" basis their refusal to carry out a common decision. They put forward the concept of "majority and minority," which claims that the minority has a right not to comply with collectively adopted decisions and to combat the common line approved. This is nothing but a revision of the fundamental organizational principle of Leninism, for Lenin taught that "only the submission of the minority to the majority can be a principle of the working-class movement." (Coll. Works, Vol. 20, p. 354, Russ. ed.).

The majority to which the Peking leaders are now opposed is a majority comprising Communist parties that have brought the working class of their countries to power and are achieving epoch-making victories for socialism. It is a majority which includes Communist Parties of every single continent and is marching in the van of the revolutionary struggle.

The Chinese leaders are so blinded by their factionalism that they do not hesitate to describe the Marxist-Leninist parties as nothing more or less than a "fictitious" majority.

That device is by no means new. It was first used by splitters against Lenin. They declared boastfully that some day the majority would follow their lead and then they would recognize its will. Lenin wrote about such people that they "recognize the will of the majority of the class-conscious workers not at the present time but in the future, in that, and only in that, future when the workers will agree with them, the liquidators, Plekhanov and Trotsky" (Coll. Works, Vol. 20, p. 451, Russ. ed.).

It follows that splitters at all times resort to the same kind of stratagems in opposing the will of the majority.

Lately, in fighting against the principle of submission of the minority to the majority, the CPC leaders have been the first among the opportunists and splitters whom the world Communist movement has ever encountered to put forward the thesis that the existence of several Communist parties in one and the same country is a "legitimate" thing. From what they say it follows that these parties should fight not so much against the enemies of the working class as among themselves. There is no need here to refute this thoroughly harmful concept at great length, for every politically-conscious worker realizes that the unity of the class interests and will of the proletariat, and its ideology and class organization are embodied in a single and solidly united Marxist-Leninist party. Still, it is worth pointing out once again the stratagems to which the present day splitters have recourse to bring confusion into the working-class movement and undermine Communist unity.

With that aim in view, they use a patently fraudulent device, by deliberately misinterpreting Lenin's statements. Here is a typical example.

In his well-known work "Violation of Unity Under Cover of Cries for Unity," Lenin condemns Trotsky's splitting activities, exposes his calumny against the Bolshevik Party and his attempts to disorganize the workers' movement with his propaganda of insubordination of the minority to the will of the majority of workers. Lenin wrote: "Where the majority of class conscious workers have rallied to pre cise and definite decisions, there is unity of opinion and action, there is Party spirit and a Party . . . Now by trying to persuade the workers not to carry out the decisions of that 'whole' which is recognized by the Marxists- *Pravda*ists, Trotsky is trying to disturb the movement and cause a split." Lenin regarded Trotsky's activities as "splitting activity, in the sense that it is a most impudent violation of the will of the majority of the workers" (Vol. 20, pp. 310, 312).

The editors of the article published in Jenminjihpao and Hungchi magazine on February 4, 1964, cite Lenin's article perverting the position of Lenin who always emphasized that general proletarian discipline should be obligatory for all and demanded that the minority should submit to the will of the majority of workers. Trying to disorganize the Communist Parties, the Chinese splitters went as far as an outright forgery.

Furthermore, the Chinese leaders obscure so obvious a point as the necessity for a definite international discipline within the Communist movement. They contend that such a discipline is out of the question since we no longer have a centralized organization of the Comintern type.

But that is a statement by which the CPC betray themselves, probably unwittingly. They do not realize that international Communist discipline in the present conditions does not imply the execution of orders given by someone on top, but the assumption by the Communist parties, of their own free will and from a keen awareness of their internationalist duty, of definite obligations towards the world Communist movement as a whole and towards one another, as well as the consistent fulfilment of these obligations. That is what prompted the fraternal parties to pledge themselves in their Statement of 1960 to adhere strictly to the following principles: to cherish party unity as the apple of their eye; to abide in a spirit of solidarity by the jointly formulated appraisals and conclusions regarding the common tasks to be carried out in the struggle against imperialism and for peace, democracy and socialism; to prevent all actions likely to undermine the unity of the world Communist movement; to support one another and respect the independence and equality of all the Marxist-Leninist parties.

Consistent adherence to the collectively expressed will of the world Communist movement is an indication of the Marxist maturity of the party concerned, of its internationalism, for Marxism-Leninism and internationalism are inseparable.

The Chinese leaders' statements on this point are apparently influenced by their general view on discipline, which they regard not as politically conscious fulfilment of its duty by every contingent of the great alliance of like-minded Communists, but merely as compulsory execution of orders. They are evidently influenced by a practice which is so characteristic of the CPC leaders.

But how foreign that is to the Marxist-Leninist spirit! Lenin, speaking of the Russian Bolsheviks, wrote: "We are proud of the fact that we decide the great questions of the workers' struggle for their emancipation submitting to the international discipline of the revolutionary proletariat, with due regard to the experience of the workers of different countries, to their knowledge and will, and in this way achieve, in deeds, and not in words as in the case of the Renners, Fritz Adlers and Otto Bauers, world-wide unity in the class struggle of the workers for communism" (Coll. Works, Vol. 31, p. 244, Russ. ed.).

What the Chinese leaders are particularly proud of today is their complete disregard for international Communist discipline, their truly anarchist behavior both in polemics and in their relations with fraternal parties.

At present not only the underlying idea of the "theories" spread by the Chinese leaders with a view to justifying their splitting activities, but the main lines along which their activities are developing in practice, and their ways and methods, have become perfectly clear.

The CPC leaders aim their heaviest blows at the strongest and most authoritative contingents of the world Communist movement, that is, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the Communist parties of other socialist countries, and the French, Italian and other parties. They are out to discredit at all costs all the genuinely Marxist-Leninist parties, which enjoy well-earned respect in the world Communist movement and among the masses.

The attitude of the CC, CPC, to the Communist parties functioning in the capitalist countries is particularly outrageous. The Chinese leaders are creating many additional difficulties for those parties, which have to work in difficult conditions as it is. They are doing their best to defame the Marxist-Leninist leaderships of those parties and to undermine their prestige. They fling at tried and tested leaders of the working class such insulting epithets as "as faint-hearted as mice," "parrots," "double-dealers," and so on .

They say those things about leaders of parties which have set an example of heroic struggle against fascism, which today march at the head of the struggle against the monopolies and constitute a major national force. They say those things about militant and esteemed comrades who are fighting against heavy odds and are persecuted. Surely one cannot but resent it when they say that the leaders of the U.S. Communist Party "co-operate with the most reckless of the U.S. imperialists," that the Chilean Communists' position "meets the objectives of U.S. imperialism, which wants to maintain its rule in Latin America," that the leadership of the Communist Party of India is no more than a "clique," and so on.

An idea of what Peking means by proletarian solidarity can be gained from the reaction of the CC, CPC, to the execution of Salam Adil and other leaders of the Communist Party of Iraq by the Baath nationalists. In their interviews with foreign delegations, the Chinese leaders frankly gloated over the atrocious assassination of the Iraqi comrades. Immediately after the Baathist coup d'état they sought contact with the assassins. It is now clear that the Chinese representatives in Iraq wanted to take advantage of the fact that the Communist Party of Iraq found itself without a leadership and to form a splitters' group there.

The whole of the Chinese propaganda machine, the New China News Agency, information centres, various bulletins, and radio have now been turned against the Marxist-Leninist parties. The Chinese leaders have in effect opened a new ideological front against fraternal parties. Moreover, they do not mind directly borrowing any device, however base, from the anti-communist arsenal. There is, for example, the falsehood, launched by Chinese propaganda, about the "baton of Moscow" at a wave of which Communist parties are supposed to "turn" one way or the other. This falsehood is an affront both to the fraternal parties which staunchly champion the national interests of their peoples and to the CPSU, to which all interference in the internal affairs of other parties is alien. It is nothing but a new version of that old fable of imperialist propaganda about the "hand of Moscow." In the past it was used against Lenin and the Comintern by Right Social-Democratic leaders. Today it has become a weapon of Peking.

A recent development which may be called the height of the splitting activity of the Chinese leaders is their recruitment of adherents in the ranks of fraternal parties, and the formation of factional groups composed of them. In its letter of June 14, 1963, the CPC leadership already threatened fraternal parties that should they reject the propositions of Peking, they would be replaced by new people who "are or are not members of that party." Facts of recent date show that the Chinese leaders are now carrying out that threat by trying to saddle the working-class movement in some countries with leaders from among all sorts of renegades, turncoats and adventurers. The CPC leaders are trying to make the splitters' groups they form out of those renegades their main weapon in the struggle against the Marxist-Leninist parties.

To date anti-party groups of renegades and splitters have been set up, with help and support from Peking, in Belgium, Brazil, Australia, Ceylon, Britain and some other countries. Some of those groups number less than ten members and some otherscomprise a few dozens of people. This does not, however, embarrass the Chinese leaders, for, on orders from Peking, these groups shout loudly and in unison, pouring lies and slander upon the world Communist movement and the Marxist-Leninist parties. The ringleaders of the groups unexpectedly come into possession of large sums of money. They found newspapers and magazines and begin to publish all manner of slanderous writings, and often open shops of their own to sell Chinese propaganda productions.

The political complexion of the members of these groupings bespeaks the Chinese leaders' complete lack of principle. These as a rule are opportunists, unstable elements expelled from Communist Parties for advocating anti-Marxist views, for factional activity or for immoral behavior, or ambitious men seeking a career, political "weathercocks" and the like. Members of anti-Party groupings in some countries have displayed rightist opportunist tendencies. There are people with a shady record and all kinds of adventurers acting in the splitters' groups in Austria, Chile and the United States.

It stands to reason that fraternal parties refuse to put up with factional groups and throw them out of their ranks. Whenever this happens, Peking "takes to task" the fraternal party concerned, which it accuses of nothing more or less than "using unlawful methods." The Chinese leaders declare expelled splitters to be "true revolutionaries" and "courageous fighters," although all that their "struggle" boils down to is the writing of high-sounding "manifestoes" against the Communist Party concerned. They make frequent trips to Peking, where they are received with great pomp and where their long articles peddling calumnies are published.

The meaning of the clamor raised in Peking over factional groups has become perfectly obvious in recent months. The Chinese leaders have revealed it themselves. A very short time ago they widely advertised a get-together of renegades in Belgium, which termed itself nothing more or less than a "national conference," and passed a ridiculous resolution to "re-establish (sic!) the Communist Party of Belgium" and "condemn the anti-Party behavior of the former (sic!) Central Committee of the Communist Party of Belgium." As for the Chinese leaders, they base themselves on that fiction to describe the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Belgium elected by the Party Congress as the "former" CC, as if it were Peking and not the working class of the country concerned that founded a Communist party. In the same way the CPC leaders "abolished" the central committees of certain other Communist parties, such as that of Ceylon.

We must say plainly that there has never been anything like that in the history of the Communist movement. It has never occurred to a Communist party to declare wretched groups of splitters expelled from another Communist party to be the real Party and to describe the real Communist Party as a "has-been." The Chinese leaders, who talk so loudly about equality and non-interference by parties in one another's internal affairs, today lay claim to the role of "supreme judges" in the Communist movement who shall decide for the Communist parties concerned matters bearing on their internal life.

The splitters' groups set up by Peking have no roots in the working-class movement and in the general democratic struggle of the masses, nor can they have any. They are outside the world Communist movement and no politically-conscious worker will ever agree to have anything to do with them. They have been brought into existence in an absolutely artificial manner, being a product of the splitting activities of Peking. It should be noted that their rise has been very well received by the ruling circles of the capitalist countries, which see them as a gratuitous "fifth column" in the working-class movement.

At present the leaders of the CC, CPC, are carrying things further, plainly intending to form, as a counterweight to the world Communist movement, a bloc of their supporters with its own platform and group discipline, and with headquarters in Peking. These plans were given away as early as the end of 1962 by Mehmet Shehu, who said that a bloc of parties loyal to Marxism-Leninism was being formed with the Chinese Party at the head.

Why is that bloc being set up? Anyone should realize that its aim is not to fight for the objectives of the working-class movement against world imperialism, for the very idea of the bloc contains the seeds of a split and, consequently, of a weakening of the working class. That bloc is being set up to fight against the Marxist-Leninist parties, against the world Communist movement, for the benefit of the special aims of the CC, CPC, leadership.

The Chinese leaders have extended their policy of splitting the world Communist movement to the international front of the democratic forces. For several years now they have been using the congresses and conferences of peace fighters and of women's, youth and other international associations for disruptive sorties. This was the case at the conferences of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organization, the Women's Congress in Moscow, the session of the World Peace Council in Warsaw, and at other international forums. Juggling with "revolutionary phrases," the Chinese leaders try to impose on all those organizations tasks and functions alien to them, to discredit and declare unnecessary the principal slogans and demands which gave rise to such democratic movements. Obviously, the Chinese representatives' sectarian position is directed towards alienating from these movements large sections of the population holding different views and towards narrowing the mass base of the general democratic struggle.

Comrades, the world Communist movement has become the most influential political force of today. In waging a grim struggle against imperialist reaction, for the interests of the working class and all working people, for peace, democracy, national independence and socialism, it has made great progress, considerably increased its membership and scored outstanding victories. The post-war period has seen the rise of dozens of new Communist parties and today there is not a corner on the globe where Communists are not carrying the great ideas of Marxism-Leninism to the people. The last decade has been particularly eventful for the world Communist movement. It is in this decade that the movement has, in eliminating the harmful effects of the personality cult, become much more active in its creative thought and practical work, which it has brought even closer to reality, to the needs and expectations of the mass of the people.

Against that historical background, the harm of the splitting activities of the Chinese leaders, as well as the utter hopelessness of their attempts to lead world Communism astray from its Leninist path and make it subservient to their own designs, are particularly obvious.

It would be wrong, however, to underrate the danger of the factional activities of the CC, CPC. The Chinese leaders pin their hopes on all sorts of immature and unstable elements, and also on those who are unaffected by the new spirit which has permeated the Communist movement during the last decade and who cling to the practices of the personality cult and are still fettered by the dogmatic and doctrinaire patterns implanted by it.

The Chinese leadership's factional methods are also adopted by all manner of renegades and turncoats, who are willing to fight against communism under any flag.

Furthermore, the Chinese leaders clearly want to profit by the real discontent of the people at the anti-popular, reactionary policies of the ruling classes of the capitalist countries. In our day, when hundreds upon hundreds of millions of people, including people who are at sea politically and lack experience, are joining in an active political struggle, the "ultra-Left" revolutionary phrases in which the Chinese leaders couch their adventuristic concepts are likely to bring a certain response. This applies, above all, to those countries where there is no industrial proletariat or where it is small, and where petty-bourgeois ideology exercises considerable influence, while the theoretical maturity of revolutionary leaders is not always up to the mark.

To disguise their anti-Leninist line and their splitting activities, the Chinese leaders profess to be fighting "modern revisionism." They label as "revisionist" Marxist-Leninist parties and exalt themselves as the "true" revolutionaries. They expect that they can in this way mislead people who are unfamiliar with the true history of the struggle of the world Communist movement against Right and "Left" opportunism, and are inclined to assimilate superficial patterns of revolutionary struggle rather than to master the substance of our great doctrine.

We know well from the history of the Communist movement that irresponsible accusations of revisionism have repeatedly been levelled at the proponents of creative Marxism by all kinds of dogmatists and petty-bourgeois revolutionaries. In the autumn of 1920, for example, G. Gorter, a Dutch "Left" Communist expelled from the Comintern, wrote in his Open Letter to Lenin in reply to Lenin's book "Left-Wing Communism," an Infantile Disorder: "You and the Third International are now doing what Social-Democrats did in the past. . . . In accordance with the development of the working-class movement in Western Europe, there exist two trends: radical and opportunist.

You, however, Comrade Lenin, support the opportunist trend. . . . From a Marxist leader you are turning into an opportunist leader."

How many people recall today those wretched sallies against the greatest revolutionary in world history?

The methods used by the Chinese splitters cannot deceive the Marxist-Leninists of the world. The absolute majority of the Marxist-Leninist parties has openly condemned the anti-Leninist, adventuristic policy of the leaders of the CC, CPC. Numerous documents, statements by prominent leaders of the world Communist movement, and the Party press have strongly criticized the harmful propositions and factional, disruptive actions of the Chinese leaders. All this means that, taken as a whole, the world Communist movement today adheres to the only position that is correct, namely, the Marxist-Leninist position.

Our Party, which was reared by Lenin, will continue, together with the other fraternal parties, to fight unrelentingly against all opportunist actions both from the "Right" and from the "Left," for the unity of the fraternal parties and all the contingents of the world revolutionary movement, and for the purity of the all-conquering Marxist-Leninist doctrine.

Soviet Communists, as all other Marxist-Leninists in the world, cannot limit themselves to a criticism and political assessment of the erroneous, anti-Leninist views of the CPC leadership. Each of us inevitably asks the question: How has it happened that the leaders of a party like the CPC, which has considerable experience of revolutionary struggle and of building a new society, have taken the road of struggle against the world Communist movement? Who are we dealing with in the person of the CPC leadership?

The experience of our Party and of the whole international working-class movement shows that on many occasions Leninism had come to grips with views and propositions such as are now being trumpeted by the Chinese leadership. Naturally, the present advocates of these views do not simply repeat what their predecessors said. They adapt old ideas to new conditions and to their own requirements.

Lenin, as we know, pointed out that Bolshevism grew, gained strength and became steeled chiefly in the struggle against Right-wing opportunism. "This was," he wrote, "naturally, the principal enemy of Bolshevism within the working-class movement." At the same time he emphasized the importance of another aspect of the experience of Bolshevism, about which, he noted, much too little was known abroad. "Bolshevism," he wrote in 'Left-Wing Communism,' an Infantile Disorder, "grew up, took shape and became steeled in a drawn-out struggle against petty-bourgeois revolutionism, which smacks of anarchism or borrows something from it, which departs in all essentials from the conditions and requirements of a consistent proletarian class struggle" (Coll. Works, Vol. 31. pp. 15-16).

It is noteworthy that the Chinese leaders, who love to refer, relevantly and irrelevantly, to examples of past ideological differences and draw historical parallels, pass over in complete silence this aspect of Bolshevik experience. That is not accidental, for each word that Lenin directed against representatives of petty-bourgeois revolutionism or, as he ironically called it, petty-bourgeois "revolutionarism", is directed at the present ideological and political concepts and propositions of the CPC leadership.

A comprehensive characterization is given of petty-bourgeois revolutionism in Lenin's numerous works, in the decisions of our Party and in the documents of the Communist International. Lenin saw its sources in the special position of the petty proprietor, who easily goes over to "extreme revolutionism" but is unable to display self-control, organization, discipline and staunchness and is inclined to swing from one extreme to another.

Everybody knows of the struggle Bolshevism waged against the Socialist-Revolutionaries, a party "which more than any other," as Lenin noted, "showed a tendency to go over to petty-bourgeois revolutionism" (Coll. Works, Vol. 31, p. 16). We cannot help but recall that the Socialist-Revolutionaries rejected the idea that the working class plays the leading role and tried to prove that the peasant movement is the true socialist movement.

From time to time, particularly at sharp turns in history, petty-bourgeois vacillation made itself felt in the ranks of the proletarian parties as well. Lenin repeatedly pointed out that the proletariat was not insured against the penetration of petty-bourgeois ideology and prejudices into its ranks. Joining the proletarian parties the best of the petty-bourgeois revolutionaries re-educate themselves, seriously study Marxism and in the end become true revolutionaries. Others are either too slow or incapable of learning anything from the proletarian party "except a few words and 'striking' slogans learnt by rote . . ." (Coll. Works, Vol. 16, pp. 44-45).

Our Party had to combat "leftist" petty-bourgeois vacillation most of all after taking over power, during the early years of the development of the Soviet state. We know the relentless struggle that Lenin waged against "Left-wing Communists", the "workers' opposition", Trotskyism and the "ultra-leftist" trend in the then young Communist movement.

Allow me to remind you of the struggle against "Left-wing Communists" in the period the Brest Peace was concluded, when they attempted to foist upon the Soviet Republic the disastrous adventurist tactics of a "revolutionary war". Lenin held that despite their clamorous revolutionary talk, the "Left-wing Communists" based their views on stark pessimism and utter despair. (Coll. Works, Vol. 27, p. 51, Russ. ed.). As regards the objective role played by the "Left-wing Communists" at that time, Lenin, addressing them, said bluntly: "By your objective role you are the weapon of imperialist provocation. While your subjective 'psychology' is that of an infuriated petty bourgeois who swaggers and boasts and yet is fully aware that the proletariat is right . . ." (Coll. Works, Vol. 27, p. 297, Russ. ed.).

In the situation that has now arisen in the international Communist movement special mention must be made of the acute struggle that our Party wages against Trotskyism. Trotskyism was a clearly expressed petty-bourgeois deviation. It laid false claim to being more "leftist", a more "revolutionary" trend than Bolshevism. While proclaiming themselves the "true" champions of the world revolution, Trotsky and his supporters in actual fact opposed Leninism. Moreover, Trotskyism was a negation of the Bolshevik Party, of the unity of its ranks. Factionalism comprised the "soul" of Trotskyism. The Trotskyites joined hands not only with the small factional groups within the Comintern but also with organizations, groups and individuals that had never belonged to Communist parties, and also with enemies and traitors expelled from their ranks.

Do we have to recall all these facts? Yes, comrades, we have to, in order to take into account the lessons of past struggles against Leninism.

Do the Chinese theoreticians' present concept not remind us of many of the ideas of the petty-bourgeois trends that were defeated by Leninism long ago? Only a petty-bourgeois "ultra-revolutionary can regard the policy of peaceful coexistence between states with different social systems as a "renunciation" of the struggle against imperialism, a "rejection" of the revolution. He alone welcomes the thesis of the "revolutionary war" being the "last, decisive means" of putting an end to the contradiction between the two social systems. Only a petty-bourgeois "arch"-revolutionary can demand that revolution be started "at once" and "everywhere" without taking into account concrete conditions and the balance of forces. He alone can oppose the utilization of the peaceful road of revolution because his only criterion of "revolutionism" is the use of armed force regardless of whether circumstances require it or not.

It is quite understandable that having steered this course, the Chinese leaders have naturally come down to borrowing many of their ideas and concepts from the ideological arsenal of Trotskyism in the same way as they have inherited from it their factional, splitting methods of struggle against Marxist-Leninist parties.

Yes, comrades, it must be said openly that the entire range of the CPC leadership's theoretical and political views are in many ways a rehash of Trotskyism, which has long ago been thrown overboard by the international revolutionary movement.

What in actual fact are the views of the Chinese leaders on the questions of war and peace? Nothing but a repetition under new conditions of the Trotskyite slogan of "neither war nor peace".

Or take the CC CPC leadership's active opposition to economic competition with capitalism. Is there anything new in it? No, it is merely a repetition of the old Trotskyite line of rejecting peaceful economic development and going over to the tactics of "revolutionary war", of giving the world revolution a "push" by armed force.

That, of course, was the real meaning behind the Trotskyite theory of "permanent revolution". The struggle against Trotskyism on this issue was of historic significance. The future of the world's first Land of Socialism, the future of the entire world revolutionary movement depended on the outcome of that struggle. What would have happened had our Party adopted that line? It would have found itself helpless in the face of world imperialism and would have fallen easy prey to it in the event of an armed attack.

Properly speaking, the dispute the Chinese leaders have started concerns the same question of whether to take the road of "revolutionary" adventures or to adhere to the Leninist policy of strengthening the economic and political might of the world system of socialism and developing the revolutionary movement in the capitalist countries and the national liberation struggle of the peoples, taking full account of Lenin's theory of the revolution being the result of the aggravation of internal class contradictions in each country.

The kinship with Trotskyism is not less striking also in the Chinese theses on the danger of "bourgeois degeneration" in the socialist countries. In reply to these fabrications we can say that they are not new, that our Party has heard them before. They are a repetition under new conditions of the Trotskyite slander about the "degeneration" of the USSR into a "Thermidor" state.

Besides, do we not find features of Trotskyism in the Chinese concepts which exaggerate the role of force, of coercion in the revolution and in the building of socialism?

Furthermore, compare the views of the CPC leaders with the "ideas" of modern Trotskyism. Perhaps some people might think that the Chinese theory about the regions of Asia, Africa and Latin America being the "the storm-centres of the world revolution" is new? No, it is almost a word for word repetition of one of the basic theses of present-day Trotskyism. The decisions of the so-called Fourth (Trotskyite) International contain the words: ". . . As a result of the successive defeats of the two major revolutionary waves in 1919-23 and 1943-48 and the weaker wave of 1934-37, the focus of the world revolution has for the present shifted to the colonial world."

Here you have the source of the Chinese leadership's political wisdom.

In the writings of modern Trotskyites one can find other "ultra"-revolutionary phrases, which are reproduced almost word for word by the Chinese press and given out as so-called "revolutionary principles". Peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems, the Trotskyites vociferate, "is not only impossible but also harmful to the working-class of all countries" because it helps "to strengthen the positions of capitalism and weakens the positions of socialism". They boastfully declare that "only the person who is fearlessly prepared to face the consequences of the nuclear war being hatched by capitalism can be considered a true revolutionary," and so on and so forth.

After this is it surprising that in addressing the CPC leaders the ringleaders of modern Trotskyism say to them (as was said last July by Posadas, one of the heads of Trotskyism in Latin America):

"Comrade Chinese, you have no right to maintain that all the questions you are putting forward as revolutionary conclusions are the result solely of your own theoretical and political works. They are the conclusions of the Fourth International."

Small wonder that the Trotskyites openly link up their hopes for a revival of their long-withered movement with the present political line of the Chinese leadership. "The political stand taken by the Communist Party of China," states the so-called 'Manifesto' of the sixth congress of their International, "indicate tremendous possibilities, which open a field of activity such as Trotskyism never had before."

The Chinese leaders pretend they do not notice all this. They have evidently reasoned along the following lines: "Present-day Trotskyism is a little-known trend and we can use its ideas by giving them a 'Sinified' form". But the truth will out. No matter how the Chinese leadership strive to conceal the real source of their ideas they cannot hide the coincidence of their views with those of the Trotskyites, past and present.

Like the Trotskyites, the Chinese leaders are demanding freedom for factions and groupings in the Communist movement and using their methods for subversive activity in the movement. Does anyone think we cannot recognize in the malicious personal attacks of Chinese propaganda against leaders of the CPSU and the Communist parties of France, Italy, the USA, India and other countries the familiar "handwriting" of the Trotskyites, who dreamed of finding ways of casting still more vicious slander at popular leaders of the working class?

The modern Trotskyites do not hide their jubilation over these actions of the CPC leaders. In a statement published in Paris at the close of last year, the joint secretariat of the Trotskyite "International" assured the Chinese leaders that it "would support them" in the struggle against the CPSU and also against the Indian, U.S., French, Italian and other Communist parties. At a meeting in the summer of 1963 the Executive Committee of this "International" issued a special resolution approving the "historical mission of joining the Chinese and working for a united front between the Fourth International and the Chinese comrades".

These facts speak for themselves. The logic of their struggle with the CPSU and the world Communist movement is bringing the CPC leaders ever closer to Trotskyism, the bitterest enemy of Marxism-Leninism.

One must say that at one time the Chinese leaders themselves saw the danger of petty-bourgeois pressure on the Communist Party of China. "Our Party," Mao Tse-tung, for example, said, "is not only surrounded by this broad social stratum from without, but people with a petty-bourgeois background form a huge majority within it as well . . . Petty-bourgeois ideology of all shades frequently finds expression in our Party" (Mao Tse-tung, Vol. 4, pp. 386-387 Russ. ed.) In the CPC, he said elsewhere, petty-bourgeois ideology finds expression in "dashing now to the left, now to the right, in a weakness for leftist revolutionary verbiage and slogans, in sectarian exclusiveness and adventurism."

The Chinese leaders used to be right in what they wrote. But now they have ceased talking about the danger of petty-bourgeois degeneration. Is it because petty-bourgeois ideology has taken the upper hand in their own views, in their political line, in the methods of their activity?

Yet in a country like China, as in tsarist Russia, with its huge preponderance of non-proletarian strata among the population, Communists must be especially vigilant with regard to the penetration of petty-bourgeois views and traditions into the ranks of the working class. Under Lenin's leadership our Party successfully coped with this task. From its very inception it was a party of the militant working class, which was linked up with large-scale industry and had extensive training in the proletarian class struggle. The fact that Lenin and the Bolsheviks drew on the experience of the entire international working-class movement and firmly adhered to the principles and ideals of the scientific socialism of Marx and Engels was of fundamental importance.

The CPC leaders evidently lack sufficient Marxist-Leninist grounding to stand firm against the pressure of petty-bourgeois elements and uphold the line of proletarian socialism. This alone can explain the fact that petty-bourgeois ideology has laid its imprint on both their internal and foreign policy.

We would not have liked to touch upon the question of the internal policy of the CPC leadership. But we are compelled to do so, because the adventurist line of the Chinese leaders in the international arena is linked up with their mistakes in domestic policy.

Marxist-Leninists of all countries now know the results of the so-called policy of the "big leap" and people's communes. One cannot fail to see in this policy "leftist" attempts to "leap" over necessary stages of social development.

Our Party has always given the Chinese Communists due credit for the democratic and socialist transformation effected after the triumph of the Revolution. In the period 1949-57, when it pursued a realistic line, utilized the experience of the other socialist countries and relied on their support, the Communist Party of China achieved considerable successes in promoting China's economic, social and political development. Soviet people sincerely rejoiced over these successes.

But in 1958 this line was suddenly revised and replaced with the so-called policy of "three red banners — of the general line, the big leap and the people's communes." The Chinese leaders decided to accomplish in a few years the tasks for which back in 1956 it was felt three or more five-year plans were needed. It was decided to increase the gross industrial output 6.5 times (with an average annual increase rate of 45 per cent!) and the total agricultural output 2.5 times (with an average annual increase rate of 20 per cent!) in five years (1958-62).

These plans were drawn up without any economic substantiation whatsoever, without taking the country's real possibilities into account. The people's communes that were set up in the countryside had the job of ensuring the "leap to communism" in 3-4 or 5-6 years.

Everybody knows what came of these experiments. The CPR's economy found itself hurled back several years. The line of the "three red banners" led to a serious disorganization of the entire national economy, to a sharp retardation of the rate of industrialization and affected the people's standard of living.

In saying this, we are, naturally, not gloating over the failures of the Chinese Communists. Like them, we are distressed by the difficulties that have fallen to the lot of the fraternal Chinese people. Our sole purpose in speaking of these facts is to show what a departure from tested Leninist principles of socialist construction leads to.

In analyzing the present positions of the Chinese leadership one cannot fail to see that they also stem from the increasingly more open nationalistic, great-power aspirations that are particularly evident in the foreign policy of the CPC leaders. History knows of many cases when vociferous "revolutionarism" went hand in hand with the most blatant nationalism. Lenin pointed out time and again that the social and economic conditions giving rise to the petty proprietor impart especial stability to one of "the most deep-seated of petty-bourgeois prejudices, namely: prejudices of national egoism, of national narrow-mindedness" (Coll. Works, Vol. 31, p. 128, Russ. ed.)

Facts show that nationalism is gaining the upper hand more and more in the entire policy of the Chinese leaders, that it is becoming the mainspring of their actions. This manifested itself during the period of the "big leap", which was obviously planned as an attempt to overtake all the socialist countries "at one go" and occupy a dominating position in the world socialist system.

Later these tendencies became mode and more pronounced. This found expression in such actions of the Chinese government as the artificial fanning of nationalistic passions around frontier issues, the behavior of the CPC leaders during the Caribbean crisis and the stand of the Chinese government in the nuclear problem.

These and other facts reveal the complete discrepancy between what the Chinese leaders say and what they do. It is becoming increasingly clear that the "leftist" talk and prescriptions are intended mainly for "export", for the Communist parties of other countries. As for themselves, when matters concern practical steps in the international arena, the CPC leaders prefer to act from anything but positions of revolutionary struggle against imperialism. It is extremely surprising why at present Chinese propaganda reduces the entire struggle against imperialism solely to a struggle with the U.S., by-passing its allies — the Japanese, West German and French imperialists. Are they, perhaps, looking for partners among the monopolistic groups of these countries for the struggle against what they term "modern revisionism"?

Great suspicion is evoked by the Chinese leaders' so-called theory of an "intermediate zone", which regards West Germany, Britain, France and Japan as countries held in thralldom by U.S. imperialism, thereby embellishing the imperialists of Britain, France, Japan and, in particular, West Germany, glossing over their aggressive nature and the threat they constitute for the socialist countries, the national liberation movement and world peace. The 1960 Statement lays stress on the special threat to the cause of peace from West-German imperialism and sets the Communist parties the task of intensifying the struggle against its aggressive aspirations. From their own experience the Soviet people know how dangerous this imperialist vulture is. West-German imperialism is no longer a mere satellite of U.S. imperialism. Relying on a huge economic potential, which considerably exceeds the potential possessed by the whole of nazi Germany, West-German imperialism has created a large war machine and is increasingly setting the tone in NATO.

British, French and Japanese imperialism are likewise exceedingly dangerous. This is seen from, say, the example of recent events in Cyprus, in East Africa, Gabon and South-east Asia, where the British and French imperialists are resorting to armed force to suppress the national liberation movement.

The CPSU holds that side by side with a determined struggle against U.S. imperialism, the major international exploiter and policeman, all anti-imperialist forces must also carry on a struggle against the aggressive, reactionary forces of British, French, West-German and Japanese imperialism. The Chinese theory of an "intermediate zone", on the other hand, objectively whitewashes the imperialists of Britain, France, West Germany and Japan, and is hence to their advantage.

It must be said that the ruling circles of the imperialist powers have "divined" the secret of Chinese policy. They have understood that the "revolutionary phrase-mongering" of the Chinese leaders is not at all directed against imperialism. In effect, the purpose of this phrase-mongering is to screen a savage struggle against the CPSU and the world Communist movement and in no way threatens the imperialists. That accounts for the change that has come about in the policy of the leading capitalist states with regard to China.

We shall not hide the fact that following all these manoeuvres of the Chinese leaders, we, like all other Marxist-Leninists in the world, are justifiably alarmed at the dangerous path onto which the Chinese leaders are dragging their great country. There is the danger that in pursuing their erroneous, anti-Leninist line, the Chinese leaders will virtually land themselves in the same boat with reactionary, bellicose elements of imperialism, as has already happened in connection with the CPR government's refusal to sign the Moscow partial test-ban treaty.

The nationalist policy of the CPC leaders has nothing in common with the actual national interests of the fraternal Chinese nation. Most of all, it is the people of the socialist countries that can be sincere allies of the people of China. The people of China have a vested interest in the consolidation of the world socialist system, in an enduring alliance with all the anti-imperialist forces. In that lies the earnest of the rapid advance of People's China along the socialist road.

It is impossible to comprehend the present attitude of the CC,

CPC both in the country and internationally unless it is viewed in the context of the situation within the Communist Party of China and in the country itself that has arisen due to the personality cult. It must not be overlooked that the Mao Tse-tung personality cult is having an increasingly negative effect on the activities of the Chinese Communist Party.

For many years Chinese propaganda has been drumming it into everybody's head that Mao Tse-tung's ideas are the "supreme embodiment of Marxism-Leninism" and that our epoch is the "epoch of Mao Tse-tung". By asserting that the brunt of generalizing the historical tasks of our time has fallen completely upon the shoulders of Mao Tse-tung alone, Chinese propaganda claims that Mao Tse-tung's ideas are the Marxism-Leninism of our epoch, "the scientific theory of socialist revolution and the building of socialism and communism."

It is now perfectly clear that the CPC leadership is striving to spread the Mao Tse-tung personality cult to the whole world Communist movement, so that the leader of the CPC should, like Stalin in his day, sit aloft, God-like, above all the Marxist-Leninist parties and settle arbitrarily all matters of their policy and work. The ideology and practice of the personality cult largely explain the appearance of hegemonic ambitions among the Chinese leaders.

But history does not repeat itself. What was once a tragedy will be no more than a farce if it occurs a second time. The CPC leaders ought to know that the Communist movement will never allow the personality cult, which is alien to Marxism-Leninism, to recur, for it has paid too dearly for it in the past. The Communist movement and the personality cult are incompatible.

The 20th Congress of the CPSU has put an end to this alien phenomenon in our Party once and for all, and has created conditions in which the things that occurred in the personality cult period can never be repeated.

The Party has completely restored the Leninist principles in Party and state affairs. It has restored and developed the principles of socialist democracy. The course charted by the 20th Congress of the CPSU was fully supported in the Declaration and Statement of the Moscow Meetings. It is clear, therefore, that denouncing the struggle against the personality cult ideology is tantamount to departing from the agreed line of the Communist movement, that it is tantamount to impelling the Communist movement deliberately towards an incorrect path, a path foreign to Marxism-Leninism and the nature of the socialist system.

Yet that is exactly what the Chinese leaders are doing. They have undertaken the defense of the Stalin personality cult and have declared that fighting against it means "overthrowing Marxism-Leninism" and "stigmatizing the dictatorship of the proletariat".

However, it is the personality cult that leads to perversions of important aspects in the dictatorship of the proletariat, which is the highest form of democracy, a democracy for the working people. In Lenin's time the democratic principles of party and state life and socialist legality were always strictly observed. He fought against anti-party groups and trends with Party methods, drawing on the support of the Party rank and file. A different method predominated during the Stalin personality cult period — the method of physical elimination of all Party workers whom Stalin suspected of disagreeing with his views. What is more, the abuses and repressions against tested and faithful Party and government workers were particularly intensified at a time when the struggle against the opposition was over and socialism had won. Stalin turned the "avenging sword" of the dictatorship of the proletariat, intended to strike at the enemies, against the cadres of the Communist Party and the socialist state.

But it is evidently this very aspect of Stalin's activities that the Chinese leaders like most — since they identify this incorrect method of leadership with the dictatorship of the proletariat. In spite of the now widely known facts testifying to Stalin's abuse of power during the personality cult period, in spite of Stalin's departure from Lenin's precepts on certain important issues, the Chinese leaders place Stalin on a pedestal, depicting him as the "great continuer" of Lenin's cause. The Chinese leaders speak and write about the wholesale repressions during the personality cult period as though they were no more than slight "excesses".

This policy of the Chinese leaders augurs no good to the people. It smacks of the ideology and ethics not of Marxists, not Leninists, but of people who bank on methods of violence and suppression. The Chinese leaders ought to ask the Soviet Communists, the workers, peasants and the intelligentsia who experienced the evil consequences of the personality cult what they think of the attempts to vindicate the perversions and mistakes made by Stalin and of restoring the personality cult. They would get only one answer: never again!

Our Party has routed the Molotov, Kaganovich and Malenkov anti-Party group. This group resisted the abolition of the personality cult, not the least consideration being that many of its members were also responsible for the wholesale persecution of guiltless people at a time when they themselves stood at the country's helm together with Stalin.

The crimes perpetrated by Stalin and the subsequently exposed members of the anti-Party group against prominent leaders of the Communist Party and the Soviet state, have now come to light. But that is not all. It has been learned that Molotov, together with Stalin, sanctioned the execution also of the wives of these leaders entered in the so-called "List No. 4 of the Wives of the Enemies of the People", containing the names of V. A. Dybenko-Sedyakina, E. C. Kosyor, A. I. Chubar, E. E. Eikhe-Rubtsova, and others. In many cases, Molotov tried, as the saying goes, to be "more Catholic than the Pope". In one of the documents, endorsing long prison terms for a large group of wives of arrested functionaries, Molotov wrote "supreme penalty" against one of the names in the list.

Do the Chinese leaders, perhaps, wish to restore these inhuman practices? Is that why they show such sympathy for people who have been expelled from our Party?

In the matter of the personality cult the Chinese leaders have departed not only from the conclusions and propositions of the world Communist movement, but also from their own previous declarations.

It may be recalled that in 1956 and 1957 Mao Tse-tung and Liu Shao-chi in their speeches, and articles about the historical experience of the dictatorship of the proletariat approved by the Political Bureau of the CC CPC, highly commended the efforts of the CPSU to eliminate the consequences of the personality cult. At the Meeting of Communist and Workers' Parties in 1957, Mao Tse-tung said: "In the past four or five years since Stalin's death the situation has improved considerably in the Soviet Union in the sphere of both domestic policy and foreign policy. This shows that the line represented by Comrade Khrushchov is more correct and that the opposition to this line is incorrect." At that time the Chinese leaders rightly said that none but "the reactionaries of the whole world" could oppose the line of the 20th Congress of the CPSU.

Yet now the Chinese leaders are defending the personality cult in pursuance of their own political designs. They are defending Stalin's distortions and mistakes largely because they are themselves implanting the Mao Tse-tung personality cult.

The present political line of the CPC leaders again shows the world Communist movement and the politically conscious workers of the whole world how pernicious are the practices of the personality cult, and what harm they inflict on the interests of the peoples, to the great struggle against imperialism, for socialism. Affirmation of the personality cult ideology in the Communist movement would lead it into a cul-de-sac and do grave harm to the socialist and communist cause.

Therefore, an examination of the sourcees of the present anti-Leninist disruptive policy of the CPC leadership leads to the conclusion that the world Communist movement faces the real danger of a petty-bourgeois nationalist deviation disguised by "Left" phraseology. The danger of this deviation is all the greater since we are dealing with leaders of a party in power which has at its disposal a large state machine and the means of ideological indoctrination.

It is clear that the CPSU, like all the other Marxist-Leninist parties, cannot but take measures in order to attenuate as much as possible the harm that this petty-bourgeois deviation may inflict on the world Communist movement.

VIII

FOR UNITY OF THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT ON THE BASIS OF MARXIST-LENINIST PRINCIPLES

Comrades, our Party has every right to say that we have done and are still doing everything in our power to overcome the differences and to restore co-operation between the CPC and the CPSU, to strengthen the friendship between the CPR and the Soviet Union and to cement the unity of the world Communist movement. In spite of the inadmissible methods of debate used by the leaders of the CPC, in spite of their open struggle against the CPSU and other fraternal parties, our Party has shown the maximum of restraint, the maximum sense of responsibility, and the maximum concern for the cohesion of Communist ranks.

In the last few years, acting on the initiative of Comrade Khrushchov, the CC CPSU and the Soviet government undertook many practical measures aimed at uniting our Parties and at preserving and expanding co-operation with the CPR in the political, economic, scientific, technical and cultural spheres. If these measures have failed to yield results, the blame rests entirely with the Chinese leaders.

When the Chinese leaders began their unveiled attacks on our Party, the CC, CPSU, addressed several letters to the CC, CPC, pointing out that the fundamental interests of the socialist and communist cause require that our Parties should, as before, in spite of the existing differences, pursue an agreed policy in all matters of principle. We suggested stopping the needless controversy over questions on which our opinions differ, and to cease making any public statements, which only tend to deepen the differences. The letters put forward concrete proposals envisaging co-ordinated actions in world affairs, greater exchange of foreign policy information and agreed action in the international democratic organizations, etc.

In October 1962, Comrade Khrushchov asked the Chinese Ambassador to the USSR, who was returning home, to tell the Chinese leaders that we proposed to "abandon all arguments and differences, to stop discussing who is right and who is wrong, not to rake up the past, and to begin our relations over again with a clean slate".

Although the Chinese press had by then published a whole series of articles containing gross attacks on the CPSU and other fraternal patries, Comrade Khrushchov declared in a conversation wtih the new Chinese Ambassador in January 1963 that "we want to return to our previous fraternal relations and are ready to do everything for this purpose."

But the leaders of the CPC invariably responded to these acts of good-will on the part of the Central Committee of our Party by deliberately doing everything possible to aggravate the differences, and mounted fresh attacks on the CPSU, the Soviet government and the general line of the world Communist movement.

In the struggle against the CPSU and its Leninist policy, the Chinese leaders are concentrating their fire mainly against Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchov who stands in the van of the remarkable developments that have taken place in our Party and country since the 20th Congress and which ensure the successful advance of the Soviet people to communism. That is why they would like to isolate Comrade Khrushchov from the Central Committee, for their subversive ends, and to oppose our Central Committee to the Party and the Soviet people.

But this foul plan is adventuristic and hopeless, and is doomed to complete and ignominious failure.

The Chinese leaders, and not they alone, should know once and for all that our Central Committee, headed by the loyal Leninist Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchov has never been so united and monolithic as now.

Comrade Khrushchov with his inexhaustible energy, his truly Bolshevik zeal and devotion to principle, is the recognized leader of our Party and our people. He expresses the most cherished thoughts and aspirations of the Soviet people. The Leninist line pursued by our Party cannot be separated from the Central Committee, from Nikita Sergeyevich Khrushchov. This line has elevated our country's world prestige to unprecedented heights, it has elevated its prestige in the eyes of the working people of the whole world. This Leninist line is supported wholeheartedly by all the Communists and all the people of our land.

Our Party has never feared ideological struggle. But it believes that ideological differences should be settled on the basis of Leninist principles and that the polemics should be subordinated to the interests oft he working-class movement.

The CC, CPSU, clearly foresaw the danger that the Chinese leaders would seek to use open polemics not as a means of ironing out disputed questions but as an excuse for piling up absurd, slanderous charges, an instrument of ideological and political struggle against the Communist movement.

Together with the other Marxist-Leninist parties, our Party has exerted considerable effort to terminate the open polemics forced upon us by the CPC leaders. The CC, CPSU, has repeatedly taken the initiative to that effect — notably in January 1963, in the speech of Comrade Khrushchov, First Secretary of the CC, CPSU, at the Sixth Congress of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany. This initiative was backed by the overwhelming majority of Marxist-Leninist parties. But the Chinese leadership refused to discuss this proposal and saw fit to extend the range of questions in dispute, to aggravate and provoke the polemics.

Last spring an agreement was reached on a bilateral meeting of CPSU and CPC representatives. We hoped that at this meeting the Chinese comrades would be ready to concentrate efforts not on what divides us, but on what unites the CPC with the CPSU and with other fraternal parties. The CPSU delegation suggested that all questions in dispute be thoroughly thrashed out in order to clear the path for a normalization of relations, to cement the unity of our Parties and of the world Communist movement as a whole. We submitted a concrete program for the development of relations between the USSR and the PRC.

But the CPC delegation took advantage of the meeting to exacerbate the differences and to level violent and groundless attacks on the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties. After reading prepared statements, which completely ignored our arguments and proposals, the Chinese delegates called for an adjournment of the bilateral talks.

All the measures taken by the CC CPSU were prompted by a sincere desire to strengthen the unity of the Marxist-Leninist parties and the cohesion of the socialist countries. Our task was to utilize every available opportunity to remove the differences and prevent a split, and not be carried away by the heat of the struggle.

The Chinese leadership, however, apparently understood these measures of ours differently. It became all too clear that they took our restraint, our striving towards unity, for a sign of weakness. Lately they have begun saying that they will not agree to any improvement of relations with the CPSU, except on the basis of our "unconditional surrender". What do the Chinese leaders want?

In substance, they want the Communist movement to retreat from its positions on all the basic problems of our times.

The world Communist movement considers it vitally necessary to utilize the present situation, all the revolutionary forces of our time, ever more closely and to develop the world revolutionary process further.

In contrast to this the Chinese leaders have set their sights on dividing the main revolutionary forces of our time — the world socialist system, the international working class, and the national liberation movement. This can only act as a brake on the development of the world revolutionary process.

Marxist-Leninists believe that it is the cardinal task of the Communist parties to marshal all the peace-loving forces for the defense of peace and the deliverance of mankind from a nuclear disaster. They consider peaceful coexistence to be the general principle of relations between the socialist and the capitalist countries.

The Chinese leaders scorn this task. What they are doing, in effect, is whipping up the nuclear arms race and calling for new powers to join it. They are pursuing a line that is liable to cause an atomic war and consider the struggle for peace a secondary task, opposing it to the struggle for socialism.

The Marxist-Leninists consider it their duty to strengthen in every possible way the Marxism-Leninism and to concentrate the special attention of the socialist countries on economic development in order that socialism win out in peaceful economic competition with capitalism.

The actions of the Chinese leaders are subverting and undermining the unity of the socialist camp. They are isolating China more and more from the other socialist countries. The CC CPC underrates economic development and ignores the tasks confronting the socialist countries in their economic competition with the capitalist countries. This policy tends to weaken the might of the socialist countries and impedes their struggle against imperialism.

Marxist-Leninists, the working class of the capitalist countries see it as their task to step up the struggle against monopoly capital, in defense of the vital interests of the masses, to make maximum use of the now available opportunities to effect a peaceful socialist revolution not involving civil war, and at the same time to be ready to take the non-peaceful way, to suppress the resistance of the bourgeoisie by armed force.

In contrast, the CPC leaders vilify in every way the struggle of the working class and its communist vanguard for the vital interests of the working class, for peace and democracy, and reject the tactics of broad anti-monopoly alliances, the possibility of effecting social revolution peacefully. They call for reckless armed actions irrespective of the existing situation.

Marxist-Leninists and the peoples fighting for national liberation consider it their duty to complete the anti-imperialist, democratic revolution, to create and consolidate the national front, and to work for the establishment of states of national democracy, for the non-capitalist way of development.

The Chinese leaders ignore the essence of the present stage of the national liberation revolution. They are blind to the differences in the situation prevailing in the various countries and offer the peoples of all countries one and the same prescription — armed struggle and establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat. Such prescriptions may, if put into practice, undermine the national front and strengthen the positions of the colonialists and neo-colonialists.

Marxist-Leninists are eager to strengthen the unity and cohesion both of each indivdual Communist party and the entire army of Communists in the world on the basis of the principles laid down in the Declaration and the Statement.

The Chinese leaders are disrupting the unity of the Communist movement and of the democratic organizations; they are setting up factions and are striving to split our movement and its national contingents.

In brief, the CPC leaders are opposing the Communist movement in all the basic questions of strategy and tactics. Theirs is a course in which petty-bourgeois revolutionism and nationalistic, great-power aspirations merge.

In a malicious anti-Soviet article, slanderous from beginning to end, which appeared on February 4 in the CC, CPC publications, the Chinese leaders declare for everybody to hear that they will step up their subversive activities against the world Communist movement. With nationalistic arrogance they boast that they will continue their attacks on the CPSU in order to disorganize the work of the Party founded by the great Lenin.

To the Soviet Communists, the sons and daughters of the October Revolution, the pioneers of the new, communist world, who have withstood so many gruelling ordeals, such threats are ridiculous.

The Soviet Communists will not keep silent while the Chinese leaders prosecute an unbridled offensive against our great cause of communist construction, against the Leninist course of our Party and the positions of the world Communist movement. We shall have to explain the substance of the anti-Marxist, neo-Trotskyite position of the Chinese leaders publicly.

The urgent task at present is to protect Marxism-Leninism from the distortions to which it is being subjected by the Chinese leaders. The interests of preserving the purity of the Marxist-Leninist teaching, the interests of the world Communist movement and, in the final analysis, the interests of the Chinese people itself, require that we come out openly and strongly against the incorrect views and dangerous actions of the CPC leadership.

We stand for strengthening friendship with the Chinese people and are ready to develop co-operation with the CPR in all fields. The Soviet Communists have a sincere regard for the great people of China and a deep respect for the revolutionary traditions of the Communist Party of China. We are sure that nobody will ever succeed in undermining the foundations of the friendship of the great Soviet and Chinese peoples and that the present attitude of the CPC leadership does not reflect the true national interests of the Chinese people. We shall do everything in our power to bring relations between the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China back to a path that conforms with the fundamental interests of the working class and all the working people of our countries.

We are fully aware of the danger of the present attitude of the Chinese leaders. The facts show that a grim and evidently long struggle lies ahead for the strengthening of the unity of all the socialist forces for friendship and co-operation between the Soviet and Chinese peoples. It is now perfectly clear that the CPC leaders intend to persist in their incorrect stand, that they intend to carry on with their factional activities in the world Communist movement. Together with the other fraternal parties, our Party will resolutely defend Marxism-Leninism; it will firmly defend the unity and cohesion of all the forces working for peace, democracy, national independence and socialism.

Our Party favors convening another meeting of fraternal parties to discuss the basic problems of our time and to hold the broadest possible exchange of opinions in the interest of overcoming the difficulties that have arisen in the Communist movement. These difficulties have been caused by the CPC leadership's differences with the world Communist movement. The joint efforts of all the fraternal parties are therefore perfectly justified in order to determine what must be done to preserve and strengthen the Marxist-Leninist unity of Communist ranks. It is perfectly clear to the CPSU that the meeting should serve this very purpose.

The CC, CPSU, is certain that no matter how great the difficulties experienced by the world Communist movement, that this movement will be strong enough to surmount them and to cement its ranks in the struggle for the great Communist cause.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union will continue to pursue the policy of promoting unity with all the fraternal parties on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism and on the basis of the Program documents of the world Communist movement — the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement.

The road followed by our Party, by the world Communist movement is the Leninist road and, therefore, the only true road. We have adopted a new Program, in which we have charted our development twenty years ahead. Our Party and the whole Soviet people regard fulfilment of this Program and a determined and purposeful advance to the heights of communism, as their supreme internationalist duty to the international working class and Communist movement. As always, our Party will perform its internationalist duty honourably!

Under the invincible banner of the great Lenin, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union will continue consistently and undeviatingly to pursue a line aimed at carrying out the CPSU Program for the building in our country of the most just social system—communism.

STRUGGLE OF THE CPSU FOR THE UNITY OF THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

DECISION OF PLENARY MEETING OF THE CC, CPSU, ADOPTED ON FEBRUARY 15, 1964.

Having heard and discussed the report of Comrade M. A. Suslov, member of the Presidium, and Secretary of the Central Committee of the CPSU, "On the Struggle of the CPSU for the Unity of the World Communist Movement", the Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, expresses its profound concern over the splitting activities of the leadership of the Communist Party of China which are causing great damage to the socialist community of nations, the whole of the world Communist and working-class movement.

Aware of the historical importance of the unity and solidarity of the Communist movement, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union has lately taken new steps towards overcoming or, to begin with, at least diminishing the differences between the leadership of the CPC and the CPSU and other fraternal Parties, towards strengthening economic and political co-operation between the USSR and the CPR. Moves to prevent the deepening of these differences have also been made by other Marxist-Leninist Parties.

The Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU notes with regret that the leadership of the CPC has not responded to this initiative, has not answered the letter of the CPSU nor stopped the open polemics, on the contrary, it has intensified the campaign against the general line of the Communist movement defined by the Meetings of 1957 and 1960.

Under the cover of verbal assurances of fidelity to Marxism-Leninism, under the banner of struggle against the imaginary revisionism of the Marxist-Leninist Parties the leaders of the CPC have assailed the basic theoretical and political principles by which the Communist movement is guided at the present stage.

The new appraisals and conclusions arrived at through collective efforts of the fraternal Parties on the basis of the creative application of Marxist-Leninist principles to the present day conditions—on the role of the world socialist system, on the ways of building socialism and communism, on the possibility of averting a world war, on peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems, on the necessity of combating the ideology and practice of the personality cult, on the forms of transition to socialism in the developed capitalist states and in the countries liberated from colonialism are all being distorted by the Chinese leaders.

Having departed on all basic questions of strategy and tactics from the Leninist line of the world Communist movement, the Chinese leaders have put forward a course of their own which is compounded of petty-bourgeois adventurism and great-power chauvinism. On a number of questions they, in effect, descend to Trotskyite positions, adopt Trotskyite methods of struggle against the Marxist-Leninist Parties, and set up factional groups of their supporters in various countries. The leadership of the CPC is seeking to impose its dissenting ideological platform on the whole of the socialist camp and the world Communist movement, and on the international organizations.

The Chinese leaders have adopted a course aimed at worsening Soviet-Chinese inter-state relations, undermining friendship between the Soviet and Chinese peoples. Having rejected all the proposals of the CC, CPSU on the normalization of the Soviet-Chinese relations, they have intensified anti-Soviet propaganda inside the CPR and are grossly interfering in the internal affairs of the Soviet Union.

The Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, holds that the vital interests of the socialist world system, of the Communist movement and the defense of the purity of Marxism- Leninism call for the ideological exposure of the anti-Leninist position of the CPC leadership and for a resolute rebuff to their splitting activities.

Fully and unanimously approving the political and practical activities of the Presidium of the CC, CPSU and of Comrade N. S. Khrushchov, First Secretary of the CC, CPSU, aimed at builidng Communist society in the USSR, ensuring the triumph of the cause of peace, democracy, national independence and socialism, and strengthening the solidarity of the Marxist-Leninist parties, the Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU instructs the CC Presidium to continue firmly to uphold the general line of the world Communist movement, to work to strengthen the unity of all the revolutionary forces of today.

Our Party is following, and will continue to follow, the tested Leninist road and nobody will ever succeed in diverting the CPSU, from this course—the course of the 20th and 22nd Congresses.

In spite of the fact that the Chinese leaders have gone far in their splitting activities, the Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, placing the interests of the unity of the world Communist movement, above all else, expresses its readiness to exert further efforts towards the normalization of relations between the CPSU and the CPC. If the CPC leaders have not lost all sense of their international responsibility, they must realize, at last, that by their actions they are diverting the forces and attention of the Communist and Workers' parties from the solution of the urgent tasks of socialist construction, impeding the struggle against imperialism, damaging the entire anti-imperialist front.

The Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU is firmly confident that the world Communist movement will overcome the existing difficulties, rally still closer around the banner of Marx, Engels and Lenin and achieve new successes in the struggle for the great cause of the working class, for the cause of peace and the peoples' security, for the victory of communism.

THE SITUATION IN THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

Raymond Guyot

Excerpts from a report on the situation in the international Communist and working-class movement made by RAYMOND GUYOT, member of the Political Bureau of the French Communist Party, at a meeting of the Central Committee held on March 25-26 and published in L'HUMANITE.

Since the Central Committee meeting of October 6, Guyot said, a number of developments have taken place which make it necessary to inform the Central Committe of the situation which has arisen in the international Communist and working-class movement.

In the past few years the peoples have registered important successes in their struggle for peace and disarmament, for national independence and socialism. But it is also in this period that the leaders of the Communist Party of China—in opposition to the majority of the Communist parties and trampling underfoot jointly agreed decisions—have made an attempt to divert the international Communist movement on to the path of sectarianism and adventurism. They show complete lack of faith in the ability of the working class and the peoples to avert war and achieve disarmament in our epoch. Their attitude has already done grave harm to the cause of communism; it impedes the struggle for peace today when there exist great possibilities to deliver new blows at the aggressive forces of imperialism, when whole continents, as well as countries like Cuba and Algeria are actively fighting together with all the peace-loving forces of the world for peace and peaceful coexistence.

It is precisely in this period that the leaders of the Communist Party of China have been intensifying their campaign against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Soviet government, against the Communist parties which adhere to the positions of the 1957 and 1960 meetings. Their attacks against our Party and its leadership have become more numerous and more vicious.

They engage in large-scale splitting activity, the more recent manifestation of which was the behaviour of the Chinese delegate who tried to break up the united anti-imperialist and anti-colonial front at the meeting of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Council in Algiers.

The article which appeared in the Chinese press on February 4, openly calling for a split, revealed the true intentions of the Chinese leaders: to create a factionalist bloc under their hegemony with a program of its own; to lay increasing claim to being the sole heirs of the founders of Marxism-Leninism, the supreme judges in the sphere of the theory and practice of communism; to dictate to all the parties—in the capitalist as well as in the socialist and newly-emergent countries—what they must not do, while they, the Chinese leaders, would decide who are the leading Marxists and who, modern revisionists.

They have their own interpretation of history and philosophy: the centre of the revolution (meaning China) is shifting, and this is normal; everything is destined to split in two, for such is the law of nature, and this also holds true for the international Communist movement, etc.

In many countries factional groups are being formed inside the parties or parallel with the parties, with the participation of renegades and Trotskyites. Such, in particular, is the case in Switzerland, Australia and some of the Latin American countries; for example, such pseudo-parties have been formed recently in Belgium, and attempts have been made to replace Central Committees (Ceylon, Peru) with splinter groups.

Particularly unseemly practices are being used against the parties which are fighting fascist dictatorships. At the Central Committee meeting last October Waldeck Rochet branded the practice of Chinese documents being widely circulated in Spain while the Communists and anti-fascists of that country were subjected to persecution. We have recently received the following letter from our Spanish comrades:

". . . The Franco political police have already utilized the differences in the international Communist movement to publish a fake issue of Mundo Obrero (organ of the Communist Party of Spain—Ed.) in an attempt to give the impression that our Party has been split.

"Our activists have established that this issue, a copy of which we are sending you, was distributed by police agents, and have vigorously rebuffed this fabrication. But this very fact demonstrates how dangerous for the whole Communist movement, and particularly for the parties working in illegal conditions, is the turn which the Communist Party of China has given to the polemics, and the splitting activity which it supports in the various countries."

Guyot also pointed to the use of government radio by the Chinese leaders for propaganda against the Soviet Union. Peking Radio systematically broadcasts materials violently attacking the Soviet Union, its Communist Party and its government. The calumny published in Jenminjihpao and Hungchi on February 4 was transmitted in Russian 125 times for 80 hours during the first two weeks.

In our Party, Guyot went on, the position adopted by the Chinese leaders has evoked indignation and unanimous condemnation. The few attempts to foster anti-Party groups made with the support of renegades and Trotskyites have failed. It is, nevertheless, necessary to draw the attention of the Central Committee to certain aspects of the situation which has arisen in the French-Chinese Friendship Association, whose aim is to promote friendly relations between the two peoples. Certain elements, notably in the Marseilles Committee of the Association, instead of working to foster the broadest unity in the interests of true friendship with the Chinese People's Republic, are doing their utmost to distribute Chinese materials directed against the international Communist movement and the French Communist Party, i.e., engaging in activity which has nothing in common with the noble aims of this Association. These attempts will be thwarted by the vigilance of all Frenchmen who stand at once for both French-Chinese friendship and for peaceful coexistence, disarmament and peace.

It is also necessary to step up the ideological and political struggle against the attitude of the Chinese leaders vis-a-vis the de Gaulle government. De Gaulle, they assert, is the standard-bearer of national struggle against U.S. imperialism.

This anti-Marxist position of the Chinese leaders in regard to the Gaullist power has become even more strongly pronounced in connection with the recognition of People's China and the establishment of diplomatic relations with France (we have always fought for this recognition, just as we are now carrying on the fight for the admission of the Chinese People's Republic to the UNO.").

In Peking they pretend to be unaware of the true aims of de Gaulle's foreign policy (the search for new markets for the capitalist monopolies, possession of atomic armament, a bigger say in NATO and alliance with German militarism, the attempts of French imperialism to regain some of its positions in Asia and Latin America, etc.). The recent statements made by Pompidou in the American Club and the interview given by Couve de Murville to the U.S. News and World Report throw light on the character of de Gaulle's policy. On its part, La Nation declares unashamedly that "France, which has long been active in Oceania, is preparing new installations there" (meaning nuclear bases, of course), and it asks: "Perhaps from this standpoint, too, it is believed desirable to maintain official relations with the principal power in this part of the globe?"

What Mao Tse-tung said about the atom bomb during a meeting with the Gaullist MP's visiting China echo de Gaulle's own claims: "I know, you are ahead of us, but we shall have our own bomb. This is the way to be strong."

It should be noted that not a single word appeared in the Chinese press denouncing the Gaullist repressions in Gabon, the persecution of the youth on Martinique or of Comrade Paul Verges on Reunion. Not a single voice of protest was raised against the establishment of a nuclear experimental centre in Polynesia at the time when protests are resounding in France, Australia, New Zealand, Chile and Peru.

In the meantime a "new theory" is being elaborated in Peking, the theory of the so-called "second intermediate zone" which should embrace Britain, West Germany, de Gaulle's France and Japan. "Ceasing to be agents of the United States" these countries, along with China, will constitute a kind of "third world". For France and the other above-mentioned countries this anti-Leninist and grossly opportunist policy would mean the liquidation of the working-class struggle against imperialism and neo-colonialism.

Our Party is fighting against U.S. imperialism and its aggressive policy, against our own imperialism which is no different from that of the United States, and, as Comrade Maurice Thorez has stressed, we oppose everything in de Gaulle's policy which runs counter to the national interests, the independence of the peoples and the cause of peace.

The situation in the international Communist movement confirms the soundness of the attitude taken by our Party on a whole range of problems.

Limiting ourselves to the more recent decisions of our Party, we would like to stress the significance of the October meeting of the Central Committee, the documents of which were published (in the form of a pamphlet subsequently translated into German, Spanish and English and sent to the fraternal parties); Leon Feix's reply in l'Humanité to a Chinese article which slandered our Party and its leadership; the more lengthy reply given editorially in the February issue of Cahiers du Communisme, which also appeared in pamphlet form. Lastly, we would like to recall the chapter on these questions in the draft resolution for the 17th Congress, which is now being widely discussed in the Party.

One cannot remain "neutral" in this struggle which is of exceptional significance for the unity of the Communist movement. For this is not a matter of differences between the CPSU and the CPC but of differences between the latter and the vast majority of the Communist and Workers' parties of the whole world. To avoid qualifying and denouncing the policy and the disruptive activity of the Chinese leaders, as is sometimes the case, means to refuse to ensure the future of our struggle for socialism and communism.

The grave threat which menaces the international Communist and working-class movements, and which cannot but alarm us, is a result of the attempts made by the CPC leaders to impose their views on the world movement, a result of the campaign they are waging against the CPSU and other parties, a result of their subversive activity. These are the causes of the situation that has arisen in the international Communist and working-class movement. The CPC leaders are wholly to blame for this situation which, in fact, plays into the hands of the imperialists.

At the October meeting of the Central Committee we came out for the convocation of a meeting of all the Communist and Workers' parties at the earliest possible date. Today we feel that this need has become even more urgent.

We reaffirm at this meeting of the Central Committee the unequivocal positions of our Party clearly set forth in many documents and notably the more recent ones (resolution of the CC meeting in October, draft resolution for the 17th Congress).

The Central Committee maintains that the line elaborated by the Chinese leaders in opposition to the general line of the international Communist movement, their splitting activities in the various countries, the material and moral support they render to the splinter groups in the various parties, their slander of the leaders of the fraternal parties, cause grave harm to the movement as a whole, to the cause of peace and socialism. It holds that reconciliation with the Leftist and nationalist line of the Chinese leaders and their splitting activity would spell danger for the international movement, for the Chinese people themselves, for our Party and its broad policy of unity needed for the struggle against one-man rule.

The Central Committee would welcome the convocation at the earliest date of a meeting of all the Communist and Workers' parties which would reaffirm, in the light of the changes that have occurred, the general line of the international Communist movement and adopt all the decisions which would be necessary to safeguard its unity. It is our earnest desire that the differences which oppose the CPC to the other Communist parties will be overcome and that the Communist Party of China will again make its contribution to the unity of the international Communist movement, to our common struggle for peace and national independence, for democracy and socialism.

In the course of preparations for the 17th Congress and during the discussion we must pay close attention to the ideological struggle on the fundamental points of the 1957 and 1960 meeting and our own earlier congresses. And we must be prepared to make another contribution to the ideological struggle in its various aspects on all the problems affecting the international Communist movement.

At the same time it is necessary to wage a struggle on two fronts in our own ranks, primarily against the main danger—dogmatism and sectarianism. Any conciliation with splitting activity is inadmissible.

Our struggle to put an end to one-man rule and bring nearer the hour of the democratic alternative, for the unity of the working class and the alliance of all democrats in the fight for social progress, freedom, national independence, peace, disarmament and socialism, Guyot concluded, cannot be separated from our efforts to achieve the unity of the international Communist and working-class movement.

AGAINST THE SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES OF THE CHINESE SPLITTERS

RESOLUTION OF THE CENTRAL COMITTEE OF THE HUNGARIAN SOCIALIST WORKERS' PARTY.

The open attacks by the Chinese leaders against many aspects of the joint policy of the international Communist movement are known to the members of the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party and the Hungarian people. Thus, the Chinese leaders oppose the policy of peaceful coexistence, set at nought economic competition between the two social systems, deny the possibility of socialist revolution triumphing peacefully, without civil war. The Chinese leaders take the stand that there is no need to rectify the gross mistakes committed at the time of the cult of the individual, which caused incalculable harm to the international working-class movement. As we know the parties which uphold the purity of Marxist-Leninist principles, including the HSWP, most patiently discussed with the Chinese leaders their incorrect views. In this discussion the parties, adhering to a joint line, did not adopt the virulent tone of Chinese propaganda, its methods of abuse, but pointed out the incorrect views and their harmful political consequences, rejecting fabrications.

After the overwhelming majority of fraternal parties came out against their wrong views, the Chinese leaders took the path of splitting activities. They have organized factional groups made up of Trotskyites and renegades who are prepared to go to all lengths, and they have the effrontery to call some of these groups Communist parties. They are doing this at a time when the forces of socialism and peace are multiplying throughout the world, when the national independence of the peoples of former colonies is growing stronger, when the internal contradictions in the capitalist world are intensifying, when imperialism is at a stage of profound crisis and the process of its disintegration is accelerating. The combined might, united action by the socialist world could accelerate this process still more, could render still greater assistance to the peoples battling against colonialism and neo-colonialism; the fight in defense of world peace would become still more effective were it not for the fact that the splitting activities of the Chinese leaders are dividing the international Communist movement, are hampering its common struggle.

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of China formulated the essence of its policy in a 25-point document published in June 1963, which was printed also by the Hungarian press. This document and the entire activity of the Chinese leaders show that their tactics are aimed at splitting the international Communist movement, that the CPC leaders want hegemony, want to impose their views on the international Communist movement. Actuated by this desire they oppose the Statements of the Communists and Workers' parties of 1957 and 1960.

In the autumn of 1963 the Central Committee of the HSWP supporting the initiative of the fraternal parties, including the CPSU, ceased to publish materials concerning the differences in the international Communist movement. The purpose of this step was to create favourable conditions for a new international meeting of the fraternal parties to discuss the differences. The Chinese leaders, however, replied by continuing their open attacks, by become even more abusive and absolutely ignoring the position of the overwhelming majority of the fraternal parties which insisted on ceasing the public debate.

In the February 4 issue of Jenminjihpao, the official organ of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China, the Chinese leaders published a long article in which they openly declared that they support and will help to organize factions against the Central Committees of the fraternal parties which oppose the views of the Chinese leaders, condemn their desire for hegemony and which are in solidarity with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. They call this undermining of unity "an internationalist obligation". They ignore the propositions of the Moscow Statement of 1960 regulating the relations between the fraternal parties, and by impermissible methods interfere in their internal affairs. They attack the Central Committee of the CPSU and Comrade Khrushchov personally with blind rancour, calling him "anti-Soviet", "the greatest of all revisionists", the "greatest splitter of our time". With the help of an extensive propaganda network they create big difficulties for the Communist parties, and first of all, for the fraternal parties battling in the capitalist countries.

It is characteristic of the Chinese leaders that instead of engaging in a theoretical discussion of fundamental ideological issues they are waging a political struggle against the CPSU and the other fraternal parties. The fabrications, distortions and abuse contained in the Jenminjihpao article of February 4 divert attention from the fundamental differences. This clearly is the purpose of the assertions that "the leaders of the CPSU are bent on seeking Soviet-U.S. cooperation for the domination of the world", that "the revisionism and splitting of the leaders of the CPSU are the product both of the lush growth of bourgeois elements inside the Soviet Union and . . . of U.S. imperialist policies. . . ."

This policy of the Chinese leaders which they try to justify with assertions that are absolutely lacking in a sober assessment, is nothing but an adventurist policy which has as its purpose to mislead people; it is a policy which is doomed to failure.

The Central Committee of the HSWP has from the very outset condemned the sectarian, dogmatic views of the Chinese leaders and their splitting activity. The Central Committee emphatically rejects and denounces their new attack of February 4, which is even more vicious than all previous attacks and which is directed against the entire international Communist movement and consequently against the HSWP. By their splitting activities the Chinese leaders are assailing the unity of the socialist countries and the international Communist movement, are making things easier for imperialism in the face of the progress of the socialist world, are hampering the struggle of the Communist parties in individual countries and on the international arena.

Together with the other fraternal parties the Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party firmly adhering to the Moscow Statements of 1957 and 1960, resolutely opposes the undermining activity of the Chinese leaders.

The Central Committee of the HSWP is in full solidarity with the CPSU and its Leninist Central Committee, and personally with Comrade Khrushchov. It is absolutely clear that the attacks of the Chinese leaders are directed first and foremost against the CPSU. The steadfast Marxist-Leninist policy of the CPSU, its great international prestige make impossible the Chinese policy of adventurism. Neither the old nor the new anti-Soviet attacks can alter this fact.

The Central Committee of the HSWP has decided that if the Chinese leaders do not stop their open attack and splitting activities, they will have to be answered in public. We are not deceived by the tactics of the Chinese leaders in accordance with which they attack first one and then another fraternal party and its leaders. We shall oppose all attacks, and uphold the common cause and policy of our Party.

The Chinese leaders are trying to set off some countries of the socialist world system against each other. The Central Committee of the HSWP rejects and condemns these attempts and also interference in the affairs of the member countries of the Council for Mutual Economic Aid.

The class enemies are trying to make the most of the differences caused by the leaders of the CPC in the international Communist movement. With the help of diplomacy and other methods the imperialists are seeking to weaken the unity of the socialist world system. The imperialist press picks up and spreads the anti-Soviet slander circulated by the Chinese leaders in order to provoke differences and a split in the revolutionary working-class movement in the capitalist countries. Upholding the ideas of Marxism-Leninism the Communist parties are steadfastly combating the attempts to cause a split.

The Central Committee of the HSWP and the Hungarian people who have from the very outset unanimously rejected the harmful views of the Chinese leaders now more than ever before strongly condemn the intensified splitting activities of the Chinese leaders and their unbridled anti-Soviet slander.

In our fight against pseudo-Lett views and against the splitting, undermining activities of the Chinese leaders we do not lose sight of the fact that there are still Right reactionary elements in Hungary who will try to exploit the attacks made by the Chinese leaders to whip up dissatisfaction with the policy of our Party and the government.

The Hungarian Socialist Workers' Party forged its ideological political and organizational unity in a difficult period, in hard-fought battle, at the price of big sacrifices in the struggle against counter-revolutionaries, revisionists and dogmatists, and it has the necessary experience to repulse the attacks of both the Rights and the "Lefts." Those who will attempt undermining activities will learn to their cost that the Party is able to combat these attempts with vigor and determination.

At the same time it necessary through patient explanatory work and persuasion to clear up the ideological confusion of those who have been misled on certain issues by the pseudo-revolutionary phrases of the Chinese leaders and those Right elements who are seeking to use the discussion with the Chinese leaders to bolster their revisionist position. One of the important tasks of our Party organizations is to raise still higher the ideological and political level of the members of the Party, to strengthen still further the unity of our ranks by exposing the anti-Marxist line and splitting activities of the Chinese leaders.

The political line of the HSWP, which practice has shown to be a correct line, is based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism; it faithfully adheres to the Moscow Statements of 1957 and 1960, to the jointly elaborated general line of the international Communist movement, it draws on the experience of the working-class struggle and of our people. We consistently adhere to the political line of our Party, and will in the future, as heretofore, defend it against all Right and pseudo-Left attempts to distort it. The paramount task facing our Party and our working people today is to carry out the decisions of the Eighth Congress and to complete the building of a socialist society. Every new success along this road, every new achievement in our economic and cultural work is the best answer to all attacks against the policy of our Party, including the attacks of the Chinese leaders.

ON THE DIFFERENCES IN THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST PARTY

STATEMENT OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF SALVADOR*

INTRODUCTION

The Communist Party of Salvador has viewed with deep concern the differences in the international Communist movement.

Unfortunately, the differences concern vitally important aspects of the strategic and tactical line of the international Communist movement. They include all the basic issues of the struggle for peace, against imperialism and capitalism, the national-liberation struggle, the struggle for socialism and communism. They embrace also internal questions of the international Communist movement and the principles on which this movement rests, as well as the relations between the parties and questions of proletarian internationalism. Consequently, these are not superficial differences of opinion, but profound disagreements affecting the future of mankind.

Our Party, which cherishes the greatest respect and friendship for the Communist Party of China and the heroic Chinese people, hoped that the revolutionary maturity of the Chinese comrades would enable them to find the right way to settle their differences with the rest of the international Communist movement. Unfortunately, our hopes were disappointed. Indeed, the intransigence of the Chinese comrades increased and their relations with the rest of the international Communist movement steadily deteriorated to the point where they began rapidly to break away from the countries comprising the world socialist camp, and from the international Communist movement as a whole.

In this situation it is the duty of our Party, as of all other revolutionary detachments of the proletariat, clearly and unequivocally to define its own position in conformity with the principles of Marxism-Leninism in order to preserve the internal unity of our Party, to give our members the proper orientation, and to conduct the ideological struggle against incorrect, erroneous positions prejudicial to the unity and the development of the international Communist movement.

1. THE PROBLEM OF WORLD PEACE AND WAR

The cardinal issue of the ideological dispute between the world Communist movement is that of peace or war.

*Abridged translation. This Statement, published in full in pamphlet form under the above title by the Ediciones Farabundo (organ of the Communist Party of Salvador), was adopted by an enlarged meeting of the CC of the Communist Party of Salvador held in December 1963 to discuss the differences in the international Communist movement.

For us who live under imperialist rule in conditions of brutal exploitation and repression, who suffer from the effects of militarization, and who see our oppressed peoples living in hunger and want, the phraseology of the Chinese comrades might have a certain appeal when they say that the sacrifices, whatever they may be, are unimportant, so long as the peoples are delivered from imperialism; when they declare that on the debris of nuclear war mankind will build their socialist future even sooner; or when, by the way of argument, they cite the fact that the result of the two past world wars has favoured socialism notwithstanding the suffering caused by these wars, then they are indeed striking a most responsive chord in our people's hearts—their yearning for speedy liberation. Thus the way is cleared for counterposing the interests of the peoples fighting for their liberation to the policy of peaceful coexistence pursued by the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries in their relations with the capitalist countries.

Faced with arguments of this kind, we Communists of the whole world must study this problem in detail and ask ourselves the question: does the policy of peaceful coexistence between states with different social systems help or hinder the movement of the peoples for their liberation? This question cannot be answered by emotional or bombastic phrases. For us Communists, who are guided by the Marxist-Leninist teaching, there exists but one correct way, namely: to compare the theory with practice; to analyze the problem concretely without resorting to polemical evasions. The truth is always concrete, and it must be sought in the concrete facts.

Let us ask ourselves these questions: is modern history reduced to the development and the aftermath of the two world wars? Is it not true that there was a period of several decades between the two world wars and after the last war when there was no world war, and that the cause of world revolution was furthered and many nations liberated in the period of peaceful coexistence? Why then is this experience not examined, why are all the arguments concerned solely with the history of the two world wars?

There is no doubt that in the epoch of transition from capitalism to socialism (just as in past centuries in the transition from lower to higher social formations) wars, political conflicts between classes, ideological struggles, etc. lead to the defeat of the old social order and to the victory of the new through a complex process in which temporary and partial retreats are by no means excluded.

Marxism-Leninism, drawing on the sum of historical experience, has proved that the replacement of the moribund social system by the new is bound to be effected through class struggle and through a process which develops not only in the period of wars, but at all times and in all spheres (ideological, political, economic, military, etc.); this is a cumulative process of change; when the accumulation of change reaches a certain point a revolutionary leap takes place. The experience of our time shows that the world revolution is developing at an increasing pace from day to day in the conditions of peace between states with different social systems. Capitalism's tragedy lies in the fact that, having no prospect of winning a world war, it also has no possibility of avoiding its own destruction in conditions of peace; capitalism is doomed to disappear, and it will disappear.

In these circumstances only those who close their eyes to reality can fail to see that socialism came to our continent in the period of peaceful coexistence, a period marked by the disintegration of the colonial system of imperialism in Asia and Africa and the emergence of many new independent states. All these states constitute a big force counteracting imperialism and war.

Had the Chinese comrades continued to adhere to the positions of dialectical materialism they would have had no difficulty in recognizing the dialectics of development. But they abandoned these positions and, in order to arrive at their conclusion concerning the present revolutionary process, they lay undue emphasis on the experience of the two past world wars, ignoring the historical experience of the other period, the period without wars and the tremendous differences between the destructive capacity of past wars and the destructive capacity of a nuclear war.

Every revolution has two principal stages: first, the struggle to remove the ruling classes from power and hand over the power to the revolutionary class, and second, the building of the new socio-economic system after the power has been won. The working class fights against the bourgeoisie not out of a desire for revenge; it fights the bourgeoisie in order to destroy the capitalist system which is founded on the exploitation of many by man, and to build a socialist system in its place, a system without exploitation and in which man's dreams will be fully realized. The peoples of the colonies and dependent countries too are not fighting imperialism out of a thirst for vengeance; they are fighting imperialism in order to put an end to the imperialist regime of exploitation and colonial oppression, to open the way to independent economic and cultural progress and to carry on in more favourable conditions the struggle against all forms of exploitation. The proletariat of the colonial and semi-colonial countries, like the proletariat of the developed capitalist countries, is carrying on the struggle with their gaze fixed on the socialist and Communist future.

Hatred for the exploiters and a desire for revenge are transient emotions, and they can in no way be the cause and the objective of revolutionary struggle. But to listen to the Chinese comrades it would appear that the first stage of the revolution is the most important and that the entire problem of revolution consists in destroying the power of the enemy. We refer to the argument by means of which they seek to convince people that the destruction caused by nuclear war is not important inasmuch as imperialism would be destroyed.

Our science teaches us that every social system corresponds to the level of development of its productive forces, on the level of its material base. The complete victory of socialism and communism as societies superior to capitalism will come only when the level o their productive forces is higher than that under capitalism. Henc when speaking of the second stage of the revolution, Communist should always bear in mind that the building of the new societ will proceed the faster the more resources we have at our disposa and the better the conditions for the development of the productiv forces and for expanding the material base of society. Yet th Chinese comrades wish to convince people that on the debris o nuclear destruction mankind would be able to build a "truly beau tiful future".

Today, when the world revolutionary process has made the vi tory of revolution possible without allowing the capitalist stat to unleash war against the socialist states; when the advent of atomic weapon has turned the prospect of world war into prospect of colossal devastation of the most advanced mater base in the world; when thanks to the increased weight of t tremendous power accumulated by the world revolutionary mov ment, war has ceased to be inevitable and the victory of revoluti can be achieved without necessary recourse to war; today, despi all this, the Chinese comrades are trying to convince people th the path of nuclear war is not so bad and that, consequentl there is no particular need to warn the people about the cata trophe that would engulf the world in the event of a nuclear wa

When man created means of destruction capable of extinguishi all life on this planet, there emerged also the social forces capabl of preventing war and putting an end to the exploitation of ma by man. This is a dialectical contradiction of our time whic makes it incumbent on the Communists, the vanguard of all ma kind, to ensure the triumph of life over death, revolution ov nuclear war.

Of course, nuclear war would bring about the destruction the power of the bourgeoisie throughout the world. But in th event of nuclear war, vast masses of working people in the c pitalist countries, entire cities, factories, means of transport, ag culture, etc., would be wiped out; the destruction would be wi nigh total. In the countries of victorious socialism the destructi would also be very great. In that case it is in place to ask: wo socialism, as a social system already built, be brought nearer a a nuclear war? Can socialism and communism be rapidly b on the ruins and on the corpses of hundreds of millions of worke i.e., on the corpses of those who are destined by history to bu the new society? And finally, assuming that a nuclear war wou affect only the big nuclear powers and no one else, where wou the peoples of the backward countries find the material suppo for the rapid building of the radiant future, the socialist futur This is not to speak of the difficulties of life and progress in a atmosphere contaminated by radio-active fallout. Undoubted socialism, despite all these obstacles, would eventually be bui but how long this would take and how much suffering and har ship this would entail it is impossible to predict.

Thus, if we as Marxists do not forget that the decisive stage of any revolution is the stage in which the new social system is being built, the conclusion is obvious, having in mind the present situation in the world: the path of nuclear war postpones the victory of revolution for all peoples; socialism is nearer today than it would be after a nuclear war.

Let us examine the given problem for a simpler and more direct point of view. If a nuclear war breaks out what would become of the revolution in each of our countries? Would a nuclear war accelerate or retard the revolution in each of these countries? What role in the event of war would each of our peoples play in the struggle for the victory of their revolutionary cause? It is enough to picture the conditions that would be created in the world in the event of a third world war to reply at once to these questions. The clash would occur without any preliminary warning being given the peoples and without their consent. Within the space of a few minutes vast areas would be swept by a raging and destructive holocaust that would make no distinction between revolutionaries and reactionaries. Revolutionary plans, the gains and the successes won by the revolutionary forces would be wiped out and those who worked out these plans and who fought in the ranks of the revolution would perish. And even if by some miracle we should be saved from the immediate and subsequent destructive effects of a nuclear war, even so the revolutionary plans would be essentially frustrated by the consequences of the clash. The prospect of building socialism in a brief historical period, a prospect at present made tangible by the possibility of obtaining material assistance from the socialist camp, would be dealt a serious blow, inasmuch as the socialist camp itself would be subjected to frightful destruction.

Let us now examine another perspective, that of the development of the world revolution in conditions of peaceful coexistence between the socialist and capitalist countries. In the conditions of peaceful coexistence the class struggle is maturing in that part of the world still dominated by imperialism. The peoples, led by their advanced parties, have outlined their plans, worked out their revolutionary programmes, set up their revolutionary organizations and are waging a struggle against their enemies. This struggle, (peaceful or non-peaceful depending on what path one or another people is compelled to choose) is being crowned with victory now in one, now in another country.

Hence it is the duty of the Soviet Union as a nuclear power and as the mightiest and most reliable bulwark of the world proletariat, to mobilize all its resources and efforts to prevent war from breaking out. By following this course the Soviet Union is fulfilling its duty not only to its own people but to the world revolution as well. This is also the duty of all other socialist states, of all Communist parties and progressive forces the world over. By virtue of our principles and our objectives, we Communists have a greater obligation than anyone else to fight for the preservation of wor peace.

And finally, let us examine the given problem in the light Marxist humanism. The Chinese comrades scoff at arguments favour of peaceful coexistence based on the lofty postulates Marxist humanism, seeking to depict them as nothing more th false sentimentality. It is a well-known fact that whenever o enemies wish to discredit the Communists in the eyes of the mass and undermine our prestige they accuse us of subscribing to t anti-humane and reactionary maxim which holds that "the end ju tifies the means". On the contrary this infamous slogan was a remains the slogan of those classes which are unwilling to leave t stage of history. We Communists have always rejected this slog We are humanists. The whole of our theory, all our aims and our practical activity is permeated with the loftiest striving for t perfection of all humanity in every field of endeavour. Violence not our principle, although we do not hesitate to employ violen for the sake of the victory of the revolution should the enemy comp us to take such a course. Humanism and revolution are not co tradictory. The end does not justify the means. On the contrary, t end and the means constitute an integral whole. Such is our Marxi Leninist position, and we have no cause to revise it now when t world revolution has matured and is rapidly developing everywher

We Salvador Communists resolutely declare our firm adheren to the policy of peaceful coexistence, inasmuch as we regard t preservation of peace among states with different social systems, t prevention of nuclear war as the most important condition in t present-day world for the ripening and speedy consummation of t world revolution. Therefore we condemn the position of the Chine comrades on this question as a position at variance with the interes of the world revolution. Notwithstanding our respect for the Co munist Party of China, notwithstanding its great services and i victories which we acknowledge, and notwithstanding the fact th we are a small party, we nevertheless declare this without hesit tion. This is a problem affecting all peoples, big and small, all mankind, and we Communists must all state our point of view.

II. THE NATIONAL-LIBERATION MOVEMENT

Another major problem involved in the ideological conflict b tween the Communist Party of China and some other parties, o the one hand, and the overwhelming majority of the internation Communist movement, on the other, concerns the national-liberatio struggle of the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America and th link between this struggle and the struggle of the internation working class.

It is obvious and incontestible that in our time the main contra diction is that between socialism and capitalism. This contradictio will be resolved with the world-wide victory of the working clas with the establishment of socialism and communism in all countries. At the same time our epoch is marked also by other important contradictions, outstanding among which is the contradiction between the colonial and the semi-colonial countries, on the one hand, and imperialism and colonial rule, on the other. This is a very sharp contradiction, and the prime role here is played by the oppressed countries and peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America. The big victories won by the national-liberation movement since the Second World War have increased the number of independent countries and at the same time caused the ground on which imperialism stands, i.e., colonial and semi-colonial domination, to slip from under its feet. We are convinced that the struggle of the oppressed people could not have led from victory to victory and acquired its present gigantic scope had there not existed, alongside the indomitable resolve of the peoples to win national liberation, the steadily growing might of the socialist camp. Among all the forces constituting the irresistible revolutionary torrent of our day the peoples belonging to the camp of socialism and communism play the leading, vanguard role. . .

All the movements for democracy and peace, against capitalism and imperialism, and for national liberation and socialism should be closely and inseparably linked with one another as indivisible components of the world revolutionary process. Therefore we qualify as pernicious the efforts of the Chinese comrades to counterpose, by diverse means, crude and subtle, overt and covert, the national-liberation movement to the socialist world camp and the world peace movement. We likewise disagree with the Chinese comrades' claim that the international Communist movement ignores the struggle for national liberation. To claim this is to resort to fabrications. And this is dangerous indeed. . .

Marxism teaches us to analyze the struggles waged in class society from the standpoint of class interests, proceeding from the thesis that the history of class society is shaped in class struggle. Yet in this as in other questions the Chinese comrades prefer to depart from Marxism and to speak of nations as of united entities without making any distinction between the classes within these nations or between the interests of these classes. For the Chinese comrades there exist only oppressor nation and countries and oppressed nations and countries. They seem to have forgotten that the proletariat of both types of nations and countries have common interests and are fighting against a common enemy and for common goals. True, in conducting the polemic the Chinese comrades point to these common interests and goals of the world proletariat, but only to the extent that this bolsters up their arguments on other points. When they speak of the connection between the struggle for national liberation, the struggle for socialism and the vanguard role of the socialist camp, they prefer to speak only about countries and not classes. In other words, they incline towards the positions of bourgeois nationalism, departing from Marxist-Leninist positions.

III. THE PATHS OF REVOLUTION

On the question of the means the peoples should use to win power —both at the stage of national liberation and at the stage of transition to socialism—there is full clarity in the international Communist movement. This question was theoretically elucidated in the statements of the Communist and Workers' parties in a way which seemed to leave no loophole for sowing confusion.

The Chinese comrades, after categorically asserting in their June 14 Letter that they are for faithful and consistent pursuance of the line set forth in the documents of the Communist and Workers' parties, ridicule the opportunities for peaceful struggle against the oligarchy in the various countries and against imperialism which are opening before a number of peoples. Clearly the Chinese comrades are assuming the posture of conservatives and dogmatists. Many peoples today have access to means of struggle which could hardly be envisaged when socialism was taking its first steps. The more the forces of socialism and progress become the decisive factor of social change, the more possibilities open up for the peoples for waging a successful struggle for power.

The Communist Party of Salvador, repudiating the position of the Chinese comrades and their attacks against other Communist and Workers' parties, once again reaffirms the Communique issued by its Central Committee in April 1963 which declares that our Party ". . . maintains that national independence may be won either by peaceful means or through armed struggle, depending on the specific conditions in the country concerned, and that in each case it is up to the Marxist-Leninist Party of the given country to determine the revolutionary tactics and the forms and means of struggle." The Communique states further: "Consequently, we maintain that it is dogmatic to claim that there is only one way to be followed and one form of struggle to be used in all cases. Underestimation of the possibilities opening up in the course of the struggle would only lead to defeat and unnecessary suffering for the peoples."

As regards our country, the Communist Party of Salvador holds that at present and in the foreseeable future the only possible form of struggle for power. We would not be Marxist-Leninists if we non-peaceful form. In other words, in order to win, the people must be prepared to take up arms against their enemies—imperialism and the oligarchy.

The people have worked hard to win democracy by peaceful means; but the broad masses have come to realize that the peaceful path of the revolution has been blocked by imperialism and the oligarchy. Long years of mass murders, terror, denial of democratic rights, refusal to allow the agricultural labourers to organize, constant trampling on the freedom of speech, and military coups against governments which sought to foster some democratic tendencies have shown that the ruling classes have placed their stakes on force, and this has convinced the people that they must prepare to counter force with force.

The foregoing does not mean that the Communist Party of Salvador excludes the possibility of change taking place in the internal and the international balance of forces favouring the peaceful path of struggle for power. We would not be Marxist-Leninists if we associated the popular revolutionary process in Salvador with only one particular form of struggle, if we denied the possibility of new conditions and circumstances emerging in the course of the development of the mass struggles giving rise to new methods of defense and attack, if we closed all but one door to a better life and insisted on using forms of struggle no longer according with the historically evolved conditions. We would have to be completely blind and certainly not Marxist-Leninists to fail to see that the balance of strength between the imperialist camp and the socialist camp in the international arena is steadily becoming more and more favourable to the camp of socialism.

Consequently, as regards the internal situation in our country, we do not rule out the possibility of a time coming when the organized forces of the people of Salvador, united in struggle against the tyranny and the interests it represents, will achieve such a preponderance of strength as to make the peaceful path to power possible. We do not underestimate the possibility of a government of national democracy coming into power—a government consistent with our political process which would launch out on the path of non-capitalist development. Nor do we rule out the possibility of a situation arising in which a transitional government respecting democratic freedoms, guaranteeing the free development of the political forces and enjoying the firm support of the people might be formed.

IV. PRINCIPLES GOVERNING RELATIONS BETWEEN PARTIES

The differences between the Communist Party of China and the international Communist movement extend to the highly important question of relations between parties within the international Communist movement. All the fraternal parties which signed the 81-Party Statement solemnly undertook to observe the basic Marxist-Leninist principles governing relations between the various revolutionary detachments of the proletariat. These principles are: the equality and independence of the Communist and Workers' parties; non-interference in the internal affairs of other parties, mutual aid based on international working-class solidarity; fraternal relations between parties. These principles make for the maximum solidarity of the socialist camp and the international Communist movement in the struggle for the final victory of the working class and the peoples, in the struggle for peace, democracy, national liberation, socialism and communism. . .

If the Communist parties did not cherish their independence, they would not be able correctly to elaborate their own political line according with the specific conditions prevailing in the country at the given moment; they could not effectively lead the struggles of their peoples.

The equality of the parties, the fact that there are no "superior" and "inferior" parties, is a guarantee of the observance of the principles of proletarian internationalism. Whenever there have been deviations in this respect, as, for instance, in the twenties (owing to Trotskyite influences) or in the period of the Stalin cult, they have had an adverse effect on the international Communist movement.

As regards the Communist Party of Salvador, it has strictly adhered to these principles in its relations with fraternal parties.

Further, recognition of these principles and their correct implementation can in no way detract from the important relevant thesis that the vanguard role, the role of the bulwark in the fight against imperialism, is played and will continue to be played by the USSR and the CPSU.

Recognition of this fact, far from harming, strengthens the international Communist movement. Recognition of this fact is an important element in the strategy and a vital factor of unity of the entire progressive world, while refusal to recognize it weakens the solidarity and the impact of the struggle waged by the Communist movement and the peoples of the world. This is an elementary truth recognized by the international Communist movement, a truth which even the Chinese comrades, with due modesty, always used to acknowledge.

As regards the Communist Party of Salvador, we realize the importance of the equality and independence of the Communist parties; we also realize that these do not conflict with the positive fact that the CPSU plays a vanguard role in the international Communist movement. Therefore our Party has clearly defined its stand on this question in its decisions.

Nothing would please the imperialist camp more than the weakening of the solidarity of the socialist world camp and the international Communist movement with the USSR, for the diffusion of their forces would enable the imperialists to deal with the various socialist countries, detachments of the working class, popular movements and national-liberation movements one by one. But these dreams of the imperialists will never come true, for nothing will ever make the international Communist movement forsake its main bulwark of strength.

We categorically declare that we shall always stand together with the parties which strictly and faithfully observe the principles adopted by the international Communist movement. We do not consider any fraternal Party infallible. Any Party may make one or another mistake in applying the general line of the international Communist movement, but this is not a valid reason for disrupting the unity of the movement.

In view of the situation that has developed, our Party urges that a conference of the parties be called to discuss concrete instances of mistakes which one or another fraternal Party has committed, or is presumed to have committed, in carrying out the general line.

V. UNITY OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

The unity of the international Communist movement is the basic condition for the final victory of the working class and the peoples over capitalism and imperialism.

The immortal slogan "Workers of all lands, unite!" is more timely than ever at the present stage when socialism is becoming the decisive factor of social development and the victory of the proletariat is the order of the day. Yet it is precisely at this moment when all the forces of the proletariat and the peoples should be concentrated on ensuring maximum cohesion in the common struggle against imperialism, exploitation and war that the differences examined in the present document have arisen.

Differences as such, even on cardinal questions of strategy and tactics, are no cause for alarm or surprise in the international Communist movement. But using such differences to undermine or destroy the unity of the socialist world camp and the international Communist movement is alien to Marxism and extremely damaging to the internationalist Communist movement and all humanity. And this is one of the gravest errors committed by the leadership of the Communist Party of China.

Resorting to systematic action which at first seemed inexplicable and caused surprise in other parties but which, as developments have shown, were part of a far-reaching plan elaborated in advance (and designated as the plan of "three great world-wide ideological campaigns"), the Chinese comrades set to work to deepen the differences and to worsen relations with the entire international Communist movement to the extreme, and then launched a vigorous drive to split the socialist world camp and the international Communist movement as well as individual parties. This divisive struggle was launched on a scale and by means without precedent in the history of the international Communist movement.

No Communist Party can remain indifferent to this state of affairs. It is a matter of deep concern to every Communist, to every progressive throughout the world.

The Chinese leaders, departing from the general line of the international Communist movement, unleashed a campaign of slander and invective against the leadership of many Communist and Workers' parties. They sling mud at the leaders of the Communist parties of France, Italy, U.S.A., Brazil, Spain, Australia, Belgium, etc., calling them "modern revisionists" who are "in the service of imperialism", and accusing them of "betrayal", "cowardice", etc. It is symptomatic that all the scum thrown out of the various Communist parties are raising their heads and, holding up the basic theses of the Chinese comrades, waging a struggle against these parties. No wonder, then, that the leaders of the CPSU have been congratulated and warmly greeted even by the Trotskyite so-called Fourth International.

The international Communist movement has regarded with anxiety the disruptive activities of the Chinese comrades, but at the same time it has displayed great patience and forebearance in the hope that the Chinese comrades would ponder over the serious damage they have caused to the international Communist movement and would return to the correct positions. But the Chinese comrades gave a wrong interpretation to this fraternal attitude which was prompted by a sense of proletarian unity, and hardened their erroneous stand still more.

Ever since the differences came to light the Communist Party of Salvador has fervently hoped that they would be overcome in conformity with the standards of proletarian internationalism and that no actions damaging the unity of the internaional Communist movement would be taken. Regrettably, however, the disruptive actions of the CPC have assumed such proportions that our Party cannot but condemn them; our Party once again confirms its resolve to uphold the unity of the international Communist movement based on the principles of Marxism-Leninism.

VI. STRUGGLE AGAINST DEVIATIONS FROM MARXISM-LENINISM

Rarely has anyone pursued a sectarian line on the fundamental questions of the strategy and tactics of the international Communist movement in so glaring a form as the leaders of the CPC today. If the international Communist movement were to take an attitude similar to that of the leaders of the CPC towards the peace movement and the international democratic organizations, we Communists would find ourselves isolated, both at home and on the international arena, from the broad progressive masses adhering to diverse religious faiths and political views. Such a loss of contact with the interests of the masses would inevitably postpone the final victory of the peoples in the struggle against imperialism, for peace and socialism.

The Chinese comrades refuse to admit that they had committed an error in creating a cult of the personality of Mao Tse-tung, and proceeded to misreprent the efforts that were being made to combat the personality cult, which did so much harm to the international Communist movement.

A petty-bourgeois nationalist deviation is becoming ever more clearly evident in the position of the Chinese comrades on a number of questions; and this confirms the correctness of the recommendations contained in the 81-Party Statement that the Communist movement should regard struggle against "all manifestations of nationalism and chauvinism" as one of its prime duties. It would be tragic if these deviations were to lead to manifestations of racism, which is utterly alien to the class outlook of Marxists; yet indications of this are already apparent in some of the statements issued by the Chinese comrades.

In view of the foregoing, the Communist Party of Salvador declares:

—that it firmly adheres to the principled positions of the international Communist movement; that it is guided by the principles laid down in the statements of the meetings of the Communist and Workers' parties of 1957 and 1960; it considers that these statements have fully demonstrated their historical correctness;

—the Party considers that the practical realization of the principles of the international Communist movement by the Communist movement, by the Communist and Workers' parties has created better conditions and prospects for the struggle of the peoples;

—it cannot regard as correct the line and ideological position adopted at the present time by the Chinese comrades; this position and line do not accord with the general line endorsed by the whole international Communist movement;

—the Party recognizes the great Soviet Union and its Party, founded by the leader of the world proletariat Vladimir Ilyich Lenin, as the indomitable and invincible vanguard of the international Communist movement;

—the Party believes that in the struggle for Marxist-Leninist principles these principles will inevitably prevail over revisionism, dogmatism and sectarianism; the Party holds that the public debate could even be continued provided the hostile tone is abandoned;

—the Party is in favour of calling a conference of the Communist and Workers' parties to discuss concrete instances of mistakes which one or another fraternal Party has committed, or is presumed to have committed, in carrying out the general line;

—and lastly, the Communist Party of Salvador addresses to the Communist Party of China and all the Communist and Workers' parties a fervent appeal for unity on the basis of the principles by which the international Communist movement is guided.

The cause of peace, democracy, national liberation, socialism and communism will emerge from these grave trials stronger than ever before.

Under the banner of Lenin, forward to the final victory of the working class and the peoples of the whole world!

"Proletarians and oppressed peoples the world over, unite!"

SHOULD THE NATIONAL LIBERATION MOVEMENT FEAR INTERNATIONAL DETENTE*?

Larbi Bouhali

The underlying factor of the foreign policy of the Algerian People's Republic is the struggle against colonialism and imperialism, the friendship and solidarity with the peoples, particularly the peoples of the Arab, African and socialist countries, the fight for peace and peaceful coexistence. At the Addis Ababa conference of the heads of state and government of African countries held in May 1963 Algeria played a paramount role in intensifying the anti-colonialist struggle with a view to achieving the complete liberation of Africa from colonial oppression, building African unity and transforming the continent into a nuclear and missile-free zone.

The people of Algeria like all the peoples of the world passionately strive for peace. And the foreign policy of the Ben Bella government is deeply coloured with this striving for peace on the part of our people.

Immediately after the announcement of the Moscow test-ban treaty presidents Ben Bella and Julius Nyerere welcomed it in a joint statement which said: "It is with great satisfaction that we learnt about the conclusion of a treaty banning nuclear-weapon tests. We are convinced that this treaty expresses the legitimate aspirations of all peoples and that it will largely contribute to the strengthening of world peace and security."

In an interview with the newspaper Izvestia Hadj Ben Alla, President of the National Assembly of the Algerian Republic, declared: "I maintain that the Moscow test-ban treaty is the outstanding event of the year for all countries and, notably, for Algeria."

The Algerians rejoice over the fact that the overwhelming majority of the states in the world have adopted the same attitude to the Moscow Treaty as our own government inasmuch as the treaty expresses the profound will of all the peoples, and notably the peoples who have won their freedom or are still fighting against the colonial yoke.

WHO SPEAKS ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL-LIBERATION MOVEMENT?

We understand very well why the de Gaulle government, the West German militarists and the Pentagon brass hats are hostile to the Moscow treaty. But it is difficult for us to understand a similar attitude on the part of the Chinese leaders, who claim that the treaty is directed against their country. While they have feelings of admiration for the great Chinese people, the Algerians categorically reject the standpoint of the Chinese leaders according to which the Moscow treaty is a "betrayal" of the interests of the peoples. This is not only a rude calumny against the Soviet Union and the glorious Party of Lenin but also an insolent challenge to all the peoples who support the actions of their governments in this direction and, consequently, a challenge to the Algerian people. The betrayal of the interests of the peoples consists in the fact that a struggle is being waged against the cause dear to all the peoples under the pretext that the imperialists were compelled to support it. In fact, however, the opposition of the Chinese leaders to the Moscow test-ban treaty derives from their erroneous attitude to the general line of the international Communist and working-class movement and, in particular, to the struggle against war, for the strengthening of world peace.

The Chinese leaders maintain that the policy of peaceful coexistence, which they themselves earlier supported, is demobilizing the peoples and retarding their struggle for national and social emancipation. In order to push through their adventurist standpoint they are trying to counterpose the national-liberation movement to the international working class and its principal gain, the socialist world system. But, in effect, what right do they have to speak on behalf of the national-liberation movement after they refused to honour their commitments in the international democratic organizations and launched a violent campaign against one of the deepest aspirations of the peoples which compose this national-liberation movement? Why did they ignore the Addis Ababa conference which gave a clear expression to the opinion of the African peoples on the question of war and peace? Or perhaps they consider all the heads of state and governments who attended that conference to be traitors to their peoples?

Is it necessary to recall that peaceful coexistence has never meant, nor will it ever mean, renouncing the struggle of the oppressed countries against the oppressors, of the exploited against the exploiters, the struggle between two diametrically opposed ideologies, as the Chinese leaders would like us to believe? When it is a question of peaceful coexistence between states with different socio-economic systems, the revolutionaries have in mind the peaceful coexistence of the socialist and the capitalist countries. The peaceful coexistence imposed by the peoples on the imperialists creates a real possibility for humanity as a whole to avoid a terrible nuclear catastrophe. Neither of the nations, not one forward-looking person, can remain indifferent to this perspective. But if it is true that peaceful coexistence rids the people of nuclear holocaust, it is equally true that it cannot either arrest or retard the national-liberation movement and the class struggle. On the contrary, it presupposes their continued development. Moreover, it creates even more favourable conditions for this development as can be seen from the experience of the postwar years.

Before the Second World War imperalism dominated the majority of the population and reigned on most of the territory of the world. And after the end of the war, i.e., in the conditions of peaceful co-existence, over 50 countries with a population of 1,500 million political independence.

Why did not these countries win their national independence before or during the Second World War? Did they not want it or did they not fight for it? To suppose so would mean to abuse them. It is common knowledge that each people subjected to colonial oppression has not for a moment ceased to fight against it. On the other hand, it is not of their free will that the imperialists granted independence to the peoples. This means that the peoples won their independence in struggle and that this struggle proceeded in far more favourable conditions.

NO ADVENTURISM!

Liberation from colonialism requires above all that the peoples concerned fight against it, and this is the principal condition of success. But the peoples are not waging this struggle in one and the same form. Some of them had to make recourse to armed struggle, to partisan warfare combined with various forms of mass political action—and all is over a span of many years. This, for example, was the case with the peoples of Vietnam and Algeria. For others it was enough to take political action to obtain independence. An example of this is Guinea and many other territories of former French Africa south of the Sahara. This means that an insurrection which can be indispensable for one people is not absolutely necessary in all cases, as claimed by the Chinese leaders who brand as counter-revolutionaries all those who do not favour armed insurrection in all cases. Had the Algerian people been given the chance to achieve independence in a peaceful way, it would never have agreed to sacrifice more than a million of its sons and daughters whom it needed alive for national construction. But when imperialism confronted it with violence, it did not hesitate to use the same means and stopped at no sacrifices.

For true Marxist-Leninists an armed insurrection is not a game of chance. It is imperative that it has the maximum of chances of success, and for this it is necessary to take cognizance of the sum-total of objective and subjective conditions. To fail to do so and seek to impose on the people an armed uprising as the whole means of their liberation means to plunge them into an adventure.

As a matter of fact, the Algerians have already seen for themselves the workings of this adventurist policy of the Chinese leaders. During a meeting with a delegation of the Algerian Communist Party in October 1959 in Peking the latter criticized the decision of the Algerian Party to disband its armed groups and merge them with the National-Liberation Army. They suggested that the ACP should do everything to re-establish these armed units as soon as possible, saying that a Party without its own armed forces was nothing. Our delegation rejected this "suggestion" as pernicious both for the Communist Party and the Algerian people as a whole.

In order to shake off the chains of colonialism our people made enormous sacrifices and engaged in glorious struggle, which was undoubtedly the decisive factor of our victory. But every Algerian realizes that, no matter how heroic this struggle was, alone it could not have defeated the most powerful colonial army ever known to history. If the people of Algeria won, this was because their struggle developed in a favourable international situation.

The imperialist countries, with the exception of the U.S.A., were weakened by the Second World War. This circumstance encouraged the struggle of the colonial peoples which began to shatter the colonial system of imperialism. Every nation that won its freedom made new breaches in the flanks of imperialism and rendered active support to the struggle of other peoples. That was how the national-liberation movement grew. At the same time a movement and struggle for democracy and peace got under way in the capitalist countries and began to render political and moral support to the national-liberation movement.

But these two movements could not have reached their scope without the emergence and strengthening of the socialist countries which formed a world system of socialism. It is the joint efforts of these three mutually complementary world forces that are steadily sapping the foundations of imperialism and will ultimately vanquish it.

To try to isolate the national-liberation movement and counterpose it to other progressive force, as the Chinese leaders are doing, means to harm the interests of all peoples and objectively play into the hands of the imperialists.

All peoples know full well that without the socialist countries, without the Soviet Union and its great economic, scientific and technological achievements, the image of the world would be different today. The stronger the socialist system the greater the political, moral and material aid it is rendering to all peoples, both those which are fighting for their liberation and those building their independent states.

All peoples know that it was thanks to the vigorous actions of the Soviet Union that the imperialist aggressors had to retreat in many countries such as Cuba, Egypt, Syria and Iraq.

In defiance of indisputable historical facts, the Chinese leaders accuse the Soviet Union of not supporting the struggle of the peoples against colonialism. They claim that it did not want to support Algeria in the liberation war against French colonialism. As for the Algerian people, they know and highly appreciate the aid rendered them by the USSR in the political and diplomatic fields as well as the material aid, including arms and munitions. The Algerian leaders, be it said, often recall this aid, as did President Ben Bella in an interview with the Soviet journalists during the Third World Meeting of Journalists in Algiers: "We," he said, "are much obliged to the peoples of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries for the aid they have given us and for the great material aid we are receiving at present, at the time when we are launching out on the building of a highly developed and independent socialist economy."

In the future we shall be able to receive the ever-growing aid of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries only in measure as these countries develop their economy and go from success to success. And for this there must be peaceful coexistence and further international détente. The aggression unleashed by the Moroccan monarchy against our borders has shown that had our people been forced to wage a prolonged war to protect our territorial integrity, this would have inflicted grave damage to the building of our national economy and to the development of our revolution.

Such are the additional reasons explaining why the Algerian Communists resolutely support the consistent policy of peace pursued by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries as well as the struggle for peaceful coexistence, for general and controlled disarmament.

POLITICAL RESOLUTION OF THE FIFTH CONFERENCE OF THE ITALIAN COMMUNIST PARTY*

In the conclusion of its proceedings the Fifth Conference of the ICP adopted the following political resolution:

1. The Fifth National Conference on Organization of the Italian Communists, which met in Naples at a grave moment of our national life, draws the attention of all Italians, with the authority of a great political, democratic and national force, to the serious deterioration of the economic, social and political situation of the country during the three months that have elapsed since the setting up of the Moro government. The big monopoly groups, after having exercised growing pressure in order to condition the action of the Centre-Left government, are today developing a great offensive in order to have their will and their interests prevail in full. Such an offensive, made possible by the agreement on the platform of the present government, has been more and more encouraged by the docility of the Centre-Left group. Thus, serious threats arise to the living conditions of the working masses and to the initiatives of the middle strata, as is clearly shown by the attack on wages and the demand for shorter working hours, wide-scale dismissals, the restriction of credit to the small and medium-size enterprises and the curtailment of public expenditure. At the same time, scandalous concessions have been made to tax evasions and an inadmissible tolerance has favoured the escape of capital abroad. The gaps, the contradictions, the traditional injustice of Italian society, above all the South Italian question—already sharper due to monopoly expansion during the years of the "economic miracle"—are now sharpening more and more. The striving for renewal on the part of the more advance section of the Centre-Left group has been paralyzed by the prevalence of the conservative orientation, outside and inside the government. The confusion that has characterized the government actions in these months has worsened the economic situation, humiliated the Socialist Party and the most advanced forces of the Catholic world, struck a blow at the prestige of the democratic institutions and may create the conditions for reactionary chaos.

A resolute renovating action by the government can offset the pressure, the economic and political blackmail on the part of the big monopoly groups and the anxiety and demagogical campaign, by means of which the Rights are trying to influence the middle strata. A revival of Italian economic development on a different basis, opposed to that indicated by the big employers, if possible if one has the will and the force to defeat the sabotage, manoeuvres and speculation of the big capitalists and make them pay the cost of that rebirth which is now weighing down on the shoulders of the working class and the middle strata. First of all it is necessary:

a) to stop the inflation process;

b) to prevent the consequences of the present difficulties being shifted to the shoulders of the popular masses.

For this, it is necessary to adopt immediate measures of public interference and public control capable of stopping the increase in the cost of living and of stimulating investments to meet with the most urgent needs of the national economy and the working people.

Such measures should immediately start democratic economic planning, based on essential structural reforms, subordinate the action of big capital to the interests of the collective and give the working masses a new role in society and in the state. These basic orientations should underlie all government action and also the utilization of the loan now given to Italy by the United States, rejecting all political conditions.

The policy and the solutions of the Centre-Left government have revealed their deep limitations due both to the composition of the majority and the program and orientation that have been chosen. Today the PSI is faced again with a dramatic dilemma between defense and development of its essential features or assumption of the role of a mere supporter of the capitalist system. More and more critical is also the position of those forces inside the Catholic movement that refuse to accept unconditionally the present capitalist set-up and the monopoly leadership of society.

It is essential and urgent that all the secular and Catholic forces understand the necessity not to remain subjected to the pressure of the monopoly group and feel the urgency and the actual possibility of imposing today a decisive orientation of renewal of the nation and of drastically limiting big capital's power. The experience of the past two years shows that even the most timid and contradictory reforms come up against the harsh resistance of the ruling classes, resistance which cannot be faced and defeated without mobilizing the widest and most militant political forces expressing the interests and the will for progress of the working people and the middle strata. The confidence and support of these great social and political forces are decisive in order to emerge from the economic and political crisis, to give new impulse to the democratic institutions, to defeat the plans of the Right inside and outside the government, to create the conditions and the basis for a Left-wing shift.

tion made in these years of major problems of unity of the international Communist movement with due regard for diversity and autonomy of the experience of every party, of the important problems of search for one's own perspective of democratic advance towards socialism and of new forms of participation by the working class in government, the Communists propose a discussion, open to all the Left forces, on the ways of democratic renewal of the nation.

2. Recent developments have again demonstrated how futile are the attempts to pursue a policy of democratic development in Italy against and without the Communist Party, and how absurd is the perspective of embarrassing our Party. In face of the stubbornness of the monopoly groups and the grave political weakness shown by the other sectors of the Left movement, the growing strength of the ICP—so clearly evidenced in the organizational field by the successes gained in the re-registration campaign of 1964—represents a beacon for all the social strata aspiring to a deep-going transformation of national society.

It is the task of the Communists to make the most of this strength in the present dramatic phase of the national economic and political situation.

The Fifth National Conference on Organization calls upon the Party to start immediately a campaign of orientation, propaganda and agitation aimed at defeating the insidious activities through which the monopoly groups try to repress the advancement of demands, deprive the working-class movement of autonomy, and isolate the middle strata from the working class. At the same time the Conference calls upon all the party organizations to develop, on the basis of unity, the widest initiatives of struggle for peace, for disarmament and for an autonomous and independent development of the underdeveloped countries, for the immediate establishment of regional institutions, for land reforms and for the rebirth of the South, against the rising cost of living and against every attack on the employment levels, for new town-planning legislation, for school reform and for a higher level of scientific research.

It is in the spirit of these renewed militant tasks of struggle that the organizations of the Party and of the Young Communist Federation are called upon to carry on the campaign of re-registration and registration towards new successes which—in the year since the big victory of April 28—indicate the constant and increasing popular support given to the ICP and its policy.

The Fifth National Conference on Organization, the impulse coming from it as a result of the renewal of the organizational structure and further extension of democracy in the party, indicates that the ICP is a virile and essential force in Italian democracy, capable of making a new, decisive contribution to the common struggle of the Italian people for peace and socialism.

SITUATION IN THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

COMMUNIQUE OF THE POLITICAL BUREAU OF THE FRENCH COMMUNIST PARTY*

The Political Bureau of the French Communist Party, at its meeting on April 9, 1964, under the chairmanship of Comrade Maurice Thorez, examined the latest developments in the international Communist movement.

The Political Bureau notes that the leaders of the Communist Party of China are departing more and more from the principles jointly elaborated by the fraternal parties at the 1957 and 1960 meetings, that they refuse to support the proposal to terminate the public debate, and are levelling violent attacks on the policy and leaders of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, our own Party and the majority of the fraternal parties. They are organizing groups hostile to the Communist parties of the various countries including parties which are working in the difficult conditions of illegality, thereby playing into the hands of imperialism.

The report of Comrade Suslov published recently by the Central Committee of the CPSU is a firm and reasoned reply to the dogmatic theses and disruptive activities of the leaders of the CPC.

The Political Bureau stresses the importance of the proposal advanced by the Central Committee of the CPSU to convene at the earliest possible date another conference of all the Communist and Workers' parties. It will be recalled that in October 1963 and in March 1964 the Central Committee of our Party expressed itself in favor of such a conference. In the light of developments since 1960, it is necessary to reaffirm the general line of the movement and to take necessary measures to preserve its untiy.

Full accord exists between our Party and the CPSU on fundamental theoretical and political questions affecting the international Communist movement.

Full accord exists between our Party and the CPSU on fundamental theoretical and political questions affecting the international Communist movement.

The French Communist Party is firmly resolved to foil the attempts to undermine the unity of the Marxist-Leninist parties, that unity which is the principal guarantee of success in the struggle for peace, democracy, national and social liberation for all people.

The Political Bureau urges all Communists, in preparation for the 17th Congress of the French Communist Party, to study and discuss the documents relating to the situation in the international Communist movement. The ideological and political unity of the Party is a condition for the efficacy of its actions in defense of peace, in defense of the interests of our people, in the name of the alliance of all workers and democratic forces against one-man rule, for the establishment of genuine democracy in our country.

STRUGGLE WITH DETERMINATION AGAINST THE CHINESE SPLITTERS

RESOLUTION OF THE PLENARY MEETING OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF BULGARIA

A Plenary Meeting of the CC of the Communist Party of Bulgaria, held on March 21, 1964, heard and discussed the report of Mitko Grigorov, Member of the Political Bureau and Secretary of the CC, BCP, on some questions of the world Communist movement, and unanimously approved the conclusions and appraisals contained therein.

The Central Committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party notes that the Chinese Communist Party leadership has lately taken advantage of the discontinuance of open polemics by the CPSU and other fraternal parties to intensify and deepen its deviation from Marxism-Leninism and to step up its disruptive activities in the world Communist and Workers' movement. This is doing great harm to the socialist camp and gravely jeopardizes the unity and cohesion of the world Communist front. The Plenum believes that the situation is no longer tolerable. An irreconcilable struggle must be waged against the harmful anti-Marxist and disruptive activities of the Chinese leaders. Their dogmatic, nationalist and Trotskyist views, and their factional and subversive activities must be exposed to the last.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union and other fraternal parties have gone to great pains to eliminate the differences caused by the Chinese Communist Party leadership in the world Communist movement. It was on the initiative of the CC, CPSU that representatives of the two parties held negotiations in Moscow in the summer of 1963, and it was the fault of the Chinese leadership that these yielded no results. In the last few months, the CC, CPSU has repeatedly suggested that the bilateral talks be resumed, but for a long time the Chinese leaders did not reply to them. The CC, CPSU proposed discontinuing the open polemics in order to create a calmer and more favourable atmosphere for a discussion of the questions in dispute. Although the Chinese leaders did not reply to this proposal, the open polemics were discontinued in the Soviet Union. In our country, too, and in other fraternal parties the open polemics were stopped.

The Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party, held on July 31 and August 1, 1963, called on the Chinese leaders to strive for the removal of the differences and for the consolidation of Marxist-Leninist unity among the Communists of the whole world. Our leadership has invariably backed the efforts and measures of the CPSU and of other Communist and Workers' parties to that effect.

But the CPC leadership responded, and now responds, to all the efforts and actions aimed at removing the differences and consolidating the unity of the world Communist movement by intensifying its factional activities and redoubling its campaign of slander against the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties. The Bulgarian Communist Party membership is deeply alarmed, troubled and angered by the CPC leadership's refusal to discontinue open polemics, by its provocative declarations that it will continue and expand its disruptive work, by its vicious anti-Soviet propaganda and by its public calls for a split in the world Communist movement.

The Plenary Meeting of the CC, BCP believes that the dogmatism and sectarianism of the Chinese leaders are the chief danger for the world Communist movement at the present stage, for they are disrupting its unity and creating grave difficulties in the common struggle of the fraternal parties for peace, democracy, socialism and Communism.

The Chinese leaders have passed all bounds in their deviations from Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. They have completely betrayed the Declaration and Statement of the Moscow Meeting and have given their new political line, which they seek to impose on the world Communist movement, final shape. In the beginning of their splitting activities they said they differed with the fraternal parties on just a few questions of strategy and tactics, but have now passed over completely to nationalism, petty-bourgeois adventurism and Trotkyism on a number of key issues. Deep-going differences of principle exist today between the CPSU and other fraternal parties, on the one hand, and the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party, on the other, in relation to all the basic problems of our time, to Marxism-Leninism and to the general line of the world Communist movement. The Chinese leaders adopted the positions of great-power chauvinism and Trotskyism, and continue doggedly to develop and deepen their erroneous and harmful "theories" on these basic problems.

The Chinese leaders have come out against the policy of peaceful coexistence between countries with different social systems, the struggle for general and complete disarmament, the Moscow Treaty for the partial banning of nuclear weapons tests, and all the other peaceful proposals made by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries. Thereby they create serious difficulties for the peace forces in their effort to safeguard and strengthen world peace. In contrast to the Leninist theory of socialist revolution, they are harping more and more insistently on the old Trotskyist thesis about permanent revolution, the "pushing" of revolution, and on its victory through war. In matters of war, peace and revolution, the Chinese leaders are continuously intensifying their dangerous and adventurist policy. In doing so, they line up with the most aggressive and reactionary forces of the imperialist camp, helping to aggravate the international situation and adding to world tension.

Furthermore, in these activities the Chinese leaders are resorting to crass demagogy and hypocrisy. When, in the struggle for peace and peaceful coexistence, the Soviet Union and other socialist countries negotiate and seek understanding with the capitalist countries on certain issues, when they strengthen and expand their economic and other contacts with the capitalist countries, the Chinese leaders accuse them of "revisionism" and "treachery", but when the Government of the Chinese People's Republic associates with capitalist countries and even helps certain reactionary forces, the Chinese leaders parade as genuine "revolutionaries" and "Marxists".

The Chinese leaders also persist in, and deepen, their anti-Marxist line in relation to the national liberation movement. In so doing, they are bent on creating an Afro-Asian front under their own leadership. Their main goal at present is to tear the national liberation movement from, and oppose it to, the world socialist system, the world Communist movement and, particularly, the Soviet Union. In pursuance of this goal, they are expanding their disruptive activities in Asia, Africa and Latin America more and more, trying to create separatist organizations, etc. In their struggle against the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, they have adopted a racist stand, substituting the slogan of opposition to whites generally for the class approach.

By seeking to deprive the national liberation movement of the immense assistance and the influence of the world socialist system and world Communist movement, which have done so much for its extension and successful development, the Chinese leaders are causing the most painful damage chiefly to the struggle for freedom and national independence waged by the peoples of the dependent and colonial countries.

At present, the Chinese leaders are concentrating their disruptive activities in the world Communist and workers' movement on attempts to establish an international bloc of factional groups, which they aim to oppose to the CPSU and other fraternal parties. To this end, they issue unveiled calls for dissent within the Communist and Workers' parties and seek to create anti-party groups within them, to organize and unite all the Trotskyist and anarchist elements, politically and morally corrupted people expelled from the various parties, careerists and adventurers who would support them in the factional struggle.

In many capitalist countries the authorities, and even the police, give the Chinese leaders active assistance in this respect. In order to justify and camouflage their disruptive and subversive activities, the Chinese leaders have developed a special theory that splits are objectively inevitable in the world Communist movement. This theory has nothing in common with Marxism-Leninism and goes completely against the facts of history.

Lately, the Chinese leadership has stepped up still more its provocative and corrupting activities in the various international democratic organizations. The Chinese representatives in these organizations strive to impede their work by all possible means and to create all sorts of difficulties with the object of discrediting the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, of saddling their will on them, and overriding the will and the decisions of the vast majority by the will of the minority.

The Chinese leaders have extended their ideological differences to their relations with the socialist countries, and persist in worsening these relations. They are disrupting the unity of the world socialist system and oppose themselves to all its activities and its development. It is through the fault of the Chinese leadership that mutual assistance and co-operation have decreased drastically between the Soviet Union and the Chinese People's Republic, and between the Chinese People's Republic and the other socialist countries, including the People's Republic of Bulgaria. Some time ago the Chinese leaders began to stage crude provocations on the Soviet-Chinese border.

With the object of maligning the Soviet Union and other socialist countries and justifying the deterioration in the condition of China's working people, which is due entirely to their own erroneous and reckless policy, the Chinese leaders have invented a specious "theory" on the restoration of capitalism in the socialist countries, and on their turning bourgeois. They go to the length of saying that the Soviet Union has no right to build communist society as long as imperialism exists in the world. The Chinese leaders maintain that the higher the living standard rises in the Soviet Union and other socialist countries, the more intensively the restoration of capitalism and the spread of bourgeois tendencies proceeds. They denounce the program of the CPSU and declare that its great slogans of Peace, Labour, Freedom, Equality, Fraternity and Happiness are bourgeois.

In their disruptive activities the Chinese leaders are aiming their chief efforts primarily against the Soviet Union, against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and its Central Committee headed by N. S. Khrushchov. That is no accident. By discrediting the CPSU and the Soviet Union, the Chinese leaders hope to decapitate and disorganize the whole world Communist movement, and to impose their own pernicious and harmful general line upon it. In their struggle against the Soviet Union and the CPSU, in their unbridled anti-Soviet activities, they emulate the bitterest enemies of the Soviet state. The foulest of slander and all sorts of insinuations and falsehoods are their chief weapon. Without shame or remorse, the Chinese leaders today spread monstrous accusations and slander, alleging that the Soviet Union has struck a deal with American imperialism to seize possession of, and divide the world. They allege that the Soviet Union, together with the United States, is the chief enemy of the Chinese people, that the Soviet Union is bent on enslaving the other socialist countries, that the CPSU orders the fraternal parties about, etc. In the past, the Chinese leaders hailed the assistance rendered to China's socialist construction by the Soviet Union. Today, they deny it completely. They are so deeply resentful of the Soviet Union and the CPSU that they accuse the Soviet Party and Government leadership of anti-Soviet activities. They fiercely defend and extol the harmful personality cult, which has been done away with for good.

The Bulgarian Communists consider it their sacred internationalist duty to emphatically reject the Chinese leaders' monstrous inventions and slanders against the Soviet Union and the CPSU. In so doing, they declare once more that anyone who attempts to discredit and malign Lenin's great Party will be branded as a deviationist from Marxism-Leninism and a traitor to proletarian internationalism.

The Bulgarian Communist Party has always considered, and now considers, the CPSU to be the strongest and most tested detachment of the world Communist front, one that has the richest revolutionary experience and is the commonly recognized vanguard of the world Communist movement. The CPSU, the party founded and raised by the great Lenin, is making the biggest contribution to the creative development of Marxism-Leninism and to the worldwide victory of socialism and communism.

The Bulgarian Communist Party will always, as before, march firmly and staunchly together with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, and will struggle shoulder to shoulder with it for the triumph of the great communist cause. The fraternal assistance of the Soviet Union and life-giving Bulgarian-Soviet friendship have always been, and alway will be, an important condition for the final building of socialism and communism in our country. During the recent visit of a Bulgarian Party and Government delegation, headed by Todor Zhivkov, to the Soviet Union, and in the Joint Bulgarian-Soviet Statement signed in Moscow, the two countries again reaffirmed their fraternal relations and Bulgarian-Soviet friendship was raised to a new, higher stage of development.

The Plenum of the Central Committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party again expresses the deep affection and loyalty, and the appreciation of all the Bulgarian Communists, of all the working people of our land, to the mighty Soviet Union and its glorious Party. Again they express their boundless gratitude to and their confidence in, the Leninist Central Committee of the CPSU and N. S. Khrushchov, for their exteremely important role in the world Communist movement, for their tireless struggle for the strengthening of its unity and cohesion, and for the immense assistance they are rendering our country.

The Plenum of the Central Committee of the Bulgarian Communist Party heartily approves and unanimously supports the proposal of the CC, CPSU to convene an international conference of fraternal Communist and Workers' parties in the autumn. We strongly object to the attempts of the Chinese leaders to retard and delay the conference, because this is likely to complicate the situation and further deepen the differences.

In the several years since the Moscow Meetings of Communist and Workers' parties, the world Communist movement has scored new big successes and victories. In following the jointly formed general line, the world Communist movement has consolidated and increased its ranks. The strength and might of the world socialist system has grown. Thanks to the policy of peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems and thanks to the efforts of the Soviet Union and all the world's progressives, world peace has been safeguarded and strengthened. The revolutionary struggle of the working class and all the working people in the capitalist countries has expanded. The national liberation movement against imperialism and colonialism is developing at a rapid pace. The general democratic struggle of the peoples against capitalist monopolies and reactionaries is growing continuously.

The giant battle for peace, democracy, national independence and socialism has completely borne out the general line of the world Communist movement. At the same time, developments show graphically how wrong and harmful the dogmatic and adventurist policy of the Chinese leaders is.

Reared by Dimitr Blagoev and Georgi Dimitrov in the spirit of unshakable loyalty to Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, the Bulgarian Communist Party has always steadfastly followed, and will continue to follow, this general line. It has always waged and will continue to wage an uncompromising struggle in defense of the great Marxist-Leninist teaching.

GUARD AND STRENGTHEN UNITY OF WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

RESOLUTION OF THE SEVENTH PLENARY MEETING OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF GREECE, APRIL 1964

The Seventh Plenary Meeting discussed the serious situation that has arisen in the international Communist movement as a result of the anti-Marxist, anti-Leninist line and the increasingly disruptive activities of the leaders of the Communist Party of China.

The leaders of the Communist Party of China have long been carrying on a systematic campaign aimed at distorting and undermining the line jointly elaborated at the 1957 and 1960 Moscow meetings in order to impose their hegemony and dogmatic, adventuristic, neo-Trotskyite, chauvinistic line on the world Communist movement.

The Communist Party of Greece from the very first rejected the positions and actions of the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party and came out in defense of the Marxist-Leninist principles set forth in the Moscow documents; it reaffirmed its solidarity with and support for the efforts of the CPSU and the other fraternal parties aimed at ending the public and harmful polemics, overcoming the differences and consolidating the unity of the ranks of the international Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism. Unfortunately, events showed that the Chinese leaders did not want to listen to the voice of reason, did not want to consider the interests of the world Communist movement. Moreover, they interpreted these efforts on the part of the fraternal parties as a sign of weakness.

Of late the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party has stepped up the propaganda of its erroneous views and is openly intensifying its subversive and splitting activities against the world Communist movement. The chief target of its unbridled slander is the CPSU, the tried and tested vanguard of the world Communist movement, its Leninist leadership and Comrade Khrushchov personally. The leadership of the Chinese Communist Party is extending the struggle to inter-state relations, engaging in hostile sallies against the Soviet Union and striving to split the socialist camp. It is carrying on its splitting activities in international mass organizations as well.

The leaders of the Chinese Communist Party are now openly taking under their wing all anti-party factionalist elements in the different countries, all renegades from communism, organizing these elements into splinter groups and calling them "communist parties". They are trying to unite these anti-party groups and all those who support their views in a central organization under their hegemony as a counter-weight to the great community of Marxist-Leninist parties.

This systematic undermining of the world Communist movement at a time when the struggle of the peoples against imperialism is mounting, objectively helps the imperialists to weaken the socialist camp, prevents the broad masses in the capitalist countries from uniting with the working class to fight for democracy and socialism, weakens the struggle of the enslaved peoples, undermines the front of all revolutionary anti-imperialist forces and is detrimental to the peoples' fight for peace.

The anti-Marxist views, the subversive and splitting activities of the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party, which affected our own country as well, are creating additional difficulties for our Party working in underground conditions and for our entire democratic movement at a time when the need for unity of the working class, the entire nation, and all the democratic and anti-imperialist forces in their efforts to steer the country onto a path of democracy, peace and social progress is greater than ever before. The actions of the Chinese Communist Party tend to bolster up dogmatic tendencies refuted by life itself, to underestimate the struggle for democracy and the importance of alliances for the working class. They are prejudicial to the fight for peace, for the establishment of a nuclear-free zone in the Balkans and the Mediterranean, for a policy of peaceful coexistence in relations between states.

Our Party resolutely condemns the attempt made by the Chinese leaders to impose their dogmatic, adventuristic line on the world Communist movement and to revive the pernicious practices of the personality cult. Our Party knows by its own bitter experience how much our popular movement suffered as a result of the dogmatic, sectarian adventurist line of the Zachariadis leadership.

The Seventh Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Greece holds that in order to defend the purity of Marxism-Leninism and the unity of the international Communist movement it is imperative to expose the anti-Marxist, anti-Leninist ideological positions of the leaders of the CPC and to give a resolute rebuff to their disruptive activities. The Plenary Meeting urges the entire Party, without relaxing the struggle against revisionism which in the specific conditions of our movement in Greece remains a very serious danger, to intensify the struggle against dogmatism, the danger of which has been greatly increased in our movement as well by the subversive actions of the Chinese leaders.

The Plenary Meeting is of the opinion that the interests of the international Communist movement require the speediest convocation of a meeting of the Communist and Workers' parties to discuss the basic urgent problems of the international Communist movement and the need to safeguard and strengthen its unity on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism.

The Seventh Plenum is confident that the world Communist movement will, through the joint efforts of all Marxist-Leninist parties, overcome the present differences, close its ranks in still stronger unity and forge ahead with redoubled resolve toward new major victories in the fight for peace, democracy and socialism.

FOR UNITY OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

RESOLUTION ADOPTED AT THE 18th NATIONAL CONVENTION, COMMUNIST PARTY OF CANADA (MARCH 27-30, 1964)

Our last Convention (January 1962) acknowledged the report by Tim Buck on the differences in the world Communist movement particularly as they bear on our own program and policies. These differences have since become more acute. What commenced as ideological differences has now been transformed by the Communist Party of China in its February 4, 1964, Red Flag article into organized efforts at splitting the world movement and individual Communist and Workers' parties. The leadership of the Communist Party of China is openly justifying and encouraging splits, thereby disuniting the world Communist movement and in effect working for the establishment of an international centre under its leadership directed to pursuing an entirely different strategical and tactical line to that agreed to unanimously at the Moscow meetings of 1957 and 1960 as embodied in the documents adopted by these meetings.

Such a course, if persisted in, would have disastrous consequences. It would shift the balance of forces on a world scale in favour of imperialism by splitting the countries of the world socialist system and so weakening the world front of peace, democracy, national liberation and socialism.

A split in the world movement would be the biggest gain for imperialism. Imperialism, headed by the U.S.A., is working for such a split, seeking in every way possible to "fish in muddy waters", so as to undermine the unity of the world movement.

In this difficult and complex situation it is necessary to avoid aggravating the situation, and step by step, to patiently resolve the differences which have arisen, subordinating them to the primary need of strengthening the unity of the world movement and thereby the world-wide movement against imperialism, for peace, democracy, national liberation and socialism.

But to accomplish this it is necessary not only to cease public polemics, but that the leadership of the Communist Party of China desist from its splitting policy and agree to a patient discussion and resolution of differences.

History will never forgive the leaders of the Chinese Party if they continue to pursue policies deliberately calculated to undermine and destroy the unity of the world Communist movement.

The policies advocated by the Communist Party of China, and which they put forward as a "general line" for all Communist parties, go contrary to the program and policies democratically arrived at by our Party. We reject those policies and will uphold our position against any attacks.

This Convention calls on all members of our Party to reject the totally wrong and un-Marxist line of the Chinese leaders and to energetically oppose the attempt to divide the world Communist movement.

This Convention declares that our Party, like the majority of the Communist and Workers' parties, will patiently and in a comradely and fraternal spirit persevere in all efforts at restoring and consolidating unity on the firm and principled basis of Marxism-Leninism, of proletarian internationalism and solidarity, and the documents of the 1957 and 1960 Moscow meetings.

It endorses the action of the National Committee in urging the convening of a World Conference of Communist and Workers' parties as soon as possible, in order to restore the unity of our world movement.

CEYLON COMMUNIST PARTY'S STRUGGLE AGAINST SPLITTISM

Pieter Keuneman

General Secretary Ceylon Communist Party

The Communist Party of Ceylon is a comparatively young party, just over 20 years old, working in the difficult and complicated conditions of a newly-independent Asian state. Although our country is small, the Ceylonese people have played a creditable part in the fight for peace and against colonialism. Ceylon's role in the affairs of the Afro-Asian and the non-aligned states has also been an important one. Recent examples of this role have been Ceylon's initiative, together with other Colombo Powers, to promote a peaceful and negotiated settlement of the Sino-Indian border dispute and its sponsorship of past and forthcoming conferences of no-aligned states. Despite differences on specific questions with its neighbors, like India, Ceylon has maintained a policy of friendship with them and has resisted all attempts to exploit these differences in order to draw her into specifically anti-Indian alignments.

During the past two decades, our Party has upheld Marxism-Leninism and endeavored to apply its scientific teachings to the concrete conditions under which the revolutionary process is developing in Ceylon. We have upheld proletarian internationalism against bourgeois nationalism and racial chauvinism. We have maintained and developed relations of fraternal solidarity with all our brother Marxist-Leninist parties. We have valued highly their assistance to and encouragement of our struggle and have always supported their struggles in every way we could.

Our Party has consistently supported and solidarized itself with the great Chinese revolution and explained its profound significance to our people. We have stood in the van of all the struggles to strnegthen and consolidate the friendly relations between Ceylon and the People's Republic of China. Our relations with the Communist Party of China have always been warm and cordial. Even when we disagreed with specific political positions and actions of our Chinese comrades, we have never permitted this to impair the respect and regard in which we hold the Chinese Communist Party and its achievements.

For all these reasons, we deeply resent and condemn the open support and encouragement that the Chinese press and radio have given and continue to give to a small group of opportunists and renegades in their factional struggle against our Party.

This is not a question of "ideological differences" but gross interference in the internal affairs of a brother party, an impermissible violation of the norms that regulate relations between fraternal Marxist-Leninist parties.

Day in and day out, the Communists of Ceylon read and hear the pronouncements of our Chinese comrades about the "equality of all parties, big and small" and against big-power chauvinism. Is it any wonder that we feel deeply grieved and indignant at the support and encouragement that a big and powerful party like the Chinese Communist Party has given to attempts to split a young and small party like ours?

To judge from the statements in the Chiness press and radio, our Party's crime, in the eyes of the Chinese comrades, is the statement of our Central Committee of September 26, 1963, in which we upheld the agreed general line of the international Communist movement evolved at the 1957 and 1960 Meetings of fraternal parties, and expressed our disagreement with the attempts of the Chinese leaders, as witnessed by their letter of June 14, 1963, to the CPSU, to impose on the international Communist movement a unilateral "general line" of their own.

The Central Committee's statement of September 26 was the first public expression by our Party of any disagreement with the Communist Party of China. We had, of course, expressed disagreement with certain positions of the Chinese comrades at the 1960 Meeting of fraternal parties and in personal discussions with responsible representatives of that party. But we refrained from any public comment or polemics. It was only after the Chinese comrades openly challenged the general line of the 1960 Statement, to which our Party was also a signatory, that our Central Committee felt it necessary to make our own position clear in public.

We cannot accept that the September 26 Statement of our Central Committee is any reason for the open encouragement and support that the Chinese comrades have given to those who sought to split our Party. But in point of fact, we are well aware that long before September 26, 1963, the Chinese leaders had established special relations with opportunist and anti-party groups within our Party who, as was discovered subsequently, had conducted a systematic and planned campaign to split our Party.

In its struggle for a correct Marxist-Leninist policy for our country, the Ceylon Communist Party has had to wage a systematic and continuous struggle against both dogmatic "Leftist" and reformist "Rightist" deviations within our Party.

In August 1962 our Central Committee took a historic decision to initiate a campaign for a United Front of the Left parties on the basis of a common agreed program. The establishment of such a United Left Front would enable the working class to rally and lead all other progressive forces in the struggle to complete those tasks of the anti-imperialist, anti-feudal and democratic stage of the Ceylonese revolution which still remain unaccomplished. But when our Party began to implement this decision, representatives of both the "Left" and "Right" deviations in our Central Committee combined to oppose this. The main spokesmen of these two deviational trends were N. Sanmugathasan and P. Kumarasiri.

This period also coincided with the Caribbean crisis and the outbreak of hostilities on the Sino-Indian border. Our Party was not in agreement with several positions which the Chinese comrades adopted. We did not, however, express these disagreements publicly but concentrated on the positive presentation of our point of view.

It was in these circumstances that the opportunist groups within our Party, who had begun to take the path of anti-party factionalism, embraced the erroneous views that the Chinese comrades were publicly advocating in the internationalist Communist movement.

Without the knowledge of the Party, they set up a clandestine organization called the "Ceylon Marxist Study Circle", which was the nucleus of a rival party that they intended to form. Membership of this "circle" was confined to handpicked members of the Communist Party. A special committee was set up to guide the work of the "circle". A series of lectures were given to members of the "circle" by Sanmugathasan in which the leaders of our Party and other fraternal parties were slandered as revisionists and traitors and an attempt was made to create ideological cohesion among members of the "circle" on the basis of the special views advanced by the Chinese leaders.

The anti-party group also began at this time a surreptitious whispering campaign among Party members and workers, slandering the leadership of the Party and other fraternal paties, principally the CPSU. Special materials were sent from China and Albania. The anti-party group also intensified their opposition to the great campaign for a United Left Front, which was then in full swing, and earned the plaudits and support of the reactionary bourgeois press.

In July 1963, when our Party was celebrating its 20th anniversary, Sanmugathasan attempted another open sortie against the Party. He announced through the medium of the bourgeois press a public lecture on "Marxism-Leninism vs. Modern Revisionism". But he was once again forced to retreat when the Political Bureau ordered him to cancel the lecture and his attempt was condemned by the Party membership. He also withdrew a special article which he had submitted to the bourgeois newspapers without the knowledge or sanction of the Party.

Shortly afterwards, the Central Committee became aware of the existence of the "Ceylon Marxist Study Circle" and other parallel organizations that had been started by the anti-party group. When the Central Committee began to investigate these organizations, the anti-party group panicked and informed the Party that the "circle" had been dissolved.

The activities of Sanmugathasan and the anti-party group were subjected to severe criticism at the Central Committe meeting at the end of August 1963. In order to give them a final opportunity to take a correct path, the Central Committee decided to call an extended session to discuss the differences within the Party and the international Communist movement. This meeting of the Central Committee also decided to summon the 7th Party Congress in April 1964.

The attitude of the anti-party group to the extended session of the Central Committee showed clearly that they sought merely to delay decisions in order to gain time to perfect their practical preparations for a split. After the failure of an initial attempt to prevent the Central Committee from supporting the conclusion of the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, P. Kumarasiri absented himself from all further sittings. Sanmugathasan appeared only to make occasional statements denouncing the Central Committee and other fraternal parties. But none of these tactics could prevent the Central Committee from adopting by an overwhelming majority the statement of September 26, "On Questions of the International Communist Movement".

Although Sanmugathasan and his handful of supporters had the further opportunity to canvass their views during the pre-Congress inner-party discussion and at the 7th Congress itself, they preferred not to do so. Instead they rushed to the bourgeois press with statements denouncing the Central Committee and its decisions and attempted, without success, to organize a revolt in the Party against the Central Committee. Sanmugathasan and Kumarasiri were then served with specific charges of violations of the Party constitution and Rules and given an opportunity to appear before the Central Committee to answer them. They refused to avail themselves of this opportunity, issued statements to the bourgeois press justifying their anti-party factionalism, and were expelled from the Party.

Having failed to organize a revolt in the Party against the Central Committee, the anti-party group proceeded to put into operation the plans to split the Party which had been prepared earlier.

The attempts to set up a new "Communist party" were more elaborate and received the open support of the Chinese comrades.

The first step was to issue on October 27, 1963, a so-called public "reply" to the Central Committee's statement of September 26. Although this reply is said to have been signed by four out of the 25 full members of the Central Committee (including Sanmugathasan and Kumarasiri who had been expelled) and six out of the 10 alternate members, such a signed document was never presented to the Central Committee of the Party. Extracts from it were, however, published in the bourgeois press and the entire "reply" was quoted in full in the Chinese press and radio. It was reprinted in Peking Review (November 29) and Global Digest (January 1964).

The November 29 issue of Peking Review also carried a special article of its own entitled: "Protesting the Revisionist Leadership of the Ceylon Communist Party". This tendentious article, which is full of inaccuracies and mis-statements, glorifies Sanmugathasan, Kumarasiri and other splitters by name and seeks to interfere in the internal affairs of our Party. It describes the disciplinary action taken against Sanmugathasan and Kumarasisi as "unwarranted", accusing the Party leadership of "manipulating" the CC statement of September 26 and brands them as revisionists "parrotting the tone of the CPSU leaders".

It is worth noting that, in all these events, the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party never cared to ascertain from our Central Committee what the real position and facts were.

The next step of the anti-party splitters was to hold a secret meeting on November 17, 1963. Eighty-five persons were present, including persons who were not members of the Communist Party and persons who had been expelled from the Party at various times for factional activities. P. Kumarasiri made the main report where he stressed the need to set up a new party. Sanmugathasan gave a report on the organizational steps that should be undertaken. The meeting issued an appeal addressed, "To All Marxist-Leninists Inside the Ceylon Communist Party". The substance of this appeal was to split the Party and set up a parallel "Communist Party".

This appeal for a split of our Party was also given wide publicity in the Chinese press and radio. It was reprinted in full by Peking Review (December 13), together with a report of the meeting.

In the face of this open call for a split, the Central Committee and the membership of the Party rallied to protect the unity of the Party. The Central Committee called district meetings of all members of the Party where the record, conduct and aims of the anti-party splitters were exposed. These district meetings of Party members passed resolutions condemning the splitters and supporting the actions taken against them by the Central Committee. The Central Committee expelled those members who had joined with the anti-party group and the Party branches took action to remove the others from membership of the Party.

The Central Committee of the Federation of Communist and Progressive Youth Leagues of Ceylon took similar action to rally the communist youth in support of the Party and against the splitters.

Our Party did not confine our struggle against the splitters to the members of the Party and the youth leagues. We took the issue to the masses, especially the working class. We organized many discussions and public lectures and innumerable meetings at factory gates and workplaces where the aims of the splitters were exposed concretely in relation to their actual disruption of the mass movement in Ceylon.

The anti-party group led by Sanmugathasan suffered a big and rapid defeat in the trade unions as well.

Workers in factory after factory and in innumerable plantations and other workplaces held meetings of protest, condemning Sanmugathasan and his co-conspirators and affirming their support for the Communist Party and the United Left Front.

As a result, when the anti-party splitters held their so-called "7th Congress" in January 1964 and set up their split-away, parallel "party", they cut no ice among the working people. Even the reactionary bourgeois press, which had earlier given these splitters tremendous encouragement and support, felt that they were backing a losing cause. In point of fact, this so-called "7th Congress" of the splitters received more attention in China than it did in Ceylon.

The struggle against the anti-party splitters' group, who would long ago have disappeared altogether from the political scene were it not for the support they receive from China and from domestic reactionary circles, continues and registers new victories every day. The special sessions of the Ceylon Federation of Trade Unions on March 6 and 7, 1964 and the real 7th Congress of the Ceylon Communist Party on April 16-19, 1964 will be further landmarks in this struggle.

The Chinese press and radio have sought to depict the anti-party splitters' group as "genuine revolutionaries" and "heroic fighters" for Marxist-Leninist principles. But the Ceylonese Communists are well aware of the histories of the persons concerned and their despicable methods.

How can Ceylonese Communists take seriously the claim of this unprincipled gang to be considered as "genuine revolutionaries" when we know that Kumarasiri, the "general secretary" of the new "Party", was one of the main spokesmen in our Party for a reactionary policy of class collaboration and subordination of the Party to the national bourgeoisie, a man who used to boast openly that he had opposed all strikes and mass struggles since 1956? Do the Chinese leaders expect any Ceylonese Communist to regard D. Jinendrapala, the "Assistant National Organizer" of the new "party", as a "heroic fighter" when we all know that he decided to become a "genuine Marxist-Leninist" only after a Party commission had found him guilty of financial irregularities? It seems to us that the Chinese comrades do not mind what stick they pick up to beat those who do not agree with them.

The neo-Trotskyite positions of the anti-party group are also extremely striking. They prate about the "return to capitalism" in the U.S.S.R. and other familiar Trotskyite slanders.

In the history of our movement, anti-communism and anti-Sovietism, operating under Trotskyite slogans, was used to split the united left movement in 1940. Since then our Party has waged a long and successful struggle to defeat anti-communism and anti-Sovietism as a basis of reuniting the left movement. The formation of the United Left Front in August 1963 was a signal victory in this struggle. And it is just when the unity of the Left movement has again been established that this renegade groupe once again seeks to split the movement, operating under neo-Trotskyite slogans.

Indeed, it is a striking feature of the political situation in Ceylon that many of the erroneous political positions of the Chinese comrades have become a common weapon of factional groups in all Left parties of the country.

In the fight against the splitters and their supporters, our Party has acquired many useful experiences. Our experience has confirmed Lenin's teachings that dogmatic ultra-leftism mainly attracts the petit-bourgeoisie and has little or no support among the workers. We have seen in practice how the Left-deviators and the Right-capitulationists feed each other and unite. We have seen the connections between dogmatism and opportunism.

Another important lesson that we have learnt is the need to pay great attention to the social composition of the membership of the Party, to strengthen continuously membership from among the working class. This is especially so in countries like ours where petty-commodity production and semi-feudal relations are strong.

In conducting the struggle against splittism, our experience has shown that it is necessary to wage an offensive struggle and not submit to the blackmail of the splitters, to expose the real aims of the splitters to the widest masses, to show them what dogmatic and splitting policies mean in practice for their own struggles. We have also learnt that a successful struggle against splittism should be linked with the struggle to build the widest unity of the masses in the fight for their vital interests.

The anti-party group and their supporters hoped to weaken our Party. But the opposite has happened in practice. The Party has been strengthened by purging itself of opportunist and corrupt elements and in the mass fight against the splitters our ties with the working class and the broad masses have also been greatly strengthened.

REPORT AT 17TH CONGRESS, COMMUNIST PARTY OF LUXEMBOURG*

(Abridged)

D. Urbany

Our last congress met during the Christmas holidays in 1960. Since then there has been no change of government, although in some respects the situation with which they, and, for that matter, we, have to reckon is no longer what it was then.

The disillusionment of the population in general with the policy of the Christian-Liberal coalition, which has proved insolvent, reactionary and clearly pro-capitalist, is perhaps even greater than its disillusionment with the militarist and anti-communist policy of the preceding Christian-Socialist coalition.

This disillusionment stems from the developments underway throughout the world and in our own country, developments which are asserting themselves more and more and can hardly be welcomed by our reactionary "European" circles. The cold-war climate, to which the anti-popular activities of the reactionary forces in the Western countries were geared for years, is being slowly but steadily dispelled. The consistent peace policy pursued by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries is bearing fruit. The idea of peaceful coexistence is reaching ever broader sections of the people in the capitalist world. The growing difficulties and controversies in the NATO camp, the signal successes of the movement for independence in the former colonial and semi-colonial countries, the steady growth of the economic and political strength of the socialist camp and especially the Soviet Union, and the progress made by the Communist, democratic and peace-loving forces in the capitalist countries– all this is increasingly undermining the influence and weight of the warmongers and ultras generally in our countries, tying their hands and forcing the reactionary monopoly capitalists and their placemen in the governments to resort to all manner of defensive manoeuvres and compromises.

The eradication of the personality cult and other non-democratic and non-Marxist Stalinist deviations in the Soviet Union and the overwhelming majority of the Communist parties, including the Communist Party of Luxembourg, the restoration of the principles and precepts of Marxism-Leninism, all of which is aimed at ensuring peace and uniting all the progressive and anti-imperialist forces against our main enemy — monopoly capital — have given new strength to the world Communist movement and the peace movement. This augurs new victories for socialism and the common emancipation movement of the peoples.

ON THE CORRECT PATH

There is no doubt that our Party owes its successes to its loyal adherence to the decisions of the Moscow meetings of the Communist parties and to the fact that it drew the right conclusions from the lessons of 20th Congress of the CPSU for our Party work in general and our inner-party life in particular.

Today we stand in closer unity than ever with the great Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the overwhelming majority of the Communist parties of the world in support of the Marxist-Leninist thesis that the dynamics of the balance of forces in the world generally and in the Western capitalist countries in particular create a real possibility of preventing a new world war, a nuclear clash between East and West which would spell death and destruction for many countries and nations, and especially for our small country; that it is possible not only to ensure peaceful coexistence and peaceful competition between the two systems but also to create through them more favorable conditions for the world-wide victory of socialism; that the defense of peace is the most pressing and important task of the day. Because of this we support the initiatives of the Soviet Union in this direction, for example, the Moscow test-ban treaty, and resolutely reject the adventuristic policy of the Chinese Communists which is aimed at sabotaging this policy of peace. We also subscribe to the conclusion that the ways leading to socialism may differ, that the struggle of the working class and the peoples cannot be fitted into the same stereotyped pattern everywhere, and that, due to their specific conditions, the possibility of transition to socialism without civil war is present or maturing in some countries. This applies also to our country, to our people, who have deep-seated democratic and parliamentary traditions. The working class constitutes the majority of our population. Our working people are in a position to foil any attempt by our reactionaries to resort to dictatorship and terror; they are in a position to implement by democratic means measures putting an end to the rule of monopoly capital and leading to socialism. All this, of course, will not happen of itself; the way to this lies through bitter and unceasing social and political clashes with big capital, with the reactionaries.

The leading role in this process belong to the working class. But success can be achieved only in cooperation with the other sections of the working people and their organizations, through joint action by all progressive and forward-looking parties, primarily the Communists and Socialists. Hence we hold that the one-party system and one-party government are not necessarily prerequisites of socialism and working-class rule.

SECTARIANS AND ADVENTURISTS HAVE NO FUTURE

Our views are diametrically opposed to the interpretations given by the leadership of the Communist Party of China to the decisions of the Moscow meetings, interpretations which bear more and more unmistakably the stamp of chauvinism and political adventurism.

It is regrettable that leading Chinese Communists are conducting what they claim to be an ideological polemic with the other Communist parties on these questions by totally non-Marxist and undemocratic methods aimed at splitting the world Communist movement. They have begun openly and provocatively to undermine the solidarity of the socialist camp, viciously attacking the Soviet Union and organizing subversive factional activities in the other Communist parties.

Such attempts have been made in our country too, though with negligible results. Only one comrade has found it fit to circulate the propaganda materials of the Chinese Party. So long as this was a matter of propaganda about construction, cultural and other endeavors in China there was nothing reprehensible in it, for we remain the friends of the Chinese people. But for some time now these journals, pamphlets and bulletins have contained increasingly malicious and slanderous articles against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and other Communist parties, voicing views completely at variance with the political line of our Party. More, the above-mentioned comrade has latterly gone over to spreading vicious accusations against individual comrades in the Party leadership and sabotaging our Party work. Suffice it to mention one example of his subversive activity. You know how difficult it is for us to put up 27 candidates in the capital. But when he was asked to run in the elections on our ticket, he not only refused but tried to persuade other comrades to refuse in the hope of being able to prevent our Party from scoring an electoral success in the capital. These speculations — his and our opponents completely failed.

Needless to say, such factional activity causing damage to the Party cannot be tolerated in a Communist Party. We must do everything in our power to ensure the unity and solidarity of our Party. In view of this our Central Committee, at its meeting held on March 2, in Esch, unanimously expelled this comrade from the Party for "persistent gross violation of the line and rules of our Party".

Expulsion of comrades who have turned into open enemies of the Party is, of course, not enough. It is necessary to make sure that our comrades, our Party and the people are absolutely clear on all the problems arising from the dogmatic and disruptive activities of the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party. Therefore we join with other parties in welcoming the fact that the idea of another international meeting is close to realization; we feel that it should not be put off. We likewise welcome the publication of the report by M. A. Suslov on "The Struggle of the CPSU for the Unity of the World Communist Movement". We are in full agreement with the conclusions of this report which refute the groundless theories of the Chinese Party leaders and expose their true motives which run counter to the interests of the international Communist movement.

THE WAY TO SOCIALISM IN CONDITIONS OF PEACE, FREEDOM, DEMOCRACY AND NATIONAL INDEPENDENCE

STATEMENT OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF LUXEMBOURG ADOPTED UNANIMOUSLY AT THE 17th CONGRESS OF THE CPL IN DIFFERDINGEN ON APRIL 5, 1964*

The Communist Party of Luxembourg, founded on January 2, 1921, considers its aim to be the replacement in Luxembourg of the existing capitalist society by socialist society. It is a Marxist-Leninist Party, its program, activity and organization being founded on the principles of scientific socialism elaborated by Marx and Engels and developed by Lenin.

Marxism-Leninism holds:

1. that the capitalist system, owing to its inherent and insurmountable contradictions, especially since the time when it reached the stage of imperialism (monopoly rule), has chained human progress (the unleashing of the two world wars, the establishment of fascist dictatorships, colonial and national oppression, chronic mass unemployment, malnutrition of a half of the world's population, periodic and disastrous economic crises, the wasting of the national income for the arms race and war preparations, the constant generation of new sources of war danger, etc.) and that therefore the abolition of this obsolete system and its replacement by socialism, i.e., the transformation of capitalist private ownership of the basic means of production (mines, factories, banks) into state and people's owner ship, has become a pressing historical necessity. Socialism alone can ensure the full utilization of modern productive forces and their further development and planned organization on an international and world-wide scale, and thereby guarantee forever social security, peace, freedom, a decent life and cultural development to the whole of mankind. The victorious socialist construction in the Soviet Union and other socialist countries proves that socialism, as a socio-economic system, is not only possible but is superior to capitalism;

2. that capitalism does not automatically grow over into socialism, but that the working class in alliance with other sections of the working population should win political (state) power in order gradually to transform the capitalist means of production into public (commonly-owned) property and replace the capitalist economy based on profit-seeking by a socialist planned economy which will meet man's requirements, and that therefore it is the imperative task of the working class in each country to build a strong, purposeful and disciplined party which leads the masses in the struggle for state power. The Communist Party of Luxembourg is this type of party. It unites in its ranks the more forward-looking workers, intellectuals, peasants, representatives of the middle sections, etc., who are prepared to fight for socialism.

True to the principles of Marxism-Leninism, brilliantly confirmed by history, the Communist Party of Luxembourg rejects all forms of revisionism and dogmatism.

Revisionism, represented mainly by the Right-wing leaders of the Socialist parties, denies the true nature of monopoly capitalism ("people's capitalism") and the trends of its development, and is seeking to replace the class struggle by conciliation with monopoly capitalism ("social partnership") with a view to preserving the existing state of affairs and limiting the demands of the working class to purely economic objectives. It turns the working people into an appendage drifting in the backwash of monopoly capitalism and its international economic, political and military bodies (European Coal and Steel Community, NATO, etc.).

Dogmatism, on the contrary, denies the need always to take cognizance of the advance of science and the march of history, and always to bring the theory and practice of the working-class movement in line with the changed conditions. Ostensibly revolutionary, dogmatism, in the shape in which it is today practiced by the leaders of the Communist Party of China, isolates the Party from the masses and creates the danger of sectarianism and political adventurism.

The changes, which have occurred in recent years in the balance of forces between socialism and capitalism, have enriched the theory and practice of the Marxist-Leninist working-class movement with new experience and new conclusions. The socialist system has become firmly and completely established in one-third of the world with a population of a thousand million people, which was largely due to the successes of socialist construction in the Soviet Union. Socialism is increasingly becoming the determining factor of world politics. Today it possesses such economic, political, military and moral power that there exists the real possibility to prevent imperialism from unleashing another world war and impose upon capitalism peaceful competition with socialism. Preservation of world peace and the state of peaceful coexistence and competition, due mainly to the growing prestige and superiority of socialism, create new, more favourable conditions both for the struggle of the working class of the capitalist countries and for the struggle of the oppressed peoples. For this reason it will be possible to achieve socialism without a violent revolution and civil war in many countries, especially those with a strong working class and developed democratic traditions. The Communist Party of Luxembourg is confident that this is also possible in our country.

The Communist Party of Luxembourg is a democratic party. It is working to win over the majority of the people through propaganda and persuasion, and mainly by selflessly upholding all the demands of the people and the country. In view of the fact that our people have rich democratic and parliamentary traditions, the democratic-parliamentary form of the state in Luxembourg can be the suitable foundation on which the working class will come to power and build socialism. The condition of this bloodless road to socialism is the close alliance of all working classes and sections under the leadership of the proletariat, the combination of the parliamentary and extra-parliamentary forms of struggle, and firm determination on the part of the people to nip in the bud all reactionary attempts to curb or abolish democracy and to resist socialist legality with either force or sabotage. The democratic road to socialism, too, lies through constant and bitter social and political struggles against the forces of the old, moribund system. The existing democratic institutions, rights and liberties must be extended, improved and developed already today. Parliament must become a truly sovereign legislative and executive organ of the people.

The Communist Party of Luxembourg is a national party. Both today, in the conditions of capitalism, and in the future socialist society it comes out for the preservation of complete national sovereignty, acting on the principle: "Luxembourg for the Luxembourgians". National sovereignty is the foundation on which the people of Luxembourg will build a socialist system and will regulate, freely and independently, their relations with other states on the basis of equality and fraternal cooperation.

The Communist Party of Luxembourg is at the same time a party of proletarian internationalism. It is free and independent in adopting decisions concerning its own activity and its own program, but it is conducting its struggle in friendly contact with the Communists and working people, democrats and peace supporters of all countries, true to the slogan formulated in the Communist Manifesto in 1848: "Workers of All Lands, Unite!" The Communist Party of Luxembourg is working tirelessly for the preservation of the unity of the world Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and the decisions jointly adopted by the Communist and Workers' parties. This international friendship, particularly with the Soviet Union, is the best guarantee of our security and national co-operation in building socialism in our country and securing world peace. Hence the national and international positions of our Party complement and condition each other. Our Party rejects all forms and manifestations of national chauvinism and racialism. It expresses its complete solidarity with the peoples who are still fighting against the colonial and semi-colonial yoke and against fascist and racial oppression.

In the spirit of the principles of Marxism-Leninism generally and the decisions of the 1960 Moscow Meetings of the 81 Communist and Workers' parties, which it helped actively to draft and which it approved, the Communist Party of Luxembourg is following its own road to socialism, a road which corresponds to the experience and traditions of the people of Luxembourg and the conditions obtaining in the country. This means, in particular, that:

1. The Communist Party of Luxembourg is working perseveringly for the restoration of the political and trade-union unity of the Luxembourg working class, realizing, however, that this unity cannot be achieved by any artificial, and still less by dictatorial, means, and that it must develop from the experience and voluntary decision of the workers themselves. It is quite possible that the building and victory of socialism will be achieved in fraternal union between the Communist Party and the other parties and organizations of the working class and the small and medium producers. Therefore the Communist Party rejects the idea of a one-party system and one-party state in Luxembourg because it is convinced that this idea does not correspond to the conditions and traditions in Luxembourg.

2. The small and medium producers (peasants, wine-growers, handicraftsmen, small and medium manufacturers) are still playing an important and useful role in the economic life of our country, and will continue to perform it under socialism. The Communist Party comes out in defense, and for assisting, the individual or family enterprise founded on the personal labor of its owner, and also in defense and for the right of inheritance of private property acquired by labor and personal savings. The transition of the small and medium-sized enterprises to a higher form of co-operative property can take place only on the basis of their good will and material advantage.

3.The Communists respect the religious feelings of their compatriots. They stand for the freedom of religious and other conscientious activity, in the spirit of tolerance and mutual respect, as well as for the freedom of scientific research and creative endeavour.

Socialism means neither rigorism nor anarchy. For the people of Luxembourg it will create the material prerequisites for free development of the abilities and talents of man, for higher social ethics which will no longer be founded on the exploitation of man by man, but will proceed from the premise that labor is a source not of enrichment for the few but of prosperity and a better, truly human life for all. Thanks to the unprecedented increase of labor productivity achieved with the help of the socialist organization of the economy and science, humanity will advance from socialism to communist society where there will be no material worries, with the working time reduced to the minimum and the last armaments dumped into the sea, where the peoples of the world will live in one close-knit family and where state coercion will wither away. It is only with the advent of communism that the true history of mankind will have begun. To be a member of the Communist Party of Luxembourg, whose program rests on the ideas of the greatest thinkers of all mankind and on the experience of the heroic battles of the international working class, a program which at once absorbs and furthers the finest national and democratic traditions of our people, is both an honour and obligation for each class-conscious worker, each progressive and, last but not least, for each intellectual who is aware of his responsibility to this country.

Never losing sight of its great ultimate aim, the Party is persistently and perseveringly upholding the immediate demands and interests of the working people, the satisfaction of all their material, social and cultural needs. In so doing, it centres its attention on those demands and reforms which can create the best conditions for the advance to socialism: the preservation of peace and our independence, complete restoration of our national sovereignty, extension of the political, trade-union and economic rights of the working people, curbing the power of Big Business, the right of the working people to control and have a say in the management of the enterprises, in the economy and the state, and the building of the broad united front of all social, democratic and national forces, regardless of party affiliation and world outlook, against the main enemy of the people of Luxembourg as represented by international monopoly capital.

Each Communist is duty bound to uphold in the day-to-day struggle the demands, both big and small, advanced by the working people and their organizations (trade unions, etc.) and be active and exemplary in other progressive mass organizations, while respecting their particular status and discipline.

FOR UNITY OF THE COMMUNIST MOVEMENT AND THE SOCIALIST CAMP

A TRIBUNA LUDU EDITORIAL

Comrade M. A. Suslov's report to the February Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU, made public a few days ago, is an immensely important document. The response to it was world-wide, especially among the Communist and Workers' parties. The report makes an exhaustive examination of the substance of the differences between the Communist Party of China, on the one hand, and the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and other Marxist-Leninist parties, on the other.

The CPC leaders have ignored the repeated appeals of the CPSU, of our Party and many other Communist parties to end the public polemics. Their endless, increasingly sharp and unusually rude attacks on the policy and ideological positions of the CPSU and the Soviet government have put the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in a position where it was forced to publish materials demonstrating the substance of the differences in the world Communist movement.

The Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee of the CPSU levelled strong criticism at the irresponsible conduct of the CPC leaders. It approved the stand of the Presidium of the CC and of Comrade N. S. Khrushchov, and instructed the Presidium of the CC to preserve in upholding the general line of the world Communist movement and to work for the strengthening of the unity of the revolutionary forces.

At their Meetings in 1957 and 1960, the Communist and Workers' parties worked out a common general line of struggle for peace, socialism and the freedom of the peoples. They also worked out the principles of co-operation and solidarity that unite all the Marxist-Leninist parties. This line, jointly framed in the Declaration and Statement of the Moscow Meetings, is being consistently followed by the world Communist movement. The Polish United Workers' Party, too, takes guidance from it in all its activities. In the meantime, throughout the past few years, the CPC departed more and more from this jointly elaborated platform, attacked the policy of the CPSU and other Leninist parties with increasing ferocity, and worked out its own, special course of action.

The CPC leaders assaulted the basic idea of the 20th Congress of the CPSU, which revealed to mankind the possibility of avoiding a military disaster in our epoch and became the cornerstone in the restoration of the Leninist principles governing relations between Communist parties and socialist states. The CPC leaders attacked the jointly framed foundations of Marxist-Leninist theory, strategy and tactics on the questions of war and peace, on the peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems, on the national-liberation movement, on socialist democracy, on trends of development for the socialist countries, on the unity of the world Communist and working-class movement, and on a number of other problems.

The CPC launched out on a campaign, accusing the CPSU and some other parties of revisionism, loss of revolutionary perspective, treason and surrender to imperialism, and flirting with imperialism.

Time and again, our Party made clear its critical attitude to the CPC line, and its complete solidarity with the ideological position of the CPSU and the foreign policy of the USSR. At this crucial juncture, too, our Party reaffirms this solidarity most emphatically.

Our Party fully shares the opinion that the most important task of the working-class movement and the socialist camp at the present time is to avert a thermonuclear war and that in view of the contemporary relation of world forces there exists a possibility of preventing a world war even before the final victory of socialism, and that the Leninist principles of peaceful coexistence constitutes, and must constitute, the underlying principle of the foreign policy of the socialist states in their relations with the capitalist countries.

Our Party rejects as unfounded and inconsistent with historical experience, the contention that contradictions exist between the struggle for peace and the struggle for socialism and national liberation. Far from retarding and complicating the class and national-liberation struggles, the struggle for peace helps to develop them more widely and effectively, and creates favorable conditions for their victory. The peace banner held aloft by the socialist forces unites the masses and rallies them to the struggle against the aggressive forces of imperialism and reaction.

Ending the arms drive and effecting partial agreements that may facilitate an early general and complete disarmament, is a composite part of the policy of peaceful coexistence. We reject the view disseminated by the Chinese leaders that disarmament is an illusory slogan that only misleads the people. If we were to abandon the struggle against the arms drive, we would only be grinding the imperialist axe, for it is the imperialists who are organizing and expanding the armaments race.

Our Party considers the efforts to achieve reasonable compromises with the capitalist countries in behalf of peace and a relaxation of tension to be correct and consistent with the interests of socialism. We hailed the Moscow Treaty on the partial banning of nuclear tests. Furthermore, we reject as groundless, the attacks made on the CPSU and the Soviet government for their striving to improve relations with the United States, seeing that such an improvement has a fundamental bearing on the relaxation of international tension.

Their aggressive criticism by no means deters the CPC leaders from seeking compromise and agreement with imperialist countries whenever this involves China's immediate political interests, and they have no scruples about the way they do it.

By subordinating ideology to their current foreign-policy aims, they have lately created a theory about a so-called intermediate (non-imperialist) zone, in which, along with the newly-free countires, they include such lands of monopoly capital as France, Britain, Japan and the Federal Republic of Germany.

At the present time the struggle for socialism depends largely on the outcome of the competition between the two systems. In the final analysis, the peoples will choose the social system ensuring them a rapid rate of economic growth, a higher living standard, and enduring peace. The economic achievements of the socialist countries serve to stimulate the working-class struggle in the capitalist countries and the struggle of the peoples for complete liberation from colonial and neo-colonialist domination.

It is only by the common efforts of the world socialist system, the working-class movement and the national-liberation movement that we can achieve victory over imperialism, and, to be sure, the chief place in this struggle falls to the world socialist system. This is the reason why our Party opposes the policy of the Chinese leaders who are seeking to counterpose the national-liberation movement to the socialist system and to the working-class movement in the capitalist countries.

The socialist countries consider it their duty not only to support the peoples fighting against imperialism, but also to develop economic co-operation with the newly-independent countries and to give them every kind of fraternal assistance to consolidate their independence and self-sufficiency.

It is the main purpose of socialist construction to secure an all-round development of the productive forces and an improvement in the living conditions of the working people. The Chinese leaders, on the other hand, consider the efforts to continuously improve living conditions as a "petty-bourgeois" departure, or even as "restoration of capitalism" in the USSR and other socialist countries. The accusation that the CPSU is restoring capitalism in the Soviet Union is to be classed under the same head as the accusation once made by Professor Revilo Oliviera (of the notorious John Birch Society) that President Kennedy and the American government were conspiring to surrender the United States to international communism.

Our Party considers the development mapped out by the CPSU in its Program and approved by the 22nd Congress, to be entirely correct. Also, our Party supports the struggle which the CPSU has been waging ever since the 20th Congress against the personality cult and for the development of socialist democracy. A society in which violence is idealized and democracy restricted, in which the personality cult flourishes and the needs of the masses are ignored, cannot be a model of socialist society.

As in the aforesaid questions, which are of fundamental import for the strategy and tactics of the socialist countries and the working-class movement, the CPC is departing more and more from the jointly framed positions and slipping to positions of sectarianism and dogmatism in many other important problems. This is evidenced by the large number of articles written in a coarse tongue and insufferable in the relations between Communist parties and socialist countries. This applies particularly to the attacks on the CPSU leadership, on Comrade N. S. Khrushchov.

Our Party has come out strongly for the ending of public polemics, which it believes to be extremely injurious to the socialist camp, to all the Communist parties, and to the forces of progress and socialism throughout the world. These polemics are a violation of the fundamental principle set forth in the 1960 Statement, which requires that all Communist and Workers' parties act in solidarity and unity with regard to imperialism, that the socialist countries carry through the jointly adopted foreign policy, and that the Communist parties pursue their jointly framed strategy.

Each Party handles its domestic problems on the basis of Marxist-Leninist principles in conformance with the conditions and requirements of its country, and is responsible first and foremost to its own working class and its people. At the same time, each Party is responsible to the world Communist movement as a whole for the common cause of socialism and peace. No party should oppose the narrowly-conceived interests of its own country to the interests of the socialist community of peoples, and of the Communist movement as a whole. A policy that under-rates historical and common interests and over-rates narrowly-conceived goals and transient interests, tends to weaken the world positions of the Communist movement and jeopardizes the vital interests of each socialist country.

The CPC leaders have gone against these principles. Not only have they turned down the proposals to end the polemics, but have, under the pretext of struggle with so-called modern revisionism, set out to create factions and groups in individual Communist parties and taken action to disrupt the unity of the world Communist movement. That sort of activity calls for the most severe and determined condemnation, since it is aimed against the unity of the basic forces of the world anti-imperialist front, the socialist camp, the international working-class movement and the national-liberation movement.

The CPC leaders have also embarked on disruptive activities in the international organizations of the peace movement, and in trade union, youth, women's and other democratic bodies. The practical steps of the CPC leaders, who are turning these organizations into a battlefield against other Communist parties, are extremely harmful. This, in effect, narrows the possibilities of democratic world organizations.

The unity of the international working-class movement and of the socialist camp is very greatly imperilled. Unity of our movement and cohesion of the socialist countries is one of the basic sources of our strength and the position we now hold in the world. This unity has always been, and remains, an essential condition for the solution of the basic problems of peace, of the victory of socialism and of the national liberation of the oppressed peoples. It is the common duty of the socialist countries and Communist parties to cement this unity in every way and in all fields. None but the imperialists can gain from a deterioration or disruption of this unity.

Today practically all the centres of the imperialist world are making capital out of the differences in our movement. They hope that these differences will retard the revolutionary process in the world, and suit their actions to this goal. It is the duty of all the Communist parties and all revolutionary forces to come out against this danger and to do their utmost to cement the world Communist movement on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. Particularly great harm is done by irresponsible charges of treason, capitulation, flirting with imperialism, and by all other attempts at "excommunicating" the Marxist parties.

That the working-class movement has a common historical goal constitutes an enduring foundation for its unity. It is essential to work out, through mutual consultation such principles of policy as would guarantee joint action and solidarity on issues of crucial importance for the whole of our movement, with full observance of the equality and independence of individual parties and socialist countries.

International unity of the Communist movement, which is the source of its strength and influence in the world, must be restored and strengthened through adherence to Leninist principles. In common with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and other fraternal Communist and Workers' parties, our Party will work tirelessly for the solidarity of the world Communist movement and the unity of the socialist community of nations.

WE EMPHATICALLY CONDEMN THE ANTI-MARXIST POLICY OF THE CPC LEADERSHIP

*Speech by A. Novotny

Our Party is following with grave concern the policy of the leadership of the Communist Party of China and the Government of the Chinese People's Republic, which in the past four years has been sharply at variance with the norms governing relations between fraternal parties and the conclusions set forth in the Declaration and Statement of the Moscow Meetings of Communist and Workers' parties in 1957 and 1960. The situation has lately sharply deteriorated when in their speeches, statements, official articles and propaganda by radio as well as through the activity of diplomatic representatives the leaders of the Communist Party of China began openly striking at the international unity of the Communist movement with the object of sowing discord and splitting its ranks.

Numerous facts show that the leadership of the Communist Party of China is openly seeking to split some Communist Parties in Asia, Latin America and Europe and supporting the anti-Party splinter groups in them which threaten and undermine the political unity of these parties and their unity of action in the struggle against imperialism.

The attacks of the CPC leadership are spearheaded mainly against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and its Leninist leadership, whom Chinese propaganda is calling "revisionist" and a "sworn enemy" of the revolutionary Communist movement. With unheard-of impudence it accuses the CPSU and the Soviet Union of "brotherhood-in-arms" with the U.S. imperialists. This is alleged because the Soviet Union has signed the partial test-ban treaty, which in the distorted view of the Chinese leaders is some sort of "conspiracy against all countries" and, according to their fantastic notions, the outcome of a situation where allegedly "capitalist forces" are beginning to speak out in the Soviet Union.

They say the same about other socialist countries, where the high living standard is allegedly pushing the policy of the Communist parties away from class positions. On February 4, 1964, Jenminjihpao, the central organ of the Communist Party of China, demanded a split in the Communist movement, and the monstrous accusations and insults that it hurled against the CC, CPSU and the Soviet Government have had no parallel in the history of the Communist movement since the attacks made by Trotsky against Lenin and the Leninist policy of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in the twenties.

It is not without interest to note that when they began their talks with the de Gaulle Government, the CPC leaders, who love to boast of their "revolutionary" Communist principles, suddenly retreated from these principles. Naturally, we welcome the establishment of diplomatic relations between France and China because it signifies progress in the development of peaceful relations between countries and upsets the U.S.A.'s reactionary and absolutely unrealistic and senseless concept of China's international isolation.

However, the way this is handled by Chinese propaganda evokes nothing but surprise. Early last year the Chinese leaders vigorously attacked the French comrades, accusing them of slackly struggling against the imperialist and colonialist policy of the de Gaulle Government. But on January 21, 1964, following the establishment of diplomatic relations, the Jenminjihpao unhesitatingly associated de Gaullist France with the anti-imperialist front of all countries and excluded from it the Soviet Union and other socialist countries for having principled reservations with regard to the non-Leninist views of the Chinese leaders. At the same time, using some of the statements of the British Prime Minister Douglas Home and the West-German Chancellor Erhard directed against the U.S.A., the newspaper made it understood that these imperialist powers can play the role of an anti-U.S. force.

There even are signs at present that in the future it will supposedly be possible to count on a London-Paris-Peking-Tokyo line directed against both the U.S. and the Soviet Union. These reports are being circulated, nobody in China is denying them and it seems that they are not distasteful to the Chinese leaders.

As we all know, the CPSU, our Party and other fraternal parties occupied a restrained positions with regard to the attacks of the CPC leadership and in the autumn of last year repeatedly called upon the Chinese leaders to stop open polemics. Recently the CC, CPSU took the initiative in proposing to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China a number of measures aimed at expanding economic and trade co-operation and ensuring unity of action in international democratic organizations and at talks on important international issues. But all this was ignored despite the fact that the CC, CPSU and the other fraternal parties that supported this initiative of the Soviet comrades took this step in the expectation that in the interests of the unity of the international Communist movement the Chinese leaders would stop their attacks and deprive the imperialists of further opportunities of utilizing the differences between the Chinese Communists and the international Communist movement for their own purpose. Regretfully, this did not happen. On the contrary, the Chinese leaders have lately become even more vehement in their attacks.

As you all know, the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union sat in plenary session early in February and, among other things, discussed the attacks of the CPC leaders against the leadership of the CPSU and the over-all activities of the Chinese leaders aimed at splitting the unity of the international Communist movement. A report, which was published a few days ago, was made by Comrade Suslov.

Our Party's Central Committee is in full agreement with the analysis made by the CC, CPSU, which gave an accurate and objective assessment of the harmful and adventurist policy that the Chinese leaders are aspiring to impose upon the international Communist movement to replace the Leninist platform that was approved in the documents of the international Meetings of the Communist and Workers' parties in Moscow in 1957 and 1960. We fully subscribe to the criticism levelled by the CC, CPSU at the profoundly erroneous views of the Chinese leaders and their factional activity in the Communist movement. We endorse the efforts the CPSU is making to strengthen the international unity of all Marxist-Leninist parties and surmount the differences between the CPC and the international Communist movement.

We declare that this stand of the CC, CPSU fully concurs with the stand taken by our Party, and we consider that it is the only correct policy and that it harmonizes with the principles of Leninist tactics and strategy, with the interests of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. We consider that it promotes the further unity and solidarity of the international working-class movement in complete conformity with the conclusions of the Declaration and Statement of the Moscow Meetings of 1957 and 1960.

A public statement on the position with regard to the moves of the Chinese leaders was inevitable and necessary because in the past few weeks they have not only rejected all proposals for stopping open polemics but also gave full rein to their splitting activities. Further testimony of the fact that the CPC leadership is steering towards a split in the unity of the international Communist movement is contained in an article carried by the Jenminjihpao on March 31, 1964. In addition to venomously attacking the CPSU, the newspaper slanders our Party and grossly distorts the policy it has been following since 1945. This newspaper misrepresents the course of events in our country, trying to prove that in February 1948 the working class seized power not by peaceful means but by force. Regretfully, in the past 16 years the same slander has been spread about our February events by reactionary imperialist propaganda. It goes without saying that we shall give the Chinese leaders a fitting reply to this lie whenever we find it necessary. Moreover, we shall give our principled judgment of the demand, formulated openly for the first time by the Chinese leaders, who consider it necessary to change the wording of the Moscow Statement on the ways of transition to socialism and revise its "weak points and mistakes".

At the same time, in the past few weeks the Chinese leaders have stepped up their splitting activity at meetings of international democratic organizations. This is shown by their actions at the recent sittings of the executive bodies of the World Student Union in Budapest, the World Peace Council in Warsaw, the World Federation of Trade Unions in Sofia and at the meeting of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organization in Algiers.

In the interests of the international unity of the Communist movement it is therefore necessary to wage a determined struggle in defense of its Leninist policy, and the Chinese leaders must be given to understand that the majority of fraternal parties condemn their perniciously harmful policy and that any rapprochement is possible only on the condition that they recognize and observe the principles and conclusions recorded in the documents of the Meetings of representatives of 81 Communist and Workers' parties in 1960. This is the only way a rebuff can be given to the Trotskyite, sectarian aspirations of the CPC leaders to isolate the Soviet Union and the socialist countries from the national liberation movement, and their attempts to place the internationalist policy of the Soviet Union on the same level as the imperialist policy of the United States of America and to tie up a split in the Communist movement with their claims that Peking should become the new centre of the international Communist movement and the centre of the national liberation movement of Africa, Asia and Latin America. At the same time, every effort must be made to prepare the ground for a new international conference of Communist parties (it would be best if it could be held this year), which would uphold and strengthen the united position of all Marxist-Leninist parties in the struggle against any attempts to launch upon international factional activity.

Such is the stand taken by our Party and by tens of other fraternal parties, which are not for a moment relaxing their efforts to make the leaders of the Communist Party of China occupy a correspondingly Communist stand. The fraternal parties, including our Party, will therefore always wage a determined struggle for what is the most sacred and cardinal duty of all Communists—for ideological and effective unity, for the revolutionary militant solidarity of all fraternal Marxist-Leninist parties and socialist countries in the world struggle for peace and communism, for the freedom of the peoples.

Naturally, Antonin Novotny said, we cannot hide the fact that the splitting policy of the CPC leadership not only weakens the unity of the international Communist movement but also dangerously plays into the hands of the imperialist circles in their struggle against the socialist countries.

We are living, Antonin Novotny emphasized, in a period of a great ideological clash, which reflects the international class struggle between capitalism and socialism, between the forces of reaction and progress. This makes it our duty to know where our place is, firmly to uphold and vigorously champion the stand of the Party, the positions of socialism, and through the policy of peaceful coexistence to spread the truth about the achievements of socialism throughout the world.

FOR UNITY OF THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

EDITORIAL IN *NEUES DEUTSCHLAND

The Fifth Plenum of the Central Committee of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany, held from February 3 to 7, 1964, stated once again the attitude of the SUPG to the activity of the leadership of the Communist Party of China directed against the unity and solidarity of the world Communist movement, against Marxism-Leninism, and against the documents collectively adopted by the Communist and Workers' parties in 1957 and 1960. It unanimously approved the report of the Political Bureau, which indignantly condemns the CPC leaders' disruptive activity and anti-Leninist views, reaffirms the unbreakable bonds between the Socialist Unity Party of Germany and the CPSU and its Central Committee headed by Comrade N.S. Khrushchov.

The Political Bureau's report to the Fifth Plenum of the CC, SUPG states:

"To our great regret, we are compelled at this Plenum to state once again our attitude to the position adopted by the Chinese leaders. It will be recalled that the Central Committee of the CPSU and the Central Committees of other Communist and Workers' parties proposed to the Chinese leaders that all public polemics between fraternal Communist parties be discontinued. In fact, the CPSU and other Communist and Workers' parties of the People's Democracies have refrained during the past two months from all public polemics over the differences called forth by the Chinese leaders.

"The leaders of the Communist Party of China have throughout this period persisted in public polemics. Moreover, on February 4, 1964, they published—in Jenminjihpao and Hungchi, organs of the CC, CPC—a seventh article concerning the Open Letter of the CC, CPSU. This article not only continues the polemics but directly advocates a split in the world Communist movement.

"The article contains the most infamous attacks on the general line of the world Communist movement collectively formulated and approved by the Communist and Workers' parties in their documents of 1957 and 1960, as well as on the Central Committee of the CPSU and its First Secretary, Comrade Khrushchov. The Central Committee of the SUPG indignantly rejects that article. The publication of that article is an unseemly move violating the standards of relations between Marxist-Leninist parties. The opinion expressed in the article speaks of a complete departure from a real, earnest discussion.

"A few weeks ago the Chines leaders published in CC, CPC organs some writings on the Sinification of dialectical materialism. These materials, which are in the nature of official Party documents, show that the Chinese Party leadership has departed from the teachings of Marx and Lenin.

"The Socialist Unity Party of Germany reaffirms its indestructible bonds with the CPSU and its Central Committee headed by Comrade Khrushchov. The Political Bureau declares that our Party will do all in its power to achieve the unity of the world Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and of the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement."

After the 5th Plenum, on February 18, 1964, the Political Bureau of the CC, SUPG gave its estimation of the activity of the CPC leadership. In particular, it stated the following:

By implementing the general line approved at the Moscow Meetings of 1957 and 1960—a line which the practice of revolutionary struggle has proved correct—the world Communist movement and particularly the world socialist system were able to make further progress in socialist and communist construction and in the struggle for peace, democracy and national liberation. Credit is due to the CPSU and its Central Committee headed by Comrade Khrushchov for the fact that through the policy elaborated by the 20th and 22nd congresses of the CPSU it showed the world Communist movement as a whole the way forward and indicated its goals. The resolute and principled struggle of the CPSU went a long way towards developing Marxism-Leninism in a creative spirit, fully encouraging the initiative of the mass of the people, and promoting the vast spread of the ideas of peace, democracy, the national liberation struggle, and socialism all over the world.

The CC, SUPG constantly strives to strengthen the unity of the Communist and Workers' parties. This is why we welcomed it when delegates from the Presidium of the CC, CPSU and from the CPC leadership discussed their differences at length in Moscow. Unfortunately, the discussions were broken off and have so far not been resumed. At our 6th Congress Comrade Khrushchov, speaking on behalf of the CC, CPSU, proposed to the CC, CPC stopping public polemics. The Congress approved the proposal. Unfortunately, the CPC leaders, far from answering the proposal, published seven articles intensifying their attacks against Marxism-Leninism and Communist and Workers' parties, and in their article of February 4, 1964, they openly called for disruptive activity.

The CC, SUPG is still of the opinion that public polemics should be stopped and that discussions should be held between the CPSU and the CC. However, discontinuance of public polemics would serve a useful purpose provided the CPC leaders immediately renounce the further dissemination of the article of February 4, 1964, stop the circulation of their articles directed against the CPSU and the other Communist and Workers' parties, and discontinue their disruptive activities within the Communist and Workers' parties.

It is necessary to study the measures that may be needed to pave the way for a meeting of the Communist and Workers' parties of the same composition as the Meeting of 1960.

The CPC leaders are pursuing a different, un-Marxist general line. The Political Bureau report to the 5th Plenum already pointed out that the CPC leaders continued public polemics and that the publication of the Seventh article had created a new situation with regard to the differences called forth by the CPC leaders.

This new situation is characterized by the fact that the CPC leaders are publicly and explicitly advocating a split in the world Communist movement and have in their propaganda and their practical actions gone over to an open offensive against the unity of the world Communist movement. The Chinese leaders stated their platform in sufficient detail in their "Proposals for the General Line of the World Communist Movement" of June 17, 1963, in Chou Yang's speech "The Combat Tasks of Philosophical and Social Science Workers", published on December 26, 1963, and in the seven articles concerning the Open Letter of the CC, CPSU. That platform is in the form of infamous attacks on the CPSU, its CC and, in particular, Comrade Khrushchov, as well as on all the parties which consistently adhere to a policy based on the documents of the Moscow Meetings of 1957 and 1960.

Their platform may be appraised as follows:

1. The CPC leaders deny the further development of Marxism-Leninism under the new balance of forces that has come into being since the end of the Second World War. They deny the colossal contribution which the CPSU, its 20th and 22nd congresses, and other fraternal parties have made, and continue to make, to the further development of Marxism-Leninism. Moreover, they are out to revise the fundamental tenets of Marxism-Leninism, which they frankly replace by the so-called Maoist ideology. They insist on all the fraternal parties repudiating Marxism-Leninism, and call on all to submit—as they put it—to a Sinified Marxism, which they make out to be true Marxism-Leninism.

Their departiure from Marxist-Leninist principles expresses itself, specifically, in the following:

(a) they falsify the general line of the world Communist movement as approved by the Moscow Meetings of 1957 and 1960;

(b) they reject the conclusions drawn by the 20th and 22nd congresses of the CPSU;

(c) they falsify Marxist-Leninist dialectics and replace it by sophist, un-Marxist and anti-Leninist views;

(d) they falsify the history of the world Communist movement.

2. They advocate the "necessity" and "legitimacy" of a split in the world Communist movement and in the various Communist and Workers' parties if these parties refuse to submit to the line followed by the Chinese leaders.

3. At present the Chinese leaders demand that all the parties forming the world Communist movement should recognize the leading role of the CPC. They insist on each particular party renouncing its Marxist-Leninist policy and submitting completely to the political line pursued by the CPC leaders. They present to the world Communist movement special conditions which amount to nullifying the decisions of the 20th and 22nd congresses of the CPSU, renouncing the policy of peaceful coexistence and peaceful economic competition, and denying the leading role of the world socialist system and the working class. This signifies a departure from the common general line laid down in the documents of 1957 and 1960.

In advancing these conditions, they call for the removal of the leaderships of the CPSU and the other Marxist-Leninist parties opposing the Chinese line.

The CPC leaders' policy means an unprincipled, petty-bourgeois nationalist departure from Marxism-Leninism, a departure which is Trotskyite in content and in methods of struggle. It is nothing but Trotskyism in new historical conditions, which in the case of the leaders of the CPC, a party in power, expresses itself in great-power chauvinism, racialism, Left-radical adventurism, an anti-Soviet attitude, and factional, disruptive activities.

In an effort to maintain the unity and solidarity of the world Communist movement and induce the CPC leaders to stop their harmful, splitting activities, the CC, SUPG sent the CC, CPC a letter in the middle of March. In that letter we again proposed discontinuing public polemics and stated that the SUPG supported the proposals of the CPSU for talks between the CC, CPSU and the CC, CPC and for a conference of the Communist and Workers' parties, to be held not later than the autumn of 1964. It is most characteristic that we have so far received no reply to that letter.

Instead of answering the proposal of the CPSU, the SUPG and many other Marxist-Leninist parties, the CPC leaders continued, even more uncompromisingly than before, its public campaign against the general line of the Communist and Workers' parties, and in the end, on March 31, resolved to publish a new editorial in the Peking newspaper Jenminjihpao and in the journal Hungchi, an editorial which goes beyond the bounds of all polemics. That editorial contains incredible calumnies against the Soviet Union, the CPSU and its Central Committee headed by Comrade Khrushchov, against our Party and all the other Communist and Workers' parties adhering, in accordance with the fundamental tenets of Marxism-Leninism, to the documents collectively approved by the Communist and Workers' parties in 1957 and 1960. This absolutely undisguised slanderous offensive against Marxist-Leninist principles and against the policy of all the socialist countries and Communist and Workers' parties opposing the line of the CPC leaders calls for a public reply.

The publication of the records of the February Plenum of the CC, CPSU will help to promote the unity of the world Communist movement in the struggle against imperialism, for peace, democracy and socialism. It will help to expose the anti-Leninist platform and disruptive activities of the CPC leaders. The CC, SUPG declares that it fully agrees with the measures taken by the CPSU and fully supports these measures. The indestructible unity of the SUPG and the CPSU, its Central Committee and Comrade Khrushchov is, and will be, a true earnest of friendship between our peoples and a guarantee of peace. Together with all the Marxist-Leninist parties, the Socialist Unity Party of Germany is fighting with unshakable resolve for the purity and integrity of the Marxist-Leninist doctrine, for the unity and peaceful solidarity of the world Communist movement, for peace and peaceful coexistence, for the victory of socialism.

REPLY TO SPLITTERS OF THE COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

EDITORIAL IN *KANSAN UUTISET

The many attempts made by the Communist parties of the Soviet Union and some other countries to persuade the leadership of the Communist Party of China to negotiate a solution of the ideological differences that have for some time existed between them, have yielded no results. Day by day, the Chinese Communist Party leadership intensified its attacks on the CPSU and the other Communist parties that faithfully follow in their policy and activities the Marxist-Leninist principles endorsed by the 1957 and 1960 Moscow Meetings of the world Communist movement. The Chinese leadership turned down every one of the proposals of the CPSU and other Communist parties on discontinuing open polemics and normalizing relations, and disseminated its foul slander and accusations all over the world. In the meantime, the CPSU and other fraternal parties refrained from the polemics and strove with utmost patience to remove the differences by negotiation.

Clearly, this situation could not last forever, especially after the CPC leaders projected their attacks to the province of China's interstate relations with the socialist countries and embarked on an open political struggle against cooperation among socialist countries and against the unity of the world Communist movement. These concrete facts prompted the decision made by the Central Committee of the CPSU on February 15 in response to the provocative attacks and disruptive activities of the Chinese Communist Party leaders. The decision was made public only two days ago, because, even after it had been taken, the CPSU leadership acceded to the suggestion of the fraternal Rumanian Party, which proposed to try and convince the Chinese leaders to agree to new negotiations. But the proposal of the Rumanian Party delegation was turned down in China. It was not until this happened that the Central Committee of the CPSU decided to break its long silence. The Central Committee of the CPSU decided to take measures against the dangerous disruptive activities of the Chinese leaders in the world Communist movement and to expose their political goals, which have nothing in common with socialism. It is not only the interests of the CPSU, but also the interests of the whole Communist movement, and the interests of its unity, that call for this move, points out the CPSU resolution, which also contains the proposal to convene an international conference of Communist parties.

We in Finland, where the anniversary of the Finnish-Soviet Treaty of Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance is now being marked, know from our own experience that the peaceful coexistence policy pursued by the Soviet Union is beneficial and effective. That is why the foul propaganda which the Chinese leaders disseminate in our country against the Soviet Union, against socialist construction and Soviet foreign policy, falls on barren soil. In our country, the attacks and disruptive activities of the Chinese leaders may at best comfort those anti-Soviet and anti-communist Right-wing elements who do not shrink from the foulest of actions in pursuance of their reactionary aspirations.

The Communist Party of Finland, which has repeatedly and firmly denounced the dangerous disruptive activities of the Chinese leaders and, like the other fraternal parties, striven to prevail upon the Chinese to abandon open attacks and accept the proposal of fraternal discussion, will fight hand-in-hand with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and other Communist parties for the unity of the world Communist movement, in defense of Marxist-Leninist principles.

SOME QUESTIONS OF THE UNITY OF THE COMMUNIST MOVEMENT*

Mario Alicata

The Council of the Afro-Asian Solidarity Organization, which convened in Algiers last week, was the scene of a violent attack by the Chinese delegation on the Soviet Union, which, as is known, is also an authorized member of that Organization, inasmuch as Soviet territory extends far into Asia and a part of the Soviet population consists of various Asian nationalities.

This latter fact should be recalled and emphasized, because Comrade Kuo Tchien, the head of the Chinese delegation, kept repeating in her attacks on the Soviet Union that the USSR was an "alien force" to the Afro-Asian peoples and nations, and, consequently, also ultimately to the anti-colonial and national liberation movement. A factual error, and in fact a misrepresentation of the truth, thus combined in the Chinese attacks on the USSR with an error of principle and, in fact, with an absurd distortion of principle.

After all, even if the Soviet Union had not been a partially Asiatic state, and if the establishment, after the victory of the October Revolution, of a multi-national Soviet state — and, I would even like to add for the sake of accuracy, of an inter-continental state—had not represented a decisive force in the anti-colonial and anti-imperialist struggle, the description of the first and strongest socialist state, which has always stood in the vanguard of the revolutionary struggle, as a "force alien" to the anti-colonial and national liberation movement, still signifies that an ideological and political basis obviously opposed to Marxism-Leninism and to the realities of the historical process is being given to this struggle. The contemporary revolutionary movement, which is primarily an anti-imperialist movement, has always considered, and now considers the alliance of the class and political forces, and the countries fighting for socialism, with the class and political forces, peoples and countries fighting for their national independence to be the fundamental condition of victorious advance.

If People's China and the Chinese comrades cast doubt on this alliance and if they go to the length of working for its disruption, they are thereby assuming a grave responsibility. It means that once more the conscience of the international proletariat and the democratic masses of the whole world is confronted by the serious question about the causes and purposes of such an attitude. And the chief thing is that, far from helping, it impedes the very necessary effort of revealing the deficiencies which undoubtedly exist in the strategy of the anti-imperialist and anti-colonial struggle of the Communist and Workers' parties. These deficiencies could be, and should be, quickly eliminated, in order to ensure a new upswing of our movement, and of the revolutionary movement in general, not only in the Asian, African and Latin American countries, but also in the Western capitalist lands.

The Chinese comrades' rejection of a sober discussion, so useful in the joint search for the truth, and their attempts to oppose their own position beforehand in an acutely polemic form to the position of other Communist parties, particularly that of the Soviet comrades, were again strikingly evident at the conference in Algeria.

Comrade Kuo Tchien described in a slanderous manner the disarmament policy of the Soviet Union (the sole purpose of which, the Chinese delegation said, was to compel the oppressed peoples to disarm and cease their armed struggle against imperialism). She branded the Moscow Treaty on the partial banning of nuclear tests as an "Anglo-American-Soviet intrigue" harmful to the oppressed peoples, and went to the length of calling the Soviet Union a "reactionary force", stating that it has for some time been an "accomplice" of imperialism, from which it was now no longer distinguishable.

It seems to be quite superfluous to protest the absurdity of such statements, as well as the statements contained in the latest article in Bandiera Rossa, which accuses Comrade Khrushchov of leading the USSR along the path of "return to capitalism". Such claims cannot possibly fail to anger not only Communists, but also the more politically conscious masses throughout the world. Nor can they fail (deplorably) to cause smirks of satisfaction among our class adversaries. On this score, too, we ought to ask why and wherefore the Chinese comrades go so far in the matter.

Indeed, it is not enough to explain it away by mere dogmatism, schematism and sectarianism. If it were only dogmatism, schematism and sectarianism, the Chinese comrades may have failed to realize the worth and importance for the whole revolutionary movement of the search begun at the 20th Congress of an adequate revolutionary strategy that would correspond to the evolution of reality, a search which is by no means as yet conducted with the necessary speed and audacity. They may not have agreed with some of the conclusions arrived at in this search (assuming, in our opinion, a profoundly erroneous position, and one that should be openly combated). If it were only dogmatism, schematism and sectarianism, and only a special point of view that they would have to keep to in their analysis of the balance of world forces, the Chinese comrades may not have understood and not have accepted (though, I repeat, in our opinion this would also be a deeply erroneous position, and one that should be openly combated) all the aspects and features of the foreign poicy of relieving tension pursued by the Soviet Union, by its present leading group, and by Comrad Khrushchov with so much energy and vigour.

But what kind of dogmatism and sectarianism could compel them to describe as an "imperialist intrigue" the nuclear agreement that peace-abiding people throughout the world have desired for so many years, and for which scientists called as being indispensable to mankind's security?

And what kind of dogmatism, schematism and sectarianism could make them describe the Soviet Union as a "reactionary" power and to accuse its leaders of complicity with imperialism?

We thought that after the exposure and denunciation of Stalin's mistakes no one would ever again employ such ridiculous caricatures of attitudes and comrades one disagrees with. Regrettably, by acting that way the Chinese comrades demonstrate that they do not confine themselves to a verbal defense of Stalin. They are repeating the worst of his mistakes in practice. They are trying to re-introduce methods and forms of political struggle in the international working-class movement which we thought should have been for ever buried, never to return.

In the circumstances, the grave danger faced by our movement is that it may be driven, even if unintentionally and unconsciously, on to the path chosen by the Chinese comrades, and that our movement may return to the times when it was thought that the ideological and political differences always liable to arise on certain issues between Communist parties and even between socialist countries, could be resolved by marshalling each other's necessary support in order to "excommunicate" the party or country with which one has come into dispute, to "expel" it from the movement or the family of socialist states, or yet to accuse it of objective or subjective "complicity" with imperialism.

Frankly speaking, a return to such methods would, in our opinion, be a dangerous step backwards for the whole world Communist movement — one that we cannot accept, because it would be, in effect, a departure from the principles triumphantly proclaimed at the 20th Congress of the CPSU and carried to victory thanks to the historical efforts of the present Soviet leading group, and particularly Comrade Khrushchov.

For this reason, we believe that it is important today not only to prove publicly, point by point, that the strategic positions of the present leaders of the Chinese Communist Party are incorrect. It is also important to show that their method of political struggle is intolerable and, of course, does not contribute to the creation of the proper climate for the new system of relations between Communist parties, based on the new conception of unity and mutual solidarity, but rather drives the movement towards a disastrous split and an organizational consolidation of this split.

At the same time, we should not, in our opinion, let ourselves be intimidated by such accusations, pressures and slanders of the CPC leadership, and should not rest on our oars. We should follow the path of a bold development of theoretical and practical work, essential for a conclusive analysis of the contemporary world and for an exhaustive definition of the prospects implicit in it for the revolutionary struggle against imperialism, for peace, for the national liberation of the peoples and for socialism.

This prospect cannot fail to include a just solution of the problem (of which we spoke earlier) of the forms along which relations between Communist parties and between socialist countries should be organized today, or, in brief, the problem of securing new unity and solidarity in the world Communist movement, which would put an end to the existing differences and would be based on a recognition of the autonomy of each individual party.

It appears to us that this would be the most effective way of combating the erroneous methods of the Chinese comrades. It appears to us that only if the necessary conditions will be thus prepared, can we eventually think about convening an international conference of all the Communist and Workers' parties. At the present moment, however, we cannot but reiterate — also in the light of the aforesaid ideas — the reservations regarding its usefulness expressed a few months ago by our Central Committee.

DOCUMENTS ON SPLITTING ACTIVITIES*

THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF CHILE EXPOSES INTRIGUES OF SPLITTERS DIRECTED AGAINST POPULAR MOVEMENT

The Communist Party has submitted the following statement for the press:

On October 12 the Communist Party expelled seven of its members from its ranks for violating the most elementary norms of discipline. These people are openly acting against the Party; they took part in forming a group which follows a course that is absolutely at variance with the line democratically adopted by the Communists at their national congresses; they have dragged into the open the polemics with the Party; they took part in a manifestation ostensibly to celebrate the 14th anniversary of the Chinese revolution, but actually aimed at distorting our line and preventing realization of the policy charted by the popular movement.

The Communist Party of Chile is solidly united around its political line and its Central Committee. Its position on national and international issues of the day has the full and conscious support of the members of the Party. It is only natural, however, that in a party which has tens of thousands of members there should be members who have their doubts or hold a different opinion. This is quite natural in the life of a party. On this score Clause 5, point "A" of the Party Rules states that every member of the Party has the right "to take part in free and concrete discussion in the respective political bodies of the Party", and points "F" and "H" add that he has the right "to raise any questions that contribute to the implementation of the Party's political line, to submit them to any Party body, including the Central Committee, and to start a discussion on any point of the Party's policy". The Rules, of course, specify that it is the obligation of all members of the Party to fight for the realization of the Party's line, to propagandize its policy and to strictly observe discipline. The philosophy, if one may put it that way, underlying the organization of the Party, is the philosophy of democratic centralism which combines the broadest inner democracy in relation to views expressed with iron discipline as regards the subordination of the lower bodies to the higher bodies and individual opinions to the opinion of the collective. Such are the Leninist standards which enable the Communist parties to be solidly united in thought and deed, which has enabled them, inspired by a single will, to withstand the most severe trials.

*From the theoretical journal of the C.C.; Communist Party of Chile, Principios, No. 98, November-December, 1963. Document of Political Commission and National Control and Codres Commission Communist Party of Chile, adopted in Santiago, October 19, 1963.

They Put Themselves Above the Rules

With regard to every one of the expelled, the Party, showing the greatest patience, gave them all a chance to express their views.

The Party leadership even met them half-way and afforded them the possibility to express their standpoint to the leadership. As a result of the talks in the Central Committee two of them, Benquis and Vasquez, promised to observe the norms of Party discipline. As things turned out, however, all the efforts of the Party were in vain. They united in order to covertly carry out factional activities which ended in their openly coming out against the Party and forming the so-called MARA group. A proletarian party like ours could not tolerate such actions.

The measures against them were taken not because they held different views which is permissible in the Party, as earlier stated. The reason for these measures was that they set themselves above the Rules, did not keep faith with the Party. It is incompatible with unity of the Party to permit a situation where some of its members attack it from the outside.

The expelled tried to justify their indiscipline on the grounds that the orientation of the Party and the popular movement was not sufficiently militant. But that was simply a subterfuge. The popular movement in Chile is a militant movement and we aim to increase its militancy. The only way to achieve this is to work with the masses, to organize and stimulate their struggle. The expelled, however, did not set an example in this respect. Berchenko, Vasquez and Benquis, for example, for a long time already had been absent from their branches; Barahona, who as a student joined the Communist youth and who for nearly 20 years had no contact with the Party joined it last year only to disappear from his branch three months ago; Palacios, one of the champion advocates of militancy beat a hasty retreat when his organization—the Association of Faculty and Staff Members of the University of Chile—went on strike.

The Campaign Against the Popular Movement

The hostile actions against the Party on the part of the aforementioned elements is part of the campaign directed against the popular movement. Simultaneously with them other groups are operating who have set themselves the same aim and who are operating with the same arguments. We have in mind here the Trotskyite and affiliated groups which are the bitter enemies of the Party and whose sole purpose of existence is to try to split the popular and working-class movement. It is relevant to note here that one of these groups, the so-called Marxist Revolutionary Vanguard, was formed by old and recognized Trotskyites like Enrique Sepulvéda, who has been joined by Reinoso, Cares and Palma who were expelled from the Party more than ten years ago for forming a factional group and for attempting to get the Party to pursue an adventurist policy and to split it when it was being subjected to brutal repressions for its fidelity to the people and its courageous struggle against North American imperialism and the dictatorship of Gonzales Videla. Then there is the group which calls itself the Revolutionary Communist Movement which has attracted various anarchist and Trotskyite elements. Still another group is the old and discredited POR which recently reappeared on the scene to join the others in their anti-unionist activities.

All these groups, beginning with MARA and ending with POR, conceal their real aims and parade as the ardent supporters of Salvador Allende's candidature. But the facts, which should not be ignored, show that they are opposed to his candidature.

The so-called Revolutionary Communist Movement writes on the walls "Elections—no! Revolution—yes!", and in its pamphlets it deefnds the thesis that "armed insurrection by the people is the only path that will not disappoint the revolutionary striving of the working class to conquer power."

POR declares in Polémic through Tito Stéfoni that "the presidential candidate Salvador Allende is more and more moving on the downgrade and this will lead not only to the defeat of his candidature but to the defeat of the proletariat and the masses as a whole, to the defeat of all this candidature represents at the present stage of the fight of the working people for political power." In its newspaper El Robelde ("Insurrection"), the so-called Marxist Revolutionary Vanguard published a "Political Letter to the Chinese Communist Party", in which it comes out against "electoral idiocy", declares that "it is staunchly resisting the electoral opium that is being used to drug the people of Chile", and asserts that some one is "trying to convince our people that power will be won in a peaceful, idyllic way at the presidential elections in 1964". MARA, for its part, which includes elements recently expelled from the Party, also comes out against what is called "electioneering" and "illusions regarding the elections". By raising these questions accompanied as they are by bombastic revolutionary statements and hypocritical manifesttions in support of Allendism, all they are doing is to throw cold water on the hopes of the people, to prevent the launching of a mass campaign in support of Allende, to sow the seed of distrust, to discredit the efforts being made by the popular parties and the people to win the 1964 elections. And all this, objectively speaking, is benefitting reaction.

They Help the Splitting Trends

The afore-mentioned groups direct their fire particularly against the Communist and Socialist parties.

They have launched an all-out attack on the political line of these parties in an attempt to start splitting trends in them. In its letter to the Chinese Communist Party the so-called Marxist Revolutionary Vanguard states that it is considering the possibility of uniting with other groups and admits that it "has constantly been proposing to the members of the Communist Party and to the Communist youth of Chile, to the members of the Socialist Party and other popular organizations to take joint action and thus pave the way to this integration which would make for the establishment of a United Party of the Chilean revolution".

Pursuing the same aims Stéfoni, the leader of POR, after attacking all the parties in FRAP, which in his words have "a purely electoral opportunist strategic concept", then goes on to say that "critical tendencies are constantly making their appearance" in the Socialist Party; he does not conceal the hopes he pins on them. Armando Cassigoli, MARA's representative, speaking in the Baquedano Theatre openly appealed for the establishment of what he called a revolutionary organization which would include different kinds of people "which does not mean, of course, that they would have to withdraw from their own parties".

All these groups attack the parties in FRAP.

Pretending to be a supporter of Allende, Stéfoni at the same time viciously attacks the National-Democratic Party which is one of the parties that supports the people's choice, and which he qualifies as a "decaying and foul mosaic of the bougreois factions". As for the independents who support Allende he exclaims: "this is the most senseless myth invented by opportunists. Independents do not exist! Those who are called independents are waverers, neutrals who stand aloof from social life, those who have every reason not to trust the political election game."

It is clear what they are driving at. The afore-mentioned groups are trying with the help of all kinds of stratagems to cause a split in the Communist and Socialist parties and deprive them of allies, to isolate and narrow the social and political basis of support for the candidature of Salvador Allende and thus doom it to defeat.

They Do Not Scruple to Distort the Truth

For several decades now the Trotskyite groups have been trying to cause a split and sow confusion. They have been joined by new crusaders in this unsavoury cause. Although at times it might seem that they hold different views, objectively they have all dedicated themselves to the same aim. They were quick to join hands when the Chinese Communist Party began to cause differences in the international Communist movement.

They take advantage of these differences to further their main aim: to attack the Communist Party and the popular movement. In doing so they do not scruple to distort the truth, to present our policy on the national and international scale in a false light.

Speculating on the fact that revolutionaries should always be willing to discuss the complex issues of the contemporary world and the basic problems connected with the Chilean revolution they would have the people believe that we want to prevent any discussion inside the popular movement and impose our own opinion, that we want to have the monopoly of the truth.

Far from fearing discussion we Communists have time and again called for discussion. Our allies know with what respect we treat any opinion different from ours, and of numerous occasions when we have accepted their proposals. What we have opposed and will continue to oppose is giving the title of revolutionaries to Trotsky-ites and splitters whose activities are directed against popular unity and revolution.

The line of the Communist Party of Chile which these elements attack was elaborated democratically. It was endorsed by our National Congress held in March 1962. Before it was endorsed it was discussed at 26 regional congresses, 56 local conferences and 1,500 branch meetings. Regarding the charges made by the Chinese the Party made its position clear on this issue at its plennary meeting in November 1961. The Party's position was subsequently unanimously endorsed by its congress. The more delicate aspects of the question were examined by the Central Committee on repeated occasions. The entire membership was informed of them as the differences sharpened. Most of the Communist parties, including the Communist Party of China, acted in this way.

The Line of the Communist Party is a Revolutionary One

The position of the splitters, encouraged by the leadership of the Communist Party of China, is incompatible with the line pursued by the Communist Party of Chile in the international and national scene. It is the duty of every party to defend its line and to fight for its implementation. It cannot therefore allow ideological anarchy or even a situation where some of its members oppose the Party line.

The line of our Party is the revolutionary line of the masses. Together with its allies the Party pursues revolutionary aims which have been summarized in its Program and have been made public The Party's motto is to unite in struggle the bulk of the population around the working class. Its immediate aim is to secure a People's government for Chile at the presidential elections in 1964.

The Communist Party considers that the conditions for revolution are maturing. These conditions are both objective and subjective. The objective conditions are determined by the entire course of social development. The subjective conditions are created by the popular movement and first and foremost by its vanguard. The Party shares the view that we cannot sit back and wait until the subjective conditions mature of themselves. The Party therefore considers it necessary to organize and activize the struggle of the masses, to stimulate their militancy, for it is only through their own experience that the masses will come to realize the need to change the system and seize power. But for all that, there are certain weaknesses and reformist tendencies in assessing the elections, which have their sources in the erroneous view that all that is needed is to canvass the votes and on election day go to the polls. Fully aware of these weaknesses the Party is working to overcome them, but it believes that the way to overcome them is by giving concrete guidance to all the actions of the people, everywhere and in the most diverse forms. Once we have advanced along this path the full maturing of the subjective revolutionary conditions will no longer be something of the distant future; it might come very soon together with a profound crisis. But this will never happen as a result of wishful thinking or reckless actions, and least of all as a result of the activities of the splitting elements who have broken away from the masses and fallen into petty-bourgeois despair.

In Defense of Peace and the Fight for National Liberation

On the international scene the Communist Party pursues a policy of decisive support for the struggle for peace and against imperialism. The policy of peaceful coexistence is an integral part of the fight for peace; it is the only sensible policy and, from the Marxist viewpoint, the fight for it begun by Lenin is in our time a supreme expression of the class struggle on a world scale. The defense of peace and the fight for national liberation are components of one and the same process, two streams of one and the same world-wide revolutionary torrent. The struggle for national liberation calls for the broadest alliance of all anti-imperialist forces and, at the same time, for the most decisive support to the liberation movements, irrespective of whether they resort to arms or not. In Latin America this idea finds expression, and will continue to find expression, in the most vigorous support for the glorious Cuban revolution and in the fight being waged by all the peoples of the continent against imperialism and the internal oligarchies.

The movement for peace and national independence has its strongest bulwark in the socialist system and especially in the Soviet Union. As has already been demonstrated the Soviet Union, by its policy of peace and its vigorous stand against the export of counter-revolution, represents the best guarantee that the struggle of all the peoples who are battling for their independence will not be crushed. The attacks made on the policy of the Soviet Union do not further this struggle.

The Communist Party has considered it necessary to dwell at length on all the above-mentioned facts for they show that it is a question of a conspiracy against the Party and the popular movement. The indiscipline and, later, the expulsion from the Party of seven people, not one of whom was even a member of the secretariat of his branch would have been a matter of secondary importance were it not for the fact that other Trotskyite groups and their supporters are acting along the same lines and that they are supported, politically and materially, by one and the same hand. What is behind this conspiracy is obvious to all who care to see it. The reactionary press gives wide publicity to their activity. El Mercurio openly places its hopes on them to cause a split in FRAP, and El Diario Illustrado applauds them.

The Political Commission and the National Control and Cadres Commission calls on all Communists and all fighters in the popular movement to unite still more closely around their parties and mass organizations, to step up the fight to meet the demands of the masses and to develop in every possible way the popular movement which should ensure the victory of Allende, the victory of the people at the elections in 1964.

STATEMENT OF CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA*

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia has issued a statement on the present-day situation in the international Communist movement, which reads in part:

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia discussed at its meetings, notably in December 1963 and March 1964, the situation which has developed in the international Communist movement in connection with the splitting activity of the leaders of the Communist Party of China, who are departing more and more from Marxism-Leninism and have openly set themselves the task of dividing the world revolutionary forces and establishing a factionalist centre in Peking. With a view to achieving hegemony in the world Communist movement the Chinese leaders have worked out an ideological platform which is nothing but revision of the general line of the international Communist movement as laid down in the documents of the Moscow Meetings of the Communist and Workers' parties in 1957 and 1960.

Already at the Bucharest meeting, but especially at the Moscow conference of the Communist and Workers' parties, the delegation of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia opposed the incorrect views of the Chinese leaders. In the statement released in June 1963 the Central Committee of our Party expressed its concern and apprehension with regard to the policy of the Chinese leaders and at the same time it categorically renounced their attacks against the Leninist policy of the CPSU, pointing out that the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China would not hesitate to use demagogy, falsification and slander in order to discredit the policy of the CPSU and other fraternai parties. In due course, the leaders of the CPC deliberately and steadily stepped up their attacks against the fraternal parties. They are pursuing a policy of false charges and subversion against them, impose on them an anti-Leninist line, which today is the main danger to the world-wide revolutionary front, to the international struggle for peace, national liberation, democracy and socialism.

The fact that the Chinese leaders provocatively misinterpret the goodwill of the Marxist-Leninist parties, their calls for an end to the public polemic in the interests of unity, and ascribe them to the lack of arguments of the fear to suffer defeat in the open struggle, only betrays their desire to cause a split. To the numberless proposals of the fraternal parties to halt the pubic debate the Chinese leaders .e-plied by intensifying their hostile and factional activities aimed at dividing the Communist movement and laying down the foundation for their platform on an international scale. For that purpose they are banding together the various anti-Party and Trotskyite elements, all sorts of social scum in the various countries, and are forming factional groups, trying to present them as "new Communist parties".

Objectively they are helping world imperialist reaction, which regards these actions as a welcome aid to its efforts to weaken the activity of the Communists and undermine their prestige and which supports these splitting actions in every way.

The harmful activities of the Chinese leaders have also affected the relations with our Party and even the relations between our countries. That trade between China and us has dwindled is not our fault. The Chinese side was guilty of gross violation of our laws which led to the closing of the headquarters of the Hsinghua News Agency in Prague. It is highly regrettable that the Chinese officials regard the interference of Chinese citizens into our affairs and violations of our law as creditable and that they publicly commend the culprits.

We cannot agree with the arbitrary assessment of the transition of Czechoslovakia to socialism, given in the Chinese press, which contradicts the facts of history. This assessment distorts Lenin's idea of transition from the democratic to the socialist revolution.

The leaders of the Communist Party of China, blinded by megalomania, have lost all sense of proportion and stop at nothing. It is they who bear the full responsibility for weakening the unity and causing a split of the international Communist movement.

Czechoslovak Communists and all working people of Czechoslovakia are particularly indignant at the violent attacks launched by the Chinese leaders against the CPSU and the Soviet Union, attacks which, in tone and content, are reminiscent of the invective used by imperialist circles. The Chinese leaders demonstrate their political and moral unscrupulousness by urging world public opinion to oppose the policy of the Soviet Union—the policy of peace, of support for the progressive and revolutionary forces and of friendly relations among the nations.

Our Party highly appreciates the position of the CPSU and its numerous constructive steps timed at averting the dangerous course of events and cementing the unity of the international Communist movement. The Central Committee of the CPSU, supported by the other fraternal parties, has displayed the maximum patience, goodwill and calm in the effort to overcome the differences and to explain to the leadership of the Communist Party of China, the danger of its actions. However, the proposals made by the CPSU and other Communist and Workers' parties went unheeded by the Chinese leaders.

In agreement with many other fraternal parties, we have arrived at the conclusion that, the disruptive activity of the Communist Party of China which has repeatedly rejected all the proposals for ending public polemics, has resulted in a situation where resolute and open action on behalf of the unity of the international Communist movement and its Leninist general line is the direct internationalist duty of the Communist and Workers' parties. The Central Committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia, unanimously supported by the recently held regional Party conferences fully approves of the actions of the CPSU Central Committee which gave a principled answer to the Chinese leaders by publishing the materials of its February meeting.

By its theoretical and practical activity the CPSU invariably shows that it consistently implements the general line of the Communist movement jointly elaborated in the Declaration of 1957 and the Statement of 1960; today this is the main criterion of the Marxist-Leninist approach for any Communist or Workers' Party.

The Central Committee of the CPC fully endorses the proposal of the CC, CPSU, for convening another conference of the Communist and Workers' parties at the earliest date. In our opinion, this conference should discuss, from positions of principle, the situation in the Communist movement and such questions as strengthening the unity of the world Communist forces on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and in conformity with the jointly elaborated general line of the world Communist movement.

STATEMENT OF CENTRAL COMMITTEE, SOCIALIST UNITY PARTY OF GERMANY*

AGAINST THE DISRUPTIVE POLICY OF THE CHINESE LEADERS, FOR STRENGTHENING THE UNITY AND SOLIDARITY OF THE COMMUNIST AND WORKERS' PARTIES

In 1957 and 1960 the representatives of the world Communist movement, meeting in Moscow, drew up and unanimously adopted two historical documents—the Declaration and Statement of the Communist and Workers' parties.

The Communist and Workers' parties undoubtedly owe their signal successes of recent years largely to this jointly adopted general line. Life itself has thus confirmed the correctness of these decisions.

Our Party and the working people of the German Democratic Republic wholeheartedly endorsed these documents. And inasmuch as our words do not diverge from our deeds, we have contributed much to their realization. Nor could it have been otherwise, for the documents of 1957 and 1960 gave a scientific assessment of the present epoch of transition from capitalism to socialism. Proceeding from the new balance of forces in the world, they drew the correct conclusions for the fight for peace and social progress, and charted the way to the realization of the basic tasks of our time.

These basic tasks are the building of socialism and communism; removal of the danger of a new world war and pursuance of a policy of peaceful coexistence of states with different social systems; complete abolition of the imperialist colonial system, and struggle for democracy and social progress in the capitalist countries.

The Socialist Unity Party, like the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the other Marxist-Leninist parties, is guided by this jointly elaborated and unanimously adopted general line which has been corroborated by experience, our experience included. This is evident from our consistent peace policy, the vigorous effort towards the building of socialism in the GDR, the application of Leninist principles in planning and economic management, the deepening of socialist democracy and the development of our socialist national culture.

Anyone endowed with clear vision and common sense can now see that the way taken by our Party was, and is, the right way. That the republic has grown economically stronger is clear not only to us in our day-to-day life; even our opponents have to admit this. Politically too our republic has become stronger. Its international prestige has grown. Its contacts with other nations and states have become broader. Telling blows have been dealt to West-German imperialism and militarism. The aggressive policy of the Adenauer group met with failure, and if Erhard were to continue this policy, he would be no more successful.

Hence it is perfectly clear that in the future as well we shall not allow either circumstances or individuals to divert us from the correct general line of the Communist and Workers' parties, or from the program adopted by the Sixth Congress of our Party in which the principles of Marxism-Leninism are creatively applied to the complex conditions of struggle in Germany.

I

This general line to which we owe our success has been assailed by the leaders of the Communist Party of China. Time and again our Party has rejected the viewpoint of the CPC leaders: It is in full agreement with the CPSU, which published materials of the February plenary meeting of its Central Committee a few days ago, as well as with the overwhelming majority of the other fraternal parties.

The Central Committee of the SUPG knows that the people of the GDR are indignant at the policy of the CPC leaders. Their indignation is quite understandable, for this policy is causing grave harm to the cause of peace, democracy and socialism. It is now clear that the leadership of the CPC is out to disrupt the unity and solidarity of the world Communist movement.

Let us recall the period preceding the 1960 Meeting of the Communist and Workers' parties in Moscow. Already at that time the Chinese leaders objected strongly to any condemnation of factional and splitting activities, activities which are utterly incompatible with the Leninist standards of Party relations. Since then the CPC leaders have gone still further. They have departed on all basic issues from the Moscow documents of 1957 and 1960. They have counterposed to these documents their own unprincipled platform, which is an unsavoury hodgepodge of the most diverse anti-Marxist, anti-Leninist views. Moreover, when they realized that the Marxist-Leninist parties, and primarily the tried and tested vanguard of these parties, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union under the leadership of its Central Committee headed by Comrade N.S. Khrushchov, resolutely rejected every attempt to falsify the jointly elaborated general line and were determined consistently to carry on the fight for peace, democracy and socialism, the CPC leaders unleashed, using all the means of factional struggle, a campaign against the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties.

We should like to recall that the SUPG, like the CPSU and other

Marxist-Leninist parties, pointed out to the leaders of the CPC in good time that their policy was anti-Marxist and urged that the public polemics be stopped and the discussion conducted in a sober and comradely way. But the leaders of the CPC ignored this good advice. Instead they replied to the comradely suggestions of the fraternal parties with even cruder attacks, insults and slander. More than that, they went so far as to openly urge the removal of the tried and tested Marxist-Leninist leaders of the Party of Lenin and of many other Communist parties. In this way they went over to open attacks against the unity of the world Communist movement. They set up anti-party factions in the fraternal parties. They mounted a blatant campaign under the odious slogans of factional struggle to rally unprincipled and corrupt careerists and Trotskyite, anarchist and sectarian elements to their banners. They carried their disruptive activities and pernicious factional struggle even into the international democratic organizations and movements, for instance, the Afro-Asian solidarity movement.

Their main blow is directed against the Soviet Union, against the socialist community, the greatest achievement of the international working-class movement and all other revolutionary forces. The CPC leaders evidently hope that racist, nationalist and chauvinist slogans will help them to realize their claim to the leading role.

Their ideology and policies are a mixture of petty-bourgeois nationalism, adventurism, great-power chauvinism and racism. This orientation has become the greatest danger to the unity of the international Communist movement.

The CPC leaders have sought "theoretically" to justify their splitting policy as "inevitable". But how do things stand in reality? The truth is that a split in the revolutionary working-class movement is not inevitable. Moreover, the lessons of history show that the forces which betray the theory and practice of Marxism-Leninism and break away from the revolutionary movement are sooner or later bound to suffer defeat.

What is natural is the growth of the forces of peace and socialism. It is natural for the socialist countries to cement their unity in struggle for their common goals. Natural too is the growth of the forces of the Communist and Workers' parties, of their unity and solidarity.

Our Party and the working people of the GDR know full well what the division of the working class means. We also know that unity multiplies our strength tenfold. The working class and its allies in the GDR have advanced from success to success precisely thanks to their unity. The SUPG which is the embodiment of the unity of German Socialists on the basis of Marxism-Leninism, has always worked for the unity and solidarity of the world Communist movement.

Underlying this unity is the teaching of Marx, Engels and Lenin and the decisions of the Communist and Workers' parties based on this teaching. For the sake of strengthening this unity it is imperative to expose and refute the erroneous anti-Marxist views of the CPC leaders. Our slogan is: clarity cements unity!

II

It is natural for people in the GDR to want to know the reasons for the anti-Marxist views of the CPC leaders and the struggle they are waging against the general line of the world Communist movement. The views and disruptive activities of the Chinese leaders bring to mind primarily the struggle which the Communist and Workers' parties, our Party included, had to wage in the past against similar tendencies stemming mainly from petty-bourgeois nationalism.

Owing to the predominantly agrarian nature of the country, the relatively small numbers of the working class, and the social composition of the Party, petty-bourgeois nationalist influences are particularly strong in China. Gradually these petty-bourgeois nationalist views came to predominate in the policies of the CPC leaders.

Today petty-bourgeois nationalism and great-power chauvinism are the characteristic features and the driving force of the policy of the leaders of the Chinese Party.

This, in particular, is evident from the fact that they underrate the achievements of other peoples and fraternal parties, arrogantly overestimate their own successes, strive for world leadership and want to lay their hands on nuclear bombs, and seek to domineer over the world Communist movement and other peoples. The leaders of the CPC have joined those who seek a revision of their frontiers with neighbouring states; they themselves carried their border dispute with the Indian Republic to the point of military clashes. Their attitude towards other peoples, which is determined not by class but race considerations, should be particularly condemned.

The policy and stand of the Chinese leaders reveal their inability to make a scientific assessment of the present situation, to elaborate a revolutionary strategy and tactics on the basis of such an assessment and to implement this strategy and tactics patiently and systematically in struggle against all manifestations of subjectivism and petty-bourgeois anarchy. This was particularly clearly evident when the leaders of the CPC were confronted with the complex task of going over from the armed anti-imperialist liberation struggle and economic rehabilitation to planned building of socialism. As the decisions of the CPC show, it was faced with the task of guiding the country not by means of general slogans but by paying due attention to economic upbuilding and the deepening of socialist democracy. These tasks were then as urgent in China as they are today. The Eighth Congress of the CPC in 1956 adopted decisions which basically corresponded to objective laws. Later, however, these decisions were somehow replaced with the policy of the "big leap", which hindered and complicated the consistent building of socialism, damaging the interests of the industrious and ingenious Chinese people.

In examining the reasons why the CPC leaders adopted such a position, our Party cannot ignore the fact that they have taken up the defense of the Stalin cult, which is utterly alien to Marxism-Leninism. For it is clear to all that the eradication of the consequences of the Stalin cult in the sphere of theory as well as in practice helps further to develop and consolidate socialist democracy and to create guarantees precluding any possibility of arbitrary rule by individuals. Only those who do not want this can defend the personality cult.

III

Steadfastly following the general line of the Communist and Workers' parties, the peace-loving forces of the world have achieved major successes in the fight to preserve peace.

Thanks to the superior strength of the Soviet Union and other socialist countries and their consistent policy of peaceful coexistence, the ultra-reactionaries of the U.S.A. were prevented from invading socialist Cuba. The annals of history will testify for all time to come that it was the peace-loving forces of the world who prevented a thermonuclear war. And it is to the credit of the very same forces that the Moscow treaty terminating the radioactive contamination of the atmosphere, outer space and the seas was signed. The Moscow treaty gives all mothers new hope that their children will grow up healthy and will themselves bear healthy children.

Today, when thermonuclear weapons hold the threat of physical annihilation over entire nations, war can serve less than ever as a political means of settling disputed international issues. Because of this we say: since the survival and happy future of the German people depends on the preservation of peace, the only possible way to order the relations of the two German states is by pursuing a policy of peaceful coexistence.

This policy alone is in the interests of our nation. Therefore our Party, government and National Front has again and again taken the initiative in seeking normalization of relations between the two German states and between the G.D.R. and West Berlin, and in pursuing a policy of common sense and good will. The historical mission of the G.D.R., the contribution which the working class and all other working people of our state are destined to make, is to create, through all-out building of socialism, the prerequisites for the victory of the forces of peace and progress in all of Germany.

Take the question of peaceful coexistence. What is the good of all the diverse declarations of the leaders of the CPC if they reject the policy of peaceful coexistence as the foreign policy line of the socialist states? By doing so they place themselves in sharp opposition to the will of the peoples and the objective dictates of history. True, they pose as ultra-revolutionaries, but actually they are poor revolutionaries who in their heart of hearts are utterly lacking in faith. They do not believe, in effect, that the liberated peoples will be able to create their own new world by peaceful labor and to defeat imperialism in economic competition. Because of this they seek to impose on the Marxist-Leninist parties a policy of local wars against imperialism which are fraught with the danger of a global nuclear catastrophe.

It is easy to visualize what the consequences would be for the German nation if the Socialist Unity Party were to fall in line with these ultra-Left, adventurist and anti-human views. Such a policy would play into the hands of the West-German revenge seekers, who are out to unleash aggression. It would be impossible to ensure in the G.D.R. the peaceful building of socialism, in which we engaged for a long time with our frontiers wide open. To follow the line of the CPC would mean encouraging the aggressive forces of West-German imperialism to stage new and bigger provocations. Such a policy would inevitably lead to war; it would spark off a thermonuclear world war; which would endanger the very existence of the German nation.

One must therefore ask oneself: why do the leaders of the CPC not wish to see this, and that, after all, is their purpose? Are they really concerned with the victory of the world revolution? Perhaps they are mistaken only as regards the ways and means of achieving this end?

The answer is clear: prompted by their narrow selfish interests stemming from great-power chauvinism, they stop at nothing in gambling with the future of the international revolution and the destinies of the peoples. It is in this light that their rejection of the idea of stage-by-stage disarmament and their striving to gain possession of nuclear weapons is allegedly a criterion of national sovereignty, a guarantee against a country being classified as a "second or third rate power". This of course has nothing in common with Marxism-Leninism and the international revolution, nor has it anything to do with security requirements, since the Soviet Union's missile and nuclear power ensures the security of all the socialist countries. Whether they want to or not, the Chinese leaders are thus playing into the hands of the West-German militarists who are clamouring for for nuclear weapons.

The leaders of the CPC advise the socialist countries and the fraternal parties in the capitalist countries to concentrate their struggle exclusively against U.S. imperialism. This thesis too is garbed in ultra-revolutionary phraseology and "substantiated" by the argument that West-German, French, British and Japanese imperialism is merely a relatively insignificant "intermediate zone", a "shadow" of U.S. imperialism. This "theory" ignores the notorious aggressiveness of West-

German imperialism and tends to minimize the danger it presents. And this the CPC leaders have the temerity to offer to the German people, and to the other peoples which only too often suffered from the rapacity of German imperialism, as a revolutionary policy! This policy also explains why the leaders of the CPC, who are so eager to pose as champions of the national-liberation movement, say nothing about the neo-colonialist policy of such an imperialist country of the "intermediate zone" as Western Germany.

As for our Party, it stands for the complete and final abolition of the anti-human colonial system. It renders assistance to the people still oppressed by imperialism, not by pseudo-revolutionary slogans and "intermediate-zone" theories but by colonialist policies, the West German brand of neo-colonialism in particular. The entire experience of the national-liberation movement shows that it is the community of socialist countries, and especially the great economic and military strength of the Soviet Union, that is the best source of support and aid to the just cause and the development of the newly-emerged national states.

IV

Our Party is channelling its efforts in all-out construction of socialism. Socialism is a social system which ensures people peace and social security, human dignity and fraternity, freedom and justice, a happy full-blooded life.

Now that the socialist relations of production have finally triumphed in the GDR and its frontiers have been made secure, social progress in the republic and the living standard of its people depend primarily on how effectively the economic laws of socialism are used to ensure the maximum growth of the productivity of labor. In elaborating the new system of economic planning and management, the SUPG is steadfastly pursuing a Leninist economic policy. Aimed at advancing the scientific and technological revolution, improving the quality of output and reducing production costs, this economic policy of our Party and the government of the GDR calls for the use of all the advantages accruing from socialist production relations in order to make that contribution to the economic competition between socialism and capitalism which is required by national and international interests. We all know that this is a policy which makes our life finer and richer. It is a truly revolutionary policy understandable to the working people.

Yet the leaders of the CPC describe this successful policy of all-out building of socialism in the G.D.R. as a revisionist policy allegedly leading to the "restoration of capitalism".

What, indeed, do the Chinese leaders hope to achieve by fabricating such fables? Do they expect the working people of the G.D.R. to renounce the planned, consistent economic policy pursued for years now? Do they expect us to follow their example and ignore the objective laws of socialist construction and embark on a "big-leap" policy? What would have happened if our Party had tried to by-pass essential stages of social development? We could not have risen from the ruins of 1945. Every sensible person knows by his own experience that you cannot build a sound economy by "big leaps". Only those aims can be set in building a national economy for which the prerequisites exist. Were we not to take this into account, our revolution would merely amount to spreading out poverty equally and the ideas of socialism and communism would lose their attraction for the millions of working people. A cult of backwardness and primitive equality has nothing in common with the building of socialism. The Chinese leaders, however, think and act differently. Now that their policy of the "big leap" has set the economy of the Chinese People's Republic years back, they, contrary to the views of Marx, Engels and Lenin, are seeking to elevate poverty to a virtue under socialism. Such "virtuous socialism" can hardly find many adherents. The working class and its allies have not taken the path of the socialist revolution to make life worse than it was.

They have taken this path in order to develop the productive forces and thereby satisfy their material and cultural requirements better than under capitalism.

The leaders of the CPC only discredit the lofty ideas of socialism when they repeat over and over again that those who steadily improve the people's living standard, who are evolving a higher form of organization of social labor than that existing under capitalism, and who are extending socialist democracy and developing new social relations among the working people are "sinning" against the socialist revolution, "halting half-way" and giving themselves up to the "bourgeois striving for well-being". One need not be a philosopher to see that this is an utterly erroneous interpretation of socialism.

How can people call themselves Marxist-Leninists who claim that the just principle of remuneration according to work performed leads to "a growth of bourgeois individualism" and "causes damage to the socialist economy". In the early years of the Soviet power V.I. Lenin opposed similar arguments advanced by the so-called "Left Communists", who labelled Lenin's economic policy as a "Right-wing Bolshevik deviation" and "evolution towards state capitalism". This absurd "Left Communist" position was completely annihilated by Lenin in his "Left-Wing" Communism, an Infantile Disorder. Only the leaders of the CPC are apparently unaware of it to this day.

Already n 1960 our Party gave a rebuff to attempts to propagate the Chinese "people's communes" in our republic. Had we departed from the tried and tested path of gradual development of co-operatives and adopted the way of the "people's communes" as a "ladder to paradise" our position would undoubtedly have taken a turn for the worse.

Deepening of socialist democracy is an indispensable aspect of the building or socialism. But in none of the statements of the Chinese leaders is there any mention of socialist democracy or the need to promote it. Instead they are increasingly making use of military and bureaucratic methods of leadership, resorting more and more to orders from above. Since the beginning of 1964 the military methods and forms of organization practiced in the People's Liberation Army are being implanted in all spheres of public life.

Our Party has always rejected the idea of fitting socialism in any "procrustean bed" and allowing administrative compulsion to eclipse persuasion. Nor will it in the future allow itself to be diverted from the Marxist-Leninist teaching concerning the party of the working class, it will not cease its efforts to deepen inner-Party democracy or give up its close links with all sections of the people. Our Party has always existed and will continue to exist for the people. Hence it is the true champion of the interests of the working class and the entire German people, their recognized and tested leader.

The solidarity and unity of the international Communist movement and all other progressive forces is the decisive factor of victory in the struggle for peace, national independence, democracy and socialism. Because of this the Communist and Workers' parties, the Communist Party of China included, pledged themselves at the 1957 and 1960 meetings to educate the working people in the spirit of unity, internationalism and patriotism. They pledged themselves to wage a resolute struggle against all survivals of bourgeois nationalism and chauvinism.

Our Party has long worked along these lines. One of its greatest achievements is the complete extirpation in the G.D.R. of nationalism, chauvinism and fascist race hatred. The whole world knows this, and hence the peoples regard with respect our republic, whose population has been imbued with the spirit of international solidarity, humanism and friendship among the nations. The 15 years of the existence of our state have clearly shown that socialist patriotism combined with socialist internationalism promotes both the national interest and the interests of all other peoples.

Why, then, do the leaders of the CPC seek to replace internationalism, the tried and tested jointly adopted general line of the international Communist movement, with their own "25-point general line," the salient features of which bear the odious stamp of great-power chauvinism, national arrogance and claims to autocratic leadership? Have not the peoples of all countries suffered enough from nationalism and great-power chauvinism? At any rate our people know full well that neither has ever tended to strengthen friendship betwen peoples or to promote peace.

How can the CPC leaders' professions of loyalty to proletarian internationalism be reconciled with their anti-Soviet policy? Indoctrination of the Chinese people in an anti-Soviet spirit is a flagrant violation of proletarian internationalism inasmuch as the Soviet Union is the centre of the international working-class movement, the bulwark of Marxism-Leninism and peace. The attitude of the Communist and Workers' parties and the socialist countries towards the Soviet Union is now more than ever before the touchstone of their policy.

The Soviet Union is the starting point and the base of the socialist world system, which is the greatest achievement of the international working-class movement. Can Marxist-Leninists ever forget what they owe to the heroic accomplishments of the Soviet peoples? Can they forget that the People's Democracies were able to lay the foundations of socialism so rapidly primarily because they could draw on the material aid selflessly extended by the Soviet Union and the vast experience of the CPSU? Can they forget that it is the economic might of the Soviet Union which above all ensures the peoples peace, the prime condition for the successful building of socialism. Can they forget that in forging ahead from socialism to communism the CPSU is blazing the path to this lofty goal for all humanity?

Our Party and our people always bear this in mind. Not to remember it would mean scorning not only socialist internationalism but all the lessons of German history.

Our Party resolutely rejects the non-Marxist view that each country should build its own socialism relying on "its own forces" in isolation from the fraternal parties. If this view were to be accepted, our progress in the economic competition between socialism and capitalism would be retarded, the community of socialist countries would be weakened, and in the final analysis, the victory of socialism in general would be endangered. Socialism, like the socialist doctrine, is international, not national.

All true internationalists know that the faster the strength of socialism grows in the course of peaceful economic competition, the greater the influence exerted by the socialist community on the march of history and the more favorable the conditions for rendering effective support to the peoples who have been the object of imperialist exploitation and oppression for centuries. Our Party will therefore work indefatigably to promote co-operation among the socialist countries and to strengthen the socialist community, for this serves best of all both national and international interests.

VI

The working people of the German Democratic Republic have long been linked with the Chinese people by close friendship and splendid traditions of joint struggle against imperialism.

Many of us remember well the slogan "Hands off China!" with which the revolutionary forces of our people rallied to the support of the emancipation struggle of the Chinese workers and peasants. We remember the moral and material support given to starving strikers in China; Ernst Thaelmann's speeches in support of the Canton commune in 1927; the mass meetings sponsored by the Communist Party of Germany to protest against the supply of arms by the German imperialists for the suppression of the Chinese revolution; and Walter Ulbricht's speeches in the Reichstag exposing the imperialist war against China.

And after 1945 our Party consistently combated the attempts made by the Bonn reactionaries to stab the Chinese people in the back at a time when they were fighting the foreign imperialists and the Chiang Kai-shek regime. It condemned Adenauer's chauvinistic anti-Chinese sallies. In the course of these years the bonds of friendship between the Chinese and German peoples grew stronger. This friendship entered a new stage in 1949 when the Chinese People's Republic and the German Democratic Republic were established almost simultaneously.

True to their proletarian traditions, our Party and the government of the GDR promoted close relations with the Chinese People's Republic. These were relations of friendship, fraternal aid and co-operation, relations that were beneficial to both our peoples. Our Party consistently pursued this policy even after disagreements appeared between the leaders of the CPC and in the international Communist movement.

The Chinese leaders carried the ideological differences over to inter-state relations. They deliberately sought to worsen relations between our two states. By curtailing trade and discontinuing the supply of important raw materials, they caused considerable difficulties to our economy. At the same time the Chinese leaders had no qualms about strengthening their economic relations with capitalist countries.

Despite this regrettable stand taken by the leaders of the CPC, our Party, true to socialist internationalism, is consistently adhering to its policy of friendship with the Chinese people. It seeks not only to maintain but to promote state relations between the two countries. The SUPG hopes that in this question at least the Chinese leaders will see reason.

The disruptive activities of the Chinese leaders have given rise to justified concern on the part of the members of our Party, the citizens of our republic. What will happen now, they ask.

The Central Committee of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany considers it necessary to convene another meeting of the Communist and Workers' parties. It therefore supports the suggestion made by the CPSU that a new meeting of the delegations of the CC, CPSU, and the CC, CPC, be held in May, that a meeting of representatives of the Communist and Workers' parties which took part in 1960 in the editorial committee preparing the Moscow meeting be called in June-July, and a meeting of all Communist and Workers' parties in the autumn of 1964.

Summarizing the foregoing, we declare with all responsibility: the general line adopted by the Communist and Workers' parties, the living, history-making spirit of the teaching of Marx, Engels and Lenin, will triumph, and not the anti-Marxist dogma and practices of the Chinese leaders. This is the conclusion to be drawn from the rich experience of the past, from the entire history of the revolutionary working-class movement, which has always swept aside the splitters and factionalists. This is a law of history. For peace and social progress accord with the basic interests of all peoples, the Chinese people included.

The achievements of the commonwealth of socialist countries headed by the Soviet Union and of the entire international Communist movement are exerting a growing influence on the thinking and actions of the working people in all countries. Under the leadership of the CC, CPSU, headed by Comrade N. S. Khrushchov, the Soviet people are carrying out their program of building communism. Under the leadership of their Marxist-Leninist parties the working people of other socialist countries are achieving new substantial successes. By building up our economy and strengthening our worker-peasant state in every way, by carrying out our program for the all-out building of socialism, we too are making our contribution towards cementing the unity and solidarity of the socialist countries and the international Communist movement. Who can doubt that our struggle and labor, the creative powers of the masses guided according to a scientific plan, will continue to enhance the attractive force of socialism! Ours is a just and good cause, it is the right cause, and hence it will triumph!

FROM A PARTY OF THE WORKING CLASS TO A PARTY OF THE WHOLE SOVIET PEOPLE*

The leaders of the Communist Party of China have launched a desperate campaign and are stepping up their undermining activities against the policy (agreed on and expressed in the documents of the Moscow Meetings of 1957 and 1960) of the international Communist and workers' movement in all the basic theoretical and political problems of our times. The essence of this campaign is to oppose leftist adventurist, petty-bourgeois and nationalistic ideology to Marxism-Leninism. Aspiration to hegemony of the world Communist movement is their political aim. The methods they use, which they have borrowed from the Trotskyites, are unbridled demagogy and pseudo-revolutionary phrase-mongering, designed to disguise their departure from the cardinal principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. They also slander the fraternal parties, urge the formation in their ranks of anti-Party and near-Party factional groups and carry on open splitting activities.

The credo of this modern "left-wing" opportunism which found its fullest expression in the notorious 25 points of the CPC Central Committee letter of June 14, 1963, has been duly appraised in the documents of the February CPSU Central Committee Meeting and in the statements of fraternal parties. Taking just one theoretical and political problem we would like to show the real worth of the "theoretical" inventions of the Peking leaders and the purpose these inventions pursue.

The Chinese leaders, in gradually increasing the range of problems in which they are trying to impose their viewpoint on fraternal parties, have now selected as the object of attack the internal affairs of the Marxist-Leninist parties and especially the CPSU, concentrating their fire on our Party's Program adopted at the Twenty-Second Congress. The Peking ideologists who are trimming Marxism-Leninism "to suit the Chinese fashion," do not agree, among other things, that a proletarian Party can become a Party of the people. They reject our Party Program conclusions that the CPSU has become a Party of the entire people. They allege that this conclusion is nothing but "organizational and moral disarmament of the proletariat" and even a "service rendered for the restoration of capitalism."

Naturally they cannot adduce any proof on this score and try to compensate for the absence of argument by slander and lies. They are careful enough to avoid a serious study of the real state of affairs. But since these lies are being disseminated on a grand scale through all possible channels, we are obliged to take up the issue.

DIALECTICS OF PARTY DEVELOPMENT

Marxists have never doubted that the development of a Communist Party, like the development of every social organism, follows the laws of dialectics. A Party, like everything else in the world, has its past, present and future.

The specific features of the development of parties in different countries notwithstanding, it is not hard to see some common features in this development. Usually beginning as a small group of closely united like-minded people, a Party, on joining the workers' movement, turns into a force capable of guiding the broad popular masses. This is borne out by the history of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and of many other Communist and Workers' parties.

A Marxist-Leninist Party passes through three stages of development: 1. gathering strength, preparing the working class for struggle, overthrowing the exploiters' rule and establishing the dictatorship of the proletariat; 2. building socialism, the first phase of communism; 3. building communist society. These stages are distinguished not only by the tasks confronting the Party and the conditions in which it has to operate, but also by the place of the Party in society.

When a revolutionary Marxist Party was being formed in Russia, Lenin attached special importance to a precise definition of its class nature and of the immediate and ultimate goals of the workers' struggle. Lenin insisted that "it is necessary, first of all, to fence off ourselves from all, to single out only and exceptionally the proletariat, and then declare that the proletariat will liberate all and that it appeals to all and invites all to action" (Lenin, Selected Works, Vol. 2, p. 132).

Only the working class can set itself, and what is more can attain, the goal of abolishing all forms of exploitation of man by man and building communist society, a classless society. No other class can lead the struggle of all the working and exploited people and weld their efforts together. Only the working class in fighting for power is not interested in the subsequent perpetuation of its class domination, for it aims at abolishing all classes and all domination. This special role and position of the working class also determines the place in society of its political party as a party of the proletariat, a party of struggle for the dictatorship of the proletariat.

Yet, though it emphasizes its class nature, the Party does not in the least isolate itself from other, non-proletarian working groups of the population. On the contrary, it considers that the vanguard of the working class can express its class interests only if it voices and defends the interests of an overwhelming majority of the people, of all working men. The idea of narrow guild interests is alien to it. The working class becomes genuinely revolutionary only to the extent that it comes out in all activities and in all spheres of life as leader of all working and exploited people.

Already in its first Program, which was worked out with Lenin's direct participation, the Party declared that it undertook to represent the interests of all working people. This by no means implied that the Party renounced its proletarian class position; on the contrary, this implied profound understanding of the special historical role of the working class and of its special position in society. "The Party of the working class, the Social Democrats," said the Program, "urges all sections of the working and exploited people to join its ranks inasmuch as they come to adhere to the viewpoint of the proletariat" (The CPSU in Resolutions, Part 1, 7th edition, p. 39, Russ. Ed.)

On the eve of the October Revolution in Russia the Party of the working class came out as a true champion of national interests. This was one of the reasons for the mass support given to the Party's policy, and for the success of the socialist revolution. The October Revolution, developing as it did under the guidance of the Communist Party, was a proletarian and socialist revolution and at the same time a popular revolution: the working class tackled the decisive issues of the life of society "as the representative of the whole nation, of all that was virile and honest in all the classes" (Lenin, Works, Vol. 26, p. 75).

Describing the changed position of the Party after it became the ruling party, Lenin, in his Message to All Party Members and to All the Toiling Classes of Russia published on the next day after the revolution, called the Communist Party a "Party of Soviet majority" and stressed that it reliably guarded the interests of the workers, soldiers and peasants who followed the Party and were ready to win the victory for peace and socialism (Lenin, Works, Vol. 26 p. 273). In that period the "Soviet majority" comprised the workers, the peasants and all other working men who constituted the Russian people. In many of his writings Lenin emphasized that the Party's strength lies in that it correctly expresses the consciousness of the people.

Marxists have never confused the social composition of the Party with the interests of the different social groups it expresses. The broader the following of the social forces which the Party leads the more essential is the need to preserve its proletarian essence as a guarantee of firmness and consistency in the implementation of revolutionary changes.

With the victorious socialist revolution begins a whole period of radical reorganization of society on socialist lines, eliminating all the exploiting classes and creating conditions for a gradual erasing of distinctions between the toiling classes. As the proletariat remoulds itself in the course of revolutionary change, many things change also in the Party itself, in its composition and methods of work.

At the beginning of the transition period the Party takes all necessary steps to protect its ranks from penetration by non-proletarian elements, but when the basic problems of the transition period have been solved, it makes admittance easier for all those sincerely wishing to apply themselves actively to the building of socialism and communism. The accomplishment of the tasks of socialist construction brought about a change in the class structure of Soviet society, the political awareness of the people grew, the Party became nearer and dearer to all groups of the working people, and its ideals were accepted on an ever greater scale by people as their own ideals.

The Party, which came into being as the vanguard of the working class, steadily turned into the vanguard of all working people, of the Soviet people as a whole. This was recorded in the Constitution of the Soviet Union adopted in 1936. The Constitution says that "the more active and politically-conscious citizens among the working class, working peasants and working intellectuals voluntarily unite in the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, which is the vanguard of the working people in their struggle to build communist society..."

It took the Party almost 20 years to overcome the difficulties of the transition period and embark on the path leading to the completion of soscialist construction and gradual development of socialism into communism. Because of this, the terms of admission to the Party were different for workers and for other groups of the working people from the first years of the New Economic Policy until 1939. But at its 18th Congess, in 1939, when the transition period was over, the Party lifted the different terms of admittance (depending on social status) and introduced equal terms for all—workers, peasants or intellectuals. This was an expression of the historical fact that the non-proletarian groups of the working people had undergone radical change not only in their socio-economic conditions but also in their ideological make-up. It was also a result of the Party's assessment of the new situation which had developed as a result of the victory of socialism; and paved the way for a gradual transformation of the Communist Party into a Party of the whole people.

A terrible and devastating war had interrupted the process of development of socialist relations into communist relations, the building of the material and technical basis of communism. The process of the Party's development into a Party of the whole people was slowed down also by the Stalin personality cult and the accompanying methods of leadership alien to a Leninist Party, and by violations of the democratic rules of Party life.

However, when the country had recovered from the last war, and the Party, enriched with new experience, had worked out and substantiated the way for building communism, when resolute measures had been taken for overcoming the Stalin cult and its harmful consequences, the natural tendency of the Party to gradually develop into a Party of the whole people became especially strongly marked.

The outstanding achievements in the construction of socialism, the tremendous growth in the Soviet Union's economic and defense power resulting from this, and the formation and strengthening of the socialist world system made the victory of socialism in the U.S.S.R. both complete and final. Because of a growing affinity between the public property and collective-farmer co-operative property, the higher cultural standards of all the people, the process of erasing class distinctions between the workers and peasants gained momentum as did the process of erasing the distinctions between these two classes and the intellectuals. This consolidated the social homogeneity of Soviet society. The ideology of the working class and of the Party, its vanguard, became the ideology of the whole people.

These changes were bound to be reflected in the nature of the Party, in its composition and role in the life of society. This found expression in the Program and the Rules of the Party adopted at the 22nd CPSU Congress. Both the Program and the Rules emphasize that in the conditions of full-scale construction of communism the Communist Party has become a Party of the whole people.

Having embarked upon full-scale construction of communism the Party reviewed the results of its work in the years of Soviet power and was able to draw, in its new Program, the following conclusion: "As a result of the victory of socialism in the U.S.S.R. and the consolidation of the unity of Soviet society, the Communist Party of the working class has become the vanguard of the Soviet people, a Party of the whole people, and has extended its guiding influence to all spheres of social life." This theoretical conclusion is not a slogan, projected into the future, but a declaration of the actual state of our Party. It sums up the stupendous socio-economic changes which have taken place in the country. It is the concentrated expression of the many years of the Party's struggle for the establishment of the dictatorship of the proletariat, of the results of its work in organizing the building of a new social system, socialist reconstruction of the economy, remoulding the social relations and the world outlook of millions of people, the struggle for the consolidation of the socio-political unity of the Soviet people. The Communist Party of the Soviet Union has not ceased to be a Party of the working class, for it continues to represent its communist ideals. Yet, the Communist Party in our country has become something more than the Party of the working class alone. It is now a Party of the whole people because all Soviet people have accepted the Marxist-Leninist world outlook of the working class and its ideals. These are the vital dialectics of the development of Soviet society.

In the period of socialist construction in our country there were classes and social groups that were hostile to the working class, groups that wavered between socialism and capitalism, between the working class and the bourgeoisie. At that time the Party which embodied the class positions of the proletariat waged a long and difficult struggle to win first the majority of the people, and then the entire people, to the side of the working class. The conclusion that our Party has become a party of the whole people is an acknowledgement of the fact that this struggle has been crowned with complete success.

All Soviet working people—the peasants, former artisans and working intellectuals—gradually took the side of the working class and came to realize the community of their interests with those of the working class as expressed in the fullest possible way by the Communist Party. In the course of the struggle for the triumph of socialism all Soviet people came to accept the policy of the Communist Party as their own, to accept the Party's guidance and today regard the Party as the sole champion of the common interests of all working people. That is why the party of the working class has become a party of the whole people.

Our Party is definitely a party of the people in its goals, its policy to achieve these goals and in its composition (the best people from all sections of Soviet society are represented in it: the workers, the peasants and the intellectuals). The entire Soviet people are interested in the attainment of the ultimate goal—communism, and this is the firmest foundation for a party of the entire people, the organizer and leader of the work of building communism.

The democratic methods of its activities also conform to the nature of a party of the whole people. The CPSU is backed by the moral prestige of its policy and leadership and the acknowledgement of this by the broadest mass of the population. The Party invites the people to discuss the most important economic and political problems of development and takes guidance from the people's collective reason. "The strength of our Party lies in the fact," says N.S. Khrushchov, "that it acts jointly with the entire people and that non-Party working people work side by side with Party members" (The Construction of Communism in the USSR and the Development of Agriculture, Vol. 4, p. 102, Russ. Ed.).

The new Program has recorded what has already become a reality and will become more and more apparent in the future. The conclusion that there are no longer any classes or sections of society hostile to socialism and, consequently, no class struggle in Soviet society, that the Soviet state is a state of the whole people and that the CPSU is a party of the whole people, are not abstract formulas.

They spring from the life of our society, the Party's realistic policy, which corresponds to the new historical period, and is aimed at enlisting all Soviet people in building communism and the management of society, at promoting the people's activity and extending socialist democracy.

Marxism-Leninism does not regard the transformation of the CPSU into a Party of the whole people as a single act; it views this transformation as a process begun a long time ago and calling for a further improvement in the methods of Party guidance and for the Party and the people drawing still closer to one another. In the past our Party was a party of a single class, now it is a party of the whole people, and in future—mature communism—it will gradually develop into a new type of organization of society.

Theoretically it can be assumed that the Communist Party will not exist for ever as a political organization: there will be no need for it when a mature communist society has been built. But it will remain as a public organization necessary for managing the affairs of society. Lenin expressed this idea in one of the most important documents of the Second Congress of the Comintern, in the resolution "The Role of the Communist Party in the Proletarian Revolution." This document drew the conclusion that towards the final victory of communism there may take place a gradual merger of the three main types of organization—the Soviets, the trade unions and the Party—into a single type of organization. It is hard to say now how this process will proceed in actual life. But the theoretical direction given to it by Lenin is already being borne out by life.

These are the dialectics of the development of the Communist Party and it is natural that the conclusions set forth in the documents of the 22nd Congress of the CPSU should have met with the complete understanding of Marxist-Leninists all over the world. They were accepted by all who, in studying the life of society, proceed from Marxism-Leninism which demands that one should "take cognizance of actual events, of the precise facts of reality, and not cling to a theory of yesterday, which, like all theories, at best only outlines the main and the general, and only approximates to an inclusive grasp of the complexities of life" (Lenin, Works, Vol. 24, p. 26).

MAIN ARGUMENT OF THE CHINESE THEORISTS

What is apparent to every Marxist-Leninist who accepts the laws of dialectics not merely in words, but wants to use them as a guide in analyzing social phenomena, evokes sharp protest on the part of the Chinese leaders.

The Chinese leaders do not take up the theoretical problems of Party development. They are clearly unwilling to disclose their obvious departure from the basic or, as they like to put it, "general"

Marxist truths. As the initial prerequisite for their attacks on the CPSU Program the Chinese "theorists" set forth this sole argument: "the dictatorship of the proletariat is inevitable until a country enters a higher phase of communist society." They assert that the "withering away of the dictatorship of the proletariat is the withering away of the state," and as long as the dictatorship of the proletariat exists, the Party should also be a party of the proletariat. Not in the least abashed in asserting this, the Chinese leaders ascribe their own inventions to Marx and Lenin and "defend" them from "modern revisionists." Let us see, however, from whom the Marxist-Leninist theory of the State and the Party should be defended.

Perhaps it should be guarded against those who see no difference between the bourgeois state, the state of the transitional period from capitalism to socialism and the state of a mature socialist society advancing to a higher phase of communism? Perhaps it should be defended from those who apply the same old formulas to all periods of history?

The Chinese leaders deliberately impose the laws of the transitional period from capitalism to socialism on socialist society in general. In their articles they cite only those quotations from the works of Marx, Engels and Lenin in which communism is regarded as a socio-economic formation generally. Anyone who has taken the trouble to study conscientiously the works of Marx and Lenin knows full well that they distinguished different phases in this formation: the first phase—socialism, and the higher phase—complete communism.

In his Critique of the Gotha Programme, Marx wrote: "Between capitalist and communist society lies the period of the revolutionary transformation of the first into the second. This period conforms also with the political transitional period and the state of this period cannot be anything but a revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat" (Marx and Engels, Works, Second Ed., Vol. 19, p. 27, Russ. Ed.).

It is actually this quotation, snatched out of context of Marx's exposition, that is used as a theoretical basis for "rejecting" the CPSU Program's thesis about the state of the whole people. The Peking propagandists do not anywhere quote the following two lines from the same work, which says this apropos the Gotha Program: "But the program does not concern itself with either this last (i.e., the dictatorship of the proletariat—Ed.) or the future statehood in communist society." (Our emphasis—Ed.)

If one were to follow the logic of the Chinese "theoreticians," Marx should be declared an anti-Marxist for expressing this idea. Indeed, what statehood will follow the dictatorship of the proletariat, the withering away of which, in the Chinese theoreticians' opinion, is the withering away of statehood in general?

The "Chinese-style Marxists" stubbornly deny that when Marx spoke about the period of transition from capitalism to communism he had in mind the first phase of communism—socialism. They also remain silent about Lenin's conclusion in "The State and Revolution and other works, where he carefully summed up everything Marx and Engel had said on the state, namely that: "What is usually called socialism was termed by Marx the 'first' or lower phase of communist society. Insofar as the means of production become common property, the word 'communism' is also applicable here, provided we do not forget that it is not complete communism" (Works, Vol. 25, p. 442).

Lenin clearly defined also the essence and aims of the dictatorship of the proletariat as a special form of class alliance between the proletariat and the numerous non-proletarian groups of the working people aimed at complete overthrow of capitalism, suppression of the resistance of the bourgeoisie and their attempts at restoring capitalism, an alliance for the final establishment and consolidation of socialism (Works, Vol. 29, p. 351). Removal of the danger of capitalist restoration signifies, in his opinion, also "the cessation of the dictatorship of the proletariat" (Works, Vol. 33, p. 75). Lenin did not ignore Marx's profound idea of "the future statehood of communist society," which emerges after the dictatorship of the proletariat has fulfilled its historical mission.

Developing Marx's views on this question, Lenin writes:

"Thus, even 'communist society' will have statehood!! Isn't there a contradiction here?

"No, there is not:

"I—in capitalist society—the state in the proper sense

"II—transition (the dictatorship of the proletariat): the state of a transitional type (not the state in the proper sense)

"III—communist society: the withering away of the state

"Full consistency and clarity!!

"Otherwise:

"I—democracy as an exception only, never a full one . . .

"II—democracy almost full, limited only by suppression of the resistance of the bourgeoisie

"III—democracy genuinely full, becoming habitual and therefore withering away . . ." (Marxism on the State, pp. 53-55).

In our country the first two periods noted by Lenin above are already things of the past. A state of the whole people has emerged and is developing in the Soviet Union—communist statehood, the statehood of the first phase of communism. This new communist statehood is destined to develop gradually into communist public self-government, and this development is not a theoretical forecast any longer, but something that is taking place in Soviet life.

The dictatorship of the proletariat is indispensable for the transition to socialism. It is necessary in state form for the complete and final victory of socialism. But by virtue of the laws of its internal development, at a definite stage—the stage of mature socialism—the state of the dictatorship of the proletariat turns into the state of the whole people. And the latter is a most important landmark on the way to the development of socialist statehood into communist public self-government, on the way to the withering away of the state in general.

Powerless to prove anything in substance, the Chinese "theoreticians" resort to the following argument. They assert: "Anyone with an elementary knowledge of Marxism-Leninism knows that the so-called state of the whole people is nothing new. Representative bourgeois figures always called the bourgeois state a 'state of the whole people,' or a 'state in which power belongs to all the people'."

A strong argument, indeed! By this logic, Communists would have to renounce socialism because there exist many different anti-Marxist "socialist" doctrines. They would also have to abandon the realization of such slogans as freedom, equality, fraternity, democracy for the sole reason that they were put forward by the bourgeois revolution and subsequently perverted and debased by the bourgeoisie on coming to power. Communists, on the contrary, maintain that the true meaning of these slogans should be revived, that these slogans should be carried into practice, and that this is possible only under socialism and communism. The same applies to the state of the whole people. When Lassalle spoke about such a state, or when imperialist ideologists speak of it today, the Marxists rightly reply: this is deception of the people. A state of the whole people or a party of the whole people cannot exist in a society split into hostile classes. A state of the whole people that develops out of the dictatorship of the proletariat which has accomplished its historic mission with the complete and final victory of socialism and the country's entry into the period of full-scale communist construction, is an entirely different matter.

Having got tied up in the importunate repetition of quotations snatched out of context and seeing the senselessness of the attempt to palm off distortion of Marxism as genuine Marxism, the Chinese propagandists are trying to make believe that the Soviet Union is still going through the transitional period, that the question "who will win" has not yet been solved completely and finally in our country, that "there still exists the danger of restoration of capitalism," and that therefore there is still need for the dictatorship of the proletariat and the proletarian Party. These ideas are given wide publicity by the Chinese press. Specifically, they are contained in the briefing speech Chou Yang, assistant head of the propaganda department of the Central Committee of the CPC, made before social science workers on October 26, 1963.

The Chinese leaders would like to see the Soviet Union not as it is today, but in the conditions which obtained some 35 years ago, during the NEP period. Can one argue with people resorting to such methods? Perhaps, they should be referred to pronouncements of the man whose ideas they accept unreservedly and whose name they readily use in the struggle against the CPSU and the international Communist movement.

For some reason the Chinese leaders pretend that they have not read Stalin's report on the New Constitution, or his report to the 18th Congress of the Party, or his other speeches in which it is pointed out that already in the mid-thirties the question "who will win" was solved in the Soviet Union once and for all, the exploiting classes were liquidated, and socialism scored a complete victory. To believe the Chinese leaders, the Soviet Union has made no progress since then, and, what is more, the country still faces problems that were solved long ago.

That classes still exist under socialism is axiomatic. The important thing is what kind of classes. Socialist society in the U.S.S.R. consists of friendly classes—the workers and peasants, and the social group of the people's intelligentsia. They are welded together by the community of vital interests, by Marxist-Leninist ideology, and by a common goal: the building of communism.

Whereas the period of transition from capitalism to socialism is characterized by the existence of overthrown but not yet liquidated exploiting classes and, consequently, by class struggle, the transition from socialism to communism takes place in the condition of socio-political and ideological unity of society. The Chinese leaders do not want to reckon with this. Evidently they believe that the CPSU should pursue a policy of class struggle in the country, artificially foment enmity between the workers and collective farmers, egg on the workers and the collective farmers against the intelligentsia.

Why does the CPC leadership, despite self-evident facts, fabricate concoctions about class struggle in Soviet society? The purpose of these specious and at the same time very naive methods is not hard to guess. Their heads turning from outstanding victories in the national-liberation revolution, which chiefly accomplished anti-imperialist, bourgeois-democratic tasks, the leaders of the Communist Party of China clearly underestimated both the difficulties of the transitional period and the time needed for it. The mania of hegemonism drove them onto the path of adventurist leaps in the economy. Take the question of Party building. Already at the Eighth Congress in 1956, i.e., only seven years after the victory of the revolution on a nation-wide scale, equal terms for admission into the Party were introduced, irrespective of social status. And this in an incomparably more petty-bourgeois country than Russia used to be. The first successes in economic development and in uniting the peasants in co-operatives turned the heads of the Chinese leaders, gave them the idea that the transitional period was already past and that, through the communes, China would be able to attain communism rapidly—sooner than the socialist countries of Europe, the Soviet Union included.

Objective reality hits back cruelly when disregarded. The economically unsubstantiated, maximalist slogans fell through and the country's economy paid dearly for them. Then, seeking to conceal its miscalculations, the Chinese leadership launched a noisy propaganda campaign designed to make believe that not only in China, but also in the U.S.S.R. and all socialist countries the tasks of the transitional period had not been accomplished, that the U.S.S.R. was a country somewhat richer than China but as far removed from communism as China with respect to social gains.

This is tantamount to insisting at noon that it is only daybreak. Such statements show that the people who make them could not care less for what time it really is.

The CPC leaders declaim with shrill revolutionary zeal: "In the view of Marxist-Leninists, there is no such thing as a non-class or supra-class political party. All political parties have a class character. Party spirit is the concentrated expression of class character." This is a truism of Marxism-Leninism. But the Chinese ideologists are not inclined to ponder over problems raised by life: in what is the class character of a Marxist-Leninist party expressed in socialist society free from antagonistic classes, where the exploiters have been liquidated and exploitation of man by man abolished forever, where the socio-political unity of society has been consolidated?

Communists reply: the class character of a Marxist-Leninist party in such a society is expressed in its loyalty to communism—that supreme class principle of the international proletariat; in the building of communism—that ultimate goal of the international working class. It is expressed in its irreconcilable attitude towards capitalism and the exploiters and all forms of imperialist, national and political oppression.

"Sinified Marxism" treats all matters, regardless of place and circumstances, in a primitive fashion, following one stereotyped pattern, the same for all times and types of society: parties—antagonistic classes—class struggle. Why should our country revert to stages of life that are already past history, just because the Chinese leaders do not want to or cannot understand the life of our socialist country, the struggle of our people for communism, and just because they assess the situation in other countries only by the situation in their own. In order to understand class nature correctly, in the Leninist way, the Chinese leaders should go by the facts of life and not by primitive, stereotyped patterns, or, as they like to say themselves, "walk on both legs and not on one or on one and a half."

WHAT DO THEY NEED THIS FOR?

It is wrong to regard the Chinese leaders as people who are genuinely interested in having a discussion on questions of principle, in finding out the truth. The methods they use show clearly that there is a definite purpose behind all their fulmination against those who regard the transformation of a proletarian party into a party of the whole people as a logical process.

Historically, it so happened that the propositions on the nature of the CPSU as a party of the whole people were elaborated at a time when the Party was combating the effects of the Stalin cult and when objective possibilities had been created in the country for a fuller satisfaction of the people's requirements.

The Chinese leaders are highly sensitive about this. Denying the popular character of the CPSU, they are indignant over the fact that the Soviet Communists "tirelessly propagate such slogans as 'everything in the name of man, for the benefit of man'." In his briefing report, Chou Yang does not have the courage to admit that in the present conditions the level of productive forces in China and the adventurist, subjectivist course of the Chinese leaders do not allow them to pursue such a policy. Therefore the thesis is "substantiated" that the slogan "everything in the name of man" can be put forward "only with the advent of the epoch of communism all over the world." Carried away in briefing social science workers, Chou Yang "forgets" what is written in the Rules of the CPC adopted in 1956, when the Chinese leaders pursued a basically correct policy. Yet the Rules of the CPC say that "the chief aim of the entire work of the Party is to satisfy to the maximum the material and cultural requirements of the people" (see Records of the Eighth National Congress of the CPC, p. 509), which only differs verbally from the wording now being criticized by the Chinese leaders. This is yet another example of departure from correct positions, of a revision of even their own documents, revealing the theoretical and political inconsistency of the CPC leaders. Evidently China's internal situation does not enable Chinese leaders to speak of raising the well-being of the people now. That is why they clamp down upon a party which regards concern for the welfare of the people as the supreme principle of its activities.

The struggle against the Stalin cult launched by the CPSU was obviously unpalatable to the Chinese leaders, because it hit at the personality cult which has assumed truly unheard-of proportions in China. Having admitted, at first, that the 20th Congress of the CPSU "has given convincing explanations of the tremendous importance of strict observance of the principle of collective leadership and of the struggle against the personality cult," Peking declared soon afterwards that the struggle of the CPSU and of the entire international Communist movement against the personality cult was "erroneous" and "harmful." The Chinese leaders use Stalin's name in order to laud fallacious methods of leadership, camouflage violations of the standards of Party life and, while extolling themselves, slander the leaders of other Communist parties who denounce the unseemly behaviour of the Peking splitters.

Visitors to China get a distinct impression that the study of Marxism-Leninism there is limited to the study of the works of one person only. At any rate nobody says that he reads works by Marx and Engels, that he has read at least one work by the founders of scientific communism. The infinitesimal number of copies of Lenin's Works published in China makes them practically inaccessible to readers at large.

But the works of Mao Tse-tung, issued in a printing of more than 380 million copies, are described everywhere as the sun illuminating the road, as the ultimate in wisdom. Party members are urged to keep Mao's works in three places—at home, in the pocket and at your place of work, and to recall Mao's behests at least three times a day. The pious attitude towards Mao's personality is also manifested in that he is thanked for the food the Chinese receive, for the health of the children, for a stroke of luck.

It is not hard to understand why the Chinese leaders ,having created such a mystical atmosphere around Mao's personality, oppose the CPSU, which has boldly exposed the Stalin cult and demonstrated the incompatibility of any personality cult with Marxism-Leninism.

The Chinese leaders are inculcating in the Party practices which have little in common with democracy, and cultivating morals notoriously known as an inevitable product of the personality cult.

The Eighth Congress of the CPC described it as a serious shortcoming that no Party congress had been convened in the previous 11 years. This self-criticism, however, was purely formal. According to the new Rules, congresses are to be convened once every five years, but nothing has been heard about the next CPC Congress, although more than seven and a half years have passed since the Eighth Congress. Furthermore, if one recalls that in the past four years the CPC leaders have made such a sharp turn in policy which only a Congress should have the authority to make, it will become even clearer why the Chinese leaders revile the proposition about the popular character of the Party and the broadening of democratic practices stemming from these propositions.

If the leaders of the Communist Party of China were more consistent, they would have "to expose" the documents of the 8th Congress of their own Party. For these documents speak of the fallaciousness of attempts to build socialism singlehanded, in isolation from the rest of the world (see Records of the Eighth National Congress of the CPC, Gospolitizdat, 1956, p. 132. Russ. Ed.); of experience having shown that whenever leaders tried to set an unrealistic pace they have been brought up sharply—"more haste, less speed" (p. 224); of the great importance of the assistance rendered by the Soviet Union and other socialist countries to People's China (pp. 4, 125, 164, etc.); of the impermissibility of arrogant, Great-Power attitudes and conceit because of the victory of the revolution and certain successes in construction (p. 5); of petty-bourgeois vices being like weeds which "are not completely burned down by the steppe fire and grow again at a whiff of the spring wind" (p. 374). All this appears today as sharp criticism of the present line of the Chinese leaders. The CPC leaders behave as if there had been no 8th Congress of the Party. Instead, they violently attack everything that is being done in the Soviet Union, and the criticism of the idea of the popular character of the Party is merely a part of their efforts to distract the Chinese people from the internal hardships resulting from their incorrect policy.

In recent years the Chinese press has been treating questions of Party life more and more sparingly, and has written very little about methods of Party leadership. This subject is being avoided, and treated as a kind of "military secret." An idea of the prevailing style can be gained from the persistent claims that "policy is the commanding force," a proposition serving as a theoretical substantiation, as it were of voluntarism and administration by mere injunction, and as an admission, made from time to time by provincial newspapers, that not a few Party workers have become accustomed to being sole taskmasters, whom the people call "living Buddhas," and that the provinces have acquired their own "cults of the individual."

It is common knowledge that the less Party democracy there is, the larger the Party apparatus. In no other Communist Party is the Party apparatus so colossal as in the CPC. For example, in 1960 there were more than 100 full-time Party functionaries for 3,500 Communists in the Fushun coal fields. In Anshan, there were 2,510 full-time Party functionaries and public organizations workers for every 24,000 Party members. There are 510 members and 25 full-time Party workers at the Shanghai diesel-engine plant. For 4,750 employees this plant has 600 full-time public organizations workers. Thus, there is one full-time Party leader per 25 to 40 Communists. What this means in practice can be gauged from Mao Tse-tung's injunction that a Party secretary should be a good "squad leader" (see the Records of the Eighth National Congress, p. 295). This view is referred to, daily guidance is taken from it, and a secretary is indeed regarded as a commander, a Party organization as a military unit, and Party life as army routine. Today one may also see the following maxim in the Chinese press: "Every first secretary is a commander-in-chief."

An idea of the relations between Party leaders and the rank and file is given by the so-called huipao system which grossly contradicts Marxist-Leninist concepts of Party life. According to this system, every Communist regularly reports to his secretary on his work and life. In doing so he must abide by Mao Tse-tung's dictum: "If you know, say so; if you say, say everything. There is no reproach to him who cautions, but a precept to him who heeds." In other words, a Communist is demanded to confess everything, including his sentiments, doubts, etc., and not only his own, but also those of the people he meets. Advertised as the leaders' "solicitude" for Party members but in reality a legalized system of denunciation, huipao creates an oppressive atmosphere in Party organizations and produces adulators, slanderers and careerists.

The same aim is pursued by the method of educating people by the positive examples of those who are "boundlessly devoted to the ideas of Mao Tse-tung," a method designed to substitute criticism and self-criticism.

Only a few years ago the CPC leaders criticized the views and style of work, alien to Marxism-Leninism, that were current in the Party: "subjectivism in ideology, red-tape in work, and sectarianism in organization" (The Eighth National Congress of the CPC, p. 5). Today, no trace is left of the criticism of these vices, which have assumed incomparably greater dimensions. The CPC leaders prefer slander against fraternal parties to honest self-criticism. But this method has never helped to resolve internal problems.

Development of a Communist party into a Party of the whole people is an objective law. The socialist nature of the People's Republic of China will lead to a situation where, with the growth of the productive forces, with further changes in the social structure of society, this law will make its way in China as well. The present leadership of the CPC is hampering this process. But people cannot revoke the laws of social development of their own free will. The time will come when there will be inscribed, in the history of the CPC, pages wrathfully condemning those who in their time wanted to supplant Marxism-Leninism by a petty-bourgeois nationalist ideology, to reverse the march of history.

LETTER FROM CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF GERMANY TO CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF CHINA*

Dear Comrades,

As you are no doubt aware, our Party has taken a firm principled stand on the question of the differences that have arisen between the leaders of the Communist Party of China and the world Communist movement. Our position rests on the principles of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, on the joint decisions of the Moscow Meetings of 1957 and 1960. At the same time, our attitude in this question derives from the experience of the German revolutionary working-class movement over the years, the experience of struggle against Right and Left-opportunism, the needs of our present-day struggle to combat West-German imperialism and militarism, and also our firm faith in the recognized vanguard of the international Communist movement—the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and its Central Committee led by Comrade N. S. Khrushchov.

In the interests of the unity of the world Communist movement and in order to avoid exacerbating the differences unnecessarily, our Party has displayed maximum restraint in the public polemic. For this reason we welcomed the proposal to end the public debate made by Comrade Khrushchov on behalf of the CPSU at the Sixth Congress of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany in 1963—a proposal prompted by a high sense of responsibility for the unity of the revolutionary working-class movement and the socialist states—and we have abided by this proposal. Although the mounting attacks by the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party against the general line adopted at the Moscow Meetings of 1957 and 1960 have compelled us to ask ourselves again and again whether we ought not to reply publicly, our Party, even at its 1963 Congress, refrained from open debate.

It was only when the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party began to conduct the polemic in an increasingly virulent form and intensified its insulting sallies against the CPSU and many other fraternal parties, resorting to the open circulation of its materials through legal channels with the aid of the Federal German authorities which are persecuting our Party—it was only then that we felt compelled to come out openly against these sallies and to set forth our viewpoint with utmost clarity; this we did in the Statement of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee issued in August 1963 and the decision of the Second Plenary Meeting of our Central Committee at th end of 1963. After all, you cannot fail to realize what it means for a party outlawed by a monopoly government to find its policy attacked by the leadership of a fraternal party in documents circulated with the aid of that very government.

*Freies Volk, May, 1964

In the decision of the Second Plenary Meeting of our Central Committee we once again endorsed the proposal to terminate the public polemic in the interests of the unity of the world Communist movement and to create a favorable atmosphere for thoroughly thrashing out the differences.

Exercising the greatest self-restraint, we refrained even in the past few months from conducting the controversy in public, for we hoped that the leadership of the Communist Party of China would finally heed the insistent appeals addressed to it by many fraternal parties, including our own Party.

However, our hopes were cruelly disappointed. We now find ourselves faced with the following situation: your documents containing attacks on the general line of the world Communist movement, outrageous slander against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and many other fraternal parties, and also attacks on the policy of our own Party, are being circulated on an increasing scale with the active support of the reactionary Bonn state machine. We are in possession of sufficient incontrovertible proof that the Department for the Protection of the Constitution, a police organization which specializes in the persecution of all peace-loving, democratic and socialist movements, is directly engaged in the planned distribution of your materials. This same department is also working to activize the few insignificent Trotskyite groups, which are being supplied with materials issued by the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party and are instigated to carry on disruptive and subversive work within our Party. We have evidence that the Department for the Protection of the Constitution has set up a special division to study the question of how to utilize the policy of the Chinese Party leadeship for the purpose of: (a) subverting the Communist Party of Germany; (b) preventing united action by Social Democrats and Communists and co-operation among all democratic forces; (c) stepping up psychological warfare against the German Democratic Republic and the Soviet Union.

This activity on the part of the political police of the Federal Republic has assumed such proportions and become so obvious that the liberal bourgeois journal Der Spiegel has commented on it in some detail.

In view of this situation the Central Committee of our Party has once again examined the question of whether to continue to abide by our decision to end the public debate when you continue to attack the general line of the world Communist movement in a form that has long since exceeded all permissible bounds. It is with a feeling of deep outrage that we read in your materials the type of slanderous assaults on the CPSU and many other fraternal parties which have hitherto emanated only from the imperialist enemies of the working-class movement. We have also been greatly shocked by the attempt in your materials to justify a split in the world Communist movement as allegedly inevitable, openly to intervene in the internal affairs of the fraternal parties, and, with the help of Trotskyite and other elements, to create factions in the various Communist parties, including our own Party. We find equally reprehensible your undisguised support of the disruptive groupings which have long been waging a struggle against the Communist parties.

We should like to repeat here once again that we emphatically reject the slander which the leadership of the Communist Party of China is levelling at the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, its Central Committee and Comrade Khrushchov. Fraternal militant cooperation with the CPSU is a cherished tradition of the CPG and it will never allow the Party of Lenin to be vilified and insulted in its hearing. The decisions of the 20th, 21st and 22nd congresses of the CPSU were an outstanding contribution to the creative development of Marxism-Leninism and gave new and powerful impetus to the entire international Communist movement. The significance of the 20th Congress was duly recognized by the entire world Communist movement in the 1957 and 1960 documents.

Dear Comrades! The Central Committee of our Party would like once again to make an earnest and insistent appeal to you to abandon the path of attacks and slander, the path of irrational exacerbation of the debate and interference in the internal affairs of fraternal parties. No one who is really concerned for the unity of the international Communist movement will interpret this appeal as a plea to avoid discussion of issues which are urgently in need of clarification. On the contrary, it is precisely in the interests of such clarification that the open polemic should be terminated and a businesslike atmosphere created free of irresponsible attacks.

As the leaders of a great socialist country you bear a very great responsibility for the preservation and consolidation of the unity of the socialist camp, for the unity and cohesion of the world Communist movement and all anti-imperialist forces.

We are firmly convinced that the leadership of the Communist Party of China will be guilty of a grave transgression against history and against the interests of their own people if it continues to carry on the open polemic and to persist in the policy of splitting the world Communist movement.

Therefore we earnestly appeal to you once again to end the open debate and the dispatch of materials to Western Germany which run counter to the line of our Party and the decisions of the Moscow Meetings in order that the differences of opinion might be thrashed out in a sober atmosphere and in the comradely form customary among Communists.

With Communist greetings,

MAX REIMANN,
First Secretary, Central Committee,
Communist Party of Germany.

MAJOR CONTRIBUTION TO STRENGTHENING OF WORKING-CLASS MOVEMENT

STATEMENT* OF CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF GERMANY ON REPORT OF COMRADE M. A. SUSLOV AT PLENARY MEETING OF CC, CPSU ON FEBRUARY 14, 1964.

The Central Committee of the Communist Party of Germany addressed a letter to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China, in which it set forth the principled standpoint of the Communist Party of Germany with regard to the differences between the Marxist-Leninist parties and the leaders of the Communist Party of China, suggesting once again that they desist from the public polemic and disruptive activity. This letter, prompted by a sense of high responsibility for the unity of the world Communist movement and the need to defend the jointly adopted decisions, was, however, left unanswered.

Contrary to common sense and to proletarian discipline, ignoring the dangers threatening the international working-class movement, and with the plaudits of the West-German reactionaries and revenge-seekers, the CPC leaders went on with the polemic and even developed it into an unbridled campaign of slander against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, its Central Committee and Comrade Khrushchov, and against the Marxist-Leninist leadership of other Communist and Workers' parties.

Therefore the Central Committee of the CPG approves the publication of Comrade Suslov's report "Struggle of the CPSU for the Unity of the World Communist Movement" and the resolution on this report adopted by the Plenary Meeting of the CPSU Central Committee on February 15, 1964. It recommends that all Party organizations thoroughly study these materials and distribute them among all sections of the population, especially among the Social Democrats and trade unionists.

The publication of these materials is a further major contribution enhancing the strength of the great ideas of Marxism-Leninism and, therefore, an inestimable aid in the struggle of all Communist and Workers' parties against imperialism and war, for peace, democracy and socialism. These materials serve to promote the unity and solidarity of the international Communist movement and provide the Communist and Workers' parties everywhere with a new political and ideological weapon in the struggle for the accomplishment of their tasks.

These documents show once again that the CPSU, and its Central Committee headed by Comrade Khrushchov, is the most experienced and mature Marxist-Leninist Party which displays wisdom, competence, self-control and firm adherence to principle in all situations, and is, therefore, a model for all Communist and Workers' parties.

The strong ties between all Communist and Workers' parties and the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, their fidelity to the jointly agreed decisions of 1957 and 1960, to the decisions of the 20th and 22nd Congresses of the CPSU are the guarantee of victory in the struggle for peace, peaceful coexistence and socialism the world over.

UNITY OF INTERNATIONAL WORKING-CLASS AND COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

REPORT* BY COMRADE PALMIRO TOGLIATTI TO THE JOINT PLENARY MEETING OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE AND CENTRAL AUDITING COMMISSION OF THE ITALIAN COMMUNIST PARTY.

As you know, during the closing months of last year there was a certain abatement in the polemics. During that period the leaders of the CPSU and notably Comrade Khrushchov on repeated occasions voiced the desire and proposed that an end be put to the bitter public polemic. This would have made it possible to discuss matters calmly, in the course of which agreement could have been reached, thus avoiding the danger of an open break and thereby reinforcing the unity of the international working class and Communist movement. In conformity with these proposals the Soviet comrades, from July 1963 onwards, abstained from publishing new polemical materials, confining themselves to the publication in December 1963 of a volume containing the materials that had been written in the previous months. We, like all the other parties in agreement with the position adopted by the Soviet leaders, likewise abstained for a certain time from continuing the polemics in the hope that this would open the way to contacts that would benefit unity, and that the dialogue between the parties would be conducted along reasonable and fruitful lines. It should be noted, however, that the Chinese comrades took an entirely different line of conduct. They expounded their positions in a 25-point program published in the summer of 1963. A fitting answer was given to them. Moreover, they continued to circulate materials criticizing and attacking the line of conduct of the Communist parties, to form small factional and disruptive groups in different countries.

All this notwithstanding, a kind of truce was reached, if only a partial one, at the beginning of the year. It was broken at the beginning of February, when a most violent article was published in the Chinese press and then broadcast and circulated in all countries, in which the leaders of the CPSU were accused of deliberately provoking a split in the world Communist movement by their "revisionist" policy. It all amounts to a repetition of the outworn arguments characteristic of the Chinese polemic, arguments which are far removed from the existing situation and tasks of the day. In the article in question, however, they are supposed to theoretically substantiate the necessity for a split in the revolutionary movement. Attacks are made accordingly against the Soviet leaders and especially against Khrushchov, which in their violence exceed all bounds, and the demand even made that the leadership of the CPSU be changed and also its policy.

*L'Unita, April 23, 1964. Abridged.

It was necessary to answer this and Comrade Suslov did so at a meeting of the Central Committee on February 15. The other parties were informed of this report, but it was not published immediately because it was not clear just then whether the Chinese leaders would agree, or not, to end the public polemic.

It was then, in fact that the leadership of the Roumanian Workers' Party took the initiative and asked the Soviet leaders to postpone publication of Suslov's report and decided to send a delegation of their own to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China in order to secure, through mediation, the termination of the open polemic. Their initiative did not yield positive results.

When, upon their return to Bucharest from Peking and after their meeting with Soviet leaders, the Roumanian leaders tried once again to follow up their initiative by making a new concrete proposal, the Chinese press renewed its violent attacks against the political line of the CPSU and the other Communist parties regarding the possibility of the peaceful development of the revolutionary working-class movement. We published a comprehensive resumé of this article which gives the comrades a chance to see that the Chinese as always, develop their polemics, not on the basis of a political analysis, an examination of the current situation and its perspectives in the different countries, but in accordance with their usual criterion, that of repeating quotations, falsifying our positions and repeating their accusations of revisionism, treachery, etc.

The publication of Comrade Suslov's report was therefore inevitable. As the comrades know, it contains a comprehensive, documented and reasoned confutation of the Chinese positions which were vigorously rejected. During his recent visit to Hungary and his meetings with the Polish comrades, Comrade Khrushchov exposed and denounced these positions. The report of Comrade Suslov should be widely circulated, studied, commented upon and discussed in the ranks of our Party. It contains a clear exposition of the line upheld by the CPSU in the international movement, in the dispute with the Chinese comrades. We are in agreement with this line in substance.

We might note here that we do not know what exactly was the position of the Chinese leaders regarding the proposals of the Soviet comrades to terminate the polemics or the more recent Roumanian proposals. However on the basis of the documents known to us it is our conviction that the Chinese comrades are not acting in good faith towards the other parties. It seems to us that they are following the method of opportunist diplomacy, aiming to assure themselves positions of advantage by refusing or inexplicably delaying giving exact, unequivocal answers. This is a rather serious and significant matter. If the Chinese leaders had really wanted to wage a struggle to save, as they say, the revolutionary movement from opportunism they would have acted quite differently, would have rejected these fraudulent methods which are not worth anything.

All this has led to the aggravation of the situation inside the international working-class and Communist movement, has created a serious threat to its unity and struck a blow at the confidence the millions of working people have in the revolutionary movement. It is therefore right and necessary that we, like the other Communist and Workers' parties, should attentively examine this new situation and the dangers inherent in it, that we should take our decisions or reaffirm decisions already taken, both as regards the substance of the questions and the method we think should be followed to safeguard and, in the future, to restore the unity of the entire movement. As you know, the proposal is made again in Comrade Suslov's report to hold an international meeting similar to the 1960 meting of the 81 parties. Several parties, and in the first place the French Communist Party, favor convening such a meeting. Others, like us, have on the contrary expressed their doubts, or are still considering the question. It would be advisable once more to express our viewpoint about this meeting (about which incidentally we have already publicly stated our position) in the light of the present situation.

The Italian Communist Party and the Polemic With the Chinese Comrades

However before proceeding any further, we must rid ourselves of the accumulative effect of the anti-Communist propaganda spread by all kinds of opponents and enemies of the revolutionary working-class movement with the object of causing confusion, provocations and reactionary agitation, and who in their campaign pursue two aims: on the one hand to have people believe that the Communist movement is on the brink of a terrible crisis and, on the other, to speculate on the positions of our Party, falsifying them in order to discredit us. The ultimate purpose of this campaign is clear. By sowing confusion, through inventions and falsifications often of a shameless character, to strike a blow at the vanguard forces of progress, democracy and peace. . . .

We would like to draw the attention of the Chinese leaders to this fact. It is strange that they do not see, or pretend not to see, that their activity, aimed at discrediting and splitting he Communist parties, that their violent struggle and smear campaign directed against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and Comrade Khrushchov are being used today by the propagandists of imperialism. When Marx and Lenin took issue with the opportunist or extremist trends in the working-class movement, the press of the big bourgeoisie never became the mouthpiece for their polemics or gave publicity to their arguments, as the reactionary press is doing today in regard to the Chinese attacks. This is further proof that Marx and Lenin acted in the interests of the revolutionary movement and its unity, which cannot be said of the actions of the Chinese comrades.

It may well be that the reactionary groups and leading conservative circles with their social-democratic, clerical or pseudo-democratic fellow-travellers think that our present international debate signifies a great crisis in the Communist and Socialist movement. But something quite different is happening. What is happening is that the socialist and Communist movement has reached the stage in its development when it has to tackle not only the task of elaborating theory and determining the perspective or objective development, the task of action and advance in different countries and sectors; it also has to tackle the task of realizing its own perspectives and aims on a world scale, the task of advancing, facing and resolving the problems that are of importance to the whole world. History shows that all ideological and practical movements developed and drew inspiration in profound debates, particularly when they reached the stage of their affirmation and development on a world scale.

If fresh proof of this truth is needed let our enemies and opponents, and also our luke-warm friends, note the fact that our debate concerns not only the problem of the struggle for progress which is being waged in the most diverse spheres and in all parts of the world. Let them note the fact that in all these spheres, despite the diversity of positions and situation, despite the difficulties, the resistance, the sharp counter-attacks of the enemy, and despite even our weaknesses and mistakes, we, Communists, are in the van of the fight for progress and peace, in the fight to change the economic and political structure of contemporary society and have new classes head this society. Let them convince themselves through reality. Our movement, despite internal differences, despite the fact that it debates its problems, and very sharply at times, is a movement before which all the principal roads of historical development are open, a movement which wants to explore these roads thoroughly in order to advance along them with greater assurance. The support given us by tens and hundreds of millions of people, the sympathy and hopes with which we are regarded throughout the world, confirms us in our belief.

As concerns the clamor that has been raised, and which still continues, the strange inventions and falsification of our Party's position in the present international debate, I think that we can simply regard them with a sense of ironic tolerance. All kinds of things have been said about us. To Saragat we are the most Chinese among the revolutionaries of the West. To others we are the most abject servants of Moscow and Khrushchov. To others still we have become, strangely enough, "conciliators" with the Chinese position.

Let us make an honest attempt to see the situation in its proper light. Our Party, far from being conciliatory or confused, has always been among the first parties which most decisively combated and rejected the position of the Chinese comrades. This was proved first of all at the meeting of the 81 parties when we explicitly reserved our opinion regarding the propositions in the resolution adopted which made unjustified concessions to the Chinese positions. This is evident from the documents published by us and which everybody can obtain. Later, and especially after the 22nd Congress of the CPSU, the polemic developed and the Chinese began their attacks, referring ambiguously to "certain parties" and "certain persons" who were accused of revisionism and much else. We therefore considered it necessary at our 10th Congress and, as a matter of fact already during the preparations for the congress, to put an end to this game, hardly a serious one, and unhesitatingly criticized and rejected the attitude of the Chinese Party on the most important points. The polemic was public and we subsequently became one of Peking's favourite targets for its attacks.

We replied to these attacks calmly and resolutely, reaffirming all our positions. At the same time, however, we openly raised the question of the unity of the international working-class, Communist and Socialist movements, stressing that this unity is precious and indispensable for the victory of our cause, and also that it must be achieved and defended regardless of the diversity of the situations and political developments in the individual countries, and without impinging on the autonomy of the Communist and Workers' parties whose duty it is to conduct the struggle for our common aims with due regard to this diversity. Our position was expounded and exhaustively argumented in public statements by our leaders and subsequently in the resolution adopted by our Central Committee at its meeting of October 24, 1963. The resolution criticized and rejected the strategic and tactical orientation endorsed in the documents of the Chinese comrades and expounded the correct Marxist-Leninist concept regarding the advance to socialism in present-day conditions. As for the ways of overcoming the present differences, we made explicit reservations regarding the proposal to convene an international meeting to condemn the Chinese position. On the contrary, we stressed the advisability of giving further consideration to the problems under discussion between the interested parties with a view to reaching effective unity on the basis of further critical examination and political action, or at least on the basis of mutual understanding. This is the position which our Party unequivocally adheres to and will continue to adhere to even in the present circumstances.

Falsification of our Positions by the Chinese Leaders

At what stage of development is our movement today? The main perspectives of the struggle of the working class and the masses to establish themselves as the leading force in the new socialist society were outlined, on the basis of a scientific analysis of capitalist society in the classics of Marx and Engels. They were supplemented and further developed by Lenin on the basis of an exact analysis of imperialism, its nature and the laws of its development. In the space of a little less than a hundred years the prophecy of the Communist Manifesto and the subsequent precise precepts and prevision of Lenin, which to some might have seemed inconceivable, have become a reality in our day.

The working classes have established themselves as the leading force of the new society; imperialism no longer holds undivided sway; the system of colonial slavery has not been able to withstand the pressure and revolutionary onslaught of tens of millions of peoples. A large part of the world is still under the domination of capitalism and imperialism, but even in some of the capitalist countries rapid and profound changes are taking place, broad mass movements are under way through which the working classes seek to alter the economic and political structure of the old society and thus clear the way to becoming the leading force of society. A struggle is under way embracing all spheres of international life, politics, the economy and culture.

It is clear that this struggle pursues a single, common aim which unites the entire movement, namely, to end capitalist exploitation, defeat imperialism and achieve the triumph of socialism which henceforth is delineated in its historically concrete perspective. But it is equally clear that the spheres of struggle, of advance in the various parts of the world and in the various countries are different from each other, hence the immediate concrete aim must be diverse as must the forms of action and advance. Moreover, we are living in a world that is in constant change because the conditions of resolving many problems are rapidly changing, or have already changed.

In this situation the paramount task of the revolutionary movement is not to lose touch with this reality which is in constant change, to try to understand it in all its aspects, and to adapt our searches and views, to take issue with our opponents, determine our aims and trends of work accordingly.

This is the main point at issue in our differences of principal with the Chinese comrades. Their interpretation of our policy is, in fact, a completely false one, for it is not based on an analysis and understanding of present-day reality. Everything is reduced to a schematic tedious and sterile repition of general truths; the revolutionary factor is reduced to a phrase, to a series of quotations . . . It is very easy in this way to accuse, as the Chinese are doing, all the other parties of treachery, revisionism, of abandoning the revolutionary line, etc. We fully agree with Comrade Gomulka when he says that what is stigmatized as revisionism by Peking is in reality creative Marxism which we need today if we want to advance, to be understood, if we want to measure up to the situation and achieve success.

We must recognize the fact that for many years our movement suffered from narrow-mindedness which restricted all creative capacities. Schematism, dogmatism, the refusal to think and do something new, admiration for scholastic formulations and stereotyped phraseology, fear of the new—all this caused us serious harm. The great impetus that was given to the working-class and Communist movement by the 7th Congress of the Communist International, and which as reflected in such great movements as the Popular Front in France, the defense of Republican Spain, the united action to smash fascism, did not receive further development after the war as it should and could have.

Many positions were lost. Many possibilities for further progress were not utilized. Stagnation set in which threatened to petrify the movement had not the 20th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union struck a decisive blow at schematism and dogmatism, discussed in a new and correct way problems that could no longer be deferred or ignored. The 20th Congress marked the beginning of a process of renovation which was to start a general struggle against schematism and for the restoration of the creative character of our thinking and our policy.

As we see it that is precisely why the Chinese comrades directed their main blow against the 20th Congress. Today they reject all its positions which they had approved of only yesterday. In other words, they reject the process of renovation which has advanced despite everything, despite the uncertainties, the delays and mistakes that existed in some countries and which could have been the cause of a profound crisis. Here too insurmountable differences exist between the positions of the Chinese comrades and the positions of the international Communist movement and, in particular, our Party.

That is why we always demanded at all international meetings that this role of the 20th Congress should be reaffirmed and underlined, overcoming the hesitation displayed in this matter, particularly by the Chinese comrades. By its 20th Congress decisions, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union once again demonstrated its role as the beacon and vanguard of the entire working-class and Communist movement.

It is this refusal to recognize the fact that Marxism is being creatively developed in keeping with the present conditions of the struggle against imperialism and for socialism that explains, I think, most of the erroneous positions of the Chinese. This refusal is accompanied by an attempt to interpret the present conditions in a way that is completely at variance with the fundamental principle of Marxist theory and the concrete precepts of Lenin and also with the necessity for action which aims to be successful. Thus, we have here a strange mixture of pseudo-revolutionary Trotskyite phraseology and views that are of a directly opposite nature as, for example, the view that it is the peasant masses of the underdeveloped countries who should head the world movement for socialism and not the countries of socialism and the international proletariat. Incidentally, in their domestic economic policy the Chinese leaders swung from one extreme to another without explaining why—from a forced march to a system which is almost already a Communist one and whose industrial development is even more rapid than that of the Soviet Union, to the present subordination of the entire economic development to the needs of agriculture.

We are well aware that these are internal problems of the Chinese Party. But why does this Party, which chooses to judge and condemn all the other parties in its own way, take exception when it is asked to give an explanation of its policy? Why do its leaders not want to recognize their own mistakes, why do they not openly state what have been their mistakes, as the leaders of all Communist parties should do. The real reason is that the extremist agitation carried on by the Chinese leaders conceals their confusion, their deliberate falsification of the correct positions which we are today defending; it also conceals their weaknesses which are a direct consequence of their inability, even more, their refusal to take a realistic view of the situation in which we are living today. This is the case as concerns both the socialist world and the struggle against imperialism, as well as the development of the national-liberation movement. Even in those instances where the Chinese comrades do consider existing problems that need to be solved, they show their inability to abandon pseudo-revolutionary phraseology, to measure up to the conditions of objective reality and to propose solutions that are feasible.

The Autonomy and Sovereignty of Every Party are for us the Condition for the Development of the Movement in the Present Situation

We consider that the campaign which the Chinese leaders are conducting against the Soviet Union, against its foreign and home policy, against its leaders, and, especially, against Comrade Khrushchov is inadmissable, shameful and dangerous for the entire working-class movement. There are no facts whatsoever that could justify this campaign.

As for the differences between the two states we do not know what bearing they could have had in deciding the Chinese comrades to renew their attacks; but we do know that it is the duty of these comrades as leaders of a socialist state to discuss these issues in a different way from the method used in the relations between bourgeois states: they should not have started because of this, a frenzied campaign of accusations and slander but should have, instead, patiently and calmly tried to find a solution through the necessary contacts and on the basis of mutual understanding. Otherwise ordinary people might ask, and rightly so, in what way are the socialist states different from the bourgeois states and should not the same basis and social structure make for the adoption of methods other than the method of attack which can only lead to a further sharpening of the differences. In fact, the behaviour of the Chinese comrades towards the Soviet Union undermines the confidence of the broad masses in the ideas of socialism.

It is impossible and absurd to deny the fact that the Soviet Union —the first socialist state achieved through revolutionary struggle, built, defended and made powerful by the labor of generations and at the price of incalculable sacrifices—occupies a special place and shoulders a special responsibility in the community of socialist countries and the entire working-class movement. But it is common knowledge that after the death of Stalin it was the Soviet leaders who insisted that every Communist Party should be regarded as autonomous and independent and held responsible for the development of its policy in its own country. That was the meaning of the decision to dissolve the Communist International approved in 1944. However, when the Soviet comrades made the solemn declaration rejecting the concept of the Soviet Party, being the leader and the state being the leader, which concept was to be approved by all the parties, it was the Chinese comrades who raised objections. Why have they changed their opinion? Maybe because they themselves would like to be the leader? The autonomy and independence of every Party are for us questions of principle, the condition for the development of the movement in the present situation. And they do not contradict international proletarian solidarity and its application in practice; they do not contradict the community of aims of the entire movement or the co-operation between the various parties, which is necessary and indispensable. They constitute the form in which unity in the struggle against imperialism and for socialism must be realized today.

The anti-Soviet campaign of the Chinese comrades who would like to undermine the prestige of the first socialist state, which was a big gain in the minds of the masses, aims to cause a split and confusion among the socialist states, misunderstanding and hostility between these countries and the movement for the liberation and emancipation of the oppressed peoples, to destroy the indispensable solidarity and militant unity between the Soviet Union and the working-class movement in the leading capitalist countries. In every one of these spheres all attempts to create a dangerous and fatal rupture must be vigorously opposed.

In resolving their varied problems, in enhancing their economic potential and the general standard of well-being of their peoples, the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries are thereby acting in the interests of the entire revolutionary movement. They are thereby reinforcing the might of the socialist system and demonstrating its superiority. We venture to add here that this superiority, apart from the standard of well-being of the people, has its roots in the very nature of the socialist system, in the character of government, in the principles regulating the national economy, in the attitude to the individual, to his education, to his conscience, in the free and full development of his personality.

To the socialist countries, to the working class has fallen the task of building a society in which not only the well-being, but also the freedom and dignity of all its citizens are ensured to an equal degree. The development of the productive forces, technology, science and culture in all the socialist countries is making for this. This raises the task of the synthesis, the unity of the socialist countries among themselves, as well as with the national-liberation movements and the struggle of the working class in the capitalist countries.

The Chinese comrades should always remember that their heroic struggle against imperialism and colonialism would most probably not have been crowned with such a sweeping victory had it not been for the existence of the might of the Soviet Union, the fact that it was thanks to this might that fascism was defeated in Europe and Japanese imperialism in Asia, the fact that the victory of socialism in the Soviet Union led to profound changes in the balance of forces throughout the world. This applies to all the other peoples formerly enslaved by colonialism and who have now won their freedom. The stronger the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries will be economically and politically the greater will be the concrete aid and political support these peoples will receive in their struggle for complete emancipation. The same holds true for the working-class and mass movement in the more developed capitalist countries.

We know that in the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries schematism and dogmatism which prevailed in the Stalin period caused considerable harm. That is precisely why we have established, in the course of the struggle to remedy this harm, closer co-operation and unity with the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and its leaders. This unity should be further developed.

The concept of socialist democracy must be fully restored in our movement, by which is meant not only legality, equality and fraternity, but also the active participation of the masses both in economic and state construction. The socialist state cannot be something that exists apart from the working masses, which they obey as a benevolent but nonetheless alien power. That is why we hailed and approved the new Program of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union which aims to create a state of all people. The Chinese criticism in this respect is unfounded and dangerous.

For the working-class movement of the capitalist countries it is important that the remnants of the past in this connection be rapidly eliminated. And we should not fear innovations, new forms of organization such as the self-government practised in Yugoslavia, for example, which gives the working masses new possibilities for displaying their initiative in the economic and social spheres, compels them to assume the effective function of control and direction in the economy and in society. If mistakes are made along this path there is always time and ways of rectifying them. The biggest mistake is inaction, clinging to organizational forms which no longer give rein to the animating and creative drive of the masses.

We, too, in our movement, in developing trade union activity and organizing workers at the enterprises, are faced with similar problems, which is a sign that a socialist consciousness is maturing among the working class. There is a certain connection between the progress achieved in the socialist countries and what we are working for. Hence, co-operation and unity are essential in facing these problems with courage and resolving them correctly.

It is in this that the indissoluble connection between democracy and socialism must be clearly established. When the Chinese comrades speak of the necessity of the dictatorship of the proletariat but in the same breath refuse to criticize the regime established under Stalin, they are thereby doing a bad service to the dictatorship of the proletariat. In the final analysis they virtually identify it with that regime, thus preventing the full resoration, both in theory and practice, of the concept which, unless the development of the democratic character of the state and of the democratic life of the masses is consistently and fully ensured, will have nothing in common with socialism.

To Ensure the Intervention of a Powerful Mass Movement in Defense of Peace

As regards international policy and the struggle against imperialism I should like once again to note what happened when the Chinese Prime Minister, Chou En-lai visited several Asian and African states. The statements he made in the capitals of these states correspond, in substance and form, to the basic policy and demands of the Soviet Union and the socialist countries, as well as the international working-class movement, even though he assiduously took care not to refer to them.

What does this mean? Did the Chinese Prime Minister forget all the principal propaganda points of his Party; maybe he forgot that these demands are incompatible with the nature of imperialism, that to insist on peaceful coexistence is tantamount to plotting with leading American circles, that the atomic weapon must be diffused throughout the world and that the partial test ban was a mistake? No, he did not forget all this. But he realized that all this must be shelved if he wanted to discuss international issues as they need to be discussed with due regard for present-day conditions and the concrete objectives that can be attained by the co-ordinated efforts of the countries desiring peace, by a mass movement and by all who, whatever the reason, reject the perspective of a new world war. It means that we have here a profound contradiction, the collapse of all the propaganda the Chinese leaders have been carrying on for many years now on these international issues. But it is a collapse we greet as fresh confirmation of the correctness of the method which we hold should be followed in the fight for peace and against imperialism.

This struggle has its source in the premise that war is no longer inevitable, that a new world conflict and, consequently, the annihilation of entire peoples, and maybe the whole of humanity in the fire of a nuclear holocaust, can be averted. It is this premise that gives a concrete content to our policy and does not reduce it to mere agitation, for it establishes a real perspective and imparts positive meaning to all demands and partial gains.

The Chinese leaders sent Comrade Khrushchov a courteous telegram on the occasion of his birthday. We appreciate the call to unity in that telegram, but we think it does not present the question correctly. The Chinese comrades state that the Soviet Union and People's China, despite their present differences, will undoubtedly be united in the future in the event of imperialist attacks against them. Thus unity is linked, in effect, with the perspective of war, and a world war at that. But it is precisely this perspective that we want to reject because we believe it can be averted taking into account the balance of forces in the world today. However, to avoid war action is necessary, a struggle against imperialism is necessary. If this struggle is to be succesful, unity is necessary today not only between the Soviet Union and People's China, but of all the socialist countries, of the working-class movement and all peace forces, irrespective of what they adhere to.

Abstract discussion and quotation mongering regarding the nature of imperialism add nothing to what we have always known and constantly remember. But it is one thing to compile quotations and another thing to act, to move ahead in a world where a new world war can only be connected with the prospect of the destruction of our civilization, in a world whose structure has changed, in a world where imperialism is no longer the sole dominant force, in a world where profound new changes are maturing.

The enemies of a detente and peace are active, they are offering resistance, are trying to preserve the unity of their front, are kindling flames in many areas in order to start new fires. We cannot afford to interrupt our struggle, we must watch all those areas where peace is threatened, see to it that we are always in a position to ensure the intervention of a powerful mass movement in defense of peace.

We reject the harmful position which the Chinese comrades have taken on international issues, going so far as to play with the catastrophic idea of a nuclear war which could wipe entire nations off the earth. We reaffirm, in this connection, all our previous positions. But we agree to wage the struggle against imperialism vigorously and effectively on the basis we consider to be correct.

Democratic and Peaceful Advance to Socialism in the Developed Capitalist Countries

The problem to which we have paid the greatest attention when studying it and in an effort to apply and further develop the revolutionary theory of Marxism is undoubtedly the problem of the democratic and peaceful transition to socialism in the developed capitalist countries. We tried to give the correct answer to this question immediately after the defeat of fascism and the conquest of a democratic regime, realizing that we would have to wage the struggle in conditions very different from those in which the conquest of power was achieved in other countries. Consequently this problem from the very outset laid its imprint on all the Party's activity. It was theoretically endorsed and concretely formulated at our last three national congresses. It is on this very issue that we have our greatest differences with the positions defended today by the Chinese comrades who have in this connection launched their polemic against us, which they are conducting in the most violent language.

An analysis of the nature of their polemics shows first of all a deliberate falsification to suit their ends, to enable the Chinese comrades to represent themselves as the defenders and interpreters of the elementary principles of theory and practice. The distortion is in the attempts to prove that we allege that open revolutionary actions no longer have any place in the modern world because all political and social progress must henceforth take place everywhere only in peaceful forms. We have never said anything so preposterous. We are well aware what role violence has always played and continues to play in history, in the struggle of the peoples for their independence and in the class struggle.

But we hasten to add that not in all situations can there be a call to revolutionary violence and that the most profound revolutionary advances and transformations are possible without it. Cuba and Algeria liberated themselves as a result of a long armed struggle; but there are dozens of colonial peoples who won their independence without having to go through this ordeal, as a result of a mass movement which developed in more favorable conditions than in the past.

This question must therefore be studied; it can be resolved only on the basis of a correct assessment of the concrete conditions of the struggle determining both the aims and the forms of its organization and development. I should like to note here that I consider the rigid counterposing of the peaceful and non-peaceful path of development somewhat schematic and abstract. There exists the movement of the working class and working masses for their economic and political demands, for social transformations and reforms. This movement must develop in keeping with the situation. Its leaders must know how to orientate and direct this movement, must be fully prepared to measure up to changes and objective turns so as never to lose control over events. Between 1943 and 1945 we fought with arms in hand. It would have been sheer folly had we not after victory, passed to legal forms of struggle on a democratic basis, for the events taking place at the time tended to change the character of the struggle, without affecting its principal aims, however. What is essential is the link that unites into a single process all the phases of the movement, the existence of a large mass movement that is ready for action at all times. What is dangerous is any division or arbitrary and schematic counterposing which regards the peaceful struggle as stagnation or renunciation and condemns the struggle waged by non-peaceful means, when this is necessary, as adventurism.

The discussion conducted along these lines is still, however, far from being a concrete examination of present-day reality. But on this question too the Chinese comrades show their utter inability to make even a minimum positive contribution.

To allege as they do that we have slid down to opportunism of the social-democratic type because we think it possible to pass on to socialism by winning 50 per cent of the vote plus one more is another convenient falsification. Parliament is part of the political structure of the democratic type of society and it can, to a lesser or greater degree, be a representative body and perform democratic functions, which weaken or strengthen its importance and its possibilities to engage in activities other than mere agitation and making declarations. At present we are not in a position to carry on an effective struggle of the working masses in Parliament. But we are carrying out this activity within the economic and political framework of capitalist society with the subject of winning progressive gains and reforms that will change this regime; constantly strengthening and securing the positions of the working classes and their organizations, weakening the power of the ruling capitalist classes, particularly of their most reactionary and decisive groups which today are the groups of big monopoly capital.

This may be said to be a new strategy which is being developed in the long struggle for democracy and socialism. But the conditions exist making this strategy possible and necessary: the broad development of the organizations of the working masses and their growing militancy, a widespread democratic spirit and the ability to mobilize the popular masses which make more difficult reactionary adventures on the part of the bourgeoisie; a notable shift among large sections of the middle-class in town and countryside towards the positions adopted by the working class in the fight against big monopoly capital, thus making possible broader social alliances; the existence of intermediary parties who accept a program of democratic and social reforms which, in turn, makes for co-operation of a new type; finally, a profound crisis in the traditional bourgeois order which is compelling the ruling classes to look for new forms of directing the economy and which, consequently, makes it possible to carry on a struggle for radical reforms in this sphere. All this makes it possible and necessary to find new ways of coming to power through the creation of a coalition of forces socially and politically progressive.

In fighting to advance towards socialism in conditions of democracy and peace, we do not only aim to exclude, as far as we are concerned, the hypothesis of an armed insurrection and civil war, but also to resolve, in a new way, the problems connected with organizing a socialist society. We feel it is necessary to impart a democratic content to this organization in all its phases; to avoid the mistakes, restrictions, and distortions that occurred elsewhere; not to reject the democratic gains already won and the method of struggle corresponding to it; to permit, therefore, the existence of several organized political forces and the possibility of co-operating with them, which was the exception at one time but which now from our viewpoint must become the rule. We by no means renounce our ultimate aim—the destruction of capitalist exploitation and the creation of a classless society—but we want to achieve this through a broad movement which supports and develops all that is positive in democratic institutions that the peoples have won at the price of a bitter struggle and great sacrifices.

We know it will not be easy to advance along this path, but it is a path that has to be traversed, if we do not want to confine ourselves to preaching revolutionary action which afterwards we will not know how to effect and what concretely it should correspond to. For us revolution is a process that is being carried forward today by a combination of actions affecting all spheres of public life. We are working already today to give a new meaning to democracy, having in mind not restricted and controversial external forms but political and economic reforms, the direct participation of the masses in controlling and directing the economy, the extension of the rights of the workers' organizations when resolving new tasks, the renewal of the entire civil and social order.

Thus already today we inseparably link the cause of socialism with the cause of democracy and open the way to socialism. Our unflagging struggle for the unity of the working class and of all democratic and popular forces, like the character and forms of our Party's organization and internal life, are in conformity with our political concept and its basic elements. No objections, no criticism, no attacks by the Chinese comrades against us can in any way affect our line of action or disprove its correctness and effectiveness.

The Liberation Struggle of the Colonial Peoples and the Working-Class and Communist Movement

I think, we should approach in a similar manner another problem which is in the centre of the strategic and tactical platform elaborated by the Chinese comrades, that of the liberation movement of the colonial peoples who have recently won their independence, this movement's role in the struggle against imperialism and its further development. Also in this case the Chinese comrades proceed from completely erroneous positions. They turn this movement into the principal directing force of the entire anti-imperialist struggle, they isolate it from the rest of the movement and place it in opposition to it. This is not only a mistake; it is an exceedingly dangerous thing to do. The great successes achieved in the past twenty years by the liberation movement of the oppressed peoples are connected with the complex of changes that have taken place in the world; they are due, therefore, to a large extent, to the crisis of the capitalist structure whose chief factor was the victorious construction of socialism in the Soviet Union and the formation of the camp of socialist countries. The stronger these countries become the more clearly the oppressed peoples and the newly-emergent countries will see the perspective of complete emancipation. It is sheer madness to tell the oppressed people, as some of the Chinese do in their documents, that the socialist countries are imperialistic and resemble the bourgeois imperialists.

This shows a desire to want to undermine solidarity, the possibility of co-operation, the unity of intentions and aims which are one of the most important mainsprings in the fight against imperialism. These actions therefore make it still more difficult to fight the colonialism of the old and new type and to expose it. Here, too, the Chinese comrades are causing confusion and a split where it is essential to fight for unity, for the preservation and extension of this unity.

Having said that, I think we must honestly recognize that in this sphere there are problems that need to be more profoundly examined. The working-class movement in the leading capitalist countries has by no means accomplished the task facing it in the struggle against colonial enslavement and in support of the oppressed peoples. There is no denying that mistakes were made here, even serious ones, that caused harm to the common cause. There has always been solidarity in the struggle for national emancipation and against colonialism and racism in Asia, Africa, Latin America and also in the United States itself. This solidarity was often expressed in vigorous actions. However, we think that there has not been adequate contact, understanding and mutual assistance between the various sectors of the wide front of struggle against imperialism. The old form of colonial domination has been defeated and practically disappeared; a new form is establishing itself in some of the former colonies which have now become free states. The initiators of this new form of enslavement are the leading groups of big monopoly capital who are at the same time the enemies of any democratic reforms and social progress in the capitalist countries. An objective basis therefore exists for waging a common struggle both in the one-time mother countries and the former colonies. It rests with the proletariat and the working masses to show the initiative in carrying on this struggle more effectively. But it is not enough just to talk about this initiative. It must be realized in the form of a clear program of concrete demands which affect the structure of the monopoly economy, thus preparing the ground for joint actions in the sphere of international relations and also with the peoples and even the governments of the newly-emergent countries.

But in order to accomplish this we must consider these people and their governments without prejudice; we must know their conditions of life and development, and their organizations; we must establish close contacts between these organizations and similar organizations of the working people in our countries; we must in this way lay the foundation for a truly joint struggle against the common enemy. If the parties in the big capitalist countries will will not be able to co-ordinate their effort and to advance along this path they will then not be able to accomplish one of their main tasks.

A great achievement of our theory and a very inspiring one for the future is the fact that the peoples and governments of the newly-emergent countries have openly proclaimed their desire to build a socialist economy and a socialist society. But here too we must avoid dogmatism and a superficial approach. We must realize that the advance to socialism in the countries which only yesterday were still colonies and are therefore still backward will have its specific features, will be something quite different from what has taken place up to now. The popular movements and political forces effecting leadership in these countries will have to define their aims and stages of development most precisely. We must not allow a policy to be imposed on the Communists of these countries that does not correspond to the conditions under which they are working. The very organizational forms which are traditional for the capitalist and socialist countries, may under these conditions, be an obstacle to contacts with the broad masses and to playing a positive role in their political development.

The schematism preached by the Chinese comrades, their desire to reduce the liberation struggle to exclusively an armed struggle is also harmful and dangerous. Armed action is often inevitable in colonial conditions, but it would be a mistake to make it the only form of action, not to link it with the political activity of the masses, with the organization of the broad political alliances with all national, democratic and progressive forces. Errors of this nature are possible especially in the Latin American countries and, if we have been correctly informed, have been committed in some cases thus causing damage to the entire movement.

The Reasons for our Reservations Concerning an International Meeting

It could not be clearer, I believe, from everything I have said so far that we oppose the line which the Chinese comrades propose today to the international working-class and Communist movement. Our opposition is deep and can in no way be overcome by incidental and formal compromises, because it is rooted in our theoretical and political activities of many years, which have secured for our Party important positions among the working people, both on national and international terrain. We have never suggested that what we do should be regarded as a model for other parties; many of them function in conditions very different from ours. We ask, however, that our activity and experience be regarded as a serious contribution to the development of our movement as a whole, to the discussion and solution of the problems that exist and can be resolved only through free criticism, hard work and struggle.

We also strongly oppose the method used by the Chinese comrades to spread their views. It is not a method intended to strengthen the movement and, if necessary, to correct their own mistakes. It is a method that is intended to weaken and split the movement.

Their propaganda passed gradually from allegations of an organic rupture between large sections of the anti-imperialist struggle to increasingly candid appeals for a split in the international working-class and Communist movement, for the establishment of small groups of dissenters within the existing parties, and for a struggle which, would result in the formation, in each country, of two opposed organizations. Some of the parties in Asia have accepted the Chinese positions or have fallen strongly under their influence. Elsewhere, small groups have abandoned our ranks, assumed the names of parties, and raised a certain amount of noise over it.

All in all, the great majority of Communist and Workers' parties are united and reject Peking's criticisms and attacks. If one takes a closer look at those on the margin of our movement, or in its ranks, who gravitate towards the Chinese standpoint or let themselves be influenced by it, one gets the impression that they are comrades who do not realize the basic motives of the complexity and the contradictions of the present situation, who feel the need for a revolutionary approach but are not yet able to see this approach in terms of concrete policy. They are allured by the extremist language of the Chinese, but it would be futile to look for concrete and practicable guidance to action in whatever they write or say.

We should, therefore, without any hesitation, condemn the disruptive intentions and actions of the Chinese leaders. Affirmation and defense of the unity of the working-class and Communist movement is an essential element of all our activities in our own country and on the international scene. However, we want this affirmation and defense to be carried through in harmony with all our political positions, in keeping with our idea of what the relations between individual parties and the character of the unity of the world Communist movement should be today.

Today, nobody doubts any longer that diversity is necessary in the actions of the different parties. This diversity stems from national peculiarities, from the level of development, from the different experiences and different problems facing each party. This applies equally to parties in the socialist and capitalist countries and to the backward areas and newly-independent countries. Unity cannot be secured by some centralized organization. Experience has shown this conclusively. Unity must spring from the common and key objectives of our activity and from our international solidarity.

Along with this unity, or, more precisely, as a condition of this unity, as a condition of the strength and all-round development of our entire movement, each party should have complete autonomy and independence; it should be fully responsible for its actions, above all to the working class and the other working people of its country. On due consideration you will see that it is the Chinese comrades who are today inclined to reject this principle by their importunate efforts to impose their views on us. We, on the other hand, do not depart and will never depart from this principle which has been proclaimed for years by the leading bodies of our Party.

We realize that this makes the struggle against the mistakes of the Chinese comrades and the dissemination of these mistakes more complicated. In a centralized organization one could apply the method of, say, excommunication. Comrade Khrushchov defined and condemned this method rightly in his speech at the Sixth Congress of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany in January 1963. "If we disagreed on certain questions and quarrelled," he said, "and then said at once that the socialist country whose leaders differed with us on something was not socialist, we would be demonstratng subjectivisim pure and simple. It would be as in the case of the Church: when a person ceases to keep religious vows and perform religious rites, he is excommunicated and anathemized. It does not befit us to proceed like churchmen and engage in 'excommunications' from socialism."

The method of excommunication was used in Stalin's time against the Yugoslav comrades. This has been a mistake which we all recognize today, and traces of which are still evident in the collective resolution of 1960.

When talk arose of a new international meeting of all Communist parties to examine and assess the attitude of the Chinese comrades, we thought at once that this was likely to end in another excommunication, in a different direction this time and it appeared to us unnecessary and dangerous. True, there are Party cadres and Communist leaders in the world who believe that official declarations made in a document approved by the overwhelming majority of the parties are more convincing and forceful than the positions taken separately by the parties comprising this majority.

But with regard to these cadres and, in general, as concerns the movement as a whole, we believe that conviction and firmness in the defense of a correct political line should be sought—and is likely to be found more easily—through closer and deeper study, and a better solution of the problems facing each party in any prevailing situation and in relation to the common objectives of the movement as a whole. This was why we suggested a series of bilateral or group meetings at which these questions could be thrashed out seriously and decisions arrived at, which without prejudicing the autonomy and sovereignty of the parties, would enable each of them better to understand its tasks and perspectives, and the ways and means of realizing them.

We would also like to meet the Chinese comrades in our country and to acquaint them at first hand with the situation in which we are working, with the big struggles we have waged and are waging today, and with the progress we have achieved.

Our attitude corresponds to our conception of the world Communist and working-class movement as a movement united by profound solidarity but open to necessary differences, to an exchange of ideas, thanks to which the propositions of our doctrine crystallize and develop, and a collective effort is made to avoid errors of principle, while bringing our judgments and actions into conformity with the continuously changing reality.

On the other hand, the method of official excommunication may revive authoritarian and sectarian systems in the leadership of each party, and also imperil the activities, development and, partly the very existence of the international mass organizations, trade unions, etc.

As you know, the proposals we made could not be realized. Preparations were begun for a meeting of the parties of the capitalist West, but these too were suspended. Now, as I have said, the idea of an international meeting of all Communist parties has been advanced again, in order to examine all the problems created by the Chinese attacks and to reaffirm the general line of our movement.

In principle it is a legitimate idea, provided all the parties take part in the meeting. It remains to be seen whether or not it is the best way to surmount the differences, to combat the attempts of a split and, consequently, to reinforce the unity and cohesion of our movement. It is also necessary to see how it should be prepared in order to be able to attain these goals.

I wish to say at once that we do not consider it opportune at this time to suspend the polemics, including the open polemics. We have come to a point where this would serve no useful purpose. It would only create illusions. The debate cannot but continue. So we propose that it should be conducted in the most opportune forms, even with those groups of workers or comrades who have fallen under the influence of the Chinese ideas. Discussion is indispensable, and should be conducted continuously and patiently, so as not to alienate any of the forces who can contribute to the struggles we have to wage.

But the debate must always be based on objective arguments, rooted in the facts, it must avoid summary and insulting qualifications and, consequently, avoid any exacerbation of the differences. It would be good if we could get the Chinese comrades to follow this principle. For one thing, it would be a big step forward if ideological differences were in a way separated from differences between the states.

It is therefore necessary, before calling an international meeting, to prepare for it more concretely and deeply than for the 81-Party Meeting in 1960. Provisions should be made for bilateral or group meetings, and for possible mediation, so as to try and determine more specifically those questions which can be examined with the hope of reaching agreement, and those questions which seem to be insurmountable.

As for the results the meeting may yield, our hesitation stems not only from a desire to avoid summary excommunication, but also from the fear that in a discussion at this level, inevitably too general in character, it may prove very difficult to make any serious advance in the creative elaboration of our policy. If things then go to the length of a rupture, the repercussions may be extremely grave for our whole movement. Once two opposed centres arise, we may be running the risk of all our future work being concentrated on a struggle between these two centres; it is almost inevitable that small pro-Chinese parties will appear in each country. Both sides will be more rigidly strict as to organization and discipline than the present situation and present needs warrant, causing us almost inevitably to abandon the creative search for new development in all the major sectors and all fields of our activity.

To sum up, we are not yet convinced that it is not worthwhile to continue the discussion and to work perseveringly for a correct political line and for the unity of the international movement in the present conditions, using methods which, as I have said, may at least give some hope of attenuating the political differences, establishing fruitful contacts, and gradually returning to complete unity.

We will set out and reason our considerations to the leading comrades from other parties, above all the comrades from the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. We are sure that, at least, we will be able to convince them that our considerations are prompted by the desire and intention to contribute to the struggle in a manner we believe to be the most effective, and to overcome all forms of schematism and dogmatism, to defend and restore the complet unity, the internal solidarity and co-operation of the whole Communist and working-class movement.

The views which I have set forth correspond to what has already been expressed in the Party, at meetings where these questions were discussed. Besides, they correspond to the state of mind, the opinions and concerns widespread among the working people. As we formulate these propositions, we are deeply conscious of the responsibility devolving on us not only on account of our past, our long struggle and our experience, but also on account of the strength of our Party, our deeply internationalist spirit and the determination with which the Italian Communist Party has for years, using all the necessary forms of action, waged a difficult struggle for the interests and aspirations of the laboring classes, scoring major victories and successes.

We are inviting all our organizations to examine once more the problems facing the world Communist movement, to discuss them at branch meetings, and at open meetings with the participation of our Socialist comrades, our sympathizers and even our opponents. It is also our desire that, as regards these problems, the unity of the Party should be based on a reasoned and comprehensive conviction, and not merely on discipline. We do not want to give anyone the opportunity to say that our comrades were not informed, that the decision was made at the top. What we do want, particularly in this case, is to give an example of an exchange of views and of internal democracy that should, in our opinion, be the rule for all Communist parties and for the international movement as a whole.

RESOLUTION*

ADOPTED AT MEETING OF CENTRAL COMMITTEE AND THE CENTRAL AUDITING COMMISSION OF THE ITALIAN COMMUNIST PARTY HELD APRIL 21-23.

The Central Committee and the Central Auditing Commission heard and approved the report of Comrade Togliatti on the unity of the international working-class and Communist movement.

At the same time they reaffirmed the resolution of the CC of October 24, 1963.

They instructed the leadership of the Party to conduct, in the discussion and the contacts taking place in the international Communist movement, consistent activity based on the line laid down in this resolution and in the report of Comrade Togliatti.

They invite the Party organizations to conduct, both in the Party and among the working people, an extensive and deep-going discussion on problems concerning the unity of the international movement in order to ensure complete clarity about these problems, so that there is deep conviction and unity in our ranks and so that we are able to combat anti-communist propaganda ever more effectively.

FIGHT FOR UNITY OF INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST MOVEMENT*

R. Palme Dutt

Member of Political Committee of the British Communist Party

The fight for the unity of the international Communist Movement and of every Communist Party on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism, set out in the 1960 Statement of the 81 Communist parties, is now fully joined. However much we may all dislike to be involved in an unjustifiable and harmful internal controversy in the international Communist movement at a time when the fullest united strength of all is needed against the common enemy, no Communist can be on the sidelines in this fight.

Let there be no mistake. We are not fighting "for Russia" or "for Khrushchov", "against China". It is the enemy press which seeks to confuse the issue by treating it as a "Sino-Soviet controversy" in which sides are taken with one or another country according to preference.

We are opposed to all abusive language in this controversy, from whatever side it comes.

COMMUNIST UNITY

We are fighting, as throughout this controversy, for international Communist unity; for the unity of every Communist Party against disruption and factionalism; for the principles of Marxism-Leninism as set out in the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement; for the principles and program and Congress decisions of our own Party.

When we repudiate outrageous charges set out in Chinese documents that the Soviet Government and leadership of the CPSU have "betrayed the Soviet people, the socialist camp and the peoples of the world" (Hungchi, No. 17, 1963), and are "allied with imperialism to oppose socialism" or "allied with the reactionaries of all countries to oppose the peoples of the world" (Statement of the Chinese Government, July 31, 1963), we are not declaring that "the Soviet Union is always right" or that "the CPSU is infallible". No Party has been more unsparing in self-criticism than the CPSU.

AGAINST SLANDER

But slanders of this type we have known and fought every year and every month since 1917, equally when made against Lenin, against

*Comment Supplement, No. 1, April 18, 1964.

Stalin, and now against the present leadership of the CPSU. Our Communist Party, which was founded before the Chinese Communist Party, has been fighting these slanders ever since its foundation. Those of us who joined in founding our Communist Party, who were fighting publicly on the side of the Bolsheviks before the Bolshevik revolution, from the moment of the Bolshevik revolution, we had to rebut these foul charges from enemies and renegades ever since 1917. We are shocked that these same slanders should now be repeated by leaders of the Communist Party of China. But we shall continue to rebut them from whatever source they come.

We love and honour the great Chinese Revolution, the second greatest socialist revolution in history, just as we have loved and honoured always the Soviet Revolution. We honour the brilliant role of the historic Communist Party of China, which led 600 million of the Chinese people to victory against imperialism and its allies. Whatever the ideological differences, we stand in unbreakable solidarity with the Chinese People's Republic as a great socialist country against every assault of imperialism. We showed our solidarity when Anglo-American imperialism sought to take advantage of the border conflict in the autumn of 1962, and we shall always maintain such solidarity wherever and whenever imperialism dares to threaten China. We fight for the rights of China in the United Nations, for the ending of the illegal American occupation of Taiwan and for the removal of the American blockading force of warships and planes from the coasts of China.

It is our deepest regret that the manifest strategy of U.S. imperialism to drive a wedge between the Chinese People's Republic and the Soviet Union, should have won a temporary success in this present controversy, and that the leadership of the Communist Party of China should have adopted a line which thus suits the strategy of U.S. imperialism.

FOR CLOSE CO-OPERATION

We desire to see the friendship and close co-operation of the two great socialist powers, the Soviet Union and China, as of all socialist countries and all Communist parties, in the common cause of international communism and for the aims of socialism, national liberation and peace.

It is precisely because of this concern for the unity of the international Communist movement and for the principles of Marxism-Leninism that we have taken our principled stand on these issues as set out in our successive Executive Committee statements, Congress decisions and the latest E.C. statement of September of last year.

Now a new and still further dangerous stage has been reached in this situation by the last document of the Communist Party of China of March 31, openly repudiating the 1960 Statement of 81 Communist parties and openly calling for splits and factions in all Communist parties.

In face of this challenge no Communist can stand aside or take refuge in declaring that this quarrel of big parties is no concern of his, that it is "six of one and half a dozen of the other", or that he wishes to be neutral, blame both sides, and get on with his job in this country.

COMMON FIGHT

We should indeed deeply like to be free to concentrate on getting on with our job in this country, to unite the fight against British monopoly capitalism and imperialism, the common fight of all Communists and supporters of socialism and national liberation and peace.

We have repeatedly made clear that in our view any issues of internal, ideological controversy in the international Communist movement — and it is quite understandable that in the complex modern international situation questions of difference on current tactics and estimations should arise — should never become the subject of the present type of public polemic between parties for the delight of the enemy, but should be settled by comradely, collective discussion along the lines indicated in the 1960 Statement. It is with the utmost reluctance that we have put out the public statements we have issued only when compelled by the publication of slanderous allegations and charges in documents printed in English and circulated among our members challenging the basic principles of our Party and of the international Communist movement and of the 1960 Statement.

We have, therefore, been compelled to make clear our principled position on these questions; but we have always sought to state our views in the most moderate tone, and continuously laying the main stress on the need to end this type of harmful public polemic and proceed to the methods of international consultation to resolve the differences and restore international Communist unity.

Now that the People's Daily article of March 31 has been published, following the "Splitters" article of February 4, and followed by the Pravda editorial of April, with the Suslov report of February 14, all the facts and issues are set out plainly for every Party member and reader to judge.

It is not a question of "only" an "ideological controversy" between two great parties, in relation to which differences individual Communists may hold their varying opinions on the rights and wrongs. An ideological controversy can be settled by comradely, collective discussion. But here the language is no longer the language of Communist ideological controversy. The Communist Party of China has charged the leadership of the CPSU with "betrayal" of communism, denounced the Soviet Union as a fortress of counter-revolution comparable to the "Holy Alliance" of the Tsar and the Kaisers of the early 19th century ("The New 'Holy Alliance' Will End Up No Better Than The Old"), and described the economic system in the Soviet Union as dominated by capitalism (People's Daily, March 31, 1964). This is not an "ideological controversy". The same type of slanderous abuse was previously spread through all these years from the sewers of counter-revolution. Every serious Communist can only be indignant that the leadership of the Communist Party of China should descend to repeating such slanders.

SERIOUS FEATURE

It is a serious feature of this controversy that it has been extended to the sphere of state relations. But the issue is not, as the commentators in the capitalist press frequently assert, a battle of "power politics" reflecting the problem of relations of two great socialist powers. Certainly there are such problems. There may be rights or wrongs in these relations. But all these problems can be solved, provided the political basis exists of comradeship in a common cause and the desire for mutual understanding. Only if the political basis is poisoned can such problems dangerously explode.

In face of outrageous charges, the CPSU exercised the greatest patience and restraint. The letter of November 29 to the Communist Party of China, now made public, was couched in the most conciliatory terms; avoided any polemical expression; emphasized that the public division was creating harmful effects and difficulties for the international Communist movement, and especially for smaller Communist parties struggling under difficult conditions in capitalist countries; urged that concentration should be turned on to the main aims on which there was unity, while issues on which there were differences should be held over for further consideration; and suggested that the co-operation of the Soviet Union and China should be publicly manifested by agreements in the economic and cultural spheres, and for this purpose offered to consider any forms of economic co-operation, trade agreements or aid which the Chinese comrades would like to suggest.

"SPLITTERS" ARTICLE

No reply was received to this friendly and conciliatory letter for three months. Instead, on February 4, the provocative and slanderous "Splitters" article appeared. The reply was only sent on February 29.

The People's Daily editorial of March 31 has now brought out two new and dangerous elements in the position at present adopted by the leadership of the Communist Party of China, which should open the eyes of all to realize the challenge raised.

First, the Chinese Communist Party now for the first time openly attacks the 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement, and demands their revision. On the question of the peaceful transition to socialism, they say that "there are serious weaknesses and errors" in the agreed Statement of the 81 Communist parties. Therefore > "it is necessary to amend the formulation of the question in the Declaration and the Statement through joint consultation of Communist and Workers' parties."

It is obvious that only a world conference of the 81 Communist parties would have the right to make any amendment of their previously agreed statement. But the above formulation calling for amendment through joint consultation of Communist and Workers' parties, could be interpreted to mean that the unilateral repudiation of the agreed document now made by the leadership of the Communist Party of China, would be followed by a unilateral attempt at amendment by a few parties or groups.

Previously every Chinese Communist statement has professed fidelity to these agreed documents of the international Communist movement, and accused others of violating them.

What can be thought of those professions in the light of this new statement of the Chinese comrades themselves?

PEACEFUL TRANSITION

Whereas the 1957 and 1960 documents affirmed the possibility of peaceful transition to socialism in certain countries, and this was agreed by all the 81 Communist and Workers' parties, the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party now declare that there is only one path, the path of violent revolution, and demand the revision of the international documents in this sense.

The Chinese comrades allege that this theory of the universal law of "violent revolution" and of the rejection of the possibility of peaceful transition in any country, is the true story of Marxism-Leninism. They quote the statement of Lenin in The State and Revolution that "as a general rule" the proletarian revolution can take place "only through a violent revolution". This statement demonstrates that even at that time, Lenin explicitly rejected the dogma of universality, even half-a-century ago, at the height of the imperialist war, before there was a world system of socialism, before the change in the world balance of forces. But the Chinese comrades then proceed to distort this concrete, careful and dialectical statement of Lenin into the dogmatic assertion that"violent revolution is a universal law of proletarian revolution".

They allege that the conception of the possibility of the peaceful transition to Socialism in certain countries as a result of the change in the balance of forces in the modern world situation, is an invention first put forward by the Report of Comrade Khrushchov at the Twentieth Congress of the CPSU in 1956.

"THE BRITISH ROAD"

This is incorrect. The conception was already set out in the Program of our Party, The British Road to Socialism, adopted in 1951. This Program was reprinted in Pravda and in Communist organs all over the world, and was recognized as winning the approval of leading international Communists, including the leadership of the CPSU, with Stalin at their head. Thus the abuse directed by the Chinese comrades against Khrushchov in this respect is in reality directed against Stalin.

The Chinese comrades allege that the conception of the peaceful transition to socialism is the same as the bankrupt and long discredited reformist conception of achieving socialism by a parlamentary majority, independently of the class struggle and of the extra-parliamentary mass movement.

This is an indefensible distortion. The definition of the conditions for the realization of this peaceful transition (unity of the working class, broad alliance of the working class and the majority of the working population, rising class struggle, alongside the winning of a parliamentary majority, etc.) was set out with complete clearness in our Program, in the Report to the 20th Congress of the CPSU, and in the 1957 and 1960 documents. There is no possible excuse for misunderstanding.

In support of this revision of the teachings of Marxism-Leninism on the question of revolution, the Chinese document of March 21st quotes with approval the declaration of Comrade Mao Tse-tung as a supposed tenet of Marxism-Leninism, "political power grows out of the barrel of a gun".

"FORCE THEORY"

This caricature of Marxist-Leninist theory ignores all the teaching of Engels in his Anti-Duhring, repudiating the "force theory" of Professor Duhring, and showing that, so far from military force being the original creator of social-political institutions, as Professor Duhring had argued, it is the economic stage of development and corresponding stage of social-political forces which governs the forms and role of military force. This profound teaching of Marxism-Leninism has been abundantly confirmed by the present stage of nuclear weapons, whose possession and use depends on the most advanced economic, scientific and technological development of an entire society.

Similarly the document of March 31st seeks to find an economic basis for the charge of "revisionism" against the leadership of the CPSU and other leading Communist parties. Previous documents were content to quote at scholastic length Lenin's diatribes against Bernstein, Kautsky and the revisionists of the Second International, and to draw a parallel from this with socialist countries.

BASIS OF REVISIONISM

But Lenin never failed to show that the economic basis of revisionism was the alliance of an upper section and leadership of the Labour movement with their own ruling capitalist class. Since the rule of the capitalists and landlords in Russia was ended nearly half a century ago, and socialism established, the charge of "revisionism" remained hanging in the air without any visible economic basis. The document of March 31st has now tried to repair this omission by declaring that capitalism is dominant in the Soviet Union:

"The capitalist forces in Soviet society have become a deluge, sweeping over all fields of life in the USSR, including the political, economic, cultural and ideological fields."

This also is the old song of anti-Communist and Social Democratic calumny. Lenin used often to express hearty derision of these absurdities, even in the period of NEP when the existence of permitted small-scale capitalism could provide some concrete facts on which to build the Western fables about the alleged "restoration of capitalism" in the Soviet Union. But at the present day, in the era of the mighty triumphs of the long established socialist system in the Soviet Union, this kind of fantasy is only an expression of theoretical bankruptcy.

The second new and grave feature of the March 31st document is that the general incitement to factionalism and splits, already contained in previous documents, notably in the "Splitters" document of February 4th, is now carried to the point of explicitly calling on the CPSU to remove Comrade Khrushchov from his leading position as General Secretary:

"Khrushchov's revisionism has inflicted very great and grave damage on the Soviet Union . . . we would give the leading comrades in the Soviet Union a piece of advice: since so many opportunists and revisionists have been thrown on to the rubbish heap of history, why must you belatedly follow in their wake . . . When Kautsky became a renegade the German Communist Liebknecht could only appeal to the working class in this way to 'push aside such leaders'."

What is here involved is no mere question of an individual, but of the basic relations of Communist parties.

But no party has the right to issue instructions to another party as to whom to choose for its leadership. It is the democratically elected Congress of a Communist Party which elects its Central Committee and its Central Committee which appoints the comrades to leading positions. This sovereign, democratic independence applies equally to the smallest Communist Party as to the largest.

All fraternal relations between Communist parties would be destroyed if this principle of independence and non-intervention in internal affairs as between Communist parties were not recognized and if, instead, the principle of factional intervention by any Communist Party to promote disruption within another Communist Party were to become recognized as the principle of relationship between Communist parties.

AGAINST FACTIONALISM

Factionalism has nothing in common with the essential principle of the fullest and freest discussion within a Communist Party.

Factionalism, or the formation of counter-posed groups around opposing platforms within a Communist Party was condemned by Lenin and on Lenin's initiative prohibited by the Tenth Congress of the CPSU in 1921, as incompatible with the principles of democratc centralism of a Communist Party. Factionalism is no less impermissible on an international scale. During the thirties Trotskyism tried to organize factionalism on an international scale, with the customary call to "All true Marxist-Leninists", or "All true Bolsheviks" to form their grouplets or "would-be parties" in each country in opposition to the Communist Party and the international Communist movement (portrayed as hopelessly corrupted, bureaucratic, betraying Marxism-Leninism, and jumping obediently to "the orders of Moscow"), and on this basis erect a so-called "Fourth International". The attempt was an ignominious fiasco from the outset; and the latest phase of the myriad convolutions of the fragments of the so-called "Fourth International" has been their further disintegration into three rival mutually squabbling "international centres" in different continents—a feat surpassing the splitting of the atom.

Nevertheless even this puny and unsuccessful example of the attempt to promote factionalism on an international scale, did harm by providing the capitalist press with rich material for denunciation of the international Communist movement, or for presenting the most honoured and fearless revolutionary working class fighters all over the world with long records of devotion and integrity through every ordeal, as "jumping to the orders of Moscow".

Thus the international Communist movement has long experience of the harmfulness of factionalism and of the use of it made by the enemy. It is all the more serious if any established Communist Party, and still more leading Communist Party, gives direct countenance and even incitement to such attempts. Any attempts at factionalism require to be met with the united opposition of the entire international Communist movement. This is the emphatic warning of the 1960 Statement of the 81 Communist and Workers' parties:

"Marxist-Leninist parties regard it as a law of their activity strictly to observe Leninist standards of Party life in keeping with the principles of democratic centralism and to cherish Party unity like the apple of their eye."

The Communist Party in this country will continue to oppose all factional activities and disruption, equally in Britain or internationally, at the same time as carrying forward the struggle for the unity of the international Communist movement on the basis of the principles of Marxism-Leninism, as set out in the 1960 Statement.

WORLD CONFERENCE

The problems of the present situation are serious and unprecedented. To overcome them will require the united efforts of all sincere Communists. Our Party has advocated a World Conference of Communist and Workers' parties to meet this dangerous situation. At the same time our Party has also declared that such a World Conference should be adequately prepared by preliminary consultations to ensure that the conference shall serve the purpose, not of deepening or perpetuating a split, but assist to resolve differences by comradely discussion and to restore the unity of the international Communist movement.

This remains our aim. Whatever the difficulties and obstacles still before us, we shall continue these efforts in the cause of the unity of the international Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism.

We remain confident that, grave as is the present situation, the international Communist movement will, in the end, solve the problems set by the present critical developments and emerge finally as it has emerged in the past from every preceding ordeal, with renewed strength and unity, to new triumphs in the cause of communism.

FOR AN INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST CONFERENCE

RESOLUTION* OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL, COMMUNIST PARTY OF INDIA, APRIL 15, 1964.

The National Council of the Communist Party of India views with grave concern the new stage of aggravation of the open controversy and conflict in the world Communist movement reached since February 4, 1964 when the leadership of the Communist Party of China in their editorial in the People's Daily and Hungchi (Red Flag) gave an open call for organizing splits in the Communist and Workers' parties of every country in the name of fighting alleged "revisionism" of the CPSU.

From an attempt to give an alternative interpretation of the basic new appraisals and conclusions regarding the present-day world situation reached by the fraternal Communist and Workers' parties through their collective effort and incorporated in the Declaration and Statement of 1957 and 1960, the leadership of the Communist Party of China proceeded, on the eve of their bilateral talks with the leadership of the CPSU, to put forth unilaterally an entirely alternative line for the world Communist movement.

After the breakdown of the bilateral talks, the leadership of the Communist Party of China launched an unprecedentedly venomous campaign of open polemics, distorting the guiding principles laid down in the aforesaid collective documents, the Declaration and Statement of 1957 and 1960, on the role of the world socialist system, on the possibility of averting a World War, on peaceful coexistence of differing social systems, on the forms of transition to socialism in the developed capitalist states and in the countries which have newly won their independence from imperialism.

In these open polemics, they resorted to such gross vilifications and slanders against the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties, including our Party, violating all norms of behaviour and relations between fraternal parties—which are equal among themselves and sovereign in respect of their own people.

Passing from acrimonious words to disruptive deeds, the leadership of the Communist Party of China at the time of the Caribbean crisis, instead of lending support to the great peace initiative of the Soviet Union calculated to prevent a thermo-nuclear war and protect the Cuban socialist revolution, foully attacked the Soviet action and utilized the crisis to launch a massive invasion across the Mac-Mahon Line in a bid to intimidate India and to solve the border dispute in its favour.

CHINA PURSUES ALTERNATE LINE

This action, as well as its opposition to the Test-Ban Treaty, and its opposition to the Soviet move to achieve world agreement to settle all border and territorial disputes peacefully, clearly shows that the leadership of the Communist Party of China and the People's Republic of China are bent on extending the pursuit of their alternative line to the stage of conflict on the State plane, thus causing division in the great united front of the progressive forces of the world socialist countries, of the great labour movement of the capitalist countries and of the mighty national liberation movements of the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America— the front for peace, democracy and socialism.

They are extending their splitting activities to all the great world organizations of peace, of labor, of women, of youth and of Afro-Asian solidarity. They are openly encouraging the organization of rival Communist and Workers' parties in a number of countries including ours, and grossly interfering in the affairs of fraternal parties in an attempt to force their line on them.

FOR AN END TO DISRUPTION

In the face of this serious situation in the world Communist movement, created by the unilateral actions of the leadership of the Communist Party of China, which threatens the solidarity and unity of the progressive forces of the peoples of the world, and above all of its advance detachment, the Communist and Workers' parties of various countries, and which only bring grist to the mill of imperialists and reactionaries, it is of the utmost importance to make a determined and united effort based on the broadest possible consultations among fraternal parties to overcome these difficulties and reforge the unity of the world Communist movement and to bring about the end of all divisive activities and disruptive polemics.

The National Council of the Communist Party of India reiterates its former resolution calling for the convening of a World Conference of Communist and Workers' Parties as soon as possible.

This conference is necessary to preserve the unity of the world Communist movement, to ensure the victory of the great ideas of the Moscow Meetings of 1957 and 1960, which have advanced the cause of peace, of democracy, of the national independence of nations and of socialism.

UNITY OF WORLD'S WORKERS MUST BE GOAL OF COMMUNISTS

STATEMENT* OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The historic mission of our working class is not only to free itself, the Negro people, and all deprived strata of this capitalist society from exploitation and oppression at the hand of the monopolists, and to make a rich and new life for the masses, but it also bears the responsibility of safeguarding all that is worthy in the national heritage and all creations of civilization.

Its destiny is to lead the nation to new heights of international fraternity and service to humanity. It cannot fulfil its duty to itself as a class nor attain its rightful status as leader of the nation, save on the basis of preserving all mankind from a holocaust that would result from the outbreak of thermonuclear war.

The preservation of peace is the first task of honour of our working class and of the workers of the whole world. It is a task which the working people of the whole world assume in association with all people who treasure the life and achievements of humanity.

* * *

The Communist Party of the United States understands the grave responsibilities which our Party, our class, and the workers of the whole world bear before history in this epoch when an ascending socialism is lighting the way to freedom from economic and cultural want, and freedom from fear of political tyranny yet, when at the same time the thermonuclear and rocketry instruments of war have been brought to an earth-crumbling destructive calibre.

It is on these grounds of responsibility to our class and our nation, and in conformity with the interests of humanity the world over, that we reaffirm our criticism and rejection of the course being advocated and pursued by the leadership of the Communist Party of China on a wide range of questions which bear upon policies in connection with the struggle for peace, democracy, economic development, national freedom, and socialism.

The attempts of leaders of the Communist Party of China to propagate their views over the heads of the leadership of the Communist and Workers' parties of the various countries have brought about a situation of divisions and confusions of serious proportion.

*The Worker, April 19, 1964.

It is the obligation of Marxist-Leninists to take all necessary measures consistent with principle to re-unify their ranks as speedily as possible.

Therefore, it is our judgment that the earliest convocation of a conference of the representatives of each of the Marxist parties of the respective countries of the world, consistent with adequate preparation, be held to arrive at a concensus concerning the departures from the scientific line of Marxism-Leninism on matters of universal principle and for setting forth the required recommendations for effecting the necessary self-corrections and for the strengthening of the all-round unity of the international Communist movement, of the world working class, and of the fellowship of its respective national parties.

COMMUNIQUE OF COMMUNIST PARTY OF ECUADOR

BAR THE WAY TO SPLITTERS IN THE COUNTRY AND OUTSIDE.

For some time now the Communist Party of Ecuador has been waging a fight against a small group of factionalists headed by Rafael Echeverria, Carlor Rodrigues and Jorge Arrellan who have deliberately placed themselves outside the Party, ignoring its discipline, its political line and the Marxist-Leninist approach to national and international problems.

Their adventurist methods, their inconsistent and unprincipled theses were in too obvious contradiction with the realities of life and, naturally, they were emphatically rejected by all true members of the Party and by the Party as a whole. Seeing their operational base inside the country smashed, they carried their activities beyond its frontiers in an attempt to discredit the Party in the eyes of the fraternal parties and also before the Latin American revolutionary movements. They thereby are objectively playing into the hands of U.S. imperialism which seeks to weaken the fraternal parties of our continent and split the revolutionary movements fighting for the social and national emancipation of our peoples.

Those who use these methods have long shown themselves as a miserable group of petty-bourgeois, adventurist, corrupted and ambitious elements to whom the policy of the Party expressing the interests of the masses is alien and who do not recognize the historical mission of the proletariat and the vanguard role of the Party. These are ambitious opportunists, supporters of Caudillism, who tend to follow pseudo-revolutionary trends. In their activity they have always sought to undermine the Party's influence in the mass movements, and did not hesitate to join hands with the elements expelled from the Party and with its open enemies.

These elements have lost all positions from which they could attack the Party. Hence it was not fortuitous that when differences set in between the leaders of the Communist Party of China and the world Communist movement, they came out as zealous supporters of what they call the "Chinese line", using every opportunity to smear, distort and slander the positions of the CPSU and the CPE. At first we could not believe their boast that their activity had the support of the Communist Party of China—a thing which is inconceivable in the relations between fraternal parties. However, the events that have occurred in our country since June-July 1963 demonstrated that the splitters indeed received direct support from the Chinese leaders in their campaign of slander directed against our Party.

Operating from abroad, enjoying support which by no means comes from the fraternal parties upholding the unity of the world Communist movement, and using slanders and fabrications, these elements are not only combating the CPE but are encroaching on the unity of each and all Latin American parties, on the unity of the world Communist movement.

The CPE therefore considers it urgent to issue a call to all members working in the country to bar the way to the disruptive activity of those few splitting elements, both inside and outside the country, who have not yet been fully exposed. We also urge those members who have had to leave the country because of the persecutions by the dictatorship, resolutely to oppose and expose those elements abroad, and to combat the splitters' attacks against the world Communist movement, as in the case of Jose Maria Roura and Jorge Rivadeneira who have been expelled from the Party.

UNITY—FOR DEMOCRACY, FOR SOCIALISM

SPEECH* BY MAURICE THOREZ AT THE 17th CONGRESS OF THE FRENCH COMMUNIST PARTY

Comrades, our 17th Party Congress is coming to an end. The debate on the Central Committee report delivered by Waldeck Rochet, our General Secretary, and on the new Party Rules was of a high political standard and culminated in unanimous approval The draft resolution was also unanimously approved.

The scope and content of the debate, the good knowledge shown of the issues on hand, prove that it was not just a formal approval, but a genuine identity of opinion, deriving from a serious and thorough study of these issues when preparing for the Congress at thousands of branch meetings and hundreds of sectional and federation conferences.

Friends and enemies alike had an opportunity to learn from these four days of free and extensive discussion that our Party is solidly united.

The whole Party, as represented by its delegates, voted unanimously for the documents defining our policy. The whole Party approved the composition of its governing bodies.

This reveals the deep-going cohesion of our ranks. So, in this respect we can proudly say that our 17th Congress has been a striking manifestation of unity.

The idea of unity was also advanced by the Congress in a broader context.

The Congress has issued a strong call for working-class unity, for the unity of the democratic forces, for the unity of the social strata victimized by the policy of the monopolies, a call to combat the regime of personal power and establish a genuine democracy.

Ever since 1958, in spite of the painful defeat suffered by the working class and democracy, we have stood firm. At once, we made the right appraisal of gaullist power, and it did not take long for the course of events to confirm it. We showed that both domestically and externally the contradictions would come to a head and the camp that had voted "yes" would fall apart.

We expressed our unshakeable faith in the masses, and predicted that struggles would be sure to arise in all spheres—the economic, political and social. We demonstrated the necessity of organizing these struggles and of preparing their convergence for a general battle against the authoritarian system.

Soon after the 1958 referendum we declared our confidence that all working people, and above all the socialists, would join hands with us in this battle.

*Supplement au No. 5 du Bulletin de Propagande et d'Information, May-June, 1964.

It was in this spirit that we worked at our Congress for four days. We occupied ourselves with the condition and future of the working class and of all the other working people, and discussed what the best conditions would be for the struggle to end a political system that embodies the increased domination of finance-capital and furthers with all its powers the super-exploitation of the masses. What would these best conditions be? They may be summed up in one word: unity.

Unity is essential in the daily struggles of the working people. It is essential between the trade union organizations. It must be achieved between the Communist and the Socialist parties. Our resolution emphasizes that it is highly important to develop joint action by the two parties and that this joint action should be more fruitful than in the best days of 1934 and 1945.

Before parting, the delegates at this Congress will reaffirm their pledge to fight tirelessly to achieve accord with the Socialist Party despite the existing differences. If the Socialists and Communists wage the daily struggle together and keep developing their common activities, they will be better able to overcome the difficulties and reach agreement on the more essential questions.

In this connection, we consider the following statement by Guy Mollet extremely important. "Does not a certain form of economic democracy," he said, "lead to new forms of political democracy? Are not some of the aspects of what we call political democracy quite useless ones?"

If the militant Socialists give this problem due thought, as the General Secretary of their Party urges them to do, we shall succeed in putting one of the main differences between us out of the way. The question of democracy will then stand on a Marxist foundation, a class foundation, rather than abstractly, on a liberal foundation.

In other words, formal democracy is no longer being opposed to the economic and political gains of socialism.

Comrades, if we are conscious that the strength of gaullism derives chiefly from division in the ranks of workers and democrats, then, obviously, unity is the cardinal task to which all others must concede precedence. If we know that a united working class can and must be the pole of attraction for the realignment of all the other sections of society that cherish progress, democracy and peace, should we not place working-class unity above all else?

This is why we hear the call for alliance between the Communist and Socialist parties at the factories and offices, in the countryside and at the universities. We shall spare no effort to translate this great hope into reality, and our energy will redouble from the knowledge that unity is gaining strength.

It is a few weeks since a very thorough common educational policy has been worked out and adopted at a conference of all the democratic parties and organizations. There is no reason why we should not achieve for the whole program what we have so successfully achieved for one of its parts. If the democrats have reached agreement on questions that have long been controversial, such as the nationalization of education, should this not encourage them to tackle the political, economic, social and other sections of a common program?

Unity is developing, too, in order to protect and extend municipal freedoms. Elected republican office-holders come together, reach agreement and fight jointly against authoritarian concentration of power and paralyzing tutelage, which tend to impede measures profiting the people.

We fight hand in hand—Socialists, Communists and all republicans —to support the people of Spain against Franco terrorism.

We stand together against violence.

In all these actions there is the underlying idea and embryo of a common platform, a common program. The draft of a program was advanced by us as far back as 1959 with the object of providing a concrete foundation for an alliance of the working class, the working peasantry, the middle classes and all the victims of the monopolies. We can put on record at this point that the programs of the different democratic parties already contain many common elements. So could we not on these grounds produce a conception that would facilitate general agreement?

If we want to inspire among the democratic forces the confidence and enthusiasm indispensable for victory, it is essential that we work together to frame a common program. On the other hand, the absence of such a program enables the government to capitalize on fears of a "return to the past" and to allege that the workers and republicans are incapable of agreement in the name of a positive and new cause.

Let us also note that French political affairs must not be made dependent for two years on the personal conduct of the candidates to the presidency. In your resolution you have expressed your determination "to oppose the candidate of personal power with a jointly nominated candidate who can effectively represent the mass movement and the alliance of all the democratic parties and organizations without exception, in order to establish a new democracy."

To achieve a real change, it is necessary more than ever to have a mass movement of unprecedented proportions, which, in turn, calls for agreement and unity.

We see this unity taking shape most impressively in the battles for the working people's various demands, in the strikes, and in other forms of struggle for higher wages and salaries, for a 40-hour working week without reduction in pay, for the various economic interests of the masses, for non-violation of the right to strike, and in defense of trade-union freedoms.

Unity is being wrought in the struggles of the working peasantry for a revision of the prices of farm products, which the government has rejected, and against the measures of mass expropriation, to which the government resorts in the interests of agrarian capitalism. Special acclaim is due to the big joint demonstrations of workers and peasants held in some of the areas.

Unity is evident in the struggle against reactionary incursions on public education, in the actions to protect secular schools, for a democratic educational reform under the Langevin-Wallon plan and in defense of the young people's rights to culture, to a trade or profession and proper leisure time.

Unity is also gaining strength in the battles to safeguard local freedoms from the assault of personal power, to check the reactionary administrative reforms and to reaffirm the right of the people to impartial democratic information.

We see unity making distinct progress in the struggle for peace. Socialists, Communists, radicals and all other republicans, churchgoers and atheists, jointly denounce de Gaulle's refusal to participate in the disarmament negotiations. The government's opposition to the Moscow nuclear test-ban treaty, (since the building up of a strike force (force de frappe)—so ruinous to the country's finances), is likely to create the frightening condition in which France risks total destruction. All of them act jointly, they find themselves shoulder to shoulder in the big demonstrations protesting against atomic arming, such as that in Parc de Sceaux. The policy of relieving international tension, of general and controlled disarmament, and of peaceful coexistence, is welcomed unanimously by all democrats.

We leave this Congress, which has proceeded under the motto of unity, with the conviction that we can and must overcome the resistance still obstructing joint actions.

Today, the time is ripe to respond to the mounting aspiration of the masses to socialism. We must act on the demands of our time, the time of transition from capitalism to socialism. At this time, when all roads lead to this great transition, we Communists and Socialists must not fail to find the means of achieving mutual understanding.

It is by building a united front of parties representing the working class and by effecting the alliance of all republicans that we shall in the near future generate a movement strong enough to abolish personal power and establish a true democracy.

Comrades, our Congress has given the vast majority of Communist and Workers' parties an opportunity to reaffirm their firm adherence to the principle of the unity of our international movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism. This was strikingly indicated in the speeches made by our guests from this rostrum and in the messages we received at the Congress from fraternal parties.

We extend our fondest greetings to the delegates of the glorious Communist Party of the Soviet Union, which is leading the people of its land to the inspiring goal of Communist construction showing the superiority of socialism over capitalism to working people the world over, and opening the most radiant prospects for all mankind.

Lenin's great Party and the Soviet people are showing every nation the road to a happy future. The Soviet Union remains the beacon for all working people, for all progressives. It stands in the van in science and technology. It is opening an entirely new field for the flowering of democracy in its state of the whole people. It embodies the social ideal which has for centuries been the dream of the oppressed. Acting in behalf of the Soviet people, Comrade Khrushchov has, in the eyes of the whole world, become the standard-bearer of peace. We add our applause to the ovations of the Egyptian people, who are giving a rousing and grateful reception to the head of the Soviet Government, the friend and supporter of the peoples fighting for complete independence.

The presence at our Congress of numerous delegations from the People's Democracies, and their speeches demonstrate the unity of the socialist camp. We deeply regret the absence of the delegates of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany, who did not have French visas. We applaud the message which our comrades sent us from the German Democratic Republic and assure them of our fraternal solidarity.

We also applauded the message of the Vietnamese Party of Labor, whose heroic struggle for national independence, for socialist construction and for the country's democratic reunification we have always supported, and with which we have particularly close bonds. We extend fraternal greetings to all comrades, present and absent.

The presence at our 17th Congress of delegations from many Communist parties of capitalist countries also reflects the powerful upsurge of our international movement and the unshakeable loyalty of the Communists of different countries to the principles of proletarian internationalism. While greeting the delegates of all these parties from the bottom of our heart, everyone will understand that our Congress sends special expressions of solidarity to the courageous Communist Party of Spain, whose policy of unity contributes so effectively to the development of mass action against the Franco regime.

Fraternal greetings to the working people of Spain, to all the antifascist fighters of Spain! Fraternal greetings to the brave strikers in the Asturias!

Allow me to express the deep gratitude of the Congress to the representatives of the national democratic parties of the independent African countries, the Algerian People's Democratic Republic, Guinea, and the Mali Republic. We ask these delegations, when they return to their countries, to convey to their parties and their peoples the fondest wishes of the Communists and the working people of France.

At the price of many years of harrowing and selfless struggle, the people of Algeria, led by the National Liberation Front, have triumphed over colonialism and re-established their national independence. The achievement of freedom and sovereignty by Algeria is a victory for all progressives. True to the principles of proletarian internationalism and acting on the properly understood interests of France, we have from the first supported this just struggle. Three years ago, our 16th Congress appealed to all Frenchmen advocating negotiations, to take vigorous actions in favor of peace. Today, we heartily wish success and prosperity to Algeria, which has embarked on socialism.

We send equally heartfelt greetings to the other independent African countries, which have courageously taken the road of creative development.

In their speeches at our Congress, the delegates of the fraternal Communist parties have reaffirmed their adherence to the policy of the international working-class movement and to its unity. One cannot help feeling concern and grief over the fact that the leaders of the Communist Party of China are departing more and more from the principles of Marxism-Leninism, from the line worked out jointly on the basis of these principles by the international conferences of Communist and Workers parties in 1957 and 1960. They are spreading incorrect theories of a purely adventurist nature.

Instead of considering the contradiction between world socialism and world imperialism as the principal contradiction of our time, the Chinese leaders contend that "the principal storm centre of the world revolution," the pivot of the contradictions of our time, is located in Asia, Africa and Latin America. They are trying to oppose the national-liberation movement to the socialist system, in order to knock in a wedge between the peoples fighting for independence, on the one hand, and the socialist countries and the international working-class movement, on the other.

But could the national-liberation movement ever have achieved all its successes without the October Socialist Revolution? Could it have done so without the 46 years of creative labor and the immense sacrifices of the Soviet people? Could it have done so without the Soviet Union's victory over Hitler Germany and Japan? It was the historic achievements of the Soviet Union that created the conditions for the liberation of the Asian, African and even the Latin-American peoples, and China is no exception. It is the Soviet people again, who are able, thanks to their labor, to render material aid to many countries, thus helping them to build up independent economies. It is the Soviet people who stand guard over the sovereignty and integrity of the newly-free countries.

This statement of the facts is not made by me to belittle the importance of the struggle waged by the peoples in the former colonial countries for their complete independence and of their own contribution to the solution of the big problems of our time.

The Chinese leaders are committing gross blunders. Instead of considering the new balance of forces in the world, which leads to the conclusion that it is possible in our time to prevent world war, they are playing with fire and making a policy devoid of any sense of responsibility for the future of the peace and the very existence of the peoples. This attitude prompts them, among other things, just like de Gaulle, to oppose the Moscow Treaty and advocate the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

Instead of recognizing that concrete conditions of time and place create possibilities of either peaceful or non-peaceful forms of revolution, the Chinese leaders condemn the peaceful form out of hand, and recognize only the non-peaceful. Furthermore, they obscure the temporary character of the dictatorship of the proletariat and reject the conception of a state of the whole people. In effect, they denounce the idea of a united front with the Socialist parties, and seek thereby to turn back the clock by 40 years.

Having at first acknowledged the evil caused by the Stalin cult, they have now changed their minds about it. They glorify the methods regretted and condemned by the working-class movement, and do so, evidently, because these practices persist in their country.

In trying to spread this indefensible line, the sectarians and dogmatists of the CPC leadership fall back on impermissible practices in their relations with other Communist parties, and resort to gross aggression and calumny.

They say in our country that anything exaggerated does not count.

What Communist or, generally speaking, what sensible man in France and elsewhere, would give credit to the outrageous and, at once, pitiful and ridiculous contentions of the Chinese leaders against our Party?

Who would believe that we "defended the positions of French imperialism" and that we are "opposed to the struggle of the colonial peoples for their independence"?

In any case, it would not be believed by those who have in the last 40 years responded to our call and battled against the injustices inflicted on the peoples of Morocco, Syria, Vietnam and, more recently, the people of Algeria.

It would not be believed by those who paid with their liberty for supporting the liberation struggles of these peoples.

From Sabatier, killed on October 12, 1925, during the big strike against the war in Morocco, to the nine people killed in Charonne—of whom most were Communists—the blood of our dead cries out against the calumnies of the Chinese leaders.

The peoples now free do not believe the insulting charges made against our Party. The presence of delegates from many of them at our 17th Congress is precious evidence of the strong friendship that binds us, and of the active solidarity that has in no sense ever been one-sided. We have helped the peoples of the oppressed countries, and they have helped us, the proletarians of France.

The Chinese leaders are multiplying their attempts to disorganize and divide the working-class movement. They employ all kinds of renegades and adventurers to further their disruptive enterprise. Their sole aim is to injure the Communist movement.

Can one remain indifferent to their intrigues? Can one keep silent? For a long time we showed extreme discretion, over the theoretical differences of the Chinese leaders with the whole international working-class movement and their disruptive work against our parties. We confined ourselves to briefing them on the resolutions of our Central Committee, and it was not until the end of 1962 that we informed just the members of our Party about our speech at the 1960 meeting.

The Chinese leaders mistook this moderation and this desire to conduct the discussion on a fraternal basis, for weakness. They expanded their disruptive activities. They went to the length of outrages and slanders.

Today, our entire Party, as the Congress has just declared, considers it necessary that all the Communist and Workers' parties solemnly reaffirm the principles of Marxism-Leninism. We believe it is necessary to reaffirm the Communist theses on peaceful coexistence, on the possibility to avert war, the possibility of advancing to a world without arms and without wars, the possibility of peaceful transition to socialism in definite circumstances, and the necessity of creating a united front with the socialist parties.

Our Congress has pronounced itself in favour of an international conference in order to discuss the problems of the international working-class movement, and to safeguard its unity. The only people who could oppose such a conference are those who wish, in one sense or another, to go back on the principles of the 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement.

Comrades, the serious deviations of the Chinese leaders remind us, if that is at all necessary, that in all circumstances the Party must always firmly adhere to Marxist-Leninst principles. In our own Party, and internationally as well, we must always struggle with determination on two fronts: against sterile sectarianism and narrowness, which today represented the chief danger, and also against Right opportunism, against revisionism, which is still in evidence.

We have entered a period of big battles. It is therefore doubly necessary that our Party should be strong ideologically, that it should be steeled, always combining fidelity to principles with the bold and flexible tactics that convince and attract the masses. At the same time, the Party must be solidly organized on the basis of democratic centralism. Equipped with the new rules, it will accomplish its tasks still more surely.

As always, it must not stint its strength in the performance of its mission, which is to serve with devotion the working class, the people, and the country. It will struggle with all energy to hasten a big democratic change, a regime of progress and freedom, which is feasible in our time solely in the context of socialism.

How far we have travelled since 1922, since that Congress in Paris at which I, a young worker, was a delegate of the Pas-de-Calais federation! That was when, on Lenin's recommendation, our Party first raised the problem of working-class unity and a united front with the Socialist Party.

Ever since that remote period we have worked tirelessly to eliminate the split and to reunite all working people in a single militant front. In 1934, exactly 30 years ago, when the working people of France rose against fascism, our efforts were crowned with an agreement on united action between the Communist and Socialist parties. Soon it was followed by the Popular Front, and a joint program for democratic parties and groups came into being. We had joined hands not only against something, that is, against fascism, but also for something—for "the Popular Front of bread, freedom and peace".

The Popular Front yielded many benefits to the working class, the peasants, and all the other working people. It gave them higher wages, collective agreements, a 40-hour working week, paid leaves, a wheat office, etc. Once again, the democratic spirit asserted itself in our country. When the war was over, after the battles of the Resistance and Liberation movement, it was through unity that we gained new victories: social security, nationalization, the vote for women, the status of civil servants, etc.

We were bent on uniting all the sound forces of the nation and proffered a fraternal hand to the Catholic working people and working people of other faiths in order to fight in concert for happiness on earth.

In these years the people of France recognized our Party more and more as the bearer of their hopes. As far back as 1936, at the time of our Eighth Congress, in order to make the future of our counntry secure, we appealed for the unity of the French people against the two hundred families who exploited them. The Communists denounced and combatted those who undermined national prosperity and impelled the country towards stagnation. They regained the Marsellaise and the tricolour for their people.

Since then the Party's national far-sightedness and national courage came into evidence at every stage — it condemned the Munich betrayal, waged war against the Hitler invaders, opposed the Atlantic pact and the notorious strike force in any of its forms. We continue the history of France. The history of our Party is marked, as with milestones, by important initiatives in the service of France, by its national actions. This has won it the trust of the people. Nobody in France can ignore the Communist Party. Today, as before, it has decisive weight in the country's affairs.

It has won extensive support among the main sections of the working class, in the important industrial centres. At the same time, its words carry weight among the people in the countryside.

Communists head the most important trade union organizations of the working class. The working people elect them freely by reason of their devotion and ability. The Communist Party is a party of proletarians, but it can also be proud of the fact that the most prominent intellectuals of France occupy in our ranks the place left empty by Anatole France and Henri Barbusse, Langevin and Joliot, Eluard and Léger. The Communist Party, we see, represents the France of working people and that of the intellectuals, the whole industrious and productive population in all its wealth and variety.

On its banners it has inscribed the slogans of struggle for socialism, for communism, which will secure prosperity and abundance, culture and freedom for all. Marxism opens the only new road to mankind that will lead it forward and, so to speak, rejuvenate and renovate it.

It is not surprising that the youth, which does not want an unjust society — a cruel, egoistic world based on violence, a world without ideals — turns to the noble cause of communism. Is it not enough to glance at this hall, at the faces of the delegates, to see this?

In our Party young people are trusted with responsible posts. No greater happiness exists than to devote one's life to the Communist cause and to see a new generation rising around it to which we will pass the torch.

Everyone of us, young and old, knows what he owes to the Party.

Everyone of us knows that he will never be able to give it as much as he gets from it, and is always prepared to serve the Party, no matter what functions it may entrust him.

In a few minutes the delegates of the 17th Congress will return to different parts of our country. They will be guided in their work by the clear decisions we have adopted. They will be animated by the conviction that life makes the imperious demand of unity between Communists and Socialists, based on the pooling of the energy of all republicans.

Let us do all we can by our ardent, persevering and tireless efforts for unity to hasten the day when a new democracy will arise in France and when the country will be able to advance firmly forward to socialism.

Long live working-class unity!

Long live the unity of all democratic forces!

Hail to the 17th Congress of the French Communist Party!

Long live Communism!

STRUGGLE OF THE COMMUNIST MOVEMENT FOR PEACE, DEMOCRACY AND SOCIALISM

RESOLUTION* ADOPTED BY A PLENARY MEETING OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF DENMARK

The Communist Party of Denmark has repeatedly emphasized the decisive significance of unity among the Communist Parties in the struggle to resolve the historical task of our time—the task of ensuring the triumph of the cause of peace, democracy and socialism. Hence we could not but deplore the publication by the Communist Party of China of its "proposal concerning the general line of the international Communist movement" of June 14, 1963. By advancing this proposal the CPC widened and deepened its differences with the overwhelming majority of Communist parties, violated the agreement to call a halt to the public polemic, and struck a blow at the striving to strengthen the unity of the Communist movement through discussions between parties.

The main questions brought into dispute by the CPC are: the attitude towards the struggle for peace and peaceful coexistence, the forms of transition from capitalism to socialism, the significance of national-liberation movements, the personality cult in the Communist parties, and the unity of the socialist camp and the world Communist movement.

It has therefore become necessary for the other Communist parties clearly to state their views on these basic problems. Our Party does so in order to forestall any attempts to distort or sow doubt in regard to its aims and tasks and with a view to further substantiating our policy. Our Party also seeks to promote the achievement of greater clarity and to strengthen the ranks of our movement through an exchange of views among Communists.

1. The Communist Party of Denmark holds that life has fully confirmed the correctness of the general line of the Communist movement as set forth in the joint documents of 1957 and 1960. Underlying these documents is the view that the world is now in transition from capitalism to socialism, that ours is a time when social development is determined above all by competition between the two diametrically opposed social systems — socialism and capitalism — and when the socialist world system, in alliance with the other anti-imperialist forces, is increasingly exerting a decisive influence on social development. The proposals of the Communist Party of China on all the basic questions run counter to this general line. Attempts are being made theoretically to substantiate these proposals by claiming that the national-liberation movement in the former colonies is now the decisive determinant of progress. In defiance of the facts, the forces of the working class and socialism are relegated to a secondary place. The CPD rejects both this view put forward by the CPC and the theoretical argumentation advanced to vindicate it.

2. Our Party and the Communist movement generally regard the struggle for peace as one of the main aims of their policy, as the cardinal task of our time. With the present balance of strength between socialism and imperialism there exists a tangible possibility of compelling the imperialsts to renounce war, of excluding world war from the life of society even before socialism has achieved complete and final victory throughout the world. This means that the peaceful coexistence of states with differing social systems is possible. The transition to socialism is therefore a question which will be decided in each country through the class struggle; for socialism to triumph throughout the world there need be no world war. The Communists concentrate all their efforts on realizing these possibilities. The CPC, however, comes out against this jointly adopted militant line; it is opposed to peaceful coexistence being considered the general foreign policy line of the socialist countries capable of providing a way to socialism for all humanity. The CPC counterposes peaceful coexistence to the struggle of the peoples for freedom and socialism, regardless of the fact that in our time this struggle is inseparably connected with the fight for peace. It labels agreements facilitating detente and the achievement of peaceful coexistence as "capitulation". Inasmuch as peace and socialism are indivisible, the Communist Party of Denmark resolutely rejects this viewpoint.

3. General and complete disarmament would make it impossible to wage war and would provide the most durable foundation for the peaceful coexistence of states. Realization of the horrors of nuclear war makes the imperative need for disarmament clear to the peoples of all countries and impels them to fight for it. The Communist movement has jointly posed the realistic task of compelling the imperialists to accept general disarmament. To achieve this, however, vigorous effort on the part of all the peace forces is imperative; the prospect is one of progress through compelling the imperialists to accept a succession of partial disarmament measures.

The Communist Party of China has come out against these jointly elaborated aims. It calls struggle for disarmament a "sheer illusion" and seeks to reduce the demand for disarmament to a purely propaganda slogan. The leaders of the CPC describe the nuclear bomb as a "paper tiger" and are opposed to the danger it represents being brought to people's attention. Proceeding from this, they have levelled unreasonable and violent criticism at the test-ban Treaty, thereby setting themselves against all peoples, who are fighting for peace. Such a policy does not promote the cause of peace, and the Communist Party of Denmark rejects it, deploring that the CPC should have taken such a political stand.

4. The Communists seek to effect the trasition from capitalism to socialism by peaceful means. This is possible only if the peoples unite in defense of their interests, isolate the reactionaries and compel them to refrain from using force, the danger of which always exists. In view of the fact that the rule of monopoly capital comes into conflict with the interests or ever wider sections of the people, the conditions for building the necessary anti-monopoly unity are improving. We therefore have set ourselves the task of stimulatin the activity of the people and heightening their confidence in their own strength through a democratic struggle for peace, independence and regeneration of democracy combined with effective action against the monopolies. If the working class consistently and firmly takes the lead in this struggle, it will be able to unite around itself the majority of the people, isolate the reactionaries and in this was ensure the victory of socialism. The program and policy of our Party rest wholly on these convictions. The proposal of the CPC, however, clearly runs counter to the line which it approved in 1960 jointly with other fraternal parties. Calumnious allegations are made that this policy "regards the movement of the present as everything", and that the Communists who pursue this policy "are disavowing the revolutionary demands of the masses" and in effect preventing revolutionary uprisings where they might otherwise flare up. These concepts have nothing in common with reality and our Party rejects them wholly. The same applies to the exhortations to orientate our policy solely on preparing for the non-peaceful way. Such exhortations are a call to withdraw into complete isolation and to pursue an adventuristic policy.

5. The new, more favourable conditions for the struggle for peace, democracy and socialism throughout the world are the result above all of the tremendous achievements of the socialist countries in construction and raising the material and cultural standards of their people's life. Thanks to these achievements the socialist camp is exercising a growing influence on world development. We are completely unable to understand why the Communist Party of China seeks to belittle the significance of this fact, or why it has gone so far as to accuse Communist parties of socialist countries of "helping to revive capitalism". Such accusations, especially when levelled against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, whose achievements offer the most convincing living proof of the superiority of socialism as a social system, must be most resolutely rejected.

6. The national-liberation movement in the newly-emerged countries is an important part of the anti-imperialist struggle and of the overall process of change under way in the world. The Communists, therefore, fully support this movement, even in cases when it is not led by the working class. The attempts of the Communist Party of China to counterpose Communist parties to the national-liberation movement can only have negative consequences. For it is the support of all the anti-imperialist forces and primarily of victorious socialism that enables the peoples of the newly-emerged countries to forge ahead along non-capitalist lines.

7. The exposure of the Stalin personality cult was of decisive significance for the development of the entire Communist movement. All parties assessed the 20th Congress of the CPSU as having ushered in a new phase in the movement, and life itself has confirmed this assessment. Consequently, it is impossible to understand why the Communist Party of China holds that the struggle against the personality cult is "erroneous and harmful". The Communist movement cannot and will not allow any repetition of the mistakes of the past, which have already been rectified. It will see to it that these mistakes will never be repeated again.

8. The implementation of the line of the Communist parties in the fight for peace, democracy and socialism presupposes consistent struggle against bourgeois ideology in all its forms. There can be no "peaceful coexistence" in the sphere of ideology. Hence our Party is constantly on guard against both revisionist and dogmatist distortions of our policy. Our Party has given a vigorous rebuff to revisionist sallies and thereby staunchly upheld and advocated the line of class struggle in the Danish working-class movement. The fact that the leaders of the Socialist People's Party have been moving farther and farther to the Right has fully demonstrated the need for such action on our part. We therefore reject as utterly groundless the accusation made by the Communist Party of China that our policy is "revisionist" or "opportunist".

9. The unity of the Communist movement is a guarantee that all the available opportunities will be utilized in the fight for peace, democracy and socialism. Precisely because of this the parties pledged themselves to undertake no actions that might undermine this unity. But to our dismay we find in the proposals of the Communist Party of China an undisguised call for a split in the fraternal parties and the movement as a whole. We hold that the CPC has no right whatever to pursue such a course.

10. Regarding the above-mentioned issues as being of decisive importance for our political activity, we completely reject the proposal of the CPC concerning a new general line. We fail to find in it a single weighty argument justifying changing the general line set forth in the agreed documents of 1957 and 1960.

We also deplore the methods to which the leaders of the CPC have resorted in assailing the jointly approved line. One cannot discern in these methods the slightest desire to achieve mutual understanding and unity. On the contrary, they reflect a factionalist approach which leads to increasingly contradictory positions. There is no justification for the arbitrary sallies against fraternal parties or the attempts to ascribe to parties views which everyone knows they do not hold. There is no justification for the assistance rendered to the ruling classes in the capitalist countries in their attacks against the fraternal Communist parties of these countries. Nor is there any justification for the unwillingness of the CPC leaders to achieve the mutual understanding and principled unity in the international Communist movement which above all the Communist Party of the Soviet Union has been striving for in its relations with the Communist Party of China.

11. Seeking to make its contribution to the struggle for peace, democracy and socialism, our Party will make a profound study of the problems that have been raised. We shall work to foil the attempts of our opponents to use the sallies made by the CPC in order to sow confusion, and shall conduct our discussions in strict conformity with Party rules. We shall not allow the attacks made by the CPC to undermine our friendly regard and our respect for the Chinese people and the struggle they have successfully waged under the leadership of the CPC.

We shall continue to work tirelessly for the unity of the Communist movement on the basis of the principles set forth in our joint documents. We appeal to our Chinese comrades to discard their narrow viewpoint which has nothing in common with reality and can only cause harm. We urge them to display a desire to understand the requirements of our time and the conditions in which the fraternal parties are carrying on their struggle, a desire for unity, which is of utmost importance for our common cause.

Our interests are identical. We have common aims. There are no real grounds for policies aimed at a split. Hence we are convinced that unity will triumph and give new impetus to the steadfast efforts of the Communists for peace, democracy and socialism.

PROPOSALS ON STRENGTHENING WORLD UNITY OF THE COMMUNIST PARTIES

STATEMENT* OF THE PLENARY MEETING OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF DENMARK, ADOPTED ON NOVEMBER 23-24, 1963

Our Party has always considered the strenthening of the international unity of the Communist movement a task of prime importance. Hence we are seeking ways and means of furthering this aim in the present situation.

Our position on the current differences was set forth in a resolution adopted by the Central Committee on August 24, 1963. This position has been fully endorsed by the entire Party; moreover, it has been confirmed by later developments.

Life has shown that attacks against the general line adopted by the Communist movement have only played into the hands of its enemies. In view of this, and taking into account the position of other Communist parties, we propose that the open polemic be terminated.

*Land og Folk, November 24, 1963.

The exchange of views to date shows that the agreed decisions of the 1957 and 1960 meetings should be regarded as the basis uniting the Communist movement. We suggest that in the light of this fact the possibilities be explored for the convocation, as soon as the necessary political preparations have been completed, of a new international meeting of the Communist parties with a view to reaffirming these decisions, taking into account the experience gained since the last meeting.

FOR UNITY OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

STATEMENT* OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF DENMARK, ADOPTED APRIL 19, 1964

The Communist Party of Denmark has always fully supported the general line which the international Communist movement elaborated at its meetings in 1957 and 1960. Hence our Party has consistently combated all distortions of this line and all attacks levelled against it both by the Right-wing, revisionist elements, in particular those represented by Axel Larsen, and by the dogmatists and sectarians who consider themselves to be more "Left" than our Party.

From the very beginning of the debate in the international Communist movement we have voiced our disagreement with the dogmatic and sectarian views of the spokesmen of the Communist Party of China. We set forth our arguments at the meeting of Communist parties in 1960 and since then we have in diverse ways confirmed and expounded our position. In particular, the Central Committee stated its views on this question in its resolution of August 24, 1963.

At the same time we have consistently sought to ensure that the discussion among Communists be conducted in a comradely spirit, so as not to give the anti-Communists any opportunities to use it to denigrate the Communist movement. In the various messages we have sent to fraternal parties we laid stress on the responsibility they bear in this respect. We have voiced the view that the atmosphere could be improved by stopping the open polemics, and supported the initiative of a number of fraternal parties, in particular that of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, which has displayed a praiseworthy sense of responsibility, devotion to principle and patience in dealing with the difficulties that have arisen in the international Communist movement.

We therefore deplore the fact that the leaders of the CPC, who carried the public polemic far beyond all permissible bounds, not only rejected the suggestion that the public debate be discontinued but have latterly gone to even greater lengths. Moreover, they are attacking positions which they only recently upheld themselves. They are assailing the basic principles of joint statements, accusing the Soviet Union and other socialist countries of allowing themselves to be dominated by "capitalist forces," and trying to prove that a split is inevitable in the Communist movement. The actions of the CPC leaders constitute an unprincipled drive to bring about a split.

The situation demands new effective steps to strengthen the unity of the international Communist movement. The experience of our movement shows that unity can be ensured only on the basis of devotion to the principles of Marxism-Leninism. It is therefore necessary to reaffirm, elaborate and elucidate the principles which unite the international Communist movement and are its distinguishing features. The further fruitful development on this basis of the political thinking and activities of the various Communist parties, in accordance with the conditions prevailing in the respective countries, is an essential component of this process.

The CC, CPD has time and again, and in particular at its plenary meeting in November 1963, declared for the convocation of an international meeting to confirm the general line charted earlier and to elaborate, on the basis of this line, a new positive initiative conforming to the changing situation. Proceeding from the fact that genuine unity can be achieved only through a constant exchange of views between independent and equal Communist parties, we believe that it is now more important than ever to call such a meeting and that preparations for it should be begun as soon as possible.

We believe that the time is ripe for the Communists of all countries to undertake a new positive initiative in the struggle for peace, national freedom and socialism.

The Central Committee authorizes the leadership of the Party, on the basis of the position outlined above, to continue to give effect to the Party's striving to strengthen the unity of the international Communist movement and to increase its contribution to the cause of communism.

ALL COMMUNIST PARTIES HAVE COMMON BASIS—DIFFERENCES OF OPINION MUST NOT UNDERMINE UNITY

STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL BOARD OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF NORWAY ADOPTED AT A PLENARY MEETING ON JANUARY 5-6, 1963

Having heard the reports of the Norwegian Communist Party delegations who visited China and Poland, and of delegations who attended the congresses of some fraternal parties, the Plenary Meeting of the National Board of the Communist Party of Norway has discussed the present situation in the world Communist movement.

The National Board herewith declares:

Differences of an ideological and fundamental nature over some important issues have arisen lately in the world Communist movement.

The point of view of the Communist Party of Norway on these issues has been set out in fundamental, programmatic Party statements. We refer in particular to the Working Program adopted at the last Party Congress and to the draft Party Program, which sum up the point of view of the Party on vital international and national problems.

Our scientific theory of Marxism has been further advanced in a number of important fields. This is reflected in international resolutions and the resolutions of individual Communst parties, notably the new Program adopted by the 22nd Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

The Communist Party of Norway was a co-signatory of the following international instruments: the Moscow Declaration of 1957, the Rome Statement of the West European Communist Parties of 1959 and the 1960 Moscow Statement of all the Communist Parties. These provide "a theoretical basis of principle for all the Communist parties in their joint struggle for the common goal" (Resolution of the Plenary Meeting of the National Board on the Moscow Statement).

The National Board considers it necessary to elucidate its points of view on some of the main issues:

The Communist Party of Norway regards the struggle for peace as the most important task of our time. In this nuclear rocket age a new world war would be a disaster, the consequences of which are hard to foretell. However, a new world war can now be prevented; war is no longer inevitable.

The CPN holds that peaceful coexistence of countries with different social systems is possible and necessary for the survival of mankind. The CPN considers that the steps taken by the Soviet Union at the peak of the Cuban crisis saved the world from a thermonuclear war and, at once, protected the independence of the people of Cuba.

The CPN regards relaxation of international tension and universal disarmament as necessary to secure peace. Norway must make its contribution to this by pursuing a neutral foreign policy, a policy of non-participation in blocs, and by supporting all proposals and measures promoting peace.

The CPN considers the new neutralist countries to be an important factor in the struggle for peace and an easing of tension, and against imperialism.

The CPN strives for peaceful transition to socialism. The possibilities for this are implict in the changed international situation, the present situation in Norway and in the historical traditions of the Norwegian people and the Norwegian workingclass movement.

The CPN considers the struggle to safeguard the country's sovereignty, restrict the power of monopoly capital and extend the democratic rights of the people in all social spheres to be the principal objective of Norway's present policy. The solution of these tasks will pave the way for peaceful transition to socialism.

The CPN believes that each Communist Party must frame its policy on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and in accordance with the concrete situation and the conditions prevailing in its country. It is impossible to create a universal course of action suitable for all countries. There are different roads leading to the same socialist goal.

The CPN regards international proletarian solidarity as the decisive basis of the struggle for peace and socialism. The National Board considers it a prime task to help preserve the unity of the world Communist movement. For this reason, the resolution of the Plenary Meeting of the National Board on the 1960 Moscow Statement says: "The National Board of the CPN welcomes with deep satisfaction the standards worked out in the Statement for co-operation and contacts between Communist parties."

The National Board of the CPN considers it natural that different points of view and different evaluations may arise in the different situations and conditions of individual countries. Discussion of these questions is necessary and useful. But it must be consistent with the standards worked out in the 1960 Statement for co-operation and contacts between Communist parties.

In view of the nature which the discussion sometimes assumed of late, the National Board of the CPN declares that all the parties must, in order to preserve and strengthen their comradely and fraternal relations, try to avoid such language and such measures as would unnecessarily aggravate the situation and thereby damage unity and impede resolving the questions by means of comradely negotiation.

The National Board refers to the point in the 1960 Statement which concerns exchange of opinion and experience between parties by means of conferences and joint consultations, and rejection of any steps liable to weaken or undermine the unity of the world Communist movement. Any spread of ideological and tactical differences to relations between states must be avoided.

The Communist Party of Norway is prepared to participate in a new conference of all the fraternal parties in order to determine and resolve the differences of opinion. But such a conference should not convene before thorough preparatory work has been done for it. The unity of the world Communist movement is a matter that concerns all parties, and all parties must share the responsibility for it. The National Board welcomes the initiative of the fraternal Italian Party, which suggested negotiations between two or several parties and recommended one or several commissions composed of representatives from several parties to examine and discuss the fundamental ideological questions in dispute, and to determine and examine objectively other existing differences.

As before, the CPN will take its stand on various ideological questions of current policy on the strength of internal discussions, and will set out its point of view when ever it deems necessary. The CPN will support all efforts to safeguard and develop friendly relations between the Communist parties, and will for its part try to conduct the discussion in a comradely way that will help to strengthen the unity of the world Communist movement.

DIFFERENCES MUST BE DISCUSSED IN A COMRADELY WAY.

The NB, PN dissociates itself from the harmful trend of the discussion in the world Communist movement

STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL BOARD OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF NORWAY ON THE DISCUSSION IN THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT ADOPTED AT A PLENARY MEETING ON OCTOBER 5-6, 1963

The point of view of the Communist Party of Norway on the questions now being discussed in the world Communist movement is set out in the Statement of the National Board adopted at a plenary meeting in January of this year, in the Party Program passed by the all-Norway Conference in April and in the Statement of the Party Secretariat on the conclusion of the partial nuclear test-ban treaty. The Communist Party of Norway has not changed its point of view, and does not agree to the proposals of revising the general line worked out at the conferences of Communist parties in 1957 and 1960.

The National Board greatly deplores the harmful trend the discussion has taken in the last few months, particularly because the discussion has also affected the inter-state relations of the socialist countries.

The Communist Party of Norway will not subscribe to the view that a split of the Communist movement is inevitable. All Communists and all Communist parties have a common basis. The factors that bring us together are far more important and significant than those which may divide us in the appraisal of specific questions, be they even extremely important questions of current policy. Enemies of the working class and enemies of the peoples will be the only ones to gain from a split.

The Communist Party of Norway believes that it is possible to determine and discuss the differences of opinion in the world Communist movement in a friendly way and to resolve them in accordance with the standards of co-operation and contacts worked out in the 1960 Statement. The CPN will not take part in any discussion that may lead to a further aggravation and deterioration of the situation and will instead strive to restore the comradely standards of relations and discussions between all fraternal Communist parties.

The National Board therefore submits to all the Communist parties the proposal to end further open polemics and, at the very least, to take due measures for the discussion to proceed in a comradely atmosphere and in a politically justified manner. The National Board repeats the proposal it made in January to form one or several commissions composed of representatives of a number of parties in order to discuss the questions in dispute. Unity of the world Communist movement is not the concern of only the biggest parties, the CPSU and CPC. It concerns all the Communist parties, big and small, and all parties bear the responsibility for it.

ON THE SITUATION IN THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT

STATEMENT OF THE ALL-NORWAY CONFERENCE OF THE CPN ADOPTED ON APRIL 12, 1964

The all-Norway Conference of the CPN has discussed the situation in the world Communist movement and approves the decisions taken on this score by the National Board of the Party in January and October 1963.

The open polemics have grown more acute of late and it is now even more imperative than before to act in line with these decisions.

The all-Norway conference believes that one or several Commissions should be formed of representatives of many parties in order to clarify the existing differences and find ways and means of overcoming them.

All open polemics and all activities liable to deepen the existing differences must be ceased while this work is being done.

The all-Norway Conference holds that an international conference will be useful, provided it restores the unity of the world Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and the principles of proletarian internationalism, taking into account the independence and equality of every single party.

The proposed commission or commissions must be given an opportunity to work in a tranquil environment, until they find a positive solution. The commissions should begin their work at the earliest date.

An international conference must yield good results and invigorate the struggle against imperialism, for peace, democracy and socialism.

ON THE POLITICAL SITUATION AND POLITICAL TASKS BEFORE NEXT CONGRESS IN 1965

STATEMENT OF THE ALL-NORWAY CONFERENCE OF THE CPN ADOPTED ON APRIL 11-12, 1964

The Program of the CPN passed at last year's conference stresses that struggle for the preservation and maintenance of peace is the most important task of our time. On the strength of an analysis of the present situation in Norway and the class structure of Norwegian society, the Program defines the purposes pursued in the struggle for daily objectives, for Norway's independence, for a renovation and extension of democracy and for restricting the power of monopoly capital, so as to pave the way for a peaceful transition to socialism. United action by the working class and rallying the people to back this policy is specified in the Program as the main task.

The contemporary world situation and that in Norway has created added opportunities for accomplishing these tasks. The Moscow nuclear test-ban treaty has been an important step towards a further easing of tension.

The developments in Norway show clearly that the time of class struggle is not over. The reluctance of employers to make concessions when signing collective agreements last year and this year proves this point. It is also proved by the reactionary offensive last year for the formation of a bourgeois government. In the circumstances, it was the correct class attitude of the Party that tended to improve the situation in the Norwegian working-class movement. At present, it is the task of the Party to intensify and extend the struggle for unity in order to form a common class front. This is necessary in order to repel the forces of capital and to secure a progressive policy.

There are deep-going differences between the CPN and the two other working-class parties on many programmatic and ideological problems. Therefore, the question of an "organizational merger" is unrealistic. What the present situation calls for—in spite of the differences—is to secure united action in areas where unity exists.

The principal political tasks, the Conference believes, are the following: 1. promote a broad popular movement for an atom-free zone in the North, to be sealed by treaty and guaranteed by the nuclear powers, and a Norwegian movement against NATO mixed-manned nuclear force. In that way, and by considerably reducing its own military expenditures, Norway could further a general easing of international tension and the realization of disarmament; 2. work for the introduction of a satisfactory public pension, block the road to rising prices, work for an increase in real wages, for a 40-hour working week, for four-week annual leaves, protection of days off, greater public housing programs, rejection of the Handal Committee proposal of raising house rents, and secure employment, among other things, by founding industrial enterprises in different parts of the country; 3. push through democratic reforms securing participation by employees in the management of production, and restrict the power of monopoly capital by means of nationalization and other measures. First and foremost, the big banks and sources of capital should be put under public supervision.

The Conference supports the Statement of the Plenary Meeting of the National Board in October that it is the principal task of all active and effective forces in the working-class movement to act in unison and secure the promises made before the communal election last year in the "counter-statement" of the Norwegian Labour Party group in Parliament, and other urgent demands.

The Conference emphasizes the necessity of applying all efforts to achieve good results for the CPN at the communal election in the autumn of this year.

Preparations for the 1965 Storting election should also begin now. The Communists, who are the most consistent fighters for peace, progress and socialism, must again be represented in the Storting. The Communist Party of Norway believes that a united labor front should be created in the coming parliamentary election, in order to inflict a telling defeat on the forces of capital.

A strong and effective policy of unity presupposes a strong Communist Party, efficient in all its sectors and active at all times. It depends mostly on the activity and attitude of the Party leadership and the membership whether the present favourable, objective situation will lead to further positive gains for the working class and all working people of our country.

WORLD COMMUNIST CONFERENCE UNLIKELY TO HAVE POSITIVE RESULTS NOW

ENLARGED MEETING OF THE WORKING COMMITTEE OF THE BOARD OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF SWEDEN*

"We do not think that an international conference of the Communist parties could have positive results in the present conditions. This does not mean that we are neutral or indifferent to the disagreements between Communist parties. Our Party Congress has adotped a very definite stand on these cardinal issues," C.-H. Harmansson, CPS Chairman and a deputy to the Riksdag, declared as he summed up his Party's point of view.

* * *

The latest proposal to call an international conference of the Communist parties was made in M. A. Suslov's speech at the Plenary Meeting of the CC CPSU, on Feburary 14. Earliest convocation of such a conference has been proposed by other parties.

STANDPOINT OF THE CPS CONGRESS

An enlarged meeting of the Working Committee of the CPS Board discussed these questions on April 20 and came to the unanimous conclusion that in the present conditions an international conference would be unlikely to yield positive results. At the same time, the Working Committee referred to the following passage in the Statement of the Party Congress in January 1964:

"The Congress reaffirms the propositions contained in the Party Program of 1953 and in the programmatic statement of 1961 regarding peaceful coexistence and the possibility of a peaceful road to socialism. The Congress rejects the Chinese Communist Party's criticism of this concept as unfounded."

ABOUT THE DISCUSSION

"I want to make the following comment on the Working Committee's stand," Hermansson said. "We consider it incorrect to describe the differences of opinion as 'a conflict between Moscow and Peking alone'! Some inter-state affairs may have played a certain part in the discussion, but in the main it concerns something else, namely, matters of surpreme importance to all mankind: how to secure peace and social progress in the complicated conditions prevailing in the world today."

*Ny Dag, May 13, 1964.

SOVEREIGN PARTIES

There has not been any international organization of the Communist parties since the Comintern was dissolved in 1943. Every party is completely autonomous and free to state its own policy. This is the only possible approach, considering the different conditions obtaining in the different countries.

This autonomy does not rule out consultation and co-operation between Communist parties. In general, extensive co-operation is necessary among all forces and parties fighting in the different countries for peace, democracy and socialism. Therefore activities aimed at a split are particularly deploragle, because they have already led to the formation of new groups and parties in some countries. What the working-class movement needs is greater unity and not a greater split.

DISCUSSION NECESSARY

The above standpoint does not signify a negative attitude toward discussion. On the contrary, what is needed today is a more active discussion, both on an international plane and within our own Party. But it should be conducted in a way that could yield positive results. The invectives one heard in the course of the international discussion will only harm the socialist cause and discredit it in the eyes of the public. Especially harmful is the fact that the question of contradictions between rich and poor nations and between different races, was raised in this discussion. The socialist working-class movement must adhere to the principle of the equality of all peoples and races. Our solidarity should be less limited to nationality or region of the world than ever before. It should embrace the whole world.

RESOLUTION* OF PARTY MEETING, CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF FINLAND

The Political Bureau of the CPF met on April 8 to discuss the situation that had arisen in the international Communist movement as a result of the Chinese Communist Party's rejection of the proposal of a number of fraternal parties to stop the public polemics and to restore unity. It was decided to publish the resolution adopted at the February 22-23 plenary meeting of the Central Committee.

At its February meeting the CC, CPF, discussed the disruptive activity of the leaders of the Communist Party of China in the international and working-class movement. The report of the Political Bureau as well as speakers who took the floor in the discussion noted that this was not the first occasion the Party had had to consider the Chinese leaders' stand, which differs from the unanimously adopted decisions of the 1957 and 1960 international meetings. Many other Communist parties, under attack by the Chinese leaders, have also discussed the differences, and support the proposal to convene an international meeting in order to resolve these differences. Already at its November meeting, the Political Bureau of the CPF came to the conclusion that such a meeting would sooner or later be necessary, but did not consider it urgent at the time. Precisely at the same time the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union proposed to the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China to discontinue the public polemics and mutual recriminations, and to settle the problems at issue through fraternal negotiation on the basis of the 1960 resolution. The acceptance of this proposal would lay the groundwork for an international meeting, and for resolving the differences and achieving unity in the international Communist movement.

The Communist Party of Finland also refrained from public discussion of the differences and waited for an answer from the CPC to the reconciliation proposal. The Chinese leaders, however, ignored the proposal and intensified their attacks against the Marxist-Leninist parties of the Soviet Union and other countries. The proposal for reconciliation was made in confidence by the CPSU Central Committee, but the Chinese leaders began to discuss it openly—for instance, in Jenminjihpao of February 4, and in other articles published in many languages. These articles provided rich material for anti-communist propaganda, inasmuch as they abound in false accusations, both old and new, against the policy of the Communist parties of other countries. In these articles the Chinese leaders demand that the polemics be continued and seek to provoke a split in the Communist parties and in other international democratic organizations.

In view of this, the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Finland can no longer remain silent in the face of the slanderous and disruptive policy of the leaders of the Communist Party of China in the international Communist movement. It is necessary to rally all our forces to ward off the threat of a division in the Communist movement and resolutely defend the principles of Marxism-Leninism. From this standpoint, an international meeting of the Communist and Workers' parties has become an urgent necessity. The object of this meeting would be to rally the Communist movement to the struggle for socialism and national liberation, taking due account of the changes that have lately taken place in the international situation. The Central Committee is in favor of such a meeting and authorizes the Political Bureau to take the necessary steps to ensure the victory of Marxist-Leninist principles and the integrity and unity of the Communist movement.

CERTAIN ASPECTS OF PARTY LIFE IN THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF CHINA*

Back in 1912 the Prague Conference of the Bolsheviks adopted a resolution, proposed by Lenin, "On the Chinese Revolution", which was full of a warm feeling of respect for the Chinese revolutionaries and a readiness to give them every support. It stated: ". . . . The Conference recognizes the world-wide importance of the revolutionary struggle of the Chinese people, which is bringing emancipation to Asia and undermining the rule of the European bourgeoisie. The Conference hails the revolutionary republicans of China, testifies to the profound enthusiasm and complete sympathy with which the proletariat of Russia is following the successes of the revolutionary people of China, and condemns the behavior of the Russian liberals who are supporting tsarism's policy of conquest." (V. I. Lenin, Works, 4th Russ. ed., Vol. 17, pp. 434-435.)

Ever since the victory of the October Revolution, which shook the foundations of capitalism throughout the world and opened the sluices wide for the powerful stream of the revolutionary movement to spread all over the earth, China included, our Communist Party has always supported and continues to support the Communist Party of China, the Chinese revolution, maintains friendship with People's China and treasures this friendship.

Until recently, while the leadership of the Communist Party of China was still able to assess things objectively, this leadership repeatedly expressed, at its congresses and in individual statements, the highest esteem for the CPSU and its Central Committee, and for the line of the 20th Congress of our Party, and stressed the tremendous importance of the Soviet Union and of its support of, and assistance to, China.

We have never taken the liberty of criticizing the internal life of the Communist Party of China, although we had, and still have, some serious objections with regard to certain aspects of the activities of this Communist Party. We refrained from voicing our criticism because we regarded all this as the concern of the Communist Party of China—just as in other cases, such things are the concern of other Communist parties.

However, of late the Chinese Communists have appropriated the right to interfere in our internal affairs, both of the state and of the Party.

The leadership of the Communist Party of China lauds the Stalin cult, opposing our criticism of the personality cult and our measures to combat its consequences. This in itself, of course, is downright interference in the affairs of our Party.

---

*Pravda, April 28 and 29, 1964.

The CPSU Program and Rules are being subjected to unscrupulous and utterly unfounded criticism in the Chinese press.

Were we to do anything of this sort with respect to the Communist Party of China, its leaders would at once attach the great-power label to us. But when they do it themselves, they consider it legitimate and correct.

Lately the leadership of the Communist Party of China has adopted a policy of unbridled anti-Soviet propaganda among its own people and in all other countries where they have the opportunity to conduct such propaganda. While attacking our Party and its Program, the Chinese leaders inordinately extol the internal conditions and practices of their own party, presenting its line of activity as "the most Marxist-Leninist" line, an irreproachable line that might well-nigh serve as a model for others to follow—as if they really had serious grounds for doing this. They varnish up the state of affairs inside their own Party, and cover up their mistakes, of which, to take them at their word, they have none. This is evidence of a lack of the qualities which are above all essential to the leaders of a Leninist-type party.

Lenin said: "Frankly admitting a mistake, ascertaining the reasons for it, analyzing the conditions which led to it, and thorouhgly discussing the means of correcting it—that is the earmark of a serious party; that is the way it should perform its duties, that is the way it should educate and train the class, and then the masses." (Works, 4th Russ. ed., Vol. 31, p. 39.)

It is precisely over the past decade, when the Leninist standards and traditions of party life were restored, that our Party has given an especially striking demonstration of its strength, boldly revealing its mistakes and shortcomings and taking radical measures to remove them. N. S. Khrushchov stressed in the report of the CPSU Central Committee to the 22nd Congress: "In conformity with the demands of its new Program and Rules, the Party will unswervingly observe Leninist standards in Party life and the principle of collective leadership, will make Party bodies and their members more strictly accountable to the Party and the people, will foster activity and initiative on the part of all Communists and their participation in the elaboration and implementation of Party policy, and will develop criticism and self-criticism."

That is what the Chinese leaders particularly dislike today.

In the present situation, it might be useful to expose the violations of Leninist standards of Party life in the Communist Party of China, for these violations are directly connected with the roots of the present anti-Leninist stand of the CPC leadership. It goes without saying that we shall not imitate the Chinese method of resorting to lies, falsification, crude sallies, vituperation, and insults, for that is unworthy of Communists.

ONLY TWO PARTY CONGRESSES IN 35 YEARS

A Marxist-Leninist Party is built on the principles of democratic centralism.

Any violation of these two elements—democracy and centralism—in one or another respect signifies a deviation from the Leninist principles of Party organization and inevitably engenders either bureaucratic or anarchist tendencies in its development.

It is generally known that Lenin, this greatest authority and universally recognized leader of the Party, did not consider it possible to direct the Party without regularly convening its congresses. His understanding of the role of congresses was that the leadership, the Central Committee, should report to the Party, in accordance with the requirements of the Party Rules, so as to collectively elaborate further policy, by taking into account the experience of the masses and the activities of the entire Party, or to introduce necessary amendments to the decisions of preceding Party Congresses, should this be called for by the changed situation.

Within four months after the victory of the October Revolution a congress of our Party was convened to formulate the tasks of strengthening the dictatorship of the proletariat, and of the Soviet system, as well as the aims of socialist construction. Both in Lenin's lifetime and right up to the beginning of the Patriotic War, Party Congresses were convened regularly. This tradition and major requirement of the Rules was restored in the CPSU after Stalin died.

The Communist Party of China held its Sixth Congress in 1928, its Seventh Congress in 1945 and its Eighth Congress only eleven years later, in 1956. Thus, the Communist Party of China has convened only two congresses over the past 35 years. The CPC held its Eighth Congress six years after complete victory had been won in the whole of China in 1949. This Congress adopted important decisions which basically corresponded to Marxist-Leninist theory, and represented the application of Marxism-Leninism to the conditions existing in China. This has been noted time and again by our Party, which has not changed its appraisal of the 1956 Congress of the Chinese Communist Party.

The Congress adopted the Party Rules. According to these rules, congresses are to be convened once every five years, Congress sessions to meet annually throughout this period; the delegates, elected to the Congress in 1956, retain their powers for five years, The Second Session was to have been held in 1957. It was held in 1958. That was the last session. Six years have already passed, although the Third Session of the Eighth Congress was to have been held in 1960, it has still to be convened.

This method of keeping delegates in office for five years is unusual and is not practised in any Marxist-Leninist Party. It cannot be considered a contribution to inner-Party democracy in the world Communist movement and it is not surprising that no other party has borrowed this "experience" from the Communist Party of China.

Let us examine, for instance, the following aspect of the matter. At the time of the election of delegates to the 1956 Congress, the Communist Party of China had 10.7 million members. Today it has 18 million, almost twice as many; yet the delegates elected in 1956 still represent the entire Party and retain their powers, although the five-year term stipulated in the Rules has expired long ago. This means that almost half the Party, more than seven million members, have never elected delegates to Congress. What about inner-Party democracy then? What about the rights of Party members?

There is another curious thing. Since the Party Rules have not been changed, it would seem one should abide by them. However, they are being grossly violated.

The five-year term envisaged by the Rules expired in 1961 and a new Party Congress should have been convened and new delegates elected. But over seven years have passed since 1956 and it is not even known when a Party Congress will be held or why it is not being convened.

According to the Rules, the term of office of the Central Committee also expired long ago. However no one, including the Party itself, appears to be aware of this. Can this really be a matter of indifference to everyone in the Party? — even to the old Party members or those seven million who joined the Party after the last Congress and who thus participated neither in the election of its leading bodies nor in the elaboration of Party policy? Can the members of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of China have allowed their sense of responsibility to their Party to have become blunted to such a degree?

The leadership of the Communist Party of China does not even consider it necessary to give the Party its reasons for not adhering to the Rules and for not convening congresses.

Everything shows that in the Communist Party of China these questions are now decided not by the Rules, but by the directives of Mao Tse-tung, as was the case with us for a certain period after the war, when Stalin was alive.

After the Second World War, the question of convening a Party Congress was raised on more than one occasion in the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of our Party. Stalin, however, used every means to put it off. The Party was prepared for a congress and the entire postwar situation called for one, above all in order to discuss the plan for restoring and further developing the economy. However, the plan was adopted without the sanction of a congress, the Party's supreme organ; this was a violation of its traditions and did not help to improve its practical activity.

The Political Bureau of the Central Committee twice adopted a decision to convene a congress, even appointing a definite date, but Stalin contrived subsequently to obtain a postponement on the grounds that he was not prepared to present the report of the Central Committee, that because of his age he found it difficult and needed more time to prepare.

As a result, the Party Congress was convened only in 1952 instead of in 1946-48, and the only reason why it was not held at that time was the personality cult and the inordinate role it played in the Party leadership.

It may be assumed that something of the kind is taking place in the Communist Party of China today. There too the first five-year plan of economic development was not discussed at a Congress, the "three red banners" policy and the transition from agricultural co-operatives to communes were carried out without any decision of a Congress and indeed in contravention of the still valid directives of the 1956 Congress. The new five-year plan should have started in 1963, yet to date there is no indication of a Congress being convened to chart the further development of economy. Moreover, it must be most definitely stated that the new course taken by the Chinese leadership, in recent years with regard to the world Communist movement, to international and domestic policies, and its new ideological platform, which is tantamount to revision of the major theses of Marxism-Leninism—all this sharp turn-about was affected without the Party being consulted, without a Congress being convened and contrary to the decisions taken at preceding congresses of the Communist Party of China. This signifies not only revision of the Marxist-Leninist theory and practice common to the Communist parties, it is first and foremost revision with regard to the CPC itself, its principles and the decisions of its congresses.

Hence an attempt to analyze how and on what points the present ideological theses and practices of the Chinese leaders, who are driving towards a split, depart from the decisions of Chinese Party congresses, and how they contradict these decisions, can in no way be taken as an attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of the Communist Party of China. This has nothing at all in common, either in form or in substance, with the gross interference of the Chinese leadership in the affairs of other parties.

REVISION OF THE POLICY OF CHINESE COMMUNIST PARTY IN INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

The radical change in the position of the CPC leadership, its revision of theses jointly agreed upon at international conferences of the Communist and Workers' parties and of resolutions adopted at its own Party congresses can be traced without difficulty by examining its stand on international issues.

Strangely enough, the Chinese Communist Party has no program of its own. This is in itself a serious matter and we shall return to it later. The Party Rules, which the CPC adopted at its Eighth Congress in 1956, are prefaced with a brief "Program Outline". This document says that "the Communist Party of China advocates a foreign policy of preserving world peace and of peaceful coexistence of countries with different systems". Such was the general line of the Chinese Communist Party in international affairs at that time. Moreover it shared the general interpretation of peaceful coexistence. The report of the CPC Central Committee to the Eighth Congress emphasized that the 20th Congress of the CPSU had "put forward proposals for the further expansion of peaceful coexistence and international co-operation and made a signal contribution to the relaxation of world tensions".

It was on the basis of these principles laid down by their Congress that the Chinese delegates at the 1957 and 1960 Moscow Communist Party meetings signed documents setting forth positions with regard to war and peace, peaceful coexistence and the class struggle on the international scene, unanimously adopted by all Communist parties in the world.

Who is now authorizing the editors of Jenminjihpao and Hungchi to expound exactly the opposite?

The notorious "Sixth Article" (December 12, 1963) about the Open Letter of the Central Committee of the CPSU speaks in insulting terms, as of some crime, of the fact that the CPSU leadership "considers peaceful coexistence the 'general line of the foreign policies of the Soviet Union and all countries of the socialist camp'," claiming that this supposedly "means putting the sign of equality between the fraternal socialist countries and the capitalist countries" that it means "renouncing the socialist camp", that this line supposedly "accords with imperialism's wants and plays into the hands of the imperialist policy of aggression and war", that this line "implies the substitution globally of class co-operation for the class struggle", etc. etc.

Apropos the U.S.S.R.'s international agreement and the class struggle in the different capitalist countries, there was a time when Mao Tse-tung fully appreciated the interdependence of these two questions. More than that, he saw to it that nobody in China understood it amiss, that is, in the way it is now being presented by Jenminjihpao and Hungchi.

Referring in his explanatory notes to "About the Evaluation of the Present International Situation", to the possibility of agreements between the imperialist and socialist countries and, in particular, between the U.S.S.R., U.S.A., Britain and France, Mao Tse-tung wrote at that time (April 1946) that "this by no means implies that the peoples in the countries of the capitalist world should also agree to compromises at home. The peoples of all countries will continue to wage the struggle, which will assume different forms depending on the situation".

In the 1957 Declaration the Communist parties conjointly and unanimously stated their view with respect to the forms of the struggle and the forms of transition to socialism in the capitalist countries:

"The forms of transition from capitalism to socialism may vary for different countries. The working class and its vanguard—the Marxist-Leninist Party—seek to achieve the socialist revolution by peaceful means. This would accord with the interests of the working class and the entire people, with the national interests of the country. . . In the event of the exploiting classes resorting to violence against the people, the possibility of non-peaceful transition to socialism should be borne in mind."

At its Second Session in May 1958, the Eighth Congress of the Chinese Communist Party adopted a special resolution in which it unanimously approved the Declaration and the Peace Manifesto and stated that these documents had "ushered in a new stage in the international Communist movement of today and had lent tremendous inspiration to all the working people and to all the forces for peace, democracy and progress throughout the world."

But what document and which Chinese Communist Party Congress has legalized the departure from these positions and in particular, the crass misinterpretation of the forms of the transition to socialism and unrestrained advocacy of armed forms of struggle, regardless of the situation and of the balance of forces, as being supposedly the only possible way and the "universal law of the proletarian revolution" (from the Hungchi and Jenminjihpao articles, March 31 last) for all countries and nations? And, as the conclusion following from this "law", gross interference in the affairs of the Communist parties in the capitalist countries, the demand that they start the armed struggle, and—whenever this demand is objected to—the practice of labelling the leaders of the Communist parties of these countries as being "cowardly as mice" or "pusillanimous penguins"?

Does that correspond to the spirit, the letter or the meaning of the documents of the Moscow Meetings or of the Eighth Congress of the Chinese Communist Party? There can be only one answer: not in the slightest!

For that matter, that is no longer concealed in China. In its eighth article of March 31 last, Jenminjihpao directly demands "a re-examination and rectification" (which really means nothing but revision!) of formulation on major issues set forth in the Declaration and Statement of the International Meetings of the Communist parties.

The attitude of the Chinese leadership to disarmament and the ending of nuclear tests has undergone a similar metamorphosis. In the decisions of its Second Session adopted in 1958, the Eighth CPC Congress clearly and definitely stated:

"The Soviet Union was the first to stop nuclear weapon tests and the government of the Korean People's Democratic Republic and the government of our own country conjointly decided to withdraw the Chinese people's volunteers from Korea. These facts show the peoples of the world that the countries of the socialist camp are prepared to do their utmost to maintain peace. However, the aggressive bloc under the aegis of U.S. imperialism is still slighting the peaceful aspirations of the peoples of the world and is still refusing to stop nuclear weapon tests, end the cold war, reduce armaments or withdraw its troops from Korea, and is still doing everything to put off a summit conference."

Thus, in 1958 even the unilateral ending of tests by the Soviet Union was regarded as a manifestation of the readiness of "the countries of the socialist camp to do their utmost to maintain peace", while the aggressive circles were criticized for ignoring the peaceful aspirations of the peoples. Now, contrary to what the Congress of the Chinese Communist Party proclaimed, the partial test ban is described as "capituation to American imperialism" and as having the aim of "consolidating the nuclear monopoly of the three powers". (From the Jenminjihpao and Hungchi articles.) What has changed? Have nuclear tests started doing humanity less harm? No, it is the view of the Chinese leadership that has changed and is now the exact opposite of that expressed by the Congress. But it is not even thought necessary to inform the Party and its supreme organ, the Congress, of this.

Having thus revised the theses set forth in joint Communist Party Documents and the resolutions of its own congresses on international affairs, the CPC leadership tried to shift the charge of revisionism to where it least belongs, and has been drumming away in issue after issue in Jenminjihpao and Hungchi, that it is the leadership which is "making propaganda for its revisionist line of so-called 'peaceful coexistence', 'peaceful competition' and 'peaceful transition', and has started preaching the 'reasonability' and 'kind intentions of the imperialists'." (From the article of September 6, 1963.)

The Soviet press has only to mention that some personality in a capitalist country has displayed a reasonable approach, even on a trifling point, for the Chinese press to raise an incredible clamor.

We had particularly strong charges levelled against us for negotiating with Kennedy, whom the Chinese politicians saw as merely the personification of U.S. imperialism and reaction, maintaining that any sober approach on the part of his administration or any act from positions of reason and common-sense in matters of war and peace, was completely out of the question. Therefore, in the eyes of the "orthodox" Marxists of the present Chinese slant, our search for avenues to establish relations of mutual confidence with the U.S. in these matters, is betrayal of the cause of the revolution. However, in the CPC Central Committees' report of 1956, the Chinese leaders themselves singled out American personalities who had begun to realize that a new world war would not be of any advantage at all to U.S. interests. That report said: "Even among U.S. ruling circles we find more or less sober-minded people who are beginning to realize that a policy of war would scarcely be advantageous for America."

One must not forget how carefully differentiated an approach Lenin took to such matters or the great importance that he attached to the evaluation of individual bourgeois politicians and the trends they stood for. In his "Left-Wing" Communism, an Infantile Disorder, for example, we read:

"The divergences between the Churchills and the Lloyd Georges—with insignificant national differences these political types exist in all countries—on the one hand, and between the Hendersons and the Lloyd-Georges on the other, are quite minor and unimportant from the standpoint of pure, i.e, abstract communism, i.e., communism that has not yet matured to the stage of practical, mass political action. But from the standpoint of this practical mass action, these differences are very, very important." (Selected Works, FLPH, Engl. ed., Moscow 1947, Vol. 2, p. 628.)

The policy documents of the Moscow Meetings of the Communist parties confirmed the definition, given by the 20th Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, of the main content and main contradiction of our epoch. In its resolution of May 23, 1958, the Second Session of the Eighth All-China Congress of the Communist Party deemed it necessary to especially single out and stress the thesis of the Declaration that at the present time "world development is determined by the course and results of the competition between two diametrically opposed social systems".

The Statement of the 1960 Meeting of Representatives of the Communist parties clearly said: "The central factors of our day are the international working class and its chief creation, the world socialist system".

On this point again, the Chinese leadership, grossly contravening the joint decisions and the directives of the Congress of the Communist Party of China, have lent themselves now to the unsavoury business of trying to counterpose the national-liberation movement to the world socialist system and the international working-class movement.

The so-called "Fourth Article" published in the newspaper Jenminjihpao, and the magazine Hungchi (October 22, 1963), is devoted to this. It "proves" that the main contradiction of the present epoch is the one between imperialism and the national-liberation movement, whereas socialism is only a "base", an auxiliary force for this movement. For instance, it is claimed that "the national-liberation revolution in Asia, Africa and Latin America is presently operating as the most important force, that is directly delivering a blow at imperialism. Asia, Africa and Latin America are those areas where the contradictions present in the world are concentrated".

The effort to drive a wedge between socialism and the international working-class movement, on the one hand, and the national-liberation movement, on the other, is futile and doomed to failure. It is, perhaps, precisely on this point, that the Chinese splitters best show their true colours and expose themselves. Unity of the great movements of our time is the earnest of peace and social progress.

In the same fundamental way, in contravention of the Eighth Congress directives, has the CPC leadership changed its attitude to economic co-operation between the socialist countries, notably and, especially, in the appraisal of our assistance to People's China.

Making the report of the Central Committee to the Congress, Liu Shao-chi said:

"The Soviet Union lent tremendous assistance to the cause of socialist construction in our country; the People's Democracies of Europe and Asia also rendered great assistance in this respect. The Chinese people will never forget this comradely help of the fraternal countries. This help, as in the past, is help that we need now, and shall need in the future. China's unity and friendship with the great Soviet Union and the other socialist countries, which is based on common aims and mutual assistance, are everlasting and unbreakable. The further strengthening of this unity and friendship is our supreme internationalist duty and the basis of our country's foreign policy".

The Congress resolution underlined that the setting up in China of a new "industrial system is of tremendous importance not only for facilitating the all-round development of the national economy of our country, but also for strengthening the co-operation between the countries of the socialist camp, for promoting a general advance in the economy of all the socialist states".

But this Congress resolution, too, is evidently not obligatory for the Chinese leadership, which has begun to counterpose "reliance on one's own forces" to co-operation with the socialist countries.

Addressing a rally in Phyongyang on September 18, 1963, Liu Shao-chi said the exact opposite of what he had stated previously:

"There are some people today who oppose the promotion by the fraternal countries of a policy of relying mainly on one's own forces in construction. They say that since there exists a socialist camp uniting a number of socialist countries, it is necessary to draw on these splendid conditions and, in conformity with the principle of proletarian internationalism, implement in construction the policy of international divison of labor and co-operaton in production instead of stressing the principle of relying on one's own forces".

With incredible malice he went on to make deliberately false statements about those who advocate mutual assistance, co-ordination and co-operation. In his opinion, they "are using this pretty screen merely to follow the example of the capitalist countries, which in their mutual relations do detriment to others to grind their own axe, prevent the economically underdeveloped countries from developing their own independent economies, make these countries dependent on them economically, and put them under their control politically. In their view, the other fraternal countries have only the obligation to sacrifice themselves for their disposal and, meanwhile, have no right to develop an independent national economy".

Has there ever been any question, let alone dispute, about the need for each country to rely primarily on its own forces in the building of socialism? Certainly not. Why, then, have the Chinese leaders invented it and presented it as a point of difference? Because they have embarked on a nationalistic road, because the policy of nationalism now prevails in their country, and the raising of this point accords with the aims of this fallacious policy.

To deny the need for co-ordination between the socialist countries, for a division of labor between them, as the Chinese leaders are doing, in violation of the directives of their own Party Congresses, would mean to doom each socialist country to isolation, to leaving it to overcome alone the difficulties encountered in building up socialism, to insufficient use of the advantages of socialist production, and also of the advantages of large-scale production generally.

One feels the Chinese leaders are themselves aware of the folly and unreasonableness of all this. That is why their comments on this question are so confused and contradictory. They have been led to and placed in this position by the logic of factional struggle against the general line of the world Communist movement, by their vain attempts to find differences even where they do not exist to deepen and inflate these differences, and split the Communist movement.

They are, in effect, opposing close co-operation between the socialist countries because the Soviet Union accounts for the greater proportion of this co-operation, and in their anti-Soviet aberration they are sliding down to negation of the absolutely correct and irrefutable propositions adopted by the Congresses of their own party and by all the other Communist and Workers' parties.

The root of the trouble lies not in the differences on questions of co-operation within the socialist camp, but in the hostile attitude taken to the Soviet Union. That is the crux of he mattter.

No wonder that when there was none of this hostility and bitterness, the Chinese leadership's view on matters of co-operation was diametrically opposite to its present one. Here, for instance, is an extract from Chou En-lai's report on the Second Five-Year Plan to the Eighth CPC Congress, which he made on September 16, 1956. It speaks for itself, and, therefore, needs no comment.

"The other view—the effort to build alone, in isolation from the outside world—is also erroneous. Needless to say, the assistance of the Soviet Union and the People's Democracies will, as before, be necessary for a long period of time to build up an integrated industrial system in our country; simultaneously with this, it is also necessary to develop and expand economic, technical and cultural exchanges with other countries. In addition, even in the future, when our country will be a socialist and industrial power, it will be difficult to imagine ourselves being able to isolate ourselves and dispense with assistance . . . Hence the isolationist attitude to the building of socialism is also incorrect".

REVISION OF CPC INTERNAL POLICY

Over the past few years the so-called line of the "three red banners" has been proclaimed the expression of China's internal economic policy. The "banners" policy is made up of the general line plus the big leap and the people's Communes. The fact that the leap (the industrial policy) and the communes (the agricultural policy) are not included in but seem to supplement the "general line" is somewhat strange in itself.

No wonder that no fraternal party, even ruling Communist parties of Asia, adopted the "three red banners" policy, that dubious "contribution" of Chinese theoreticians.

You will look in vain through the decisions of Chinese Party Congresses for anything about the "banners" policy. On the contrary, these decisions formulate the Party's general line quite differently, and, it should be noted, more precisely, issuing a serious warning against reckless "leaps" and skipping of necessary stages of co-operative farming.

Thus, the report of the CPC Central Committee to the Eighth Congress in 1956 pointed out that the rate of advance "should be stable and reliable, in order not to digress from correct proportions in developing the economy, in order not to place too heavy a burden on the people or to upset the economic patterns, in order not to frustrate the fulfilment of the plan, in order to avoid wastefulness, which would lead to adventuristic blunders". This, certainly, hits the mark! It seems as if they themselves foresaw that adventurist blunders would lead precisely to such consequences. Unfortunately, that was what happened.

Another report to the same Congress, entitled "Proposals on the Second Five-Year Plan for Economic Development" gave the following warning against a Leftist deviation in development rates: "Some branches of the national economy and some areas sought to achieve successes faster: they attempted to accomplish in three to five years, or even in one or two years, what could be done in only seven-twelve years. The Central Committee of the Party promptly exposed and liquidated this deviation".

In its decision the Congress called on the Party "to combat the tendency to push blindly ahead without paying attention to the hard facts, the actual opportunities and the planned, proportionate development of the national economy".

On the theoretical plane we have witnessed these Congress directives being revised ever since Liu Shao-chi's report to the Second Session of the Congress in 1958, in which the "leap" was mentioned and the so-called theory of "saddle-type development" advanced. "Saddle-type development", the report explained, "implies peaks at either end and a drop in the middle." Movement of the economy after the pattern "high tide—ebb—a still higher tide, that is, a leap—conservatism—a still bigger leap—which should surely be clear to all", was elevated to the rank of a law of socialist development.

What really "is clear to all" is that a "theory" of this kind does not bear even a remote resemblance to Marxism, which considers planned and proportionate development the law of socialist economy. Cyclical development with ups and downs is a feature of the capitalist economy with its inherent anarchy of production. Lenin wrote in Iskra: "Capitalist production cannot develop otherwise than by leaps, taking two steps forward and one step (sometimes even two) back" (Collected Works, 4th Russ. ed. Vol, 5, p. 74).

Evident in the same report were the dangersous tendencies of recognizing the inevitability of disparities in the economy and a snobbish-Leftist attitude to technology and specialists. It demanded that the entire population take a hand in building up industry, so as to "refute the mystic assumption that this is the monopoly of the few", so as to "necessarily campaign firmly and steadfastly against the undue bias towards the latest technology", and "against the over-emphasis on specialists". This all resulted in neglect of proportionate development, scrapping of technological processes and disdain for the quality of output.

Inasmuch as the Soviet specialists naturally could not but think in terms of balanced economic endeavor, technical progress, respect for technical standards and sound technological processes, they proved to be in the way of the organization of the "big leap", and the Chinese leaders took steps which could not but result in their recall from China.

However, as far as concrete plans for industrialization and the rates of advance were concerned, the second, 1958 Congress Session still took a realistic view of things, basically in line with the correct decisions which the Eighth Congress of the CPC had adopted at its First Session in 1956. The goals of the Second Five-Year Plan were not modified and, consequently, the 1956 decisions of the Congress still stood. The Leftist adventuristic changes in the rates of advance and the "three red banners" line were introduced after the Congress and over its head.

Whereas at the Second Congress Session in May 1958, mention had been made, for instance, of working to overtake Britain in the production of main industrial items in "15 years or sooner", later in the same year it was already stated that Britain could be overtaken in steel and pig iron output in a year or two. This became the keynote all along the line. In the collection of articles Long Live Leninism! published in 1960 an attempt was made "theoretically" to justify disdain for technology: "Marxists-Leninists have always said that in world history the destiny of mankind depends not on technology but on the human being, on the masses".

Why did the Chinese leadership find it necessary to counterpose technology to the human being? Merely somehow to vindicate in the eyes of the Chinese people the setting of unreal, fantastic, unfeasible tasks, to justify its adventuristic policy.

In the First Five-Year Plan period (ending in 1957) China's industrial output was nearly doubled. That was a great achievement. The Five-Year Plan was fulfilled ahead of time, in four years. We rejoiced together with the Chinese people at those successes. The Second Five-Year Plan called for doubling the industrial output. However, success bred conceit and gave rise to a desire to increase the rates of advance twofold, threefold and even more, completely unrealistic though this was. As a result, the goals of the new variant of the Second Five-Year Plan drawn up by the PRC State Planning Committee in July 1958, or in other words, shortly after the Second Session of the Eighth Congress, were arbitrarily boosted from a twofold increase in industry to a 6.5-fold increase over the five years, which meant an average annual rate of increase of 45 per cent. In agriculture a 2.5-fold increase was projected, implying an average yearly rate of advance of 20 per cent. This was the so-called 'big' or 'general' leap.

Five years went by but the Chinese leadership did not even think it necessary to render an account to the Party and the people on how the Five-Year Plan was being carried out. It lacked the courage to confess the shameful fiasco of the fantastic "leap" which so strongly smacked of the Trotskyite schemes for "super-industrialization" that our Party rejected long ago. The danger of these ultra-revolutionary Leftist schemes lay in the inevitable subversion of the alliance of the workers and peasants, since pushing things too far in industrialization inevitably means placing a heavy burden on the peasants. Naturally, this danger soon manifested itself also in China, during the period of the "leap". It was expressed in the establishment of the communes and in attempts to skip necessary stages of co-operative farming in the countryside, in Mao Tse-tung's formula "to work persistently for three years and reface, in the main, most parts of the country".

Lenin said: "If there was a Communist who dreamed of being able in three years to change the economic foundations, the economic roots of small-scale farming, he was, of course, nothing but an idle dreamer." (Works, 4th Russ. Ed. Vol. 32, p. 193). The difference between utopianism and Marxism is self-evident!

In its 1956 decisions the Eighth Congress of the CPC issued a serious warning against overdoing things in the collectivization of farming. It pointed out:

"In the process of developing the agricultural producers' co-operatives care must be taken to prevent heedless amalgamation of small co-operatives into large ones, so as to avoid difficulties in the work of economic management and production organization together with the adverse effects they have on farming."

But again the decisions of the Congress proved to be not obligatory for the CPC leadership. The "drive against the so-called overdoing of things" was castigated in 1958, and in late August the CPC Central Committee adopted a decision "On the Institution of the People's Communes", which read in part: "The transformation of collective property into the property of the whole people is a whole process. In some areas this transformation may be effected rather quickly, that is, in three or four years; in other parts this transformation may take place at a relatively slower pace, meaning that five or six years or a still greater period will be required."

The Plenum of the CPC Central Committee where this decision was taken put forward the ultra-Leftist slogan: "We must not mark time at the stage of socialism!" But how was it proposed to "skip" socialism? The Plenum decision supplied the following answer: "Apparently the realization of communism in our country is no longer something remote. We must make vigorous use of the form of the People's Commune and evolve through it a concrete way of effecting the transition to communism."

Yet the Chinese leaders now question the possibility of transition to communism in the Soviet Union, a country that has built socialism! Does this not echo, even if the form has been modernized, the Trotskyite contention that it was impossible to build socialism in our country!

Though lacking the material and technological foundation and other prerequisites for effecting the transition to communism, the Chinese leaders declared that owing to the Chinese peasants' high level of consciousness they would nevertheless be able to go over to communes sooner than the Soviet Union, which they regarded as having got bogged down at the co-operative stage. Moreover, the idea was to organize mammoth amalgamations of some 15,000 or 20,000 households each. But there were no experienced people to do the job, not to speak of the impossibility of giving proper guidance to operations on such a scale. Finally, not only were the communes put in charge of farming, schools and the local industries; they were also militarized, with people turning out for work as they might in army units.

One cannot but see a manifestation of petty-bourgeois ideology in the desire to forge on to communism through the village, through a hasty transformation of forms of ownership in agriculture. This meant ignoring the Marxist-Leninist teaching on the transition period, on the preparation of the necessary material and technological base, and the other essential conditions for the building of socialism and communism. What is this if not an attempt to substitute undisguised petty-bourgeois utopianism for scientific proletarian socialism!

The communes were set up under the slogan of "eliminating the remnants of private property". Garden plots, household livestock, poultry, orchards, trees, and farm implements, and, in many places, also homes and personal belongings (such as sewing machines, bicycles, furniture, pots, and other household utensils) were made the commonly-owned property of mammoth communes. Remuneration of labor in the countryside on the basis of the workday unit and material incentive was replaced by a minimum wage and free meals, according to the "number of mouths to feed", i.e., by a wage-levelling system. Scientific farming was proclaimed conservative and an obstacle to giant strides in agriculture. The decision adopted at that same Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee in August 1958, said:

"The overcoming of Right-wing deviationist and conservative views and the scrapping of customary rules for the application of agrotechnical measures have produced a situation in which agricultural production is being increased twofold, several-fold, more than 10-fold, dozens of times over."

Fantastic projects were put forward to reduce the sown areas and there was talk about China having nowhere to store surplus rice over the next few years. However, several months later district after district in China found itself on the brink of famine. Food rationing was introduced. It had to be announced that harvest figures had been overstated, that actually they were only about half as much. The resulting hardships coincided with crippling natural calamities.

Hard times set in for the next few years, which were proclaimed years of "regulation" in industry and agriculture. The communes were reorganized. The old co-operatives were actually restored in the guise of big teams. The principle of material incentive was also restored to a substantial extent. But the courage frankly to confess that the Chinese leaders had suffered a serious setback in their communes policy was lacking. The slogan of the communes, therefore, remained, though in substance things changed most radically.

However, the situation could not be remedied because of a new swing in economic policy, now from a Leftist to a Rightist deviation. Agriculture was proclaimed the foundation of the economy, and at its Tenth Plenary Meeting in September 1962, the CPC Central Committee advanced the slogan, "Put agricultural development first". Needless to say, this is no "new important law of development of socialist economy" allegedly discovered in China, as the Chinese press claims. It runs counter to Marxism-Leninism and to the decisions of the Eighth CPC Congress of 1956, which state:

"In order to transform our country from a backward agrarian one into a leading socialist industrial power, we should, in the course of three Five-Year Plan periods or of a slightly longer time, create in the main an integrated industrial system, so that industrial production should dominate in social production, . . . so that the technical reconstruction of the national economy should be provided with the necessary material base."

It is hard to say anything definite at this moment about the state of China's economy. No economic statistics, not even the briefest of information on economic progress, have been published over the past few years. All that is known is that 1963, as far as economic indices are concerned, was better than 1962, while 1962 was better than the preceding year. For peacetime development, this kind of statistics cannot be considered normal. Prior to 1958 the situation was entirely different.

These are all "peculiar features" of the development of Party life in the Communist Party of China in the conditions of a flourishing personality cult. Neither the decisions of Congresses nor the decisions of the Central Committee have any independent and decisive significance; they amount merely to comment on the instructions of the leader. The nwespaper Chung Kuo Ching Niev Pao frankly declared on March 10, 1964:

"The instructions and documents of the Central Committee of our Party and the supreme organs are the crystallization of the ideas of Mao Tse-tung in present-day practical struggle and work."

A PARTY WITHOUT A PROGRAM

The emergence of the neo-Trotskyite deviation represented by the leadership of the CPC, a deviation characterized by petty-bourgeois anarchism and nationalism, Leftist revision of the resolutions of its own congresses and the decisions of the Moscow Meetings of the Communist parties, and deification of an individual is not a matter of chance.

No small role in this was played by the conceit which seized the CPC leadership following the major successes in socialist construction that preceded the "three banners" period. V. I. Lenin foresaw the danger of success making ruling parties conceited. He noted that the setbacks suffered by political parties had often been preceded by situations conducive to self-adulation. Lenin warned against the grave danger of a party "finding itself in a very dangerous position, namely, the position of a man who has grown conceited—a rather silly, ignominious and ridiculous position". (Works, 4th Russ. ed., Vol. 30, p. 493.)

The turn in home and foreign policy, the departure from the standards of party life generally accepted by Marxist-Leninists, can be traced back to the errors, manifestations of dogmatism and partial deviations from Marxism observed in the course of years; all this led to the present set of ideological and political views.

It is no secret that many of the political slogans which are now being put forward on the international scene have been current in China for many years. The atom bomb was declared a paper tiger back in 1946, while the thesis that "the whole world can be remade only with the rifle" is still older.

Up to the liberation of China, the CPC worked among the peasants, which greatly influenced its character as a party. In an article marking the 30th anniversary of the CPC Peng Chen noted:

"The Communist Party of China worked for a long time in enemy-isloated villages, and hence peasant and petty-bourgeois anarchy, subjectivism, sectarianism, bureaucracy, as well as adventurism, defeatism and other trends, at times with extreme ease found expression in the Party." This helps us to understand much of what is going on in the Communist Party of China today.

Prior to liberation, the CPC was made up chiefly of peasants, who comprised about 90 per cent of total Party membership in 1949. The proportion of working-class representation in CPC ranks climbed very slowly even after the founding of the People's Republic of China. On the eve of the Eighth Congress, in late June 1956, CPC membership had the following social composition: workers, 14 per cent; peasants, 69.1 per cent; representatives of the intelligentsia, 11.7 per cent; representatives of other sections of the population, 5.2 per cent.

Party congresses too were held in a peculiar way. For instance, when delegations from the fraternal parties came for the Eighth CPC Congress in 1956, they learned that for a whole fortnight before the official opening group meetings of delegates from the different provinces, of army delegates and of delegates from central offices had been held. This had been in a way a dress rehearsal for the congress, a rehearsal during which the texts of the various reports and resolutions were read, discussions held and speeches made. These meetings had chosen the speeches that were to be delivered at official sessions of the congress. It was even said that preliminary elections to the Central Committee by secret ballot had already been held.

No other Communist Party practised anything of the kind; moreover, such procedures can hardly be considered acceptable in any Party.

Nor did the following strange practice on the part of the CPC Central Committee pass unnoticed. Delegations invited from 50 fraternal parties attended the first session of the Eighth Congress in 1956. They were given the opportunity to state their views at the session and describe the state of affairs in their own parties. All that was good, the normal practice in all parties.

But when the second session of the congress was convened in 1958 no delegations from the fraternal parties were invited. Only two reports were published: by Liu Shao-chi, who delivered the Central Committee's report, and by Tan Chen-lin, who explained the basic points in the plans for agricultural development in 1956-67. The resolutions of the session and communiques on its meetings were also published. However, Teng Hsiao-ping's report on the Moscow Meetings of the Communist and Workers' parties was not published. This suggests that the report contained passages concerning the international Communist movement which the Chinese leaders found advisable to conceal from the members of their own party and the fraternal Communist parties. It may be assumed that the CPC had already begun evolving a special line running counter to the agreed decisions of the Communist parties.

Nor was Mao Tse-tung's speech at that session of the congress published either, though the communique said that he had addressed the session. Was the state of affairs in China such that the speech of the party leader could not be published? Was it not perhaps because the matters discussed were of an extraordinary and secret nature?

As distinct from the 1958 congress session, all reports and speeches of the 1956 session were published. For the benefit of the Soviet reading public the Soviet Party press printed in millions of copies the full texts of all reports and the more important speeches delivered at the congress, as well as slightly abridged versions of the other speeches made there.

But the most serious "peculiarity" of the Communist Party of China, and one due wholly to its leaders, is that, in effect, it has no program.

This is a hard fact. The Communist Party of China has no program, for the Manifesto adopted at its Second Congress in 1922 is not regarded as a Party program even by the CPC itself. Though this Manifesto is of definite historical value, it can in no way serve the party as a guide to action today. No references are therefore made—nor can be made—to a program either in Party decisions or in the Party press.

There is no need to speak in detail in this article of the great importance that Lenin and our Communist Party attached to a Party program.

Lenin linked up the elaboration of a program with the very founding of the Party. In 1919, less than 18 months after the victory of the October Revolution, the Party adopted at its congress a program that oriented the Party and the people on the building of a socialist society, for by this time the previous program, whose aim had been the victory of the proletarian revolution, had been carried out. At its 22nd Congress, proceeding from the fact that socialism had been built in the U.S.S.R., the CPSU adopted a new program setting the historic goal of effecting the transition from socialism to communism.

In direct contrast to this concern for a Party program is the approach that many bourgeois party ideologists take to the subject. Thus, in his book Constitutional Government and Democracy, the American lawyer Friedrich says that "the Party is strong in its apparatus and, consequently, the apparatus is primary and the program secondary".

Can it really be that the Chinese leadership also regards a program as being "secondary"? Can it really be that in the 15th year of their victorious revolution the Chinese comrades cannot work out a Party program? The PRC press often declares that the Chinese cannot go by the decisions of other parties—though nobody has ever urged the Chinese Communist Party to do that. But we may well ask: Where is your own program? Is such a Party good and "correct" —as you yourselves are fond of saying? And by what is one to verify the correctness of its home and foreign policy?

Incidentally, as regards the attitude to the Party program, too, a certain parallel may be drawn between the personality cult in the U.S.S.R. in Stalin's lifetime and the personality cult that is now current in China. Back in 1939, our Party decided at its 18th Congress that it was necessary to draw up a new program, as the old one had been carried out. It elected a commission to draft such a program. However, like the commission elected subsequently at the 19th Party Congress, this commission did not meet once. Only after the 20th Congress did it become possible to draft and adopt the new CPSU Program.

Can it really be that China's Communists are not asking why, in contrast to the Communist parties in other countries, their Communist Party, 18,000,000 strong, has no program of its own? Is it not an axiom of Marxism-Leninism that to steer a correct course, never losing sight of the goals and prospects and never veering from one side to the other, a Party must have a comprehensive militant long-range program for each stage of history? But the Chinese Communist Party has no program.

Does this not lead to the conclusion that the lack of a program provides a favorable setting for the personality cult — for where there is no program there are no restraints on the cult and even the fundamental, program positions of a party can be changed without particular difficulty, without giving the matter a second thought, just as the leader wants them changed.

The absence of a program, failure to convene Party congresses regularly, the "obsolescence" of congress decisions and the consequent impression that they are no longer obligatory, all have little in common with Marxism-Leninism. On the contrary, these things are characteristic of a Party leadership which has made the personality cult all-supreme and taken the road of revisionism. For it is precisely in these conditions that directives formulated under the impact of one or another impression can be substituted for a program, for the collective will of a party and for the principles common to the entire Communist movement.

ON THE SITUATION IN THE WORLD COMMUNIST MOVEMENT.

STATEMENT OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF PORTUGAL

1. Reaffirming its position set out in the resolution "On the Situation in the International Communist Movement," adopted by the CC in August 1963, the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Portugal notes that the situation has continued to deteriorate since then, owing to the intensified anti-Leninist activities of the Chinese Communist Party.

2. The CC, CPP highly appreciates the spirit of unity implicit in the unilateral discontinuation by the Communist Party of the Soviet Union of public polemics and in the termination by it, from November 1963 till April 1964, of any public criticism of the CPC, giving the latter a chance to adopt the same stand. Instead of appreciating this move and following suit, the CPC took advantage of it to launch a campaign of slanderous attacks on the CPSU and other fraternal parties and to step up splitting work in many fraternal parties and in the international Communist movement as a whole.

3. In its resolution of August 1963, the CC, CPP supported the earliest convocation of a conference of Communist and Workers' parties, which would at once have the limited purpose of establishing a general agreement to stop the public polemics and prohibit interference by one Communist Party in the internal affairs of other fraternal parties. The facts have proved the correctness of this position. As time goes by, it is growing increasingly difficult to convene a conference and less possible to avoid a split. The CC, CPP considers that a conference of Communist and Workers' parties must be called without delay.

4. There are no ideological disagreements that could justify efforts to torpedo the unity of such a mighty bulwark of the international working class as the socialist camp, and to split the unity of the Communist movement on a world scale and in every country. The attitude towards the unity of the world Communist movement and the unity of the socialist camp is the touchstone for Marxist-Leninists today. Those defending it serve the interests of the working-class movement and the Communist cause. Those trying to undermine it are doing the greatest service to imperialism. The CPP, for its part, will make every effort to uphold the unity of the world Communist movement so long as there is the slightest possibility of avoiding a split.

5. The CC, CPP considers that the struggle in defense of unity under the banner of Marxism-Leninism is waged by every Communist Party in two directions: participation in the international discussion and defense of the general line of the Communist movement within the Party itself, on the one hand, and struggle within the Party for the unity of thought and action on the basis of the political line adopted by the Party concerned and the principles of democratic centralism, ruling out conciliation with any factionalist and splitting activities, on the other. Acting in conformity with this line, the CPP is fulfilling its internationalist duty and its duty to the working class and all working people of Portugal.

April 1964

TO THE WORKING PEOPLE, INTELLIGENTSIA AND STUDENTS—TO THE PEOPLE OF SPAIN

APPEAL OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF SPAIN

The strike of the heroic miners and metalworkers of the Asturias is growing hourly. Tens of thousands have already stopped work, demanding trade union freedom, the right to strike, a minimum wage of 150 pesetas, and satisfaction of other perfectly legitimate demands.

The expansion of the strike started on May Day, when the working people of Biscay, Guipuzcoa and other localities went out into the streets fearlessly with the same demands as those of the Asturian workers. It is taking place at a time when the agricultural workers of Cadiz and part of Seville are waging a strenuous and audacious struggle, while the echo still resounds of the Madrid demonstration against the fascist trade unions, the strike of Riotinto and Puertollano miners, the strike at Altos Hornos in Sagunto and at other enterprises of Levante.

The strike is broadening in conditions when the working people of all Spain — Communists, Socialists, Catholics, Nationalists and anarchists — are making important steps towards unity; when the demand for the right to strike, for genuine democratic workers' trade unions without employers and henchmen of the political regime is spreading throughout the country; when the fight for new labor agreements has gripped the whole of the shipbuilding industry, and when the RENFE (national railways) and public transport workers are demanding a substantial improvement of their living conditions.

At the same time, the severe, unbearable policy of the government, prompted exclusively by the interests of the monopolistic and feudal oligarchy, the oligarchy of bankers and big landowners, is rousing discontent verging on indignation, in the rural localities, among small and middle industrialists and tradesmen, among the working people.

The entire country feels the pressing need for political changes, which enable the various toiling classes and sections of the population to act freely in defense of their legitimate interests. The entire country feels the need for ending the archaic fascist political structure symbolized by the present dictatorship which bars the way to modern development in our country.

In these circumstances, there can and must be solidarity with the heroic miners and metalworkers of the Asturias. The Communist Party calls on the working people of Spain to rally and carry out short stoppages, strikes and demonstrations for the right to strike, for trade union freedom, a minimum wage of 150 pesetas, and presenting concrete economic demands for the given area.

There is no time to waste! The Asturian working people must be given to feel that they have not only the moral but also the militant support of the working people of the entire country.

At every enterprise, in every community, in every branch of industry, workers' committees must be set up without delay in order to provide leadership and direct the actions. Where no organizations exist, they must be established in the nearest future. This task must be tackled everywhere by the most class-conscious workers, especially the Communists.

The entire nation must give utmost support to the working people wherever a struggle breaks out.

We call on the tradesmen to sell on credit to the strikers and on the small and middle industrialists to support the demonstrations and strikes of their workers.

We call on the intelligentsia and the students to support the workers forthwith with all the means at their disposal!

We appeal to the armed forces and the police: the workers, students and the intelligentsia, the people, are not fighting against you. You are not well off, either. You, too, suffer from the present state of affairs. Do not let the government set you against the people! Disobey punitive orders! The dictatorship will ultimately disappear, but you, like the people, will remain, and it is not in your interests to assume the responsibility for any arbitrary actions in behalf of what are not your interests.

We also appeal to all the political and social anti-Franco forces: the dictatorship lies when it says that this movement is a Communist manoeuvre. It is a movement of all working people, all democrats. No party can take sole credit for it. The time has come to build contacts, to reach agreement and establish organized and regular relations in order to wage the big struggle mounting in Spain hand in hand, and direct it to a democratic settlement of the national problems.

Nobody should evade doing his duty due to prejudice, narrow-mindedness or fear of exposing oneself to danger. It is everybody's duty to unite and co-ordinate the democratic and anti-fascist actions of the masses before it is too late.

Every group, every politician should fulfil their duty with resolution for the sake of the present and future of the country.

Workers, peasants, students, intellectuals and women! To rally and fight together with the Asturians today means to use a favorable situation for the defense of your own rights and aspirations! If we give effective support to the Asturians, the dictatorship will be unable to suppress the rising powerful movement. We shall make a big step towards freedom.

All for one! Form fighting committees everywhere! Formulate and present your demands, including the demand for the right to strike and for trade union freedoms! Having united, hold work stoppages, strikes and mass demonstrations! Follow the example of the Asturias, Bilbao, San Sebastian, Madrid, Puertollano, Cadiz and Riotinto!

Long live the strike! Long live the demonstration! Long live unity! Long live democracy!

AKEL CONDEMNS STAND OF CPC LEADERSHIP

STATEMENT* OF THE POLITBUREAU OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE AKEL (PROGRESSIVE PARTY OF CYPRUS WORKING PEOPLE)

Having discussed the CPC leaders' renewed attacks on the CPSU and the other Marxist-Leninist parties, the Politbureau of the CC, AKEL has adopted the following resolution:

1. In conformity with the September 20, 1963 decision of the enlarged plenary meeting of the AKEL Central Committee and Central Control Commission, the Politbureau resolutely condemns the anti-Marxist and anti-Leninist splitting activities of the CPC leaders with respect to all the cardinal issues of today. Their erroneous, sectarian and dogmatic petty-bourgeois and nationalistic stand on the question of war and peace, the role of the socialist world system, the national liberation struggle of the peoples, and the forms of transition to socialism, is greatly harming the unity of the world Communist movement and creating difficulties for some fraternal parties. With their outrageous and slanderous attacks on the CPSU and other Marxist-Leninist parties the CPC leaders are emulating the bitterest enemies of the socialist camp; they are doing serious harm to the anti-imperialist struggle of the peoples, and, whether consciously or not, grinding the axe of the imperialists, the enemies of the working class and all peace-loving mankind.

2. Replying to the slanderous allegations of the CPC leaders that the Soviet Union does not help the peoples in their struggle for freedom, the Politbureau declares that the latest events in Cyprus fully refute these wild contentions. The Soviet Union's courageous and unconditional solidarity with, and support of the heroic people of that small island have proved the decisive factor in their effective resistance to the sinister aggressive plans of the imperialists and their agents in Ankara.

3. Denouncing the Chinese leaders' calumniatory anti-Party attacks, incompatible with the spirit of Marxism-Leninism and the principles governing relations between Marxist-Leninist parties, the Politbureau expresses its profound conviction that the world Communist movement is strong enough to overcome the present difficulties caused by the disruptive activities of the CPC leaders. It will emerge even more steeled and solid on the basis of the principles of proletarian internationalism.

4. AKEL vigorously supports all efforts aimed at achieving the great international goal of consolidating the unity of the world revolutionary movement. Therefore, our Party fully subscribes to the proposal of the CC, CPSU to convene a conference of Communist and Workers' parties of all countries in order to eliminate the difficulties and intensify the anti-imperialist struggle of the peoples.

THE THREE ARCH-ABSURDITIES OF THE CHINESE LEADERS

By Khaled Bagdash

WHITHER THE CHINESE LEADERS?

Regret and pain are the words that best describe what we felt until lately about the strange attitude of the Chinese leaders. Then came their "seventh reply" to the CC, CPSU letter, and an "eighth reply" (Jenminjihpao, March 31 and April 4, 1964—Ed.), and all their invective at the Council of Afro-Asian Solidarity in Algiers and the Organization of Democratic Lawyers session in Budapest. After that no patriot or revolutionary in the Arab world, whether Communist, Socialist or progressive, could help feeling a sense of revolt and anger for these men sunk in the quagmire of nationalism, blinded by chauvinism and impelled by a phrenetic hatred of the CPSU and all the other Marxist-Leninist parties.

It is hard to believe that men who call themselves Communists could go to such lengths. What are they after? That is the question people all over the world ask themselves today.

The lessons of history show that a schism in the working-class movement is bound to develop dialectically. Especially if it assumes a "leftist" pose. Take Trotskyism. It began with "left-wing" attacks on Lenin and ended up as an adventurist trend, of which lack of principles and scruples is the chief trait. Trotskyites do not shrink from volunteering their services to imperialist intelligence agencies just so as to injure the Soviet Union and the socialist cause, and to split the Communist movement in various countries.

Every Marxist knows that their blind hatred makes the Trotskyites rave and rant whenever the Soviet people score a new economic victory or accomplish something in any other province. All of us know, moreover, that during the Second World War they wished defeat on the U.S.S.R., and acted accordingly.

That is the logic in the development of any group of dissenters. At first they wish defeat on the movement from which they split away. This wish is followed by direct actions to cause the longed for defeat, and lastly, their actions prompt them to make alliances and co-operate indiscriminately with the deadliest enemies of the movement they oppose, no matter what the consequences.

It strikes the eye that the Chinese leaders avoid any mention of the substance of Trotskyism. In their "seventh reply" they declare that Trotsky took issue with Lenin, but do not say which of Lenin's views and positions he opposed. In their "eighth reply", too, the Al-Ahbar, April 12, 1964. Abridged. The sub-headings are ours.

Chinese leaders evade this question. All they say is that "Trotskyism has different forms, and operates in most cases under the guise of the extreme Left wing". They only add a few general quotations of Stalin, to the effect that Trotskyism is a variety of Menshevism, Kautskyism and Social-Democracy. The Chinese leaders do not quote what Lenin said about Trotsky and make no mention of how, why and which of Lenin's positions were attacked by the Trotskyites, because if they were to disclose the purport of Trotskyism, they would thereby also disclose the purport of their own line.

It will be recalled that Trotsky took cover behind shrill "revolutionary" phrases to accuse Lenin of opportunism, retreating before imperialism, abandoning "true, revolutionary" Marxism and "world proletarian revolution", and concentrating on the consolidation of Socialism in the one country where it had won while neglecting to work for the spread of revolution to other countries, all of which goes against Trotsky's own ill-conceived theory of "permanent revolution".

What the Peking leaders say today against Lenin's successors, with N. S. Khrushchov at their head, is cast in the same mould, both in form and content, as the absurd accusations the Trotskyites made against Lenin.

That is something the Peking leaders try to keep from the public. But it only shows that they do not know the people, or that they treat them with contempt, because these facts are known to every Marxist with an elementary knowledge of the history of the world revolutionary movement.

The evolution of the Chinese leaders' attitude brings back to mind the evolution and inglorious end of Trotsky's dissension.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE POLEMICS

Earlier on, the differences between the Peking leaders and the world Communist movement were of an ideological complexion and concerned key political problems of principle.

In view of the complicated international situation and the different conditions from country to country, it was considered natural that divergent opinions should arise. It was also natural to expect that these differences would be settled by consultation and discussion. That is why conferences of Communist and Workers' parties were convened in 1957 and 1960. The conferences adopted a declaration and a statement, respectively, signed by all the parties, including the CPC. The two documents set out an agreed general line, which the parties undertook to follow in letter and spirit.

Even when the Chinese resumed the discussion of some of the problems many comrades thought it natural that differences should arise over the interpretation of the agreed text. It seemed to them that these differences were purely ideological and that they could be put out of the way, since all the Communists were of one mind regarding the definition of the present epoch as an epoch of transition from capitalism to socialism, and since such great goals as lasting peace and anti-imperialist struggle for national liberation and the victory of socialism united the Communists of all the world, and cemented their ranks.

This is why the Communist parties regarded the polemics started by the Chinese leaders with an open heart and infinite patience. They conducted the comradely discussion with calm restraint, and never let it out of their minds that they had to safeguard and strengthen the unity of the socialist camp and the world Communist movement.

The Communists of Syria, too, made their modest contribution to these efforts. We refuted the views of the Chinese leaders and responded to their slanders in a restrained, thoughtful and comradely way. Our Central Committee resolution, made public at the end of July 1963 after it was unanimously approved by all the branches of the Party, said:

"It is the supreme duty of every Communist to safeguard the unity and cohesion of the socialist camp with its main force and vanguard, the Soviet Union, and to safeguard the unity and cohesion of the world Communist movement with its true and tested vanguard, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, the Party of the great Lenin. Every Communist worthy of the name must cherish this unity as the apple of his eye. No matter what differences may arise between Communists, they are immeasurably less important than the great cause which unites them. They have one enemy—imperialism—and one goal—peace and national liberation, and democracy and socialism throughout the world."

Many Marxist-Leninists all over the world hoped against hope that the Chinese leaders would realize their folly and come to their senses.

To create a tranquil atmosphere conducive to fraternal exchanges of opinion between members of the Communist family, Comrade Khrushchov suggested stopping the open polemics and opening negotiations between parties. The vast majority of Communist parties supported his proposal. Some prominent comrades offered to mediate in the matter. But all these efforts went to waste. With undue conceit, the Chinese leaders mistook these efforts for a sign of weakness and "fear" of their "incontestable arguments". They mistook them for a sign of "confusion" in face of their articles, which, due to narrow vision and isolation from the masses even in their own country, they believed to be masterpieces and revelations one only needed to read to prostrate oneself before the "genius" of Comrade Mao Tse-tung as pious Chinese do before the likeness of Buddha.

The Chinese leaders persisted in their folly. In the end, they exposed themselves completely, proving by their seventh and eighth replies that they had been insincere when signing the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement. They showed their disagreement with what they had signed, and revealed thereby that they had affixed their signature to the documents merely to preserve their ties with the Communist parties and to exploit these ties to continue their disruptive activities in the world Communist movement.

We do not intend in this article to disprove their erroneous views on the key problems, on which there was complete agreement when they signed the documents that they later repudiated. We mean the problems of peace and peaceful coexistence, disarmament and the possibility for mankind to avoid the horrors of a destructive thermonuclear war, peaceful and non-peaceful transition to socialism, alliance between the socialist countries and the national-liberation movements, and, particularly, the immense, continuously growing influence which the socialist world exerts on international developments and on the situation in every country. This has created "real opportunities of resolving the cardinal problems of modern times in a new way, in the interests of peace, democracy and socialism", and other problems as well.

Like our brothers, all Arab Communists, we Communists of Syria expressed our opinion on these problems in numerous resolutions, articles and studies. Our opinion coincides in every respect with the opinion of our comrades of the CPSU and all the Marxist-Leninist parties of the world.

However, when replying to criticisms of their views, the Chinese leaders prefer not to base the discussion on the concrete facts. They raise an outcry and fling accusations right and left. This is because the answer they received from our brothers of the Soviet Union and the leaders of the Communist movement in all countries disclosed the weakness of their position and knocked the bottom out of their slanders and claims.

EVOLUTION OF THE POSITION OF THE CPC LEADERS

In this article, we shall deal with three points that are gaining prominence in the evolution of the Chinese leaders' position, namely:

1. their attempts to persuade the public that the Soviet Union has restored capitalism;

2. their attempts to persuade the public that the Soviet Union has become an imperialist state, that it is not fighting imperialism and is bent on dividing spheres of influence with the U.S. imperialists, and

3. their attempts to persuade Communists that a split within each Communist Party in particular, and the world Communist movement in general, is objectively conditioned and natural.

These three facets of the Chinese leaders' position are closely interlinked. They show that the Chinese leaders have overstepped the bounds of purely ideological struggle. Every Communist and revolutionary sincerely fighting for peace, national liberation and socialism, no matter what trend he follows, must therefore be highly vigilant and weigh all the facts properly in order to see the deep abyss into which the Chinese leaders may fall due to their blindness, their folly and hatred, and to see what dangers their position and behavior hold for the world revolutionary movement and particularly the national-liberation movement.

The present deviation of the CPC leaders is incomparably greater in scale and influence than the Trotskyite deviations of the past. The Trotskyite group consisted of a fairly small number of people whom the Communist movement was quickly able to remove and isolate. The Peking leaders, on the other hand, hold power in a vast country and have a state machine at their disposal at home and abroad, which they can use in the interests or against the interests of peace, and in the interests or against the interests of the liberation movement. They have the resources to bribe venal writers, to bribe the press, and to buy the conscience of people.

THE FIRST LIE

The 1960 Statement of the Meeting of Communist and Workers' parties says that the restoration of capitalism has been made socially and economically impossible not only in the Soviet Union, but in the other socialist countries as well, and that the combined forces of the socialist camp reliably safeguard every socialist country against encroachments by imperialist reaction. The CPC leaders affixed their signature to this Statement in December 1960.

It is a clear and lucid statement, and does not need to be specially explained or elucidated. What it means is that restoration of capitalism in the U.S.S.R. from either within or without, is out of the question.

The Statement also says that "the Soviet Union is successfully carrying on the full-scale construction of a communist society". This means that the Soviet people have completed the building of socialism, whose motto is, "from each according to his ability, to each according to his work", and have embarked on gradual transition to communism, whose motto is, "from each according to his ability, to each according to his needs".

So we ask, have any far-reaching changes occurred in the Soviet economic system in the three-odd years since the Statement was published to give the Chinese leaders grounds to allude (in the seventh reply and other documents) to a "rapid growth of bourgeois elements inside the Soviet Union" and to "capitalist forces spreading widely in the U.S.S.R."?

Has the Soviet Union abolished its collective farms and turned the land over to big landowners and kulaks? Of course not. The Peking leaders know that perfectly well.

Has public ownership of the means of production been abolished, and have the factories become the private property of capitalists, monopolies and stock companies? Of course not. The Peking leaders know that perfectly well, too.

So why infer "restoration of capitalism" in the Soviet Union?

Do they think that the higher living standard of the Soviet population, the fact that they eat and dress better and that their cultural level has risen (all due to steady growth of production at a rate unknown in history before) means restoration of the capitalist system in the U.S.S.R.?

If they do, let them tell us, as Comrade Khrushchov said, what object the workers and peasants pursue in making a socialist revolution? Is it not to achieve a better life in all respects?

Could the Chinese leaders, due to their irrational domestic and foreign policies, have lost faith in ever achieving a higher standard of living for the masses of China? Could they be trying to convince the Chinese masses that any sign of welfare is "bourgeois", and that "true", "revolutionary" communism is poverty, hardship and need?

Marx, Engels and, later, Lenin, demonstrated that socialism is a higher and more progressive social system than capitalism because, inevitably, it elevates production and thereby adds to the wealth of the people, because the purpose of production under socialism is to satisfy the growing requirements of the people and not, as in bourgeois society, to increase capitalist profits.

How and why could the Peking leaders forget, or pretend to forget, this ABC of Marxism? They reproach the CPSU for raising the material and cultural level of the people, although this should gladden every genuine Communist and Socialist (as pointed out in the resolution of our CC of July 1963) because it adds to the attraction of socialist ideas all over the world, and particularly the Asian, African and Latin American countries, whose situation resembles that of some parts of former tsarist Russia. They are eager to achieve progress as quickly as the latter achieved it under socialism.

What is the purpose the Chinese leaders pursue by spreading the monstrous and ridiculous lie that capitalism has been restored in the Soviet Union? This is an important question, and every Communist, every progressive and every revolutionary patriot, should give it deep thought.

THE SECOND LIE

The charge that the Soviet Union has turned imperialist and is colluding with the American imperialists to divide the world is the second lie spread by the Peking leaders.

All patriots in the Asian, African and Latin American countries hail and thank the Soviet Union for the firm support it rendered them by word and deed, morally and materially, in their struggle for liberation from imperialism, for national and economic independence, and progress. Not only the Communists, but also all patriots and even the bourgeois nationalists in those countries, say so openly and clearly.

All of them say that they consider the Soviet Union a bulwark, a helper and a champion in their struggle against imperialism, for political and economic independence.

What is the purpose the Chinese leaders pursue by repeating this second lie over and over to so large an audience? That is also an iimportant question, and every Communist, every genuine progressive, and every revolutionary patriot, should give it deep thought.

THE THIRD LIE

Lately, the Chinese leaders have begun to spread a third lie. They are trying to persuade the Communists that a split of the Communist movement, both on an international scale and in every country, is an objective law of dialectical development.

All they have succeeded in doing by this "new proposition", however, was to disclose how far removed they are from understanding dialectical materialism and how little they know about applying its laws. What is right for a society divided into classes—where the struggle between classes, as Marx, Engels and Lenin proved, is the motive force of history—and what is right for some specific class, such as the capitalist class, which consists of groups with conflicting immediate interests though generally connected by common class purposes and tasks, is applied by the Peking leaders not only to the working class, but also to the Communist movement, which is its vanguard and which represents its vital interests, the same for all, harmonious and free from contradiction: the building of socialist and then of communist society.

With this strong basis, Leninists oppose the existence of more than one communist party in any country and, consequently, the existence of more than one Communist movement in the world.

The Chinese leaders say that "a process of bifurcation of unity proceeds in the international working-class movement, just as it does in all other things" and that "unity—struggle or even a split—a new unity on a new basis—such is the dialectics in the development of the international working-class movement". If we take their words at their face value, we arrive at the startling conclusion that struggle between opposites is an organic and immanent feature of the working-class and Communist movement, and that, consequently, this struggle cannot be overcome. In other words, it follows that a split of the working-class and Communist movement, induced by continuous, endless and eternal struggle between opposites within that movement, is a natural condition (because it is governed by the same laws as any other natural phenomenon), while unity is accidental and exceptional.

The unity achieved after the split which the Chinese leaders are urging today, will, according to their own construction, be temporary and, in turn, subject to split, since that is the eternal objective law of dialectics.

If that is so, there is no objective material basis for the great Marxist slogan, "Workers of all lands, unite!"

If that is so, every worker and every workingman has good reason to ask the Chinese leaders: how can you promise us a united and harmonious society if the working class, under whose leadership we are supposed to work for it, and if its Communist vanguard, too, are doomed to splitting, that being a constant and eternal law?

Is that the way the Chinese leaders want to "strengthen" the faith of the masses in proletarian revolution, in its advantages and its future?

May we ask the Peking leaders whether this "objective", "dialectical" law of "continuous split" also applies to the Communist Party of China, or whether this "dialectics" of theirs does not suit the Chinese conditions? Or could they, perhaps, have closed China's doors to all dialectics?

In the same breath, the Chinese leaders say the following: "by destroying proletarian unity, dissension does a service to the bourgeoisie and accords with its needs".

Could there be a more convincing way of expressing the substance of the split which the Chinese leaders are urging, which they are working for, and which they present as an objective law?

There is yet another passage in the aforesaid article that rings strange coming from the Chinese leaders. "Engels said," they write, "that the proletarian movement must go through different stages of development, and that in every stage some people start marking time and stop helping the movement to advance." This sounds strange coming from them, because it describes their own condition. They are quite incapable at present of any advance.

However, what is the purpose the Peking leaders pursue with this third lie about continuous splitting of the Communist movement being inevitable? This is another important question, and every Communist, every progressive and every revolutionary patriot should apply his mind to it.

We Arab Communists of Syria are convinced that the three points we have listed here, more and more distinct in the pattern of the Chinese leaders' thought, these three points which we describe as three gross lies and three arch-absurdities, are nothing but a politico-ideological bridgehead, designed to justify the most disgraceful forms of disruption of the world Communist movement and, perhaps, the foulest forms of alliance with all the enemies of this movement, particularly the enemies of its vanguard, the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

People who could spread the monstrous lie about restoration of capitalism in the U.S.S.R. and Soviet collusion with American imperialism, and about a split of the Communist movement being objectively inevitable, must have far-reaching plans, the object of which is, firstly, to smash the alliance between the U.S.S.R. and the other socialist countries, on the one hand, and the national liberation movement, on the other; secondly, to split the national liberation movement in all countries; thirdly, to split the Communist parties in the newly-independent countries and stop all co-operation between them and other national and progressive forces; fourthly, to subvert the world Communist movement, and, fifthly, to establish upon its ruins Chinese leadership of the Asian and African countries.

Those are the ambitions of the Peking leaders. What else could prompt them to utter such monstrous lies?

To justify their attacks on the Soviet Union before the masses in China and in the Asian, African and Latin American countries, the Chinese leaders want to make them believe the Soviet Union has become not only a capitalist, but even an imperialist state. Is this not proof enough that they have run into a blind alley?

WILL THE CPC LEADERS REGAIN THEIR SENSES?

The workers, peasants and intellectuals of China, like their brothers in all the Asian and African countries, are surely unable to find an explanation for the furious campaign of the CPC leaders against the greatest and strongest socialist state, founded by Lenin, which defeated Hitlerism and entered the history of science as the home of the first spacemen, a country that sacrificed 30 million men, women and children to pave the way to victory for the Chinese revolution, a country which then proferred a helping hand to the people of China and whose aid enabled the Chinese people to score their biggest successes in industry and technology.

The CPC leaders have realized this. They have realized that the masses in their own country, on the three continents and in the rest of the world are baffled by the unbridled campaign against the Soviet Union. That is why they proclaimed out of hand, in Stalin's style, that the Soviet Union has become a capitalist country (sic!). This was the pivot of countless articles published in the press and broadcast over the radio. But the Peking leaders, in their blissful ignorance, ought to be told that you cannot ever change the system of a country that way, and the convictions of people, either.

We know our country very well and can assure the Peking leaders that proclamations of that sort will never evoke our response, or fall on fertile soil, either in Syria or any other Arab country.

The Arab workers, peasants and progressive intellectuals have grown out of their infancy. They have matured, and their opinions are not formed by what they hear, but by actual experience. And experience always shows them that the Soviet Union is a loyal friend of the Arabs in their struggle against imperialism, for national and social liberation. Khrushchov's name is today as popular in any Arab country as that of the most prominent of its national leaders. For the Arabs it is a synonym of the Soviet state and the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. We Arab Communists are not abashed by the Chinese leaders' calling us and other Communist parties "pawns on the chessboard of Soviet diplomacy". We reject this accusation scornfully. It is not a novelty for us. We have heard it for dozens of years from the imperialists and their agents, and the Right-wing nationalists. I can just imagine what Farahjalla Helou would say if he heard, when being tortured, that the Peking leaders accuse him of the same thing as his executioners, who were breaking his bones.

The friendship of the Arab and Soviet Communists, and Arab-Soviet friendship generally, is like a rock, and anyone who tries to undermine it will break his head against it.

Will the Peking leaders ever come to their senses?

It was after this article was written that the world learned about the decision of the CC, CPSU Plenary Meeting and Comrade Suslov's report on the disruptive activities of the CPC leaders. We are deeply convinced that in reading these documents all the Communists in our country will, as always, find views and conclusions prompted by devoted loyalty to Lenin's glorious party and the principles of creative Marxism-Leninism, and deep concern for the unity of the world Communist movement.

We declare our full support for the position of the CPSU and the other fraternal Marxist-Leninist parties regarding the splitting activities of the Chinese leaders.

We also hold, in accordance with the latest decision of our Central Committee, that it is necessary to convene a new international conference of all Communist parties in order to discuss the situation in the world Communist movement, foil the plans of splitting it, and take effective measures to strengthen its unity. It will help to thwart the disgraceful designs applauded by the warmongers, the imperialists and reactionaries throughout the world, and deeply regretted by all patriots and progressively-minded people who cherish peace, national liberation and socialism.

It is our deep conviction that the course charted in the documents of the 1957 and 1960 conferences will ultimately win, because it accords with the objective development of mankind and leads to a society without wars, without exploitation and oppression, its banner being peace, fraternity of labor and science, and happiness for all people.

HISTORY WILL NOT FORGIVE THEM*

AT CRUCIAL STAGE OF TOILERS' MOVEMENT SPLITTERS AT WORK

The National Council of the Communist Party of India, which concluded its six-day meeting in New Delhi on April 15 adopted the following resolution:

Thirty-two members of the National Council, having walked out of its meeting on April 11, 1964, have issued a press statement amounting to a manifesto and programme of action. The National Council of the Communist Party of India has considered this document of the "Left" minority group and found it to be a catalogue of falsehoods, distortions and anti-Party slanders, meant to justify the splitting tactics and disruptive activities of its authors.

By their walk-out and their subsequent stand as revealed in their statement, these 32 comrades have put themselves outside the pale of the Party. They have forfeited their rights as members of the Communist Party of India.

The seceders have openly declared war upon the National Council, upon the Secretariat and the Chairman of the Party in the name of "struggle against the factional activities" of "S. A. Dange and his group".

In this connection, it is well to remember certain hard facts of the past and present.

Firstly, this is not the first occasion in the Party's history when this same "Left" group has resorted to the anti-Party tactic of blackmail through threatened walk-outs and split. The most glaring example of this was seen at the Vijayawada Party Congress in 1961, where, finding themselves in a minority, these "Left" leaders and their followers threatened to walk out of the Congress unless they were given more representation than they could legitimately claim on the new National Council. They did not hesitate to precipitate a crisis in the presence of delegations from several fraternal Communist parties.

Secondly, the National Council would be failing in its duty if it did not expose the latest disruptive actions of the Left-sectarian group in their proper international context, i.e., not as an isolated event, not as a coincidence, but as an integral part of a worldwide move to divide and split as many Communist parties in the world as possible.

As is well-known, splits by minority groups have been deliberately planned and carried through in recent days, in the Communist Parties of Belgium, Great Britain, Australia, Ceylon, Peru and other countries. Disruption on an international scale and naked interference in the internal affairs of brother parties, have become the self-proclaimed aim of the present leadership of the Communist Party of China.

OPEN ATTACKS ON OUR PARTY

During the last 16 months, the Central Executive Committee and the National Council had also to take cognisance of the open attacks on our Party by the leaderships of the Communist Party of China and the Communist Party of Indonesia. Early last year (February 1963), the National Council adopted a resolution denouncing the leadership of the Communist Party of China for attempting to interfere in the internal affairs of our Party through open calls issued by it through articles in the Hungchi (Red Flag) and Peking People's Daily, as also through the Peking Radio.

The pamphlet called A Mirror for Revisionists in which our Party was attacked as the "Dange clique" and as an agency of the imperialists and the Indian big bourgeoisie and landlords, was answered in the pamphlet written by the Chairman of the Party Neither Revisionism nor Dogmatism is our Guide.

The leadership of the Communist Party of Indonesia stooped to the low level of characterizing the leadership of our Party as "spies" and calling for the disruption of the Communist Party of India by elements which it considered to be "genuine Marxist-Leninists". All this was denounced in a resolution of our Central Executive Committee.

The Hungchi and People's Daily editorials of February 4, 1964, have issued an undisguised call for splitting our Party.

The activities and behaviour of the dogmatist, sectarian group in our Party have run parallel to the attacks on the Communist Party of India by the leaderships of the Communist Party of China and the Communist Party of Indonesia.

It is against this background that the National Council has to judge the latest acts of the leaders of the disruptionists in the Party.

The 32 who have walked out to place themselves outside the Party claim that the National Council majority advocates and practises the "general political tactical line of Congress—Communist unity", which mounts to gross reformism and which, according to them, was defeated by their efforts at the Vijayawada Party Congress. This is a blatant distortion of truth.

No general line of Congress-Communist unity was ever advocated at Vijayawada. As is well known, the real struggle at the Sixth Party Congress was for the correct line which was eventually adopted—the line of building the National Democratic Front, of unity with democratic elements inside and outside the Congress, on common issues, against the anti-democratic policies of the Congress.

WHO VIOLATED PARTY DECISIONS?

It is not the National Council which has violated the Party Congress decisions since 1961, as falsely alleged by the disruptors; it is the latter who have stuck doggedly to their Left-sectarian line which was defeated at Vijayawada—a line of total opposition to the Congress, which leads to unprincipled alliances and understandings with reactionary, communal and separatist forces such as the Muslim League, the DMK, Swatantra Party, Akalis, etc., in the name of fighting the Congress.

According to the seceders, the majority in the National Council against them was the fortuitous result of the "crisis" of October-November 1962. the declaration of Emergency and the arrests of a large number of comrades. This could not be a greater denial of truth than this.

The "crisis" referred to so diplomatically by the Left leaders was, of course, the crisis caused by the Chinese aggression. When the National Council met in November 1962 to denounce this aggression and to declare its unequivocal stand for national defense, not a single arrest had been carried out.

The National Council resolution was adopted by overwhelming majority after thorough discussion and debate when these seceders were present and when none of them had been arrested. How then could it be claimed or insinuated that the majority was not a genuine one?

Yet another gross distortion in the statement of the Left seceders refers to the alleged rejection by the National Council of their proposals for "the organization of inner-Party discussion" and for "creation of necessary conditions in which a Party Congress can be convened". This, according to them, has prevented their participation and co-operation in the solving of inner-Party problems.

This presumably refers to the discussions which took place in the National Council meeting of October 1963, on a document by Comrade Basavapunniah and 16 others entitled "The Threatening Disruption and Split of the Party—How to Avert the Disaster?" This document which was circulated in clandestine fashion outside the National Council also, was replied to by Comrade Dange on behalf of the Secretariat which later published both documents.

In the meeting itself, the Council agreed to open discussion on all the controversial questions, to prepare for the Party Congress, and to associate with this work nominees of the minority group.

The National Council agreed to postpone the Party Congress, though it was overdue, until after the comrades in jail were released.

The CEC elected a Commission to prepare documents for the Party Congress in which were included Comrades M. Basavapunniah, EMS Namboodiripad, Jyoti Basu and P. Ramamurty. When the Commission meetings were called, these comrades boycotted them and later on organized their rival conference.

Why were these offers rejected by the "Left"? What more could they want? Today they pose themselves as champions of Party unity who have been forced out of the Party by the "undemocratic" practices of the majority. But the truth of the matter is that they were all along determined to flout the basic principles of Party organization and the authority and discipline of the National Council and to continue their activities as a rival party within the Party.

The only postion which could satisfy them was one in which the elected majority would agree to accept the status of a minority, while they, the actual minority, could dictate terms as though they were the majority. The National Council refused to surrender to such outrageous demands.

The "Left" leaders complain that the National Council and some State Councils have used their majority to carry out vindictive disciplinary actions against them.

LENIENCY OF NATIONAL COUNCIL

The truth is that the National Council and these State Councils can, on the contrary, be charged with sowing excessive leniency to persons who, while sheltering under the cover of their Party membership cards and their reputation as Party leaders, have been systematically wrecking the Party from within, repeatedly violating every single principle of Party organization and discipline, throwing all accepted Party norms and forms to the winds and running full-fledged rival Party centres from Delhi and several states. This has been conclusively established by the Central Control Commission in its latest report submitted to the National Council.

In the face of such conscious, planned and cold-blooded wrecking activity, the only disciplinary action taken so far against any leading member of this group has been the public censure of Comrade A. K. Gopalan in last October! The National Council has erred, if at all, on the side of leniency by any standards. The disruptors have taken full advantage of it to further intensify their anti-Party activities to an unparalleled extent.

Knowing that they cannot justify their ideological, political or organizational stand (in fact, they admit that they have serious ideological differences among themselves which have been subordinate to a common factional interest), the "Left" leaders have produced the diversionary provocation of the alleged "Dange letters" and are counting on cheap sensationalism to serve as a smokescreen for their nefarious anti-Party game.

The National Council has heard the available evidence and held that not even a prima facie case has been made out for the genuineness of the letters. It has repudiated the slanderous accusation that Comrade Dange was or is a British agent. Even then, in order to carry out a more thorough probe, it has appointed an inquiry committee of seven National Council members.

But why did not these "Left" leaders who proclaim from the housetops that they are convinced of the genuineness of the letters produce their evidence, if any, before the National Council? Why did they walk out? Why did they not return even after Comrade Dange declined to take the chair during discussion of this subject? And why do they now repeat the demand for an "agreed inquiry committee" when their representatives have already denounced to the world that the genuineness of the letters is beyond doubt?

They did not have the decency even to raise the issue in the CEC or the National Council before rushing to the press. None but the worst enemies of the Party could ever indulge in such shocking activity and that, too, in collusion with the pro-American weekly Current.

OPEN REVOLT

The "Left" leaders have now publicly announced their future course of action. It amounts, in short, to organizing an open revolt by Party members and units against the National Council and against the accepted political line of the Party, and to preparing for the organization of their own all-India Congress which they have the temerity to call the "Seventh Congress of the Communist Party of India". They have decided to circulate their own documents and to convene a meeting of "representatives of Party members from all over India" after two months.

These and other decisions have been adopted in the seceders' conference which has been in session, as they admit in their own statement, from April 2 to 9 in Delhi.

Draft "Programs" and other documents have been issued to and discussed by Party members specially invited to this conference from various states and districts. The press has been briefed every day.

Clearly a rival Party — all but the formal signboard — has been openly set up. And yet its organizers put forward so-called "proposals" for the National Council to accept as the price of their co-operation, even at this last moment. This is nothing but a last desperate attempt to dictate terms to the majority.

The National Council wishes to make it clear that it is always ready and anxious to explore all avenues for restoration of Party unity at any stage. But how can unity be restored as long as the seceders do not agree unconditionally to scrap their rival and parallel party centres and to accept unhesitatingly the authority of the National Council?

It has to be emphasized that these desperate anti-Party activities have been resorted to in the background of the rising wave of mass struggles in India on economic and democratic issues, a wave in which the Party has been playing a glorious and most prominent role.

For the first time in the history of our Party, an all-India mass movement has been unleashed against the monopolists and the anti-people forces of the Congress government. This movement which began with the Great Petition campaign and the Great September March last year, is entering the next stage of preparations for an all-India General Strike.

It is precisely at this moment that the seceders have come out with their open split.

The disruption unleashed by this group inside the Party has, therefore, to be strongly condemned for the immense damage it has done, not only to the Party but also to the entire working class and popular democratic movement in the country. It has brought grist to the mill of the reactionaries and the vested interests — internal as well as foreign. Such a crime cannot be forgiven.

STILL NOT TOO LATE

The Communist Party of India is facing the gravest crisis in its history—a crisis which is the reflection of the international conspiracy of disruption and direct creation of a group of hardened dogmatistic, Left-sectarian and adventurist leaders within our Party.

History will never forgive them for their crime of splitting the Party which tens of thousands of heroic revolutionaries and selfless workers have built up at the cost of their lives and untold sacrifices, a Party which is the hope of the toiling millions of India.

The National Council calls upon all Party members and Party units to rally round the banner of the Party, defend its unity and honour and exercise maximum vigilance against the forces of disruption and disunity.

The National Council is fully alive to the danger that the attack of the splitters on the Party is likely to be accompanied by similar attacks on the unity of the trade unions and other democratic mass organizations. This attack, too, must be resisted tooth and nail, for, if the disruptors succeed in their game of setting up rival unions, rival kisan sabhas, etc. it will be a grave blow to the unity of the toilers in their struggles against class oppression and exploitation and for better conditions of life and democratic rights.

Such disruption will only bring grist to the mill of the monopolists and reactionaries in every walk of life, enabling them to divide and suppress the struggles of the working people, deprive them of all their gains and crush their fighting mass organizations.

The National Council declares that the Communist Party of India, the revolutionary Party of the Indian working class and of all the toilers in town and countryside, will remain united to fight the battles of the toiling and democratic masses of India. The Party has been built by the sweat and blood of millions of our countrymen. Their sacrifices and devotion cannot go in vain. The banner of the Party will be victorious.

ON THE SPLITTING ACTIVITIES OF THE CHINESE COMMUNIST PARTY LEADERS IN THE WORLD COMMUNIST AND WORKING-CLASS MOVEMENT

STATEMENT OF THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF ARGENTINA

Having examined Comrade Suslov's report to the February (1964) Plenary Meeting of the CC, CPSU and the decision adopted by this Plenary Meeting, and having discussed the situation that has arisen in the world Communist movement as a result of the incessant hostile attacks of the leaders of the Communist Party of China on its general line and unity, the Plenary Meeting of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Argentina rejects these attacks in both form and substance and supports the Marxist-Leninist stand of the CPSU, the stand of consistent unity.

1. Ever since the CPC leaders launched their attacks on the basic propositions of the 20th and 22nd congresses of the CPSU, the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement, seeking to supplant them with their own anti-Marxist and anti-Leninist theses, our Party has adhered to a clear-cut, unambiguous position.

In face of the dogmatic and disruptive activities of the CPC leaders, our Party has always supported the policy of the CC, CPSU headed by Comrade Khrushchov, who, while vigorously defending creative Marxism-Leninism, displayed reserve and patience, striving to avoid a split in the world Communist movement. The 12th Congress of our Party, held in February 1963, denounced the political views and splitting activities of the CPC leaders and supported Comrade Krushchov's proposal, made at the Sixth Congress of the Socialist Unity Party of Germany, to discontinue all open polemics in order to create a more favourable atmosphere for discussion, in keeping with the standards established by the 1960 Statement. Our Party has abided by the decision of its congress.

2. As subsequent events have shown, the CPC leaders never intended to discuss their objections fraternally, so as to remove them. On the contrary, they are doing everything to exacerbate them. That was why they replied to the repeated CPSU proposals to hold a conference and iron out the differences, with dilatory tactics in order to gain time and try to set up factions in the Communist parties, and to establish parallel organizations in every country with the object of splitting the world Communist movement.

This is borne out by the June 14, 1963, letter of the CPC Central

Nuestra Palabra, April 21, 1964.

Committee to the CPSU Central Committee, in which the common line worked out at the 1957 and 1960 meetings is openly countered with their own, dogmatic and sectarian line. In these circumstances, the CC of our Party, again condemned the stand of the CPC leaders at a meeting on July 23, 1963, and voiced full support of the CPSU reply contained in the "Open Letter of the CPSU Central Committee to All Party Organizations and All Communists of the Soviet Union."

In view of the fact that the CPC leaders did not discontinue their open polemics, conducted in a language impermissible in relations between fraternal parties, and in view of their splitting activities in these parties and in mass international movements, the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Argentina decided to publish Comrade Codovilla's report "The Marxist-Leninist Position with Regard to the Trotskyite Dogmatists from the Communist Party of China", which he delivered in September 1963 and in which he analyzed in detail and denounced the Chinese leaders' anti-Marxist and anti-Leninist position.

3. Of late the CPC leadership has gone over from ideological discussion to slanderous attacks on the policy of the CPSU and the other Marxist-Leninist parties, and to undisguised splitting activities, in order to organize the basis for a parallel movement devoid of Marxist-Leninist principles.

Although the harm they do to the international Communist movement is obvious, there is every indication that they will fail to attain their disruptive ends. The most they have achieved is to win over some vacillating elements, especially those with a petty-bourgois background, bringing them together with a few counter-revolutionaries expelled from Communist parties for anti-Party activities and with representatives of the bourgeois-nationalist intelligentsia and Trotskyites.

Athough the Chinese splitters have so far failed to do damage to our Party and won support only among some elements expelled by us for anti-Party activities, we must be vigilant because they are stepping up their disruptive work, and so prevent them from harming us. At the same time, our Party considers that in the international arena the struggle against this dangerous dogmatic and nationalist deviation of the Trotsky type must be continued. Nothing but open struggle against it from the positions of creative Marxism-Leninism staunchly upheld by the CPSU and the other parties of the Communist movement, will enable us to rout the splitters and consolidate our unity so as to go forward to new and bigger victories on the international scale and in every country, dashing the imperialists' hopes of weakening our parties.

4. Ideological struggle against dogmatism, as well as against revisionism, which both stem from the influence of bourgeois nationalism on the proletariat, is one of the forms of class struggle. The issue is which of the two lines to choose: the proletarian line collectively worked out at the 1957 and 1960 meetings and based on creative Marxism-Leninism, or the adventurist line of those who, like the CPC leaders, are trying to implant in the Communist parties an ideology alien to Marxism-Leninism.

That is why it is now more necessary than ever to defend Marxism-Leninism in the name of the unity and consolidation of the world Communist and working-class movement.

5. Although, as repeatedly stated by the CPSU and other fraternal parties, our Party included, the CPC leaders have gone far in their anti-Leninist and splitting activities, we reaffirm our readiness to support any proposal designed to bring the discussion back to the standards established at the 1960 Meeting, and conforming with the principles of creative Marxism-Leninism, provided it is honestly accepted by the Chinese leaders.

We Communists of Argentina, like the Communists of all countries, hope that the CPC leaders will realize what colossal harm they are doing to their people and to all the peoples with their disruptive policy aimed at weakening the socialist camp and the international Communist and working-class movement at a time when their unity is necessary more than ever for the struggle against the imperialist camp headed by the United States. Enraged by the consolidation and development of the Soviet Union and the other socialist countries, by the growing successes of the national-liberation movement in Asia, Africa and Latin America, and by the advances of the democratic and progressive forces in all countries, the world peace movement especially, which are undermining their positions, the most reactionary and warlike imperialists are intensifying their aggressive actions, such as the hostilities in South Vietnam. They advance the Johnson-Mann "new doctrine", a doctrine of undisguised and outright support of reactionary and fascist coups, such as the recent coup in Brazil.

6. In view of the above, our Party considers that a conference of Communist and Workers' parties must be convened to examine the present situation in the world Communist and working-class movement and to discuss the common line with due regard for the changes in the international situation, on the basis of the main principles enunciated in the 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement.

SPEECH BY OTTO KUUSINEN

AT FEBRUARY 1964 PLENARY MEETING OF CENTRAL COMMITTEE, COMMUNIST PARTY OF THE SOVIET UNION*

Comrades, since the erroneous anti-Marxist position of the Chinese leadership was already exhaustively dealt with by Comrade M. A. Suslov in his report, allow me to dwell only on the one question of the character of the dictatorship existing in China today.

No one of course has any doubts that there is a dictatorship in the People's Republic of China. But what sort of a dictatorship is it?

Clarity on this score is essential both from the angle of basic theory and from the angle of practical considerations. For the question of the dictatorship of the proletariat is a fundamental question of Marxism-Leninism. It is the touchstone of the attitude of the Communist parties to the different classes in society.

You know, comrades, that the Peking leaders aspire to be the teachers and mentors of all Marxist-Leninist parties as concerns this question as well. They level at the CPSU Program criticism which is completely unfounded and illiterate from the standpoint of Marxism-Leninism, assailing the way this document presents the question of the character of state power following the proletarian revolution and the triumph of socialism. It is therefore not amiss to examine what sort of a dictatorship they have in China. Such an examination will perhaps help to understand why the CPC leaders have plunged headlong into the abyss of splitting activities.

The Chinese leaders themselves give the dictatorship they have established a deliberately confused characterization. In the initial period after the victory of the revolution they defined their state system as "the democratic dictatorship of the people", "the people" being understood as including the working class, the peasantry, the petty bourgeoisie, and the national bourgeoisie.

As Mao Tse-tung explained it, China's state system was precisely the dictatorship of an alliance of all these classes. In those years Mao Tse-tung emphasized time and again that there was a fundamental difference between this Chinese "dictatorship of the people" and the dictatorship of the proletariat as Marxists had always understood it.

There was no need for him to have said that! One could see even with the naked eye that his theoretical edifice had nothing at all in common with Marxism-Leninism. Marxist theory in general knows no such thing as "the dictatorship of the people". This term smacks strongly of petty-bourgeois revolutionary phrase-mongering. It is reminiscent in particular of the lingo the followers of the Narodnaya Volya and the Socialist-Revolutionaries of old Russia were fond of using.

*Pravda, May 19, 1964.

If the Chinese leaders really sought to give a Leninist definition of the class character of their state system during the initial stage following the victory of the revolution, they could have spoken, for instance, of the revolutionary-democratic dictatorship of the working class and peasantry developing, under working-class leadership, into the dictatorship of the proletariat. Such a form of dictatorship would have offered ample opportunity to enlist also representatives of the loyal sections of the national bourgeoisie in the work of the various organs of power. However, for some reason—we shall see later why—Mao Tse-tung believed it necessary to proclaim the national bourgeoisie of China a class exercising the functions of the dictatorship. This indeed is the heart of the matter!

However, somewhat later the Peking leaders had to cudgel their brains to polish up their definition of China's dictatorship. which was a patent revision of Marxism. "Our state," Mao Tse-tung now said, "is a state of the democratic dictatorship of the people, directed by the working class and based on an aliiance between the workers and peasants."

That already had a better ring. At any rate it did mention the guiding functions of the working class. However, further explanations again upset the apple cart. "Who exercises the dictatorship?" Mao Tse-tung asked, following up with the answer: "Of course, the working class and the people it leads, all men and women enjoying civil rights who are rallied together by the working class, firstly the peasants, exercise the dictatorship with respect to the reactionary classes. . . ."

The question is: Doesn't the national bourgeoisie in China enjoy civil rights? Of course, it does, at least the overwhelming majority does. In that case, according to Mao Tse-tung, the overwhelming majority of the Chinese national bourgeoisie exercises the dictatorship in the country along with the workers and the peasants. Hence Mao Tse-tung's new, edited formula again concealed his old piddling opportunist idea, the point of which is that after they gain power the working classes are not able to exercise the dictatorship by themselves, but have to go halves with the national bourgeoisie.

Why, is it, one may ask, that the Chinese leaders, those ultra-revolutionists, are showing such great concern for the rights of the bourgeoisie? Who knows for sure? But it is very likely that they hope thereby to make it easier to flirt with bourgeois nationalists in other countries, especially with bourgeois Chinese nationals living in various parts of Asia and Africa. "Come over to us," the Peking leaders seem to tell these elements, "and we shall see to it that you get a decent place in the system of dictatorship we have invented."

However, decisive for the assessment of the state system in China is the question of the part allotted in it to the working class. As we have seen, the Chinese leaders recognize on paper, though in a very general and abstract way, not only the participation but also the leading position of the proletariat in the Chinese "dictatorship of the people". But how do matters stand in reality?

It must be said that the Chinese working class in reality does not occupy in the state power system the place allotted to it by Marxism-Leninism. Moreover, the policy of the Chinese leaders with regard to the urban proletariat bears a stamp of distrust and alienation. One cannot get away from the impression that the CPC leaders act as though they were afraid of the growth of the influence of the working class. This is manifest in full measure, first of all, in the attitude to the Chinese trade unions. The attempts of the trade unions to draw attention to the just demands of the workers and on the need for a certain improvement of their conditions were resolutely rebuffed by the CPC leaders. These activities, quite normal for trade unions, were branded as a manifestation of dangerous "deviations", of "economism" and "syndicalism".

Instead of cultivating in the working masses class-consciousness and helping them to understand their lofty historical mission of builders and the leading force of the new society, the Chinese leaders demand of the workers only blind obedience. It is being impressed upon them that they should be satisfied with playing the part of mere "cogs" in the machine. The Chinese leaders consider that their main support is the peasantry and hence pin all their political hopes on it and not on the working class.

This incorrect and essentially scornful attitude of the CPC leaders towards the working-class movement in the country is not a new development. The Communist International in its time subjected it to justified criticism. I do not want to say that all the decisions of the Comintern, including the ones on the Chinese question, were always faultless. But on this basic question the Comintern was absolutely correct!

Overestimation of the role of the peasantry in the socialist revolution combined with underestimation of the role and potential of the working class, which, according to Marxism, is the only consistently revolutionary class in society, is in general characteristic of the petty-bourgeois system of views which is being intensively propagated in China. The CPC leaders, in the period before they came to power, did not devote due attention to the proletarian section of the Party and did not work enough with the urban proletariat. And after that they had the audacity to complain that in such a major working-class centre as Shanghai the Kuomintang had more influence than the Communist Party and to blame the workers for it.

How much more the Chinese leaders rely on the revolutionary potential of the peasantry can be seen also from the testimony of the American journalist Anna Louise Strong, this zealous advocate of the Chinese regime. She says in her book, for instance, that in a talk with her Liu Shao-chi praised in every way the revolutionary nature of the "Chinese boys" who, he said, were superior to any proletarian revolutionary. According to him, 'Marx had never seen such people. . . . They are even more disciplined and loyal than the industrial proletariat."

Needless to say, the Chinese peasants joined the revolutionary struggle for the abolition of the feudal yoke and for national liberation with great enthusiasm. But would any Marxist-Leninist consider this ground for counterposing the peasantry to the working class, belittling the revolutionary potential of the proletariat and even "correcting" Marx on this question!

However, so as not to reveal their departure from the Marxist theory, the Chinese leaders talk about the participation and the leading role of the proletariat in the Chinese dictatorship. But they cannot show where this role of the proletariat is concretely manifest in the conditions of China. On the contrary, the facts indicate that the Chinese working class has no rights; its position is indeed grim. But while saying this I do not for a single moment doubt that the glorious working class of China will in the further course of the revolution win its vital rights and the leading role allotted it by the laws of history.

To extricate themselves from the difficult situation in which they have landed as a result of gross distortion of the Leninist teaching on the dictatorship of the proletariat, the leaders and propagandists of the Communist Party of China resort to the following simple explanation: the leading role and the dictatorship of the working class are implicit in the fact that we have a Communist Party which in the final analysis manages all the major affairs of the country. Mao Tse-tung wrote that "the working class leads the democratic dictatorship of the people" in China "through the Communist Party". In his report to the Eighth Congress of the CPC Liu Shao-chi also pointed out that with the establishment of the People's Republic of China "the Communist Party of China has become a Party wielding political power, and the democratic dictatorship of the people has actually become one of the forms of the dictatorship of the proletariat." Thus, the leadership and the dictatorship of the proletariat are in effect identified with the leading position of the Communist Party. Is this correct?

No, it is not. The Chinese leaders completely forget that the great Lenin pointed out that far from every Party which calls itself Communist is really the vanguard, the recognized leader of the working class. A party can be, according to Lenin's teaching, a genuine vanguard of the working class only if it pursues a correct policy meeting the interests of the proletariat, if it is closely linked with the proletariat, lives the same life with it, trusts it and enjoys the benefit of its undivided confidence. These theses of Lenin's apply not only to the Communist parties of the old capitalist countries but also to those of the colonial and semi-colonial countries, where there is a working class. Lenin classed China among such countries.

Do the top leaders of the Communist Party of China take into account these propositions of Lenin's? No, they do not. As I mentioned already, the Chinese leaders do not trust the working class, ignore its interests and demand only submissive obedience from it. It is not by chance that the CPC Central Committee has of late been imposing on the workers' collectives and trade unions such slogans, characteristic of militarized organizations, as: "Policy is a commanding force", "The Secretary of a Party Committee is a production commander", etc. The All-China Conference on Industrial Matters, held in Peking early in 1964, called upon all the workers "to learn from the People's Liberation Army". Thus, instead of persuasion, insistence on obedience and army discipline is what underlies the attitude of the leadership of the CPC towards the working class. How under the circumstances can the proletariat exercise its leading role?

On major international questions too the Peking policy is erroneous, non-Marxist; it is not a policy of proletarian internationalism. Does a policy permeated with great-power aspirations, which replaces proletarian internationalism with chauvinism, and the policy of strengthening the unity of the socialist countries and the world Communst movement with the policy of undermining and splitting it, accord with the interests of the Chinese proletariat? The leadership of a Party pursuing such a nationalistic policy can in no way be regarded as one expressing the will of the working class.

Hence the Communist Party of China cannot be now considered a genuine vanguard of the working class, capable of giving effect to the leading role of the proletariat.

In reality in China today there is no dictatorship of the people, no dictatorship of the proletariat, no leading position of the proletariat, and also no vanguard role of the Communist Party. The whole of the Chinese leaders' pseudo-Marxist phraseology is only camouflage designed to disguise the dictatorship which really exists there. It is a dictatorship of leaders; or, to be more exact, a one-man dictatorship.

The Party leaders have actually freed themselves from any control by the Party. For many years now congresses of the Communist Party of China have not been convened, and its representative bodies are increasingly playing merely an ornamental part. The decision of the Communist International which back in 1926 demanded that the Chinese Communist Party "firmly give effect to collective leadership in the Party, all the way from the Central Committee down to the factory and neighborhood nucleus", has also been buried in oblivion by the Chinese leaders.

Like-wise indicative is the fact that in attacking the Program of our Party, the leaders of the Communist Party of China furiously assail those propositions in it which envisage all-round development of inner-Party and Soviet democracy and ever greater participation of the working people in the administration of the state. In China democracy is either not spoken of at all or mentioned merely as a matter of form. This is not surprising, because socialist democracy is a flower which does not grow in the shade of the personality cult.

The Mao Tse-tung dictatorship is weighing down on the entire life of the working people of China. This is felt in all parts of the country. The leading Party workers not only do not conceal the existence of the dictatorship of Mao Tse-tung, but are trying in every possible way to invest him with a halo of infallibility and to build the cult of his personality.

It is widely known what fantastic proportions the Mao Tse-tung personality cult has assumed in China. A special ritual has been created for Mao Tse-tung's rare public appearances. Each pronouncement of his is assessed as "a great contribution to the treasury of Marxism". Even the verses he writes in his leisure time are served up as an historic event in the ideological life of China. The Chinese leaders do not even notice, or do not want to notice, that in their idolatry they have deviated far, not only from the principles of Marxism-Leninism, but also from elementary decency.

Comrades, you know that for a long time the Central Committee of our Party did everything it could to explain to the leaders of the Communist Party of China their mistakes and delusions. Our Party patiently waited and hoped that they would, in the final run, heed the voice of reason and conscience. To make their return to the correct road easier, our Party, as everyone knows, proposed that open polemics be mutually rejected.

However, from our proposal, which was prompted by good will, the leaders of the Communist Party of China drew the following conclusion: the people in Moscow, evidently, are afraid of polemics with us, and once this is so, the Chinese leaders decided, we shall compose as many thunderous replies to the CPSU Central Committee's Open Letter as necessary to achieve our ends.

You are greatly mistaken, gentlemen! Our Party is not afraid of struggle in defense of Marxism-Leninism. Since you persist in and have decided to continue your harmful undermining campaign against the unity of the world Communist movement, we, too, most likely, will have to expose publicly the anti-Marxist position of petty-bourgeois nationalism which you, the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party, have adopted.

In the course of its history, our Leninist Party more than once shouldered the task of defending the principles of Marxism-Leninism against both the Rightist and "Leftist" petty-bourgeois splitters.

The whole of our Party indignantly condemn the foul slander and undermining activities of the Peking renegades. Our entire country firmly stands and will continue firmly to stand for that policy of creative Marxism-Leninism which the Central Committee of our Party, headed by Comrade Khrushchov, is pursuing.

We are confident that all honest Marxist-Leninists the world over will march side by side with us in the struggle which our Leninist Party will wage to preserve and strengthen the unity of the world Communist movement.

MARXISM-LENINISM: INTERNATIONAL TEACHING FOR COMMUNISTS IN ALL COUNTRIES

The Chinese leaders have declared an outright ideological and political war on the world Communist movement with the aim of splitting it.

The Chinese leaders can conceal their actions no longer. They are, therefore, trying to justify them, alleging that the purpose of such actions is to protect Marxism-Leninism, and extolling themselves as the sole guardians of the purity of this teaching. However, the entire development of the polemics shows that the activities of the Chinese leaders are nothing but political intrigues on the part of factionalists who talk about the defense of Marxism merely to cover up their desire to undermine the unity of world communism for their own private ends. That this is so was convincingly demonstrated in the speeches of N. S. Khrushchov, in M. A. Suslov's report and in the other materials of the February Plenary Meeting of the CPSU Central Committee, as well as in the documents of the fraternal parties.

Today when Peking wants to screen its subversive activities against the fraternal parties behind noisy protestations of a desire to protect Marxist-Leninist theory, first-rate importance attaches to the struggle for the ideological unity of the Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism—the international teaching for Communists in all countries. This vital issue is raised in a series of Pravda editorials which follow.

IDEOLOGICAL UNITY IS THE FOUNDATION OF UNITY IN THE COMMUNIST MOVEMENT*

The world-historic mission of the working class can be discharged only if the proletariat and its Marxist-Leninist parties pool efforts internationally. Hence the tremendous importance attaching to the task of achieving cohesion in the world Communist movement.

This task is especially important today, because never before have the Communists borne such a great responsibility for the destinies of peace, socialism and progress, for the destinies of mankind.

How can this unity be achieved, a unity which presupposes not only verbal declaration of solidarity, but also united, concerted action, constant mutual assistance, and the organic blend of the national and international tasks of each revolutionary detachment? The Communists have always regarded ideological unity based on Marxism-Leninism as one of the main pillars of their international solidarity. This unity is an expression of the identity of aims and agreement on the fundamental means and basic tactical revolutionary detachments of the international working class.

Even the Comintern, whose Rules were obligatory for all parties, could unite Communists in different countries only by relying on their ideological unity. The importance of the struggle for ideological unity is all the greater today, not only because in our days an organization such as the Comintern no longer exists, and the forms of contact between the parties have changed. Of far greater importance are the changes that have resulted from the growth of the Communist movement and all revolutionary forces.

Communist parties exist today in most countries of the world, and their concrete tasks under which they are waging their struggle are becoming increasingly diverse. This, naturally, gives rise to a great variety of forms of struggle and tactical methods, and also to a different approach to one or another common issue.

The international Communist movement was also confronted with a new historical situation owing to the fact that the rise of the socialist world system, the collapse of colonialist empires, the mounting class struggle of the proletariat, and the upsurge of the popular democratic movements awakened once passively-minded sections of society to achieve political life. The revolutionary dynamic character of the epoch has brought vast sections of the petty-bourgeoisie in Asia, Africa and Latin America into the vortex of political developments. They have joined in the world revolutionary movement, and this is a major victory for social progress. At the same time, the drawing of new sections of society, including the petty-bourgeoisie, into the making of history has broadened the channels of non-proletarian influence on the revolutionary detachments. Hence the increased importance of the struggle which the Communist parties are waging for the correct ideological, theoretical and political line of all revolutionary forces, and, above all, for ideological unity among the Communists themselves.

Without this struggle, without ideological unity, communism would cease to be a world movement and become but an amorphous conglomerate of parties incapable of joint action.

It is quite clear that there are no relations of hierarchy, domination, and subordination in the world Communist movement, consisting as it does of independent parties enjoying equal rights, nor can there be any relations of that nature. Hence it follows that the only form of unity can and must be a voluntary alliance of like-minded people, which would guarantee the equal rights and independence of each Party and at the same time ensure the cohesion, unity and co-ordination of action and voluntary discipline in pursuing the general line of the Communist movement.

An alliance of this kind can be achieved only on such an ideological and theoretical platform which, on the basis of a Marxist-Leninist analysis of the present epoch, provides the correct answers to the vital problems of today and takes into account the new phenomena and processes of reality. This is the platform of creative Marxism. There is absolutely no question that to be loyal to Marxism-Leninism means upholding the basic principles and propositions of the revolutionary theory of the working class and fighting against every attempt to revise it — whether made from the "right" or from the "left". It is also obvious that fidelity to Marxism-Leninism calls for the creative application and development of this teaching in accordance with the changing historical conditions.

At the same time, the creative development of theory itself must necessarily be the collective concern of all the Marxist-Leninist parties. Not because the entire multi-million strong army of Communists lacks talented theoreticians and, consequently, we have decided "for want of anything better" to tackle theory "together". There is a good number of talented theoreticians among present-day Communists. They are to be found in many parties. However, the ways of developing Marxism have changed — not "for lack" of talented people, but because of the wealth of forms, conditions and experience of struggle which we possess. Today theory can be developed only when all the parties, the entire movement co-operates — and not so much by "armchair" reasoning as by practical activity, in the very process of the struggle against imperialism, for socialsm and communsm.

Implicit in the international character of the Marxist-Leninist teaching is the need to take into account the national peculiarites and specific features in the concrete approach of each country in solving the common international task. The experience accumulated by all the contingents of the Communist movement is of great importance for perfecting and enriching the theoretical weapons of the working class.

Every Party — big or small — takes an active part in the common cause of creatively developing revolutionary theory and makes its own contribution to this effort.

It is common knowledge that the CPSU has done much theoretical work over the past decade to generalize the changes that have taken place in the world. We take pride in the fact that the results of this work, as recorded in the Resolutions of the 20th, 21st and 22nd Congresses of the CPSU and in its new Program, have been highly appraised by the fraternal parties.

These years were extremely fruitful also as regards the theoretical work done by other Marxist-Leninist parties.

The Communist and Workers' parties of the socialist countries faced new problems in their socialist reorganization of society. As they solved these problems they developed a whole series of important Marxist propositions dealing first of all with the theory of revolution and the building of socialism in states differing in the conditions and level of economic development.

The Communist Party of China has also made its contribution to the common cause of developing Marxist-Leninist theory. In the struggle against imperialism and the Kuomintang reactionaries and in the first stages of socialist construction, it enriched the theory and practice of the Communist movement with important conclusions with regard to the guerilla campaign in China, the united front of the national forces in the struggle against imperialism, the ways of transforming capitalist property (redemption, mixed property, etc.)

Extensive theoretical work has also been done by the Communist parties of such leading capitalist countries as France, Italy, Britain and the U.S.A. They have developed many aspects of the Marxist-Leninist teachings as to the strategy and tactics of the class struggle of the proletariat in their application to modern conditions. The Communists of the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America are successfully tackling important aspects of Marxism-Leninism that are related to the problems of linking the struggle for socialism to the national liberation movement, establishing groad alliances with the petty and national bourgeoisie and working out methods for the non-capitalist development of countries that have shaken off the colonial yoke.

Each party contributes to the common treasure-store of Marxism. In so doing it proceeds, first of all, from its own experience. For instance, no one could know the problems of the working-class struggle in the developed capitalist countries better than the Communist parties of those countries. The same can be said of the parties tackling the problems of the national liberation movement or of the building of socialism and communism. Proceeding from real life, all the Communist parties take an active part in working out general theoretical principles affecting the Communist movement as a whole.

This nature of the creative process of the development of Marxism-Leninism cannot but be reflected in the forms of the parties' theoretical work. Each new word of Marxism is not uttered peremptorily from the heights of some theoretical Olympus, but is verified in practice, is discussed at international forums of Communists, and becomes the gain of the entire movement. A case in point is the work of the two Moscow Meetings and the programmatic documents of international communism they drafted, i.e., the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement. Adopted by the movement, the new theses become the guide to action for all its contingents, by virtue of the voluntarily assumed pledge to abide by them and by the assessments recorded in joint documents.

As for the joint collective theoretical work of the parties, Marxism-Leninism develops, as is only natural, through discussion, disputes and struggle. That is how it will always be, because the development of Marixsm-Leninism is a creative process that never ceases. This only makes it still more important strictly to adhere to the standards and principles of theoretical disputes and discussions which the movement has evolved: under no circumstances should they be used as a method for factional struggle and for squaring accounts with other parties. Marxist-Leninists regard theoretical and political discussions among Communists as a means for strengthening unity, not as a disruptive factor. To prevent these discussions from playing into the hands of the enemies and to make them serve our cause, they must be carried on in a friendly, dignified form, conscientiously and to the point, with the common interests of communism put before narrow nationalist egotistical considerations.

In theoretical disputes between like-minded Communists, there must be no sectarian, fanatical intolerance of differences in views, for that is characteristic of medieval monks, not of Marxist-Leninists. The fact that the Communist parties are working in different conditions, have arrived at different stages of the struggle and have accumulated varying experience, accounts for the many diverse shades of opinion on specific questions. This of course is no cause for displeasure or alarm. Our Party has expressed its view on this score more than once, stressing that such differences should not be the cause for quarrels and strife. Real Communists are concerned primarily with everything that unites them with their fellow-Communists in the other countries, not what divides them; they believe that questions upon which no common view has been established today, can be agreed upon tomorrow, after time and experience have demonstrated who was right and who was wrong.

All these norms of ideological activity in the Communist parties, which in recent years have won general recognition in our movement, are now being grossly violated and rejected by the Chinese leaders.

Suffice it to read the polemical material published in Peking in the past few months to see that, far from cherishing the unity of the parties, they, on the contrary, have proclaimed constant schism to be a sort of law of normal development in the revolutionary movement.

That is exactly how the question is put in the article published in Jenminjihpao and Hungchi on February 4, 1964. ". . . Like everything else," the article says, "the international working-class movement tends to divide itself in two." And further: "Unity, struggle or even splits, and a new unity on a new basis—such is the dialectics of the development of the international working-class movement." It is clear to all that this "philosophy of split" is intended not so much to explain the past as to argue the present activity of the Chinese leaders with its aim of undermining the ideological and political unity of the Communists.

Peking does not recognize creative collective work in the field of theory, though it makes a big fuss about the "equality" and "independence" of the different parties. Refusing to reckon with the general conclusions of the world Communist movement, posing as supreme arbiters on questions of theory and politics, and "excommunicating" one fraternal party after another from Marxism, the Chinese leaders have quite openly arrogated to themselves some special rights in the field of Marxist-Leninist theory.

However, the Communist movement does not believe in "prophets" and "oracles", who think and decide for others — as Stalin attempted to do in his time. As far as the CPSU is concerned, it has made its views with regard to this question crystal-clear.

Owing to the wealth of experience accumulated by the CPSU and the services it has rendered to the Communist movement it became traditional for a special, leading place to be accorded to our Party, and this was recorded in the jointly adopted documents of the Communist movement. The Central Committee of our Party took the initiative to end this tradition, even over the objections of a number of other parties, among which most active, paradoxically enough today, was the Communist Party of China, which demanded that the corresponding formulation be introduced in the common documents of the Communist parties. The real reason for this position of the CPC leaders is now quite clear. Apparently, the Chinese leaders sought already at that time to establish the "office" of head of the Communist movement, with the aim of eventually taking it over themselves.

Our Party has resolutely opposed violations of equality in relations in the socialist camp and the Communist movement such as were typical of the time of the personality cult, and repudiated the very idea of one or another party enjoying "hegemony" in the Communist movement. The Chinese leaders, on the other hand, are obviously eager to revive the idea, appropriating the right to solve unilaterally theoretical and political questions that concern the entire movement.

Indeed, what other explanation can be found for the hullabaloo raised in China over the "ideas of Mao Tse-tung" which were presented as the apex of Marxian thought for all the peoples, for the entire movement? Peking went so far as to claim that the task of theoretical generalization of the historic tasks of our day had fallen completely to Mao-Tse-tung alone, that our age itself was the "age of Mao Tse-tung".

Such utterances are not only permeated with adulation of a leader that is unworthy of Communists. They also clearly attempt to assert the "monopoly" of Chinese theoreticians in Marxism-Leninism. In contrast to the great teaching of Marx, Engels and Lenin, the Chinese leaders seek to impose on the Communist movement as its ideological banner the so-called Chinese version of Marxism.

WHAT CHINESE LEADERS ARE TRYING TO IMPOSE UPON THE COMMUNIST MOVEMENT UNDER THE GUISE OF MARXISM-LENINISM*

In their theoretical speculations, the Chinese leaders are revising the Marxist-Leninist teaching, distorting the views of Marx, Engels and Lenin, and repudiating one of the most important principles of Marxism-Leninism—the creative approach to theory. Peking denies the creative development of Marxist-Leninist theory, the new appraisals and conclusions drawn by the fraternal parties in their jointly adopted documents.

Indeed, what do the CPC leaders regard as the "revisionist sins" of the Marxist-Leninist parties? As they themselves explain: the fact that these parties have adopted the "course of so-called peaceful coexistence", "peaceful competition", "peaceful transition", "the state of the whole people" and "the party of the whole people". There is hardly any need to say that the general line of the Communist movement is by no means reduced to the above-mentioned propositions. This is generally known. What is noteworthy is the very range of propositions selected for attack.

Several things are in question here — the principles of the foreign policy of the socialist states and the character of the state in the period of the transition from socialism to communism, the roads of the socialist revolution and the social character of the Party after the complete victory of socialism. All these diverse questions, however, have one thing in common — in every case the points at issue are theoretical problems, in the elaboration of which the Communist parties, in accordance with the demands of the epoch, have introduced many new elements over the past few years.

It is against this that the CPC leaders have directed their offensive first and foremost. They appraise all the propositions of creative Marxism advanced by the present generation of Marxist-Leninists from the point of whether or not they conform or not to what was written 100, 50 or 30 years ago. This approach is matched by their method of criticism, which completely ignores objective reality and boils down to the culling of individual quotations from the works of Marx, Engels and Lenin referring to a different epoch and a different historical situation. The Chinese theoreticians, judging by their own pronouncements, imagine that Marxism-Leninism is a set of hard-and-fast rules, principles and slogans valid for all time, which Communists have strictly to abide by, like churchmen to the Old and the New Testaments.

Such an approach to theory was utterly alien to Marx, Engels and Lenin. The founders of Marxism-Leninism saw their theoretical task not in remaining loyal to the letter of books written earlier, but in being loyal to the spirit of the scientific world outlook of the working class, in carefully analyzing changing reality, generalizing the new experiences gained in the struggle, and creatively solving the tasks that each new epoch puts on the agenda.

This is the attitude of the modern Marxists to the teaching of Marx, Engels and Lenin. For them, Marxism-Leninism is not only the collected works of the classics, and not only truths expressed by authorities decades ago, but also achievements of modern Marxist thought, which have stood the test of experience. This is the kind of Marxism we uphold.

Can one visualize the scientific theory of the working class today without the Declaration and Statement, without the conclusions drawn by the parties in their programmatic documents, without the truths that have emerged from the revolutionary battles of the past few years? To expunge all this from Marxism would be infinitely to impoverish it, to deprive it of the very thing which bears the imprint of the epoch and which is particularly important for the struggle of the working people. Our generation of Marxist-Leninists would be unworthy of their great teachers, were they not to do their duty to the working class in the field of theory.

This is precisely the premise the Marxist-Leninist parties proceeded from in working out the general line for the present.

The Chinese leaders have met at dagger-point the scientific generalization of the new phenomena of reality and the vast creative work done by the Communist parties to implement the principles of Marxism-Leninism. Having accused the fraternal parties of "revisionism", they counterposed to the general line of the Communist movement argumented in the 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement their own

"proposals with regard to the general line" in their letter of June 14, 1963. It is noteworthy that in the interpretation of the Chinese leaders, only the most general propositions of the Declaration and Statement, such as "the union of the proletarians of all countries", "the gradual attainment of full victory in the world proletarian revolution", etc., are in keeping with the general line. "This is, in our opinion," the letter pointed out, "the general line of the international Communist movement at the present stage."

One may well ask the Peking theoreticians: what has this to do with the present? Although all the said propositions are important, they apply to all epochs and call for concretization at each specific stage of history: how to bring about a union of the proletarians of all countries at the present stage, how to wage the most effective struggle against the imperialists in the given conditions, and how to struggle for the full victory of the world proletarian revolution today.

The Marxist-Leninist parties deemed it their main task to answer these concrete questions. Their answers constitute the political line of the Communist movement, its strategy and tactics. The Chinese leaders, on the other hand, under cover of general declarations and repeating universally known truths, reject every new thing that has been added to revolutionary theory by the collective experience of the fraternal parties. But the new evaluations and conclusions are more than just "pure" theory. They are a guide to action, a generalization of the new forms of the struggle of the working class movement, an argumentation of the new methods of waging an offensive against the positions of imperialism. Rejection of the new conclusions is not only evidence of theoretical stagnation, it also leads to idle talk and political inertia, to rejection of the new powerful levers that exist for the revolutionary transformation of the world.

The Communist Party of the Soviet Union was the first in the history of our movement to be faced with the task of all-out Communist construction. Naturally, the Party had to answer a number of new questions that arose at this stage, in particular those pertaining to the historical destinies of the state and the Party on the approaches to communism. The Chinese leaders, without taking the trouble to analyze the essence of the problems in question, hastened to anathemize the new theses advanced by our Party.

After the war, the Communist parties of the developed capitalist countries found themselves confronted with new conditions of struggle engendered by the aggravation of the general crisis of the capitalist system, by the defeats it had sustained in the peaceful competition with socialism, by the growth of state-monopoly trends, by the upsurge of the working class and democratic movement. It is only natural that these parties paid particular attention to evolving new tactics in order to make more effective use of the new possiblities to defend the interests of the working people, fight the monopolies and bring the masses nearer to the socialist revolution.

The Chinese leadership again chose to close its eyes to the problems posed by life, as is particularly evident from the article published in Hungchi and Jenminjihpao on March 31, this year; they preferred to cling dogmatically to quotations, taken out of context and presented in a distorted light, relating to a different epoch and different conditions.

Nor did they wish to see the new tasks facing the national-liberation movement and the peoples who had won political independence — the tasks of fighting for economic independence, overcoming century-old backwardness, and embarking on non-capitalist development. The Chinese leaders keep on reiterating that these peoples have, as before, to follow only the one road, namely, the road of continued armed struggle, although the Chinese leaders themselves fail to explain against whom this struggle should be waged today in such countries as Algeria, Mali, Ghana, and Burma, for example.

Many general problems, among them the problem of war and peace, have today emerged in a new light before the world Communist movement. Here too the Chinese leadership has preferred to resort to old quotations, and, posing as the "champion" of Marxism-Leninism, has launched an attack against the agreed position of the fraternal parties.

The CPC leaders try to cover up their break with Marxism-Leninism by referring to the history of the Communist movement; they draw parallels between the struggle Lenin and the Bolsheviks waged against the opportunists of the Second International and their own splitting activities in the world Communist movement. But again the Chinese leaders are treading on thin ice.

What aspect of the Second International's activities was it that Lenin so ruthlessly combated? What were the principal ideological and political points at issue between the Communists and social-reformists?

Lenin formulated the law of the uneven economic and political development of imperialism and drew the major conclusion as to the possibility of a break in the imperialist chain in one country. Adopting doctrinaire, dogmatic positions, the leaders of the Second International accused Lenin of departing from Marxism, attacking him with antiquated quotations.

After the victory of the Great October Socialist Revolution, Lenin and the Bolshevik Party led the people on to the building of socialism, advancing the thesis that the complete victory of socialism in one country was possible, thereby making a historic contribution to revolutionary thought. This conclusion of Lenin's was also opposed with dogmatic stubbornness by the leaders of the Second International.

Lenin's analysis of imperialism and its contradictions, his plan for the building of socialism and all his tremendous contribution to the treasury of Marxist thought was viewed by the opportunist leaders of the Second International as an encroachment on Marxism. Actually, it was exactly the struggle against the fossilization of theory, for a creative Marxism constantly enriched by revolutionary practice, that lay at the root of the bitter ideological battles which Lenin waged against Bernstein, Kautsky and other leaders of the Second International.

Hence, if one is to look for an analogy between the present struggle launched by the Chinese leadership within the ranks of the Communist movement and Lenin's struggle against the "orthodox-minded" of the Second International, we shall see that this analogy is by no means favourable for the CPC leaders. It is not Lenin they resemble by any means. On the contrary, they are aping the spiritual fathers of the Right-wing Socialists of today. Like the latter, they, too, proceed through ossification of Marxism to its distortion, to attempts to substitute for it home-baked "theories" that undermine the development of the revolutionary process.

A closer examination of the theoretical concepts advocated by the Chinese leaders, a thoughtful analysis of their ideological evolution of late will compel the conclusion that the path the Chinese leadership is following is one of flagrant distortion of Marxism-Leninism and revision of its fundamental principles.

The revisisionist essence of the positions adopted by the Chinese leaders is particularly manifest in their revaluation of that vital point of Marxist-Leninist theory, the question of the historic mission of the proletariat and its place in the world-wide emancipatory process.

The CPC leaders are, in effect, discarding the Marxist-Leninist thesis concerning the world-historic role of the working class in the revolutionary transformation of the world, a thesis that has been verified by the experience of decades of class struggle. The Chinese leaders attack this cardinal tenet of revolutionary theory from different angles, but with the sole aim of proving that the hegemony in the world revolutionary process is shifting, or has already shifted, from the working class to the social strata that comprise the mass base of the national-liberation movement, namely, the peasantry, the radical intelligentsia and the national bourgeoisie. Marxist-Leninists greatly value the revolutionary potential of the peasantry. It was the peasantry who, after they started making history, become the staunchest ally of the international working-class movement in its struggle against imperialism. However, the Chinese leaders are not speaking of this obvious fact, they are advocating a regrouping of revolutionary forces which dispenses with the vanguard role of the international working class.

This is precisely the purpose of Peking's "theory" that the zone of the national-liberation movement, upon which presumably the destinies of the world socialist revolution now wholly depend, has allegedly become the main centre of all world contradictions. The Chinese theoreticians are trying to invoke Lenin's authority to back up this point. But actually they are going against Lenin's ideas. Because when Lenin spoke of the great significance of the national-liberation movement, he did not oppose it to the revolutionary struggle of the proletariat; on the contrary, he proved that there existed an unbreakable alliance between these two forces and laid particular emphasis on the role and importance of the labor movement in all revolutionary processes.

But what is Peking doing? It is peddling the notion that today the peasantry has supposedly become the most consistent revolutionary force. As for the world working class, in the opinion of the theoreticians acting as apologists for the Chinese leadership, it has been "infected" with social-reformism and has thus relinquished its revolutionary birth-right.

Such reasoning may flatter the egos of certain immature, nationalistically-minded, petty-bourgeois politicians. But what can it have in common with Marxism-Leninism?

The Peking leaders are shouting from the house-tops not only about the "special" role which the national-liberation movement plays in the world proletarian revolution. At the same time they are trying in every way to minimize the revolutionary role of the world working class and its offsping, the socialist system.

Such is the idea behind all the talk about it being impermissible to attach decisive significance to the competition between world socialism and world capitalism, since, allegedly, such an attitude is nothing but "revisionism". Such also is the idea behind the charges of "social reformism" levelled against the Communist parties of the developed capitalist countries. To all intents and purposes the Chinese leaders completely discount the working-class movement in these countries and refuse to recognize its revolutionary force, its revolutionary potentialities and world-historic mission of the working class posing as the sole defenders of the revolutionary theory of that class!

Just how far the new-fangled "orthodoxists" go in their revision of Marxism is shown by the fact that the Chinese leaders do not stop at distorting the ultimate goal of the revolutionary struggle of the working class, its socialist ideal.

The pronouncements of the CPC leaders and their political activities give us a clue to a type of society which is presented as a model socialist society but which in reality contradicts the basic principles of Marxist-Leninist theory and the proletarian character of socalism.

The men in Peking do not consider a high level of industrial development to be an inalienable feature of socialism. Improvement of the living standards of the working people is declared unnecessary indeed dangerous, as it allegedly, causes "bourgeois degeneration". The principles of socialist democracy are constantly ignored both in theory and practice. The very concept of socialist democracy is rarely met with in the lengthy materials Peking publishes. Instead, the Chinese leaders make a fetish of violence and cultivate the personality cult which is alien to the very nature of the dictatorship of the proletariat and socialism. They are "militarizing" every aspect of life and look upon the masses as a "blank sheet of paper" (to quote Mao Tse-tung) on which the leader may "write" what he pleases.

The Chinese leaders' idea of socialism is most unusual — they visualize it as a society without a developed industry, without democracy, legality, or respect for the rights of the individual, a society perpetuating the poverty and privations of the working masses. But is this the "socialism" that Marxist-Leninist theory offers? Is this the socialism millions of working people all over the world are fighting for? Not for nothing do the CPC leaders defile the banner of humanism borne aloft by the Marxist-Leninist parties. They have no use for it, for they no longer visualize socialism as a society created for the working man, in the name of his happiness.

The socialist revolution, Lenin pointed out, replaces private ownership of the means of production by public ownership and introduces the planned organization of social production to ensure the well-being and all-round development of all the members of society. Socialism is built in the name of the people, for the good of the people.

Whatever the Chinese leaders may say, however they may extol themselves, the real facts refute their claims to the role of law-givers, in Marxism. These facts convincingly testify to the very opposite: the Chinese version of Marxism-Leninism which underlies the ideological and theoretical platform of the Chinese leadership is nothing but betrayal of the basic principles of the international revolutionary theory accepted by Communists in all countries, betrayal of the great teaching of Marx, Engels, and Lenin.

THE POLITICAL AIMS BEHIND THE CHINESE LEADERS' THEORETICAL CONCEPTS*

The first thing that strikes the eye in analyzing the concepts of the so-called "Sinified Marxism" is their contradictory nature, confusion and the rather curious tangle of dogmatism and out-and-out revisionism, the utter inconsistency with which views are expressed, and, last but not least, the yawning gulf between the revolutionary bombast and the practical activities of the CPC leaders.

At first they announced the "great leap" and boasted of the sensational iron-and-steel and coal output. targets they had set in an attempt to solve in one swoop all the tasks of building up a modern industry. But having failed in industrialization, they proclaimed farming the "basis of the economy".

They first considered the people's Commune a ready-made "ladder to paradise", a form of transition to communism, totally oblivious of the fact that the appropriate material facilities and productive forces had to be created beforehand to effect such a transition. Then they advanced the contention that in general one cannot talk of building communism, before imperialism has been finally routed.

The constant swing-around in positions, the ideological and political scurrying to and fro of the Chinese leaders, distinctly reveal the petty-bourgeois nature of their outlook. The utterances of the Peking ideologists betray a lack of principles which has been elevated to a principle, a preparedness to put forward, or subscribe to, any thesis, provided it accords with the political directives of the CPC leaders. The entire development of the polemics in the Communist movement has shown that the Chinese leaders are not concerned in the slightest with questions of Marxist-Leninist theory, nor do they endeavour to ascertain the truth by honestly comparing positions and putting them to the test of practical activity. They use the polemics on problems of theory as a subsidiary means of camouflaging and vindicating their own particular political aims, as a tool in the struggle for these aims.

What, then, is the political implication of the CPC leadership's theoretical concepts?

*Pravda, May 12, 1964.

It is crystal-clear that the main purpose of their claim of being the only true Marxist-Leninists of today is to assert their own hegemony in the Communist movement and in the liberation movement as a whole.

The Chinese leaders are attempting to produce the impression that they started the polemics in the Communist movement and launched a political drive against the fraternal parties only because they are concerned most for the interests of the revolution and are the most relentless, staunchest fighters against imperialism.

But these claims can deceive nobody.

In this case, too, we must go by what is being done, not by what is being said. What the Chinese leaders are doing shows that they are not "impatient" revolutionaries or inordinately ardent fighters against imperialism. By raising a hue and cry about the "defense" of the dictatorship of the proletariat, they are attacking the CPSU, the Party which was the first to establish and develop the dictatorship of the proletariat. The Chinese leaders, in effect, arrive at the very same political position held in their time by the leaders of the Second International, who flatly denied the Marxist-Leninist theory of proletarian dictatorship. The Peking leaders simply love to fight their own inventions, views that they slanderously attribute to the fraternal parties; they are least of all concerned with the successes of the world socialist revolution and the anti-imperialist struggle. They do more than objectively disrupt and weaken the anti-imperialist revolutionary front in the face of the class enemy: their subjective intentions, the aims they are setting themselves, are becoming more and more dubious.

As recent developments have shown, the Peking leaders level the most vicious slanderous attacks against the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. It is now perfectly clear that they have spearheaded their ideological attack not against imperialism and colonialism, but against the world Communist movement, primarily the CPSU.

Peking propaganda has accused our Party of every single mortal sin. Moreover, not only all the norms of relations between fraternal parties are being trampled underfoot: elementary common-sense is being defied. The writers of the Peking articles are looking for simpletons who would believe them when they allege that the CPSU leadership is "aligning its actions with imperialism", seeking co-operation with the United States "to dominate the world", and is "regarding American imperialism its most loyal friend", when they allege that the CPSU leadership has ". . . given free reign to the capitalist forces in the Soviet Union".

Such ways of conducting "theoretical" polemics will hardly win the Chinese leaders any laurels.

But what interests us here is not moral principles in general, but the political aspect of the matter. It is perfectly obvious that such base slander can serve only one purpose, that of discrediting and defaming the CPSU, which the Peking splitters view as the main obstacle to the accomplishment of their hegemonistic plans.

Their attempts to dominate the international revolutionary movement at all costs, completely disregarding its real interests, and to subordinate it to their own egoistic interests have brought the Chinese leaders into conflict with the Marxist-Leninist parties, the real vanguard of the revolutionary forces. The hegemonistic plans of the CPC leaders have come up against an insurmountable barrier. The overwhelming majority of Communist parties have emphatically condemned their course of action.

When their way is barred, the Chinese leaders seek other methods to achieve hegemonistic ends. They are now staking their all on splitting the Communist movement, and establishing under their own aegis a special international bloc that would stand in opposition to the world Communist movement.

Never in the history of the working-class movement has talk about the purity of the great teaching of Marx and Lenin, been so cynically used to conceal aims so alien to its ideals.

The auxiliary role which the theorizing of the Peking splitters plays in the furtherance of their political ends is distinctly revealed also in their approach to problems of the national-liberation movement. Again pseudo-revolutionary slogans and pseudo-theoretical postulates are used merely to conceal narrow nationalist political aims.

The Peking theoreticians claim that the "hub" of all present-day contradictions has shifted to the "zone of the three A's"—Asia, Africa and Latin America; this claim serves very definite political aims: speculating with this proposition the Chinese splitters are trying to win the sympathy of the peoples of the young national states, usurp the leadership of the national-liberation movement and place it in opposition to the socialist countries and the international proletariat.

When considerations of nationalistic policy so demand, the Chinese leaders do not hesitate to brush aside both their revolutionary phrasemongering and their theoretical concepts. For example, they started a border conflict with India, a state pursuing a policy of non-alignment, accused it of aggression and of collaboration with U.S. imperialism, and at once began to court friendship with Pakistan, a state that is a member of the imperialist aggressive SEATO and CENTO blocs.

In the light of the Chinese leaders' latest practical moves on the world scene, one can readily see the true political purpose of their theory concerning a so-called "intermediary zone" between the socialist countries and the United States, the object of which is to justify the Chinese leadership's line of expanding co-operation with such imperialist countries as France, Japan, West Germany and Britain.

Our Party has no intention of replying in kind to the Chinese leaders' allegations that improvement of relations between the Soviet Union and the capitalist states is "collusion with the imperialists" and "a departure from the class struggle." Our Party regards improvement of economic and other relations between the socialist and capitalist states as something quite normal, as the practical embodiment of the principles of peaceful coexistence.

The whole point, however, is that the CPR is establishing closer contacts with a number of imperialist powers not in pursuance of a common policy of peaceful coexistence but in a situation where China is co-operating less and less with the socialist countries, where the Chinese leaders are isolating themselves from the socialist camp, in the conditions of the ideological and political war that the Peking splitters have declared on the Communist movement. In a situation such as this, instead of taking advantage of the contradictions between the imperialists to promote the interests of socialism, the CPC leadership is itself becoming a pawn in the political game and intrigues which the imperialist powers are engaged in with the object of weakening the Communist movement and the positions of socialism.

What is the net result of all this?

An analysis of Peking's theoretical concepts and, even more so, a comparison of these concepts and the actions of the Chinese leaders leave not the slightest doubt that what we have to deal with is an artificially constructed system of concepts devised specially to serve definite political aims. Peking needs this set of theoretical concepts to "substantiate" and "justify" the great-power nationalistic policy of the Chinese leaders, to promote their claims to hegemony, to split the world liberation movement, and to bring under the aegis of Peking a definite type of element both inside and outside the Communist movement.

The dissenting theoretical stand taken by the Chinese leaders bears the obvious stamp of these unsavoury aims — aims which are inimical to the interests of the working class and the cause of communism.

To win a following they orient their theoretical concepts on the Left-wing adventuristic elements of the liberation movement, on incorrigible doctrinaires upon whom the cleansing spirit of the 20th Congress of the CPSU has had no effect and who nostalgically yearn for the old methods of leadership characteristic of the time of the personality cult, and, finally, on the chauvinistic, and even racialist, moods of people to whom the ideals of proletarian internationalism are alien.

Hence the eclecticism of the Chinese leadership's theoretical platform. And hence, too, the gulf between theory and practice, the inconsistent and contradictory nature of their outlook.

It is not fortuitous, of course, that the Chinese splitters have slipped into Left-wing opportunism. There was much that inclined them for this, including the pressure of petty-bourgeois anarchy, an inadequate proletarian ideological and political schooling, certain traditions and certain peculiar historical features. However, one cannot fail to see that in choosing a position most advantageous for attacking the world Communist movement, the CPC leaders preferred Left-wing opportunism also because they saw the complete ideological bankruptcy of Right-wing opportunism. They believed "Leftist" pseudo-revolutionary phrase-mongering to be a more reliable means of justifying the failures of their domestic social-economic experiments. This "Leftist" pseudo-revolutionary phrase-mongering is designed also to win for their egoistic policy those working folk who rise to the revolutionary struggle on the crest of the wave of the great historical developments of today, but whose ideological and political training is still inadequate.

In the person of the Chinese leaders the international Communist movement is faced with a trend that is petty-bourgeois in social roots, nationalistic in political aims and Left-wing opportunist — with a goodly dose of Trotskyism added — in ideology.

* * *

By working hard to thrust on the Communist movement their own erroneous views and attitudes that are leading towards a split, the CPC leaders have themselves produced a situation where a resolute struggle against their ideological and political platform has become the way to unity. Explaining the principles of Marxism-Leninism and the general line of the Communist movement and exposing the theoretical distortions, demagogy and slander has become a vital and indispensable task of defending creative Marxism and, consequently, of fighting for the ideological unity of our movement.

At the same time Marxist-Leninists proceed from the premise that it is primarily social practice that shows us which theory is right and which is wrong.

The editorial in Jenminjihpao and Hungchi of March 31 ends with a chapter entitled "Our Hopes." What are the Chinese leaders' hopes? It appears they hope for the unconditional ideological surrender of all who do not share their views, for success in imposing their policy on other parties by blackmail, slander and threats.

The Marxist-Leninist parties have a different view of the prospects and upshot of the differences in our movement. They will not vie with the Chinese leaders in blackmail, slander and invective and are not demanding ideological surrender.

Our confidence in the ultimate restoration and consolidation of the unity of the Communist movement on the principles of Marxism-Leninism derives from quite different sources.

Consistently pursuing their general line, the Communist parties are demonstrating its validity and correctness. They are demonstrating this by scoring success after success in building socialism and communism, developing the economy and culture of the new society, improving democracy and the welfare of the working people, and enhancing the might of the socialist world system. They are demonstrating this by winning new victories in the struggle the working class and all the working people in the capitalist countries are waging against the monopolies, to achieve democracy and pave the way for a revolutionary transition to socialism. They are demonstrating this by organizing the victorious struggle of the oppressed peoples for freedom and independence and helping them to find the best paths of economic and social progress. They are demonstrating this by successfully battling for peace and peaceful coexistence. They are demonstrating this by developing internationalist relations of solidarity, equality and comradely assistance between all forces of the world Communist and liberation movement.

Every success achieved and every victory won along this road is one more contribution to the struggle for unity in the Communist movement, meaning also ideological unity, for the triumph of creative Marxism-Leninism. Social practice, the actual course of developments, will increasingly show the ideological poverty of the splitters and the subjectivist and adventuristic character of their policy. As for all those who have been deluded, because of political immaturity and inexperience, to take the wrong attitude, they will be surely brought back to the correct path by all the Communist parties achieve in practice in carrying forward the Leninist general line.

The Communist movement rejects the position of the Chinese leaders, who have spearheaded their struggle not against imperialism but against the fraternal parties which do not subscribe to their views and do not want to yield to their exhortations.

The Marxist-Leninist parties always remember that the main task history has placed on the Communists is to battle against imperialism, for peace, national independence and democracy, for socialism. It is in the vital interests of this struggle to have inviolable unity between the socialist countries, and between all Communists of the world. Holding high the banner of creative Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism, the world Communist movement will foil the designs of the splitters and rally all revolutionary forces still more firmly together.

PLENARY MEETING, CENTRAL COMMITTEE COMMUNIST PARTY OF AUSTRIA

REPORT* BY COMRADE FRANZ MUHRI, MAY 6, 1964

Our Party's views on the situation in the international Communist movement, on the ideological and political differences with the Communist Party of China, were stated in detail at the Plenary meeting of our Central Committee held on August 22, 1963, and in the autumn these problems were discussed throughout the Party. Later developments were taken up at the January 27-28 plenary meeting of the CC. Since then, however, it has become necessary to make a more detailed examination of the situation in the world Communist movement.

The salient new development is that in recent months the Chinese comrades have begun openly pursuing, on both the "theoretical" and the practical plane, a line aimed at a split, which they claim is inevitable, in the Communist parties, a line aimed at disrupting the international Communist movement. Such aggravation of the differences contains the threat of a split in the socialist camp as well.

Following the repeated proposals that the public polemic be discontinued, made by the Communist Party of the Soviet Union to the Chinese comrades on October 25 and November 7, 1963, in two speeches by Comrade Khrushchov which were published in the press, the CC, CPSU once again addressed a letter to the CC, CPC on November 29, 1963. The tone of this letter was restrained and friendly.

The CC, CPSU suggested to the Chinese comrades that, the ideological and political differences notwithstanding, steps be taken without delay to improve the relations between the two Parties and countries. Agreement to increase trade between the two states was envisaged as one such step. Further, reopening of the negotiations on deliveries to China of industrial plant from the beginning of 1964, which were postponed on China's request for two years in 1962, was suggested as another. A suggestion was made to expand technical co-operation, and it was offered, if China wished it, to send Soviet specialists for work in that country. The letter also raised the question of settling border conflicts between the Soviet Union and China by precise demarcation of the frontier in disputed areas.

Finally, the CC, CPSU once again urged that the open polemics be discontinued, without, however, terminating the exchange of views on questions of principle. On the contrary, such exchange should be continued through mutual consultation, negotiations, etc. The CPSU voiced the opinion that such steps to improve the relations between the two Parties and countries could create a favorable climate for preparations for an international meeting of the Communist parties.

*Abridged from Volksstimme, May 13, 1964.

To underscore its good will, the CPSU refrained from public debate with the Communist Party of China even before this message was sent.

THE CPC IS STEERING TOWARDS A SPLIT

Instead of replying to this letter, the CPC stepped up the public polemic. Its sallies reached a new peak in a long article published in Jenminjihpao on February 4, 1964.

This article—the "seventh reply" as it was called—treats of the problem of unity or split in the international Communist movement. "What does the history of the development of the international Communist movement demonstrate?" the article reads. "First, it demonstrates that like everything else, the international working-class movement tends to divide itself in two. The class struggle between the proletariat and the bourgeoisie is inevitably reflected in the Communist ranks. It is inevitable that opportunism of one kind or another should arise in the course of the development of the Communist movement, that opportunists should engage in anti-Marxist-Leninist splitting activities and that Marxist-Leninists should wage struggles against opportunism and splittism. . . .

"This is exactly what happened. The Communist League, the First International and Second International, all of which were originally unified, divided in two in the course of their development and became two conflicting parts. Each time the international struggle against opportunism and splittism carried the international working-class movement forward to a new stage and enabled it to forge a firmer and broader unity on a new basis. The victory of the October Revolution and the founding of the Third International were the greatest achievements in the struggle against the Second International's revisionism and splittism.

"Unity, struggle or even splits, and a new unity on a new basis—such is the dialectics of the development of the international working-class movement."

The Chinese comrades thus seek theoretically to prove that a split in the world Communist movement and in the various Communist parties is in the natural order of things. They schematically apply their completely one-sided and erroneous interpretation of the preceding period in history to the present time, to the contemporary world Communist movement, just as if no changes had ever taken place. The above-mentioned article completely lacks a creative analysis of the situation today. No qualitative distinction is drawn between Social Democracy and the Second International at the turn of the century, on the one hand, and the Communist parties and the international Communist movement of today, on the other. According to this fatalistic concept, the international Communist movement has nothing but a split to look forward to. The Chinese comrades completely ignore the main problem of the west-European working-class movement—the division into the Social Democratic and Communist trends. The same applies to the persistent effort the Communists are exerting to overcome this division, to defeat reformism in the working-class movement. The Chinese comrades turn away from this decisive task and concentrate their attacks on the Communist parties instead. In reality the pseudo-revolutionary line of the Chinese leaders tends to weaken the struggle against reformism and opportunism.

Secondly, the article declares that the CPSU can no longer be considered to be in the van of the world Communist movement. "Marx and Engels pointed out," it says, "that the trade union movement in Britain and the political struggle of the French working class were successively in the van of the international proletarian movement. After the defeat of the Paris Commune, Engels said that 'the German workers have for the moment been placed in the vanguard of the proletarian struggle' . . . At the beginning of the 20th century the Russian working class, standing at the forefront of the international proletarian movement, won victory in the proletarian revolution for the first time in history. . . . By embarking on the path of revisionism and splittism, the leaders of the CPSU automatically forfeited the position of 'head' in the international Communist movement."

The question arises: what is the aim pursued in presenting the issue in this light? The only conclusion we can draw is that the Chinese leaders are clearly striving to establish their hegemony in the world Communist movement.

Under these circumstances, when the Chinese comrades are directing their main fire against the Soviet state and the fraternal Communist Party of the Soviet Union in order to undermine solidarity with the first socialist country, we Austrian Communists declare that, as before, we regard the Soviet Union and the glorious Party of Lenin as the main bulwark of strength of the international Communist movement and all those who are fighting for peace, democracy, independence and socialism. We likewise resolutely repudiate the attacks levelled against Comrade Khrushchov, whose tireless work for peace and to develop socialist democracy and the socialist economy is of signal importance not only for the Soviet Union but for the entire international working-class and liberation movement as well. Comrade Khrushchov is rightfully accorded growing respect, recognition and trust by the peoples, the Austrian workers and other working people included.

Thirdly, in their "seventh reply" the Communist Party of China openly declares that the Chinese comrades are rendering every support to factional and splinter groups in the various countries and parties. "In the international Communist movement, we have contacts with revisionists," it says, "why then can we not have contacts with Marxist-Leninists? The CPSU leaders describe our support for Marxist-Leninists in other countries as a divisive act. In our opinion, it's simply a proletarian internationalist obligation which it is our duty to discharge." Here we have a practical conclusion from the above-mentioned thesis of the Chinese comrades that a split is allegedly necessary, inevitable and even useful.

The Communist Party of China, like the Albanian Party of Labor, is now investing a great deal of effort and money in organizing and supporting disruptive activity.

The CPC leaders are stubbornly pursuing a policy of setting up new "Communist parties" consisting of splinter groups and factions or declaring such groups to be parties. The object is to build up a new bloc under their leadership, counterposed to the international Communist movement. They lay claim to the right to be the sole judges of which countries are socialist and which are not, which parties are Communist and which are not, which political line is the correct one and which erroneous.

Fourthly, the Chinese comrades state their views in the above-mentioned article also on the question of terminating the public polemic. Although they formerly urged on repeated occasions that the open debate be ended, they now take the opposite view. They write: "These major differences of principle cannot be solved in a fundamental way by a cessation of the public debate. On the contrary, only through public debate, setting forth the facts and reasoning things out, will it be possible to clarify matters, distinguish right from wrong, and safeguard and strengthen the unity of the international Communist movement on the basis of Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism. Marxism-Leninism is a science, and science fears no debate. Anything which fears debate is no science."

We would like to ask the Chinese comrades: what is there in common between scientific debate and your insults and lies about the leaders and policies of other Communist parties? What is there in common between scientific debate and your intensive disruptive and factional activities, between science and your line which is aimed at splitting the international Communist movement?

The so-called "seventh reply" essentially signifies aggravation of the polemic and rejection of the positive proposals put forward by the CPSU on November 29, 1963.

NEW EFFORT FOR UNITY

In this situation the CC, CPSU sent a letter to the fraternal parties on February 12, 1964, pointing out that the CPC still had not replied to its November 29 message and that the Chinese comrades were intensively continuing the open polemic as well as their disruptive activities. The Soviet comrades also informed us in this letter that they would state their views at a plenary meeting of their Central Committee in mid-February and would subsequently publish the report delivered at this meeting as well as its resolution, thereby coming out once again in public debate. Under the circumstances, the letter further stated, the CPSU considered it essential to take a resolute stand against the splitters and to reconsider the question of convening an international meeting of Communist parties. Previously, too, the CPSU and many other parties were for the convocation of such a meeting in principle, but did not press the matter, believing that it should be preceded by thorough preparation so as to create the prerequisites for the achievement of unity. Now, however, the real aims of the Communist Party of China had become perfectly clear. It was out to gain time, to put off the international meeting, in order to deepen the rift and to set up factions, groups and new "parties" in as many countries as possible. Therefore, the letter said, the CPSU considered it inexpedient to put off the international meeting any longer.

In this situation the Central Committee of the Rumanian Workers' Party addressed a letter on February 14 to the CC, CPSU asking that the materials of the February plenum be not published for the time being. The Rumanian Party proposed to undertake one more attempt at reconciliation. The Rumanian Party informed us that it had sent a letter on February 14 to the CPC, pointing out, with reference to the Chinese comrades' article of February 4, 1964, that such exacerbation of the polemic would inevitably lead to a split in the Communist movement. The Rumanian Party urged the CPC to refrain from public polemics and offered to send a Rumanian Party delegation to Peking.

To this Rumanian initiative, which was supported by other fraternal parties, the CC, CPSU replied at once that in view of this attempt to mediate it would not publish its plenum documents. But if after the steps taken by the Rumanian comrades the CPC did not stop the public polemic, the reply stated further, the CPSU would be compelled to reconsider the matter.

On February 17 the CPC informed the Rumanian comrades that it was ready to receive on March 1 a delegation empowered to conduct talks and that it would refrain for the time being from open polemics, which it did. At the same time, other fraternal parties likewise wrote to the CPC urging it to end the public debate.

On February 19 our Party wrote to the CC, CPC urging the Chinese comrades to put a stop to the public debate which was causing serious harm to the entire world Communist movement and giving rise to a grave threat of a split; this, however, did not exclude a businesslike discussion of problems. We published the text of this letter in Volksstimme on April 4.

The Chinese comrades have not answered us to this day. They merely handed to a representative of our Central Committee, through their Embassy in Prague, copies of letters exchanged by the CPSU and CPC with which we already were acquainted.

It was only on February 29, 1964, when the Rumanian delegation left for Peking, that the CC, CPC replied to the CC, CPSU letter of November 29, 1963. The Chinese letter dealt with the proposals of the CPSU point by point.

In regard to the proposal to end the public polemic, the Chinese letter stated that for this bilateral and multi-lateral talks and the conclusion of a corresponding agreement were essential, since the CPC had not yet replied to many of what it called attacks by the CPSU and other Communist parties. The CPC also expressed the view that the proposed meeting of Communist and Workers' parties should be properly prepared, and to this end it suggested reopening bilateral talks between representatives of the CPSU and the CPC between October 10 and 25 this year. Following these talks a committee consisting of representatives of 17 fraternal parties (the 13 parties of the socialist countries and the Indonesian, Japanese, Italian and French praties) could begin preparations for the meeting. Such a committee would thus include the representatives of a number of Communist parties close to the CPC.

The time schedule proposed by the Chinese comrades for the preparatory work clearly shows that they are only too eager to put off the meeting so as to gain as much time as possible.

The CC, CPSU replied to the Chinese letter at once, on March 7, when the Rumanian Party delegation was still in Peking. Once again the need to end the public polemic was stressed. The CPSU accepted the idea of bilateral negotiations and proposed that they be held in May 1964. The Soviet comrades likewise agreed that they be held in May 1964. The Soviet comrades likewise agreed that a committee be set up to prepare the international meeting, but suggested that its composition be the same as during the preparations for the international meeting of 1960, when it was made up of the representatives of 26 fraternal parties. It was suggested that the committee meet in June-July, so that the international meeting could be held in the autumn. The CPC replied to this letter only after the plenum with a virtual rejection of these proposals.

The results of the talks the delegation of the Rumanian fraternal Party had early in March with the Chinese leaders in Peking can be seen from the statement published by the Rumanian Workers' Party. The Rumanian comrades stated that they had considered it their main purpose to bring the public debate to an immediate termination. The Chinese comrades, however, had replied that this could be done only if the conditions were agreed upon in the course of bilateral or multilateral talks. Until such agreement, and even while the negotiations were going on, the polemics should be continued. The Rumanian comrades thus failed to persuade the Chinese leaders to desist.

On March 24, when its delegation had already returned from Peking, the Rumanian Party once again turned to the Soviet and Chinese parties in an attempt to stop the open debate.

On March 28 the Soviet comrades replied that they accepted the Rumanian proposal, although the CPSU under no circumstances could agree to the Chinese comrades' putting off their reply to this initiative indefinitely while continuing to assail the CPSU and the world Communist movement in public.

THEIR REPLY: NEW ATTACKS AND ACCUSATIONS

To this day the Chinese comrades have not replied to the Rumanian Party's letter of March 25. Instead, they published on March 31 another long article, the so-called "eighth reply" to the open letter of the CC, CPSU of July 14, 1963. This article contained particularly vicious attacks and accusations.

The article challenges the orientation of the Communist parties on the possibility of peaceful transition to socialism. "Khrushchov maintains," it says, "that if the proletariat can win the majority in Parliament, this in itself will amount to the seizure of state power and the smashing of the bourgeois state machinery . . . Khrushchov holds that if the proletariat can win a stable majority in Parliament, this in itself will enable it to realize the socialist transformation of society . . . But abundant historical evidence indicates that the reactionary classes never give up power voluntarily. . . ."

This is a downright distortion of facts, for neither comrade Khrushchov nor the new Program of the CPSU, nor any document of any West-European Communist Party for that matter, seek to uphold such a line. Our program principles concerning Austria's road to socialism are in full agreement with the viewpoint of the Soviet and other fraternal parties; in this document we underscore the fact that peaceful transition to socialism is possible only through revolutionary class and mass struggle, in the course of which the positions won by the working class in Parliament should be utilized.

In their "eighth reply" the Chinese comrades for the first time call for revision of the agreed decisions of the 1957 and 1960 meetings of the Communist parties. In their opinion, the orientation on the possibility of peaceful transition to socialism but forward in both documents should be re-examined. I quote: "We hold that in the interests of the revolutionary cause of the international proletariat and in order to prevent the revisionists from misusing these programmatic documents of the fraternal parties, it is necessary to amend the formulation of the question in the Declaration and the Statement through joint consultation of Communist and Workers' parties so as to conform to the revolutionary principles of Marxism-Leninism."

How far the Chinese comrades go in distorting the truth in this article can be seen from the following passage: ". . . Using the pretext of these very changes in postwar conditions, Khrushchov draws the conclusion that revolution must be opposed and repudiated, and he holds that as a result of the changes in the world balance of forces imperialism and reaction have changed their nature, the law of class struggle has changed, and the common road of the October Revolution and the Marxist-Leninist theory of proletarian revolution have become outmoded."

Where and when has Comrade Khrushchov, or any of the other leaders of the Communist parties against whom accusations have been levelled, defended such a viewpoint? The Chinese comrades cannot cite a single instance to prove their point.

A section of the article is devoted to assailing the internal development of the Soviet Union.

The article of March 31 marked a new culmination point in the attacks made by the CPC. We cannot but tell the Chinese comrades that such vilification of the Soviet Union plays directly into the hands of our class enemy by undermining the faith of the masses in socialism.

The Chinese comrades' "eighth reply" in effect amounted to a rejection of the new attempt made by the Rumanian comrades to end the public debate.

The day the Chinese article was published, the CC, CPSU informed the Rumanian Party that the CPSU, which had refrained from public polemics since the autumn of 1963, was now compelled openly to state its views in reply to the CPC.

COMRADE SUSLOV'S SPEECH

On April 3 the CPSU published the speech delivered by Comrade Suslov at the February (1964) plenary meeting of the CC, CPSU and the resolution adopted by that meeting on February 15 on "The Struggle of the CPSU for the Unity of the World Communist Movement". We were in full agreement with the basic propositions set forth in this speech, which once again surveyed the principal issues on which there are differences with the CPC, and made a profound analysis of the present situation in the international Communist movement.

We thoroughly examined the substance of the political and ideological difference between the world Communist movement and the CPC at our plenary meetings in January and August last year and stated our views on this matter. Today, without going into the details, I should like briefly to summarize the issues at stake in the light of new developments.

1. The speech by Suslov correctly proceeds from the fact that the struggle beween world socialism and world imperialism constitutes the main content of our time and that the socialist world system is the main bulwark of all the revolutionary forces of the day. Contrary to this view, the Chinese comrades, going against the agreed decisions of 1957 and 1960, hold that the decisive factor of world development is the national-liberation movement in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

While the overwhelming majority of the Communist parties adhere to the viewpoint, recorded in the 1957 and 1960 decisions, that the socialist countries influence international development above all through their efforts in economic upbuilding, their successes in the economic competition between the two systems, by the force of example, the Chinese comrades increasingly refuse to draw on the advantages of international division of labor, of economic, scientific and technical co-operation between the socialist countries. They underestimate the role of the economic competition between the two systems and lay the emphasis, in a one-sided way, as Trotskyism did in its time, on the armed forms of national and international class struggle. Hence their campaign against peaceful coexistence, against orientation on peaceful transition to socialism.

2. The struggle for peaceful coexistence and the struggle for democracy, independence and socialism should be regarded as an integral whole. The Chinese comrades counterpose these two sides of the single world revolutionary process to one another, describing, in defiance of the facts, the policy of peaceful coexistence as representing capitulation to imperialism. They fail to see the nature of nuclear war and the new opportunities to fight for peace which are opening to the peoples in our time. The striving of the Chinese leaders to gain possession of nuclear weapons or to launch the manufacture of their own nuclear bomb in effect plays into the hands of the West-German and Japanese imperialists, who are reaching out for nuclear armaments.

3. The Chinese leaders are pursuing a policy aimed at isolating the national-liberation movement from the Soviet Union and the West-

European working-class movement. Moreover, in doing so they draw on nationalistic and race prejudices. This runs counter to the thesis accepted by the world Communist movement that the socialist world system, the international working-class movement and the national-liberation movement constitute an integral anti-imperialist force.

The Chinese comrades criticize the Communist parties on the grounds that the struggle for peaceful co-existence and disarmament allegedly prejudice the interests of the national-liberation movement. Recently Chou En-lai, the Premier of the Chinese People's Republic, toured Asia and Africa. In nearly all the countries he visited he put his signature to a joint communique recognizing the need for international detente, peaceful settlement of conflicts without the use of force, and disarmament, i.e., peaceful coexistence. It may be asked: what is it that should be taken seriously—the Chinese leaders' criticism of the Communist parties, or the statements they sign in support of peaceful coexistence?

4. The Chinese leaders have long attacked the new Program of the CPSU, the entire home policy of the Soviet Union, and the orientation on the deepening of socialist democracy in the course of the building of communism. Now they openly say that the Soviet Union is returning to capitalism.

The declarations of the Chinese comrades elevate the use of violence to an absolute law and ignore the need to strengthen democracy. More than that, they accuse other fraternal parties of revisionism precisely on the grounds that these parties aim at extending democracy: in the Soviet Union and other socialist countries at strengthening socialist democracy, and in the capitalist countries, at the regeneration of democracy through restricting the power of the big capitalists. Precisely this orientation on promoting democracy is the basic issue in our discussions with the Socialists and in working for unity of action among all democratic forces.

Our task today consists not so much in convincing the Socialists that we Communists are for the dictatorship of the proletariat. The decisive, and far more difficult, task which we must carry out is to prove that we want to achieve a new and higher degree of democracy, that communism and democracy are not mutually exclusive.

5. The Chinese leaders are increasingly concentrating their attacks not against imperialism but against the world Communist movement, in particular against the Soviet Union, the CPSU and Comrade Khrushchov personally. They are openly steering a course towards a split in the world Communist movement and in the various parties, towards the creation of factions; they are out to organize a bloc of splitters under the leadership of the CPC.

FOR THE RESTORATION AND CONSOLIDATION OF UNITY

Rejecting the erroneous and harmful views and disruptive activities of the Chinese leaders and urging the termination of the public debate in its present form, we reaffirm the thesis set forth in our letter of February 19, 1964, to the CC, CPC: "Differences and disagreements between Communist parties should be cleared up through mutual consultations and closed meetings, or solved in the course of events, which does not exclude businesslike discussion of problems."

As regards the attitude of our Party towards the convocation of an international meeting, we believe that such a meeting would be useful provided it is thoroughly prepared through consultations between parties with a view to achieving maximum unity in the international Communist movement.

Precisely because our enemies speak of a crisis of world communism, we must not lose sight of the fact that the contradictions and differences in the world Communist movement emerged on the basis of its growth and momentous achievements. Although we are seriously disturbed by the present situation in the Communist movement, we share the view which was voiced in Comrade Suslov's speech at the February plenary meeting of the CC, CPSU in the following words: "The facts show that a grim and, evidently, long struggle lies ahead for the strengthening of the unity of all the socialist forces, for friendship and co-operation between the Soviet and Chinese peoples. . . . The CC, CPSU is certain that no matter how great the difficulties experienced by the world Communist movement, that movement will be strong enough to surmount them and to cement its ranks in the struggle for the great Communist cause."

We can make our contribution to the creation of new unity above all by preserving, strengthening and consolidating the unity of our own Party.

INTERVIEW* WITH ARMAND NICOLAS, GENERAL SECRETARY, COMMUNIST PARTY OF MARTINIQUE

Question: In his speech at Fort de France General de Gaulle spoke at length about France's efforts, in particular on Martinique, and about the progress achieved there. What is the actual state of affairs, and in what way does de Gaulle's Antilles policy manifest itself?

Answer: The situation on Martinique is, of course, not as idyllic as it was described in the accounts of de Gaulle during his over-optimistic Latin-American tour. Coué's method, accompanied by the refrain "All is well, my Marquise" has virtually been made a government policy. The publicity regarding France's "achievements" was part of the show put on to "idealize" colonialism, to gild the emblem of departmentalization which has lost its luster, and to keep alive the legend about the good general, the "decolonizer".

In point of fact, however, Martinique presents an entirely different picture: it has no industry to speak of; the old economic structure has remained intact: the emphasis continues to be on agriculture which is geared for export of certain crops (sugar, bananas, pineapples), making the island dependent on France for its manufactured goods and foodstuffs; the production of sugar cane continues to be extremely limited (France has monopolized this branch of industry since the 18th century when the operation of sugar refineries on Martinique was prohibited by a Royal decree); the island still suffers from the non-equivalent trade exchange based on the Colonial Treaty.

FIVE CENTIMES FOR A KILOGRAM OF BANANAS

Practically all crops have been affected by a crisis. Bananas are sold at a loss (sometimes for 5 old francs a kilogram). This has led to the entire crop being destroyed (20,000 tons in 1961). The market for pineapples has been badly hit and is recovering with difficulty. The high sugar prices on the world market in 1963 did not benefit the island in the least. Retaining the old prices the colonialists made a deal which netted them a clear profit of more than 4,000 million francs. The deficit in the trade balance is steadily growing: in 1963 it reached 19,000 million old francs; our exports cover only 49.5 per cent of imports.

20,000 YOUNG PEOPLE UNEMPLOYED

The economic situation is having social repercussions. Poverty is widespread in the countryside: for eight months of the year 35,000 agricultural workers are without work. The small plantation owners

*L'Humanité, April 10, 1964.

(peasants) have to contend with innumerable difficulties and debts. The destruction caused by the hurricane "Edith" has further aggravated the situation. But it is the youth who have to bear the full brunt of unemployment: according to official figures 20,000 young people have no work. (Martinique's population is estimated at 300,000).

THE "BEKES" OWN 75 PER CENT OF THE LAND

In the past two years three of the island's 12 sugar refineries have been closed down, with the result that additional hundreds of workers have found themselves without jobs. The Government's solution of the unemployment problem is a typically colonialist one: on the pretext of giving the youth a professional training in France, it is organizing their mass emigration and thus depriving the island of its life-giving force. France's overseas departments have become the suppliers of unskilled labor power (domestic servants, waitresses, etc.).

In order to conceal the real situation the de Gaulle government ever since the big popular actions of December 1959, has been pursuing a policy of throwing dust into the eyes of the public. With this end in view the port is being enlarged, an air-port and motor highway are being built, the hillsides of Fort de France are being cleared of slums which will be replaced by several new buildings. Such are the spectacular "achievements", which are primarily in the sphere of commercial undertakings and which will ultimately make for still greater colonial plunder.

The government has blazoned about its "agraraian reform". This "reform" in effect consists of several hundreds of hectares being purchased from the big landowners at a high price and then resold to peasants who in order to buy the land get into debt for the rest of their lives. This "reform" has not hurt the interests of the "békés", (the descendants of the slaveholders) who continue to control 75 per cent of the land.

There has been much talk about "plans" and "industrialization". After thunderous fulminations against the Communists, who showed that industrialization was feasible, official circles finally, in 1960, "discovered" the advantages of industrialization. But to date the only "achievement" in this sphere has been the project to build an industrial zone in Lamentin.

There has also been a lot of talk about social achievements, but these have not made things easier for the tens of thousands of unemployed. On the other hand, not a word has been said about the fact that the Government has been compelled to make some concessions under pressure of the masses. Beginning with 1960, the powerful strikes that swept the island, some of them bloody ones (3 killed and 25 wounded in Lamantin in 1961), have yielded positive results. It should also be stressed that the Government made concessions under pressure of the movement for autonomy. The Government's so-called achievements are therefore actually the result of the struggle waged by the people of Martinique. The real purpose of the Government's policy of throwing dust into the eyes is to prevent the autonomy movement gaining ground, to establish its alibi in the eyes of world public opinion.

I might also note that in our so-called "department enjoying equal rights", discrimination in the sphere of wages, social benefits, etc., and a state of emergency is a common practice (under the decree of October 15, 1960 prefects have the right to deport to France "any official whose behavior is likely to disturb public order".

The Government's concessions are accompanied by repressions against the anti-colonial forces, and in particular against the Martinique Communist Party (the Party's weekly organ Justice was banned fourteen times in the past three years; Communists are dismissed from their jobs, Party functionaries are arrested, etc.). Everybody still remembers the arrest of the twelve young people as a result of a veritable colonialist conspiracy. The police network is steadily being extended: millions are being spent on the construction of huge police stations. (What price "social achievements"!)

Finally, I might note that the rigging of elections to ensure the election of politicians loyal to the colonial power has been practically legalized. French public opinion should know that the "yes-men" do not represent the Martinique population.

Such is the real state of affairs on Martinique today. It hardly fits in with the description of the islands a a "paradise" in the period of "departmentalization" and de Gaulle colonialism.

DISTINCTIVE CHARACTER OF PEOPLE OF MARTINIQUE

Question: The head of the state particularly stressed the French character of Martinique and its people. What do you think about this?

Answer: The President's statement to this effect is clearly intended to conceal the colonial regime on Martinique on the assumption that Martinique is France and that the island's people are French. The conclusion is therefore drawn that there is no need for "decolonization".

It would be futile to deny, of course, that three centuries of "French presence" including a century of the policy of assimilation, have left their imprint on our people. It goes without saying that our people have the greatest admiration for French progressive culture and for the democratic France as symbolized by the ideals of the 1789 revolution, the anti-slave movement of 1848 and the Popular Front of 1936. History has closely linked the democratic forces of France with the people of Martinique.

But the fact remains that our people has its own distinctive character which has been shaped by its own particular historical evolution (two centuries of slavery), ethnic composition, geographic position, etc. A sense of national consciousness, of the distinctive character of its people is developing in the new generation.

MARTINIQUE IS MOVING IN STEP WITH THE TIMES

Question: Please tell us about the aspirations of the people of Martinique and the policy of the Martinique Communist Party.

Answer: Martinique is beginning to move in step with the times. The policy of assimilation has met with failure everywhere. The world is now swept by a powerful national liberation movement. It has spread to even the smallest countries, the "specks of dust" as General de Gaulle scornfully remarked. Nobody can halt this process. Several Antilles islands (Jamaica, Trinidad) have won their independence. The Cuban socialist revolution has by its example shown the way to the rest of Latin America. All this has naturally made a deep impact on our island. Our people, like all other peoples, want to be the masters of their own destiny, that is, want to conduct their own affairs. The Martinique Communist Party was the first to voice these aspiartions of the people. To this end it has advanced a program of demands in keeping with the specific conditions of Martinique. This program will make it possible to achieve the broadest unity of all sections of the population, to discard all subjectivism, all tendencies to mechanically copy the experience of other peoples.

FRONT OF STRUGGLE FOR AUTONOMY

That is why we have advanced the slogan of autonomy, i.e., for the establishment of autonomous power (with a consultative assembly and an executive organ) which will conduct the affairs of Martinique and establish new relations with France, based on co-operation and association. Autonomy would enable the people of Martinique to carry out the tasks of the anti-imperialist revolution (agrarian reform, industrialization, annulment of the colonial treaty, democratization of institutions, development of our national culture).

To achieve this our Party has set as its paramount task to unite all social strata who are the victims of colonialism and to establish a front of struggle for autonomy, an alliance of parties, organizations and individuals who want to wage joint actions on the basis of a common program.

Some progress has been made in this direction. In December 1963 twenty-four organizations of the Antilles and Réunion signed a manifesto calling for autonomy. It was signed on behalf of Martinique by the Communist Party, the Progressive Party, the United Socialist Party, the General Confederation of Labor (the leading trade union organization), the Women's Union, the Communist Youth League, the Anti-Colonialist Youth Organization, and by other organizations of Martinique in France.

Thus, our Party's correct united front policy has led to significant results.

Question: What can you tell us about the struggle of your people?

Answer: The struggle of our people has reached new heights in recent times, thanks to the decisive role played by the Party. The trade unions have forged ahead. The numerous actions in defense of economic demands, have affected all sectors. The manifestations in defense of freedom, and for the liberation of the young people imprisoned in Fresnes are multiplying. The youth, and especially the young people of working-class and peasant families, are taking an active part in the struggle.

Our Party believes that there is every possibility in the present conditions to compel the government, through mass political action and by mobilizing the masses, to accept the demands of our people. We do not share the view of those who maintain that the solution lies through violent actions by a handful of "heroes". General de Gaulle's sharp refusal, incidentally, is bound to intensify this impatience. But we believe that any hasty action would seriously prejudice the anti-colonial movement. Recent events have proved the correctness of our general line. We should not, of course, underestimate the strong pressure brought to bear by the colonial apparatus, the difficulties caused by alienation due to the policy of assimilation.

Against this background our successes stand out in bolder relief. For example, at the recent cantonal elections (March 1964) which centered around the slogan "for or against autonomy", despite the fraud and the nomination of government-sponsored candidates, the parties standing for autonomy won half of the vote and secured the re-election of all their councillors (four Communists, three members of the Progressive Party). Our Party received 25 per cent of the vote.

THE STRUGGLE IS INTENSIFYING

The united front of the anti-colonial forces has won new victories. Such are the facts. They speak of the strength and scope of the movement for autonomy. The recent visit of the President cannot overshadow them.

The President has left and the sound and the fury have died down. The attempt to evade pressing problems by holding forth about some "great community" is nothing but an ostrich policy. The problems of Martinique remain. The contradictions inherent in its colonial society remain and they are growing sharper. The struggle of our people for freedom, progress and dignity will develop.

We are convinced that our just cause will triumph for it is supported by the progressive forces of the world, by the working class and democratic forces of France, headed by its glorious Communist Party.

We are certain that our fight in these conditions will compel the Government to satisfy our legitimate aspirations.

THE WAY FORWARD FOR CEYLON

SPEECH* BY PIETER KEUNEMAN, GENERAL SECRETARY, AT THE 7th CONGRESS OF THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF CEYLON, APRIL 16th, 1964.

The 6th National Congress set our Party two important tasks.

It enjoined us to build a united front of the Left Parties and through it the unity of the working class.

It called on us to build a united national front of the anti-imperialist, anti-feudal and democratic forces in which the united working-class movement would play the leading role.

Our 7th Congress meets at a time when one of these tasks—the formation of a united front of the Left Parties on a common program, has been achieved and when favorable conditions have begun to mature that can lead to the accomplishment of the other task as well.

There is no need to recapitulate the steps that the Central Committee took to ensure the formation of the United Left Front in August 1963. These are set out in the political resolution. The important role that our Party played in these developments has been publicly acknowledged and appreciated by leaders of the other Left Parties.

The formation of the ULF in August 1963 was an important victory for the line of the Party, for the working class and the progressive forces of Ceylon. To ensure this victory, our Central Committee had to struggle against both Right and Left deviations and to overcome the opposition and sabotage of the Sanmugathasan-Kumarasiri clique.

As in the past, the reactionary forces seek help from the disruptive and sectarian elements in the Left movement such as the Sanmugathasan clique and people of similar views.

At the same time when the reactionary Right-wing forces were preparing a coup d'etat for January 1962, these same disruptive and sectarian elements, under cover of ultra-Left slogans, sought to stampede the Left—fortunately without success—into agreeing to a general strike about the same time.

When the reactionary forces were working tooth and nail to prevent the formation of the ULF in 1963, they enlisted the support of these very same elements to slander, discredit, oppose and try to prevent the ULF agreement.

And now the same song is being sung by the same singers.

The UNP and the other reactionary forces use the slogan of "democracy" to prevent the unity of the progressive forces. The sectarians and splitters speak of the "Left turning Right" and of "betrayal of the proletarian revolution" in order to achieve the same purpose. They are two sides of the same coin.

*Forward, April 24, May 1, 1964.

Neither our Party nor the ULF need be diverted by all this. Current developments only help to confirm once again the correctness of the general line our Party has followed since our 4th Congress, when we routed a similar sectarian group and advanced the policy of building a united national front, led by a united working class, to complete the anti-imperialist, anti-feudal and democratic stage of the Ceylonese revolution.

The people of Ceylon are, at present, in a new stage of our fight for national liberation. Political independence was substantially achieved after the defeat of the UNP in 1956. Since then, important advances have been made in the fight to destroy the dominance of cosmopolitanism which the imperialists imposed in the cultural sphere, and to promote national languages and culture.

These were important victories. The fight to consolidate and to secure them still continues and must be fought till victory is won.

Lenin, however, has taught us that national liberation cannot be complete unless economic emancipation is achieved. The national liberation revolution does not end with political independence. If this revolution does not solve the urgent tasks of national renascence and lead to profound changes in social and economic life, even the political independence that has been won will be insecure and constantly threatened.

This is why our Party, while carrying on the fight to strengthen political independence and promote national culture, has devoted so much attention in recent years to the fight for economic independence. We have fought to nationalize foreign capital. We have demanded the liberation of the peasantry, the majority of the population, from feudal and semi-feudal relations and from exploitation by landlords and usurers. We have advanced concrete proposals to do away with the economic structure inherited from colonialism and to develop an independent, strong and viable multi-branch economy in which industry will predominate. These ideas have gained support among the people and thus become a material force.

Our 6th Congress was held one month after the historic 1960 Meeting of the fraternal parties. The Statement and other documents of that Meeting were unanimously and enthusiastically approved by our 6th Congress.

Our 7th Congress is held under different conditions for the international Communist movement.

It is held against a background where the leaders of the Chinese Communist Party have launched an open political struggle to overthrow the general line of the 1960 Meeting, which they themselves endorsed.

It is held under conditions where the Chinese leaders openly slander and seek to overthrow the leading organs of other fraternal parties, where they openly encourage, support, promote and theoretically justify splits in other fraternal parties and in the international Communist and democratic movements.

It is no secret that the 1960 Meeting became necessary owing to the fact that in early 1960 the Chinese comrades began to express openly in their publications and at meetings of international democratic organizations views that were opposed to the conclusions of the 1957 Declaration that all fraternal parties, including the CPC, had endorsed.

The differences expressed by the Chinese comrades were thoroughly discussed at the 1960 Meeting. The delegations from other fraternal parties, including the delegation from our own Party, expressed their disagreement with the Chinese position.

Eventually agreement was reached on a common Statement that all fraternal parties, including the CPC, signed.

Events since the 1960 Meeting show that the Chinese leaders, when signing the 1960 Statement, were not acting in a sincere and open manner towards the rest of the international Communist movement but were instead playing for time in order to prepare a new offensive.

This offensive against the general line and the unity and solidarity of the world Communist movement has since been systematically developed from one stage to another.

The CPC leaders began with what they called a "great debate" on certain ideological questions. Although the positions they advanced challenged the general line of the 1957 and 1960 Meetings of many fundamental questions, the Chinese leaders at this stage proclaimed loyalty to the 1957 Declaration and the 1960 Statement.

This was followed by their open letter of June 14, 1963 to the CC of the CPSU. Here the Chinese comrades came out into the open. They began an open political offensive to overthrow the general line of the 1957 and 1960 Meetings and to impose on the international Communist movement a 25-point "general line" of their own.

Needless to say, this aroused indignation and opposition among the fraternal parties.

Since then, the Chinese leaders have passed over to a massive onslaught against other fraternal parties, who do not accept their erroneous views and loyally uphold the general line of the 1957 and 1960 Meetings.

In this, they have gone beyond all limits and have trampled underfoot all norms that should regulate relations between fraternal parties.

The course on which the leaders of the CPC have embarked has nothing in common with a principled discussion of differences on ideological, strategic or tactical questions.

Any such differences that may arise between fraternal parties are capable of solution through discussion based on common fidelity to Marxism-Leninism and proletarian internationalism.

But what have so-called "ideological" differences to do with the reckless and unbridled slander of other fraternal parties and their leaders and leading organs that have become the chief stock-in-trade of the Chinese propagandists?

What "ideological" differences do the leaders of the CPC hope to solve by scurrilous defamations of the CPSU and its leaders whom they accuse, without any regard for truth, of a so-called "unholy alliance" with the imperialists against the peoples of the world?

What questions of Marxist-Leninist principle do they seek to elucidate when they call other Marxist-Leninist parties and respected leaders of world communism "betrayers", "fawners on imperialism", puppets who dance to the "batons" of others, "parrots" who are incapable of independent thought?

This is crude abuse and slander, not principled discussion.

CPC leaders say that they defend the purity of Marxism-Leninism.

But since when has the dissemination of nationalism and even of racism been part of the defense of Marxism-Leninism?

Since when has Marxism-Leninism had to be defended by extolling all types of opportunists, petty-bourgeois adventurists, splitters, corrupt persons and sometimes downright scoundrels as "genuine Marxist-Leninists"?

Since when has the defense of the purity of Marxism-Leninism required resort to methods of personal and political corruption hitherto associated with the bourgeoisie?

CPC leaders speak day in and day out about independence and equality of all fraternal parties, big or small.

But in practice they interfere in the internal affairs of other parties, including small and young parties like ours.

They help to split other parties, set up rival "parties" and even seek to justify the existence of more than one Communist Party in a single country as something not merely quite normal but also inevitable.

They arrogate to themselves the right to declare which members of other fraternal parties are "genuine Marxist-Leninists" and which are not.

All this has created an impermissible and dangerous situation for the international Communist movement which cannot be allowed to continue.

In its statement of September 26, 1963 "On Questions of the International Communist Movement", our Central Committee set out its views on the main ideological questions raised by the Chinese comrades.

We took our stand on the positions of the 1957 Declaration and 1960 Statement and expressed our sharp disagreement with attempts of the CC of the CPC to challenge and oppose many fundamental propositions of the Declaration and Statement which our Party had endorsed.

We cannot fight splittism in practice, internationally or at home, unless we combine the fight with a struggle against the ideological and political positions that lead to, encourage or justify such splits.

At the 1960 Meeting, the Chinese representatives fought bitterly against a proposal to include in the Statement a condemnation of factionalism in the international Communist movement.

Now they argue that the existence of more than one Communist Party in one single country is normal and legitimate.

All these "theories" have not come out of the air. They are intimately connected with the practical activity of the Chinese leaders in promoting international factionalism and splits in other fraternal parties.

Our Party has its own experience of the close and intimate connection between such Chinese "theories" and the practical attempts to split our own Party and to sabotage the United Left Front.

We know very well how the special views of the Chinese comrades were used by the anti-Party Sanmugathasan clique as a banner in their fight to split our Party and oppose the ULF. We know how the anti-unity elements in other Left parties also made those "theories" their banner.

We know the tremendous material, political and other support that the Chinese leaders have rendered these splitters at every stage of their campaign.

We know that techniques and methods adopted by the Sanmugathasan splitters' group against our Party are part of a general pattern used against other fraternal parties, encouraged and promoted by the CPC leaders.

It is not only in Ceylon that anti-Party elements have been encouraged and supported to set up rival so-called "Communist Parties" on the basis of the special views of the Chinese leaders. Similar developments have also taken place in Brazil, Australia, Britain, Belgium and other countries and are being attempted in others as well.

Let not anyone think that the Sanmugathasans and Kumarasiris were unique in adopting the ludicrous technique, after their expulsion from the Party, of holding a mock assembly claiming to be the 7th Congress of our Party, electing a so-called "Central Committee" whose names they are not even ready to reveal, and informing the bourgeois press that they had "expelled" the members of the Central Committee and other leaders of our Party. A similar mockery took place in Peru and will, no doubt, be repeated elsewhere if conditions permit. Although this mockery only aroused derision and contempt in Ceylon, it was solemnly broadcast over Peking Radio and given great publicity in Chinese and Chinese-sponsored publications.

We must tell the Chinese propagandists that it is the members of the Ceylon Communist Party and not anyone in Peking or elsewhere who decide what is the 7th Congress and who are the leaders and members of our Party.

Let us say this straight and let there be no mistake about it. The Communists of Ceylon have never accepted and will never accept the imperialist thesis about "two Chinas". Likewise we do not accept and will never accept the Peking thesis about two Communist Parties in Ceylon.

The splitters and some of their apologists sometimes try to make out that the relations between our Party and the CPC became abnormal only after the CC resolution of September 26. This is absurd and contrary to facts.

To start with, the September 26 CC resolution provides no excuse for the CPC leaders encouraging and supporting factional and splitting activities inside our Party. Political differences are one thing and the promotion of splits quite another.

But it is also necessary to emphasize that Chinese political and material support for this group of splitters dates back to a period much earlier than September 26. In point of fact, direct relations between ourselves and the CPC, which had hitherto been cordial, suddenly stopped on their part after the end of 1962 when we took up a different position from theirs on the events of the Caribbean crisis and in our appraisal of certain events connected with the Sino-Indian border clash.

It was after this that representatives of the CPC, by-passing the CC and its elected officers, sought to strengthen and support those who took the path of factionalism and splittism.

You all know that Sanmugathasan and his clique were not expelled from our Party for their political views but for shameless and deliberate anti-Party factionalism, for undermining the unity of the Party and seeking to split it and set up a rival "Party" for which prior arrangements had been made from about March 1963. The details are set out in the CC resolution which was published.

You are also aware that the CC assured all members that no one would be punished for holding different views but only if they engaged in anti-Party factionalism and supported efforts to split the Party. Without even inquiring to find out what happened, the Peking Review says, without a blush, that their expulsion was "unwarranted".

It is also worth mentioning that Kumarasiri's case was, at this time, still under review by the Central Committee and that only Sanmugathasan had been expelled from the Party. The other persons mentioned as "genuine Marxist-Leninists" were at the time not even on a Party charge.

No doubt Peking Review and those who publish it consider it qute "unwarranted" and legitimate for members of the Political Bureau, as Sanmugathasan was, to oppose the ULF policy of the Party in public lectures, articles and press interviews, to organize separate demonstrations opposed to those organized by the Party and the ULF on the oil question, to attempt to set up under the guise a so-called "Marxist Study Circle" the nucleus of a Party within the Party, with its own platform and list of members, to set up parallel newspapers, youth organizations and women's organizations to those of the Party and opposed to the Party, to seek to misuse his position in the trade union field to set the workers against the Party and the ULF.

After all, this is precisely what Peking is now doing both in Ceylon and internationally.

WHO ARE THE SPLITTERS?

Does Peking Review expect any Ceylonese Communist to take seriously its claim that those it names are real revolutionaries and genuine Marxist-Leninists.

Kumarasiri, for instance, was the leading spokesman of Right opportunism in our Central Committee, the main exponent of complete capitulation to the national bourgeoisie, the man who openly boasted in the CC that he had opposed all mass struggles after the SLFP government came to power.

Yet Peking Review considers him a "genuine revolutionary".

Our members know very well the real character and actions of some of the people whom Peking Review dubs as "genuine Marxist-Leninists".

We know the person who has become the so-called "Assistant National Organizer" of the splitters' party. We all know his reputation in regard to financial matters. The Badulla comrades framed serious charges of financial irregularities against him, and a Party commission, which inquired into the matter found him guilty.

But before the CC could deal with him, he became a "genuine Marxist-Leninist" — à la Peking.

Another leading member of the splitters' Central Committee had the brazenness to tell us that he had been offered Rs. 5,000 to join the splitters but was prepared to reconsider the matter if we offered him the same amount in turn.

The splitters — or at least the leading ones — are doing well out of their apostasy.

Several of them have been provided with new well-furnished houses, vehicles and other amenities.

They and their wives have been given jobs — and the pay is not bad either.

All this undoubtedly helps them to develop a truly "revolutionary" spirit!

Do the editors of Peking Review know how some of the signatures to the documents they publish are obtained? Take the case of one of our comrades who was a full-time worker in the CTUF. He was not paid his allowance for several months and put into economic difficulties. He was then told that he would be paid provided he signed a document condemning the CC.

It is quite obvious that the Chinese publicists do not care what stick they pick up to beat our Party. They should read the articles we published from Comrades like S. S. de Silva who left the splitters in disgust, exposing their true face.

Of course there were a few genuine and confused persons who were deceived by the splitters and joined them temporarily. Some have come back to the Party, others have dropped out and become non-political, and some have made approaches to the Party to take them back. But the main core of the splitters are a gang of opportunists and renegades and the Party is stronger and purified now that they have gone.

No, comrades, if the relations between the CPC and our Party are not normal, it is because the CPC has interfered in our internal affairs and encouraged splits and factionalism. We would like to normalize matters but this requires that the CPC should not interfere in our internal affairs.

The dangerous and impermissible position that the CPC has created in the international Communist movement should not be allowed to continue.

We feel that the entire movement should now rally to rebuff these tactics and to defend and strengthen the unity and cohesion of the international Communist movement.

We feel that this situation requires another international meeting as early as possible. We therefore support the appeal made by several other fraternal parties for another meeting this year.

The struggle that our Party has successfully waged against the Sanmugathasan anti-Party splitters' clique who were supported and encouraged from Peking, has given us experiences which are valuable not only to our Party, not only to the entire Left movement, but also to other fraternal parties that face similar attacks.

In a sense, our Party was one of the first guinea-pigs for a world-wide experiment. Well, we stood the test and survived. Let it be said to the credit of our Party, that we fought back this "experiment" and overcame its evil consequences.

That is why our 7th Congress, which sums up these experiences, has not only a domestic, but a certain international significance.

The inner-Party struggle that we had to face and overcome was not, however, solely due to external causes. It arose, in the first instance, from domestic reasons—from the opposition of Sanmugathasan and Kumarasiri, from their respective points of of view, to the course set by our CC when at its historic meeting in August 1962, it advanced the proposal of building a United Left Front on an agreed program as an immediate and realizable objective.

What is common to the splitters' group in our Party and similar groups in other Left parties is their common opposition to the path of the ULF. This is because the social stratum on which all these groups mainly rely for support is the English-speaking petty bourgeoisie.

Our political resolution correctly stresses that the class roots of the opposition to the ULF within our Party and other Left parties are to be found in this social stratum.
